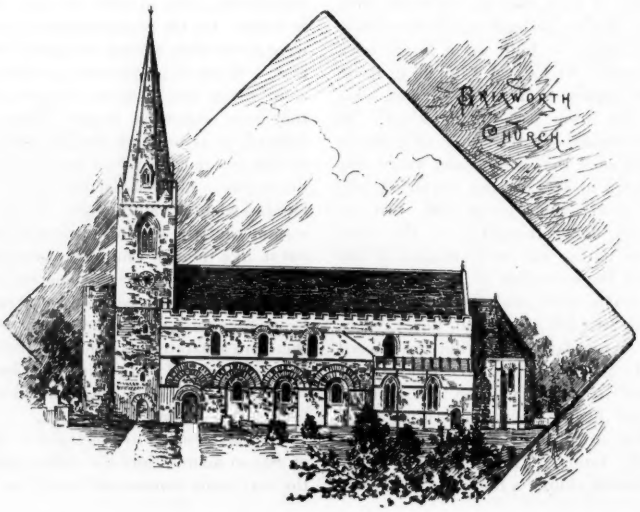
walls have been replaced. The doorway to the winding staircase, which opens into the nave, is only eighteen inches across, and the steps are in the thickness of the northernmost pier. These sturdy, hoary relics are full of associations for us. They bring before us the brave, hardy, blue-eyed people whose singers spoke of the sea as the swan's path, the gannet's bath, and the water-street; who called themselves battle-smiths, war-wolves, and war-smiths; whose kings gave bracelets to those they would honour, and in one instance placed bracelets along the roads with the certainty that none of their subjects would appropriate them. We can realise how simply, how solemnly, they worshipped, how their battle-axes and other war-gear, their mead-halls and sea-ships, their ravages, pillages, reprisals, their carousals and ale-revels, gradually became as naught compared to the worship of God and the duty of loving their neighbours as themselves.

BARTON-UPON-HUMBER.

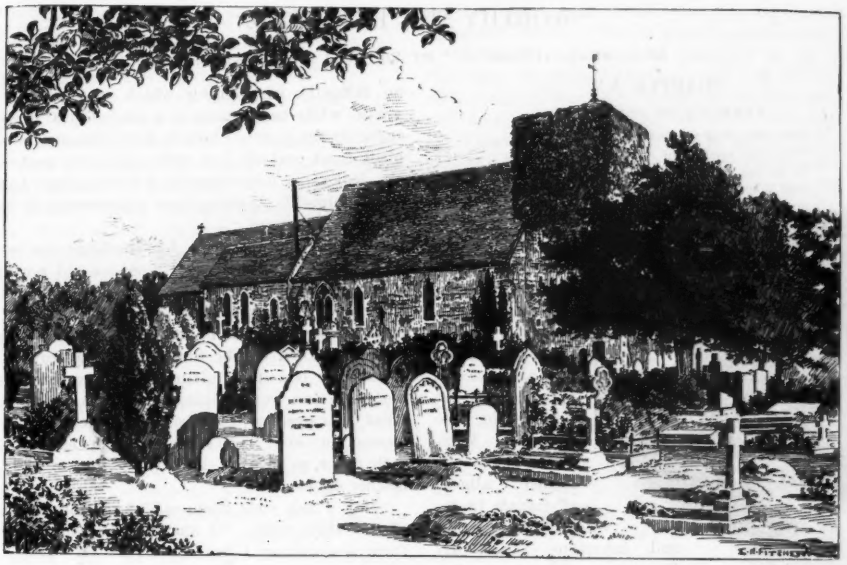
DOORWAY IN BARTON CHURCH.

Among the Saxons whose names have come down to us are two ecclesiastics whose zeal found special outlet in the building of churches. One of these was Wilfred, Bishop of York, who so built Hexham church that it was allowed to be the finest structure on this side of the Alps. The walls were three tiers in height, supported by columns, and below was the crypt just mentioned, with its approaches. Wilfred also built two other churches in Hexham, one of which, the chronicler tells us, was round; and he founded Ripon Cathedral, as well as several other ecclesiastical fabrics in other parts of the country. The other Saxon church-builder of whom we have special mention is Benedict Biscop, who built, first, Wearmouth church, and then that at Jarrow. He founded the first about A.D. 675.

Of some of the old lowly thick-walled churches reared by the vigorous Saxons, only the tower arches are left, and in some others only the chancel arches, all the walls of nave, chancel, and tower alike having been taken down—perhaps at different times—that new ones might be built on a larger scale covering the same site. At Kilpeck Church, in Herefordshire, Norman masons seem to have spared some Saxon work in the lower part of the tower. At Whalton, in Northumberland, the whole of a Saxon church, built there more than a thousand years ago, has been taken down in the passing centuries, save the tall, narrow, semicircular tower arch. In the church of St. Peter, Long Houghton, in the same county, the Saxon edifice has been effaced in the same manner, with the exception of the tower arch, with its strong square piers, and the chancel arch. As these two have been left untouched, they give us the length of the Saxon nave, which did not exceed forty-two feet. In some instances even these venerable relics are lost to us, every stone, down to the level of the ground, having been removed; and yet below the floor-line still lie all the primitive reliable foundations, solidly intact. This was found to be the case in Warkworth church a few years ago, when the floor of the Norman church was taken up. There, low within, lay the old Saxon foundations of the church that was built when Ceolwulph, King of Northumbria, to whom the Venerable Bede dedicated his history, retired to the monastery on Holy Island, and gave Werceworde, among other possessions, to the fraternity. There was the foundation-stone hollowed out for the reception of a record or for coins, which previous explorers had duly removed, and there were the lines of stones marking a smaller site than that which the Normans had covered. The greatest of the Saxon kings, Alfred the Truth-teller, wrote: "True nobility is in the mind, not in the flesh. I wished to live honourably whilst I lived, and after my life to leave to the men who were after me my memory in good works." And as we examine the old works in masonry that the Saxon masons have left us, we can only conclude they shared these noble sentiments.



The windows of these old times were of the smallest dimensions, some of them not more than six inches in width. On the ground storey, we may be sure, they were never wide enough to admit the entrance of a man. When in an elevated position, where defence from attack would not be so much of a consideration, they were somewhat larger. They were all deeply splayed, so as to admit the greatest amount of light to the interior that was possible to their external limitations. As Benedict Biscop was the first church-builder who introduced the use of glass, we must assume that the windows before his time were without it, like those of Continental countries at the same period. The headings of some are semicircular, and of others triangular, as though two stones were placed to rest against each other, edge to edge. Most of them are separated by a small baluster-like shaft into two divisions. Two, about six inches in width, were recently uncovered by the removal of plaster in the tower of Embleton church.



The Saxon doorways pictured in the illuminations of Saxon manuscripts are sometimes enriched with the very same ornamental work we may see in the rare ancient examples left to us, such as conventional lines representing foliage, and intertwining lines representing intricate knots. Some doorways have also representations of angelic figures, and sometimes of grotesque figures, carved on the semicircular spaces in the heading. One at Barton-on-Humber has a triangular heading. The caps of the columns on either side of the doorway of Water-Stratford, Bucks, have the intertwined work always found on crosses of Saxon workmanship, though the rest of the entrance has a later character. In Charney Chapel there is a curious bas-relief carved in the form of a tympanum, which has a semicircular contour of the foliage-like ornamentation mentioned, encompassing a crowned figure between two bird-headed winged quadrupeds, the beaks of which are holding its arms as its hands rest on their necks.

The walls were sometimes more than three feet thick, as may be seen in Brixworth church. In the very heart of the sumptuous remains of the priory church which the Normans built upon the site of the ancient Saxon edifice on Holy Island, may still be seen two lengths of walling differing from the rest. These are the north and south walls of the old Saxon church the Normans found in ruins. Instead of pulling them down, they preserved these lengths of solid masonry, made with flattish slab-like stones, three feet in length here and there, and built extensions in length and additions in height to them. They are about twenty feet long and six feet in height, without break for doorways or windows, but with a recess for an aumbry; and above them and adjoining them eastwards are the smaller, squarer stones of the Normans, with their windows and enrichments. And just as they handed down to us these ancient Saxon fragments, Plantagenet masons, coming after them with intent to enlarge their sombre work, left us one of their round-headed windows on either side of their masonry over the old Saxon walling, though they broke out the rest into larger openings with Pointed arches, to get more light. Here, then, in this semi-island—for twice a day the so-called island is connected with the land by three miles of low flat sands from which the sea has receded—is a veritable relic of the days of the Anglo-Saxons, and perhaps of the Heptarchy, firm still, compact, solid, and unmistakable.

The ancient chroniclers mention Christian churches that were in use by the ancient Britons before the conversion of the Saxons. Of these structures we have no identified remains. They may have been built of wood, or the stones of which they were built may have been used again on enlargements and alterations by the Saxons, just as we know they used Roman stones that they found ready hewn at Hexham and Jarrow. We have wo.d that when Augustine and his associates arrived at Canterbury for the purpose of converting the Saxons, the queen had prepared for them the ancient church of St. Martin, which had originally belonged to the Britons, and had been recently repaired; and again, when King Ethelbert was baptised, he retired to the city of Reculver, and gave Canterbury to the missionaries, when the church of St. Saviour, originally built by the Britons, was repaired and made into a residence for them. It has been suggested that ancient British churches may have been round, either as assisting continuity of idea by preserving the association of sanctity with circles of stones, as in the old Druidical temples, or as a faithful though remote approach to the form of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. We learn from the chronicles that some of the earliest Anglo-Saxon churches were round, as in the second church Wilfred built at ST. MARTIN'S, CANTERBURY.

Hexham, and the second church Benedict Biscop built at Wearmouth. All traces of these are obliterated. But we may note, too, that a large number of the churches the Normans erected all over the land had semicircular apses as terminations to the chancels and aisles, as in the priory church just mentioned on Holy Island; and smaller structures without aisles had apsidal terminations to the chancels, as at the beautiful little chapel at the foot of the Bewick hills in North Northumberland, and the chancels of the churches at Padworth, Finchampstead and Remenham, in Berkshire; which feature might be regarded as a modification of the same structural arrangement.

A close scrutiny of our old churches would doubtless result in the disclosure that the fragments of Saxon architecture that have been preserved in them are much more numerous than we now know. At present they exceed a hundred in number, counting from Kent to Cornwall in one direction, and from the same starting-point to Northumberland in another. In Sir Walter Scott's time all Norman architecture was ascribed to the Saxons; even Holy Island Priory, in his rich and mellow wording, frowned "in Saxon strength, with massive arches broad and low"; and in the restitution made by public opinion the other extreme has been fallen into of assigning too much to the Normans, and many fragments of the work of the brave battle-smiths and war-wolves have been accounted "Early Norman," and "very early Norman." We know of the strength, hardihood, energy, enthusiasm, and piety of the Saxons, their baptisms in great crowds; and we have their copies of the Gospels and other manuscripts written with a perfection we cannot exceed, and enriched with illuminations that have not yet faded; and bearing in mind the natural result of this combination of power and facility, it would be wonderful indeed if all structural tokens of it had disappeared.

The very words have been passed on to us that threw the requisite balance into the scale when the question of the adoption or rejection of the Christian faith was before an assembly convened by King Edwin of Northumbria for decision. We are told a Saxon Ealdorman arose and spoke these persuasive words:—"Thus seemeth to me, O King, this present life of man upon earth, compared with the time which is unknown to us; even as if you were sitting at a feast, amid your Ealdormen and Thegns in winter time. And the fire is lighted, and the hall warmed, and it rains, and snows, and storms without. Then cometh a sparrow, and flieth about the hall. It cometh in at one door, and goeth out at another. While it is within, it is not touched by the winter's storm; but that is only for a moment, only for the least space. Out of the winter it cometh, to return again into the winter left soon. So also this life of man endureth for a little space. What goeth before it and what followeth after, we know not. Wherefore, if this new lore bring aught more certain and more advantageous, then is it worthy that we should follow it."

Whether further identifications of Saxon work are in store for us or not, it is pleasant to find here and there, through the length and breadth of the land, traces of structures the national conversion called into requisition so long before the days of William the Conqueror. S. W.

CHAPTER XX.

VEREKER OF VERECROFT.

"Loke who that is most vertuous alway,
Prive and apert, and most entendeth ay
To do the gentil dedës that he can,
And take him for the gretest gentilman."—CHAUCER.

SIR RAYMOND'S room was one of the most luxurious in Verecroft. Austerity in any shape or form was alien to his nature, and at first sight the heir of Verecroft's apartment looked almost effeminate in its lavish decoration and luxurious furnishing. It was more like a woman's room than a man's, Lancelot often said, with the affectionate banter that hid so much real admiration. There were, indeed, whips, and guns, and foils, to bear witness to masculine ownership, but they were almost lost amongst the pictures that adorned the delicately tinted walls. The pictures were all good of their kind, but they were not the kind affected by the neighbouring squires. The customary hunting scenes, with horses and hounds streaming across green down or fallow field, with brown woods in the distance, and pink coats for effective touches of colour, were conspicuous by their absence. Landscapes by Cooper or Cuyp, figures by Millais or Leighton, replaced the conventional sport; and amongst them were one or two gems of historic fame and fabulous cost. Art was a passion, not a taste, with this latest Vereker of Verecroft, and he spared neither money nor pains for its gratification. There was only one inartistic painting in the room, and no one could blame the filial piety which condoned the execution for the sake of the subject. A half-length portrait of the late Sir Raymond hung over the fireplace, and bad as the painting was, there was no doubt it was an excellent likeness. The blonde debonair youth, with his honest grey eyes and wholesome English colouring, lived again on the canvas, and Dr. Fletcher recognised him at once. "Poor fellow, poor fellow!" he said, "how little he thought who would reign here in his stead! Well, I wish the young man would appear, and let us get it all over. I'm sorry for him; for, after all, it is probably no fault of his."

And then the door opened, and Lancelot came in, and looked inquiringly at the two unexpected guests. That one was a doctor, and the other a minister of some kind or other, he already knew, and there was no difficulty in deciding which was which. The gentle, white-haired man, in a semi-clerical dress, was certainly the pasteur; and the Englishman, who wore a black frock-coat and had such a distinctly professional air, looked so unmistakably a doctor, that Lancelot found himself thinking how unnecessary it was to put it on his card.

"We have to apologise for troubling you so late in the day," said the doctor; "but we did not understand that Verecroft was so far from Warwick, and the drive took us longer than we expected. Our business is urgent, as I am unfortunately obliged to return to town by the first train to-morrow."

Lancelot bowed inquiringly. He wondered why both the men were looking at him so curiously, and what their business could be. Whatever it was, neither seemed very anxious to enter upon it. They looked at each other, as if each desired the other to begin, and neither spoke.

"May I ask your business?" Lancelot said, as he offered them seats. "I am quite at your service, if there is anything I can do."

In his own mind, Mr. Vereker had decided that it was probably a begging affair. The little pasteur looked as if he might be a deputation from some religious society; though what the English doctor had to do with it remained to be seen.

"Sir Raymond Vereker will understand," the little minister said at last, "that only a quite strong sense of ze duty have brought us to hereward. We make our apologies en avant—what you call before ze hand—for the so painful nature of our coming, and desire his good forgiveness when we shall find ourselves compelled an innocent man to all unwillingly offend."

"If you mean me, I am not likely to take offence without cause," said Lancelot. "Be kind enough to explain what it is you want."

He could not help liking the kind-faced little man who was evidently so proud of his English, but there was something in the doctor's manner which he did not like at all.

"You don't remember me, of course," Dr. Fletcher said now, "but I wonder if you have ever heard my name?"

"Never to my knowledge, certainly."

"I was at Chamounix when the late Sir Raymond Vereker met his untimely fate, and I attended Lady Vereker when her son was born. I may as well explain at once that circumstances which then took place have recently come to my knowledge, and that I conceive it to be my duty—as it would be the duty of any other honest man—to make you acquainted with them, supposing that you are really in ignorance of what so nearly concerns yourself."

The doctor's quick eyes rested on the young man's face with a suspicious scrutiny that would certainly have set Sir Raymond's temper in a blaze, but his cousin had more self-control.

"I know nothing of the time you speak of," he said quietly. "But I cannot imagine that you should be better informed than myself of any circumstances it really concerned me to know."

The little pasteur looked at him with a friendly, and even compassionate glance.

"I think well he nothing knows," he said to his companion, who assented with a nod.

"Our business is all the more unpleasant," said the doctor, turning to Lancelot, whose surprise increased with every word. "I must ask you to understand that we make no charge against yourself. It is quite possible—it is, indeed, extremely probable—that the facts of the case have never been confided to you. Mrs. Kenyon arranged everything. Mrs. Kenyon——"

"Mrs. Kenyon is dead," said Lancelot repressively.

"So I am aware, or I should have asked for her instead of for the young man who is called Sir Raymond Vereker," said Dr. Fletcher, in a tone whose significance could not escape notice.

"Who is called!" ejaculated Lancelot. He sprang to his feet, and looked at the two men with a sudden recollection of Mrs. Kenyon's will, and the terms in which her grandson had been mentioned in it, and felt as if the room were whirling round. What did it all mean, and why were they both looking at him with such unmistakable sympathy and pity?

"I assure you, Sir Raymond——" Dr. Fletcher began, but Lancelot interrupted.

"I am not Sir Raymond," he exclaimed. "I am his cousin, Lancelot Vereker."

"Lanzelot! Ze next heir?" cried the pasteur, in great excitement, while Dr. Fletcher exclaimed with hardly less interest—

"The next-of-kin! And we were wondering how we should find you out!"

"Verily," cried the little pasteur, "the ways of God are wonderful! It is He, O mine friend, that has our steps hitherward directed, and this young man unto us sent. It is to the heir himself, see you, that our proofs shall be given. That poor boy, Sir Raymond you call, it was too much to ask of any man. But, sare, the proofs with your own eyes shall you see!"

He unbuttoned a pocket inside his coat, and took from it a tiny bundle of papers, but Dr. Fletcher laid his hand restrainingly upon them.

"Let me explain," he said. "He will not understand them till he knows all about them, and how they came into our possession. If you will kindly give me your attention, Sir Lancelot——"

"It is my cousin who is the baronet," interrupted Lance. "I am plain Lancelot Vereker, as I told you just now."

"So you think, we are aware. When you have read M. Martel's papers you will understand that—if you are really the next-of-kin—you are Sir Lancelot Vereker of Verecroft."

"But my cousin—Sir Raymond," stammered Lancelot, too surprised to say more.

"Your cousin Sir Raymond is neither cousin, nor Sir, nor Raymond," said Dr. Fletcher. "The young man who has borne those names is not even a Vereker at all. He is Giuseppe Balmano, an Italian singer's son, as these papers will abundantly prove."

"Let me see them," said Lancelot. "Your proofs had need to be ample to support such an assertion! If they are insufficient, I can assure you that my cousin, Sir Raymond, will know how to punish his calumniators."

He looked very tall and dignified as he stood regarding the imperturbable doctor and the gentle, mild-faced old man, with something between defiance and unwilling belief. He owned to himself, as Dr. Fletcher bowed gravely and M. Martel spread his papers eagerly out, that at least they believed their own tale, impossible as it sounded.

And then he remembered Mrs. Kenyon's will, and the terms of the bequest to himself. "And if, through the accruing of other moneys, these moneys of mine should be no longer needed. . . ." He remembered that, and how she had provided that if the "young man known as Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft should be in need or want," her money was to pass from Lancelot to him, "by whatever name he might be known!" It was true, he felt, and Mrs. Kenyon had known the truth!

He went to the door and locked it; for might not Sir Raymond return, and come all unprepared amongst them? Then he came back to his chair, and sat down to listen with the crushed, hopeless feeling of a man who strives against his fate. He had said once that he would rather be Vereker of Verecroft than King of England, but as he thought of the man he still called his cousin, he felt that he would rather have been the meanest hind in the village than this that they said he was.

And then, while Lancelot listened, dumb with surprise and pain, Dr. Fletcher related how he had been present at the birth of Lady Vereker's son, how delicate the child had been, and how he had engaged the services of Louise Balmano as nurse. He spoke of the contrast between the nurse's healthy babe and the frail little baronet, of his own conviction that when he left Chamounix the infant Sir Raymond had only a few hours to live, and of his surprise when he heard afterwards that the child he left in extremis had actually recovered.

"The thought of foul play never even crossed my mind," said Dr. Fletcher. "I was a young man then, and I felt an unlimited admiration and respect for the doctor who had effected the all but miraculous cure; and there, as far as I was concerned, the matter might have ended. It is M. Martel who must tell you the rest. He came to see me two days ago, and I felt the matter important enough to come down with him, and add my testimony to the truth of his account."

"It was the mother who the extraordinary but quite-to-be-believed story told me," said the little pasteur, looking sympathetically at Lancelot's troubled face. "You are ému, my young friend, and it seems to me it does you honour! But the facts, the facts are as I say. Madame Caillot sent for me on her bed of death."

"Madame Caillot?" said Lancelot inquiringly.

"Louise Balmano—her husband died, and she espoused Gustave Caillot, a Swiss guide of Chamounix, but he treat her not well, and she die, poor soul, it is a week ago. She knew that in this world she would well never again be, and she begged me her son to find, and tell him who he was. Here are her words, by me attested, and by my own hand taken down."

"Do you mean that the woman had been wicked enough to substitute her own child?"

"Wicked, or weak? we cannot tell," said the gentle pasteur. "No doubt she thought she was doing well for her child, and a bribe was offered that to her simple peasant mind truly enormous seemed."

"There is no doubt that Mrs. Kenyon was at the bottom of it all," said Dr. Fletcher. "What her motive was I cannot pretend to say, nor whether she ever repented of the wrong she had certainly done you; but there is no doubt, from Louise's confession, that Mrs. Kenyon arranged the whole business."

"She did repent—she tried to tell me—I see it all now," Lancelot said, in a broken voice.

The remembrance of that terrible death-bed almost overcame him. "Not Raymond—Lancelot!"—what significance there seemed in the rambling, disjointed words now! what meaning in the agonised attempts at utterance! what pathos in the prayer for his own forgiveness!

"Do you think that Lady Vereker knows?" Dr. Fletcher asked suddenly.

"No—oh, no!—I am sure she does not," answered Lancelot. He spoke with quick conviction, but reflection only assured him that he was right. Only to her own child, or to one that she at least believed to be her own, could Lady Vereker have poured forth that wealth of maternal devotion that seemed the very flower and crown of her life. How would she feel when she knew that her own child was lying in the little Alpine graveyard, that the love that should have been buried with it had been lavished on a peasant-woman's son?

"It will kill her!" he said in his heart, as Mrs. Kenyon had said before him, and he felt very tenderly of the sorely tempted mother who had sinned for her daughter's sake. He understood how Lady Vereker's passionate devotion to the child she deemed her own had sealed her mother's lips, even when she would fain have repaired the wrong she had done. She had borne her burden of unconfessed guilt even to the grave rather than destroy the fond illusion that made the happiness of her daughter's life; and it was left to him—to the boy Lady Vereker had loved only next to him she deemed her son, to the youth she had loaded with benefits, to the man who had told himself he would count no sacrifice too great for her sweet sake, who had only to-day proved his words by the surrender of his love—it was left to him to bring this great sorrow upon her by the assertion of his rights. He looked at the two men who were watching him so closely with a trouble in the brave brown eyes they could not understand. How were they to guess that he was asking himself, "Need she ever know?" He took the papers, and read them carefully through. One was a deed of gift by which Mrs. Kenyon made over two thousand pounds to Louise Balmano for her life, with reversion to Sir Raymond Vereker at her death; the other was a circumstantial account of the exchange of the living child for the dead one in the interval that elapsed between the departure of Dr. Fletcher and the arrival of Dr. Overton. It was written in M. Martel's faint, precise handwriting, and witnessed by himself. The dying woman's illiterate signature struck Lancelot with a sort of grotesque pathos. Was this the mother of the man whom Lady Vereker called her son, who was to himself all that a brother could be, who was the betrothed husband of Avice Meredith!

"You say that this woman is dead?" he said to M. Martel.

"Yes," said the kindly little man with a sigh. "She longed to see her son, to clasp him once more in her arms, but she lived not her wish to gain. I hurry from her side, with ze proofs, as you see—I find ze good docteur—and yesterday we hear of her death."

"Who else knows?" asked Lancelot.

"Knows? Who should know? No one could know but the two women who have gone to their account," said Dr. Fletcher. "But, Sir Lancelot, there is surely proof enough——"

"More than enough," said Lancelot, "since I do not mean to use it. I am obliged to you both for the trouble you have taken, but I am sure it will be best to leave things as they are."

"As they are?" ejaculated Dr. Fletcher. "Do you mean that you will not claim your rights—that you will let a fine property and an honourable title slip through your fingers for want of the spirit to fight it out? I tell you this fellow hasn't a leg to stand on. Ask any lawyer you please——"

"You do not understand," interrupted Lancelot, smiling a little at the other's heat. "It is not that I think I could not make good my claim. I have no doubt at all that it is exactly as you say—that I am Vereker of Verecroft, and that Sir Raymond is Giuseppe Balmano—but it would do more harm than good to make it known. Lady Vereker knows nothing, and Sir Raymond is as innocent as herself. They have done me no intentional wrong, and all I have I owe to them. I will not requite their kindness by bringing such sorrow upon them."

"Heaven bless you, my son!" said the little pasteur solemnly; but Dr. Fletcher shrugged his shoulders.

"It is an amiable intention," he observed, "but you will probably change your mind when you come to think things over. However, we have done our duty in the matter, and it is for you to decide what course you will take."

"I have decided," said Lancelot gravely. "If the —the mother had lived, it would have been more difficult to see what was right, but now I have no doubt at all."

"Well," said Dr. Fletcher, getting up, "we will leave you the proofs, and you must forgive me if I say that I shall look in the law reports for Vereker v. Vereker, and I don't think I shall be disappointed."

"I trust you will give me your word to say nothing on the subject till you do," said Lancelot earnestly.

"With all my heart," said the doctor, shaking his hand.

M. Martel gave his promise too, and Lancelot saw them into the dog-cart they had driven over in, with feelings of inexpressible relief.

"Mind you take care of the papers," Dr. Fletcher called out as they drove away. "Remember, they are all the proofs you have, and some day you may want them."

XUM

Lancelot looked after the cynical doctor and the white-haired minister with a curious, doubtful smile.

"The only proofs," he repeated slowly. Then he decided—rightly or wrongly let the reader judge—what he would do.

He went back to Sir Raymond's room, and took the papers to his own. A few minutes he stood looking at them with a very grave face, and then he laid them in the empty grate, lit a match, and stood by till only a little black film remained.

"Five minutes ago I was Vereker of Verecroft," he thought, with a sigh that was full of pain. "There is nothing hard in this—but oh! Avice, my love, my love!"

"He stood by till only a little black film remained."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE "BEST GOLD."

"'Tis gold
Which buys admittance."—Shakespeare.

"My dear Hilda," cried Lady Rosalie the next morning, looking up from the depths of an ample easy-chair as Hilda came into the room after her morning walk, "what do you think is the latest piece of news? Guess! I never was so delighted in my life."

"I suppose, as you 're so ridiculously excited about it, there 's a wedding on the carpet," said Miss Jackson, sinking into a companion lounge on the opposite side of the fireplace and looking supremely scornful. "Really, Rosalie, what is there to be so delighted about? I'm thankful to say I don't waste my emotions like that."

"But this is too delightful. I have just been in to the Hermitage, and they tell me Avice is engaged to Sir Raymond Vereker! And oh! my dear, her ring is something past belief."

"A ring already? He must have made pretty sure of her consent!"

"Well—I dare say. He could not help knowing no girl in her senses would refuse a chance like that. But the ring is something magnificent—it couldn't have cost less than three hundred pounds, if I'm any judge of diamonds. I suppose after twenty-one years' minority he has more money than he knows what to do with."

"What does the lady-mother say to it all?"

"Oh, she's all that's sweet, they say. It seems she sent Avice a letter—or a message, I'm not clear which—which really settled it, and Avice and Daisy are going over to spend a week at Verecroft."

"There's promotion for your protégées! I wonder if they'll marry Daisy to your friend Lancelot?" said Hilda, with a faint, bitter sneer.

Lady Rosalie sat up and looked at her friend earnestly.

"Hilda, should you mind if I said something—really for your good?"

"Most certainly I should! Never mind my good, please. That's how people always begin to say the most disagreeable things they can think of."

"But do let me, because when people care about anyone, you know, they are so often blind. And since that night at Lord Blackstone's, I have been quite sure that Philip Hallam is in love with Daisy Meredith!"

Hilda flushed darkly.

"He is quite welcome to be, so long as he doesn't marry her, and I don't think he will do that."

"Don't you?"—very doubtfully. "He has money enough for both, I should think, and, though you are always saying no one knows who the Mereditha are, I don't think he's the sort of man to care about that sort of thing."

"He's goose enough for anything, if that's what you mean. But I don't think he'll ask Daisy to marry him—and, if he does, I believe she'll refuse."

Lady Rosalie shook her head over her friend's blind infatuation, but Hilda did not attempt to justify her opinion. She had never told Lady Rosalie the story Lord Blackstone had related at Avonmead, or hinted at the explanation it afforded of her own discoveries at the Hermitage. She did not intend to tell it to anyone yet. It could do no good, she argued, and would only make Philip Hallam her enemy, while to keep Daisy's unhappy secret would be a claim on his friendship he was not likely to dispute. She had taken care that he should know that Daisy Meredith was Daisy Dalrymple, the forger's daughter, and she thought it quite possible that, in spite of his assertions, he would sacrifice love to pride. It was quite possible that he might not propose to her, and if he did—well! if he did, she had taken measures which she believed would insure the refusal of his offer.

The anonymous letter that had brought such desolation to Daisy's tender heart had been written by Hilda's hand, and she had not miscalculated its effect. She understood that, whatever Captain Hallam might do or say, Daisy would refuse to bring to the man she loved a stained, dishonoured name. She knew, though Lady Rosalie did not, the meaning of Daisy's white, piteous face, of Daisy's sad eyes and vanished smile. She could even afford to pity the suffering she had caused, for she knew that her end was gained.

Lady Rosalie looked at her as she sat thoughtful and silent, and felt very pitiful and sympathetic.

"If you take my advice, Hilda," she said earnestly, "you'll just put Captain Hallam out of your head. He's a flirt, like all those army men——"

"I know, I know," said Hilda impatiently. She knew that Lady Rosalie was thinking of the various captains and lieutenants, and even of a stray colonel or two, who had fallen victims to Hilda's maturing charms, who had ridden and talked and walked with her, and done nothing more. They had cooled off, or gone away, or married someone else; and now Philip Hallam was going to do the same!

"But I did think he meant it," said Hilda, forlornly. "I did think I should pull it off this time; and I should, if it hadn't been for that baby-faced chit."

A few slow tears rolled down, and though Hilda would have been the first to sneer at anyone who made a confidante of Lady Rosalie, she felt so secure of her sympathy and silence, that she did not even try to hide them.

"Oh, Hilda, you'll be ill!" exclaimed her warm-hearted friend. "I never saw you cry before, and I can't bear to see it. I'll see Captain Hallam—I'll give him a hint——"

"You'll do nothing of the sort," said Miss Jackson, sitting up with great energy. "I won't have you interfering, and spoiling everything with your blunders. If he's really gone, do you think you could bring him back?"

"You used to think I was useful," said poor Lady Rosalie, who looked ready to cry herself at this reception of her well-meant offers.

"So you were, to play propriety. I couldn't have walked all the miles I've tramped on the Warwick Road with Captain Hallam alone. I couldn't have gone there continually if you hadn't been so anxious to sketch the Castle, and so interested in that horrid old pensioner's grandchildren—wretched little slobbery things! My velvet mantle will never recover from their sticky paws—and to think that it's all for nothing! The walks we've had, when it was horses' work to keep him good-tempered and amused, the hours we've sat together on those dull, stupid seats, and now to be thrown over like this! I do hate a flirt!"

Lady Rosalie refrained from reminding her friend that it had always been Hilda herself, and not Captain Hallam, who had proposed the walks, and suggested the virtual appointments, and lingered perseveringly on the wayside seats. She was very sorry for Hilda's disappointment, but she was quite aware how much she had brought it upon herself, though she was too good-natured to say so.

"I quite forgot to tell you that I saw the 'Best Gold' yesterday," she observed irrelevantly. "I met him on the Parade, and he asked as anxiously after your health as if you were a chronic sufferer from a hopeless complication of incurable diseases."

"'The Best Gold?'" said Miss Jackson disdainfully. "Why should you tell me that you met him? And why should you call him by that ridiculous name, now we know what his own name is?"

But Lady Rosalie noticed that her friend dried her eyes and listened, in spite of her scornful tones, and launched into details of the meeting in hopes of diverting Hilda's thoughts from the recalcitrant captain.

The "Best Gold" was a tall, fairly good-looking man, with a face as weak as his arms were strong, who appeared in Leamington every year at the annual archery meeting, and distanced all competitors in that once fashionable sport. He had won the prize for the Best Gold so often that Lady Rosalie had dubbed him by that name; but she had known nothing of him personally till last year, when an arrow of his, flying far beyond its mark, had transfixed a little dog of Miss Jackson's that had strayed on to the course, and the Best Gold's regret had been so sincere, and his sympathy so respectfully effusive, that a sort of acquaintance had arisen. His name, he told the ladies of the Rosery, was Ruggles, and he further informed them that he was in the Commissariat Department, and had a house and grounds at Clapham. He had a slight tendency to lengthen his vowels and clip the ends of his words, but his manners were better than his accent, and he sent Miss Jackson a dog, who was as famous at dog-shows as his master was at archery meetings, to console her for the loss of her own. The fair Hilda had been graciously pleased to accept it, and on his next arrival in Leamington, Mr. Ruggles had called at the Rosery to inquire after the welfare of his canine friend, and had displayed a praiseworthy appreciation of its new owner's charms. But if Mr. Ruggles was an admirer, he was much too conscious of his own deficiencies to offer more than a silent and respectful worship. He gazed on Hilda with lack-lustre eyes, and sighed like a veritable furnace; but it was Lady Rosalie he talked to, and though it had become a joke at the Rosery to allude to him as "Hilda's latest," there was enough suspicion of social inferiority to make it the emptiest of jests. That he should be seriously brought forward as a consolation for Captain Hallam's defection was trying to Miss Jackson's temper and exasperating to her pride, and when it was evident that Lady Rosalie had nothing more to tell, she fell upon her for having told anything at all.

"But you never have any proper pride," she said, in an injured tone. "You are always so ready to take people up without knowing anything about them. Look at those Meredith girls! And now, I suppose, you want to send a card to this Ruggles for your musical on Tuesday, though you know he'll sit like a dummy all the evening, and everyone will wonder where you picked him up."

To do Lady Rosalie justice, the idea of inviting Mr. Ruggles for Tuesday had never entered her head; but now she looked at her friend's inscrutable face inquiringly. Some experience of Hilda's little ways had shown her that it was not safe to accept her remarks too literally.

"I can ask him, of course, if you like."

"If I like!" cried Miss Jackson. "Don't make me the screen for your own absurdities, if you please. You've evidently taken a fancy to the man, though I believe he never had a grandfather, and isn't even steady on his h's, and it isn't for me to interfere. All I say is, ask him if you choose; but don't mix me up in the matter."

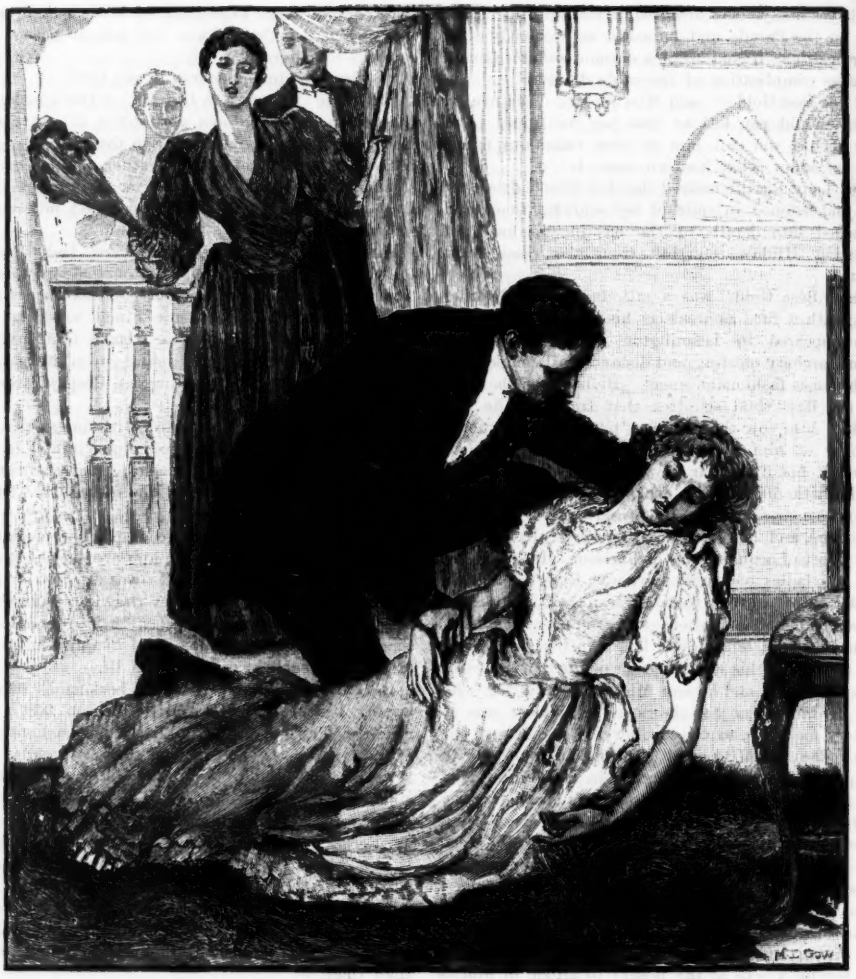
Hilda sailed away majestically, and Lady Rosalie looked after her with a very puzzled expression. Then she went to her davenport, and took out a card announcing that Lady Rosalie Finch would be "at home" on Tuesday, July 11th, from 8 to 11 o'clock, and inscribed Mr. Ruggles' name upon it, addressing the envelope to "— Ruggles, Esq., Clarendon Hotel."

It was a very ornamental card, with finches perched upon rosebuds outlined in gold upon it, and in one corner it bore the word "Music" on a rose carried in a finch's beak, and in the other the letters "R.S.V.P."

Mr. Ruggles was pleased to respond immediately, and when the 11th arrived, he appeared at the Rosery as the clock struck eight. He was the first arrival, and was shown into an empty drawing-room, where the lamps burnt dimly under their rose-coloured shades, and the pink candles, held by quite an aviary of ormolu finches, were not even lit.



Lady Rosalie was not dressed, her maid's services having been required by Miss Jackson till a few minutes ago; but Hilda presently appeared with her friend's apologies, and as she lit the candles and turned up the lamps, she reduced Mr. Ruggles to abject despair by the elegance of her costume and the hauteur of her manner.

"For if I don't take care," thought Miss Jackson, with a shudder, as she felt the rapturous pressure of Mr. Ruggles' huge hand, "he'll be proposing to me before the evening's over. It's all very well to let him come, and there's the off-chance of making Philip Hallam jealous, but it mustn't go any further than that."

If Captain Hallam had been inclined to be jealous of another aspirant to Miss Jackson's favour, he had certainly every excuse for being so to-night. The party from Avonmead arrived before Lady Rosalie had scrambled into her gown, and found Hilda and Mr. Ruggles tête-à-tête in the drawing-room, while Mr. Ruggles' manifest confusion as he was introduced to them, suggested the possibility that they had interrupted a conversation of more than usual interest.

That the worthy man's embarrassment was due entirely to shyness and gaucherie was not likely to strike those who saw the tall and stalwart Ruggles for the first time; but, indeed, Captain Hallam did not trouble himself to seek for an explanation.

Hilda Jackson was at liberty to grant tête-à-têtes to whomsoever she would, as far as he was concerned. He was not even thinking about her; he was looking impatiently at the door, and wondering when Daisy Meredith would come in.

CHAPTER XXII.

DAISY.

"Of all the floures in the mede,
Than love I most these floures white and rede, Soch that men callen daisies in our toun."—CHAUCER.

LADY ROSALIE'S musicals were generally a success. Her bright audacity carried her through difficulties that appalled other hostesses, and enabled her to say things to touchy amateurs for the merest hinting of which by anyone else they would have cut their nearest and dearest friends.

"Seven minutes," she said appealingly to the double-bass, a little man who seemed a sort of adjunct to his own enormous fiddle, and who, when he once got the bow in his hand, never let anyone off under a quarter of an hour. "Seven minutes, my dear Mr. Weber, is as much as anyone will stand in social little evenings like mine. Whatever you play will be delightful, I know, and Hilda and I will enjoy it thoroughly, but strings are caviare to so many people. A ballad that makes them cry, or a waltz they can beat time to, is what goes down best. You must come in some night when we're alone, and give Hilda and me a real treat; but seven minutes must really be the limit to-night."

Mr. Weber sighed and laid down the Adagio in E, which always took twelve minutes, even when the tempo was hurried a little, as it was apt to be at the finish. People would talk, and by the time ten minutes had elapsed there was generally a babel of voices, which made Mr. Weber as anxious to reach the end as his audience was for him to do so. But to-night Lady Rosalie prevailed, and Mr. Weber played a gavotte that kept well within the allotted time, to Mr. Ruggles' great relief.

"I couldn't have stood it another minute," he said to Miss Jackson in a loud aside. "It was nearly as bad as bagpipes, wasn't it?"

"You don't appreciate the double-bass, I 'm afraid?"

"No, I don't! If people want to make a noise of that sort, I think they ought to go into an empty room and do it. I felt like the Northern Farmer when he heard the parson 'a-bummin' away' over his head. It was all very fine, I dare say, but you see it went over mine."

"Oh, hush!" said Hilda imploringly. "Miss Meredith is going to sing now, and I 'm sure you 'll like that."

Avice and Daisy had come in during the "bummin'" of the double-bass, and sat down by Lady Rosalie. The Verekers were not going out at present, so Sir Raymond was not with them; but everyone knew of the engagement, and looked with more or less interest at Avice as she stood up to sing.

"A fine haughty madam she 'll be when she 's 'my lady,'" Mr. Ruggles opined; but there was something in the proud beautiful face that went to kind Lord Blackstone's heart.

"What has that girl been doing to herself?" muttered the old man. "She looks—where have I seen a look like that before?"

"I don't know—but I know where I have," said his son. "There was a poor young sub at Isandula who was shot, standing next to me. The bullet hit some vital part, and the wound scarcely bled—but it killed him for all that. I don't know where the likeness comes in, but it 's there."

"Ah, I can understand what you mean. And I remember what I was thinking of myself—I suppose from talking of it the other night—and that was the face of a man named Dalrymple whom I tried for forgery when you were a bit of a lad. She 's been hard hit somehow or other, you may depend."

Captain Hallam did not answer. He had said nothing to his father of the identity of the Merediths with the Dalrymples, and the reference to the likeness struck him with additional force. Somehow he felt that it would be more difficult than ever to tell him that he meant to marry the forger's daughter. He said nothing, but he looked across at the corner where Daisy was sitting by Lady Rosalie's side.

She was looking prettier and more like a daisy than ever, he thought; but what a pensive, white little daisy it was! How low she hung her head, how pale she was, how persistently she kept her eyes upon the ground. Just once she looked up and encountered his, and Captain Hallam felt that the sudden colour in her cheeks was the prettiest thing he had ever seen.

"Wee, modest crimson-tippéd flower!" The enraptured young man quoted the words to himself, and wished that Lady Rosalie would not crowd her rooms so ridiculously, or that Daisy would have chosen a reasonable seat, instead of getting into a corner where it was impossible to get near her without disarranging half a dozen dowagers, and upsetting as many more.

But at last there was a move in the direction of the dining-room—where ices, and elegant sandwiches no bigger than a good-sized domino, and delicate whips and creams, and subtly flavoured jellies, were set out on finely broidered napery, with sparkle and glitter of silver and softened glimmer of richly chased glass—and Philip seized his opportunity, and, making his way to Daisy, offered her his arm. But to his surprise, she half shrank back.

"What is the matter?" he asked bluntly. "You are not well to-night, I am sure."

"Yes, oh yes!" faltered Daisy. "I 'm quite well, but I don't think I want any supper, thank you."

"Nonsense! You must come and have a sandwich, and some of the famous jelly. Lady Rosalie always has wonderful jelly, and you 'll feel twice as fit after it."

She stood up obediently, but she looked so white and trembling, he suddenly changed his mind.

"Sit down again," he ordered her. "I 'll bring you something here."

He came back with his hands full, and as Daisy saw the pains he had taken to choose whatever he thought she would like best, she had much ado to keep the tears from her voice and eyes.

"Why did you take so much trouble?" she said reproachfully. Would he have done it, she wondered, if he had known who she was?

"Why?" he said gravely. "Don't you know why, Daisy? Trouble! I wish I could take trouble for you—that I could take all your troubles on my own shoulders, and come between you and sorrow all your life. Won't you let me try, dear? I 'm only a rough sort of a fellow, but I love you dearly, and I 'd do my very best——"

She put out her hand with a strange shrinking he never forgot.

"I know," she gasped, "but, Captain Hallam, you mustn't talk like that. I can't hear you—I mustn't —and it would be no use, indeed."

"No use?" said the captain blankly. "Do you mean that—that you can't like me, Daisy? Oh, my little girl——"

"Don't!" said Daisy piteously; "please don't say any more. I 'm very sorry to vex you, when you 've always been so kind; but I can't help it, indeed."

The blue eyes were welling over with tears, and the trembling fingers were tearing a lace handkerchief to pieces, in evident unconsciousness of the mischief they were doing. If it were not for the bracing consciousness of neighbouring eyes, Daisy would have wept outright; but she glanced at the hall, where people were sitting about, eating ices and cakes, and forced back her tears. Philip stood looking down at her in utter perplexity. He had not thought that when he tried to tell his love, she would meet him like this.

Suddenly it flashed into his mind that perhaps Hilda Jackson had told her the hideous story of her father's sin and shame. It would account, he felt, for her sister's altered looks as well as for her own —only could Hilda, could any woman, be so cruel and so base?

"Has Miss Jackson been talking to you?" he asked, feeling that he must be wronging Hilda by the suspicion, but unable to rest without knowing all he could. "Has she told you—has she said anything that has made you alter your mind?"

He did not think, in his simplicity, how clearly he was showing that he had expected a different answer; and Daisy, simple and earnest as himself, never even noticed the bearing of his words.

"I have not seen Hilda since that night," she said. To both of them there was only one night in their thoughts, the night when they had stood together under the trees at Avonmead. How sure Philip had been then that his love was returned—how inexplicable it seemed to find that it was not!

"It is not Miss Jackson, then?" he said slowly. "Would you mind telling me what it is, and why I am refused?"

She looked at him earnestly. "I can never tell you that," she said, in low, troubled tones. "Please do not ask me any more."

"Is it that you do not care for me?"

Daisy looked at him despairingly, but it was evident he meant to have a reply.

"I—I suppose so," she said desperately, feeling that only so could she silence him, and that she could not bear much more. He drew back, with a bow whose coldness cut her to the heart, and Daisy stood up trembling like a leaf.

"I must go home," she said, going to the window that opened on to the verandah. "Don't come, please; it is only a step."

But it was a step she had not strength to take. The people just then flocking in from supper found Daisy in a dead faint on the floor, and Captain Hallam bending over her with a distracted face that was almost as white as her own.

CHAPTER XXIII.

I PROMESSI SPOSI.

"I cannot love him;
Yet I suppose him virtuous, know him noble,
Of great estate, of fresh and stainless youth."

SHAKESPEARE.

"WELCOME to Verecroft!" said Lady Vereker, as Sir Raymond handed his fiancée from the carriage, and put her into his mother's arms, while he turned to assist Daisy to descend.

"Jump out, Daisy," he cried gaily.—"Here, mother, is a little white morsel who is to get quite fat and rosy with your good country cream. She looks like a 'snow-wreath in thaw,' doesn't she? but we'll soon have her roses back."

"I hope so, indeed," said Lady Vereker, kissing her pale little guest, and leading the way to the house.

But Sir Raymond hurried on first, and stood just inside the great door of the hall to receive them.

"Welcome to Verecroft!" he said in his turn, doffing his hat, and bending low to kiss Avice's hand. "My Avice. I never knew how proud I was to be Vereker of Verecroft till now that I bid you welcome here."

"Don't," she said faintly—"don't be too kind. I feel sometimes as if I could not bear it."

He looked at her with a proud, fond glance she did not know how to meet.

"Too kind! How could anyone be that to you? —Mother, do you hear the treason she is talking? Come and scold her for me, and bring her to repentance."

"Do you think I could scold anything so much taller than myself?" said Lady Vereker, smiling. "I'm afraid you will have to do that yourself, Ray, if —if Avice ever wants it."

She brought out the Christian name a little shyly, glancing up at the tall fair-haired girl, whose head was so nearly on a level with Raymond's own, and whose silence seemed a little chilling to the gentle, effusive woman who would have liked to pet and fondle her, and perhaps to weep a few happy tears over the girl her Raymond loved.

"Will you come and have some tea before you go up to your rooms?" Lady Vereker asked, moving towards the beautiful carved mantelpiece, under which, in winter, huge fires roared and blazed, but that was now a miniature conservatory of choice flowers and delicate foreign ferns. A Japanese screen, gorgeous with heavy gold dragons and impossible birds, worked on a background of dull black satin, shut off the corner of the hall where the little bamboo tea-table stood, and three or four low and luxurious chairs were placed invitingly round it.

Avice sat down and looked round her like one in a dream. It was not the unaccustomed splendour that oppressed her, it was the thought that this was her future home, that the young man beside her was the lord of her life and being, her husband that was to be. Would she, could she ever love him as she ought? If she had doubted it before, how could she help doubting it now, when every feeling seemed concentrated in the thought that this was Lancelot's home also, and every sense absorbed in listening for the step that did not come? If once the meeting was over, she could bear it better, she thought; and then she despised herself for owning, even to herself, that there could be anything to bear. What was Lancelot Vereker to her, but a man who had proved his indifference by pleading his cousin's cause? Why could she not forget him and be satisfied with the love that was poured so freely at her feet?

"And I will, God helping me!" she thought reverently, and lifting her eyes to Raymond's with a look so humble and pleading and sweet that Lady Vereker decided she had been quite mistaken in thinking her future daughter-in-law was proud and cold.

The hall at Verecroft was the favourite family gathering-place, and very bright and pleasant it looked this afternoon, with the cozy little party gathered round the tea-table, and the sunbeams pouring in at the open door and shining on the polished oaken floor, on the burnished shields and ancient weapons on the walls, and on the figures clad in panoply of plate-armour and coats of mail that lined the sides of the hall and seemed to guard the door.

"I must show you all these things to-morrow," Sir Raymond said eagerly. "There's the armour a Vereker wore at Flodden; and do you see that inlaid suit on the right of the door? A Vereker fought and fell in that at Naseby, and I dare say little thought a degenerate descendant would stick it up as an ornament in the old home."

"Which Vereker was that?"

"He was Lancelot Vereker, a Gentleman Usher at Court, and as like our Lance as one man can be like another. If Lance put himself in hose and doublet and got a big-plumed Cavalier hat, you 'd think he had walked straight out of the picture-frame in the Gallery.—By the way, mother, where is Lance? I thought he always turned up to put the sugar in your tea."

"Lance is my right hand," explained Lady Vereker to Avice, "and Ray is just a wee bit jealous, I believe. He need not be," she added, with a tender smile. "If Lance is my right hand, Ray is the very core of my heart."

Lance was coming in as she spoke, and the last words reached his ear as he approached the corner shut off by the flying dragons and open-mouthed birds. He knew how true they were; how, even with Lady Vereker, his must always be the second place. To her he was only her right hand; the "core of her heart" was Giuseppe Balmano, the peasant-woman's son. The core of her heart! If anything was needed to justify the decision he had made, it was this involuntary proof how entirely the heart of the woman who had been as a mother to him was bound up in the man she believed to be her son. Lancelot vowed again as he came across the pleasant, sunny hall, where his own forefathers had feasted and made merry, and passed in and out to field or foray or hunt, that she should never know her Raymond was neither kith nor kin of theirs.

But, as he had said, this was not the hardest thing. It was not difficult, with that tender unconscious pleading in his ears, to renew the vow that cut him off from his fathers' heritage, even in this their hall; what was difficult, what tried his manhood and brought an almost audible prayer for help and strength to his lips, was the sight of Avice sitting by his cousin's side, of Raymond bending towards her with the air of proud proprietorship that marks the happy lover. No one saw him for a moment, but Avice heard his step and turned her head.

"Lance at last!" Sir Raymond cried, looking in the direction of her glance. "Here he is, Avice—the best and dearest cousin and friend a man ever had! You must love him, for my sake, as we all do here."

He was so radiant with happiness, he wanted to include his cousin in it, to win for him some portion of Avice's regard, to make her understand that this was no ordinary cousin, but a man to be loved as a brother by them all. He was a little disappointed that she only shook hands with grave formality, and turned away with a face from which the light and colour seemed to have faded together.

"How cold it is!" she said with a little shiver, and Lady Vereker began to inquire anxiously if she had been wrapped up for the drive, and insisted on her having another cup of tea.

There was a little desultory talk, and then Lady Vereker took her guests to their room, and left them together, telling them they both looked tired, and would be the better for a rest before they began to dress for dinner.

"I have asked no one to meet you," she said. "Our mourning prevents that; and, besides, I wanted to have you to ourselves. We have to learn to know each other, have we not, my dear? But that will not be difficult, with Ray for our interpreter."

Perhaps Lady Vereker spoke a little more confidently than she felt. There was something about Avice—a pensiveness in the deep grey eyes, a mournful droop in the beautiful mouth—that she felt she did not understand, that seemed incongruous in the first flush of a girl's engagement to the man of her choice. That he was not the man of her choice was an idea that could not possibly present itself to Lady Vereker. She fell back on the shyness of first coming, and perhaps some natural anxiety on her sister's account, in which she was not far wrong. For Daisy was manifestly ailing, if she was not ill. She had given no explanation of her fainting-fit at Lady Rosalie's; but Avice could not help connecting it with Captain Hallam, and felt sure that some great sorrow had fallen on her sister's life. Was it, could it be possible, that Daisy also had loved without a return? The remembrance of Philip Hallam's unmistakable attentions seemed to contradict the thought; but Avice could not forget that he had the reputation of being a flirt, and admitted that Lancelot was perhaps mistaken.

She spoke of him no more to Lancelot, whom, indeed, she never saw except when others were by; but she told Sir Raymond all about it, and was comforted that he seemed to think as highly of Daisy's hero as Lancelot had done.

"You may depend upon it, they've had a tiff," Sir Raymond said confidently. "If ever I saw a fellow in love, it was Hallam, and yet he's talking of going off to Egypt. If that doesn't mean a row of some sort, I don't know what does."

"Daisy would have told me. She never had a secret from me in her life."

"It doesn't follow she hasn't now. I wonder if you always told her everything about me?"

Avice's eyes fell. It was all so different, and it was so impossible to explain. She could not tell Sir Raymond that Love's sacred seal of silence had never been set upon his name, even though she knew that her silence now implied that it had; but the remembrance of the reticence that had closed her lips to the utterance of his cousin's made her feel that he was probably right about Daisy. It was difficult to think of Daisy as anything but a candid and artless child, but Avice owned, with a guilty flush, that if Daisy loved Captain Hallam, she was not likely to confess her feelings to her sister's ear.

It made the elder sister very tender to the younger, who seemed to droop from day to day. Daisy had none of the proud endurance which enabled Avice to hide her wounds beneath a cloak of indifference and even of gaiety. She had found strength to refuse her lover, but she could not find strength either to forget him or to bear the burden of life without him. She was distressed, too, by troubles at which Avice could not even guess. Was it, could it be right, for Avice to marry Sir Raymond Vereker? Was not he as honourable a gentleman as Philip Hallam, with lineage as spotless and name as stainless and pure? If she had given up her own lover rather than bring to him their heritage of shame, ought she to stand by and see Avice—dear, unconscious Avice!—take it to this other man? Daisy would have liked to be able to tell him all, and she felt that if Avice only knew, that was what she would do. But her mother had decided otherwise, and Daisy was too obedient and too distrustful of her own judgment to do more than wonder and repine. She kept her dismal secret, but it weighed sorely on her spirits and her health. She thought of Philip Hallam through the long summer days, and wept for him in the silent watches of the night, and at the end of the week Sir Raymond was obliged to admit that Daisy was no rosier for Verecroft air and no fatter for Lady Vereker's famous cream.

Lady Vereker insisted on keeping her guests for another week. She had grown very fond of Daisy, and had an artless faith in country air, while she hoped, with almost pathetic hopefulness, that a longer stay would draw closer to her the heart of her future daughter. She would love the beautiful, incomprehensible girl, with her smiles and her jests and her great mournful eyes, so dearly, if she would only let her! It was no longer possible to think that the vague, intangible something that came between them was the shyness of first acquaintance. Avice was evidently quite at ease in her future home. She talked freely enough to Lady Vereker, and was so sweet and complaisant to Sir Raymond that even his mother could find no fault; and yet the poor lady felt in her heart that something was wanting, that something was amiss. Under all Avice's ready speech was a depth of reserve Lady Vereker found it impossible to penetrate. She had no suspicion of the truth. Avice and Lancelot seldom met except at meals, for Lancelot, on the plea of business, kept much in his own room, and when they were together each was distant and reserved. Lancelot was faithful to the resolution he had made, and Avice was only anxious to show him that she was as indifferent to him as he could possibly be to her.

"I wish you would be a little more cordial to Lance," Sir Raymond said one day, in quite a hurt tone. "He is such a good fellow, Avice—won't you try and like him for my sake?"

Avice promised with burning cheeks and a bitter feeling of humiliation in her heart, and began to talk of something else. She could not talk of Lancelot, and she knew it would not have been right or wise, even if she could have nerved herself to do so. She did not want to talk or to think about him, she only wanted to forget him, and to do her duty to the man whose wife she had promised to be. The daily strain of Lancelot's presence seemed intolerable. It was almost a relief to hear that he was going up to town for a few days; but when he had gone, she was frightened to feel how blank her life had suddenly become. Was this forgetting—and would she ever learn to forget?

THE HUGUENOT ADMIRAL.

ONE of the most remarkable instances of the growth of religious toleration in France is the monument to Coligny, lately erected in the heart of Paris.

Unveiled on the 17th of July, 1889, this statue is placed at the east end of the Church of the Oratoire, in the Rue de Rivoli, near the Louvre, and is one of the most artistic productions of modern times.

In 1884 a joint committee in Paris and London was formed to raise the needful funds, and many successful meetings were held in England—at Harrow, and in the Hall of Westminster School, with Lord Kinnaird and other friends interested in the movement. To these efforts, Pasteur Bersier, D.D.,* of Paris, lent his eloquent and powerful aid, and delivered an historical oration on the occasion above mentioned.

The French Government gave the site and permission to erect, and, as far as known, the monument stands on the spot where the Admiral fell wounded in the St. Bartholomew massacre of the 24th of August, 1572.

The elegant and striking composition of the group cannot fail to attract attention—at the base are two draped figures, Religion and Patriotism; between them, the open Bible—on the left-hand page of which is a part of the 6th verse of Psalm cxii.: "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance;" and on the other page a quotation from Hebrews xi. 27: "He endured, as seeing Him who is invisible." Beneath the base is an inscription copied from Coligny's will. The sculptor is M. Crauk, and the architect M. Scellier. The dates 1517–1572 indicate the birth and death of the Admiral.

An American writer, Dr. John Hall, of New York, who lately visited Paris, remarks:—"As one looks at the interesting groups who stop and study the figure and inscriptions, the wish cannot be repressed—'Oh, that fair France comprehended all that this suggests, and sought inspiration and stability from

* While writing this the news was received of the great loss by the death of this distinguished preacher.

"La Sainte Bible"!'" The historical associations of this monument are wide and various: in the relations of Admiral Coligny with England; his brother, Odet de Coligny, a resident here; in the warm reception given him by Queen Elizabeth; and in the close alliance then existing between English and French history.

Odet, Cardinal Châtillon, lived some years in this country, and received special marks of royal favour. Welcomed on his arrival by Sir Thomas Gresham (the founder of the old Royal Exchange destroyed in the fire of 1666), Cardinal Châtillon was much connected with the annals of London, and his position as ambassador contributed greatly to his popularity.

His death at Canterbury, suspected to be due to poisoning, leaves a sad memory of his residence; but at the east end of that glorious Minster, a small and unpretending brick tomb marks the resting-place of the brother of the good Admiral. Few of us, perhaps, have visited the town of Châtillon-sur-Loire, in Eastern France, whose feudal castle was the home of the patriot statesman Coligny. There, safe from the assaults of political and party strife, his leisure was spent, and we may judge from his biographer, Dr. Bersier, of its character, for he has said: "Coligny presented the noble example of a pure and beautiful home-life, in which austerity of purpose was blended with the utmost tenderness of heart—an example rare indeed in that dissolute age." His public life was full of eventful circumstances—the struggle of political factions, the rise of the Reformed faith, and other stirring incidents, crowded his chequered career.

THE COLIGNY MEMORIAL. CHURCH OF THE ORATOIRE, RUE DE RIVOLI, PARIS.)

(From a Photograph.)

Brought up in the midst of a Court headed by Margaret of Navarre and Jeanne d'Albret, true friends of Protestantism, it is not surprising to have from the pen of our well-known author, Walter Besant, the remark—

"Let it be remembered to the praise of Coligny, that he was one of the noble army of reformers who have toiled to remove from the neck of mankind the intolerable yoke of sacerdotalism."

In 1552 Coligny was made Admiral, and attained great favour at Court; he was also at one time Governor of Picardy, and had the charge of enterprises in Brazil and Florida, with a view to improve the condition of colonial France. In his own country he was engaged in several actions, and undertook the relief of St. Quentin in 1557.

By his adherence to the Protestant faith, he lost much of his earthly power and glory, but obtained for France religious liberty until the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. The death of Coligny called forth in other lands an unveiled expression of horror. Queen Elizabeth received the news with the Court attired in mourning; while the University of Cambridge was roused to a greater spirit of Protestantism by the events of the St. Bartholomew ushered in by this tragic occurrence. Posterity has not yet, perhaps, judged his full merits, but even Bossuet said: "All the attempts made to decry the Admiral have only rendered his memory more illustrious." In the story of his changeful life are woven the most stirring scenes in French history, while the regard Coligny earned with other nations secured for him a widespread sympathy. "Englishmen came to fight under the banners of the man who most commanded the attention, the respect, and the admiration of the world. There was no one like him, not one—even among our Elizabethan heroes—so true and loyal, so religious and so steadfast, as the great Admiral. He has become a proverb for fidelity, honesty, and courage. His name has sunk into the hearts of Frenchmen more than that of any other man."

When the world's Universal Exhibition of 1889 shall have faded from the memories of Paris, there will still remain this beautiful monument as a cherished link between the past and present of Protestant France.

S. W. KERSHAW, F.S.A.

IN THE NIGHT WATCHES.

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

A PREACHER, taking for his text, "He giveth His beloved sleep," remarked that the blessing of this heavenly bestowment can only be fully realised by those who know what it means to crave for sleep in vain. Sleep, "the certain knot of peace, the balm of woe," is the Master's tender gift to mortal weariness; but sometimes He holds our eyes waking, and in the night watches we do more than listen to the striking of the hours, the baying of the watch-dogs—more than lie still and long for the morning. Whether quiet or restless, if our eyes be held wakeful, we can meditate on Him Who doth not slumber, Whose presence is with us though our dear ones are wrapped in sleep. "Jesus seems so near in the darkness, I am never alone," said an invalid girl who knows little of sleep. Her bright, sweet face, smiling like a white rose, witnessed that she heard the Master's voice and shared His benedictions even in the watches of the night.

A great many remedies are suggested for restlessness, which in many a case has been caused by giving way to anxious and foreboding thoughts, indulging in such mental worry by day that night is a time of tossing and unrest. While the night-dews fall and the stars are shining, let us in spirit steal amid the quietude to Him Who is Eternal Light, the Giver of calm, the Divine Comforter; let us remember the Lord in the stillness, and we shall prove it true that > "Darkness shows us worlds of light

> We never saw by day."

Let us think, alone with Jesus, what He is, in Whom is all the fulness of God. "I will strip thee of all earthly comforts," said a persecutor once to a Christian martyr. "Christ is mine," was the answer, "you cannot strip me of Him." Christ is yours, friend, yours through the darkest shadow—Christ, Who is Rest and Refuge, the King of Kings, the great Physician. Money cannot purchase rest, but it comes to you with Jesus; there is no pillow so comforting as the Redeemer's love, and on this you may trustfully repose. Someone asked a poor infirm old man, "Do you think you can rest a little now?"—"It is all rest," he said, "because God's arms are beneath me." Soul, return unto thy rest in the power and mercy of thy Lord! let not worries for yourself and your dear ones, worries for to-morrow, worries as to basket and store, worries because laid by from work and Christian service outside, keep you fretful, uneasy, disturbed. If you cannot sleep, turn your thoughts from these matters to Jesus, the dark world's Light. "I will give you rest," He promises; then open wide your heart and let Him fill it with His bestowment of quietude, calming, consolation, rest. Think of the Master as your Refuge. Many troubles may beset you and more may seem to threaten you, but you can in quietness and confidence flee unto Him to hide you through every calamity; for the shadow of His wing is able to cover you in the hour that most you fear. Just as in the lighthouse-tower the men are safe though the billows roar around, just as those souls in the Ark were safe of old, though the floods overwhelmed the earth, so you are perfectly secure by day, by night, for time, for eternity, in Jesus, your Refuge and your Strength.

What comfort there is in thinking of Him also as the King of Kings, Sovereign over all, ruling all things, appointing all things, making all things work together for good to those that love Him! The Master's sceptre is over all—sunshine and shade obey His control, and His Kingdom is everlasting, so that nothing ever can occur to you, save by the will of that Good Shepherd Who can only lead your life aright. I read once of a dark room in which, inscribed in luminous paint, the words shone out gloriously, "Trust in the Lord." Thinking of Jesus, do we not seem to catch that message of faith, even though the shades remain? Remember in the quietude how near is the Great Physician. Nothing seems closer to you perhaps than your pain, yet His sympathy is nearer still. Miss Havergal reminds us that sometimes it seems hard to make even the doctor understand just how we feel, for words cannot quite convey our infirmities. But the Great Physician is touched with the feeling of what we have to bear; we know He understands, cares for us, stands close beside us in His love and strength and helpfulness. Oh, Thou Physician of body and soul! hold my fevered hands, bedew my heart with Thy graciousness, whisper to me of Thy presence; so shall I even in darkness renew my strength, "when I remember Thee upon my bed, and meditate on Thee in the night watches."

A BROKEN ENGAGEMENT.

A STORY IN FOUR CHAPTERS. BY THE AUTHOR OF "AUNT JANE'S NIECES," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"DON'T you think, Mrs. Grey, that the town ought to present a handsome testimonial to the Fairfax girls for giving us all something to talk about, this dull time of the year? They have been quite a boon—really most interesting! Now might not our gratitude take the form of a wedding-present to Cecilia, something graceful and appropriate—Fame with a trumpet, poised on the knob of a butter-dish lid, or——"

"I beg your pardon, Janet," said Mrs. Grey; "I did not hear the first part of your sentence—only something about Cecilia and a butter-dish! I couldn't give that, you know, dear; it is so hackneyed. When is it to be? Not before the end of October, I do hope, because I cannot get the girls' winter things till then, and Mr. Grey would not be able to take me up to London twice. Is crimson to be worn, Janet?—Thank you, Miss Marsden, I will take another cup; we cannot taste such delicious tea anywhere else, direct from China; and your nephew, of course, would see that what he sends you had none of those dreadful adulterations that Mr. Grey so frightens me with."

Reader, will you join the Misses Marsden's "few friends for afternoon tea, and a little music?" The French windows are wide open this warm September day, and if you find the chat a little too gossiping, or the music not classical enough for your correct ear, you can make your escape, and enjoy, undisturbed, the sweet old garden, and your own more congenial society. But let me introduce you first to the ladies in the drawing-room. Our hostesses are the daughters of the late Admiral Marsden, and to have the entrée to their house is, as no doubt Mrs. Ashby will tell you in a few minutes, to belong to the élite (a favourite word of hers) of Milltown society. This is Mrs. Scott, with her daughter Janet; Mrs. Grey, the banker's wife; those shy girls in the corner are Adela and Susan Ogden, from the rectory; Mrs. Ashby and Miss Browne complete the party. Ah! Mrs. Ashby knows you by name so well! Has so often heard you mentioned by Mrs. Granville, of "The Mount"! How very nice! Pray take that easy-chair, and a cup of Miss Marsden's famous tea. We are all ladies, you see: but then, as Miss Elizabeth has just been saying, that makes conversation so chatty and comfortable!

"I confess," Miss Elizabeth remarks, "that I was quite unprepared to hear of Cecilia's engagement to Maynard Williams. Sophia has so much more penetration. She said, directly, she had expected it months ago, though she had not mentioned it to me. Dear girl! she will make an excellent wife, I am sure!"

"Perhaps so," said Miss Browne, dubiously. "Her sister Kitty has far more style and elegance; though, of course, that would have been rather thrown away. Young Williams will not be able to entertain much! Very rash to think of marrying on such an income!"

"I cannot agree with you there," said Miss Elizabeth (she is a little sentimental). "Young people of this generation waste so many happy years. Our parents were satisfied with small incomes, love, and health. I never approve of long engagements; though of course, Janet, I should never sanction imprudence. Now will you give us a little music?"

"Adela and Susan have brought a lovely new duet," said Janet, who never played if she could help it. "I can make myself useful at the tea-table."

And when the Misses Ogden were fairly launched on the troubled waters of their sixteen-page duet, conversation went on more briskly than ever.

"A most extraordinary piece of good fortune," said Mrs. Ashby, "for Miss Gordon to get both those girls off her hands; though one questions if Mrs. Galbraith will be able to put up with Kitty's airs and conceit. I consider she daubs, and only wonder, Mrs. Grey, that you dared to entrust your sweet, talented little Elsie to her. A thorough foundation in drawing is everything, as Mrs. Granville says, and she is, as you know, an authority in art."

"And I am happy to tell you," put in Miss Marsden, breaking off her conversation with Mrs. Grey, "that Mrs. Granville only yesterday expressed herself as charmed with a sketch that I showed her—a picturesque old farmhouse with a pine wood in the background—Miss Fairfax's parting gift to me; I sent it this morning to be framed, or I should have asked for your valuable criticism," she added.

"Most likely Mr. Galbraith had touched it up before you had the sketch," returned Mrs. Ashby. "I have been thinking, Mrs. Scott, how your daughter Mary would have appreciated such a delightful trip as Kitty will have."

"Until a girl's mind is stored with fact and history, and matured by thought, Mrs. Ashby," said Mrs. Scott, "a visit to Italy is utterly wasted upon her."

"Poor Miss Gordon!" said Janet; "how dull she will be without Cecilia."

"She appealed to her in the most ridiculous way. Cecilia took the lead in everything; no doubt a little envy is mixed with regret—it must be trying to see her niece's engagement running so smoothly—such a contrast to her own!" said Mrs. Ashby.

"Was Miss Gordon once engaged to be married?" asked Mrs. Scott, drawing up her chair. Miss Browne set down her cup, and became all attention, as she said—"I constantly hinted that more inquiry should have been made about her, coming all the way from Edinburgh; though we all felt that if Miss Marsden was satisfied, we must be; but you knew nothing of this engagement, dear Miss Elizabeth?"

Miss Elizabeth blushed guiltily, and looked appealingly at her sister.

"Is it likely, Miss Browne, that an attractive young woman like Jane Gordon should have escaped all the worry of lovers and suitors? They say every woman, however plain, has at least one chance of making herself miserable, you know; but there may be an exception now and then, perhaps," said Miss Marsden, fixing her eyes absently on Miss Browne's new heliotrope bonnet.

"But Miss Gordon was jilted; of course I could not tell you all particulars, though it has been more than hinted to me," said Mrs. Ashby, pursing her thin lips, and leaning back in an emphatic way on her cushions.

A fearful duel of chromatic scales here took place on the piano. Miss Browne, who was a little deaf, tried in vain to catch Miss Marsden's indignant protest.

"Well," she heard Mrs. Ashby say spitefully, as Susan at last gave up the contest, and allowed her sister to run away alone, "Well, Miss Marsden, Mr. Malyon, who, from what I hear, could not be sufficiently thankful for his narrow escape, will be staying next week at Mrs. Granville's, and, I know on the best authority, is quite ignorant of Miss Gordon's whereabouts. A pic-nic to the Abbey ruins is talked of; how dreadfully embarrassing it would be for them to meet! Good-bye, Miss Marsden, I see Mrs. Grey is rising. Mrs. Scott, must you go? and Miss Browne, too! Don't let me break up the party—such a delightful afternoon! Miss Ogden, I must congratulate you and your sister on your charming rendering of that sweet air."

"I am so sorry we made such a muddle," said Susan humbly, as the ladies at last settled the question of precedence, and the door closed.

"Never mind; I am sure you did your best to give us pleasure, and we thank you heartily," said Miss Marsden. "Good-bye, my dears."

Janet, the last of the party, stood in the bay window, which commanded a view of the High Street, slowly drawing on her long gloves. "Here comes Miss Gordon! she is carrying some letters. May I stay and hear the news about Cecilia? I don't care what happens to Kitty. Mrs. Ashby calls her conceited—she is not that, certainly. There always seems a kind of pettiness about conceit, and Kitty has such a grand confidence in her own powers, she would never think it necessary to assert them—at least, that is what Tom says about her," concluded Janet.

"My dear Jane," cried Miss Elizabeth, "I was just coming in to see you."

"It's quite refreshing only to look at you, after having an afternoon of all those dreadful gossips!" said downright Miss Marsden.

"Hush—sh!" whispered her sister, with a glance at Janet.

"I've brought you three letters; I pray you, read one," said Jane, gaily. "The shortest first! Look, Janet!"

"Scented," said Janet, sniffing. "It's the Granville crest! Not an invitation to——" and she stopped.

"Why, you must be a witch! Yes, it's an invitation to a pic-nic, and I've positively accepted it, and now I wish I hadn't; but the page-boy was to wait for an answer, and his buttons must have frightened me. Cecilia always settles such things for me, and it really seemed easier to say yes than no. After the dissipation of our fortnight's holiday and visit to the Galbraiths, and then the bustle of getting Kitty ready for her Italian trip, and Cecilia for this long stay with Maynard's home people, I am left very flat and stupid, and shall be really glad to begin teaching again. You cannot imagine, Miss Marsden, how forlorn I feel without them."

"Did Cecilia find old Miss Williams very awful?" asked Janet. "I must hear that, and then run home by the garden and Green Lane, or I shall be frightfully late."

"She is as kind as possible," said Miss Gordon; "and Cecilia is full of remorse over her imaginary descriptions, and begs me to burn all those fancy sketches that she and Kitty composed between them. She has taken a great fancy to Cecilia, and hints that she intends to show her affection for Maynard in a very substantial way; and I shall lose my child even sooner than I expected."

"Then she will not be happy if you do not promise to live with them; and you will desert us, of course, like all the rest of the nice people, and Milltown won't be worth living in," said Janet, nodding her farewell.

"Ah!" she thought, as she took off her pretty hat in her own little room, "what would I give for the cap of invisibility—to have stopped and listened to the history of Jane Gordon's love affair. Miss Elizabeth is irresistible. I am not the least bit inquisitive, but I do like to know things. I daresay she is in the midst of the story this minute."

Perfectly true, Janet; and we will go and hear it, whilst you and Mary are privileged to have Mrs. Ashby's version of the matter.

CHAPTER II.

"How could I let him be bound to me?" Miss Gordon is saying, with tearless eyes but a trembling lip, "when I found my poor sister just dead—Kitty down with diphtheria, too—and then Mr. Fairfax dying within a week of Catherine. His last words were to entrust them to me. All former pledges must give way to a dying wish like that!"

"No, I think not," said Miss Marsden. "You asked Mr. Malyon to wait a few years, I suppose, and he would not consent——"

"Oh, no! no!" said Jane. "I wrote to him at once, and broke off our engagement, telling him I must devote my life to those poor children."

"That was quite wrong of you, Jane," said Miss Marsden, without hesitation.

"But they were utterly destitute," said Jane, a deep flush coming to her pale cheeks. "We had to sell everything—all the pictures, even, except the 'St. Cecilia.' Kitty begged for that so earnestly. Mr. Fairfax was my trustee, and invested my money with his own in that unfortunate bank. Could I have done anything else, Miss Elizabeth?"

"No, my darling," said the kind creature, who was crying, of course; "it was most brave and beautiful of you."

"Extremely selfish, I should call it," said her sister, shortly. Jane started. "Yes, my dear, you were in love with a morbid self-sacrifice, instead of Mr. Malyon. The man who could win your heart, Jane, would have gladly shared such a burden with you. Didn't he ask you to let him?"

"I never heard from him again—never a line! I told him my decision was final, and he took me at my word!" and Jane vainly tried to stifle a sob as Miss Elizabeth tenderly drew her head on to her shoulder.

"I cannot understand it," said Miss Marsden, putting on her spectacles. "You mean to say, child, that he never sent you a word of sympathy and comfort in all your trouble? Then he certainly wasn't worth loving, and there's an end of it."

"Oh, he was the best, the most faithful——" moaned Jane. "It was my letter; I don't know what I wrote—I was almost beside myself with grief and misery; it seemed as if Kitty would die too."

"You addressed the letter properly, dear?" asked Miss Elizabeth.

"Oh, yes," said Jane, sitting up now with a wan smile.

"Of course she did, Elizabeth," put in Sophia Marsden. "One would think you lived on milk-and-water novels."

"He was staying with his uncle, Sir Peter Malyon; he is very well connected, though our family is equally good, if we are poor," concluded Jane Gordon, with a touch of quiet dignity. "I sent back all his presents—at least, everything but a little bunch of harebells." There was a pause.

"You left Mr. Fairfax's house directly Kitty could be moved, didn't you? Of course you told Mr. Malyon where you were going?"

"We were moving about for Kitty's sake," Jane answered wearily. "We went first to the sea, and it was too cold for her, then to my old nurse near London, and then I heard of an opening for a school here, and you know the rest."

"Why, silly child!" cried Miss Marsden, "can't you see? Of course you never received his answer. You were too proud to write to any of his people, I daresay, and your only relatives, you told me, were travelling in the south of France. But surely you wrote to some of your friends?"

"No," said Jane, "I was too miserable; and—and I was afraid they might suppose I was asking for help."

"Oh, my dear!" said Miss Elizabeth, with mild reproof.

"Yes, Jane," said Miss Marsden, "there is a touch of your sinful Scotch pride again. And no doubt Mr. Malyon has his share, and when he found letter after letter brought no answer, the poor man naturally supposed——"

"Oh, do you think that is possible?" cried Jane, clasping her hands. "I never thought he could be suffering too! I don't mind pain for myself, but——"

Miss Elizabeth rose triumphantly. "You will neither of you suffer much longer," she said. "Sophia, William must be sent to order the carriage from the 'George.' I shall drive to Mrs. Granville's at once. To think that a few words will set two loving hearts beating in unison once more! Sophia, give me the key of your wardrobe, please; I put my best bonnet there last Sunday. You know I can be discretion itself, and will feel my way most carefully."

"Well, yes, Elizabeth," admitted her sister, "I confess I am too blunt. Come back as quickly as you can.—You may well look bewildered, child," turning to Jane. "But—don't tremble so—sit down here by the window; there—you would rather hear directly, of course," answering the dumb entreaty of Jane's eyes. "Well, love, you know Mrs. Granville is giving a pic-nic; it is in honour of some friends from Scotland—and—we only heard it this afternoon—Mr. Malyon is of the party!"

Jane was perfectly silent for some minutes, then—the blood rushing to her very hair—"Please stop Miss Elizabeth!" she gasped.

"No, Jane," said Miss Marsden with firmness. "In such a matter I have implicit confidence in Elizabeth. As she is not here, I will say I have often been quite surprised—she really has wonderful tact. And Mrs. Granville, though a woman of the world, has a kind heart. Jane, don't you think he has suffered long enough? There is the carriage already. Now we will walk in the garden for half an hour, and then I want to read you a most interesting article in the English Quarterly. Elizabeth will certainly be back by eight o'clock."

Those two dreadful hours! How long and dreary they seemed! Surely, the old church clock never chimed the quarters so slowly! They came to an end at last.

"There is Elizabeth!" said Miss Marsden, starting up. "Why is she stopping in the hall? Someone must be there——"

"Oh! perhaps——" whispered Jane.

"Nonsense, child! Mrs. Granville did not expect her guests till Thursday," and down went spectacles, magazine, and netting, and Miss Marsden hurriedly opened the door. "Come in directly!" she cried, and Miss Elizabeth appeared.

"Now—quick!" said her impatient sister. "I have shut the door, of course! Never mind all the ins and outs; get to the point!"

"Oh, Sophia! your spectacles on the floor!—and—and how did you like that interesting article, love? It is a little too learned for me!"

"Elizabeth, you would try the temper of an angel!" said Miss Marsden angrily.

"Jane, Jane! My poor darling; don't look at me like that! Oh, how shall I tell you? Try and bear it; we all love you so! Think of Cecilia!" cried Miss Elizabeth.

"He is dead!" said Jane, with a strange calmness.

"No, no! not that; but he is married, and coming to 'The Mount' with his bride!"

CHAPTER III.

JANET SCOTT TO CECILIA FAIRFAX.

MY OWN DEAREST FRIEND,—You haven't missed me a bit, of course. I can fancy you are perfectly happy, and riding about all day with Maynard in those lovely Hampshire lanes, and being introduced to cousins without end. But I have wanted you most awfully; I've been perfectly hungry to see you again! Now, you must promise to burn this letter the moment you've read it (I keep all yours, darling, in the secret drawer of my desk!), because, as you will see, there are really private matters in it. I hardly know where to begin. I told you Mary and I, with mother, were asked to afternoon tea at Miss Marsden's last Tuesday. Of course, Mary was too busy to go. Mrs. Ashby naturally talked a little about you and Kitty. Then your aunt's turn came, and she had found out that she was once engaged to Mr. Malyon. You know, dear, that I never, even in my sleep, would have breathed a word of the secret you told me! Mrs. Ashby had the whole story upside down. Then she told us Mrs. Granville was to give a pic-nic on the Friday, and Mr. Malyon, she said, was coming, with some Scotch friends of Mrs. Granville. Miss Marsden snubbed her and Miss Browne, and I could have kissed her for it. I stayed behind, and your aunt came in so bright and happy. She had just had your letter, and an invitation to "The Mount," which she had accepted. She looked so young and pretty, Cecilia! I could see Miss Elizabeth meant to say something. What it was, I can't tell you; but Tom heard William order the carriage from the "George," and Miss Elizabeth was driven to "The Mount." Next morning I took some early peaches to your aunt, but I did not see her. She was packing, Kezia said, and going to Barmouth for a week or two with Miss Elizabeth, who was not at all well. They started at one o'clock, without saying good-bye to anybody. Mother called on Miss Marsden in the afternoon, but she only said that her sister was "suffering from nervous debility, and that Miss Gordon had kindly promised to go with her to Wales." But it was all explained on the way home. Mother met Mrs. Ashby, who told her Mr. and Mrs. Malyon were expected—that she was a lovely girl, very rich, most fascinating, etc. I felt as if I could not go to the wretched pic-nic; but, after all, I am glad I did, for I made him suffer a little, I really believe! If it hadn't been for thinking of dear Miss Gordon, and missing you, it was really a splendid party. Mrs. Granville always has such nice people, and manages everything so well, you know. The weather was perfect. The bride is just a merry girl, much younger than Mr. Malyon. Herbert Grey was enthusiastic about her, but Tom said he thought Kitty ever so much prettier, and so she is! Well, I was talking to Adela, when Mr. Eustace Granville came up, and said—

"Let me introduce you to Miss Janet Scott, Mr. Malyon," and then was off like a shot. I am certain he wanted to get rid of him, for Mr. Malyon laughed a little, and said—

"Ha-hum; Miss Scott, you would not like a stroll to the Abbey ruins?"

I can't tell why, Cecilia, but I really said I should like it, and off we went; he talking in a learned way about Dominicans and Franciscans. When we came to that Gothic arch, where you have the lovely view of the hills, I could bear his prosing no longer.

"How I wish a friend of mine, Miss Kitty Fairfax, was here," I remarked. He gave a little start, and said—

"I think I have heard your friend's name before."

"Mrs. Granville admires her paintings, and has mentioned her, no doubt," I replied, innocently; "she knows Kitty's aunt, Miss Jane Gordon, very intimately." It was wicked of me, and I was half-frightened directly I had said it. If you had seen his look!

"Is Miss Gordon living in Milltown," he asked, quite sharply.

"Yes, she has a school for little girls."

"A school! nonsense! I beg your pardon, but it is quite impossible that Jane Gordon should——" and then he stopped. "Is she poor?"

I hope, Cecilia, you will forgive me, but I felt so furious with him, that I drew a picture of some of your troubles when you first came to Milltown, and that day, never to be forgotten, when I saw you first. You were having a dinner of half a loaf and some blackberries. When I got as far as that, he started up, and went off, leaving me to take care of myself, and find my way out of the ruins as best I could. He and Mrs. Malyon went away the next morning, and I suppose, and sincerely hope, we shall never meet again. He is handsome; rather melancholy looking. Darling, Maria has been in twice to ask for letters. Don't let Maynard fill all your heart; leave one little corner of it for your ever faithful and loving

JANET.

CHAPTER IV.

"YOU are really a little stronger to-day, dear Miss Elizabeth," said Jane Gordon, arranging her friend's shawl with a tender solicitude, "and your appetite is improving, I think; or was it only to please me that you took my lemon-jelly? I am finding you out every day" (Miss Elizabeth gave a guilty start): "some thoughtful unselfishness coming straight from your loving heart."

"Oh, my dear, pray don't!" said Miss Elizabeth, looking quite uncomfortable. ("And I've just been eating those two large buns in my bed-room," was her thought. "This air makes me so terribly hungry.") "How could I fail to get better with such a good nurse?" she said, smiling. "And now that Sophia has arranged for the little girls to have an extra week's holiday, and I know that I can keep you here, I feel quite another thing. You see, dear, nervous debility is not like a positive illness. I have always been subject to little hysterical attacks, and then, we know, change is the very best remedy Shall we have some reading? Your voice is so soothing; I was so vexed I dropped off, this morning, but then—as Kitty is not here, I don't mind confessing—I never can quite follow new poetry. It was a beautiful poem, of course, love. I have brought my old volume of Cowper; I always enjoy his poetry, and never feel sleepy, the lines are so melodious.

Shall we have something from 'The Task?' What an extraordinary bonnet that lady is wearing, Jane, but really rather becoming, isn't it? she has a stylish figure! Yes, dear, begin at the postman coming at tea-time. How much nicer it is to have our letters in the morning; it gives such topics for conversation at the breakfast-table. I will close my eyes, if you don't mind; the glare of the sea is a little distressing."

And so dear Miss Elizabeth had a long, peaceful

"'Godfrey, don't grieve about it so.'"

sleep that warm afternoon, and dreamed that she was a girl again, sitting in the stuffy little village church, and sharing a hymn-book with her mischievous cousin George; and then the scene changed—dreams are unaccountable—and she saw Jane Gordon stretching out her hands in wild entreaty, and calling "Godfrey! Godfrey!" Then she opened her eyes, to find herself amongst fern and heather, a glimpse of the tranquil sea below. Jane was sitting at her side, and bending over her was a tall man, with worn, eager face—they both seemed perfectly unconscious of the existence of another creature in the universe. Jane was murmuring in a soft, low voice, "Godfrey, don't grieve about it so. Dearest, the privation was nothing, nothing; I could bear far more than that! But how I longed for a word from you—just a sign that you loved me still! And now I shall forget those sad days—everything is swallowed up in your love!"

Miss Elizabeth was quite awake by this time, and cold with horror.

"Miss Gordon," she said, "will you introduce me to your friend—to this gentleman?"

"Oh! dear Miss Elizabeth," said Jane, turning a sweet, tremulous face, with traces on it of happy tears, "I did not like to disturb you before."

"I have not been asleep more than two minutes," murmured Miss Elizabeth.

"It is Mr. Godfrey Malyon. His brother Henry has been staying at Mrs. Granville's, and wrote to him; for Miss Marsden was quite right, and no one was to blame but me."

"But I was to blame, Jeannie," said her lover. "I ought to have gone on searching for you."

"But he was so ill, and the doctors ordered him to the Cape, and—— Oh, how selfish I am! This excitement—when you want quiet and rest!"

"Thank you, love, I feel very little flurried," was the answer; "and am delighted to be introduced to Mr. Malyon, and I am sure Sophia will be too. You have been to Milltown, and had an interview? That explains your being here. Now, I think a cup of tea will refresh us wonderfully, so I will walk on and order it, and you and Mr. Malyon can follow in half an hour or so. I really prefer to go back alone, my love. And you had not to suffer much longer, had you?" she whispered, kissing the dear, smiling lips.

"Ah, I see you have a fresh bunch of harebells. And a very pretty little piece of sentiment—isn't it wonderful what associations we all have with flowers!" thought Miss Elizabeth, as she walked briskly away, with her knitting and book. "How very, very glad I am for that dear girl! She could never have loved another; and I always felt she ought not to be an old maid! Not but what single ladies are very happy—I'm sure I am! But then Jane has no one like Sophia to lean upon, and talk things over with. The wedding shall be from our house, of course. Jane will look lovely in white! I do not like the custom of a bride wearing her travelling dress—it is the day of a woman's life, and should be kept as a festival. Mr. Malyon does not look robust—well, he will find his 'Jeannie' the tenderest and best of nurses! I can begin a letter to Sophia before they come in. I shall remind her of what I so often say—that most love affairs come all right in the end."

THE THREE CROWNS.

"The Crown of Righteousness."—2 Tim. iv. 8. "The Crown of Glory."—1 Peter v. 4.
"The Crown of Life."—Rev. ii. 10.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D.

I HAVE set these three passages together that we may perceive at one view the varied and most attractive character of that happiness which awaits God's people hereafter. Too often is it forgotten how much the Bible reveals which is fitted to excite our desire, as well as to sustain our faith, in the prospect of eternity. Ambition is deemed a principle which can be exercised only in reference to this present world. It limits itself to that narrow span which lies between us and death. Its eye is not lifted higher than to the honours and rewards of earth: its pulse is not quickened by any loftier aspirations than are drawn forth by those attainments which may be secured on this side the grave. But Revelation opens up something far grander to the view of man, something more akin to his own deathless nature—and something more worthy of his energies and efforts. It gives him a glimpse of a coming eternity. It shows him what a blessed portion will reward the faith and patience of God's people in the world to come. It takes that word crown, which comprises in itself the greatest dignity and honour of which we can at present form a conception, and then it qualifies the term by such adjuncts as are found in the passages before us—righteousness, glory, life. What a series of blessedness is this! and how impossible is it that human language could furnish another word that would add to, or intensify, the idea of perfection and enjoyment which is thus suggested to our minds! Come, then, and let us meditate for a little on the threefold aspect of the believer's future happiness which is thus set before us. Come, and let us rise upon the wings of faith above all those objects which can be presented to our ambition in this world, and, ascending to a height at which we can command a glance into eternity, let us seek fresh ardour for our hope, and new strength for our zeal, from the view which is here given us of the reward that is prepared for God's people hereafter.

We begin, as seems both the natural and the Scriptural order, by looking first at

"THE CROWN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS."

IT is somewhat difficult to fix upon the exact idea which the Apostle intends to bring out by this expression. Several eminent expositors suppose that he simply refers to the general recompense which shall be given to the righteous, without meaning to specify any one of the elements of which it will consist. When he says—"Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness," they imagine that he merely intends to declare that he would at last have a place among the righteous, and share in whatever reward was bestowed upon them. But this does not seem to me to exhaust the force of the words. It appears both more in harmony with the context, and more in accordance with those other passages in which an analogous form of expression occurs, to believe that when the Apostle speaks of "the crown of righteousness," he refers to a special blessing which shall be conferred on him and all true believers hereafter. And, if so, there can be no doubt as to what allusion is made. St. Paul anticipated that blessed day on which—body, soul, and spirit—he should be pure, even as Christ is pure; when his whole complex nature should be perfectly holy; and when, as the result of all that Divine Grace had done in his behalf—as the consummation of all his most earnest efforts and prayers in this world, there should be set upon his brows that "crown of righteousness," the immaculate purity of which shall endure for ever.

Now, we know how earnestly the Apostle longed for this, and how diligently he laboured to secure it. With respect to its attainment, he might have been described as the most ambitious man of the age in which he lived. True, we hear him declaring—"I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content." And, when we see him so patiently submitting to privation and suffering, seeking no more than necessary "food and raiment," and casting no glance of envy at those equipages of the rich and powerful which swept past him, as, footsore and weary, he travelled from city to city, we might suppose that the principle of ambition was extinct in his heart. Yet there burned a fire in that man's bosom which could not be quenched; there dwelt within him an ardour for acquisition as intense as ever lived in the heart of any human being. Offer him not, however, any worldly object with which to appease that insatiable hunger which exists in his soul. Princely dignity and priestly authority—the imperial diadem itself, with a world under its sway—might have been set before him, and he would have turned from the whole as worthless baubles, which excited no feeling of desire in his heart. But tell him of perfect righteousness, and his eye glistens with delight: reveal that attainment as ultimately lying before him, and his looks are fixed upon it with the most eager and rapturous anticipation. He could never satisfy himself with the progress which he had made in the divine life, but panted incessantly after a greater conformity to God's holy image. The miser might at last be contented with the vast amount of wealth which he had hoarded; the voluptuary might, by-and-bye, weary in the pursuit of pleasure; the aspirant after greatness might, in course of time, flag in his efforts, and stop short at the point of elevation which he had reached—but never could the Apostle pause in his zealous endeavours to advance in holiness. In this respect he was ever "forgetting the things which were behind, and reaching forth unto those that were before." With his utmost efforts, however, he could not, so long as he was in this world, lay hold of the one great prize he coveted. "I have not yet attained," he ever felt reason to exclaim; "but I follow after," he added, as, with fresh enthusiasm and rekindled zeal, he "pressed toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

Such being the feelings and desires which glowed in the heart of the Apostle, we can conceive with what a fervour of eagerness he would look forward to the day on which his fondest wishes should be fulfilled. "It shall be mine at last," he thought—"that crown of righteousness—that diadem of perfect purity which glitters before me now, but which still eludes my grasp—it shall descend and rest upon my brows, never to be tarnished or lost—and mine shall be the possession of undimmed holiness, yea, of Christlike perfection for ever and ever." Ours be it to cherish like desires and feelings, and ours, too, through Divine Grace and power, shall at last be the same glorious attainment; for, says St. Paul, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

"THE CROWN OF GLORY."—1 PETER v. 4.

THIS word glory has a strange power over the human heart. Its very utterance is like a trumpet-tongue, which rouses the energies and excites the aspirations of every soul. We look back upon the past, and we see how great is the influence which it has exerted. It has proved itself one of the most potent words in human speech. To it have been due all the most brilliant deeds in the annals of our world. It has nerved the soldier to many an act of daring; it has impelled him forward on many a hard-fought field; it has given him a sense of conquest even when he fell, for he knows that his prowess will be remembered, and that his name will be held in lasting honour.

But it is not in the department of military effort and achievement alone that the thought of glory has had a most powerful influence over human conduct. Everywhere, and in all professions, may its effect be traced. From the lowest to the highest grades of society, from the village-green on which the stripling contends for the distinction of superior dexterity or strength, to the arena of Courts and Cabinets, in which the competition is for the highest power in a nation, Glory is the enchantress who lays her spell upon the heart and prompts to such earnest and persevering efforts.

Nor can I agree with those stern moralists who would frown upon the operation of this motive, and, if possible, root it out of the human heart. We are frequently told that, unless a man loves knowledge for its own sake, or art for its own sake, independently of the fame which great erudition or artistic eminence may gain him, he is untrue to the pursuit in which he engages, and need never hope to reach its highest summit of excellence. But this is to run counter to human nature, and to set up a factitious standard which mankind at large will never acknowledge. The desire of approbation, the pursuit of fame, is a perfectly legitimate motive in animating our conduct. God has Himself implanted this desire in our moral nature, and it is idle to ignore or suppress it. The statesman should, no doubt, be influenced by patriotism in the measures which he adopts, but he may also very properly have regard to the honour which they will bring him. The scholar should doubtless love knowledge for its own sake, but none the less may he be supported in his arduous studies by the renown which in consequence of his learning he will secure. The artist should, it is true, be so wedded to his profession that he will pursue it independently of the fame which he may acquire by means of it, but it would be very hard were we to interdict him, amid years of obscurity and neglect, from cheering his heart by a sanguine expectation of that honour which his works will ultimately procure him.

Now, in this, as in other respects, the Bible is true to the inherent principles of human nature. There have been theologians who insisted that what they called a "disinterested love of God"—that is, a love which has no regard to our own interests—was absolutely necessary to salvation. But the Scriptures set up no such impracticable ideal as this. On the contrary, they continually bring before us the thought of personal happiness hereafter, as a great motive which should induce us to love and serve God in this present world. They emphatically commend those who by a "patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honour and immortality." They set forth all that is alluring and attractive in the descriptions which they give of those rewards which await the righteous in a future world. They fully acknowledge, conserve, and sanctify that desire for our own honour and happiness which exists in each of our hearts; and, laying hold of the most pleasing and significant words in human speech, they seek by means of these to paint for us the blessed effects which will flow from a life of faith and godliness upon earth. Feeble indeed are all the conceptions which even the language of inspired writers can convey to us of the happiness of God's servants hereafter; but the vision, though undefined, is of the fairest and most fascinating character; while amid its golden hues, its pure and dazzling radiance, there is one object which is seen standing forth in bold relief as prepared for every saint, and that is "a crown of glory."

On considering this expression, we are led at once to the reflection that the happiness of God's people hereafter will partake of the nature of a recompense. Glory, in every idea which we can form of it, suggests the concomitant thought of previous effort in order to its attainment. No one can gain the glory of a warrior without exposing himself to the dangers and privations of a military life. No one can obtain the glory of a discoverer, without the trouble of arduous, and perhaps long-continued, researches. No one can procure the glory of the philanthropist, without devoting himself, at much personal sacrifice, to the welfare of humanity. In every case, in short, the acquisition of glory implies antecedent effort or endurance. It is a recompense for toil which has been borne, or self-denial which has been practised. And so will it be with the happiness enjoyed by the redeemed in heaven. The glory which they then possess will be a reward for what they did and endured on earth. It is true that, looked at in another light, all will be of Grace. It is utterly beyond our power to explain how the happiness of the saints hereafter can be all due to God's sovereign mercy, and yet will possess the nature of a reward for their own doings upon earth. But the one fact is as clearly revealed as the other. Not only do we read that "by Grace are we saved through faith; and that not of ourselves—it is the gift of God;" but we are also repeatedly told that God "will render unto everyone according to his deeds." There is the strict relation of cause and effect between a holy, devoted life upon earth, and the attainment of happiness in heaven. Nothing of an arbitrary or capricious character enters into God's allotment of that crown to which the Apostle points. It is in every case a reward—a recompense for faithful and persevering service:—"Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord."

Again, we are led by the previous course of reflection to observe that there will be various degrees of glory among God's people hereafter. This necessarily follows from the fact that their happiness will partake of the nature of a reward. For, if so, it must be proportioned to the different degrees of excellence which they attained on earth. This does not imply that there will be a feeling of want or imperfection among any of the inhabitants of heaven. According to their capacity all will be filled, and all will feel perfectly happy. But, while this is the case, we can easily understand what an infinite gradation there may be in the compass, so to speak, of that felicity which they severally possess. And thus, as we learn from the whole tenor of Scripture, it will be—"He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly; and he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." The more love towards God and man we display, the more personal sacrifices we make to aid in any good work; the more earnestly and successfully we struggle against besetting temptations, the more we grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, the more shall we secure for ourselves a high place in God's Kingdom above, and the brighter will be that "crown of glory" which we shall wear for ever and ever.

"THE CROWN OF LIFE."—Rev. ii. 10.

THE words—"I will give thee the crown of life"—manifestly form a climax to all that has yet been said. Life is essential to our enjoyment of any other blessing. Let a man be the occupant of a palace; let his fame be upon every lip; let wealth surround him with the greatest luxury and comfort; and then, let death but touch him, and what matter all the means of happiness which he possessed? You look round the room in which he lies; you mark the elegance and costliness of its adornments; you see the insignia of his greatness which it contains; you can read perhaps the poem which was dedicated to his honour—all that ministered to his glory remains the same as before—but when you look at himself you perceive that a vast change has occurred, life has deserted his frame, and he is now utterly insensible to all the evidences of grandeur, and all the means of gratification, which exist around him! And so it would be little even to secure "the crown of righteousness," or to be rewarded with "the crown of glory," were not these accompanied by "the crown of life," which gives permanence to the happiness they impart. What, then, let us inquire, are any of the thoughts suggested by the promise of this best and most blessed of all boons?

It sets before us, first of all, the prospect of a true life.

Never shall we know what it is really to live, until the crown here spoken of is bestowed upon us. For, life—what is it? Can that be called physical life which is attended by such frequent sufferings, and which evinces such an irresistible tendency towards dissolution? In every human body upon earth, however strong and healthy it may appear, there lurk the seeds of death, so that, in a few brief years, it must lie down and moulder in the grave. Or, can that be called intellectual life which is mixed up with so much ignorance and error, and which constantly feels itself crippled in its efforts after development and growth? In every human mind upon earth, however powerful it may seem, there exists many a hindrance to the full attainment of truth, while but a few years impair its faculties, and bring upon them all a dark eclipse. Or, again, can that be called spiritual life which is so enfeebled by the remains of sin, and has often such a struggle to maintain its very existence? In every human soul upon earth, however holy it may appear, there is still to be found a deep-seated depravity, which sometimes threatens to conquer altogether the spiritual vitality which God has imparted.

It will only, therefore, be when "the crown of life" spoken of in Scripture has been bestowed, that we shall know what it is really to live. For then shall our bodies be endowed with imperishable vigour and immortal youth: then shall our minds be freed from all perversity, and rendered capable of seeing life clearly in God's light; then shall our souls be perfectly delivered from sin, and conformed, in all their tendencies and feelings, to the glorious image of our God and Saviour.

Again, this expression, "a crown of life," suggests to us the sublime and enrapturing thought of never-ending existence.

When we begin to meditate upon this point, we are speedily lost in the grandeur of the subject. To think that we shall never—never—die; that it shall be ours to participate in the very loftiest attribute of God—eternity; that, after myriads and millions of years have passed, we shall still be in the possession of unspeakable felicity and glory—this seems almost more than it is possible to believe, and may well lead us to exclaim—

> "Immortal! ages passed, yet nothing gone!
> Morn without eve! a race without a goal!
> Unshortened by progression infinite!
> Futurity for ever future! Life
> Beginning still where computation ends!
> 'T is the description of a deity!
> And can eternity belong to me,
> Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?"

Yes! marvellous though it appears, let but that "crown of life" spoken of in Scripture be once set upon our brows, and we share in the grand prerogative of God, who is ever "the same," and whose "years shall not fail."

Once more, we have suggested to us by this expression, "a crown of life," some idea of what will be the nature of our happiness for ever.

Life implies activity, and thus we are reminded that heaven will be no place of mere quiescence, but that every power which we possess will be called into active operation, and so contribute to entire and perfect satisfaction. Rest is, indeed, to many, as it was to Robert Hall, a most attractive feature of the world to come. There are, perhaps, few earnest Christians but feel at times that one of the most precious declarations of Scripture is contained in the beautiful words—"There remaineth therefore a rest"—a Sabbath rest—"to the people of God." That rest will undoubtedly be enjoyed in the calm, undisturbed repose—so different from the unceasing turmoil of earth—which shall endure for ever. But we are not to think of this rest as excluding activity and effort, but should rather conceive of it as waiting upon these, no fatigue being then felt as the result of either bodily, mental, or spiritual exertion. New enjoyment will, in truth, ever flow from the calm, unagitating exercise of all those faculties which the redeemed shall possess throughout eternity.

And then, too, life suggests the thought of growth, of progress in knowledge and happiness and glory for ever. Soon, indeed, is the limit to development reached in this world. Maturity, such as it is, having been attained, there is then a speedy and sure decay. But no such thing will enter into the experience of God's people hereafter. Their unending life will be a course of uninterrupted progress. Height after height will be gained, glory after glory will burst upon their view. Ever will their minds be expanding: ever will the circle of their knowledge and happiness be widening; nearer and nearer to their God will they approach; and, with infinitude before them from which to derive continually fresh and satisfying enjoyment—with righteousness as the characteristic of their whole nature, with glory as the bright crown upon their brows, with life, even life eternal, as their noble and unassailable possession—so shall they—"so shall we—ever be with the Lord."

WHITE WINGS AND SILVER SCALES.

BY ALFRED J. BAMFORD, B.A., AUTHOR OF "TURBANS AND TAILS; OR, SKETCHES IN THE UNROMANTIC EAST," ETC.

IN the corner of my garden there is a summer-house, as pretty and as comfortable as any-one could wish to have. And the other day when I was sitting there, I either fell asleep and dreamed, or else I became very much more wide-awake than I had ever been before. Which of these it was, I am not sure, but as I watched a couple of butterflies dancing in the sunlight, it seemed to me that I could hear them talking and could understand what they said. One of them had only become a butterfly that morning, and the other not more than two or three days before, and they were talking together about the great change from a caterpillar's life to a butter-fly's.

Now just at the moment I discovered that I could understand them, the young one—whose name I found to be Silver Scales—was saying: "You cannot think how strange I felt for some little time before I left the cabbage-leaf on which I had lived all my life. I used to be considered good-tempered, but for some days I believe every-body would have thought me very bad-tempered if it had not been that I felt too weak and ill to show it. I did not know what to do with myself. At last, though I wanted to stay on the leaf, an impulse within me, which I could not resist, compelled me to crawl off it, and presently I found myself climbing up the grey oak palings. I was feeling dreadfully ill, and thought I was going to die. Perhaps I did die; for what else was it when I lost sight of and forgot everything until I found—how long afterwards I do not know—that I was a butterfly? Between my losing sight of myself and all my surroundings and my awakening to find myself a butterfly might have been a minute, or it might have been years; I have no means of telling which. But I remember a great change suddenly coming over me just before I lost my consciousness, and my brother, who was slowly climbing up behind me, must have seen it, for, though I was losing my power of hearing, with my other powers, I can distinctly recollect hearing him say: 'Ah! there is poor old Silver Scales gone; I was afraid something was going to happen. He is turned into a lump of wooden paling!' and I felt him shiver as he said it. Then, whether I had become a part of a paling or not I cannot say, for I lost all knowledge of everything till this morning. By the way, how strange it was that I should have been called Silver Scales! It was not at all a suitable name for me in those days, though now"—and I thought he looked approvingly at himself—"it suits me admirably."

"It was the same in my case," said the other. "I never could make out why I should be called White Wings. I was not white, and I had no wings; and, what was more, I was perfectly certain that I never should have. Yet here I am now, as white-winged a butterfly as ever flew."

"Yes," said Silver Scales, "we were caterpillars then, and never expected to be anything else. There was a report, I remember, that got about among some of us once that we should fly one day; but I laughed at it, and went on eating. It seemed too unreasonable for serious attention. What a pity, is it not, that we did not know? How good it would have been to have looked forward to to-day! Do you not think," he added, "that, since we do know now, we ought to go to the caterpillars that are still on their leaves and tell them?"

"It would be of no use for us to try," answered White Wings decidedly.

"Why not?" asked the other, not quite liking to hear his suggestion put on one side with so little hesitation, and a little inclined to suspect his friend of presuming upon his being a day or two older than he.

"For many reasons," replied White Wings, "but especially for two. In the first place, I am pretty sure that they would not be able to understand you; and, in the second place, if you could get over that difficulty and make them understand you, I am about as sure that you could not get them to believe you. Do not forget how you have changed. Think how you now enjoy this floating upon the air and this being carried down the wind. You are in ecstasy in the sunshine, and can imagine nothing sweeter or more satisfying than the nectar of the flowers. But all this is new. Think, if you can, how you felt when you were a caterpillar, and bear in mind that that is how caterpillars feel still. Try to imagine what their thought would be—as yours, too, would once have been—on being told that they should be lifted up from off their cabbages to fly through the air in the breeze and sunlight! Tell them of this, and tell them further that they will not eat cabbage-leaves any more, but will sip honey from the flowers that hold themselves up to the sun upon their slender stalks; would they not reply, 'We do not wish for any such things. We are heavy; it is hard enough work for us to drag ourselves along slowly; we do not want to have to fly—that must be harder work still. We have no wish to be at the mercy of the wind; even here upon our leaves we sometimes have to hold on carefully with our claspers to prevent ourselves from being rolled off. What would it be to be in the air, with nothing to clasp? Nor do we like the sun much better than the wind; we prefer the shady side. And as for our sipping nectar, you surely cannot know what you are talking about! We need more solid food than nectar. Why, do you not know that we spend all day in doing nothing else but eat—eat—eat, and yet we are always hungry? We cannot satisfy our appetites as it is, eating as fast as we can all the day long; and yet you think we could afford to waste our time flying about, hurrying here and there, doing nothing but now and then sipping a little nectar!' Something like this is what you would be told. But," added White Wings, "I doubt if you could make them understand you, to begin with."

It seemed, indeed, not unlikely that White Wings was right in this, as Silver Scales admitted. At the same time he was not sure enough about it to prevent his making the attempt. "It could do no harm to try, at any rate," thought he. So, without saying a word more about the matter to his friend, he soon found an excuse for bidding him "Good morning," and I saw him flying off to look for the leaf he had once lived on, and on which he knew that some of his relatives remained when he left, who might perhaps still be there. About this he was far from certain, since, as he had said to White Wings, he could not tell how long it was since he had left the cabbage and become a chrysalis, or a piece of oak paling, as his brother had supposed.

It was quite a long time before he could feel sure that he had found the right cabbage-leaf—all looked so changed to him. He did not know it again at first when he saw it; it looked so small now, though in his memory it was very large—for so he had thought it in the days he lived on it. And therefore it was that he flew to and fro through the garden, and had once even settled on the very leaf he was looking for before he recognised it. In the end, however, he saw which it was, and found that his old friends had mostly gone. They had become chrysalids, as he had, though they had not yet awakened out of their pupa sleep into the freedom of perfect insect life. But on the leaf were some full-grown, or almost full-grown, caterpillars, that by some means or another Silver Scales knew to be the same as some which were quite young caterpillars, only just out of the egg, in the old days of his own caterpillar life. They were talking about those who had gone—himself included, for he had not been altogether forgotten; they were telling how he and the others had gone away, and had not come back again, and would not come back; and they were saying that a caterpillar's life was a poor one after all, not really worth living. "You just live a little while," said they; "too busy with eating to enjoy it; and then—it comes to an end, and there is nothing more."

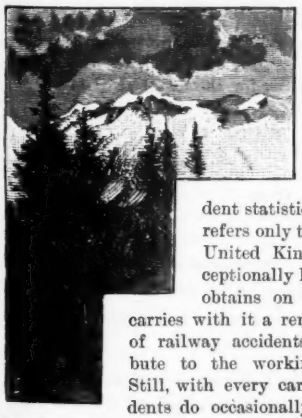
Now when Silver Scales found he could understand what they were saying, he began to hope that White Wings was wrong in one particular, at least; for if he could understand them, of course they would be able to understand him. "And how fortunate," he said to himself, when he heard the subject of their conversation—"how fortunate that I have come just at the very time to set these poor caterpillars right!" Whereupon he settled down right in front of the biggest of them, and began to tell him that he was not dead, that he had come back, and that, if he were changed, it was with a change for the better, since his life now was the happiest and brightest imaginable.

But the dull fat caterpillar had not understood a word. In fact, he could not even make out who or what Silver Scales was, and thought him to be a leaf that the wind had blown up against him. The wind had done so once before, and the leaf had tickled him most unpleasantly until the wind had blown it on further. But this seemed to him a very troublesome leaf that did not get blown away again, and had apparently more corners than the other. So the caterpillar screwed up his face and jerked his head and neck, as caterpillars are wont to do when anything displeases them.

Silver Scales understood the caterpillars, but could not make them understand either who he was or what he said. He did not give up without a very earnest endeavour; but at last he flew away, convinced that it was useless for him to try any longer. And as he went I heard him saying, "Well, life is bright, and I am glad. I can be glad not only for myself, but for my poor cousin caterpillar also; for though he cannot understand it, and will not believe it, for him too there is a bright life in store."



I have never caught the sound of the butterfly's voice again. These were the last words I heard him say—perhaps the last I shall ever hear from a butterfly. But as I remember and think about them, and all I saw and heard that afternoon, I wonder whether something like this has perhaps happened elsewhere than in my garden—whether something like this is the reason why none of my friends, who have left this world and me, have since come back to tell me of the new world to which they have gone, and where I hope to join them.

"IN JOURNEYINGS OFT."

HINTS TO TRAVELLERS.

BY THE REV. ARTHUR FINLAYSON, AUTHOR OF "EVANESCENT PHILOSOPHIES," "THE ETHICS OF ATHLETICS," "CONSECRATED INFLUENCE," ETC.

"Commit thy way unto the Lord."—PSALM xxxvii. 5.

A SEAT in a first-class railway carriage is, it is said, the safest place in the world. The statement is based on accident statistics, and, of course, refers only to railways in the United Kingdom. The exceptionally high speed which obtains on British railways carries with it a remarkable absence of railway accidents. This is a tribute to the working of the lines. Still, with every care, very sad accidents do occasionally happen, carrying desolation, anguish, and woe into many a home. Yet every traveller may very largely obviate or reduce the possibility of railway accidents by the adoption of a very simple expedient. In the extreme simplicity of the method I propose lies its chief objection to popular appropriation. Perhaps the reader will ask what is the secret or talismanic influence by which this desirable result is consummated. I reply, Do you when you travel shoot up the arrow of prayer beforehand for "journeying mercies by the way?" Surely you travel? The question seems as natural, Surely you pray?

"But," someone may say, "do you really think that prayer beforehand will avert a railway accident? If two trains meet each other they must collide, or if a train leaves the metals there must be an accident, and danger and damage may follow. You surely cannot mean that prayer produces any infraction or suspension of well-known and fixed laws of matter. That would be to work a miracle."

Stop a bit! A little reflection will show you that your arbitrary alternative is unnecessary. I am going a journey to-morrow or this morning. I lay the matter before God, and ask His guidance and protection. Is the Almighty shut up to one method of answer? By no means. He may answer my prayer by an influence on my own mind, enabling me to decide by what train I shall start, or by what route I shall travel. Or God may answer my prayer by influencing the minds of those who have the management of the train committed to their care—the conductor, engineer, brakesman, switchman, signal-tender, and telegraph operators. The safety and comfort of every traveller depend on the fidelity and promptness of all these. Such answers to prayer are independent of all physical laws, and lie without their sphere or dominion. But, again, by adjusting or combining certain physical laws, a train may escape where, without such adjustment or combination, an accident must necessarily follow.

If this be what you call "working a miracle," then thousands of "miracles" are witnessed daily on our great railway system, and every experienced railway traveller can count similar "miracles" in his personal wanderings or journeys. God is not shut up to the performance of a miracle in order to answer the prayer and ensure the safety of such as trust Him. But He does secure their safety, nevertheless, and in any event we can trust His wisdom and love. "Commit thy way unto the Lord" is an axiomatic truth for the Christian at home or abroad, in or out of doors, while sitting down, standing, or going to and fro along earth's highways. Who can tell how often your personal safety when travelling has been due to the Christian prayers of some fellow-passenger, or to the petition of some engine-driver's Christian wife or signalman's sister? Tennyson truly declares,

> "More things are wrought by prayer

Take home the lesson. Commit yourself and your journeys to God's care and keeping. "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths." The voice of prayer will have its reflex influence in the voice of praise if only we remember—though, alas! we are too prone to forget or ignore—our journeying mercies. Thus we shall express a new and deeper meaning in the words of the Psalmist, as applied to modern times, when, out of a full heart, we fervently exclaim, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits. . . Who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies." And as we think of the thousands of human beings who at this moment are being transported by this marvellous agency in all directions, and who, with the merchandise and freight that minister to our social comfort, are in spite of wind and weather, going straight as arrows to their targets, there may well arise from the devout heart, as it realises that "so He bringeth them to their desired haven," the fervent prayer, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"

The newspaper which tells of some sad railway accident may often be used to bring good out of evil if it leads us to sympathise with and to pray for the sufferers and their families. "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," and the wider our area of prayer, the deeper will be the reflex blessings on ourselves. Christianity is essentially unselfish: it is also intensely sympathetic. God give you and me the power to get beyond our little personal outlook, and to sympathise more freely and fully with others, to "rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." Thus we shall become more like our Divine Master, the Lord Jesus, whose loving sympathy is world-wide, and yet intensely personal.

The journal which records a railway accident may convey a wholesome lesson to you and me. Why did yon train leave the metals? That engine and its carriages were a power for good only so long as they were kept on the rails. As soon as the train left the metals it became a power for evil and destroyed itself. So with you and me. Our life is only a power for good when it is kept on the lines of Scripture. As soon as we leave the lines which God has laid down in the Bible for our guidance, we become powers for evil in the world, and compass our own destruction. Would you be a power for good in the world? "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The blood of Jesus avails to bring pardon, peace, and power to overcome. Contemplations of Jesus are the death of sin. And only in this way are we safe, when we follow the lines laid down in Scripture. "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life," says Christ; "no man cometh unto the Father but by Me." Those words contain a duty and a blessing for travellers, as well as for the dwellers at home.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

THE unseen touch of God has thrilled
Each bare and leafless bough,
And all the land with joy is filled,
And springtime blossoms now!

Though sweet the change seen everywhere
In Nature's smiling face,
There is on earth a change more fair—
The heart renewed by Grace!

Here, lovely tempers bloom, and make
A brightness all around,
And prayer and praise like music wake,
And happiness is found.

Lord, to Thy children now impart
This blessing from above,
This joy of springtime in the heart,
This gift of perfect love!

"BANDY": A STORY FOR THE CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TERRIE'S TWO COATS," ETC., ETC.

"Watching with strangely wistful eyes the yards of work."—p. 470.

HE did not look a bit like a hero; quite the reverse. Though nearly ten years old, he was so small that no one would have taken him to be more than seven. His hair was sandy, his eyelashes were yellow, and his big blue eyes inclined to be weak. His face was pale and pointed, though he had a nice little smile, with a dimple in it; and last, but most noticeable of all, his legs, thin as broomsticks, were crooked, in the fashion known as "knock-kneed," or "bandy." That was how he came by his nickname; for on the title-page of the shilling Bible mother gave him on his fifth birthday he was set forth as William Thomas Wiggs. But he had rickets very badly when he was a baby, and when he, at length, began to hobble about on his poor little twisted legs, the boys in the street used to say—not unkindly, but with even a rough sort of pity—"Hallo, Bandy!" "Look out, Bandy, there!" until his proper name seemed lost and forgotten. Even Mrs. Wiggs herself took up the, at first, objectionable sounding sobriquet, and consoled the child by assuring him that he was "mother's own Bandy." After that it did not seem nearly so ugly, and the unpleasantness gradually wore off, until at the time of which I am about to write he had grown quite used to it, and did not mind in the least.

But, as I said, no one would have given Bandy credit for being of the stuff heroes are made of. He did not care much to play with other boys, for when he did he was almost sure to get hurt. And he did not like noise and bustle—it made him feel so small and helpless; and he was afraid of fire-works! So it came about that Bandy sat a good deal at home with mother, reading, or watching with strangely wistful eyes the yards of work that passed so rapidly through her whirring sewing-machine. He had no brothers or sisters, and his father had died before he was old enough to know him.

One day something very unexpected happened. It was a lovely day in spring-time: Bandy will always remember that. The trees in the church-yard were opening out their beautifully folded baby-leaves in the warm sunshine; the tenderest of south winds just brushed one's cheek in passing, as if to say, "I'm going away in the country to set the daffodils dancing; won't you come too?" and every road-puddle reflected the blue and silver of the smiling, breezy sky. Bandy was hurrying home from school in great glee, for he had a rare treasure to show mother; he had found in the street a lovely head of pink hyacinth that had dropped out of some lady's nosegay. It had scarcely got muddy at all, and the scent was a revelation to Bandy, for he had never been close enough to a hyacinth to smell it before. Mother was so fond of flowers; how pleased she would be!

He climbed the four flights of steep stairs that led to his mother's room with unusual agility, but paused ere he reached the top, for he thought he heard a strange voice upon the landing.

"Here he is, I do believe!" said his mother. "Come up, Willie boy; we're just talking about you."

To be called "Willie," and told he had been talked about, was enough to prepare him for something decidedly out of the common; and he shyly advanced.

"Poor little fellow! He does look delicate," remarked a lady who stood in the doorway.

"What do you think, Bandy?" said his mother, with one hand taking off the cap he had in his surprise forgotten to remove, and with the other pushing back his hair. "This lady wants to know if you'd like a fortnight's stay in the country!"

Bandy turned very red, and said nothing, but you should have seen his eyes sparkle! He had heard of the country, but had never been farther than Hackney Marshes in his life; being so weakly, his mother had always been afraid to let him go for day excursions with the schools.

"A party of boys and girls are going to a village thirty miles away, next Saturday," explained the visitor, "and if you like, I think we could arrange for you to go with them."

In fact, it had all been pretty well managed before Bandy came in. The cost of his board and lodging in a cottager's family would be five shillings a week. Of this his mother could only afford half a crown, though she would give that willingly; and from a fund which kind people had subscribed for the purpose, the remainder, with his railway fare, might be paid.

The state of excitement that Bandy was in for the next few days can be best realised by my readers if they will set down the remembrance of their own pleasurable anticipations of a month at the seaside, and multiply it by ten, for to Bandy the prospect had all the added charms of absolute novelty. He dreamed that he was already in the country, and woke to find he wasn't; he dreamed that he was not to go after all, and woke to know that he was!

At last he was fairly off, with a little brown paper parcel of "luggage" on his knee, a brand-new and stiff pink-bordered handkerchief peeping jauntily out of his breast-pocket, and fourpence to spend.

I cannot stop to tell of all the delights he found at his journey's end: the wide sky, the green fields, the buttercups and daisies he might pick by hundreds, and no one to say him nay. These were all real and highly appreciated joys, amply fulfilling his most glowing expectations; but two things—so often does it happen thus in this world—prevented his happiness from being complete.

The one was that his poor, dear, overworked mother was not there to share the pleasure with him; and the other, that his companions, finding out that he was what they chose to call a coward, teased him about it.

As to the latter trouble, Bandy, born and bred in London, had an aversion to frogs and toads, hedge-hogs, snails, and other harmless denizens of the country-side, and was—yes, I must own it—terribly afraid of cows! These weaknesses were not shared by his more robust comrades, and they adopted the very worst possible means to cure him of them. One day he would discover a snail in his pocket; on another a frog would hop out of his shoe; while more than once did he shuffle away as fast as his legs would carry him at the cry of "Mad bull!" only to be followed by the derisive laughter of the thoughtless young practical jokers.

There was one terror, however, which they all equally shared: that was the fear of a so-called "haunted wood." In a certain fir-plantation, gloomy and dark, about half a mile from the village, a man had once hanged himself; and the spot had ever since been shunned with superstitious dread by all the more ignorant inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Not one of them would, if he could possibly help it, pass that pine grove, much less enter it, after dark; and the children could not bear to go near it at all. As for Bandy, the very thought of the place was a horror to him if he chanced to wake in the night, and it was only by saying over to himself the precious Bible words with which his mother had been wont to soothe his alarms—

"What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee"

—that he could forget it, and lapse again into the land of pleasant dreams.

One afternoon the children all went "maying."

It was the day before the little London visitors were to return home, and they wanted to take back some of the white blossoming boughs for their friends. What a joy and a marvel the hawthorn was, with its clusters of pearly buds and dainty sweet-smelling open flowers! And to think folks might gather it just as much as they liked, that was the greatest wonder of all!

They came back, singing and laughing, to the village as the sun went down, half hidden in their leafy spoils, like a party of small "Jack-in-the-greens." Bandy was especially jubilant, as a good-natured big boy had procured for him one of the whitest boughs, and he felt that he would be able to take mother a bit of the country, after all. But, oh! if she could only come and see it all for herself! He wished that more than he had ever wished anything in his life before, but he had not the glimmering of a notion how it could be attained. The mission did not send grown-up people into the country: he had ascertained that; he could not earn any money to pay for her to come—nobody would employ a little bandy-legged fellow like him—and besides, she could not spare time from her work, however badly she needed the change; and if he, Bandy, were to offer to do with less to eat, and so make up for all the expense, he was afraid mother would never agree to that. Oh, dear! what could be done in it?

So deeply was Bandy cogitating upon this problem, which he felt constrained to attack afresh in every new burst of enjoyment, that he did not notice the silence that had fallen upon his companions, or the quickening of their footsteps as they passed, as they needs must, the gloomy shade of "Hangman's Wood."

A dolorous wail that issued unmistakably from those darkening aisles of pine, followed by a chorus of terrified shrieks from the children, awoke Bandy to his immediate surroundings. Instinctively he took to his heels with the rest, though, owing to his infirmity, somewhat in the rear. "Everyone for himself" is too frequently the rule with little as well as big people in this world, and nobody—not even the good-natured big boy who had got him the may—thought of Bandy.

The sun was already gone, and the tall funereal pines on both sides of the way made that piece of the road quite dark. On toiled our little boy, trembling with fear, and the more slowly that he was very tired, the distance between him and his comrades growing greater at every step. Once more came that horrible, blood-curdling cry!—this time nearer apparently than before. It seemed, though hardly human, like the scream of someone in great anguish or pain.

Suddenly Bandy stopped—actually stopped before the fearsome wood was passed, and, with a queer mixture of terror and determination, glanced behind him.

No one was in sight; the pine grove was very dark, the road very lonely and very still; but the cool blue sky looked calm and kind, and Bandy, gazing up at it, waited, and did not run away.

Again came the weird sound, this time more like a moan, dismal and prolonged.

"It's something that's got hurt—I'm sure it is!" said Bandy to himself. "And it's crying. That's just how Mrs. Perkins' cat cried when it got run over. Oh, dear! I wish I'd got somebody to go with me and find out."

He looked anxiously up the road, but the hindmost of the maying party was long since round a corner and out of sight.

"Oh dear! there it is again! I can't go away and leave it! P'raps nobody will be past here again all night; but I am so afraid!"

"What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee."

How glad Bandy was that he knew that text! What could have fitted better to the present case? If any poor animal was lying in the wood in pain, it was a right thing—a thing God would love—for him to try and find and succour it. He would ask God to hold his hand all the time and lead him quickly to the right place, and he would not be afraid!

Laying his bunch of may carefully on the road-side grass, and shutting his eyes in prayer just one minute, Bandy, like the little hero that he was, went straight into the grove in the direction from which the howl appeared to come.

It did not seem so dark as he had expected when he was fairly among the firs, and he could always see the sky over his head. He surely would not have to go far in, for the sound had seemed quite near. He could not help shuddering when he suddenly found himself close to the blasted-looking tree on which it was said the suicide had accomplished his tragic deed, but murmuring half-aloud: "Oh, Lord Jesus, do please keep aside of me!" he went past it without faltering. The next minute a last red ray shot dazzlingly from beneath the cloud in which the setting sun had sunk, and revealed, peeping from among a clump of brown heath, the terrified face of a tabby cat.

"Puss, puss! Poor pussy, what's the matter?" said Bandy, running towards the creature with a voice full of sympathy, and all his fear forgotten. "What's the matter, then? Can't you get away?"

A closer inspection revealed the fact that poor pussy, wandering foolishly away from home, it is to be feared in search of prey, had got caught by the leg in a vermin-trap, and had torn her skin badly in trying to escape.

With the utmost tenderness Bandy endeavoured to release the poor thing, which, the trap being of simple construction, he was speedily successful in doing, and to his great gratification she allowed him to wrap his handkerchief round her bleeding leg, and carry her in his arms; the trustful, contented way in which she nestled against his breast proving both that she was accustomed to being petted, and that she recognised in this gentle-voiced and gentle-handed little boy a friend who would do her no harm.

Not another thought did Bandy give either to the horror of the wood, the fast-gathering darkness, or the bough of may that he was leaving behind, but with a heart full of happiness trudged towards the village, crooning words of caressing and comfort to the cat as he went, fearful only that she might presently take it into her furry head to struggle out of his embrace and run away.

As he neared the village he met a gentlemanly-looking boy a few years older than himself.

"Hullo!" said the latter, pausing and peering curiously at Bandy's burden. "Whose cat have you got there?"

"I don't know," answered Bandy. "I found her. She was caught in a trap."

"She's my little sister's cat, I know!" cried the boy. "We have lost her for two days. Spot, Spot, poor old Spotty! There, I told you so."

For Spot, at the sound of her name in a familiar voice, lifted her tail as much as was possible within Bandy's encircling arm.

"Bring her to our house," continued the young gentleman. "It's just across the road there, at that white gate. Lily has been in such a way about it, that father said he'd give five shillings to get Spot back. Where did you say you found her?"

"In the fir wood up there; the people call it 'Hangman's Wood,'" Bandy told him.

"What! you don't mean to say you've been in there?" exclaimed his new acquaintance, in surprise. "I thought the youngsters about here would sooner jump into the canal head first than set foot in Hangman's Wood."

Two minutes later, Bandy, much to his own inward trepidation, was ushered across the broad threshold of what seemed to him a palace, and conducted into a large and handsome room, lighted by four candles in shining silver stands: Bandy was always fascinated by shining things, and these were the first he saw. The next was the gleaming golden hair of a little girl who lay upon a sofa, covered with a rich-looking gay-striped rug; and after Bandy had once caught sight of her, he had no eyes for anything or anybody else, though he by-and-bye became aware that there were two ladies and a gentleman in the room besides. So lovely she was, with a face just like an angel on a Christmas-card; and she sat up, and held out her arms to the cat, crying, "Spottie! oh, it is my darling own Spottie!" in the sweetest, gladdest voice Bandy had ever heard; and Spot, all forgetful of her wandering, and fright, and pain, put her two paws up round the little girl's neck, and purred till every hair of her coat seemed to quiver with rapture.

"A regular Trojan, I call him!" Lily's brother was saying. "There isn't another boy for miles round would have done it. I do believe I might have thought twice before I did it myself, except in quite broad daylight."

Bandy had not the least idea what a Trojan was, but he guessed, from the tone in which it was uttered, that it was something quite different from "muffy" and "cowardy custard," which were the usual terms in which he was alluded to by other boys.

He was on the point of conscientiously explaining that he did think twice, if not three times, before venturing into the wood, when Lily's mamma, in the kindest manner, asked his name. And almost before he had begun to realise his surroundings, he found himself sitting on a low chair by the fire, quite close to the angel-faced little girl on the sofa, eating a piece of delicious yellow cake, and telling Lily, and Lily's mamma and papa, and her Aunt Adelaide, and the young gentleman whose name was Rex, all about himself and his home, and the dear mother who bent all day over her sewing-machine.

The ladies were much interested. "What was your mother's name before she was married?" asked Aunt Adelaide.

"Annie—Annie Burley," replied Bandy; adding, "She used to be a nurse, and took care of a little boy—a little young gentleman—who died."

"Dear Cecil!" murmured Aunt Adelaide, with a glance at the other lady. "I thought as much. What a singular coincidence! She was the most admirable nurse I ever knew."

After that they asked him a great many more questions, and Lily's mamma wrote down on a piece of paper very carefully all the particulars of Bandy's address in London, and how to find it. Then, with five shillings in his hand, and a packet of toffee in one pocket and a big orange bulging the other, and the lightest of hearts, he was bidden a kindly good-bye, and sent away.

The cottager, who had charge of Bandy and one or two others of the London party, was glad enough to see him back again safe and sound, for she was beginning to get anxious. She could not leave home to go in search of the missing child until her husband returned from work, and as to getting any of his valorous companions to go back towards the "haunted" wood to look for him—well! the biggest of them, the noble youth who had put the frog in Bandy's shoe and laughed the loudest when he fled from the imaginary "mad bull," had hidden in the wood shed, in mortal dread of being selected for such an errand.

About a week after Bandy's return to London, his mother was one day amazed by a visit from a lady, whom she had never seen before, but who explained that she was related to the mother of a little boy whom Annie Burley had devotedly nursed through his long last illness many years before. And would Mrs. Wiggs care to leave her present precarious employment and undertake the charge of an invalid little girl, with occasional sewing to fill up her time? She would live in a very healthy part of the country, explained Lily's mamma—for, of course, it was she—and arrangements could be made for her little boy to be with her in the very same house.

How Mrs. Wiggs ever told Bandy when he came home from school, or how they got their minds ever to take in such marvellous good fortune, I do not know. But you may be sure they did not look upon it as so poor and heartless a thing as mere "good fortune;" they knew that it all came of the love and blessing of the good God whom both mother and child genuinely tried to serve.

It is several years now since all this happened. Miss Lily, under Nurse Wiggs' ceaseless care, is growing quite a fine young lady; and as to Bandy, his former friends would scarcely know him. Fresh air, and happiness, and an abundance of good food, have worked wonders with him. His face is no longer pale and pointed, but rosy-brown and plump; his blue eyes are twice as bright as formerly, and show no signs of weakness; even his legs are almost straight—we believe they will be quite right by the time he has done growing; and the whole of his slim, upright, fearless form has at last a chance of fairly showing forth, unhindered now by nervous terrors, the true hero-soul that even when most despised was always housed within.

BABY'S FIRST VISIT.

LITTLE blossom, that I greet
With such thoughts of love and pride,
Violets make December sweet,
You will bless my winter-tide.

With your wide blue eyes you seem
Only angel forms to see;
Waken from your heavenly dream,
Come to earth, and smile on me!

All the hopes of days gone past
Thrill me with the joys of yore;
Mother-feelings, soft and vast,
Fill my withered heart once more.

Sweet forgotten voices wake
From the silence of the years;
And the long-sealed fountains break
Into floods of happy tears.

Other baby faces rise
Round your tiny face to-day;
Other gentle violet eyes
Look from regions far away.

In my fulness of content,
I can bless the Father's love
For the lights that came and went,
And the buds that bloom above.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

HE COULDN'T FORGET.

A VERY earnest and energetic teacher was away from home, and though always ready to pick up topics for teaching, and illustrations for arguments, by the wayside, the class was not in his mind. But the world is an inn of strange meetings, and suddenly he was touched on the shoulder by a young man. "I haven't the honour——' "What, don't you know me, sir? I was the worst boy in your class eight years ago. I heard you say it, though you didn't know I was close by. Now, sir, I'm a Sunday-school teacher myself. It was all true what you said of me; but though I was so wild I had a heart, sir, and I felt you wished me well in spite of the trouble I gave; and I had a memory, and the words you spoke, sir, I couldn't forget. They went with me when I ran away from home; they stuck with me. And I'm glad that they did, and I thank you, sir, for your patience in the old days." The teacher came back greatly encouraged, and is still at work, Sabbath by Sabbath, in the midst of lads who try him. If our teaching is for love of Christ, it must prosper.

CHRISTIAN LABOURS IN IRELAND.

In the will of a good man, bequeathing his property to his family, these words occur: "There is one thing more I wish I could give them, and that is the Christian religion. If they had that, and I had not given them one shilling, they would be rich; and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor." Many a yearning heart, concerned on behalf of our brethren over the water, is feeling that the Gospel is the hope of Ireland, and that in trying to bring religion home to those warm hearts of our neighbours, we shall give them comfort, inspiration, uplifting, patience, and riches for all eternity. However political opinions may differ, the Lord's people unite in the longing that evangelical religion may gain great and glorious victories throughout the length and breadth of the land. Most important are the labours of the Irish Church missions, and in some respects the workers therein are now facing a crisis. Railway alterations have required the former mission premises in Townsend Street and Luke Street, and the compensation only partly meets the attendant expenses. Accommodation is required for the home for girls, residence for female agents, school for 140 outdoor children. To build satisfactorily, about three thousand pounds will have to be found, and this causes anxiety to the society. Their mission work is most successful, and the work among the children has been fruitful of good. The need for outside help being so urgent, Mrs. Smyly, 35, Upper Fitzwilliam Street, Dublin, appeals for the practical sympathy of friends, according as the Lord has prospered them.

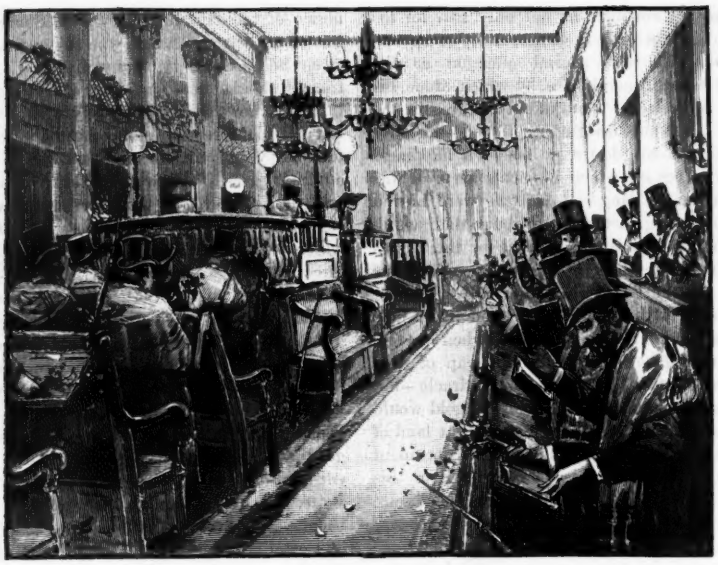
THE FILIAL PANG.
(Reproduction of the Chinese illustration.)

THE FILIAL PANG.

Among the books with a moral purpose which can claim a widespread popularity in China, one of the greatest favourites is probably "The Twenty-four Examples." It is older than the writings of our Chaucer, yet to-day is not only known by name, but read throughout the Empire. The "Examples" are examples of filial piety—in the estimation of the Chinese the chief of all the virtues. As showing the kind of conduct held up to admiration and imitation in these examples, we may instance the incident which stands fifth (of which we reproduce the Chinese illustration from an edition published near Swatow in the Kwangtung province). There was a man of the name of Pang, who had a wife and one child—a three-year-old son. With them lived Pang's aged mother. Now Pang was a poor man, and—as is unfortunately too often the case with the poor in the Flowery Land—a very poor man. Large numbers of the labouring classes live ordinarily in a condition so totally devoid of unnecessary comfort, so little removed from destitution, that the least interference with the labour market, the least failure in the crops, sinks them at once into a state of starvation. There is no possibility of a step between. Their normal condition is but one step removed. Pang was very poor. He could not earn enough to support his family of mother, wife, and child. What was he to do? The Chinese are not lacking in affection. Pang loved his little son.

Moreover, as a Chinaman, he not only had for his son the love that belongs to fathers everywhere—he regarded him also with special affection as the celebrant of those funeral rites by which alone his spirit could be delivered from untold tortures in the next world. But notwithstanding all this—his love for his child and his desire for his own happiness after death, to secure which his son's survival was to him a necessity—Pang and his wife were moved by filial piety to agree together to bury their child, that there might be a saving of food for the child's grandmother! Pang was to dig the grave, and his wife was to put the living child into it! The poor father proceeded with his work, and soon had a hole almost large enough for their purpose, when his tool struck against something hard. A heap of gold lay at the man's feet! And, gracious miracle—for, under ordinary circumstances, a heap of gold would be a doubtful blessing to a poor man in that land of rapacious and extortionate mandarins—a document lay among the pieces of gold :—"Heaven gives this wealth to Pang, the filial son. Let no official seize it; let none lay claim to it." This short story presents temptation to remark on more than one subject contested by the champions and detractors of the Chinese, but we leave it as it stands, without comment.

SOME LIFE-STORIES.



That the boy is father of the man is a truism we often repeat, and almost as often lose sight of. We have never come across a clearer example of it than is afforded by the life of the Rev. J. G. Wood, the eminent naturalist, which has just been written by his son, the Rev. Theodore Wood, and is published by Messrs. Cassell. Even when quite a child, at Oxford, he used to spend as much time as possible in the Ashmolean Museum, and the stories of the pets he and his schoolfellows used to harbour show how strongly the instinct of a naturalist governed these early years. In after life he became, as all our readers must know, famous as a popular writer and lecturer on natural history. Those who read his books and heard his addresses will be glad to welcome this story of their author's life. The friends, and they are many, of another good man who has been called away will be pleased to see the volume called "Memorials of Edwin Hatch, D.D." (Hodder and Stoughton), in which are printed a few of the many tributes that were paid to his memory at the time of his death, together with what seems to be a very representative collection of his sermons. Dr. Hatch was a remarkable man, alike in the breadth of his mind and the strength of his faith. It is to such men that we must look for the demolition of the walls of party jealousy that prevent all Christians working together for their common Lord. The spirit of the man breathes in his writings, and will, we trust, serve to enkindle a like fire to his own in many a heart. From the same publishers comes a somewhat similar volume, containing a brief biographical notice of the late Rev. Dr. A. N. Somerville, and a few of his sermons, under the suggestive title "Precious Seed, Sown in Many Lands." Our Scotch friends should make a point of getting this book. "Harness for a Pair" is a story with a well-pointed, but not too obtrusive moral, by the Rev. J J. Ellis, that our young friends might do well to read. The advice it gives, if followed, would save many an hour and day of sorrow. Another useful volume from the same author is "The Messages of Christ," in which he has gathered and expounded simply and directly Christ's call to all His people—to faithful and faithless alike. Both these volumes are issued by the Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company. Temperance workers will find a new ally in the "Temperance Reader," which has just been added to "Cassell's Modern School Series." Everybody knows how the stories and reminiscences of our reading-books remain with us, and can see how potent for good such a work as this may prove. Two new editions of books of poetry lie on our table as we write, and we can but call our readers' attention to them. The first is a volume of verse by Mr. George T. Coster (E. Stock), full of the life and change of the North-east Riding, and giving us two or three beautiful hymns, notably, that for "A Sabbath at Sea." Messrs. Rivington send us, at the same time, a new edition of "Five Minutes," a well-selected series of daily readings in poetry."

FOR LADIES IN NEED.

No class is more entitled to practical solicitude and sympathy than ladies who have seen more prosperous days, but who in declining years and weakness are without the comforts and cheer that would be so welcome and helpful. All honour to the "United Kingdom Beneficent Association," that has called into existence so many tender ministries to brighten the homes of candidates and annuitants. The "Ladies' Chain," the "Busy Bees," and other working societies, look after the matter of apparel; the "Hunt the Slipper" Association attends to the important point of boots and shoes. Then the "Quiet Friends" circulate literature, the "Ladies' Repository" tries to sell work, and the "Nourishing Dainties Society" collects and bestows many good things on behalf of those in need. Ladies who would like to join hands with those who are carrying on these channels of sympathy should procure "Con Amore," a little pamphlet issued by Charles Caswell, Birmingham, descriptive of many a suggestive and praiseworthy enterprise. Miss Smallwood, The Lees, Great Malvern, interests herself likewise in ladies of reduced fortune, but she finds that applications exceed resources. She can get work and paintings executed, and orders are very helpful; concerts, working parties, and the like, would be of great benefit on behalf of her fund for poor ladies.

"One who has seen better days."

"When spring unlocks the flowers." (The day of the "Great Hosanna" among the Jews.)

"WHEN SPRING UNLOCKS THE FLOWERS."

In the organ of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, we read with interest that on the day of the "Great Hosanna," early in the morning, an emblematic ceremony is performed in most of the synagogues throughout the world. Everyone is provided with a bundle of willow twigs, and at a certain sentence the twigs are beaten on the book-rest in front of the worshipper, to strip the leaves from the stalks. Superstition has mixed up with this ceremony the notion of getting rid of sin, but it is a symbol of the fragility of human life, passing away like the dropping leaves that so soon fall from the bough. Springtime shows us the brighter side—the picture dear to faith and hope. Nature's lesson is not so much man's mortality, but God's immortality; His voice is waking the blossoms everywhere, and sending new life pulsing through tree and hedge, and giving joyous carols to the woodland birds. The fact that we do all fade as a leaf is swallowed up in victory when we remember God, our Dwelling-Place through all generations. He is the God of the living, and every note of Nature is uniting now in the resurrection anthem. His love seems to have renewed earth's youth, as she smiles amid her garlands of primrose, violet, anemone; and the bright daffodils whisper of the roses to come. Specially dear to the heart of the mourner are these signs of glorious new life that bless us on every hand, for the Lord's saints are more to Him than the grass of the field and the birds of the air, and He will not suffer them to perish, nor to pass into nothingness, as a dream that is forgotten. He who from winter's tomb can call the spring-flowers to shine beneath the tender showers like a rainbow, He who clothes hard, frosty ways with white-robed snowdrops, and fills anew the burning crocus-chalice, what has He not wrought with the sainted lives that earth beholds no more? "Fear not; believe only," is the Master's message, and it is echoed to our yearning souls in deathless harmony by the sweet, comforting miracle of Spring.

"SINCE I HAVE KNOWN YOU!"

"Why, what are you doing there, my friend?" said a lady to one of her own sex whom she saw loitering in the dusk not far from her own house. The answer was repellent. "Mind your own business," or words to that effect, was the reply. But the lady, who is well known as an earnest Christian worker, did not leave the lingerer alone, and finally she took her to her own home and gave her food. The woman's story was a sad one. She had been deeply wronged, she said, and she had fallen into great misery. Before very long she lay on her death-bed, and as her friend bent towards her and asked the pointed question, "Do you believe or do you love God?" the touching answer came, "I can since I have known you!" We have heard the story told as an instance of the value of doing Christian work in a loving way. But weakness and sentimentality must not be confounded with such love. To preach from the pulpit is the work of comparatively few; to preach by character, and action, and life, can be accomplished by the many.

MORE ABOUT THE "QUIVER" WAIFS.

We have received the following letter, which we think will interest the subscribers to this fund:—

"22nd January, 1890.

—My dear Sir,—I write in grateful acknowledgment of your welcome remittance, providing me with the means of maintaining little Willie Rush ('the Quiver Waif') for another year. I beg you to accept my heartfelt thanks for your continued personal interest in the little fellow, and for your good service in keeping alive the sympathies of your readers, to whom I desire to convey, through you, my sincere expression of gratitude. I am glad to say Willie is in good health, and makes very good progress in every way. He is still at Denmead, where he was visited very recently by our Boarding-out-Inspector.

With renewed thanks I remain faithfully yours,—

Thos. J. Barnardo."

Our readers will rejoice with us to hear from Miss Sharman that the little girl Winifred, who, as one of our waifs, was in Miss Sharman's Home, is no longer a waif. At the time she was admitted to the Home she was really quite destitute. But now an aunt of the little girl, of whom Miss Sharman knew nothing till quite recently, has presented herself and taken charge of our protégée. So we can no longer lay claim to the little maiden whose portrait we gave so lately as our February number, in the illustration to our artist's account of "The Waifs' Picnic" (p. 293). In her place, Miss Sharman has recommended to us another little girl, who is at present in her Home. So long as our readers enable us to do so, we shall be glad to allow Susie Lank to take Winifred's place as one of The Quiver Waifs. Susie is not very strong, and at the time we write is at the Newton Abbot branch of the Home, for the benefit of the fresh country air. Her mother died of consumption, and her father took his own life in the agony of his grief, leaving Susie and her elder sister, both of whom are shown in the accompanying illustration, unprovided for. Miss Sharman, as one of her friends writes, took the children in "at once, out of their turn, as there was no one who could make a home for them." Will not our readers help us to make a home for these children?

HOW THE ICE WAS BROKEN.

"She twined her arms round him."

We make the little ones our pets and playthings, but we scarcely realise how truly the Master deigns to use His lambs for the spread of His Kingdom oftentimes. It is on record that a little child interested in Sunday-school work a man who became the founder of many such schools, and made their well-being his life-work! Little hands have done work which older people found impossible, and led hardened hearts and lives to the foot of the Cross. A speaker told in our hearing of a member of his congregation, blameless outwardly, but cold and hard, withstanding Christian appeals, held in awe by many, and much dreaded by the children of the place, who fled when they saw him approach. But a tiny grand-daughter came to stay at his house, and one Sunday evening she twined her arms round him, and urged him to sing hymns. He told her gruffly that he could not sing, but she said with confidence, "Oh, yes, you 'll sing bass, and I 'll sing treble. We'll sing 'Jesus loves me,'" and she started the hymn, "I am so glad that Jesus loves me." Presently he found himself joining in, and, as they sang, his cold heart was moved, and tears began to roll down his cheeks. The child's ministry had smitten the rock, and he was a hard, stony-natured man no more. It was on the morrow that that man was suddenly called into eternity, as he went about his daily work; he was brought home to die, and they heard him repeating with his failing breath, "I am so glad that Jesus loves me." "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones." Unless we share their tender, trustful, simple, hopeful spirit, how shall we enter into the Kingdom of Heaven?

NOT ABSENT ONCE.

"In my own Sunday-school," says a correspondent of an American contemporary, "I have a teacher who has not been absent a single Sabbath in twelve years, and a scholar whose regular attendance every Sabbath numbers fourteen years." Are these instances unparalleled, as they seem to us, or can any of our readers tell us of similar examples of faithful service? We shall be glad to hear from Sunday-school workers on this point.

A PANIC ARRESTED: A SPEECH SAVED.

A striking instance of the double quality of enthusiasm is found in a story told of Kossuth. The great Hungarian patriot was on tour in America, enlisting sympathy for his beloved land. He delivered an address in Madison, Indiana, to a gathering of Germans, speaking from the heart to the heart, and prophesying of a rising tide of liberty between Rhine and Vistula and Danube, he swayed the spell-bound throng with his oratory as trees are swayed in October winds. Suddenly a piercing scream rang out in the centre of the building, and in the tumultuous excitement of the moment panic was possible. Kossuth stopped with a calmness that had a tight grip of occasion, and a child and a woman were safely removed. But what of the speech? Surely it was a hopeless effort to resume. The audience had become inattentive, and the former fervour was dead. But Kossuth's fiery enthusiasm was not to be daunted. It enabled him to see opportunity in what had happened, and to change defeat into triumph. With a proud and inspiring gesture he said, while yet the child's wails vibrated in the air:—"He may cry now for Germany, but when he is old he will laugh." Kossuth had struck a key that answered. His power was effectually reasserted.

"MY BROTHER'S KEEPER."

The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse pleads aright that places of worship should have some place open for evening resort, easily reached, warm and cheerful, where our poorer brethren and sisters might be sure of a welcome, and sit and read "without being lectured or patronised." He relates that he once observed a number of men, who were working on the road, taking their dinner by the wayside, in the pelting rain. Within a mile there were five places of worship, and the nearest was under his own pastorate. He got the schoolroom open, and welcomed them in, offered them the room as long as they worked near, and had a fire lighted for their benefit. Another place welcomed them when their work lay farther off. On Sunday some of them walked a long distance to hear a sermon from their friend; one of them explaining, "One good turn deserves another!" There are many ways and means surrounding us of holding a kindly hand to our brethren, and we, as Christians, are responsible that they shall not be unhelped and forgotten.

"THE BOOK WAS NOT THERE!"

Four Indians of Oregon once made a journey of 3,000 miles on an unusual errand. The rumour had reached the far western woods that the white invaders had a Book, which Book was the work and gift of the Great Spirit. In a solemn forest council it was decided to send an embassy and ask for the Red man the privilege of sharing in the blessings of this wonderful possession. Two aged Sachems and two young braves were selected to go. It was a weary distance, but at last they reached St. Louis. Unfortunately for their purpose, St. Louis was, in those days, a Roman Catholic city. The visitors were shown many sights, but enquiry for the Book received only evasive answer. Soon the two old men died, the last great task of their lives uncompleted. On the eve of a sad and disappointing return, one of the survivors went into the Council-room of the American Fur Company, and with pathetic, unstudied eloquence, addressed the Governor. "My people sent me to get the white man's Book of Heaven," he said. He called to mind where he had been taken, but ended with the touching refrain, "The Book was not there!" And still the Book was not forthcoming. The poor Indian went away as he came. The mission seemed to end in utter failure. But it was only in the seeming. A young clerk in the office, who had heard those words, "The Book was not there!" wrote about it to friends. His letter was made public, and very shortly afterwards two noble-hearted young missionaries and their brave wives went out to carry the Gospel into Oregon. Man denied the Indian's prayer, but God heard it, and made even apparent failure the instrument by which the answer was sent.

MARIA HIBBERD, THE QUEEN OF "THE QUIVER" ORDER OF HONOURABLE SERVICE.

(From a Photograph by Messrs. Debenham & Gould, Bournemouth.)

THE "QUIVER" ORDER OF HONOURABLE SERVICE.

We were mistaken when we said, in our February number, that Nancy Ball is now Queen of the Order. That distinction belongs to Maria Hibberd, who has served in her present employer's family since August, 1819, very nearly 71 years. The old lady, whose portrait we give this month, is now 87 years of age. She was enrolled among the distinguished members of our Order some two years ago. Since our last note on this subject was published, the following names have been added to the roll of distinguished members :—

Name.	Address.	Years in Situation.
GARDNER, ELIZABETH	PLYMOUTH	51
SMITH, ELLEN	MANCHESTER	50

This class, which consists of those domestic servants who have held their present situations not less than fifty years, is the only class of the Order now open. All communications regarding enrolment must be addressed to the Editor of THE QUIVER.

"A GREAT MORAL INSTITUTION."

The late Earl of Shaftesbury thus entitled the Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society, remarking that old people are apt to be considered burdens, while it should be a joy and a privilege to minister to them. Reverence for old age is perhaps a less popular virtue than it ought to be; busy, bustling people are no doubt of inestimable value, but we need the benedictions across this work-a-day world of those peaceful, patient lives on the "right side of eighty"—the side nearest the Land of Sunshine and Rest. The Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society has taken up the privilege of caring for "old-fashioned Christians," and for more than fourscore years it has ministered to the needs of thousands of those whose earthly work is over. There are four homes, and there is also a most helpful pension administration. Some of the recipients are blind, others bedridden, and all are thus enabled to live free from the cares of grinding poverty and in comparative comfort. Of one aged believer thus assisted we read that for forty-three years he "supplied" village churches, walking many miles to render such help. He often expressed a wish to be taken ere he could do no more, and he preached on the Sunday before he died. "I acknowledge," writes a pensioner, "the faithfulness of a covenant-keeping God, who has enabled me, through your benevolence, to keep on a cottage-home, which I must otherwise have given up." May this society be developed by kindly hearts and hands, fulfilling the poet's words as concerns the hoary-haired:—

"Now let the parting hour be bright;
At even time let there be light"

A KINDLY SUGGESTION.

The poet reminds us that want of thought is sometimes responsible for evil rather than want of heart. Some of us have been troubled on Sunday mornings by the sight of weary postmen trudging mile after mile to perform the work that seems to belong more appropriately to week-days; yet there is a difficulty concerning this question of Sunday delivery. In critical cases a telegram might certainly answer the purpose of a letter, but few are prepared to give up their Sunday letters, and in towns the decision to do so must be unanimous, or the delivery will be continued. A lady whose mind has been exercised about this matter has formed a simple plan which she would be glad to suggest to others. She makes a rule to abstain from posting letters on Saturday which would be delivered on the Sabbath-day. A very simple solution this of the difficulty, could it become a general practice.

HER FEEBLE STEPS.

Her Feeble Steps

A PROUD young mother, in the glow
Of life's glad morning, long ago
It was her happy task to guide
His childish steps when, side by side,
Along a sunlit path they walked.
His small hand clasped in hers, and talked
With joyous tones, and laughter light,
Amid a world of beauty bright —

Now, bent beneath the weight of years,
She leans upon his arm, and hears
The deep, stern voice his comrades know,
Speaking in accents soft and low,
While, with erect and manly air,
A noble son, with loving care
He guides her feeble steps, whose day
Of life is fading fast away!

With grateful heart he dwells upon
The gracious time, forever gone,
The hours she watched and tended him!
And now her eyes are growing dim,
And strength is failing, he will guide
Her feeble steps with tender pride.
Counting her love of higher worth
Than any prize he gains on earth.

REVELATIONS OF CHARACTER.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM.

I.—CHARACTER AND THE COUNTENANCE.

MIND and body have such a marvellous and mysterious connection the one with the other, that their action and interaction have formed the subject of learned treatises, such as Professor Alexander Bain's work on "Mind and Body." All, however, that I purpose to do in this first article is confined to the consideration of the revelation of character through the countenance. I might, indeed, have enlarged the consideration by taking in the entire physique: for unquestionably the shuffling gait, the pompous walk, the expressive shoulders—shrugged or raised—all have an eloquence of their own. Let the countenance, however, suffice: it is complete as a study, and interesting enough in its variety of aspects. I am not about to defend the position that physiognomy so-called never deceives: but I do submit that it rarely does so, and that qualities of mind and heart and moral being may generally be discerned there. The studious forehead, the scornful lip, the cruel mouth, the nervous upper lip, the unsteady gaze, the self-indulgent features, are familiar to us all. The eye, of course, is in itself an exhaustless study: reverence and irreverence, pity and inconsiderateness, compassion and coldness, rudeness and courtesy, self-respect and shamelessness, earnestness and frivolity, parsimony and generosity, all reveal themselves in the wonderful expressiveness of the eye. I do not, of course, mean that a deceitful manner cannot be assumed, or that, for a time, men and women cannot look what they are not: but Nature has no permanent veils: they are very gauze-like, torn and tattered in an instant by those freaks of real nature which assert themselves in so many unconscious ways. The sentinel Will is off guard in an instant, and quietly, but surely, the revelation comes, and we see under the guise the real man!

In the most perfect sense, "out of the heart are the issues of life," and the blush of the innocent maiden and the stammering lips of the perjured witness tell their own tale.

That our countenances, too, vary with the elevation or deterioration of our spiritual character is evident to our best friends; there are times when we consciously live in strenuous endeavours after a diviner life, and those about us know it by infallible signs in the revelation of our countenance. There is a quiet dignity of expression, not long-drawn or Pharisaical, but one which makes manifest a life full of happy cheerfulness and fervency in daily duty, and yet bespeaks a consciousness of the near presence of God.

Our young friends are scarcely aware how much their countenances are affected by their friendships. Have we not all known sweet and sacred simplicity and naturalness give place to mannerism and affectation, whereby their faces have lost that early grace of considerate kindness which made their very presence a benediction amidst their often worn and weary-hearted elders?

Is it true, then, it is sometimes asked, that the instincts of people—of women especially—are always to be taken as true in respect of countenance? Certainly "always" is a large generalisation, and I should not like to endorse the idea as true in every case; but in the main I think it is true, and when instinct creates a positive aversion on the part of women, I should personally be inclined to be on my guard in fellowship with those whom they so greatly feel antipathetic to. Unquestionably, however, the consideration of what are called "first impressions" is a great study in one's own life, and the often-debated question whether, —whatever our after-views—we do not generally find first impressions pretty true, is a most interesting query, and I incline to give an affirmative reply. Everything in us works from the centre to the circumference, and what is in the revealing countenance—whether it be gladness or grief, anxiety or peace, confidence or distrust—is first of all in our mind and heart.

Another question, most interesting, too, in this region of debate, is this: Can there be true beauty where there is a corrupt and evil character? Everything here depends upon what is meant by true beauty. If outline of form and feature and perfect complexion are held ever to constitute true beauty, the answer might well be in the affirmative here also; but more than this, I think, is required to constitute true beauty.

Professor Ruskin says the faults of a painter's character show themselves in his work; and, with his large induction of observation, we naturally give great weight to his verdict. Certainly it seems to me perfectly true, as the Holy Book says of those who are not the children of goodness, that "they that be otherwise cannot be hid." And so as human beauty includes moral loveliness, true beauty cannot really belong to those whose hearts and whose lives are sensual and evil.

Expression is, after all, no forced or feigned thing; it is the result of life, and the spirit of man which is in him is one of those subtle things that more or less pervade every feature of the countenance.

From all these considerations, it is manifest that in character are to be found the highest elements of health and happiness, both of which reveal themselves in the countenance. We read in the Bible of "wholesome words": a very suggestive expression; and as the heart and the lips are so near akin, it is evident that the wholesome heart or the healthy heart gives that "health of the countenance" of which the Bible also speaks. The blessed or holy man, also, is he whose heart is right with God, who is delivered from the bondage of guilt through the Cross of Christ, and from the bondage of habit through the indwelling of the Spirit of God; for "he that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." Take away, then, the stings of conscience, the agonies of remorse, the slavery of evil habit, and let a man be saved in the highest sense, by Christ's life in him, and you secure the blessed countenance, filled with that sweet benediction of Heaven's own peace, which is spoken of by the Psalmist as "the health of my countenance and my God."

I do not say that there are no marked exceptions to my illustrations and arguments. For instance, there are specially anxious and nervous temperaments; there are inherited features, which carry with them not men's own habits, but ancestral ones; there are the subjects of melancholia, ever to be pitied, and to be honoured too, for the brave way in which they fight on in life's daily battle, and make endeavour to master their own mental tendencies; but in the main I believe that the ideas developed in these pages are true ideas, and they show us that men cannot well or long conceal their true selves.

We may not be "strikers or busybodies"; but, as the poet says—

> "They hurt me with their faces and their eyes;"

and it is certainly worthy of consideration how much scornful people and satirical people and indifferent people do to make daily life a burden and a pain to others. A cheerful countenance still does act like a medicine: it exhilarates and inspires others, and helps to make the daily road a much smoother path, and the common task a much more successful toil. A thankful countenance does much to cure a somewhat popular pessimism, and to make us more grateful for the multitude of God's mercies, new every morning and fresh every evening. An open countenance does much to disconcert the deceitful and the diplomatic, who naturally are afraid to have much fellowship with those who say what they mean, mean what they say, and look what they speak. A reverent countenance does much to rebuke frivolity with Divine things, and to check that lightness of talk which soon degenerates into the empty jest and the hollow laugh. A pure countenance is as a coat of mail against all approaches of the evil spirit. And therefore, for the reasons I have developed in these pages, by the revelations our countenances give of what is believed with the heart, loved with the heart, reverenced with the heart, and cherished and protected as the very life of the soul, the subject of our study becomes a very vital one. Nature hates a forgery—the true handwriting of life is soon known. Nature hates a mask, and at any sudden instant tears it down and rends it in twain—which is only saying, in other words, "God made us, and not we ourselves." Yes—and "fearfully and wonderfully" are we made; no handiwork of man is so subtle and delicate as that which connects body and soul together: the nerves, those messengers of sensation, have a swifter telegraphy than any of our electric wires; and before the will can forbid or arrest the message, it is written on the index of the countenance. Surely, as we study the subject, the ancient prayer has a new beauty and a fuller meaning in it: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me; cast me not away from Thy presence, and take not Thy Holy Spirit from me."

It certainly remains true, so far as Art is concerned, that revelations of character—for instance, as in Judas—have appeared in the countenance; but there is one thing Art cannot do—viz., give us the transformation scenes which sudden temptations and dangers bring forth, such as that spoken of in Belshazzar: "Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him." Yet so it is. We are the subjects of marvellous changes of countenance, as our moods come and go. When Cain was wroth, "his countenance fell." When Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, "it was not towards him as before." After the words of Eli, Hannah "went her way, and her countenance was no more sad." And Nehemiah reminds us of his own tell-tale countenance in the presence of Artaxerxes: "Now I had not been aforetime sad in his presence. Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart."

So it was; and so moods of mind and passing emotions of grief or joy mirror themselves in our countenances, as in the days of old; but underlying all, and coming out daily and hourly, are those constant expressions which give a stereotyped character to the countenance, and reveal the real abiding self. How beautiful is the quotation of St. Peter, made from the Psalms on the day of Pentecost, and how applicable to every godly man: "Thou hast made me to know the ways of life: Thou shalt make me full of joy with Thy countenance."

WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

BY E. NEAL, AUTHOR OF "MY BROTHER BASIL," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

UNDER ONE ROOF.

'They could not in the selfsame mansion dwell
Without some stir of heart."

VERECROFT seemed very quiet when Lancelot had gone, and everyone seemed more or less unsettled. It was the sort of blank the absence of the head of a household makes; for though Sir Raymond was nominally the master of the house, it was his cousin who transacted all the business and made all the arrangements.

"That will all have to be altered when I come back," Lancelot had said to Sir Raymond, the night before he went away. "You are a man now, you know, and my stewardship is over. Even when you go back to Oxford——"

"I am not going back," said Sir Raymond, with an ingenuous blush. "I don't know that a degree would be of any particular good to me—and I don't suppose I should work much, now."

"No," said Lancelot drily. He looked at his cousin curiously, and his own colour changed. "When is it to be?" he asked, almost sharply.

He turned his face from the light, but Sir Raymond was too full of his own thoughts to notice how Lance felt or looked.

"The mother wants us to wait till after Christmas, so of course we shall," he said; and Lancelot felt like a man who hears his death-warrant read

"Christmas? So soon!" he stammered blankly. Somehow he had never thought of anything immediate. When Ray was older, when the mourning for Mrs. Kenyon was over, when he himself would have had time to learn indifference, no doubt this thing must be; but now?

It was something in Raymond's face that had made him put his question, but he had not expected an answer like this. It took him all the more by surprise that he had heard no hint of such a thing, had not been consulted beforehand—he who was, at Verecroft, the universal adviser and referee.

"Nothing is quite settled, of course," said Sir Raymond, interpreting his cousin's surprise in what seemed to him the most natural way. "You see, Lance, Avice doesn't know you as we do, and she can't understand what a dear old alter ego of mine you are, and she didn't like to have it talked about till nearer the time. Of course I told you, as you asked me——"

"Don't apologise. I quite understand, and it is perfectly natural," said Lancelot, in a tone of repressed pain. Was he to lose her friendship also? he thought bitterly.

No doubt it was best so in every way, but it is not always that one has strength to desire the best. Lancelot did not ask if Avice's evident indifference made his renunciation easier; he only felt that it chilled him to the heart, that he would have given a dozen years of his life for one of those shy friendly glances he had been used to meet, for one of the sweet gracious tones that had grown so stiff, and formal, and cold. He wished his cousin a hurried good-night and left him, feeling that he must betray himself if he talked of Avice any more.

He had a long interview with Lady Vereker after that, in which he made it so evident that he wished to leave Verecroft before Sir Raymond's marriage, that Lady Vereker found herself unable to combat his resolution. She pleaded and protested in vain: for once Lancelot was obdurate, and bent on his own way. He would not even consent to remove with Lady Vereker to the Dower House, and continue to manage the estate.

"Ray is a man now," he said; "he ought to manage the estate himself. He must have occupation, and why should I take his natural duties from him? It will be best for him that I should go, and for me too. If I am to do anything in my profession, I ought to begin at once."

It was all so unanswerable that Lady Vereker could only agree, though with many tender regrets. It was settled at last that Lancelot should try to meet with suitable rooms in the Temple, or some other haunt of budding barristers, and should take possession between then and Christmas; and the feeling of a more permanent separation added to the depression with which Lady Vereker and Sir Raymond saw him drive away now.

"You can't understand it, I know," said Sir Raymond, who found his betrothed less sympathetic than usual, "but you will when you know Lance better. You will miss him then as much as any of us."

As much! Did any of them miss him as she did now? Did the loss of this one voice make all other sounds empty and barren to their ears? Did his absence take the light from their eyes and the sunshine from their day? Did they feel as if Life had nothing to offer now that he was gone, and Hope nothing to feed on now that there was no longer the chance that the sound of an opening door might herald his approach?

She was silent, for what was there she could say?

"You see," said Sir Raymond, still wishful to win her interest in the cousin he held so dear, "Lancelot is not a man easy to know, and perhaps it is a good thing for me. If you had known Lance as he really is, I shouldn't have had a chance! As it was, I believe I was always a little jealous when he went near you—though of course it would be absurd to be really jealous of Lance."

XUM

"I wonder why?" said Avice, in level tones that hid a good deal of surprise, and perhaps of indignation; but Sir Raymond answered with an unconsciousness that disarmed reproach.

"He does not mean to marry," he said simply. "He told me so the other day."

Meanwhile Lancelot's absence lengthened to nearly a week, and the quiet days slipped by with little to mark their course. Lady Vereker and Daisy walked and talked together, and sometimes drove out in the pony-carriage through the rich Warwickshire fields and lovely elm-bordered lanes, and Sir Raymond and Avice were left to the dual solitude which is the privilege of affianced lovers, and which Sir Raymond, at least, thoroughly enjoyed. He would have been well content to spend his days at Avice's feet, but Avice told him she detested "philandering," and insisted on "rational occupation."

Fortunately music offered a compromise acceptable to both, and the old hall continually resounded with the fine tones of the organ and the strains of the two beautiful voices. The tenor which Andrea Balmano had bequeathed to his son had been cultivated as it could not have been had he been brought up as the peasant's son he was, and Avice was never so near loving him as when he sang to her.

If they could only have passed their lives away in singing! she thought, with a sigh, as she sat in the shadow of the organ, the evening when Lancelot was expected home.

Lady Vereker and Daisy had driven to Warwick to meet him, and Avice sat and listened to Sir Raymond's singing, and waited—waited—till the sky glowed red with sunset, and the shadows crept along the floor.

Her eyes wandered to the clock, but it was already too dark to see the time. Still, he could not be long, she knew, and now and then she fancied she heard the roll of wheels along the drive.

Sir Raymond had left off singing, and was improvising, in the dusk, faint dreamy melodies that seemed to suit the softness and beauty of the hour. A little mist was rising from the river; the jessamine that grew round one of the windows gave out its faint sweet perfume; there were moths flitting amongst the flowers, and a bat wheeling and flashing across the space framed by the open door.

There were wheels certainly now. Avice's heart beat as if it would suffocate her, and Marmion, Lancelot's great Scotch deerhound, got up from his place by the door, and shook himself and sniffed the air as if he knew his master was coming.

Suddenly Sir Raymond began to sing again, but Avice interrupted him with a sharp, startled cry.

"Not that—not that!" she said, and he looked at her in vague surprise.

He had chosen the ballad she had sung in Lady Rosalie's drawing-room when Lancelot had come in. But Sir Raymond knew nothing of that, and naturally it had no special associations for him.

"Don't you like it?" he asked in astonishment. "Why, Avice, you used to sing it yourself! And the violin part comes out so well on the organ. Pull me out the claribel stop, and listen."

"I would rather you did not sing it—not now—not to-night."

"But why?" persisted Sir Raymond, turning round to look at her.

The next moment he jumped up, and went swiftly across the hall. Lancelot was coming in at the door, between Lady Vereker and Daisy, and in the confusion of welcome and greetings only Lancelot himself noticed that Avice had disappeared.

He had seen her as he entered, the tall white-draped figure, with its coronal of shining hair shown up against the dusky background, and seeming to him, at least, to "make a sunshine in a shady place." And now she was gone, and he felt as if he had driven her away. Did she dislike him so much that she would not even join the others in bidding him welcome home? It was thus Lancelot thought of the girl who had fled from his presence only because it was so dangerously dear. He had thought once that she had felt for him a friendship it would have been easy to change into love, but lately he had doubted if even the friendship had existed except in his own imagination.

And meanwhile, Avice was writhing under a sense of intolerable humiliation. Why should this man have such power over her? she asked herself bitterly. She was trying with all her might to do her duty to Sir Raymond, but how could she so long as his cousin's voice thrilled her in every nerve, and the mere sight of him made an epoch in her day?

She did not come down-stairs till the dinner-bell rang, and then her mood was so bitter and sarcastic that Lady Vereker was puzzled and distressed, and asked her son privately if there had been a lover's quarrel while she was away.

"A quarrel? No, indeed! She was all that is nice and sweet. She always is when we are alone. I never saw her quite like this before, but certainly there is no question of a quarrel between Avice and me. You don't understand her, mother."

"No," sighed Lady Vereker; "but I try, Ray, and perhaps it will come in time. We are so different, you see, and I have known her such a little while. I wish Mrs. Meredith would have come with her daughters. I should understand Avice so much better if I had seen her mother."

But Mrs. Meredith had refused the invitation to Verecroft, as she refused all others, and with something more than the vague alarm with which she shrank from strangers. How could she meet Lady Vereker, who was not a stranger, who might recognise her, even now, as the woman who was once Hugh Dalrymple's wife?

CHAPTER XXV.

A MOONLIGHT MEETING.

"Yea, this man's brow, like to a tragic leaf, Foretells the nature of a tragic volume."—Shakespeare.

Leamington was decidedly empty, as it always is in August. There were fewer pretty girls in irreproachable costumes to be seen about the wide, pleasant streets, and fewer languid dandies, with eye-glasses and sticks and gaiters, lounging up and down the Parade. The Jephson Gardens were given over to nursemaids and children; the sluggish Leam ran low, and a general air of dusty dulness pervaded the place.

Everyone who could had gone to the sea, to Scotland, or abroad, and even Lady Rosalie had at last carried out her intention of getting away. She and Hilda

"Avice sat and listened to Sir Raymond's singing." –p. 487.

Jackson were at Scarborough, and Mr. Ruggles, of the Commissariat Department, had also selected that lively watering-place for his autumnal holiday—a fact which involved a good deal of walking for Lady Rosalie, who found herself required to tramp up and down the grounds of the Bridge Gardens as patiently as she had ever done along the Warwick road in the days of Captain Hallam. Captain Hallam himself was far away from Warwick now. He had volunteered for service in Egypt, and was already on his way to the East; and Daisy Meredith, who felt guiltily conscious of having driven him away, was sadder and more fragile-looking than ever. She said very little about it, but she found a wonderful interest in the war news, read every line of the long reports from "Our own Correspondent at the Seat of War," and was, Sir Raymond Vereker declared, a perfect mine of information on the doings of the Khedive and Arabi Pasha, of Lord Charles Beresford and Lord Wolseley, and all who were concerned in the elucidation of the Egyptian question. Sir Raymond himself had only the vague and general information of the average Briton, but Daisy's interest was something very different, and very much more personal than this. It was the interest, not of the average Briton, but of the little knot of women whose husbands and sons and lovers were hurrying to the Delta of the ancient Nile as fast as modern steam could take them. She knew the name of the vessel Captain Hallam had gone in, and watched its course as eagerly and anxiously as any wife, or mother, or sweetheart of them all.

Mrs. Meredith, too, read the Egyptian news with unusual interest, though for quite another reason. She had told Daisy that she did not know where her husband was, but though she had no absolute knowledge, she had a strong suspicion that the Dalrymple Pasha, whose name occurred now and then in the despatches, was the man who had been ignominiously dismissed from the English service, and had worn the broad arrow at Dartmoor. She said nothing to Daisy, but she looked in the papers for the recurrence of his name with a sort of horrible fascination. Implacable as she was, and as she thought she had the right to be, the possibility that this man might be her husband, and the father of her children, invested the war news with a terrible interest, and Mrs. Meredith looked for the paper every morning as eagerly as Daisy herself.

Avice, who knew and understood her mother's face so well, was puzzled by the interest it expressed. It must be sympathy with Daisy, she thought—but surely it was better that Daisy should learn to forget Captain Hallam? She had not found forgetting so easy for herself, but Daisy was different, thought Avice, with a sigh, and Captain Hallam was not Lancelot Vereker.

She saw very little of Lancelot now, and time sped with lagging flight, like a bird with a wounded wing. Lady Vereker had gone to visit some friends of her mother's, and Lancelot and Sir Raymond were at home alone.

Sir Raymond spent most of his days at Leamington, sitting in the Hermitage garden, teaching Avice to ride, or boating on the shady waters of the Leam. He had given her a horse, as gentle as it was beautiful, and it was not long before she was able to ride it. Looking back to this part of her life in after years, Avice thought that she had liked nothing so well as these rides on the yielding turf that bordered the well-kept roads, and through the lanes where the bramble-blossoms and roses were over, and the bryony hung its fantastic wreaths, and the traveller's joy was a mass of feathery grey seed-vessels, and the poppies showed red amongst the yellowing corn. Pleasant to remember, too, save for the haunting sense of duty unfulfilled and unattained endeavour, were the afternoons spent upon the Leam, when Sir Raymond rowed out to some sheltered nook in the shade of the great trees whose branches dipped in the sober stream, and read aloud from whatever book they happened to have on hand. It was all very lover-like and idyllic, except that one at least was so painfully conscious that so little love was there. It was sisterly affection at best that she had to give; and though Sir Raymond made no complaint, Avice's calm kindness sometimes chilled him to the heart. He felt like one who had asked for bread and received a stone.

And yet she was so sweet, so beautiful, and kind, and good! The young lover's reproaches turned always against himself; his meditations ended always in assuring himself that he, and he alone, was to blame.

She loved him—was not their engagement a proof of that?—and he, ungrateful that he was, could not be content unless she told him so a dozen times a day! It was no wonder if outraged maidenliness took refuge in the silence he resented so unreasonably.

He was musing thus one evening as he rode home under the bright August moon. He had left Leamington and Warwick far behind, and taking a bridle-path by the Avon, came out into a lane that skirted Vereroft Park, and let himself in through one of the private gates. The park stretched wide and far on either hand, the house showed white through the trees, the great elms stood up tall and dark against the sky, and the young master of it all looked at his goodly heritage with pardonable pride. How good it was to be Vereker of Verecroft! How sweet it was to have so fair a possession to lay at his lady's feet! He wished Avice could have seen it as he saw it now, with the dew glittering on the grass, and the moonlight silvering everything on which it fell. The trees were still in full leaf, and cast dense masses of shadow on the dewy grass, but here and there the moonlight caught the stem of a silver birch, and made pools of light in the open spaces, and glittered on the dew-spread ferns. As Sir Raymond rode up the avenue the ground was white with moonlight beneath his horse's feet, with sharp black shadows flickering and waving across it from the waving trees, and lying dense and thick on each side of the way. Suddenly a man stepped out from a clump of trees and laid his hand on the bridle of his horse.

"What do you want?" cried Raymond sharply, bringing the handle of his riding-whip down on the other's fingers.

The man loosed his hold, but only to grasp the bridle with his other hand.

"Pardon, m'sieu," he said, lifting his cap, and showing a dark foreign face, lit up by a pair of small dark eyes.

It was no ordinary tramp, evidently, and though Sir Raymond still gripped his whip menacingly, he stopped his horse, and inquired what the man wanted, in the execrable French peculiar to undergraduates of English universities. Bad as it was, the man seemed to understand it, and poured forth a voluble reply Sir Raymond entirely failed to comprehend.

"Speak slower! Parlez—plus—lentement," he said impressively.

Thus adjured, the man did his best to comply, and Sir Raymond did his best to understand, but only succeeded in arriving at a bewildering conclusion that the ill-looking foreigner, who seemed to have sprung out of the shadows of the night, was requesting his assistance to obtain what he called justice on some person or persons unknown.

"It was not fair, as monsieur would admit, that the parson should take all and the husband nothing, when positively it was the husband who was the interested party. Monsieur had no doubt silenced ce lâche pasteur with a handsome douceur, but was the husband, was he—Gustave Caillot—to have nothing?

Moi aussi, je puis parler," ended the man significantly; and as Sir Raymond only stared, he added in English, "Me can speak too, sare; me speak too!"

"Speak away, then," cried Sir Raymond, "though I think you needn't have chosen eleven o'clock at night to do it. Parlez, mon bon homme, mais coupez le court."

Whether the foreigner understood this literal injunction to "cut it short" did not appear. He began to protest that he only wanted his rights, and had no wish to make trouble, but have his rights he would. It was intolerable, it was infâme, that the pasteur should have stolen such a march upon him, but he had no wish to be hard on his stepson. All he asked was that he should have the same as the pasteur, and his beau-fils would see.

"Oh, get along with your beau-fils!" cried Sir Raymond impatiently. "My good fellow, if you can't talk English, and I can't talk French, what is the use of stopping here? You want a tip, I suppose? Take it, and be off!"

He tossed half a crown on to the path, but the man only looked at it scornfully, and laid his hand again upon the rein.

"Pas assez!" he declared, shaking his head vigorously. "Not e—nuff! Von, two, tree ondred so much not enuff! What you haf give ze pasteur, ze same you gif me!"

"The fellow 's mad," thought Sir Raymond, "with his pasteur, and beau-fils, and nonsense.—Look here, my man—entendez, voyez-vous; that's all you'll get from me"—pointing to the half-crown glittering on the walk—"that's all you'll get—c'est tout, TOUT, TOUT!"—raising his voice as if the man were deaf. He jerked the rein out of his hand, and, touching the horse with his whip, was out of sight before the other recovered from his surprise.

GUSTAVE CAILLOT.

> Make thy demands to those that own thy power!

> This outside of a king, yet still my soul,
> Fix'd high, and of herself alone dependent,

"THERE 's been a furriner asking for you, sir," the footman said, as he let his master in. "Mr. Wickham and me both saw him, sir, but we couldn't make top nor tail of his gibberish, and Mr. Wickham didn't like the looks of him at all."

Sir Raymond laughed. The butler's objection to all sorts and conditions of foreigners was a standing joke in the kindly household at Verecroft.

"This really were a suspicious-looking party, sir," said Jones, entirely understanding his master's amusement. "I see him myself, sir, and I really think he were up to no good."

"And no harm either," said Sir Raymond. "I've no doubt I've just met the man in the park. An ill-looking fellow he is, but I don't think he's in the burgling line; I fancy he's a little touched in his head, and Wickham can sleep in peace without making a pillow of the spoons. He wouldn't have fussed if the man had been an English tramp."

"No, sir—but there's furriners and furriners, no doubt, and this was a very different party from the little parson as come a while ago—a pastoor he called hisself——"

"A pasteur!" ejaculated Sir Raymond in a startled voice.

"That was what he called hisself, sir. Mr. Vereker saw him, as you were out, and the English gent as come with him too. Nigh upon an hour they were here, I know."

Sir Raymond made no answer to the voluble Jones, but he wondered exceedingly who the pasteur was, and why Lance had said nothing of his visit. The foreigner in the park had spoken of a pasteur—could it be the same? Perhaps he was not so mad as he had thought.

One thing was certain, Sir Raymond thought: he would have to wait till Lancelot returned to hear anything about the mysterious pasteur and his visit. Lancelot had gone up to town on business, and would not be back till to-morrow. There was nothing for it but to wait till then.

But as Jones cleared away Sir Raymond's solitary breakfast the next morning, he informed him that the foreigner had called again, and was waiting to see him.

"I can give him five minutes," said Sir Raymond, looking at his watch, and calculating how soon he would be due at the Hermitage to take Avice for her ride.

But the interview so narrowly timed took longer than he expected. It was more than an hour before Sir Raymond's door opened, and the sound of voices in angry altercation brought half a dozen servants to see what was the matter.

The interview that had had so stormy an ending had begun peaceably enough. When once Sir Raymond understood that the ill-favoured foreigner was neither a highwayman nor a lunatic, he was quite ready to give a patient ear to his grievance, whatever it might be, and by degrees he made out enough of his story to understand that it affected himself much more nearly than he had expected. It was some time, indeed, before he entirely understood the story Gustave Caillot had come to tell, and even when he did, he looked upon it as something to be easily disproved, and was only anxious to make out exactly what the man meant. His name, he said, was Gustave Caillot, and he was the second husband of Louise Balmano, whose infant son had been substituted for the dead heir of Verecroft. He told Sir Raymond in effect the same story that M. Martel and Dr. Fletcher had told Lancelot, except that he brought no documentary proof. He had heard something of the conversation between his wife and the pasteur, and when he had questioned her afterwards, the dying woman had confessed all to him, and told him of the statement M. Martel had drawn up, and which she had signed. M. Martel's departure for England had opened Caillot's eyes to the importance of the facts he had become acquainted with, and when the pasteur returned, and refused to inform him of the result of his journey, he jumped to the conclusion that Sir Raymond Vereker had purchased his silence, and burned to receive a share of the hush-money himself. It was with this object he had presented himself at Verecroft; and as at last he made his meaning clear, Sir Raymond's wrath flamed high. He had listened with a patience due in great measure to the difficulty he had in understanding Caillot's rapid speech, but this was too much! Whether the man's story was true or not, he was not going to bribe him to withhold it from anyone who had a right to know. "How much will I give you?" he cried angrily. "Rien du tout—not a farthing, not a sou! You will tell the heir? Tell him, and welcome—I shall tell him myself!" He was too indignant to find the French words he wanted, but words were scarcely necessary. The indignant voice, the blazing eyes, were enough. Caillot understood that his request was refused, that he had had his journey and made his appeal in vain, and his face darkened ominously. He lowered his head, and glared at his stepson with a look of brutal ferocity.

"You gif me nothing—hein?" he snarled, showing his teeth like a beast of prey.

"Not a penny—pas un sou!" said Sir Raymond emphatically. "If that was what you wanted, you can take yourself off. Allez-vous en, je vous dis——"

But though he opened the door, Caillot refused to go. He could not and would not believe that his schemes had so entirely failed, and repeated again and again his threat of telling the heir unless he were bought off; while Sir Raymond declared, in the best French he could muster, that he intended to tell him himself. When at last Caillot understood, his fury knew no bounds. He looked as if he would like to have flown at Sir Raymond's throat, and departed shrieking out threats and vituperations in a patois that was almost as unintelligible to his beau-fils as to the astonished servants who had thronged into the hall.

"He didn't hurt you, sir, did he? Is he a madman?" the butler inquired anxiously. Sir Raymond did not answer; he did not even hear.

"Tell Mr. Vereker I want to see him as soon as he comes," he said, and then he shut himself up in his room, and was seen no more till Lancelot arrived.

The luncheon-bell rang, and the footman knocked at his door in vain, and equally in vain Avice Meredith waited for the lover who did not come. How could he go to her? how could he take his place at the table—he who was perhaps not Vereker of Verecroft, but Giuseppe Balmano, a peasant-woman's son?

He told himself that he did not believe Gustave Caillot's story, but in his heart he did believe it, or at least he acknowledged that it might be true. He would know when he saw Lancelot, when he heard what the pasteur had said to him—if indeed the pasteur Lance had seen was the one of whom Caillot had spoken.

He had some soup in his own room, and then he sat and waited for Lancelot in a maze of wonder and pain.

At last he heard his step in the hall and Marmion's joyful bark, and the next moment Lancelot came in.

"Well, Ray, old man, what is it?" he began, and stopped short at the sight of his cousin's blanched face and wild bloodshot eyes. "What has happened? Is Avice——"

"Avice? It has nothing to do with her."

"But there is something?"

"Yes," said Sir Raymond slowly, "there is something. It is very curious, very strange, and I should like to tell you all about it, Lance. But will you tell me first, please, about the pasteur who came here a little while ago?"

It was Lancelot's turn to look utterly disconcerted.

"The pasteur—M. Martel?" he asked blankly. "Surely, surely, he has not been so wicked, so treacherous, as to come here again?"

"No, he has not been; but someone else has. Let me tell you all about it, Lance; for if it is true, it is you who ought to know."

"How much do you know?" said Lancelot: "that is the question."

He sat down, greatly concerned and distressed, and Sir Raymond told him Caillot's story, and knew, as he looked at his cousin's face, that the tale he had heard was true. "You knew it—you have known it all this time!" he cried. "Lance! how could you?—why did you——"

"It seemed the best thing," said Lancelot lamely; and then there was an awkward silence neither knew how to break.

"It is true, then," Sir Raymond said at last. "You are Vereker of Verecroft, and I——"

"And you are and must be Sir Raymond Vereker still!" said Lancelot gravely. "We both know the truth, but we must keep it to ourselves. Think of your—think of Lady Vereker! Could she bear to know that you are not her son?"

Sir Raymond buried his face in his hands with a groan.

"I can't believe it!" he said hoarsely. "Lady Vereker not my mother——"

"She is, she is!" cried Lancelot, laying his hand kindly on the young man's heaving shoulders. "She is your mother, Ray, by every tie that makes a mother dear. It is not the accident of birth, it is the long years of patient care and untiring love that make real motherhood; and you know who has given you these. Come, be a man, and think only how best to repay her. It will not be by disowning her——"

"I disown her!" cried Sir Raymond bitterly, lifting a face convulsed with grief and pain. "It is not a question of disowning, it is a question of right and truth, of justice to you——"

"I want no justice of that sort."

"Then—then, what do you want?"

"I want nothing. Yes, really, Ray, that is just what I mean. I want things to go on as they have always done. I want you to be Sir Raymond, to be Vereker of Verecroft still, that Lady Vereker may never know you are not her son. Believe me, Ray, it is best for everyone, indeed."

"Best for me, no doubt, and perhaps for Lady Vereker—but for you? No, Lance, it is too much! Even if you could make such a sacrifice, or if I could accept it, I am not clear if you have the right to do it. I have not been Vereker of Verecroft all these years without learning that there are duties to others. If you have the right to renounce it for yourself, you have no right to defraud your children——"

"Put that out of your head. I have told you I shall never marry."

"But you may change your mind; men do continually about things like that. And, Lance, don't think me ungrateful, but I can't help feeling it would be easier for me to give it all up now than to have a claim made later."

"I know. But I have provided against that."

"How do you mean?"

"I mean that I have put it out of my power to make any claim. I must tell you all about it, I see, though I never meant to do so. The man you saw brought no real proof of this thing, did he?"

"No; but he said the pasteur had a paper which no one could dispute."

"He was mistaken. The pasteur had such a paper, but he gave it to me."

"Well?"

"Well, I was afraid, like you, that I might change my mind, so I put it out of my power. I burnt the proofs as soon as he had gone."

Sir Raymond looked at Lancelot in amazement too great for words. He remembered, as Lancelot had done, how the man who had thus dispossessed himself of his inheritance had said that he would rather be Vereker of Verecroft than King of England, and the remembrance seemed to reveal the extent of his sacrifice as nothing else could have done.

"How could you, Lance?" he said again. "No man ought to make such a sacrifice for another—and that you should do it for me!"

Lancelot wrung the hands so eagerly extended to him.

"It was not for you, Ray," he said, with a smile that seemed to transfigure his face. "It was for your mother, and your—wife."

He went away, more moved than he cared to show, and Sir Raymond looked after him with almost envious admiration.

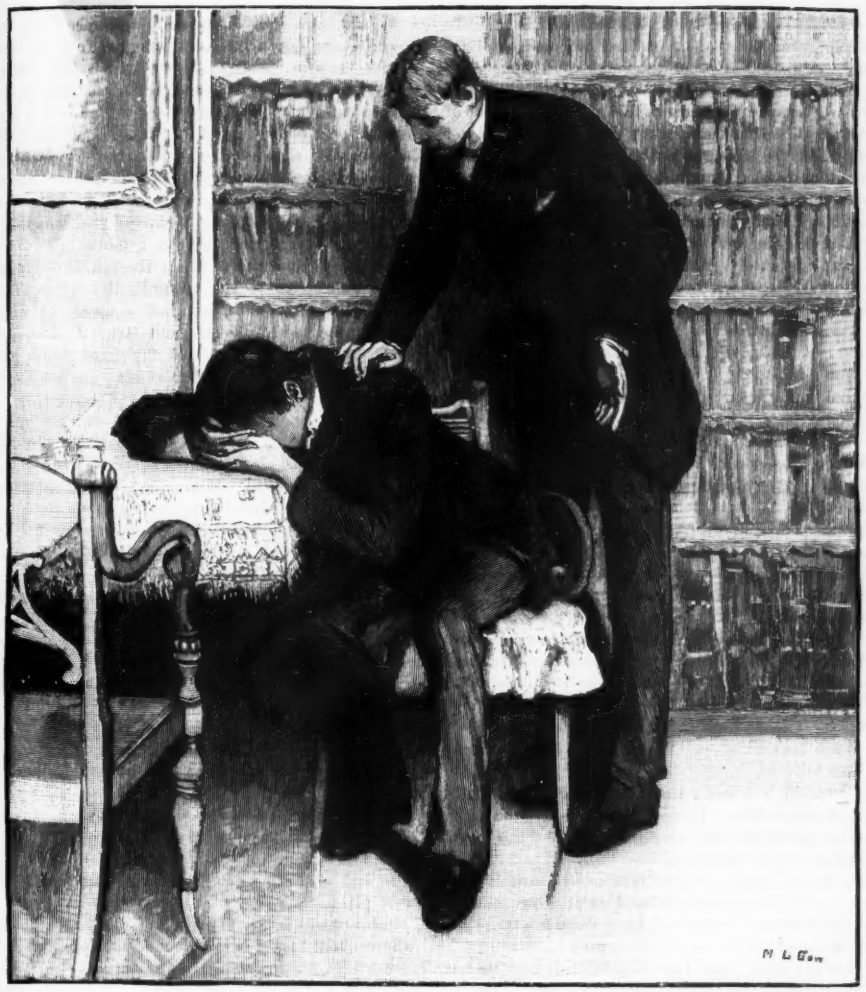
"I could not have done it," thought the man whose real name was Giuseppe Balmano—"I could not have done it. It took a Vereker of Verecroft to do a thing like that."

CHAPTER XXVII.

SIR RAYMOND TO THE RESCUE.

"That time of slumber was as bright and busy as the day."
MACAULAY.

IT was a curious day to both the young men. Two women who had made so momentous a compact, who had made or accepted so great a sacrifice, would have inevitably melted into some manifestation of unusual tenderness, but the two men who still called themselves cousins were only shy and constrained. Lancelot went down to the village with the instinct for action, however irrelevant, which the pressure of unaccustomed emotion induces in men of his type, and Sir Raymond, as he must still be called, shut himself in his room, and tried to think over the events of the day, and bring some sort of order into the chaos of his thoughts.



They were confused enough; and sometimes he almost fancied that Caillot and Caillot's story were alike part of some hideous dream. He would wake up and know himself for the man he only called himself now—for Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft, who had dreamt that he was a peasant-woman's son. He looked up at the portrait of the late Sir Raymond with the impulse of filial reverence which had made him turn to it in moments of distress through all the years of his young and uneventful life, and then, as he turned from the picture of the English squire, and caught sight of his own olive-tinted face in a neighbouring mirror, he knew that no such blissful awakening would ever be his. The dream had been the fancy that he was the son of the man whose features were so different from his own; the bitter awaking was already come. Only yesterday he had boasted to himself of his goodly heritage, and now he knew that he had no right to call a rood of it his own.

It was not his: it was Lancelot's; and it was by Lancelot's own act and deed, by Lancelot's unparalleled generosity, that he could call himself Vereker of Verecroft still. Some wild idea of repudiating the magnificent gift rushed through his mind, but the thought of Lady Vereker silenced it. He felt, as Lancelot had done, that it would cost too much to the dear and gentle lady they both loved so well.

If Lance could renounce it all to save her pain, surely he could bring his pride to accept the renunciation!

He felt that Lancelot had the right to expect as much as this, to make his own terms, and insist on their acceptance. No, he could not renounce the heritage that had come to him in so strange a way; he could only resolve to do his utmost to deserve it, and to do his duty by it. Vereker of Verecroft he must be in name, but he could and he would be Lancelot's steward in all but name. There should be no more about Lance's going to London, he resolved, in his old imperious way; and some day—when Lady Vereker's gentle spirit had passed away, and could no more be hurt by it—the man she had deemed her son would give up Verecroft to the rightful owner, and Lancelot should be Vereker of Verecroft at last!

A very sweet smile hovered tremulously on the mobile, expressive lips, as he pictured the future restitution, the hope of which would make the present burden of gratitude somewhat easier to bear. And then the thought of Avice made him pause. Avice! Could he ask her to share imaginary fortunes? could he woo her with a title that was not his? could he offer her illusory hopes, possessions he intended to resign, and honours he intended to renounce? On the other hand, how could he tell her the truth? Loyalty to Lancelot bound him to silence; and though he might ask Lance's permission to reveal the truth to her, he felt instinctively that it would be refused. It was all a maze of perplexity and pain, and when the great gong summoned the two young men to their solitary dinner, Raymond's pale face and heavy eyes made Lancelot glad that Lady Vereker was not there. Just for a moment the man who was called Sir Raymond hesitated before he took his usual place, glancing at Lancelot with an ingenuous deprecating blush, while Lancelot flushed uncomfortably at what seemed to him almost like a reproach. Why, oh why, could not that wretched Swiss have left them in peace? he thought irritably.

It was difficult to keep up a pretence of ordinary conversation, but Lancelot made a gallant effort till the servants had withdrawn, and Raymond seconded it with a fitful energy that made the observant Wickham jump to the erroneous conclusion that the course of his love could not be running smooth.

"Haven't been into Leamington to-day, and is as absent and distray as you please," he reported in the privacy of the housekeeper's room. "His young woman's at the bottom of it, I'll be bound!"

Which was true enough, though in a sense quite different from that intended by the worthy Wickham.

"What shall I say to Avice?" Sir Raymond asked, when he and Lancelot were at last alone, and free to speak of the one subject that engrossed both their thoughts.

"To Avice? Why should you say anything at all?"

"Is it right or fair to let her think I am what she supposes? I should not like to wrong her——"

"No, indeed! But you seem to forget that you are practically all that she supposes. And if I know anything of her, reasons of that sort have nothing to do with it," said Lancelot gravely. A woman, however pure and noble and good, is seldom as good as the man who loves her believes her to be. To Lancelot, the fact that Avice had accepted Sir Raymond was abundant proof that she loved him, while his clear perception of her real unworldliness was a further guarantee that considerations of position or of wealth had had no share in her decision. He did not understand the thought underlying Sir Raymond's words, or divine that he contemplated eventually renouncing fortune and title, and restoring them to himself. He only felt that he was possibly attributing to Avice Meredith motives and feelings of which she was absolutely incapable; and when Raymond again tried to elicit an expression of opinion, he refused to discuss the subject.

"There is no need to say a word to Avice on the matter," he said shortly. "I forbid you to do so, once and for all."

After that, it seemed to Sir Raymond that nothing more could be said. Perhaps he was not anxious to say more. He had relieved his conscience by asking permission to speak, but it was not possible to be sorry that it was refused. The priceless jewel of Avice's love was to be left him untarnished and undimmed—the one unchanged thing amidst the cataclysmal changes of the day. He was not Lady Vereker's son, not Lancelot's cousin, not Vereker of Verecroft, but he was, and he might be, Avice's lover, Avice's husband still. He fell into a reverie that was full of a sweetness nothing could touch—an inner core of happiness in the disturbance and trouble of his thoughts, like the peace that lies in the heart of a cyclone, and only roused himself as Lancelot's voice broke the silence at last.

"What became of—of the man?" Lancelot was asking.

"Of Caillot? I don't know. I'm afraid I hardly thought about him. I was too angry—for, you see, I did not think his story could be true."

"What sort of man was he?"

"A rough, brutal-looking fellow—the sort of man one would like to see as little of as possible. You—you don't think I ought to have done anything for him, do you?"

"Not as a duty," said Lancelot decidedly. "He has no claim upon you in that way, I am sure. But as policy, perhaps——"

"Policy!"

"I mean that he may be troublesome, and I am very much afraid that he will. I heard in the village that a rough-looking foreigner was drinking heavily in the 'Vereker Arms,' but when I went to inquire about him he was gone."

"I hope he has gone back to Switzerland. I told him decidedly I would have nothing to do with him, and I'm sure he understood."

"Well, I hope he had money to take him home. It might have been as well to make sure of that," said Lancelot as he said good-night, and went to his room.

Sir Raymond did not follow. He was not physically weary, and his mind was too disturbed for sleep. He went out into the park, and tried to walk off the restless excitement that possessed him. Lady Vereker was not at home, and no one else was likely to inquire at what time he returned.

It was two o'clock when he retraced his steps towards the house, but as he emerged from the shade of the trees he thought it was much later than it actually was. Already it seemed to him that the east was reddening with the dawn—or was it only a fancy, born of the confusion of his thoughts? He rubbed his eyes, but there was no doubt the sky was red—redder perhaps than any sunrise could have made it. And even as the thought forced itself on his mind he heard voices and shouting, a roaring that was not the wind, and piercing the night as a flame might pierce the dark, the cry of "Fire!" He waited to hear no more, but began to run towards the house, hardly knowing what he did. In a few moments he was on the lawn he had left so still and dark. It was dotted with people now, and a red flickering light waved gustily over the green, with rushing, swaying shadows blown hither and thither in the wind.

A dense cloud of smoke seemed to envelope the house, but licking tongues of flame broke through it to the right, and showed that the right wing was the part chiefly involved. It was the most modern part of the building, but it was where Lancelot's room was, and Sir Raymond's first thought was for him.

"Mr. Vereker—is he safe?" he asked breathlessly, looking round for a familiar face.

Hopkinson was there, directing a long line of men and maids who were feeding the engine with buckets, and Wickham, paralysed with terror, was clutching Sir Raymond's christening-mug to his breast, under the evident idea that he had saved the most important item of the family plate. One was too busy and the other too dazed to answer, and Sir Raymond impatiently repeated his question.

"Where is Mr. Vereker? Is he safe?" he asked again.

"Yes, sir," said Jones's voice, coming out of a fresh cloud of smoke that rolled between them; "and the plate's all right, sir, too. Mr. Vereker and I see to that and my lady's jewel-case as soon as the alarm were given."

"But where is Mr. Vereker? I don't see him anywhere about," said Sir Raymond anxiously. It was difficult to see anything in the blinding smoke, but just then a hurtling crash proclaimed that the roof of the right wing had fallen in, and a huge shaft of yellow flame shot up into the air, and made everything on the lawn distinctly visible.

"He were here a minute ago," said Jones, looking blankly around. "He did say something about going back for something he'd left behind, but surely he wouldn't be so mad."

"He were here just now, telling us all what to do," another footman said, "and then he went back to the house."

"Do you mean that he is there now, and no one trying to rescue him?" cried Sir Raymond, with a lightning glance at the terrified lacqueys. "Here—Jones! Blake! who will follow me?"

He did not wait to hear, but dashed across the lawn, and disappeared in the burning building. In the right wing flames were bursting from every window, but the central hall was as yet untouched, and the firemen's efforts were chiefly directed to preventing the flames from spreading to it. Sir Raymond staggered through it, drenched by the hose and blinded by the smoke, and turned down the corridor that led to Lancelot's room. The smoke was thicker here, and the heat almost unbearable; but he struggled on, clambering on hands and knees over the smoking débris that choked the way, and called for Lance with spent, sobbing breath.

There was no answer; but just as he had given up hope he stumbled against something that was not a fallen beam.

"Lance! Lance!" he cried, in hoarse, choked tones. And then in the silence a great fear wrung his heart. He took the prostrate, senseless form in his arms, and crawled painfully back, dropping senseless himself at the feet of Jones and Blake, just as those tardy heroes were making a timid endeavour to penetrate into the smoke-filled corridor.

A dozen eager hands bore the unconscious figures to the nearest room, and the village doctor, who had been doing manful service amongst the buckets, was speedily exercising his more legitimate calling.

"Dead? Certainly not!" he said cheerily, touching each wrist with deft professional fingers. "Some cold water, please, and don't crowd about them so, and we shall do very well."

Lancelot was the first to rêvive. He had been overpowered by the smoke, but, except for a few bruises, was otherwise uninjured; but Sir Raymond was more seriously hurt. The exertion of dragging the deadweight of a practically lifeless body through the débris of the corridor had been very great; and, though he had been too excited to think about it at the time, he had been injured by a falling beam, and was in too much pain to move.

"Is Lance safe?" he said, and swooned away again before an answer could be given.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

PRIVATE FRANKS.

"Thoughts cannot form themselves in words so horrid
As can express my guilt."—Dryden.

It is a far cry from Warwickshire to Egypt, from the banks of the Avon to the Delta of the Nile, from the dark waters of the Leam to the wonderful blue of the Red Sea.

But it is to Egypt that all English hearts are turning this autumn—to Egypt, where the pick of our soldiers are, where the blue-jackets and the Highlanders are wading side by side through the burning sand, and the Guards, who have not been out since the Crimea, are marching to victory under a son of their Queen. And with them are the dark and stately forms of the Indian Contingent, and the black coats of the Rifles, and the uniforms of half the regiments in the British army. So many have volunteered for Egyptian service that Philip Hallam, who has got an appointment on the staff, thinks himself lucky to have done so, and endeavours to forget Daisy Meredith's cruelty in his new and wonderful surroundings.

He has never been in Egypt before, and everything strikes him with a vivid sense of mystery, and almost of unreality. The sands, the palm-trees, the Pyramids, the flowing Eastern garments, seem especially unreal. They are so like the "Sunday pictures" of his nursery days that he feels as if he were a little boy again, and almost fancies he can hear his mother's voice.

It is nearly a month now since he arrived in Alexandria, and saw the ruined forts and the smouldering embers of the bright and busy town. Since that he had borne his part in everything that was going on: had helped to free the Suez Canal, had endured the fatigues of the desert march, and, having been wounded at Tel-el-Kebir, was now at Cairo, recovering his strength.

Captain Hallam's wound was not a serious one, but it had nearly been not only serious, but fatal. That it was not either was owing to the self-devotion of a private soldier, who, seeing the young officer in danger of being overpowered, had rushed gallantly to his rescue, and received himself the deadly spear-thrust that was meant for Philip's breast. It entered Private Franks' instead, and the first act of Philip's convalescence was to make inquiries for the man who had saved his life at the risk, and perhaps at the expense, of his own. He managed to identify him with some difficulty, for he did not know his name. He only knew that his hair was fair and his eyes were as blue as Daisy Meredith's, and this description, even if he could have brought himself to give it, was too vague, he felt, to be of much use. It was only when he added that there was something about the man that suggested that he might have seen better days that he succeeded in tracing him out.

"You must mean Franks," said Colonel Selby, an officer commanding a detachment of the Expeditionary Force. "Big fellow, isn't he, with the bluest eyes I ever saw? Was a swell once, I believe, and gives himself airs on the strength of it. That's the man, I've no doubt. He 's one of ours, and a precious sulky brute; but he 's done for, poor fellow, I 'm afraid. I saw him in hospital this morning, and the surgeon said he 'd never come out alive. If he 's the man you want, you haven't much time to lose."

Captain Hallam lost no time. He went at once to the stifling Cairene hospital, where the wounded who had been brought thither from Tel-el-Kebir did not know whether to execrate most Egyptian sunshine or Egyptian flies, and on one of the beds he saw the man who had stood between him and death, and whose own life was ebbing slowly but surely away. Philip felt that he could not leave him to die alone. He had him moved to his own quarters, and had reason to be thankful all his life that he had obeyed the impulse of gratitude and pity which prompted him to do so.

He soon felt sure that his suspicions as to Franks' antecedents were correct. However the man had come to his present position, he had had the rearing of a gentleman, and in the privacy of his own apartments Captain Hallam treated the humble private as the equal he felt him to be. But the more he saw of Franks, the more Philip wondered what his history had been. He was not communicative, but the few allusions he had made to his past life betrayed that his father had been a man of wealth and influence, and that the son who was dying as one of the rank and file of the British army had known the advantage of a liberal education, and had, indeed, been an undergraduate at Cambridge. His name, he admitted, was not Franks, but what it was he declined to say.

"I changed my name because I had disgraced it," he said briefly. "If you knew all, you would not soil your hands with shaking mine." Philip asked him no more. Whatever the secrets of that wasted life, the man who was known as Private Franks was hasting to a tribunal infinitely more merciful and more just than any before which he could be arraigned by his fellowmen. But it was not in human nature not to wonder who and what he had been, and quite unexpectedly the information was supplied.

The 25th of September was a memorable day in Cairo, and to none of the myriads who thronged its streets was it more memorable than to Philip Hallam.

Cairo was en fête. There were decorations everywhere, wreaths and flowers, flags and trophies, every device that ingenuity could suggest to show forth a more or less fictitious loyalty. The Khedive, reinstated by force of British arms, was to enter the town accompanied by the Duke of Connaught, Lord Wolseley, and Sir Edward Malet, and the Cairenes, with true Oriental servility, made ready to do them honour, and vied with each other in their eagerness to welcome the Sovereign against whom they had so lately rebelled. It was said afterwards that the houses of the chief rebels were the most brilliantly illuminated that night; and now, in the full noontide sunshine, it would have been difficult to find a house without its festoon of gorgeous flowers, or strip of bunting fluttering in the morning breeze.

Captain Hallam's rooms overlooked the Mahmoudieh Square, and as the procession approached he wheeled Franks' couch to the window, and stood behind him, looking down on the motley crowd below.

It was a sight no one could forget. Beside the Khedive's carriage, with the British commanders and Sir Edward Malet, was a brilliant escort of the flower of the British and Egyptian troops, while the crowds that thronged the streets were of every variety of nationality, and race, and colour. There was all the mixture of past and present, of trivial and magnificent, of Christian and Moslem, of European and Asiatic, which is common to Egyptian life; and Philip was new enough to Egypt to be fascinated by the spectacle presented. It was all gorgeous and wonderful; but one of the figures which struck him most was that of an imposing-looking man who rode just behind the Khedive's carriage, clad in the Turkish uniform, and wearing an unmistakable air of dignity and command. Perhaps Hallam noticed him the more because his face was so decidedly European, and even English, and something in it seemed oddly familiar to him, in spite of the unfamiliar trappings, which indicated a personage of considerable rank.

"I wonder who that is?" he said, turning round to point him out to Franks. But Franks had seen him already. He was lying back on his pillows panting for breath, with a brilliant hectic flush on his wasted cheeks.

"It is Dalrymple!" he said, in uncontrollable agitation. "It is Dalrymple Pasha! They told me he was a pasha, but I did not believe it. But it is Hugh, sure enough."

"Dalrymple?" cried Philip; "what Dalrymple? And what is he to you?" The name brought back all the terrible story Hilda Jackson had told him under the trees at Avonmead. He had not been in the drawing-room when the subject first came up, and knew nothing of the supposed identity of Dalrymple Pasha and Dalrymple the forger, but suddenly he knew what the inexplicable likeness was that had puzzled him a few moments before. It was the subtle resemblance that is called a family likeness, and that is often quite independent of colouring, and even of form. It was this he had seen in the bearded visage of Dalrymple Pasha, and the faces of which it had vaguely reminded him were the faces of Avice and Daisy Meredith.

"Do you know who he is?" he asked again. "Do you know his history? Is he the man who committed forgery some years ago?"

"No!—he is only the man who was convicted of it by a purblind judge and a jury of fools!"

The son of the purblind judge stared in not unnatural astonishment; and then Daisy's lover felt his heart begin to beat as if it would suffocate him. "You mean that he was innocent?" he cried. "I ought to have felt and known it! What else could her father be?"

Private Franks stared as hard as the Captain had done.

"Her father!" he muttered. "Captain, for pity's sake tell me what you mean! Do you mean that you know a daughter of Dalrymple's—of my sister Madge? Stay—I will tell you who I am, and you will see I have a right to ask. I am Ned Fazackerley; and I have not seen or heard of my sister or her children since the day I enlisted as Private Franks."

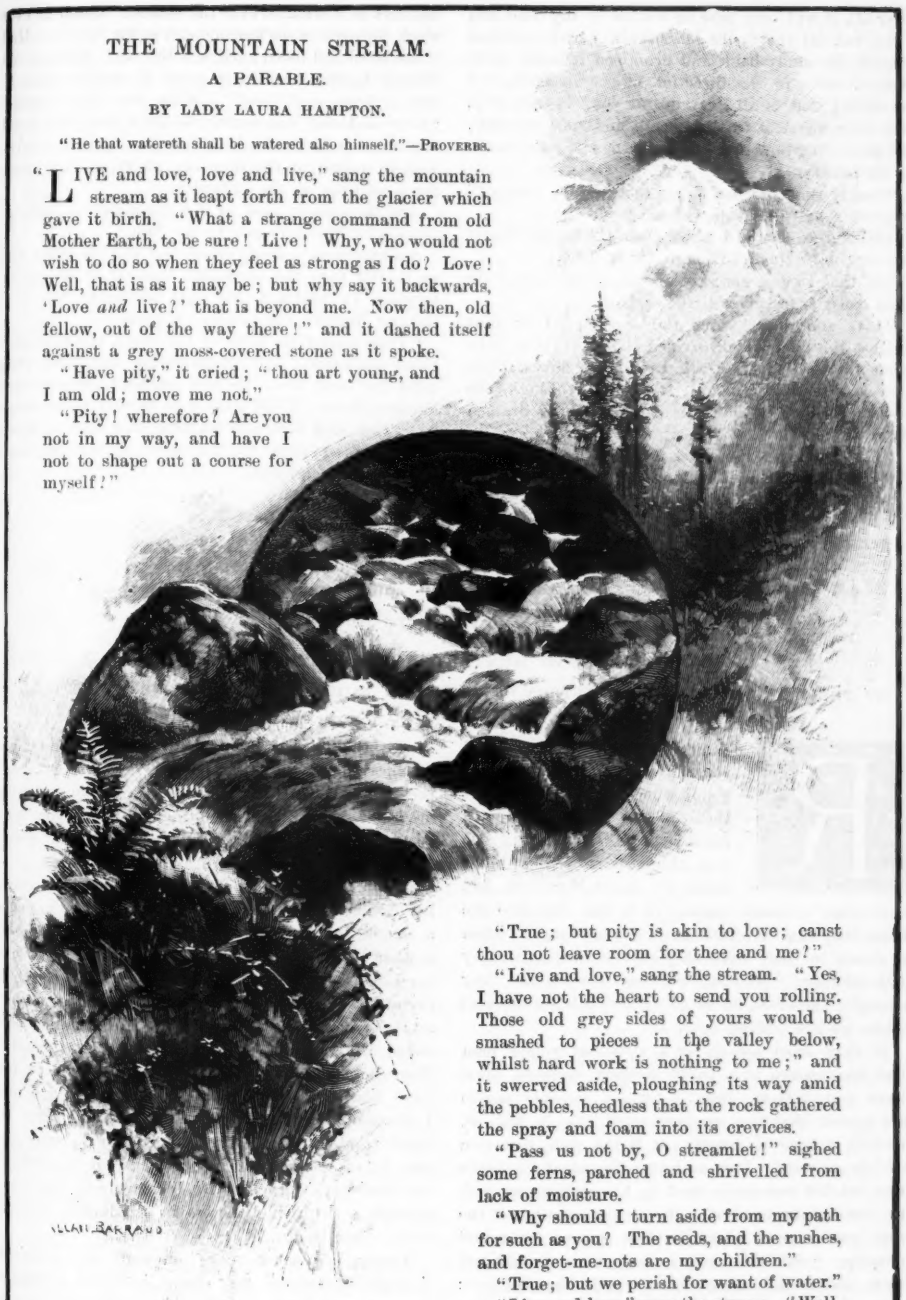
But the question of Fazackerley's relationship, or of his family secrets, was not the uppermost one in Philip Hallam's mind. That Daisy's father was innocent was all he cared to know; but he must have some proof beyond bare assertion. "I will tell you all about your sister later on. Tell me first how you know that Dalrymple was innocent!" he entreated, and a rush of overpowering emotion crimsoned the pale face before him. Franks or Fazackerley, whichever his name might be, held out his hand.

"Shake hands first!" he said; and as Philip grasped the fever-wasted palm, a faint sardonic smile curved the thin red lips. "I am a fool to tell you, I believe, but they can't hurt me now. I know that Dalrymple was innocent, because I forged the thing myself!"

(To be concluded.)

THE MOUNTAIN STREAM.

A PARABLE.



BY LADY LAURA HAMPTON.

"He that watereth shall be watered also himself."—PROVERBS.

"LIVE and love, love and live," sang the mountain stream as it leapt forth from the glacier which gave it birth. "What a strange command from old Mother Earth, to be sure! Live! Why, who would not wish to do so when they feel as strong as I do? Love! Well, that is as it may be; but why say it backwards, 'Love and live?' that is beyond me. Now then, old fellow, out of the way there!" and it dashed itself against a grey moss-covered stone as it spoke.

"Have pity," it cried; "thou art young, and I am old; move me not."

"Pity! wherefore? Are you not in my way, and have I not to shape out a course for myself?"

"True; but pity is akin to love; canst thou not leave room for thee and me?"

"Live and love," sang the stream. "Yes, I have not the heart to send you rolling. Those old grey sides of yours would be smashed to pieces in the valley below, whilst hard work is nothing to me;" and it swerved aside, ploughing its way amid the pebbles, heedless that the rock gathered the spray and foam into its crevices.

"Pass us not by, O streamlet!" sighed some ferns, parched and shrivelled from lack of moisture.

"Why should I turn aside from my path for such as you? The reeds, and the rushes, and forget-me-nots are my children."

"True; but we perish for want of water."

"Live and love," sang the stream. "Well, after all, it will only take up a little of my time, and I can run all the faster afterwards;" and it washed against the sandy bank and crumbled it away, as it made a curve in the direction of the speakers. "I am afraid that is all I can do for you," it said, as it sent tiny wavelets to their roots, and sped onwards, not perceiving how greedily the ferns and sand drank of its bounty.

"Surely thou art not going to leave me empty?" moaned a half-dried-up wayside pool.

"Wherefore should I break down the barrier that is between us? Have I enough for us both?"

"Of that I know not; yet of thine abundance truly thou canst spare me a little, or I die."

"Live and love," sang the stream, as it beat against the dam which divided them. "There, take what thou wilt; after all, I can but flow a little slower afterwards;" and it glided through the pool, regardless of how the hidden depths drained its resources.

"Live and love," it sang as it emerged on the other side; but how feeble its voice! how little strength it had left as it trickled over the stones! Could it ever reach the great river flowing still so far below? Had it not lived and loved; and was this all? Had not old Mother Earth in the past given it another song to sing—"Love and live?" What did it all mean? "Love and die" was nearer the mark, for what good had come to itself of all the love bestowed on others! And it looked to the blue sky above as if to seek for a solution of the difficulty.

And the answer came, as it always does, in time, to those who look upwards to the Sun.

A slight mist, a fleecy cloud, and falling rain; and as it fell into the streamlet, causing it to spring forward in renewed life and strength, the sun, shining through the rain-drops, spake:—

"Thou gavest to them of thy work, thy time, and thine abundance, and in obedience and faith thou didst live and love. Be not amazed; though thou knewest it not, I did gather to myself these drops from rock, and fern, and wayside pool, that in thine hour of need thou too mightest be watered, and learn to love and live."

RESTLESSNESS.

TO YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WOMEN.

BY THE REV. J. P. GLEDSTONE, AUTHOR OF "THE LIFE AND TRAVELS OF GEORGE WHITEFIELD," "SAVE THE BOYS," ETC.

"RESTLESS! why, what else would you have a young man or a young woman be? Do you want them to sit in arm-chairs all day twirling their thumbs? Do you think that young blood flows no faster than old, and that when it comes rushing in a full tide into the brain they can help feeling its excitement, and when it throbs in their veins they can sit still as if they felt nothing? We shall rest soon enough and long enough; therefore, let us go ahead while we can, and while we are willing to do it."

If that short speech by a vivacious young man had been spoken at a public meeting, everyone must have said—"Hear, hear!" for all sensible people are agreed that the suppression of life is bad—is, in fact, a kind of murder; it is the right direction of life we want. It is said that President Garfield's first teacher was sorely tried by his restlessness, and, in attempting to subdue it, almost smothered the fine young soul which he had got to train and develop. "Scholars cannot study their lessons and look about the school-room," said the teacher; "therefore, gazing about is strictly forbidden." The rule was unconsciously broken by Garfield almost as soon as it was made, and when he tried to obey it, as he honestly wished to do from the first, it only succeeded in making him a dull scholar. At length the teacher had to say to Mrs. Garfield—"James is not quite the boy in school that I expected."—"How so?" she replied; "you astonish me."—"I know," said the teacher, "that you will be grieved, but I think it is my duty to tell you." Mrs. Garfield asked him to "say on." "Well, it is only this; James don't sit still, and he don't learn his lessons. I fear that I shall not be able to make a scholar of him."—"Oh, James!" exclaimed the mother.—"I will be a good boy. I mean to be a good boy," sobbed the little fellow. Mrs. Garfield, divining the true cause, observed—"Perhaps he can't sit still; he never was still in his life." James persisted in his promise—"I will sit still; I will learn." The teacher accepted it, and, laying his hand on the boy's head, said to him—"You dear child, you and I are good friends, and I think we shall have no more trouble. I will try you again. So, wipe up, and let us laugh, and not cry." Left to work in his own way, Garfield's life became from that time onward a surprising success in scholarship as well as in other things.

Young life must move outward and forward. A right disposition may desire and seek a change from the old home and the old way of working and living, not for the sake of self-indulgence, but possibly for the sake of self-sacrifice and noble endeavour. There is a restlessness of youth and early manhood which is both right and honourable; natural, too, as that of a child who, through restlessness and exertion, grows, and creeps, and walks, and runs; no doubt getting into many dangers, but also, through them, coming to a vigorous, self-reliant manhood. Wings are given to young birds to fly with, and the first flight is out of the nest.

We also remember that the beginning of many a fine and beneficent career has been the resolution of some brave son or braver daughter to leave the warm, quiet, dear old fireside, and go out to win a livelihood, and to help the beloved ones left behind. There can be no doubt that many a comfortable, self-indulgent young man, who will not found a home of his own because he cannot do it in a style sufficiently grand, would make himself more of a man and more of a gentleman, and some true-hearted girl more of a woman and more of a lady, if he would marry on small, yet sufficient, means, bear his lot like a man and a Christian, and fight his way up to larger means, if they will do him any good, but, in any case, up to an honourable character and a worthy name. There can also be no doubt that many a young woman who is luxuriating at home amid many comforts, but with no responsibilities, so keeping all her finer qualities of mind and heart subdued and inactive, would be transformed into a heroine and a saint if she would but step outside her father's door, and see how wide, how sinful, and how sorrowful the world is, and begin to do something for its consolation. And until she does that, the trembling girl who has gone to be a governess, the timid girl who has entered a shop, the sensitive girl who has taken a servant's situation, rather than eat the bread of idleness and burden the home, is far above her in character and worth. The words of the prodigal when he was restless and wanted to leave home, words which must have wrung his father's heart with pain, have often, used in a new sense, filled the hearts of other parents with loving, thankful grief; for it is a touching thing to hear a child say—"Father, give me my clothes and my few things, and let me go and see what I can do for myself and you." Everything depends on why a young man wants his own, and why he goes away. He may be in his father's house, and yet not of it; restless, impatient, discontented, eager to break loose; or he may leave the house, and still be a true member of it. Jacob leaves his home in shame; Joseph leaves his in unsuspecting innocence; David leaves his for duty; Absalom leaves his to indulge himself and to gratify his ambition.

Unfortunately, restlessness in the young is sometimes a sign of moral distemper rather than of noble longings of heart and tender flutterings of spirit. It can hardly be seen by any careful, loving parent without more or less anxiety. So Mrs. Garfield once had her anxious season for her generous and just-minded son. He had caught the sea-going fever from reading novels, and nothing would satisfy him but he must be a captain and command a vessel. And that is all right enough for the men who are fitted for it and called to it, as some of our bravest and best are; but it was not the work and place for Garfield. While the excitement lasted, his mother was full of fear, lest a capable youth, who had powers in him far above the requirements of a ship captain, should throw himself away; at last, through a wonderful succession of events, he was led to abandon his wish, and to enter upon those pursuits which eventually brought him to the President's chair.

Surely young persons ought to think for a moment of the anxiety which their signs of restlessness cause those who are the most interested in them. Very likely the prodigal's father had seen signs of discontent before his younger son said, "Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." Coldness, aversion, distance of manner, show themselves imperceptibly and unconsciously to him who exhibits them; but how quick is a father's or a mother's eye to discern them—quick as to detect the signs of fever or consumption. The cold feeling, the sharp word, the careless manner, the selfish indifference, the unmanageable waywardness, are quite as symptomatic of some inner derangement, as the cough, the lassitude, the hot skin, is of some malady of the body. Young people cannot hide these things; the very hiding becomes a revelation. And any young person who begins to hide his or her heart away, may well inquire whether all is right.

Let us look at the causes of this restlessness which seizes so many of the young. Three young fellows come before our mind's eye: one across the Atlantic; one at the Antipodes; and a third starting for Africa. One who had sinned secretly from his boyhood, and lived in deceit, chose to leave home, tempted by the thought of liberty, although he had the prospect of a large income before he was twenty-five years old. He got the "liberty" with a few shillings a week, and also a good deal of hardship, and would be glad to be back again. The second ran away from an "irksome situation," and on the other side of the world obtained the same kind of work he had here, the same wages, and longer hours. The third is going away because he is too lazy and too fond of drink at home, and wants to do as he likes. In no case is the cause adequate.

Some are restless because home-government, they say, is too severe and too rigid. If this be the cause, it ought not to be irremovable. Something can be done by patience and reasonableness, not to say endurance. It is to be hoped that any restless young man who may read these words will be prepared to admit, and that honestly and without reservation, that there must be parental rule, and that each child in a family cannot be permitted to do just as he likes. You do not think that the house door should stand open all night for you; you do not think that your father should become your servant, and your mother and sisters your slaves; you do not think that the home should be turned into a common inn to please you; you only complain that the government, which is necessary, is sometimes rather too hard, and that, therefore, submission to it becomes difficult and irksome. And someone else admits it, though perhaps he has never admitted it to you.

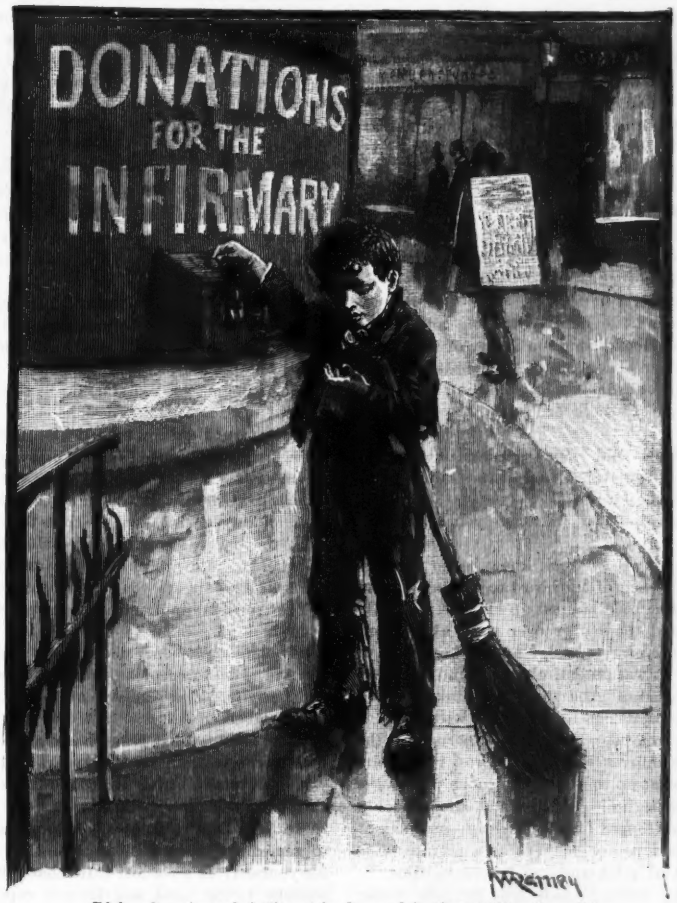
There is hardly a more touching or more ennobling passage in all biography than part of a letter of Dean Alford to one of his children, in which, with rare humility and manly frankness, he asks his child's forgiveness for his harsh words and tempers. Not that there was, or had been, any quarrel, and not that his child was restless and wishful to get away from control; it was only that he remembered a fault and had the courage to own it. Such a confession must have been like balm to the heart. "Confess your faults one to another." But then the absence of a parent's confession in nowise justifies any son or daughter in leaving home and going into a far country there to live in wilful sin. Nothing can justify sin. We ought to do right, even if all the world, father and mother, brothers and sisters, have wronged us. But what are our obligations if we are the children of parents who, with all their faults, honestly and lovingly seek nothing but our good?

But perhaps rigid home rule is not at all the cause of the disquietude of some young people. They are discontented with everything in the old house; nothing is grand enough, nobody is illustrious enough. Home customs are disparagingly contrasted with the customs of the world, and sport is made of the plain way in which the family has been brought up. The opinions of some pretentious young man or conceited girl, who knows what is "the correct thing," what is "good form," are quoted as a final authority. After years of loving service, father and mother are to be slighted for some poor, selfish worldling, whose only commendation is self-importance! Young men and young women who are beginning to think every place so much more attractive than home, everything that other people have so much better than what they have, everybody outside their circle so much finer, so much more fashionable than their friends, should have a care before they risk any changes. The prodigal thought as they do, and in his exchange he got riotous living for plain living, dissipated companions instead of those of his own blood, and then—the fields for his home, and swine for his companions, and husks to fill his belly with.



But suppose that restlessness should have a deeper meaning than any yet hinted at; suppose it should be the symptom of a deep revolt from God and all His service; suppose it should be a break-up of the inner nature; suppose it should show that sin is struggling for expression, for indulgence, for dominion. It does mean that with many, who, nevertheless, are ignorant of their own condition. Perhaps the prodigal did not at first mean to do as he did; but when once his foot crossed his father's doorway, and lost the firm foundation of home-life, it was not easy to stop, nor did he stop until he had reached the very bottom of degradation and shame. And so it may be with some restless ones who shall read these words. They do not like hard restraint, and only want, as they think, a little more freedom, but, in point of fact, they are breaking loose from God and His law; they are turning away from Christ; they are choosing the world rather than the Kingdom of Heaven. It may be admitted that they are doing this as men half blind, not knowing whither they are going, not knowing where they are, not knowing how they are on the point of undoing themselves. They may call home only a house, and not so good as many other houses, but God sanctifies it as home. They may think that their father is only a man, and his judgment none of the best; but God has set him as His representative, and commands that he be honoured more than all men. Home and home-life may be thought poor, paltry things, but God says they are sacred, and that he who spoils them commits sacrilege.

We remember what the gracious and forgiving father in the parable did when his younger son, the one with the hot blood in his veins, asked for his portion of the estate: he gave it him without a demur, for he knew that remonstrance and pleading were useless, that his son's heart was gone from him, at least for a while, and that the only way was to let him do as he liked. Very solemn, even alarming, is the quiet manner in which the father yields; as it is ominous when God just lets anyone take his own course. No words are more awful than these: "Let him alone." The young are never in such peril as when they liberate themselves from all control, when their brothers and sisters no longer try to influence them, when their father ceases to reason with them, and their mother to plead.

So it were best for those who are restless without a cause to curb their impatience, and see whether, by the grace of God, they cannot abide where they are. But even those who can plead an adequate cause for their restlessness will find it best to be quiet and patient. If they know the love of our Lord Jesus to us, and His sufferings for us, they also will be able to endure grief, suffering wrongfully; and as He conquered by submission, so will they. An unquiet, hot-blooded young man, a high-spirited girl, can become as restful in the love of our Saviour as a sleeping babe in its mother's arms.

A SHILLING AND A PENNY, AND TWOPENCE.

Dick solemnly and deliberately dropped in that shilling."—p. 502.

FOURPENCE and threepence is sevenpence, and four pennies elevenpence, and three halfpennies and two farthings, that makes one and a penny altogether—uncommon good for one week, I call it!"

Dick put his head on one side and regarded the collection admiringly. It was set out on a stone step up a retired back alley, where was no thoroughfare on Sundays, and therefore a convenient retreat for squaring up the week's financial affairs.

However, thoroughfare or no thoroughfare, with a sum like that in possession it was advisable to be cautious, and run no risk of possible surprises. Dick speedily rolled it up again in the piece of rag that did duty for a purse, and betook himself to the Sunday Free Breakfast.

He thoroughly approved of free breakfasts—of free dinners too, if he could only have discovered any institution of the kind. He meant to lay in a sufficient supply to tide him well over the rest of the day. After that duty had been discharged, he would consider the best way of investing that one and a penny capital to bring in as large a profit as possible.

The first part of the programme was the best. His paper bag of provisions was liberally packed, and Dick was well acquainted with a particular seat near the platform where there were often stray buns and pieces of roll to be secured by any person possessed of a little foresight and quick fingers; and he had every reason to be satisfied to-day with his spoils.

After the mugs of tea came the hymns and speeches. They were tiresome, of course, and took up valuable time, but it was not deemed good manners to take one's tea and bolt; so, having a due regard to future Sundays, Dick politely stayed to the end, and did his best to look interested.

There was a new man speaking to-day, a little man in spectacles, who seemed very much in earnest about his subject: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, and He will repay him again."

The address ended rather abruptly; the speaker, flushed with earnestness, came down from the platform and sat down on a bench near. Dick slipped up beside him and touched his sleeve.

"Did you ever lend anything yourself like that?"

"Aye, that I have, my laddie."

"And did it pay?"

"Ten times over. I have never repented one sixpence of it, and never shall."

"Who did you give it to?"

"Who! there's little need to trouble about that part of it. Just look about you at any of these poor starving creatures. There are the hospitals, refuges, alleys, and slums of every kind, all needing more help than we can give; there are only too many to give to."

That was a wide field. Dick selected one definite point from it: "Hospitals? that's the same as the infirmary down the street?"

"Yes, a grand one it is. What are you asking for, my lad?"

"Just speiring a wee." Dick knew better than to publish the existence of his hoard to strangers; not for nothing had he been trained up in the streets. He went and debated the matter over with himself on the parapet of the nearest bridge for the best part of the morning. It was an entirely new kind of speculation, and needed a good deal of thinking over. Whole shillings were not to be trifled with.

There was an iron-bound box at the corner of the street, "For the Infirmary" painted across it in white letters. Dick went up to it that afternoon just as the lamplighter was beginning his rounds, and solemnly and deliberately dropped in that shilling—one coin at a time. The odd penny he kept as a private nest-egg, and lost it at pitch-and-toss before bedtime.

Ten times one shilling made ten, but the weeks went by, and there was no sign of that sum coming in from any quarter. Dick waited, first cheerfully, then patiently, then despairingly; there was no room left for hope any longer. He had been done, taken in—his money was gone for good. That man had deceived him on purpose; he would never believe in any of those Free Breakfast people again. So keenly did he feel it, that he even dropped his attendance at that useful and once deeply respected institution.

Some three months later, Mr. Gilchrist, the unconscious promoter of the fraud, was paying a visit to a sick friend in one of the infirmary wards. He was going down the narrow passage between the rows of beds, when a sudden shrill whistle from one of them made him look round at one of them. A small dark face was all that was visible on the pillow, the rest was chiefly bandages.

"Hey! you're the man that preached at the Free Breakfast one day?"

"Yes; what about it?"

"And you went and told us to lend our money to the Lord," burst forth Dick, trying to wriggle up from his pillow in wrathful indignation—"and I did. I lent Him a whole shilling that same day, and I've never got a farthing of it back, after all you said."

"Take care," said Mr. Gilchrist, laying him down. "I am sorry to see you here. What is wrong?"

"Oh, I got run over," impatiently; "but where's my money gone?"

"How did you lend it?"

"I put it in the infirmary box on the bridge—all I had, except one penny; I lost that after."

"Are you not getting some value for your shilling now—a bed and medicine, doctors, and nurses to make you well again?"

"They ain't going to make me well again," said Dick sharply, "and they'd have had to do it for nothing; it's not for the shilling. I lent that to the Lord, not them."

Dick's logic was sound as far as it went. "So you wanted it back in hard cash?"

"Of course I did; wasn't it hard cash I lent?"

Just then the nurse came up and said something in an undertone, with a warning glance at Dick's excited face. Mr. Gilchrist sat down by the bed very soberly.

"Dick, my poor laddie, if that ten shillings came back to you just now in hard cash, what would you do with it? Do you know you are not to go back again to the streets you came from?"

The restless fingers twisted up the coverlet in silence.

"Was that the only money you ever lent?"

"Aye, I never had as much at once before—one and a penny. The penny went too: I got cheated at pitch-and-toss."

"And the Lord has been giving you food and shelter, health and strength, all these years, and the only thing you ever tried to give Him in return was that one shilling. Dick, it may be that in a day or two you are to see Him face to face; my laddie, you'll be gladder to remember that one loan then, than all you spent for yourself. It's not lost: 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, and He will repay him again.' I didn't make that up; he said it Himself."

Dick's head was burrowed into his pillow. After a few minutes, thinking he was dozing, the visitor got up quietly and went away.

Just at the edge of dusk the nurse noticed a grey shadow creeping over the small face; he was feebly groping under the pillow for something—a bit of dingy rag he had been very particular to have put there when he first came.

"Is the man there?" he asked, looking about blankly.

"Oh no! he went hours ago; he is coming back again, though."

"Tell him," Dick's voice stumbled curiously over the words, "tell him to put that in the same box for me; and I wish—I wish now I'd put that other penny in too."

"That," when Mr. Gilchrist opened it the next day beside the empty bed, was a legacy of twopence. Which twopence was duly acknowledged in the accounts of the institution.

SARAH PITT.

THE MORNING SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

BY A SUPERINTENDENT.

A YOUNG PHILOSOPHER.

WITH a few happy exceptions, morning school is a source of great anxiety to all concerned in the working of the great Sunday-school machinery. The two main reasons for this are that a large number, both of scholars and teachers, are absent, and that those who are present are not in touch with each other to the same extent they are in the afternoon gathering. It is somewhat difficult, owing to the different bases adopted in different districts and denominations, to compile reliable returns of what proportion of scholars attends in the morning, but the most favourable estimate does not show more than thirty per cent. This is arrived at by dealing with very large numbers and a widely extended area, and though useful and accurate as an average, it misrepresents nearly all the individual schools which furnish the means for arriving at it. This has to be borne in mind in any consideration of the morning-school problem, and of the question of how the earlier part of the day can be most usefully occupied.

In some old-established and country schools the attendance is considerably larger, while in new districts, especially in manufacturing towns, it is much smaller. Where the former is the case, superintendent officers and teachers may go on their way rejoicing, and say the morning-school problem does not exist. Unfortunately it does for others. The great revival of religious activity has caused very many mission-churches and new schools to spring up in the last quarter of a century, and has created an ever-increasing number of places where one-half the day is more or less of a numerical failure.

Mere number ought not to be held of vital importance in any Christian work, but unhappily human frailty makes it so. Hence we find that teachers and scholars lose interest in the thinly attended morning school; and then what was poor becomes poorer, and may even cease to be. In the latter case one-half of the very short time teachers and scholars might spend together is lost. But if things do not reach this worst pitch, and if a few conscientious workers do keep on, the result is not satisfactory; so long as teachers will come, there will be a certain though a varying proportion of scholars to meet them, but the scholars will be a very "scratch pack." From some classes there will be none, from others one or more, families rather than classes being represented. As both teachers and scholars are few, each of the former has an assortment of the latter given to him—his class never being twice the same, but always consisting of a small number of well-trained and a larger number of less manageable scholars. The proportion of the latter to the former is often far more than in the afternoon, for it is by no means the best educated or the best home-trained ones who are most regular in their attendance.

In proof of what I have said I may adduce a personal experience. Some few years since, it fell to my lot to be president of an association of schools in a large manufacturing town, and I considered it part of my duty to visit during my year of office all the schools with which I was thus officially connected. The superintendence of a large and growing school made it convenient to me to devote the mornings to this work, as I could then more easily obtain an efficient substitute. In some few instances I found the morning roll-call of the associated schools nearly as good as in the afternoon, but this only in about one instance in ten. In many cases the attendance fell quite to the thirty per cent., and in a number it went considerably below that; while in about one school in ten there was no morning school at all. The latter schools I found were those where the bulk of the scholars were drawn from the lowest ranks of life. I might have thought—and for a little time I did think—that perhaps this town was exceptional, but subsequent inquiries convinced me that it was not. These inquiries, assisted by personal inspection, have been made in all towns that I have visited on business or pleasure for some years, and these towns have been as widely apart as Exmouth, Rhyl, and Nottingham, so that the area covered has been fairly wide. In one school I have visited, a children's service was substituted for the morning school; and I have heard of a few other instances of the same thing, and of several where children's services are held after school, which I think a mistake.

THE DOOR-KEEPER.

One other form of morning school there is which appears to have many advantages over either of those already mentioned—at least, if carefully and judiciously worked—and, indeed, seems to offer a solution of the difficulty. Put very simply, it consists in substituting "desk" teaching for "class" teaching; but as the term desk teaching has different meanings to different people, some explanation of the system is needed.

It is worked in three ways, each of which, no doubt, has its own advantages, though the third is the one which appears to me to have the greatest number. The first is for the superintendent to take charge of the entire service every morning; the second is for the superintendent to take charge, but to have one of the teachers to give the lesson; the third is for the teachers in turn to take the entire charge of the service. Whichever of these methods is adopted, the programme is much the same, though it might with advantage be varied according to local needs. The form which has been found generally useful is as follows:—Opening hymn; prayers; hymn; reading of the lesson verses; hymn; the lesson; hymn; closing prayers.

The first step in all educational work is to interest the scholars in it, as only by so doing can a lasting impression be made upon their minds. To obtain this interest with children, it is imperative that they should have a share—the larger the better—in the actual work; and if the time-table that I have given be examined. it will be found that the scholars may be made personally to engage in every item in it. There are eight parts; and if the morning school lasts an hour, that gives five minutes each for seven of them and twenty-five minutes for the lesson. With the time lost in giving out hymns, and in other little matters which those conversant with schools are familiar with, this will be found about the right allowance. Of these eight parts, four—that is to say, the hymns—will be seen at once to belong to the scholars. In two others, the prayers, the scholars ought to have a part if they have not, and it can easily be arranged that they should join aloud. This leaves only two items in which, on the face of the table, the scholars have not a direct interest, but it may be given as to those two also. The public elementary schools have added to Sunday-school difficulties in some ways, but they have had one good result which is not sufficiently taken advantage of, and that is, they have accustomed scholars to read and recite all together. This is an art that well deserves careful cultivation in our Sunday-schools, and the reading of the lesson-verses in the morning is admirable exercise in it. The school may be allowed to read the whole of the lesson to the teacher, but the better way is for teacher and school to read it in alternate verses. To read aloud for some minutes is a sufficiently hard task for most people; but to read aloud with others for the same time is for most young people impossible. There is then only the lesson left, and in that the scholars may have a part too, and a large part, but it depends upon the teacher entirely. In even the smallest gathering of scholars there will be found some who are fairly familiar with most of the books of the Bible, and therefore if a reference passage is required, the scholars should be asked to find and to read it. This will always be done if a little patience be exercised; but too often the teacher gives up the hope of getting the passage, and because it is not found as quickly by others as by himself in his familiar and perhaps marked Bible, he reads it. This has three disadvantages. It breaks the continuity of the address without any corresponding benefit, it prevents the scholars having that part in the teaching which they should have, and it disappoints several who were just finding the verse, and checks them from trying to find references in future.

ALWAYS EARLY.

Another way of giving to scholars a share in the work is to intersperse the teaching largely with questions; indeed, a lesson, to be effective and useful, must rather be brought out of the scholars than be a mere sermonette. To question a school properly requires considerable skill; but that skill may be acquired, and is well worth acquiring; and it is wonderful what may be brought out of a body of scholars by a skilful questioner. Many a weary and disheartened worker has been encouraged and helped when he has heard such a one drawing out of the children, some of whom have been looked on as hopelessly dense, facts which it was hoped but not believed that they knew. Having previously dealt with the subject of addresses ("THE QUIVER," p. 321, vol. xx., 1885), I need not further pursue this subject here.

The advantages of this system to the scholars are many and obvious, for it will be seen that they are trained to combined action and improved in discipline; they are taught to apply the knowledge they have, and to bring their minds to the understanding of the lessons laid before them in order that they may have their share in answering and in finding references; and they are interested and made to enjoy the schooling, instead of simply feeling that they are there because their parents have sent them. There is, however, equal advantage to the teachers if they are engaged in it in turn. It accustoms them to careful and exact preparation; for few men have the hardihood to face even a small school—with, at least, a few teachers and the superintendent present—without having spent some time upon the subject to be dealt with. It trains the teacher, too, in the art of speaking; and, indeed, is the starting-point from which many an effective speaker has set forth. The ordeal of making the first speech of your life to a large school is more than most young men care to face, but none will draw back from taking the lesson at the morning gathering. Time after time confidence is gained and skill is acquired, and unconsciously to himself the teacher becomes better fitted for his class-work, and able to occupy the desk when called on in his own school or in one he may be visiting. If a set series of lessons is taken—and the balance of evidence appears largely in favour of that being done—the teachers who hear will also be largely helped by learning how their fellow-workers look upon the portions of Scripture selected from time to time.

It is somewhat difficult for me to say anything as to the advantages of this system of morning school to the superintendent personally. Of course it is easy enough to say that it enables him to form a correct estimate of the ability of his colleagues, and also to train his teachers, which is as much his duty as it is to generally direct the school. It is not quite so easy, however, to confess that there will scarcely be a teacher but will touch his self-love and show him something in which he has come short. This is not done intentionally, but it is none the less done, and done continually. Taken altogether, the superintendent is, we will say, the best man in the school, but he wil find as he listens to others that one has more skill in questions, another is more effective in illustration, another more apt in his anecdotes, and so on through the whole range of things needful for his office. This, if not always pleasant, is useful; and may be made very helpful to him, and through him to the school.

THE HYMNS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. W. MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

III.—THE HYMN OF THE ANGELS AND OF CREATION.

(Rev. v. 11—13.)

IF we couple the Apocalypse to the Acts of the Apostles, and fill up the blanks in both with what we know of the history of the world at that time, we cannot fail to be struck with one most remarkable fact. It is this—the unmoved tranquillity and confidence of Heaven. Three characters are held up in the Bible to universal anathema—Jeroboam, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Nero, Emperor of Rome. Jeroboam had made Israel to sin; Antiochus was the very "abomination of desolation;" but, outrivalling both, Nero was cursed by his friends, cursed by his own mother, and has been cursed by fifty generations of men, whose flesh has crept and whose blood run cold while they read the story of his infamies. And yet, as in the case of the two earlier, the voice of faith rose above national and moral disaster, so above the shout of the theatre, and the shriek of murdered victims in the palace, arose the clear, strong harmonies of Heaven that still animate and inspire the drooping Church of God.

For when St. John wrote, not only were the scenes of burning Rome—which tradition says he witnessed—fresh in everybody's mind, but persecution, fierce, terrible, and determined, had risen against the Church. Christians in Rome were seized, and a huge multitude (says Tacitus) were condemned to die. They were nailed upon crosses in places of public resort: they were clothed in the skins of wild beasts and set upon by dogs: they were covered with shirts of pitch and hung up to burn as lamps in the street.

Far off in the East—centre and source of Christian hope—Jerusalem was encompassed with armies which, when other plans for quieting Palestine had failed, resolved upon a decisive blow by destroying the Holy City. About the same time St. Paul, the leader of Gentile Christians, was beheaded, and St. Peter, the leader of Jewish Christians, was crucified at Rome. Terrible days those were, and days to test the faith of the young Church in her Master and His cause. Yet, through all this, St. John, in the noblest vision ever granted to man, finds the courts of heaven ringing with song, and sees, as the object of adoration and faith, the very Lamb that had been slain, and Whose brethren of the flock were already in the shambles of death.

Is not the vision, then, a permanent appeal to the Church? For one of the Church's difficulties and besetting sins is the lack of courage, which tends at all times to sink into despair. Let us, then, who inherit alike the weakness and the strength of the past, listen as the angels sing.

I. And, first, let us understand the attitude and position of the angels. They are round about the Throne of God, around the Elders—that is, the Church—and around the Living Creatures. They are, therefore, the sentinels and the guardians of divine and human things. Of their nature we know little, and all that has been pictured about them, and much that has been written, is derived from imagination, based upon a slender and fragile groundwork. They are not departed saints, as maudlin devotionalism has occasionally asserted; and while painters describe them as lovely women, the Bible always speaks of them as males. Such distinctions, however, are alien to their nature; orders there are amongst them, and beings allied to their ranks, like the seraphim, of whom we know just as little. But we do know that the angels are the ministers of saintly men, and are sent forth upon this errand of ministry to the earth. We know that special angels hold interest in individual Christians, and we know that the angels that are in heaven rejoice over every prodigal who returns to his Father. So they stand equally around the emblem of Eternal Power, around the fourfold forms of life, around its drudgery as well as its ambition, and around the Church, distressed, and broken, and divided, and betrayed. No thought of fear dims the lustre of their eyes, nor lessens the precision and the emphasis of their song. They are untold in number, outbidding the enrolled legions of earthly onslaught, and they break forth into their own hymns when the last note of the melody of the Church dies away.

And it is worthy of notice that they secure ample leisure for worship. It is a lesson that ought not to be lost upon our hurrying age. Thank Heaven, there are still secluded corners of our land where the shriek of steam-engines, the clamour of crowded streets, the driving of pulse and brain, is unknown: where the valleys laugh and sing with the standing corn, where the hill-tops are silent as the seas, and where the woods have quiet nooks, where squirrel and thrush dwell unalarmed, and where jaded brains may shape some thought of God. But Heaven is busy, too, and there is work enough to be accomplished. There are sinners lost in wilds of the hill, and in loathsome dens of the city, who will need to be brought home. There are claims and needs and dangers of the Church the world over—energies to be cherished, works to be encouraged, impurities to be purged, sorrows and disappointments to be assuaged. There is the whole creation, in all its kingdoms—its uncounted forms, its throes of birth and of dying, the types and races that have gone, the new ones that are conceived, and must appear when the time is ripe. And with all these interests in hand, their eye is upon the Throne; for here only do angels and men alike behold, and thence only receive the interpretation of life and the wisdom and guidance for work. And well were it, not only for its honesty, but even more for its progress, if the commerce of England and Scotland and Ireland were directed by the laws which abide in God. The Sermon on the Mount, which those who will not acknowledge Christ as their King nevertheless claim as their rule, requires more than even these eighteen hundred years have done for its implicit obedience. The new commandment is not always—must we say is not frequently?—the rule of the shop, the public market, or the exchange. Yet only those who obey can worship, and only those who rightly worship can truly live. And so

II. The central thought of the angels, like that of the Church,* was the worthiness of Christ: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." And as it was in the mind of the Church, so here again this worthiness is associated with sacrifice. It seems as if not only the advantage of Calvary were to be accentuated, but its example to be indelibly impressed upon our minds. For most men suffer (outside the range of their own families) only when they must, and they fail to perceive that sacrifice at once tests what we are, and makes us what we ought to be. In this way Christ's sacrifice proved His essential worth, and, beyond this, proves to-day His permanent worth, to His people. It is not His power alone. That never elicits adoration. It is the goodness that reigns paramount within Him which men worship and love. How can we weigh that? The warehouses of the city have no scales that can hold it. Who can tell, or what arithmetic compute, His worth to a single Christian? Try to cut Him out of your life—His person, truth, and example—and then see what a barrenness and waste remains: a land for the pessimist to revel in; a truth for him to tell them, with all his blatancy and might—that such a life is not worth the living.

III. The Response of Creation. The poet of Palestine had said, many a year before St. John lived, that there is neither speech nor language throughout the earth in which the voice of the firmament is not heard. "The songs of the spheres" was another method of expressing the same truth. The sky vibrates with praise as the great stars stand out in their places. "Earth, with its thousand voices," said Coleridge, "praises God." And while these call to man, whatever his tongue or his worship, man the world round feels that he must respond. He cannot help worshipping. Under the gaslight, and in the heated atmosphere of some remote meeting-place in the big town, he may lustily proclaim that God is nothing to him. He may intoxicate his conscience into the delusion that religion only restricts his English liberty or empties his English pocket. But when the gas is out and the cheering companions are gone, when he is alone on the mountain-side, and the thunder booms out its terror above, and the lightning flashes death around him; or when he is on the broad sea, and all the tempests break about his ship, and the yeasty waves lash the sides, and sweep the decks and drown the fires, and the vessel goes adrift, a voice within answers the voices without, and the infidel is compelled to pray. A well-known infidel, whose wife was one of God's true saints, had a daughter that lay a-dying. She called her father one day to her bedside and asked him—"Father, in which belief shall I die, yours or my mother's?" The heart-broken man gasped out: "You had best die in your mother's."

And as man must worship, so his worship adopts a more expansive form than that which angels take as yet.* His eyes, too, are indeed filled with the image of the Lamb. What mind can forget Calvary and Olivet? But away beyond the present fact, he contemplates the continuous recognition; and age upon age he hears the same hymn. And further yet, and fuller, the worship of the Lamb broadens into the worship of the Godhead. It is offered to "Him that sitteth upon the throne." And it expresses the spiritual history of every saint. We see ourselves in this hymn. When first our life lay before us, and we took it up and placed it upon the altar of God's salvation, Jesus Christ was all—was everything—to us. Then, as faith deepened and threw up the greater and stronger life, we saw Jesus in all things. And then we beheld the love of the Father to be as great and tender as the love of the Son, and the strength of the Holy Ghost gathered round us and within us, and God in His Blessed Trinity embraced all things. "Blessing and honour and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever."

Did the angels and the living Creation know what was coming forth out of the sealed Book? Immediately after their songs, the seals begin to open, and direful events unfold themselves. What matter? It was the Lamb that held the Book and would open the seals, and whether death and famine and war stalk forth or not, all is in God's hands, and He has given His angels charge concerning us. And so the Four Living Creatures answer with their loud Amen. So we on earth endeavour to throw back from Church and hearth some echo of its tone; and so with the Elders, with Creation, and with the Angels, we claim our ransomed right to fall down before the throne and to worship Him that liveth for ever and ever.

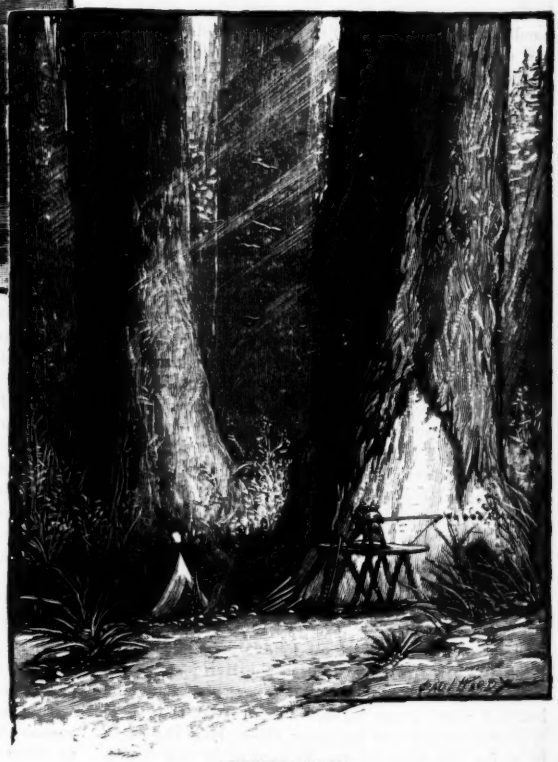
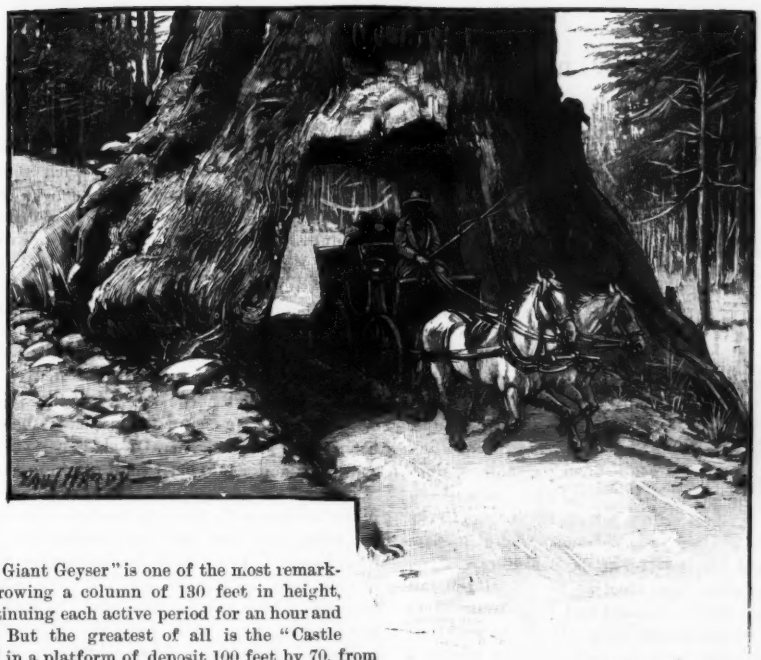
SOME MARVELLOUS WORKS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D., DETROIT, MICHIGAN, U.S.A.



THE GIANT GEYSER.

CALIFORNIA is a land of wonders, remarkable for its mines, rivers, cascades, and waterfalls, for its deep ravines and lofty mountains, for its genial climate and its richly productive soil, abounding in all kinds of beautiful flowers and the most luscious fruits. The waterfall known as the "Bridal Veil" leaps by a descent of 630 feet to a slope below, and then by a series of cascades to the valley, in all over 900 feet. And the "Great Yosemite" fall has a vertical descent of 1,500 feet, then cascades of 626 feet, and then a final plunge of 400 feet, making in all a descent of 2,526 feet.



But of all the wonders of California, perhaps the most wonderful are its geysers and its giant trees.

The geysers were first seen and made known to the public by the United States exploring expedition of 1870-71. They are in the region of the Yosemite River and on the Madison River. In the former locality there is a district a mile square in extent, which is filled with these hot springs in active operation, from which the hill-sides are covered with a snowy deposit very like a frozen cascade. For some three or four miles around there are the remains of numerous springs which, to a great extent, have ceased to flow. Farther on is a deep ravine full of hot springs of sulphur, sulphate of copper, alum, and steam jets in every variety of form. And still further on is a valley said to contain some 1,500 geysers, some small and some of immense size, throwing up columns of water from 10 or 20 to 200, and in one case to 250 feet in height.

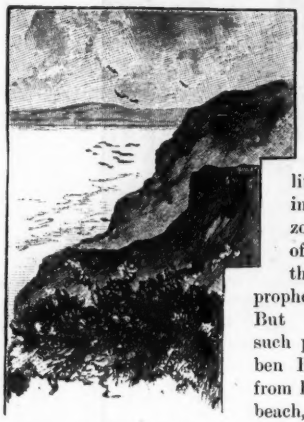
The largest of these geysers have various names, such as the "Bee-hive," the "Giantess," the "Fan," the "Saw-mill," the "Turban," etc. The "Old Faithful" is so called because it plays with great regularity every three-quarters of an hour, throwing a stream from 100 to 150 feet in height.

REDWOOD TREES.

GIANT TREE.

The "Giant Geyser" is one of the most remarkable, throwing a column of 130 feet in height, and continuing each active period for an hour and a half. But the greatest of all is the "Castle Geyser," in a platform of deposit 100 feet by 70, from which rises a chimney 12 feet high, and 120 feet in diameter at the base, and 60 feet at the top, with an aperture of some three feet. This monster geyser, when in full operation, sends a column of water to the height of 250 feet, the movement being not continuous, but pulsating, at the rate of about seventy throbs to the minute, the time of continuous activity being about an hour.

The Firehole River is one of the most remarkable features of this region, its bed and banks being entirely composed of the hot-spring deposit, honeycombed and scooped out by geyser-springs and pools, varying from minute vents not larger than quills to great tanks of boiling water. The river itself, the course of which is straight, looks much like a canal running through a region of lime-kilns, and covered with slag-heaps and the refuse of smelting-works. The Yellowstone Park, which is sixty-five miles by fifty-five in extent, has in it several thousand springs, of which about fifty are geysers.



About sixteen miles south of the Yosemite Valley are the Mariposa groves of the giant trees, one of a number of groups or collections of the sequioia gigantea, found only in California, and of the sequioia semper virens, or redwood. Three of these groves are in Mariposa County, and include 134 trees, each of more than 15 feet in diameter, and several hundred of a smaller size. In all the groups there are trees from 275 to 375 feet in height, and from 25 feet to 35 feet in diameter, and well proportioned to the top. The age of some that have been cut down has been estimated, by the usual methods, at from 2,000 to 2,500 years.

Our second illustration gives a view of two of the redwood trees, and of their size as compared with the men working to cut one of them down. And the last illustration shows one of the "giant trees," hollowed by age, through which a stage is being driven, and within which, it is said, thirty horsemen could stand at one time. On the stump of one of these giant trees a concert was given to fifty people, all standing or sitting on it at the same time.

The grain of the redwoods is straight, easily worked, and capable of a high polish, and is extensively used, not only on the Pacific coast, but in the eastern cities of the United States, and even in Europe, for offices and the inside finish of dwellings. Being very durable and strong, it is also used for railroad ties and bridges, and the less valuable portions for fence-pickets and shingles. Within some forty miles along the coast there are several large "lumbering" establishments, and millions of feet of this "lumber" have been shipped in every direction. A century would not exhaust the supply furnished by the forests of these magnificent trees.

HOW REUBEN FOUGHT FOR HIS LIFE.

BY F. BAYFORD HARRISON.

IT was a spring morning; the sky had been red, but was now grey, with oddly shaped little clouds floating near the horizon; the fishermen of Pencarn shook their heads, and prophesied squalls. But notwithstanding such prognostics, Reuben Blee came down from his cottage to the beach, where it lay, and prepared his boat for a day's fishing.

His companions stood aloof as he placed the sail and the oars within the boat and then returned to his cottage for the fishing gear. While he was thus absent there came down the path from the village a Bath-chair drawn by a footman, and containing a middle-aged gentleman wrapped in a shepherd's plaid shawl, with a black cloth cap closely covering his forehead and ears. The servant drew the chair up as near as was possible to Blee's boat.

When Reuben Blee came back he touched his cap to Squire Tregenza, without speaking.

"Eh, Blee, going out? What of the weather?"

"Yes, sir," replied Blee, "but I must go."

"How is your wife to-day?"

Reuben shrugged his shoulders. "No better, sir."

Squire Tregenza's sharp eyes seemed to draw nearer together, and his sharp nose seemed to become sharper. "A cross-grained old woman, Blee—as cross as I am."

"It is bad health with both of you that does it," said Blee.

"Hum, perhaps. It is the family gout that does it with me. With regard to Mrs. Blee, I dare say a doctor would set her right in a week. You should call in the doctor."

"Where is he, sir?"

"Oh!" answered Mr. Tregenza, "there are plenty of doctors in London; two or three even in Truro."

"And where are the guineas, sir?" asked Reuben bitterly. "What would a doctor charge to come here, even from Truro; fifteen miles across moor and rock?"

"Fifteen guineas, Blee," was the Squire's reply.

Then Reuben turned away to his boat, and Mr. Tregenza made a sign to his servant to draw him back to the village, and into the grounds of Tregenza Castle.

As soon as he was out of hearing, the fishermen began to say to each other that if their squire was like other squires he would pay a doctor to come to a poor sick woman. But one man remarked that the squire would not even pay for a doctor to attend himself, so it was not likely that he would do so for one to attend Mrs. Blee. While his mates thus conversed about Mr. Tregenza and his close hold upon his money, Reuben silently put his boat into sailing trim, and began to run her down towards the sea.

Two or three of his friends came to give a hand. "You should not go out to-day," they said. But he answered, "My sick wife must have comforts, and I must earn them for her. I shall not go out far, and if a squall comes on, I shall run in again."

The sail was hoisted, and off went Reuben Blee. A few strokes with the oars, first one side and then the other, took him into deep water, and into the fresh breeze. Two young fishermen also went out in their boat, so that he was not quite alone. At first the fishing was not successful; he should have had another man with him, but Mrs. Blee had quarrelled with nearly all her neighbours, and no one had offered to go with the old man, while he was too proud to request their company. He wished now that someone had come with him. He could not manage the net by himself, and when he drew that in and let out a line he only caught two or three small bass hardly worth taking home.

About noon the breeze freshened. As Blee ate his cold dinner he thought that perhaps a change in the wind might improve the fishing. By the time that he had finished his meal, he found the sail straining, and the boat tearing along before the wind. It blew from the south; soon he found that he must button his coat and pull on his hat; then he could not do anything with the net, for the boat rocked from side to side, shipping water at each roll.

The sky had become thick with clouds, and heavy showers of sleet fell at intervals. "I had better get home," said Blee to himself, endeavouring to put the boat's head round. This was out of the question until the sail was down. He prepared to lower it; while doing so a great wave broke over him, blinding him for the moment, and pouring off his waterproof clothing into a pool in the bottom of the boat. He again tried to unship the sail, and would have had it down in one moment more, but a loud snap told him that the mast had broken, and he had but to roll up the sail and throw it on one side.

Blee was now entirely dependent on the oars and the rudder. He looked for Pencarn, the village on the well-known cliff, but the rain was so dense that he could not make out even the coast-line. Then his desperate condition was evident. He was alone; he could not use two oars, even if they could have made any way in the raging waters. He did not know where he was; a big wave might at any moment overwhelm him; he had no food on board; he might strike on some unseen rock. And as he stood, with every nerve set, and his hands clenched on the rudder, in the awful darkness of the storm, the waters clamouring for his life, the gulls flashing past like evil spirits watching for him, he gave himself up for lost in this world, and muttered low cries of prayer that the mercy denied to him now, might be extended to his soul after the death which was at hand. This was the worst of the storm.

But God has placed within man's heart a clinging to life, even to this temporal life, and the Christian knows that he must not tamely yield up his breath without a brave struggle. So Reuben Blee prayed and toiled. He bore against the tiller with all his strength, keeping the boat's head, as he believed, to the north-east.

Then, as his last misfortune, he felt something give, and knew, only too well, that the rudder had broken, and that he was entirely at the mercy of the elements. It was now late in the day, and the approach of night added horror to Blee's situation. He sat huddled up in the stern, holding an oar by way of a rudder, but utterly hopeless of escape. He fell into a half-conscious state, dreaming over his early married life—over his children so soon taken from him, over all that had ever shed brightness on his life.

How long he sat in this state, he did not know, but he was at length aroused by a sharp, grinding noise beneath him, and, suddenly aroused, he was aware that the boat had struck on a rock; more than struck, for water was forcing its way in. Blee was now thoroughly awake; he saw that the rain had almost ceased, that in the distance a low line of yellow light marked the place where the sun had set, and that a rock-bound coast, unknown to him, was lying on his right hand.

"Now," cried he, alert once more, "if we drift towards shore, and escape rocks, we may be saved!"

All that he could do was to bale out the water which was rapidly filling the little cabin and threatening to swamp the boat, but he saw with mingled hope and dread that the wind was driving them—him and his boat—towards a bare, bleak village. On, on they went, the wind astern; now a crash as they grazed a rock, now heeling over, now drenched by spray, now twirled half-round by a wild gust, and the last that he perceived was when a life-boat loomed out of the dimness, and his own frail craft seemed to drop away from beneath him.

When Reuben Blee knew what was happening around, he saw a clean, humble cottage, a quiet old woman in a cotton gown, and a short, stout man, with a rough head, a shaggy grey beard, and large spectacles. This man was called Dr. James, and the woman was plainly a nurse.

In answer to his questions, Reuben was informed that he was at Polwith, a village twenty miles by road from Pencarn (there was no railway), and that he had just escaped with his life, for had not the life-boat's crew, who had been out to a wrecked sloop, happened to see his little boat, he must have been drowned. But warmth and food had restored him; Dr. James gave him some dry, whole clothes, and he was now to find his way to Pencarn.

"I can walk it, sir," said Blee, "though I am getting old, and twenty miles on land is worse to me than a week at sea. But thanks be to God, my poor old wife will see me once more; and, thanking you, sir, I'll be making my way home. She must have been thinking of me all day and all night, and I am afraid she will be more poorly than when I left."

"Is she ill?" asked Dr. James.

Blee described his wife's condition.

"Wait a bit, my man!" cried the doctor. "I'll have my pony-trap out, and I'll drive you over to Pencarn, and see what I can do for your wife."

"But, sir, I'm a poor man—I don't know how to pay a doctor."

"Tut, man, your rich squire shall pay me."

"Do you know Mr. Tregenza, sir? Rich as he is, he will not even see a doctor for his own ailments."

"I know him well enough by character," said Dr. James; "here comes my trap. Say good-bye to your nurse, and jump in; my time is valuable."

Blee was hurried away, not allowed even to offer payment for anything. As the doctor drove, he talked to Reuben about his fishing and his wife, and many other things. Poor Blee was very sad at the loss of his boat, the Evening Star, and Dr. James felt much sympathy for him.

At Pencarn Blee ran into his cottage while the doctor's pony was put up at the one little inn. As soon as that was done, Dr. James went to see Mrs. Blee.

After listening to all she had to say, including her account of the terrors of the previous day, and her expressions of the deep affection for her husband which underlay her irritable, invalid conduct, the doctor said to her—

"My good woman, there is nothing much the matter with you. I shall give you a pill, and a draught, and a lotion, and a liniment, and a plaister, and a few more remedies, and you will be perfectly well in the course of a fortnight. It is all on the nerves."

Dr. James had some drugs in a box in his trap, and went away to mix them. His cheery words had a magical effect on the patient.

"It is all on the nerves," she said to her husband; "you see, my nerves were on the stretch yesterday, and to-day they just are limp. If Dr. James can set my nerves right I shall be quite well, I am sure."

Mrs. Blee found something very comforting in the knowledge that her illness was all on the nerves; and in imparting this information to her neighbours she grew quite cheerful and amiable. The doctor remained a few days at Pencarn, and saw his patient, whose ailment had been chiefly, though not entirely, nervous, recover her health, if not vigour.

"This was the worst of the storm."—p. 511.

Often when out on the smooth waters, or on the rough waves, under the blue summer sky or the overcast winter heavens, Blee thought again and again of the terrible day when the Evening Star foundered, and he escaped almost as by miracle. He could trace the hand of Providence which had so driven him to Polwith, and there cast him ashore, and had then brought him home safely, and with him the doctor who was destined to restore the invalid woman to health. Had Reuben been able to look into the future, he would have seen stranger and further-reaching results following on his wild conflict with the stormy sea.

For Reuben Blee's adventure and narrow escape from death by drowning were, of course, reported to Squire Tregenza; and further stories of the wonderful cure of Mrs. Blee's long nervous malady were brought to his ears. "Well," he said, at length, "here is a doctor at my very door; I will have a guinea's worth of advice from him."

Mr. Tregenza and Dr. James had an interview. The squire was all sneers and sarcasm, the doctor all roughness and bluntness. Mr. Tregenza's close-set, piercing eyes peered at his medical attendant, and the physician's round glasses glared full at the rich squire. They seemed to understand each other. Dr. James, with difficulty, persuaded his patient to take the remedies prescribed, and in the end the "family gout" was subdued in very great measure.

One morning Dr. James said abruptly, "I am going home to-day."

"How much?" said the squire, opening his cheque-book.

"Twenty pounds to set Reuben Blee up with a new boat."

"Leave Blee to me," growled the squire. "What is your bill for your attendance on me?"

"Nothing. I don't attend people for money."

Mr. Tregenza scowled. "For what, then?"

"Just for the sake of practice and occupation. I live at Polwith because the people cannot afford to support a poor doctor. I resided many years in Paris, and had many patients among English people in that city. Now I live in a Cornish village, because—I am a Cornishman."

"I thought so!" exclaimed Mr. Tregenza. "You have worn a disguise, assumed a false name——"

"Excuse me—no. Old age has disguised me with grey beard and spectacles; and my name is James."

"Your Christian name, yes; but your surname?"

"Ah!" said the doctor, "that is Tregenza."

"James Tregenza," said his brother, with a smile of mingled scorn and admiration, "you did not quite succeed in deceiving me. Take a cheque for a thousand—five thousand—pounds."

"Thanks, no. I have enough and to spare. Give twenty pounds to old Blee; and send your cheques to hospitals. Good morning, Henry; my pony will be impatient."

And so the two eccentric brothers parted. Reuben Blee soon had a new boat; and, after that gift had been made by Mr. Tregenza, Dr. James paid many a visit to Pencarn. The squire was apt to suspect his relatives—friends he had none—of seeking to obtain his money. Finding that his brother did not require or expect anything from him, he began to tolerate Dr. James's presence, and then to desire it. But the doctor, also lonely and eccentric, was not the man to live idly at Pencarn Castle when all that he absolutely needed was to be had at Polwith Cottage. He only occasionally drove over to Pencarn, stayed one night, and returned to Polwith.

These occasional visits showed him that the squire was really in failing health. While Reuben Blee and his wife battled on bravely through hard work and poverty, the rich man in his indolence grew ever weaker and more suffering. He was too proud to ask Dr. James to remain with him; but there came a day when the pony was turned out in a field, and the doctor's portmanteau unpacked, and a physician summoned from Truro.

Mr. Tregenza knew what was being done around him; and as soon as the physician had taken his leave, bade his brother send for the family lawyer. "I will make a new will—or, at least, a new codicil."

"Why so?" asked Dr. James. "What is wrong with the old one?"

"In it I have left everything to public institutions and to the poor of Pencarn, to build them places of worship and an infirmary."

"Nothing could be better," said Dr. James.

"Well, I am going to alter it. Send for the lawyer. Do you presume to hesitate? Am I not master in my own house?"

The family gout and the family temper were too serious matters to be trifled with at such a moment. The lawyer was summoned. He drew out a fresh will, leaving the half of everything which Mr. Tregenza could bequeath to Dr. James.

By this time spasms of pain alternated with periods of intense prostration. Sleep, said the doctors, was the one medicine which might prolong life. The patient was asleep at the moment when the new will was ready.

"Now," said the lawyer, "he must be roused to sign it."

"I forbid it," cried Dr. James; "to awaken him would be to shorten his life."

"But his life cannot be saved, only lengthened. What does it matter? Forty thousand pounds will be yours if you rouse him to sign that paper."

"And forty thousand agonies of remorse! Shall I murder my brother? Perish all the wealth rather than I should do such a deed! If he wakes naturally, well and good; then he can sign the paper."

The lawyer could insist no further. He waited near at hand, until a servant told him that Mr. Tregenza was awake. Then he went into the room, and found the sick man resting with his head on his brother's shoulder, and his hands clasped tight together. The power of holding a pen, or of doing anything in this world, was over for Henry Tregenza. Dr. James was saying, "Father, into Thy hands——" and the slow, heavy breath, the glazed eye, the clammy brow, showed that the pains of death encompassed the master of so much wealth.

The breath ceased, the eye grew fixed, the brow pallid; life was extinct. James Tregenza turned away with heavy heart from the death-bed of his only near relative. On the table lay the unsigned will. "Thank God!" he cried to the lawyer, "that he did not sign it! It would have been like defrauding the poor."

And the rest of Dr. James Tregenza's life was mainly spent in disposing of Henry Tregenza's riches in accordance with the will of their late owner.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

THE earth, with leaves and blossoms fair,
Grows brighter day by day,
And, in the green fields everywhere,
We see the lambs at play.

While birds to one another call,
And sing with tuneful voice,
Shall we not praise the Lord of all,
And in His works rejoice?

Each golden morning is His gift;
The days, no longer dim,
Abound with light and joy to lift
Our grateful thoughts to Him.

O God, may our young hearts discern
Thy hand in all we see,
And from the world of beauty turn
To love and worship Thee!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL LESSONS.

MAY 18. THE TRANSFIGURATION.

To read—St. Luke ix. 28—36. Golden Text—ver. 35.

I. THE STORY. The passage having been read, question on these points:

(a) The time. Eight days after a particular conversation: What had that been about? The self-denial required from Christ's disciples, and the glory which should be His at His second coming. What had He foretold about some of them? (Ver. 27.) That they should see the Kingdom of God—i.e., should see Christ recognised by God as King. This would be the case this day.

(b) The place. Christ went up a mountain to commune with God.

Remind of others who had done the same—

Moses went up to Mount Sinai and heard God's voice. (Ex. xix. 3.)

Elijah heard the voice of God at Horeb. (1 Kings xix. 12.)

Can picture Christ and disciples slowly climbing mountain side in the evening—getting backward views of Lake of Galilee—watched by other nine disciples—seeing the sunset.

(c) The persons. Christ going, as often, to pray.

Peter, James, and John, three witnesses of His glory. Before this had witnessed His power in raising Jairus' daughter. After this witnessed His sufferings in Garden of Gethsemane.

Who else appeared? Moses the Law-giver, buried by the angels. (Deut. xxxiv. 6.)

Elijah the prophet, who went up to heaven in a chariot of fire. (2 Kings ii. 11.)

These both appeared in glory, bright and shining.

(d) The scene. Christ while praying, appears all glorious. His face and raiment become bright and shining with rays of God's glory. The disciples fall asleep; Christ, Moses, and Elias talk together.

(e) The conversation. They speak of Christ's death. This the object of His coming—to put away sin by sacrifice of Himself. For this He receives token of God's glory now, earnest of full glory hereafter. (Phil. ii. 9—11.)

Now St. Peter and the other disciples awake and join in the talk.

What do they see? The glory shining round Christ.

What do they hear? God's voice speaking of Jesus Christ.

What do they say? It is good to be here—would like to remain and enjoy still more of this wonderful vision.

(f) The end. Now the vision is over. Moses and Elijah leave. Christ is left alone.

Christ and disciples return to every-day life. They do not speak of it now, but St. Peter lays it up in his mind, and thirty-four years afterwards tells of it to the Christians in his second letter. (2 Peter i. 17.)

What a wonderful night!

II. THE LESSONS. 1. Glory in suffering. Christ's Kingdom won by suffering—giving up own will—bearing pain, enduring hardship for others.

This won glory for Him. So will it for all.

2. Prayer approved and answered. Christ's prayer answered by glorious vision of God, and assurance of God's favour. Some comfort to God's people still. While they are yet speaking, God will hear.

3. Christ to be heard. God speaks by His Son (Heb. i. 2), His life, His example, His teaching, His death. Hear Him, follow Him, obey Him. (Golden Text.)

MAY 25TH. THE MISSION OF THE SEVENTY.

To read—St. Luke x. 1—16. To learn—ver. 11.

I. THE CALL. (Ver. 1.) Remind how Christ came to lost sheep of House of Israel. These scattered all over Palestine and "beyond Jordan." Was always working Himself, going up and down the country, but the work of preaching too great for one person. Had already sent the Apostles on a short mission to test their powers; but they must stay with Him, learn of Him, and be further prepared for their great work after His Ascension. So he chooses out seventy men—just as Moses had chosen seventy Elders to help him (Num. xi. 16). Notice these points about their mission:—

(a) Whither? All the places which Christ intended to visit. Would prepare the way for Him as St. John the Baptist did.

(b) How? Two and two—for comfort, help, and support.

(c) Why? Because the harvest of souls so great. Multitudes sitting in darkness and shadow of death (St. Matt. iv. 16) need light of Christ (St. John ix. 5).

What, then, are they to do? Pray for more labourers, more workers in Christ's vineyard.

II. THE INSTRUCTIONS. (3—12.) (a) Be prepared for danger. Will be as lambs among wolves. May be in danger of losing lives, as Christ was at Nazareth (chap. iv. 29), St. Paul at Lystra (Acts xiv. 19).

(b) Be simple in habits. Were to go forth in the humblest manner, not encumbered with luggage—were to trust to ordinary hospitality.

(c) Be messengers of peace. Were to go as heralds of the Prince of Peace, telling of the love, joy, peace, which Christ brings. If the master of the house loved peace, he would receive them.

XUM

(d) Be contented. Not to go from house to house in search of better fare. Were servants of a Master who sometimes had not where to lay His head.

(e) Be useful. Had power of working miracles. Were to heal the sick—thus preparing them for the visit of the Physician of souls.

(f) Be preachers. Not to preach themselves, but Christ and His Kingdom.

(g) Be firm. If rejected, were to adopt usual symbol of shaking off dust—would have no communication with those who thus treated the servants of the great King.

III. THE WARNINGS. (13—16.) Three cities mentioned in reproof.

Chorazin—only named here—nothing known of it.

Bethsaida, or "House of Fish," on north of Lake of Galilee, where miracle of feeding 5,000 was done. (St. Mark viii. 22.)

Capernaum. Christ's "own city," where many miracles were worked. Had been exalted in spiritual privileges. What were these?

The presence of Christ—their Saviour, had they accepted Him.

The works of Christ—giving full proof as to Who He was.

The ministers of Christ—but they despised them.

These cities would become ruined, desolate—as they now are.

LESSONS. Christ's servants to be treated with—

1. Hospitality, for the labourer is worthy of his hire.

2. Respect, as messengers of Christ.

3. Attention, for they speak in Christ's name.

JUNE 1. THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

To read—St. Luke x. 25—37. Golden Text—Lev. xix. 18.

I. A QUESTION ASKED AND ANSWERED. (25—29.) Christ is asked a question. What is it? No question could be more important. On right answer depends all man's hope for eternity. But why did the lawyer ask it? To tempt, or test Christ—to try and get Him into a difficulty. How did Christ answer?

The lawyers, accustomed to study and explain God's Word, would know what was written there. Love to God includes—

The heart—seat of the affections.

The soul—seat of the will.

The strength—all man's powers of devotion.

The mind—or intellectual faculties.

That is—to know, fear, choose, and love God is the first step to heaven.

The second is to love our neighbours as ourselves.

But who is our neighbour?

II. A STORY TOLD. (30—37.) Teacher to question on the story.

1. The traveller's need. Alone, unarmed, making dangerous journey over rocky mountain descent from Jerusalem to Jericho. Set upon by banditti, wounded, robbed, left for dead. Was there no one to help?

Priest, God's minister, bound to help—passed by.

Levite, one of sacred tribe, came near, looked, did nothing. Perhaps afraid of thieves' return—or in haste to get on with their own journey. Thought of themselves first and last.

2. The traveller's help. A stranger comes near—of another nation not friendly with the Jews. What does he do? All he possibly can for present and future—binds up his wounds, pours ointment over him, gives him a draught of wine, puts him on his own camel, walks by his side to the nearest inn, delays his journey to look after him till the next day, arranges for his being taken care of. Shows true compassion, love, and devotion.

Who was the neighbour? Only one answer possible.

What, then, is it to be a neighbour?

1. To look on needs of others as our own. (Phil. ii. 4.)

2. To help all in need. (James ii. 16.)

3. To deny self for the sake of others.

The best example of all—He who told this story.

Christ left His home and came near us.

He rescued us from our great enemy, the devil.

He gives us the riches of His grace abundantly.

Shall we not love Him and our neighbour for His sake?

JUNE 8. TEACHING TO PRAY.

To read—St. Luke xi. 1—13. Golden Text—v. 9.

I. THE REQUEST. (Ver. 1.) This Gospel been called the "Gospel of Prayer." Records six occasions when Christ prayed, as follows:—

(a) At His baptism, when the Holy Ghost came upon Him. (iii. 21.)

(b) After healing the withered hand. (vi. 12.)

(c) Before calling the twelve apostles. (ix. 18.)

(d) At His transfiguration. (ix. 28.)

(e) On the cross, for His murderers. (xxiii. 34.)

(f) His last words. (xxiii. 46.)

Also have in this Gospel three parables about prayer.

(a) Friend at midnight in this lesson.

(b) The unjust Judge, teaching earnestness in prayer. (xviii. 1, etc.)

(c) The Publican and Pharisee, teaching the right spirit of prayer. (xviii. 9.)

Christ's disciples now ask Him to teach them a prayer.

II. THE PRAYER. (2—4.) The Lord's Prayer a model for all prayers. Notice:—

(a) Its brevity. One line of address, and six short petitions.

(b) Its simplicity. No fine words. Simply "Father," "give," "forgive," "deliver."

(c) Its comprehensiveness. "Us," not "me." Includes all.

(d) Its contents. Three prayers for God's glory, three for man's needs.

Notice the different ways in which God is approached:—

As Father—we His children: Our Father, etc.

As God—we worshippers: Hallowed . . Name.

As King—we subjects: Thy Kingdom come.

As Master—we servants; Thy will be done.

As Lord—we His dependents: Give us . . . bread.

As Saviour—we sinners: Forgive us.

As Deliverer—we fallen: Lead us not—deliver.

How do we pray for God's glory? That His name may be honoured, His Kingdom spread in the world, His will be done by man. For ourselves we ask all things needful for body and soul—in food and raiment, pardon for the past and help for the future.

III. THE PROMISE. (5—13.) Notice three things:

1. Our need. All things come from God; life, breath, food, etc. Absolutely dependent upon Him. Must feel this need if we would pray aright.

Notice the man's importunity in the Parable—would not stop till he had obtained what he wanted. So we must ask, seek, knock.

2. God's willingness. The friend gave to get rid of the man asking. God gives because He delights to. Promises to hear and answer before the prayer ended (Is. lxv. 24), as for example—

St. Peter released from prison (Acts xii. 5).

St. Paul saved from shipwreck (Acts xxvii. 24).

3. God's gifts. Bread as from a father to children.

The Holy Spirit as from God to man.

LESSONS. 1. The duty of prayer. Pray without ceasing.

2. The promises to prayer. Golden text.

3. The spirit of prayer. Earnestness, devotion, unselfishness.

THE OLD ENGLISH PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

WITHIN the memory of many now living, a great change has taken place in both the manner and material of the musical part of the church service. The psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins, of Tate and Brady, have long been known only by name; the old florid "repeat" tunes have given place to a class of hymn-melodies as chaste and emotional as their predecessors were rough and vigorous; the parish clerk, reading out the psalm line by line before singing, has become as extinct as the pulpit sand-glass; and the pleasing variety of instruments which used to be found accompanying the service, is to be met with no more. The old people who were brought up in the old ways, for the most part regret the change; and we are not sure that, with all our artistic advancement, the church services have gained in heartiness and enthusiasm. The music, indeed, is much better—much more refined; but the congregational singing is not nearly so good as it was in the olden times. With this aspect of the subject, however, we are not now concerned. Having in previous papers given some account of the materials of the old Psalmody, we desire now to speak of some of the usages and customs with which that material was associated. The subject is an extensive one, and it will not be possible, in the limited space at our command, to touch on more than a few of its branches.

The question of instrumental accompaniment in the services of the English Reformed Church before the organ became universal is one of great interest. It must not be forgotten that the introduction of organs throughout the entire Church is the work of comparatively recent times. As early as 1536 a protestation to the King by the Clergy of the Lower House in the Province of Canterbury styles the "playing at the organes" a "foolish vanitie"; and in the middle of the next century the instrument suffered more severely in the general devastation than any other part of the church furniture. Even in 1586 it is proposed, in a pamphlet, that "all cathedral churches may be put down where the service of God is grievously abused by piping with organs, singing, ringing, and trowling of psalms from one side of the choir to another." Some said that the use of "organical music" in the public service was Levitical; but in most cases the objections arose, no doubt, from a recollection of the glaring abuses prevalent in the Popish worship. By-and-bye the opposition died away, and instrumental music was once more freely introduced into the Church. Within a month of the Restoration, Pepys records—"This day the organs did begin to play before the King"; on November 4th, 1660, he writes—"To the Abbey, where the first time that I ever heard the organs in a cathedral"; and on April 4th, 1667—"To Hackney. Here I was told that at their church they have a fair pair of organs, which play while the people sing, which I am mighty glad of, wishing the like at our church in London, and would give £50 towards it." The term "pair" of organs which one meets with about this time meant, not, it should be explained, two instruments, but simply an organ with more than one set of pipes.

But the organ was not the only accompaniment to the singing used in the church service. The instrument was too costly for many congregations, and keyboard-players were not so common then as they have since become. The instruments chiefly in request in later times seem to have been bassoons, hautboys, flutes, clarionets, and sometimes a violoncello or double-bass. At the time Coleridge was writing "The Antient Mariner," a bassoon was added to the church orchestra at Stowey; and we are probably justified in recognising in that bassoon an instrument of music destined to a celebrity little dreamed of by the good people who first heard it. So late as 1791 Drs. Arnold and Callcott, in the preface to their edition of the Psalms, speak of "country parochial choirs . . . where generally no other bass than a violoncello or a bassoon is used;" and readers of George Eliot's "Scenes of Clerical Life" will remember a clever picture of an old-time village choir which boasted of two key-bugles and a bassoon. Further back we read of a much greater variety of instruments as in use in the Church. Walcott, in his "Traditions of Cathedrals," tells us that viols were employed at Exeter, and the lyre and harp at Hereford. Cornets and sackbuts were played at Worcester at the reception of Elizabeth in 1575 and 1613; and at Durham and York, when Lord Guildford visited those minsters, "wind music in the choir" had been only recently disused. In 1667 cornets were used at Westminster, and Pepys humorously alludes to "the fiddlers in red vests" playing in the Abbey. Organs and violins are mentioned at St. Paul's in a coarsely irreverent work; and in 1700 and 1702 the "Te Deum" was sung in that cathedral with vocal and instrumental music.

Barrel-organs, as substitutes for the larger and nobler instrument, were quite common, especially in the country, in the end of last and beginning of the present centuries. In an edition of his "Compleat Psalmist," published in 1769, John Arnold has some curious remarks from which we learn something as to the state of organ manufacture in his day. The art, says he, has been brought to such perfection that "I have seen some advertisements in the newspapers of church organs of the machinery kind, which are so contrived as to play (having barrels fitted to them for that purpose) a set of voluntaries, also most of our ancient psalm-tunes, with their givings-out and interludes, which are very commodious for churches in remote country places where an organist is not easy to be had or maintained, and may also be played by a person unskilled in music, who has only to turn a winch round, which causes the barrels to play the tunes they are set to." It is only about forty years since barrel-organs began to go out of use in the churches, and one or two were to be met with even in recent years. In 1880 Mr. Curwen came upon one in actual use in the old parish church of East Ham, Essex, not more than six miles from the centre of London. This was reported to be a fine instrument of its kind, having four barrels, "containing" in all forty-four tunes and chants. Mr. Curwen persuaded the old man who had turned the handle for forty years to give him a recital. It was of no use, the listener was assured, for anyone to play that organ who had no ear for music. Pauses had to be made in the turning at the reciting notes of the chants; a rallentando had to be given at the end of the hymn, and the stops must be piled on at the successive lines of a repeating tune. All this could be done rightly only by a musician!*

Alas! we believe the East Ham instrument has now been converted into an ordinary keyboard organ, and we suspect very few, if any, of its class now survive, even in the remotest corners of the country.

In a little book published in the early part of the present century, the author, while advocating the use of instruments in service, complains of the frivolous interludes played between verses and lines. The interlude at the end of lines has now quite gone out of use, but we are not so sure that it may not yet be heard occasionally before the last verse. Mr. Havergal, in his "History of the Old Hundredth Psalm Tune" (1857), refers to the "absurdity and ill taste" of these interludes, which, he says, are to be traced to the vitiated practices of the English organ school a century and a half ago, when the evil seeds which had been sown on the restoration of the second Charles had attained their full blossom. "The malpractices of that age had not ceased at even the beginning of the present century. The custom of interluding a flourish at the end of every strain in a tune is still rife on the Continent, and is not quite extinct in our metropolis." The following specimen of the interlude, taken from a version of the "Old Hundredth" printed about 1700, will give readers who have never heard anything of the kind some idea of what this musical incrustation was like. We can find room for the first two lines only—

* See Curwen's "Studies in Worship Music," First Series, p. 183, where a detailed list of the tunes played by this organ is printed.

Good extempore interludes used to be regarded as no unfair test of an organist's ability; but only a few men succeeded in making them effective in actual use. As heard in country churches, they must have been nothing less than a distraction to every worshipper of taste and feeling.

The grand and solid tunes which have come down to us from the Reformation, and of which the "Old Hundredth" may be named as a type, do not seem always to have suited our forefathers. They desired something of a more florid nature; and this they found in what has come to be known as "repeat" tunes, which they sang with a vigour that in our day would be thought quite startling. These tunes were scarcely ever syllabic, but abounded in extraordinary "runs" for the voices; and one line, generally the last, was taken up by all the parts and repeated several times with ever-increasing force. Unfortunately the last line would not always bear the process of repetition without ridiculously perverting the original import of the words. In a well-known hymn of Isaac Watts, for example, the last line of one verse—"And love Thee better than before," divided as it always was at the middle of the word "better," must have been more edifying to the young people in the choir than to sober-minded worshippers in the pews. "And take Thy pil—grim home," "Where my sal—vation stands," "I love to steal—awhile away," all divided where we have placed the hyphen, show other instances of the ludicrous effect which was sometimes produced by the old repeat tune. Many lines, of course, bore the process of repetition admirably, and, leaving words out of account altogether, the effect on the feelings of the successive assaults on the music, as the parts joined in one by one, "the whole culminating in a tumultuous shout of praise," must have been specially grand. "Miles Lane," with its thrice reiterated cry of "Crown Him," is the best known of the very few repeating tunes that have been spared to us. It is always heartily sung, being evidently a tune which the people enjoy, and it bids fair to last for many years yet to come. As a specimen of this class of melody, we print the tune "Desert," which was much sung in its day.

The reading of the Psalms line by line, sometimes by two lines, before singing, was a custom which seems traceable to the backward state of education in the seventeenth century. It is generally believed to have originated among the Scottish Protestants; but it was really proposed by the Westminster Assembly, under protest from the representatives of the northern Church. The Westminster Directory for Public Worship was in 1645 adopted by both kingdoms in order to secure uniformity of worship, and this manual recommends that "for the present, where many in the congregation cannot read, it is convenient that the minister, or some other fit person appointed by him and the other ruling officers, do read the psalm, line by line, before the singing thereof." That the custom was not coeval with the Reformation is evident from the following passage which we quote from an old author:—"It was an ancient practice of the Church for the minister or precentor to read over as much of the psalm in metre together as was intended to be sung at once, and then the harmony and melody followed without interruption, and people did either learn to read or get most of the psalms by heart." In Scotland the reading of the line, though resented at first, soon came to be looked upon as one of the essentials of worship; but the English Churches do not seem to have ever regarded it in that light, and at any rate they renounced it as soon as a majority of the people had learned to read. It was at the best a practice of questionable advantage, involving as it did both the interest of the tune and the meaning of the words. The latter must have suffered very much; for it is seldom that two lines contain an entire sentiment, and often the third line is required to complete the sense, as in the following stanza by Cowper:—

> "When comforts are declining,
> He grants the soul again
> A season of clear shining,
> To cheer it after rain."

And as to the music, having sung the line out, the thoughts of the people must have been so intent upon what the clerk was to deliver next that they would with difficulty remember the preceding part of the tune, so as to begin with some decision where they had left off. These considerations should have been, in themselves, enough to condemn the practice of "lining," even if it had not been otherwise absurd.

The old parish "clerks" appear to have been on the whole an incompetent and ignorant set of men. Many of them do not seem to have been able to sing more than one or two tunes, and these only indifferently. An old author, writing in 1762, tells of having heard "York" tune sung fifteen times in a week at one church, and in another the "Gloria Patria" sung to the sad strains of "Windsor." Another author attributes the decay of psalmody, which was setting-in in his day, partly to the unskilful clerks; "for as the clerks sing, so generally sings the parish." In 1730 one James Leman, in a work entitled "A New Method of Learning Psalm Tunes," draws a sad picture of the state of psalmody, and of the accomplishments of the clerks. "Though we have," says he, "several very good and easy tunes, yet not above five or six are commonly made use of, and scarce one private person in a thousand is able to sing them right; nay, even among the clerks themselves there are very few who understand so much of music as to be able to sing many of them either." Pepys, it will be remembered, thought it a jest to hear "the clerk begin the 25th Psalm, which hath a proper tune to it, and then the 116th, which cannot be sung to that tune;" and if the church were the place in which to seek jests, many would no doubt have found excellent sport in the "good old times." But the clerks seem to have done worse things than the like of which the old Diarist speaks. What do readers think of the following, which we quote from a letter in Hooker's Weekly Miscellany, February 14, 1741?—"Some parish clerks, when party disputes run high, are proud to pick out a malignant psalm, one which they imagine suits with the state of public affairs, or with some transactions in their own parishes, and casts a reflection upon them, whereby a part of the congregation is grievously scandalised, while the other is unreasonably diverted." Let us hope, for the sake of the clerks, that there is no truth in this.

The character of the choirs and choir-singing associated with old English psalmody must be familiar to most readers from frequent references in the literature of the present century. George Eliot seems to have been specially observant in this particular. In one of the "Scenes of Clerical Life" we are told something as to the process and procedure of the singing at Shepperton Church—of how a slate appeared in front of the gallery, announcing in bold characters the psalm about to be sung, and of how this was followed by the migration of the clerk to the gallery to join the choir, the latter being regarded in Shepperton as one of distinguished attraction, occasionally known to draw hearers from the adjoining parish. In another work we come across a jocose-looking man who during the week worked as a wheelwright, and on Sundays represented the musical profession by acting as leader of the local choir; and in the same story there is a persistent plaint, by one in authority, about the obstinate demeanour of the singers, who decline to change the tunes in accordance with a change in the selection of the hymns. Though surrounding them with a framework of fiction, George Eliot here represents things as they evidently came under her own eyes; and it may be taken for granted that all similar descriptions of the old rustic choirs by the great ones of English literature are tolerably faithful to the original. Nearly everyone knows the very fine picture of "A Village Choir" in the South Kensington Museum, by T. Webster, R.A. It is a most suggestive work of art, and looking at it carefully, one may learn a good deal more than we have been able to set down here.

A SONG OF REST.

AMID a merry pleasure-seeking throng,
In fair companionship two singers stood,
And to my listening ears so sweet their song
The crowded room became a solitude.

Weary of all life's cares, and sick at heart,
I found no peace among my fellow-men,
And would have gone from all the world apart,
Buried amid my selfish griefs, and then——

And then, as by a miracle, I heard
That song of welcome to a mind distressed,
That song so precious in its every word:
"Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."

To all earth's weary heavy-laden ones
Were not the Master's gracious words addressed?
So e'en to me, one of God's erring sons,
Christ stood with outstretched arms and offered rest.

The sweet song ceased, the singers passed from sight,
The loving words remain, for ever blest!
And in my darkest hours they bring me light,
"Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."

"I'VE HAD MY INNINGS!"

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

AMONGST the pleasant people with whom I have come into contact in life was Miss Georgina Carolina Dimity. Her name does not suggest Norman blood. I have no reason to suppose that any of her far-off ancestors (for ancestors of some kind she certainly had—she had not come into the world by any scientific processes of evolution) had been in any of the Crusades, or ever couched a lance in tournament, or wielded sword or mace in sterner fray. No, Georgina Carolina! the sweet, fresh, old-fashioned curtains of my bed, which are namesakes of yours, suggest to me that your honoured family are of comparatively modern date; but they are perhaps all the more useful, and none the less honourable, for that. In ancient Greece there was a certain Dimitos, or, as we should call him, "Double-thread," whose father was one "Dis," whom we should call "Mr. Twice," and whose mother was called "Mitos"—perhaps Miss "Mitos"—then; we should call her Miss "Thread" now; and, for all I know, you may go ever so much farther back than the Normans, or Saxons either. Perhaps old Dimitos was at the siege of Troy, and split somebody's head there, or had his own split—which it was, being no doubt a matter of consequence to him, but by no means any affair of ours. Anyhow, it happened so long ago that we need not trouble ourselves about it.

"Georgina Carolina" I can account for, and that in a highly satisfactory way. "Georgina" is the female of "George," Miss Dimity's uncle in India, who was supposed never to marry, and who, it was believed or hoped, might leave her some money; and "Carolina" being also the gentler sex for "Charles," or in Lat'n "Carolus," Miss Dimity's grandfather, who was believed to be good for something beyond a knife, fork, and silver spoon, and a mug and rattle of the same now unhappily depreciated metal.

If silver goes on depreciating at its present rate, either the size of mugs, and forks, and spoons, and rattles, must be increased, or else kind relations must face the situation in its metallic aspect, and rise at least to silver-gilt. Judging by the number of gold-mines of untold wealth in which I am almost daily urged to become rich, it may be that even that metal may become so cheap that the aforementioned articles will have to be made not of paltry silver-gilt, but of the genuine thing, gold itself.

Miss Georgina Carolina being thus far satisfactorily accounted for (for I am not authorised by any relationship, actual or probable, to ask to be allowed to inspect the family Bible, with no doubt the Dimity genealogy in the front), let me tell you that she was one of the most chirpy, cheery little women I ever met. She came down to breakfast with a spring. All day long the sun seemed to shine on Miss Dimity, and in her, and out of her too. Her canary sang, and she sang, and her cat purred, and her dog wagged its stump, as no other birds sang, or cats purred, or dogs wagged in the neighbourhood.

You will ask why I don't speak of Chip's (the dog's) tail. The answer is, because he had none—that's how he came to be Miss Dimity's. She heard of some cruel boys in the neighbourhood who had cut off a dog's tail, and she immediately searched out that dog, adopted it, ministered to its stump, and made such a good cure of the poor creature that she was prouder of that stump than she would have been of the most bushy tail.

Our misfortunes in life are not without their compensations, and in this case Chip was the gainer by the trouble, in a small way; for, not having so much to wag, he could wag what he had all the faster, and thus, by working hard at both extremities of his being at the same time—giving short, sharp barks at one end, and short, quick wags at the other—he reached as near perfection in the expression of joyous feeling as any dog could hope to do: he became like his mistress. Miss Dimity was, in a canine way, reproduced in Chip.

Now, I might have kept Miss Dimity to myself, and I should not have at all objected so to have done, had it not been that Miss Dimity said something to me one day in conversation which I feel strongly inclined to tell you, my reader, for your good. And how could I have told you what Miss Dimity said, if I had not told you something, at any rate, at the same time, of who she was?

What she said to me one day was this: "I'VE HAD MY INNINGS!" Indeed, I'm not sure but that she prefaced her bright little saying, brightly said, with a chirpy little "Ah, hah!"—a merry little laugh; and this I mention, because there are thousands of melancholy beings who, if they said the words, would have begun them with a groan, and ended them with the same.

Miss Dimity was of course, you know, speaking figuratively—using the well-known game of cricket as an image to convey to my mind that she had had many little pleasures and bright times and "chances" in life—"chances" having a particular meaning, as most ladies know. She had her runs, and did her little bit of batting, and though she had not scored much in one particular way, still she was quite content, and looked on what was pleasurable in the past with a cheery, a thankful, and a contented mind.

How it was that my friend's innings came to an end I never found out. Whether she was, so to speak, stumped out, or bowled out, or caught out, or leg-before-the-wicketed out, I cannot tell; but she recognised the fact that the time of her innings was passed.

XUM

A SONG OF REST.

Uncle George in India—or, rather, when he left India (and, in fact, the world) for good—had done his duty by his niece, and grandfather Charles his by his granddaughter; so Georgina Carolina was comfortably off. She might have kept a one-horse carriage if she had not preferred to spend the money in doing good. And this, I cannot but think, helped to keep my little friend as chirpy as she undoubtedly was.

Miss Dimity, when I first made her acquaintance, was living by herself. She and Chip, a canary and a cat, with a couple of maids, formed the establishment. Occasionally she had a friend; but in one way she might be said to have lived in the world—in a perfect whirl by day, and almost by night too; for, from sheer love of her kind, she had pitched her abode in a noisy street. She liked to feel that her fellow-creatures were near and about; and I verily believe she enjoyed the fearful rattling on the stones, which were almost enough to dislocate anyhow the smaller bones of anyone who was not so fond of his fellow-creatures.

Yes, Miss Dimity had mixed in society in her time. She had made many nice acquaintances, most of whom were gone now, but those who were left kept up with her and valued her still. She had been young, and had all the charms of youth. She wouldn't like to say so, but she had been admired. Three times she had been as nearly as possible proposed for. She had had many little enjoyments along her path, all of which were passed now. She had had a youth, and she remembered it all.

And now it had all passed. Somehow or other the innings was over—old Time had bowled her out; or if he had not done it himself one of his fielders had—Miss Dimity's stumps were down.

But by no means Miss Dimity herself—that's the point of the whole thing. She took stock of herself and of the situation, and she left the wickets as gracefully as anything you can conceive.

And what had she scored—how many runs had she made? She had not made anything matrimonially, else it would be absurd to go on talking of her as Miss Dimity; nor had she scored any runs in the money way, for she had left her innings in this line before George or Charles died, and put her in such a position that she could have kept that one-horse carriage if she liked. Not to have done what she well knew she had not done, would have made, and has made, many a one discontented and soured for the remainder of their natural—or, shall I not rather say, their unnatural?—lives.

But Miss Dimity had not been bowled out, nor got her leg before the wicket, nor ended her innings, however it came about, without having made some score. She had friends, and respect, and honour, and a good conscience, and the memory of many a good deed done. She had never grasped eagerly after any of the things of life, especially the great things; and when I made her acquaintance she was able to sit in sweet contentment by her fireside. Yes! I can do no better by you, good reader, than to tell you what Miss Dimity's condition was in her present state.

Contentment was one great feature of it. Miss Dimity believed that the past was past, and that when it was yet future, and when actually present, it was destined to be, and was swiftly moving on to being, "a past." Pasts must come to her as to all on earth. They had come, and she recognised them. No doubt, if she chose to rout them up, they had their "might-have-beens"—or, as is so often the case, their supposed "might-have-beens." But there was no use now in thinking that this run might have been made, and that where that one had been made, two might have been made instead. A contented mind is a continual feast; and many a snack—aye, I might say many a meal with three courses and dessert—had Miss Dimity on that.

Chip's general demeanour would suggest that he also was of the same mind; he never howled at any unhappy reminiscences of the lost joints of his tail—that bereavement was a thing of the past; the stump was of the present, and he was content therewith. Chip howling and Miss Dimity sighing would have made a duet very distressing to sensitive nerves.

And with content comes cheerfulness. When Miss Dimity approaches her canary in the morning, which is the first thing she does on coming into the breakfast-room, she is always taken stock of by that small fowl with its head on one side. Is it warranted in warbling, or singing, in any degree, in such a dusty, moiling, toiling world as is passing before its very eyes—nothing but a pane of glass between it and organ-grinders, and dust-carts, and beggars, and rushing, hurried, toiling, moiling men and women? Sunshine is scant, and the weather is chill; but here comes its mistress—here is Miss Dimity. That canary might have considered itself warranted in tuning-up a bit—a bar or two, anyhow—if it had contemplated the sugar-bowl, and reflected that the time was at hand for its getting its lump; but no! neither would its throat warble nor Chip's stump wag, until the inspiration for both came in the person of Miss Dimity.

Dear little woman! she had imbibed no bad feelings, she had not allowed herself to become in any wise soured by her innings in life, not having made some great score; she had sown the seeds of cheerfulness, and she was enjoying the harvest now.

Moreover, she had her love of humanity. She loved her fellow-creatures as such. She had actually pitched in that noisy thoroughfare, to be in the midst of them; and, dear little woman! she had mankind moving about near her to her heart's content. I think my nerves cannot be quite as strong as hers, or perhaps I am unfortunately not so devoted to my kind, for I confess to liking quiet in a general way. I don't mean to say that I would have changed places with Robinson Crusoe, if I lived in his time; but if Miss Dimity and I were going to keep house together, I think I should say, "My dear, let us go into the country—or, anyhow, look out in town for some quiet little nook." I don't know that I'd venture to say a place where they had a board up with "No Thoroughfare" on it; but a street with only one opening to it, and not much frequented, as it doesn't lead to anywhere.

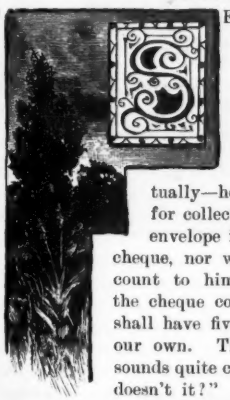
I think that an excellent habit Miss Dimity had during the time of her innings of not depending on others, but having resources within herself, stands to her now. There are some who stake all their happiness on some one thing; the ball hits it, down it goes, and with it all is lost. But, in or out, dear Miss Dimity had her own resources, and she was not without them now.

And usefulness was there—that great secret of happiness. Miss Dimity did not content herself with merely looking at her fellow-creatures through the window, or listening to them as they rattled over the pavement in the street. No; she went out amongst them, and mingled her humanity with theirs; and Chip went with her, and by wagging his stump as hard as he could on these occasions, made some gutter-children happy, if he did nothing else; for he felt kindly disposed to boys, notwithstanding what he had gone through for them in his youth.

Many of us have to look on at activities in which we can no longer take a part. Let us be content.

What mistakes we see! Ah! others, out of the game in which we in our time were so eagerly engaged, saw the same mistakes in us. But all that is past now.

Let us remember that happiness may exist outside the old activities—now past for ever. The old innings is past, but we have some other innings now.



Aye, up to the very end there is an innings for every-one who will live for God and man. But all this life's innings must end; and then, good reader, then, when you take stock of the past, God grant that there be no desolation in your heart when you say,

"I'VE HAD MY INNINGS."

IN THE SECOND PLACE.

CHAPTER I.

"SEE, Jocelyn, we have got exactly fifty pounds a year. Mr. Frost says he will pay us half-yearly, on the 1st of November and the 1st of May. He says we shall have our money quite punctually—he won't charge anything for collecting it, not even for the envelope in which he encloses the cheque, nor will he oblige us to account to him for the penny which the cheque costs. Every half-year we shall have five-and-twenty pounds, all our own. Think of it, Jocelyn; it sounds quite comfortable for two girls, doesn't it?"

"Yes," said Jocelyn in a contemptuous voice; "it will about pay for our gloves. How unreasonable you are, Hope, to burst in with your dull, dry, technical news when I am reading! Don't you see that I am reading a letter? Can't you guess that I want to finish it? You are such a tiresomely matter-of-fact girl—— There, I don't want to fret you, darling."

Hope arched her rather marked brows very slightly.

"You never vex me, Joey," she said. "I felt so excited to see certainty and some sort of land at last that I forgot you were reading. I beg a thousand pardons. Oh, thank you, Anne—coffee and hot scones—how delicious! Come to breakfast, Jocelyn; I am dreadfully hungry."

Jocelyn moved slowly across the long, darkly wainscoted room. She took her place opposite the coffee-tray, but her eyes were still lowered over the voluminous pages of a closely written letter.

"Sugar, Hope?" she said, in a mechanical voice.

Hope was cutting bread and butter.

"Yes, darling—but please not more than five lumps. Jocelyn, I assure you that is the sixth which is about to drop into my already over-sweetened beverage. Thanks, dear. Bread and butter, eggs, ham, scones, wait your acceptance when you are ready. In the meantime I am too hungry to stand on ceremony."

"Oh, I'll be ready in a minute—such a long letter! Thrilling, though—quite thrilling. Don't talk to me for two minutes, Hope, and then you shall hear news."

"Jocelyn's cheeks are quite flushed," murmured Hope, as she devoured bread and butter. "Her hands shake; she is smiling. Can it be a proposal? She is so agitated, and in such a glow of delight, that it really looks like it. But who is there to propose? She won't have poor Cecil, and there really is no one else. Fifty pounds a year—twenty-five every half-year. Could we live in London?—it isn't quite a pound a week. Yes, Jocelyn, what is it?"

"An egg, please," said Jocelyn. "I have finished my letter; it is from Aunt Margaret Seaton."

Hope's face was like her name, very bright and pliable. She had dark brows, hair several degrees lighter, and expressive grey eyes. Her eyes, which could express almost every shade of feeling, grew dark now; her lips took a straight and somewhat hard curve, and the rather fleeting colour on her cheeks paled perceptibly.

"A letter from Aunt Margaret Seaton, and you look so happy, Jocelyn?" she questioned. "I wonder she could write, I wonder you can read. I—I don't understand."

"Of course you don't, darling; you have not heard a word of the letter. It's all right, I assure you; but we'll talk it over presently. Now what about that dreadful Mr. Frost and his dull epistle?"

"'You won't break down; girls like you never do.'" - p. 526.

Jocelyn was very like Hope—like her, with a difference. She was more brilliant, more beautiful. Hope's hair was only light, Jocelyn's was golden. Jocelyn's lips were not so firm as Hope's, but they were exquisitely curved, and gleaming white teeth showed between them when she smiled. She was not so tall as her sister, but she was beautifully made; the plainest dresses became her, and took a look of ease and grace and beauty from the very way she put them on. She had an affectionate, bright, frank manner; and although Hope, too, was bright and frank, Jocelyn was, on the whole, the greater favourite. Everyone liked the Karrons, however, and all the old friends who had known the girls from their childhood were sorry when they heard that they must go away from the snug wainscoted house where, during their mother's time, they had lived, not in wealth, but in considerable ease and comfort, and face the world as very poor girls.

Still they had fifty pounds a year. Hope, who had half risen from her seat when Jocelyn made an announcement with regard to her correspondent, sank into it again, and taking up Mr. Frost's letter, spread it before her on the table.

"It's very short," she said. "He has addressed it to me."

"Of course—that goes without saying; you are the business one of the family."

Hope's eyes had not yet quite regained their usual undisturbed tranquil gaze. She loved Jocelyn with all her heart, but not quite understanding her at the moment, she rather avoided looking at her.

"I'll read the letter aloud," she said. "This is what Mr. Frost has written:—

"'DEAR MISS HOPE,—All your poor mother's unfortunate——' H'm, I needn't read aloud what he says about mother, Jocelyn. Anyhow, the debts are all paid off; that's a comfort. He goes on, down here—'It is my painful duty to have to inform you that you and your sister are penniless; or, all the same thing, I find there is a thousand pounds left, which, as it happens, I can safely invest at five per cent. This will bring you in £50 a year. In a month's time I will send you a cheque for the first half-year's interest paid in advance. You may reckon on receiving a cheque from me to the amount of £25 on the 1st of November and the 1st of May regularly each year in future. This is the utmost I can do. I can scarcely express to you my consternation, or enough deplore——'

"Oh, now he's going off in another rigmarole. You can read the letter, of course, Jocelyn; but if I were you I wouldn't—it would only give you pain."

"Poor mother!" murmured Jocelyn. "I suppose he does feel rather irate."

"Irate! He's as rude as he can be. He's not a gentleman," answered Hope. "It's no affair of his if mother did—if mother couldn't help having pretty things, and making us the happiest girls in all the world. I'm nineteen, and I haven't had a cloud until now; and all my life I'll have my nineteen perfect years to look back upon. Don't talk of it, Jocelyn, for if you do I'll certainly break down."

"Poor mother!" again echoed Jocelyn. "What sweet taste she had in dress, too! No one ever made up lace ruffles like her. Do you remember the day she powdered my hair, Hope, and made me wear the old point and velvet, and Sir Digby Leroy made those ridiculous compliments? Why, Hope, you are looking quite pale. That will never do—you would be positively ugly if you were pale, Hope. You want that touch of colour in your cheeks to darken your eyes, and make you worthy of your name. Oh, how thankful I am I hadn't the misfortune to be called after a virtue!"

Hope pushed aside her breakfast, and going over to the fire stood with her back to the old oak carved mantel-piece.

"We have got to face everything, Joey," she said. "We were waiting for Mr. Frost's letter—it has come, and now we must face the world. I am not low-spirited, and I always, always mean to be bright; but it is a grave subject, isn't it?"

Jocelyn raised her coffee-cup to her lips. She drank deliberately, her pretty eyes were lowered, and the fingers which shook when turning over the pages of Mrs. Seaton's letter now trembled again.

"It is ridiculous to be afraid of a creature like you, Hope," she said. "And of course I'm not—not a morsel. Still, I foresee a storm. Fancy a storm in a teacup between two loving twin sisters! However, it will soon blow over. Even you, darling, even you, pet, must bow to the inevitable. Fifty pounds a year; it might keep us in gloves—I'm not sure. Now, look here, Hope: how much money have you in the house?"

"A five-pound note," said Hope, "half a sovereign, a florin, twopence, and four halfpenny stamps."

"What riches! I want you to lend me the five-pound note. I want to go to town to call on Aunt Margaret Seaton."

CHAPTER II.

THERE was no pleasanter or more sociable little village in all Chalkshire than Downton, and few of its inhabitants were more popular here than the Karrons. Oakdene was the most popular house for evening parties, for impromptu charades, for tennis, for all other amusements suited to the young, happy, and gay. Jocelyn and Hope Karron were in endless request not only in their own house but in all other houses where the girls were young and the lads merry. Mrs. Karron was just the gentlest, softest, most picturesque of women, and the cares and perplexities of money seemed never to touch the lives of the Oakdene inmates. Now and then Mrs. Karron would say, in a graceful, indolent fashion, looking with her loving dark eyes at the two pretty girls—

"You know, darlings, I ought to deny it to you, for I have a kind of idea that we are shockingly poor. I had a letter from Mr. Frost only a week ago, and he really quite frightened me—talked about the workhouse, and said we would soon be beggars. I could not sleep the night I got the letter—but now I don't believe it."

"Did he send you the cheque you wanted, mother?" Jocelyn said on the last of these occasions. "After all, that is the main thing."

"Oh yes, he sent me the cheque."

"Then of course you need not believe a word of his tiresome talk. And now we can order that brown velvet from Marshall's."

Hope was standing by the fire when Jocelyn ran gaily over to open her mother's davenport. She had a very gay sparkling face in those days, but now it looked a little grave. She seemed to put a kind of constraint over herself, and then said slowly—

"I know you hate business, don't you, mother darling?—but if you like, I'll write to Mr. Frost, and find out what he really means."

Mrs. Karron threw up her hands in despair.

"You don't want quite to kill me, Hope," she exclaimed. "Fancy that dreadful man going into details! He is a lawyer, and he would do it in that terribly confused way that only lawyers can aspire to. In your poor father's lifetime, Hope, he never could get me to understand figures. He was so gentle with me, trying to explain over and over those dreadful differences between compound and simple addition. He said I had plenty of talent, but not for figures; therefore what could Mr. Frost do with me?"

Mrs. Karron raised her handkerchief to her eyes as she spoke, and Hope bent her tall young figure and kissed her.

A few months, however, after this last exhibition of weakness and ignorance on the part of Mrs. Karron, the dreaded blow fell. It was a fortnight before Christmas, and the girls were preparing for even more than their usual round of festivities. New dresses were ordered, sashes, gloves, boots, a thousand and one trifles, which, as the mother declared with smiles and proud glances, could not be done without, and cost so little—so very, very little. Boxes laden with these indispensables came down from London, and then in course of post followed the bills. Whatever the necessary trifles may have been, the money to be paid for them was sufficiently large even to stagger poor sleepy, good-humoured Mrs. Karron. Although she disliked Mr. Frost, she had learnt to lean upon him; and of late years, at his own request, he had arranged to pay most of her accounts from a reserve kept for the purpose in a London bank. The girls were up-stairs, trying on their new evening dresses, when Mrs. Karron, with a queer foreboding and almost fear at her heart, put the obnoxious bills into an envelope and directed them to Joshua Frost, Esq., Lincoln's Inn Fields. The post carried them away, and the widow breathed freely once more. There should be no girls like Jocelyn and Hope at the gay party which was to see the old year out and the new in. Hope insisted on washing and mending her mother's old point, and the mother was to accompany the girls to this special festivity.

Alas! man proposes. Two days before Christmas Jocelyn and Hope were away for the day, having joined a large skating party. Mrs. Karron was having a gentle siesta in her pretty drawing-room when the room-door was rather abruptly opened by Jane the parlour-maid, and Mr. Frost in the flesh—not a terrible letter of his, not even a still more detestable telegram, but the man himself—stood before the poor frightened lady. He was a quiet, grave man. Silly people were apt to call him stern; in reality he had one of the kindest hearts.

"I have come to see you," he said. "Don't look so alarmed. There is no help for it, however. You have got to face facts. I've brought you back these bills; there is no reserve to meet them with."

He stayed for about an hour; long before the girls came back he was halfway to London.

"Where 's mother?" said Hope, as she entered the cheery square hall about six o'clock that evening. Jocelyn was following with young Cecil Grey. "Jane," continued Hope in a half-whisper, "Mr. Grey will stay to supper. Is mother in the drawing-room?"

She pushed her fur cap from her rather low forehead as she spoke. Her eyes were sparkling with pleasure and excitement.

"Your mamma isn't well, Miss Hope," said Jane. "Perhaps Mr. Grey won't mind going home, miss. And—and the doctor, he 'd like to see you, Miss Hope."

"The doctor!" exclaimed Jocelyn, who had now come up. "I don't ever remember seeing a doctor in this house. Cecil, you had better go into the drawing-room, or home, just as you please. Come, Hope; we 'll go and see poor mother. What can be wrong?"

"The doctor wants you first, Miss Hope. He 's in the study; he won't keep you any time," murmured Jane. —"Don't go up to your mother, please, Miss Jocelyn, until Miss Hope has seen the doctor."

"Oh! what a ridiculous fuss," said Jocelyn. "Mother was quite well when we left home this morning. You are an awful croak, Jane. It is hateful to have people about one who make the worst of things," she continued, pulling off her fur-lined gloves and glancing up at young Grey.

Hope looked from Jocelyn to Jane; then the bright glow left her face. She felt grave and queer. She was too inexperienced to be really alarmed; but she hurried down the little passage which led to the tiny and seldom-occupied study.

"What is it, Mr. Marvel?" she said, as the grey-haired old doctor came to meet her.

"How do you do, Hope?" he said. He took her hand; he had known her all her life. "Yes, I knew you were a brave girl," he continued. "You have stuff in you. That 's right, my dear; hold yourself erect, and look me full in the face. You won't break down; girls like you never do."

"What 's the matter? What 's the matter?" said Hope, impatiently.

"I knew you had the right sort of mettle in you. I always admired you very much, Hope."

"I am getting extremely impatient," said Hope. "I have got a temper, and you are trying it. I suppose mother is really ill. But do tell me what is wrong, and let me go to her."

"She is very ill, my dear child—alarmingly ill. She has had what they call a stroke; it is a bad one, and must have been occasioned by some sudden shock. She is most anxious to see you, Hope. She cannot speak; but there is something on her mind. Perhaps you can help her to interpret it. Anyhow, I want you to go to her at once, and to be very calm and quiet. Whatever you feel, you must on no account break down. If Jocelyn cannot control her feelings she must not go into your mother's room."

"You think, then," said Hope, opening her big eyes wide, and staring at the doctor, "you think that mother—our mother, who was quite well this morning, is in danger?"

"Why, didn't I say so, child? Or if I didn't say it, I meant it. People don't have serious strokes without being in danger. Now, Hope, if you are going to break down——"

"I 'm not. Will you tell Jocelyn, please? I 'm going to mother this moment."

She ran out of the room, and brushed against Jocelyn, who, in her furs and richly coloured dress, made a picture as she still stood chatting with Cecil Grey in the hall.

"Good gracious, Hope! what is the matter?" exclaimed her sister; but Hope did not utter a sound. She reached her room, threw off her hat and jacket, encased her feet in a pair of worn but noiseless old slippers, and calmly, with a pale face, but two brightly shining eyes, entered her mother's bedroom.

The stroke had come truly, and poor Mrs. Karron could not utter a word. She looked at Hope with a whole world of entreaty, and question, and despair in her eyes.

The girl's strong young hand clasped hers. She bent down over her.

"You want something, mother dear," she said, in a clear matter-of-fact voice. "You can't speak; the doctor says you won't be able to speak just yet; but I dare say I can bring you what you want."

The eyes grew more questioning and eager.

Hope gazed at her mother as if she would read her very soul. Then she went across the room, and returned with some paper and a pencil.

"You can write, mother," she said, in an encouraging voice.

XUM

She put the pencil into the feeble, almost powerless hands.

"You can write, mother," she said. "I will hold the pencil with you, and you shall write on this paper what you want me to do."

A caged spirit seemed almost to leap from Mrs. Karron's dying eyes. With a resolution which had never before been manifested by her, and aided by Hope, she managed to get the following message conveyed to the sheet of paper:—

"Dear Margaret Seaton,—Send me £2,000 by the next post, or I shall die."

"Yes, mother," said Hope. "This shall go at once. Mr. Grey is down-stairs, and he will post it. Of course Aunt Margaret will give you or lend you the money. She is rich; it is nothing to her. Rest easy, mother pet—mother darling; your own Hope won't let you die."

The restless eyes certainly grew quiet and calm, and the feeble hand tried to return Hope's warm pressure.

"I must send off the letter at once," she said. "There is quite time to catch the post."

She ran down-stairs and entered the drawing-room. It looked just as it did every evening. A bright fire shone and crackled in the highly polished grate. A pretty shaded lamp stood on a little round table beside her mother's empty chair. Jocelyn had crouched up in one corner of a large Chesterfield sofa; she was sobbing bitterly, and the doctor and Cecil Grey were both trying to comfort her.

"Ah! here comes Hope," said Dr. Marvel.

Jocelyn raised her face, down which the tears were streaming.

"Come here, Hope; how unkind of you to go away from me!" she half-sobbed, half-screamed; and rising to her feet, she held out her arms to her sister.

"In a minute, darling," said Hope.—"Dr. Marvel, I must write an important letter immediately. I must catch the post.—Cecil, will you fly with my letter to the post-office when it is written?"

"I knew you wouldn't break down, Hope," said Dr. Marvel admiringly. "Then she had a secret, and it is off her mind. Capital! Now no one must talk while Hope writes her letter. Would you rather write here, or in the study, Hope?"

"Here," said Hope impatiently. "There is not an instant to lose; I must not miss the post. Go away, everyone, please, for five minutes—I mean, leave me alone at mother's davenport. Go away, please, Jocelyn; I'll speak to you after I have written the letter."

"Oh! you are unkind," sobbed Jocelyn. "Oh, what an awful, awful evening this is!"

Hope did not take any notice. She scribbled away with burning spots on her cheeks:—

"Dear Aunt Margaret,—Mother had a stroke this afternoon. She is very ill. She cannot speak, but she wrote what I enclose. Please send it to save her life. It is the last chance.—Your affectionate niece, "Hope Karron."

CHAPTER III.

On Christmas Day Mrs. Karron died. Jocelyn had been in an almost stunned state since the first evening of her mother's illness. She had wept so long and so violently that her pretty eyes were nearly lost to view; she had refused to eat, refused to be comforted by anyone. When she did sleep, it was from exhaustion. No one could doubt the genuineness of Jocelyn's grief; the Downton people spoke of it as tragic, and the pity and admiration felt for the beautiful young girl was universal.

"Although she never do go near her mother's room," Jane was once or twice heard to whisper. "She couldn't abear it, she says; and the poor dear lady always and always looking out for her. But there 's no doubt she 's broke down, poor Miss Jocelyn is; and she 'll never be the same bright young lady no more."

Hope during the two days which intervened between her mother's sudden illness and its fatal termination kept up, in Dr. Marvel's opinion, bravely. She was never seen to cry. She ate her meals with composure; she did not sleep, it is true, for she had so much to do, and the terrible illness was so short and so quickly over that there was no time for sleep. But she was alert, watchful, capable. Instinct made her a good nurse, and the doctor, at least, was never tired of singing her praises.

The mother and daughter were mostly alone. Both knew the danger which was approaching, but both thought that it might be averted. Mrs. Karron clung in a confused kind of way to the succour which must surely come, and which would not only bring relief to her clouded brain, but would avert that domestic calamity which was killing her. Hope used to stand by her mother's side and talk cheerfully.

"Aunt Margaret's letter will come on Christmas morning, mother; and I am sending a messenger early to the post-office, so that there shall be no delay in our getting it. Of course she will send us what we want; there is no doubt about it—she is enormously rich."

Mrs. Karron could only smile with her eyes when Hope spoke brightly to her, but her faith was strengthened by Hope's faith, and after these warm emphatic declarations of her daughter's, she often dropped off into almost peaceful slumber.

Christmas morning came, and with it the letter. Jane brought it herself to her young mistress as she stood in the shaded light by her mother's side. Mrs. Karron was very weak at the moment. Hope gave her a restorative, then she tore open the letter, having no doubt whatever in her own mind with regard to its contents.

There was no cheque within, however, and the large writing on the thick sheet of notepaper was sufficiently brief to be quickly perused:—

"Grosvenor Mansions, December 24th.

"My dear Niece,—You must have taken leave of your senses to write to me as you have done, or to take any notice of the wanderings of a sick person. I am truly sorry for my poor sister; but what else could be expected? She has never lived on her income, and even a large capital comes to an end when people fail to deny themselves. I am sorry, of course—very sorry—for this illness; but I dare say you have exaggerated its serious import. Give my love to Sophia, if she is well enough to receive it, and write and tell me how she goes on.—Your affectionate aunt,

"MARGARET SEATON.

"P.S.—Lotty sends her love. She does look so sweet, dressed for her first party. By the way, I am sending a hamper with some game and fruit to your mother as a little Christmas remembrance."

"What is it, Hope?" asked the eyes of the sick woman. "What does she say? Where is the cheque which is to save us, Hope?"

Hope's face was almost deathly. She folded the thick sheet of paper, replaced it in its envelope, and bent down over her mother.

"She has said nothing, mother—nothing that you would care to hear. She—she—— Mother, what is it?—Jane, come here; my mother is worse."

But no—for the moment she seemed better; the imprisoned tongue was loosened.

"Your aunt Margaret has refused to send me the money, Hope?"

"Yes, mother—yes. Don't let us talk of it any more."

"Never any more," whispered Mrs. Karron, in a confused way—"never any more. I 'd," she said, looking up at Hope with a glazed look coming over her eyes—"I 'd like you to read me the letter."

"Read it, Miss Hope," said Jane, who was standing behind the bed with her apron to her eyes. "Don't you refuse her; she 'll never want much more from you, Miss Hope."

"I 'll read you the letter, of course, dear mother," said Hope. "It is unkind, and I 'd rather you didn't hear it; still, I 'll read it if you like."

"Every word," whispered the faltering, failing voice.

Hope did read, from the first line to the last. When she began, Jane slipped out of the room, and returned with the frightened, shrinking Jocelyn. As Hope folded up her letter, Mrs. Karron's eyes rested with an expression of pleasure on her eldest daughter's face.

"Her first party," she began to murmur. "No, no, it 's Jocelyn's first party, and there 's lots of money, lots—and flowers—quantities, beauties. They 're bringing them in, in baskets; they are all for a girl's first party—no, they are for a bride. See, all the flowers are white, and Jocelyn is the bride—no, white flowers are for funerals, too. Never mind—flowers—money, all for Jocelyn and Hope. God bless them!"

The last words were almost whispered. A fleeting smile passed over the dying features, and Mrs. Karron never spoke in this world again.

"Come away, Jocelyn," said Hope.

Her sister was in a paroxysm of grief. Hope put her arms round her and led her down-stairs. There was a snug fire burning in the cheery dining-room, and an over-officious servant had even put up some feeble Christmas decorations.

"Jocelyn," said Hope, as her sister sank into an arm-chair and pressed her handkerchief to her face, "I do wish you would stop crying for five minutes, and let me speak to you. I 'll go away afterwards, and you can cry from morning till night if you fancy."

"You are unkind to me, Hope," sobbed Jocelyn.

"Oh no, darling, but my own heart is crushed, and I must say something to relieve my feelings. Do you know that when mother was taken ill she got me to write to Aunt Margaret—our rich Aunt Margaret—mother's own only sister? Mother wanted some money from her—well, a good lot; but what was that? It was the last chance for mother. I sent off the letter—you remember? This morning came the answer. She refused; she wrote scornfully. There, that is what has killed mother. This is the letter; I am putting it into the fire. Do you think, Jocelyn, that I would ever speak to Aunt Margaret, or take a farthing of money from her again after this? Do you, Jocelyn, do you?"

"I don't know, Hope; I wish you would not glare at me so. You quite frighten me."

"There goes the letter into the fire," said Hope. "Oh! my poor little Jo—my poor little Joey—we are motherless; and we are beggars, too; but we 'll always cling to one another. No one can ever part us from one another, can they, darling?"

When Jane slipped into the room, she saw the two poor things with their arms round each other, and Hope tired, and white as a sheet, but with her head lying on Jocelyn's breast fast asleep.

CHAPTER IV.

MRS. KARRON'S death caused considerable excitement in Downton; and not only her death, but the news which immediately followed—that pretty Jocelyn and Hope Karron were, to all intents and purposes, penniless. No end of compassion and sympathy was shown. Notes of condolence arrived at all hours. Officious but kindly meaning matrons tried to see the girls; and so many offers of help came in, and so many invitations arrived, that had the Karrons cared they could have lived on their friends for at least a couple of years.

Jocelyn, however, was in bed ill with a feverish and nervous attack, and Hope steadily refused to see all visitors except the doctor and Mr. Frost. Mr. Frost came down on the day of the funeral, and had a long talk with the young girl.

"It was not only," he said, "that your mother lived for some years past on her capital, but she was lately tempted to invest small sums in most unsafe speculations. She was weak enough to read those silly prospectuses which seem to flood every country house, and to be guided by them. I expostulated, and did all in my power; but as your father left her full control of everything, I could not do more than speak my protests. When I came to see her in a hurry the other day, it was not only to explain that all her reserve money had come to an end, but that £2,000 which she had rashly invested was irretrievably lost."

"That explains," said Hope, moving her lips slightly.

"That last news seemed to break her down; she cried out in the most heartrending way. Seeing what has occurred, Miss Hope, I am almost sorry that I paid that visit; and yet it seemed my absolute duty to warn your poor mother."

"You could not help it, Mr. Frost," said Hope; "it had to be told. I am only sorry that you did not come to me in the first place. I have always had more taste for that kind of thing than mother and Jocelyn."

"Poor child! How old are you, my dear?"

"Nineteen. Jocelyn and I are the same age. We are twins."

"Poor children!—poor children! Your sister is dreadfully broken down. I hear."

"She is. I don't think she'll ever be quite the same again. Now, Mr. Frost, what are you going to do for us?"

"Anything in my power, Miss Hope."

"Will you try to put affairs straight? I mean, are there any debts?"

"Bless the child—yes, there are heaps and heaps of debts."

"But is there money enough to pay them?"

"Yes, but it would mean making you and Miss Jocelyn penniless."

"Never mind that; pay the debts first."

"You're a brave girl, my dear. You take after your father—one of the most upright, honourable men I ever met. I am only sorry your poor mother was not more like him——"

"Please say nothing against mother; no one could have been better for us, or have made us more happy. May I give you some tea?"

Mr. Frost went away, and from that day kept up a brisk correspondence with Hope.

Jocelyn had been in bed for a week. She was now lying on a sofa, close to a luxurious fire in the girls' pretty bedroom. She wore a soft morning-gown of creamy white, with little pieces of black ribbon introduced daintily here and there. Her lovely golden hair lay in a rich mass against a dark velvet pillow; her eyes were fixed in alarm on Hope's eager face.

"Who did you say told you we were penniless?" she interrupted.

"Mr. Frost, of course."

Jocelyn laughed in a relieved way.

"You almost frightened me," she said. "Those tragedy-queen airs don't suit you, Hope. Please don't adopt the style, for it makes you forbidding. Mr. Frost told you all this? Then we can go on as we have always done; we need not believe a word of it. We are only poor in the kind of comfortable way we have always been poor. Mr. Frost has croaked as long as I can remember."

"It is true this time," said Hope. "It killed mother, and it will kill me too, if you don't believe it, Jocelyn."

Jocelyn stroked her sister's smooth cheek.

"Poor old worry!" she said. "Why, she will fret herself into an old woman if this kind of thing goes on. Frankly, however, Hope, whether your news is true or false, I am not strong enough to be teased about it to-day. Let us put it off for a week at least, and be as comfortable as we can be without poor mother.'

"'Who did you say told you we were penniless?'"

Jocelyn's eyes brimmed with tears; Hope's grew wide and bright. She poked up the fire, and sat down with a resigned expression.

"That is right, darling pet. Now I 'm going to ring the bell; Jane shall bring our tea up here. I feel better to-day, Hope; as if a kind of awful black cloud was lifted. It is not right to grieve without resignation, is it, Hope? I feel much more resigned to-day.—Is that you, Jane? Please bring our tea up here; and let us have nice thick cream, please, and tea-cakes. That will do; we 'll have tea as soon as you can get it for us, Jane. Oh yes, thanks, I 'm much better."

Jane withdrew, and Jocelyn almost laughed as she turned to Hope.

"Well, Gravity," she said, pinching her sister's ear, "aren't you glad to have your poor old Jocelyn reviving a bit? I am quite sure, Hope—quite absolutely certain—that if I had felt poor mother's death even the hundredth fraction of an inch more than I did, it would have killed me. It 's a dreadful misfortune to have such a sensitive nature. Dr. Marvel said he never saw anyone so sensitive. He was talking about you, and he said you were made of quite different mettle. Well, poor Hope, you take it out of yourself in other ways. Now let me tell you what I did this morning; you must not think that I am quite useless. I felt better; and I said to myself, I 'll do something to help that poor fussy darling down-stairs. So I wrote a long letter to Mme. de Pompadour—she has got our measures, you know—and I gave her a complete list of mourning to get for us both. Of course it pained me, Hope—yes, of course it pained me awfully; but I said to myself that you should not be worried about everything, and I did it; I wrote the letter. Good gracious, child, what an unpleasant habit you have of staring!"

"Is the letter posted?" asked Hope.

"Posted? Rather. Jane was going out, and I gave it her. That letter is almost in Mme. de Pompadour's hands by now. Poor little Hope! Why, you are quite trembling, darling. Yes, I knew this would be too much for you. I knew you did feel things, although you have scarcely ever cried, and you have kept up so; but I knew you missed mother, and I said you should not be pained. I ordered just the same for us both, Hope. Everything of the very best, and lots of crape. I ordered evening dresses, too, cut just prettily round the neck, and elbow-sleeves. We are sure to be asked to go on some visits, and we must have something. Poor little Hope! why, your hands are like ice. I think it has rather done me good to exert myself; so you need not fret for me, Hope. There comes Jane with the tea.—You posted that letter for me, didn't you, Jane?"

"Yes, miss.—Miss Hope, you don't look at all well, my dear."

"Give Jocelyn her tea, please, Jane," said Hope, in a stifled voice.

And she ran out of the room. There were burning spots on each of her cheeks. She rushed to the davenport in the drawing-room, took out a telegram form, and filled it in quickly:—

"Miss Hope Karron begs Madame de Pompadour not to execute Miss Jocelyn Karron's order. Letter will follow."

She had not shown herself in the village street since her mother's death; but this was no time to stand on ceremony, and she did not dare to trust her precious telegram to any other hands. She put on her hat, veil, and jacket, and went out.

It was growing dusk, and there was a slight sprinkling of snow when Hope reached the post-office. She sent off her message, and with a relieved heart hastened home. As she reached the little gate which led to Oakdene, Cecil Grey came up suddenly and spoke to her.

"You don't mind, do you, Hope?" he said. "I have been wanting to see you so often. You don't think that I am intruding, do you, Hope?"

"Of course not, Cecil. I am glad to see you again."

Hope held out her hand. The young man wrung it warmly.

"I know it 's very soon," he said, "but I didn't want to go away without. How is Jocelyn, Hope? Is there any chance, any chance at all, of her seeing me?"

"Not at present, Cecil; she is only lying on the sofa in her room to-day, but she is better, and I will give her your message. I will say that you called to say good-bye."

"But that isn't my message. I—if there is no chance of my seeing her—I will send her a message. You will take it for me, won't you, Hope?"

"Yes," said Hope. "Well?"

She was standing on her own doorstep, and raising her crape veil she looked full up at the tall young man by her side.

"Yes, Cecil, what is your message?" she continued.

She was feeling cold and chilly now, and longing to get into the house.

"Good gracious, I can't tell it to you here," said Grey. "May I come in? I won't keep you long. It is not really intruding, for we are old friends."

"Of course we are, Cecil," said Hope, her face brightening. "I didn't know you wanted to come in. I 'd have asked you, but it never occurred to me that you could want to, for the house is very gloomy now."

She rang the bell as she spoke, and Jane opened the door.

"Please, Jane, light the gas in the dining-room. We are not using the drawing-room just now, Cecil. Will you come in here?"

In the old times that had so quickly passed away, there never was a brighter-looking house than Oakdene. Candles in profusion, coloured lamps on every pedestal, crackling merry fires in every grate; and warm curtains and soft mats, and brightly dressed girls with laughing voices, and the no less bright and fascinating mistress of the house—all combined to make the young men, and the girls too, who lived at Downton, regard Oakdene, even in winter-time, as a sort of fairy palace.

Cecil Grey had always looked upon it in this light. As he entered the dark hall now, he was conscious of a sort of chill. The coloured lamps were nowhere to be seen; there was no reflection of cheerful firelight.

One dull gas-lamp only made the gloom of the wide square hall more visible. The bright girlish figures no longer flitted about; there was no gay laughter. Only one grave young voice asked him to come into a cold, half-warmed room, where the fire was nearly out, and the window curtains had not even been drawn. The young figure in its heavy black seemed like a ghost of the former brightness. Hope threw off her hat, when Grey came up to her.

"Thank you, Jane," she said, as the servant withdrew, having shut away the cold outside world. "Now, Cecil, your message. Cecil, you don't look well."

"I'm awfully worried, Hope. I said at last I'd come down and see you, and take my fate in my hand. The old people are put out, but they'll get over it. I told them what I was going to do. It isn't that they don't care, but there are always mortgages and things about a big place like ours, and fathers and mothers have such fads about rich wives clearing them off. You understand, don't you, Hope? I always said you were such an understandable sort of a girl."

"Rich wives, and your father and mother—and your fate in your hand—and mortgages—and you looking as white as a sheet! No, I don't understand. Honestly, I don't understand a bit what you mean, Cecil."

"Answer me one question first," said Cecil. "Is it true that you—you and Jocelyn—are poor?"

"Yes, that is quite true."

"Then here is my message in a nutshell. I love Jocelyn with my whole heart—my father and mother are rich—I am the eldest son—I have plenty of money now—I shall have more some day—I want Jocelyn to be my wife. I can give her comforts—I can give her about everything she can want—and—and—you know it, Hope—you must have always known it—there never was anyone in all the wide world like Jocelyn to me."

THE MANIFESTATIONS OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

V.—HIS MANIFESTATION TO HIS PEOPLE.

"Beloved! now are we the sons of God: and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."—1 JOHN iii. 2.

BOTH St. Paul and St. John dwell largely upon the "sonship" of believers, but they approach the subject from different points of view. To the mind of the former of these two apostles, this sonship assumes the appearance of a position of privilege. A boy running wild in the streets—untaught and uncared for, and in danger of utter destruction, is adopted into a benevolent and wealthy family. He has had no reason to expect such an advancement: nor has there been anything in his conduct or character to render him deserving of it. But the thing is done! Lifted up out of his degradation, removed from the perilous associations of the life he has hitherto led, the lad is introduced into circumstances most favourable to his moral and spiritual development, and everybody would regard him as seriously culpable if he did not avail himself of the opportunities placed within his reach. Here you have the Christian disciple according to St. Paul. He has been brought—through no merit of his own, but simply through grace—into the family of God; he has had bestowed upon him the position and all the advantages of sonship, and what he has to do is to obtain the Divine help, pledged to him (if he will honestly seek for it), and walk worthily of the vocation wherewith he has been called.

The other apostle pushes the matter a step further, and opens up what perhaps we may venture to call a profounder view of the subject. Looking beyond the question of privilege, he speaks of the disciple as deriving his spiritual existence from the Great Being into whose family he has been introduced. The man, according to the apostle, is born of God. A life which has made him a child of God, has been communicated to him from above, and it is by virtue of this life that he is in sympathy with all that is Divine, and out of sympathy with the maxims and feelings of the world at large.

You will see at once what a lofty idea of Christian discipleship the apostle St. John presents to us. It is much to be the saint of God: it is more to be the friend of God: we count it a higher blessing still to be the son of God by adoption: but how great must be the dignity, how advanced the position of him of whom it may be said, that by being born again of the Spirit, he has actually been made a partaker of the Divine nature!

"Beloved! now are we the sons of God." This is the starting-point. St. John does not tell us that we are to be or to become the sons of God at some future time. He affirms that we are such now. Whatever the blessing may be, we have it in present possession, provided, of course, that we be Christians in the true sense of the word—consecrated to God—born of the Spirit—members of the mystical body of Christ the Lord. This, I say, is the starting-point; and when we have reached it there emerge to the view three thoughts which I propose to consider with you to-night. First, that there is something difficult to comprehend about the present spiritual position of the believer. It is seen, as it were, through a mist. In the next place, that this difficulty will be removed. The mist will melt away, and all be made plain when Christ appears. And lastly, that if we are really looking forward to the clearing up or manifestation, which is coming, the effect of the expectation will be seen in the conduct of our daily lives. We shall purify ourselves even as He is pure.

I. As to the first of the three thoughts, it is plain enough that the true disciple of Christ is misunderstood, and must be misunderstood by the world at large; and just because the world cannot possibly put itself at his point of view. St. Paul tells us that the spiritual man judgeth all things: whilst the natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God. If you, being outside in a street, in a broad glare of sunshine, look into a room, in the window of which is a semi-transparent wire-gauze blind, you will have the very remotest and vaguest and faintest idea of the furniture of the room, and of what is going on in it, whereas those who are inside will be perfectly well able to note every movement of your body, and every expression of your face, and nothing will be hidden from them. They will judge you: but you will not be in a position to judge them. In some such way the Christian disciple is more or less of a puzzle to those who, not being born again of the Spirit, do not really belong to the family of God. Sometimes they will question his motives, and set him down as hypocritical, or fanatical, or as seeking his own advantage under pretence of regard for the glory of God. But the more kindly and generous portion of them—and these will probably constitute the majority—will content themselves with expressing surprise, or, it may be, amusement, at his devotion to Christ; at his deep regard for the Word of God; at his thirst for religious knowledge, and his value of the means of grace; at his dissatisfaction with himself, and his aiming at a higher and higher standard of purity and holiness; in fact, at all the experiences—the fluctuations and vicissitudes, the misgiving and perplexities, the joys and the raptures—of a spiritual life. And the reason of this is plain enough. You must sympathise with a man in order to be able to understand him. If you are out of sympathy with him, he will be an enigma, perhaps even "foolishness" to you. "The world," says St. John, "knoweth us not, because it knew Him not."

But there is more than this to be said. The disciple himself—to put the opinion of the world aside—the disciple himself can only very dimly and imperfectly apprehend the future which lies before him. Partly because he is engaged in the tug and strain of a spiritual conflict. You may have your misgivings sometimes as to how the battle is going on with you. You may almost fear that you are being worsted, and that you will have to give way at last. And knowing what you do about the plague of your own heart—though you do believe that the Lord, in His mercy, has healed you—yet, when men express a doubt about the reality of your faith, and the sincerity of your religion, you may at times be inclined to suspect that their judgment is correct, and that your estimate of yourself has all along been in error. But though the confusion may arise—in part—from the fact of your being placed in the thick of a spiritual struggle, it may be attributed still more to the difficulty of realising the things of the eternal world: a difficulty for experiencing which we are surely not altogether to blame. You will remember the words of St. Paul (words which, by the way, he quotes from the prophet Isaiah), "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." Are we to infer from this statement that it is impossible for us to form even a conception of the future state? that the glory of it is completely hidden from our eyes? Nay: not so! For the apostle goes on to assure us "that God has revealed them unto us by His Spirit." If, then, God has "revealed" them to us, we can—at all events, to a certain extent—understand what the future will be. We have some glimpses of it, though not a distinct view. We have intimations, surmises, presentiments; even though there be nothing more. The case seems to stand thus. The future—the eternal life—what will it be? It will be no new thing, but the expression and development of the spiritual life of which we are in possession at the present moment. In the next world we shall not be anything essentially different from what we are now. We shall be our present selves, but more completely, in a higher degree. And yet what the completion, what the fulfilment, what the development will be, we can only imperfectly guess, such is the limitation of our faculties. We are not expected to form just now a distinct and accurate conception of the subject at all.

II. I pass on to our second topic. There will be a time when all difficulties and confusions shall be removed, and that time is the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. That coming of Jesus Christ is a moment of manifestation. What is your idea of the Judgment and the Judgment-seat? When you hear the words, do you not picture to yourselves the vast assemblage of all the countless myriads of the human race? The masses of glorious angels—assessors of the judgment—rising rank above rank in magnificent array, and lining the sky? The Great White Throne itself—the Throne white in its dazzling brightness, like the core of fire in the heart of a furnace—and on the Throne, the God-man—the Judge—from whose face the earth and the heaven flee away, and there is no place found for them; and then the books—in which the deeds of man are recorded—and the opening of the books, and the disclosure of the secret entries, and the balancing of the accounts, and the terrible hush of suspense and the gradual dismissal of the members of that boundless multitude to the one side or to the other—to the right hand or to the left—to the realms of happiness or to the dungeons of dark and inevitable despair. Well, the images are Scriptural, and are intended, of course, not only to strike the mind, but also to convey important truths.

But may not the underlying thoughts which the imagery is intended to express, be something of this kind—that the Day of Judgment is simply a day of manifestation, in which every one of us, every human being, is seen to be what he really is? For my part, I am inclined to think this view a correct one. At present we are muffled up in various disguises. More or less, we are hidden from each other, and perhaps from ourselves. The mean spirit is sometimes clothed in dignity, and struts and fumes on the stage of life; and men bow down before its altar and chant its praises; whilst solid worth, not unfrequently, is clothed in rags, and is treated with contumely. Sometimes, too, the true Christian is misunderstood; and the man of loud profession, of unctuous phraseology, or of hard and rigid formalism, works his way to the front, and poses and passes as a saint. But in the keen, searching blaze of the Judgment-seat, all disguises will drop off, and the very essence of the soul will start out before the eye of the Judge. Is not this, then, what is meant by being manifested before the Judgment-seat of Christ—that our characters will be displayed, and that we shall take our place at our real essential value in the universe of God? or to express it more briefly, that angels and men, yea, and we ourselves also, perhaps, for the first time shall know what we really are.

If so, I must confess I see no need for long processes, and for balancing of accounts. Are you a Christian indeed? Is the life of Christ in you? Are you living for Him, and by Him? and striving to follow in the footsteps of His example? Well, your motives may be misunderstood, your character maligned, your endeavours ridiculed; yea, you yourself may be a poor feeble creature, and no such grand specimen of a Christian after all. But if your faith be true, and your Christianity real, depend upon it, a time is coming when the confusions and the mists that now gather round you shall have passed away, and the life of the spirit that is in you will display itself in its beauty and grandeur to all that are assembled together to behold. Such seems to be, in part, the meaning of the apostle in the text.

But we must go a little further with him. "When Christ," he says, "is manifested," i.e., in His resurrection-glory, "we shall see Him as He is." It is possible to see Christ and yet not to see Him "as He is." There are few, I suppose, in Christendom, who do not form any idea of Christ; but in some cases it is unhappily a mistaken one. To some persons He is a mere man. To others a great teacher and nothing more. To others, again, a hard and exacting taskmaster. To others, a severe and formidable judge, to be dreaded and not loved. And perhaps to others He is a mere pretender, assuming an attitude towards the human race to which He is not entitled, and making promises which He is in nowise competent to fulfil. To see Christ in this way is to see Him to no purpose; indeed, I suppose I ought to say it is to gaze upon Him to the damage and detriment of our souls, because under such circumstances, instead of being attracted towards Him, we are in very great danger of being repelled from Him. But to see Christ as He is, is to contemplate Him with sympathy and love. We have been taught by the Spirit to understand Him—to understand Him, if I may use a homely phrase, "all round," to understand His person, His character, His work. At least we have been placed in a right position for understanding Him. We have some true knowledge already, and the knowledge is growing. We have been led, by the Divine Spirit, into an acceptance of Christ in His entirety—in all the various offices which He fulfils to His Church. We have put ourselves into His hands, and are submitting our wills to His holy and righteous will, drawing strength and blessing out of His fulness, living by His life. Now, He becomes to us an object of contemplation. Where do we behold Him? In the Holy Word especially. And this contemplation, being one, as I just said, of sympathy and love, has the effect of bringing us into closer and closer resemblance to Him, of gradually stamping His likeness upon our souls. "We are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even by the Spirit of the Lord."

This I suppose to be seeing Christ as He is, so far as this present world is concerned. And they who are thus accustomed to see Christ, are ready to gaze upon Him with unspeakable joy when He shall come again to earth. We must have contracted, whilst here below, a likeness to Him (a spiritual likeness, of course), in order to be able to confront the beams of the risen Sun of Righteousness, in the plenitude and blaze of His resurrection-glory. Take this idea with you. And take this also. Upon the people of Christ, thus prepared for seeing Him, the vision of His glory will produce the most amazing effect. What it will be I must not presume to say. For, indeed, I know nothing about it. I had better quote without comment the words of Scripture: "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, in the Kingdom of their Father." "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory." "Christ shall change our vile body (the body of our humiliation), that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able to subdue all things unto Himself." Such statements point to some transcendently glorious transformation, which shall pass over the bodies and souls of believers, in the day of the appearing of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

III. Our last point remains yet untouched. I do not wish to put it aside altogether, and yet, with so little space remaining at my disposal, I dare not attempt to discuss it. An illustration somewhat resembling that with which I started, must serve me to place this part of our subject rapidly, but I fear not very perfectly, before you.

A young prince, stolen away in childhood from his father's palace, and brought up amidst unworthy and degrading surroundings, has been recovered and brought back again. By degrees, he comes to understand his position—he did not quite understand it at first—and he is full of gratitude when he contrasts what he is now with what he was some months or years ago. Yet he has difficulties. The habits of years of depraved life are not easily shaken off. But he contends manfully against the difficulties, and is climbing up slowly, but surely, to a fitness for the position in which he has been so happily reinstated. Now, two distinct considerations will influence the young man. First, he will desire to act worthily of his present princely state; and then, because he knows he is to inherit, at some time or other, his father's sceptre, and because wide dominions and large populations will then be placed under his sway, he will wish to qualify himself for the task and responsibility of ruling, whenever he shall be called upon to ascend the throne.

You see the application. We who are Christians have a present position to maintain. Christ says to each of us, "Be what I have made you! I have placed you where you are. I have made you children of God. Be children of God!" And then, there is the future to look forward to—the future Kingdom—the future glory, upon which we shall have one day to enter with Christ. And what is the result of our expectation of these things, if we really entertain the expectation? Let St. John tell us: "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

THE DREAMS OF DR. FAYDING.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," "THE VANISHING OPAL," "THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT," ETC. ETC.

WEARIED and worn with London life, Charles Domville was glad when the early autumn came, and with it the time of his release for a while from what had become the weariness of work.

He was in early middle life, full of ambition, full of conscious capacity—the eagerness, the enthusiasm of youth were still with him—the world seemed still to have much to give, and he was eager to get.

All his thoughts were associated with life—its energies, its successes, its gains, everything good was to be found in them—weaknesses, failures, losses, they all savoured of a region of death. What was to be expected from them?

It was a wonder now that the very need he felt of rest for both mind and body, at the time of which I write, did not suggest to him something about pauses, calm, repose, perhaps death itself; but I suppose the rush of life without, and within too, was overmuch for what was restful, for what seemed to have nothing in it. Such thoughts might do well for the river-side, but he was on the flood of the river itself—the flood that could carry great timber-trees down with it to the sea, that could scoop out great landslips from the river's bank, that could cover the meadow, and drown the wild flower, and that flowed in the channel where but little water trickles now. But the little can reflect the sun, and the little can make a sweet soft murmuring as it ripples onward on its peaceful way to the great ocean—the great deep which lies before us all.

Early middle age, and older middle age—he has passed beyond them both, and is at peace; and the way by which he has come to peace is by walking with Dr. Fayding in his churchyard.

Now, good reader, understand at the outset that I am not talking only of spiritual peace—the "peace of God, which passeth all understanding"—the peace of forgiven sin, which can come only by the bloodshedding of Jesus Christ—I am thinking of the "mind-calm," the "heart-calm" also, which come by the acceptance of what is our lot, of the pain, the sorrow, the bereavements, and the losses of life—by the breaking of the power of aught of earth to have mastery in our heart, or memory, or thought; so as to torment us with their stings, and make what we have of life the worst of all estates—a living death.

Charles Domville wandered about hither and thither, from one watering-place to another, until at last, wearied out with brass bands, and piers, and esplanades, and young ladies with no meaning—and some, he was bound to say, with a good deal of meaning—he determined to go off to some place where he should see as little of his fellow-creatures—at least, of such as he was used to—as possible.

And thus it was that he found himself at Daysford, a place of which the world knew but little, and which, in its own way, returned the compliment, by knowing little of the world.

The little village of Daysford lay on the side of a sunny hill; I dare say it might have contained some three hundred folk; but it did not boast of any inhabitants of much social account: the chief people were the parson—Dr. Fayding—and next to him the churchwardens, who towered above their fellows in virtue of their office, and of that alone. Their glory stuck to them very fairly during the week, but on Sunday they shone; for, far removed as Daysford was from the world, it had a churchwardens' pew; and from time immemorial that pew had in front of it two black rods gilt at the top; and the ordinary bucolic mind could not make any separation between the men and the rods; and so it gilt-tipped, if I might so speak, the officials all the week through; and they were looked upon with becoming fear by little boys, and with respect by all well-principled and right-minded men.

After Charles Domville had established himself in tolerable comfort in the "Three Owls," the only place in which he could find a couple of decent rooms; he betook himself for a stroll, and soon found himself in the churchyard. It was separated only by a slight hedge from the garden of the inn, and passing through a little turnstile, there he was.

At first he thought he had the place to himself; but presently he came upon an old man putting a few late flowers upon a little grave, and as he thought he would ask a question or two about the place, he sauntered up to him.

This man was Joseph Drailes, the sexton, and he was nothing loth to have a chat with a stranger.

"Coming close up to him, and almost whispering in his ear."

"You be a stranger hereabouts," said the old man; "and what d'ye think of the place? Ye haven't seen much of it yet, no doubt. Folk say there ain't much to be seen about; but whatever there be, you won't have seen everything until you've seen our parson—aye, and I might a'most say our churchwardens too. You'll see their gilt sticks standing right up out of their seat if you wait till Sunday: or I'll show them to you now, if you like—the keys ain't three minutes away. But the parson! he's the principal person to see here. All Daysford says he's only fit to be put down in a book; and he'll be put in one some day or other, I make no doubt. If you walk much about here, you'll be sure to meet him; he often walks about in this churchyard. I've seen him from my window going up and down in the moonlight of a summer's night——"

"And not afraid of ghosts?"

"Ghosts! Bless you, the gentleman has a churchyard in his own house, in the very room he lives in—gravestones and all complete; and he's ower much to do with graves to make him afraid of ghosts. If he ain't afraid of them in his own house, he ain't likely to be afraid of them out of it."

"A graveyard in his own house!—that's out of the common, at any rate," thought Mr. Domville; so he asked the old man what he meant.

"I'll tell you," said the sexton. "I see by your dress and your watch-chain you're a gentleman; and if you'll give me your word, and your hand on it, that you won't let out, if you meet him, that I told you anything about it, I'll tell you what I know."

The stranger pulled out his watch, which was a handsome gold one, with arms and crest enamelled on it, to confirm the sexton's belief in his gentility; and he gave him his hand as he required. Then coming close up to him, and almost whispering in his ear, the old man said, "What I knows is from Mrs. Dillwort. Mrs. Dillwort is first cousin to Mrs. Kingston's half-sister as keeps the 'Three Owls;' and she 's been with the rector, Dr. Fayding, nobody knows how many years. Mrs. Dillwort's husband lies buried in the third row from this; and that 's how she comes to be so friendly with me.

"Well, the vicar once went away for an entire week; nobody ever knew where he went, though everyone tried to find out: even Mrs. Dillwort doesn't know to this day. She says she hopes he won't die without making a clean breast of it; but he hasn't much on his mind, in my opinion, who sees him a'most every day; if he had, he wouldn't be as peaceful as he is.

"Well, when he were off a day or two, Mrs. Dillwort comes to my cottage yonder, and says, 'Mr. Drailes, I 'm uncommon low over at the vicarage; and if you don't mind dropping in, and Mrs. Drailes too, I 'll be glad.'

"When the time came, Mrs. Drailes had to go to her daughter two mile off, whose child was ill, and I went off by myself to Mrs. Dillwort's. Said she, after tea, 'Would you like, Mr. Drailes, to see the curiosities as come from the South Sea, where the vicar has a brother? they 're kept in the study, where the Doctor lives."

"I thought afterwards Mrs. Dillwort ought not to have taken me into that room, and I ought not to have gone into it; for I might have remembered that the Doctor, all the time I knew him, had never seen me there, but had always come to me in the hall or the dining-room. However, that 's neither here nor there, now; into the room I went, and looked at all the queer things on the walls; and at a lot of great books, with writing, or printing, or whatever it was, here, and there, and everywhere —only making out, what everybody said, that the Doctor was a very learned man.

"But the greatest curiosity in the room was in a deep window, near which our parson's writing-table was. There was a little brass rod, with green curtains on it; and what do you think was behind it? Why, the very thing I told you of just now. You wouldn't believe it, I dare say; but so it was, there was the very churchyard, to the bottom of which I never could get. And, sexton as I am, I 'm bound to say, I never saw a little churchyard kept neater in my life. There were the headstones, and something written on them, a deal too small for my eyes to see—and for Mrs. Dillwort's too. And there was a little church there too; 't was for all the world like a real church—only made of cork; 't was a great curiosity in its way, and the ivy all growing up it. I don't know what the make-believe was made of; but it was just as if it were creeping up, and would want trimming some day.

"Said I to Mrs. Dillwort, 'I is worth coming to tea with you to see this, to say nothing of the pleasure of your company;' at which, I can tell you, Mrs. Dillwort looked pleased, and no mistake; and this made her talk a bit, and tell me what she knew about this affair, which seemed a very queer one to me.

"'I never heard exactly what this was,' said Mrs. Dillwort; 'I can only tell you my belief—and my belief is that this is the church where master was before he came here, and that he's had its likeness taken when he left, gravestones and all. There's only one thing that I can't make out: all that's on the tombstones is in some strange language; so, for the life of me, I can't tell who 's supposed to be buried in those graves.

"'One day the vicar left lying about a glass of his that makes things look big; and I made bold to take a turn out of it, to see who was buried in those graves; but, bless you, I was none the wiser, and I never shall be. It used to trouble me at one time, for I didn't like secrets lying about the house here and there; one never knows the awkward ways they have of coming out into something dreadful; but said I to myself, "If there is any secret, it rests with the vicar; and it couldn't be with anyone better; for he's a good man; and he wouldn't let anything bad stay in the place."'

"'Graveyards is all very well in their proper place,' said I to Mrs. Dillwort; 'and as man is in this world now, we couldn't do without them. Folk like myself would miss them very much; but "everything in its season,"' said I, 'and everything in its place; and I don't think the house is just the place for all these graves. You never hear any strange noises about in the night, now, do you, Mrs. Dillwort? and you don't ever see anything out of the common, do you? You've never seen anyone walking, or anything white, or heerd anything out of the common—say, when the clock strikes twelve, or from that to daylight in the morning? There may be strange histories in those unknown tongues; and though I'll answer for all being fair and square in my churchyard, and no disorderly doings of any kind, I can't tell what might be going on in a place like this; it's out of my line. Unknown tongues is dangerous things; and what may come out of them at any moment, who can tell? If I saw a headstone coming to our churchyard with one on it, I'd beg the vicar not to allow it to be put up. There might be an explosion, or a something—I can't tell what; and "something" may mean anything, and anything may go as far as an earthquake, for all you know—and an earthquake is the very last thing I should wish to see.'

"'Well, we must leave it as it is,' said Mrs. Dillwort; 'it 's been here a long time, and no harm has come of it; and if it were no good, I 'm sure the vicar wouldn't have it here—and where it is, too—quite close to his writing-table, so that it might be said to be always under his eye.'

"'Yes, we 'll leave it,' said I. 'Some day everything will be explained, and this will be amongst the lot; in the meantime, we may hope that as no harm has come of it up to the present, so none will in time to come. What will become of it when the vicar dies?—that will be the question. But we may leave that to those who come after him. He must look after his own graves, and I'll look after mine.'"

As you may well imagine, good reader, Mr. Domville's curiosity was highly excited by this strange story of the churchyard in the parson's house. The inscriptions in strange tongues—the evident value which the good man, and apparently the learned man, attached to what seemed to be a toy—it was something quite out of the common; and there was a something in it; that he felt quite sure of. And here, amongst these rustics, was something of interest—something worth coming to the bottom of; for that it had a bottom, he felt perfectly sure.

But how could he get at the parson, and how could he intrude into what, he felt sure, was a mystery—perhaps of his faith, perhaps of his family, perhaps of his life?

Circumstances were in Charles Domville's favour; for, the sexton had hardly done speaking, when he saw an old gentleman coming slowly along the walk, which led directly to the grave on which the old man had been putting the few late summer flowers.

"Here he is himself," said Mr. Drailes in almost a whisper — "here's the vicar;" and presently the owner of the private churchyard came up to them. He had a rose in his hand, and he had come to lay it on the little grave on which the sexton was bestowing his care.

I suppose the vicar had been tall in his early life, but he was now bent—the bent bow for the strong man to shoot with, the bent back when the strong man can shoot no more. There are graceful bendings of salutation; there are painful bendings of burden-bearing, and of burdens borne. The bendings of salutation rise up again; the bendings of burden-bearing—they seldom rise up more!

The old gentleman wore upon his body the usual habiliments of a clergyman; he wore upon his countenance a calm, a peace, a restfulness unusual: there was rest for one's spirit in looking into his face. The brawling stream of life, rushing between boulders, and leaping over stones, to which Charles Domville was accustomed, seemed in him to flow into a quiet pool, where a hush came over all; and where, in perfect reflection, there was an earthly home for the light of the faintest, farthest glimmering star. There are some upon whom, even while on earth, Heaven traces the first outlines of its eternal, its unbroken peace.

"He was a troubled man; the tears were in his eyes."—p. 538.

A thought flashed across the visitor's mind: "Had this peaceful-looking face ever been in London? and if so, then how long ago? Had it ever looked on the whirl, and moil, and trouble of daily life? Had it seen what man is to his fellow-man, and what man does to his fellow-man—the pushing, the crushing, the throat-seizing, the drivings-out into the middle of the road, the crushings-up against the wall—which make up so much of man's days, and weeks, and years? Were the worst shadows it knew, those which floated over the neighbouring hills? the worst storms, those which flooded the streams, and bent the trees, and which convulsed nature, not man? Had the old divine ever known, ever felt, any of those things? and had he drunk some water of Lethe, which had drowned the memory of them all, flooding his brain and flooding his heart, so that he was no longer a prey either to memory or feeling?" "And," said Mr. Domville, "shall I ever be like him? I have come from the hot haste of life; I must soon return to it again. Will a time come—it may be, in the long future—when I, too, shall feel whatever this good man felt; or, to put it more fully, also not feel what he does not feel?" Often had he heard ministers end their sermons with the words, "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God, and of His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord." When this old man said these words, did he know more, did he mean more, did he wish more, out of his own inner heart, and experience, and realisations, than many other parsons? All these thoughts came rushing through the younger man's mind in almost less time than I take in writing them—whether they would be ever more than speculations he could not tell. He had no excuse for making the old gentleman's acquaintance; so he just made a slight salutation, and turned away.

Charles Domville had not, however, proceeded far, before he was overtaken by the old clergyman. He had sat down on a great square tombstone when the doctor came up to him, for he was on the direct path to the vicarage.

"You are a stranger here, sir," said the old gentleman. "We don't see many in these parts from the outer world. I hope you are comfortably lodged."

"Thank you, sir," said Domville; "I have all that I require; my wants are not very many."

"That is well," said the vicar; "the fewer our wants, the greater our chance of happiness, so far as the world's things go; though we might come to wanting nothing, and yet not be happy even then. I have my own doubts as to Diogenes being altogether happy in his tub. We must look for happiness not only in independence of things, but in attainment of that which is above things—in deaths and lives, in graves and resurrections, in the buryings of the past and in the resurrections of the future. See, all around us here are graves—the buryings of death, death put out of sight; death's work is done, life's struggles are over, all around this place is peace.

"I must introduce myself," said the old gentleman; "my name is Fayding: I am the vicar of this parish." The vicar paused, evidently that the stranger should do as he had done, and introduce himself, which he accordingly immediately proceeded to do.

"Permit me, sir, in turn to introduce myself. My name is Domville — Charles Domville, of Clement's Inn—a tired-out barrister, roaming about for a little change and rest; and doomed soon to go back to worry and turmoil again."

"Domville," said the vicar thoughtfully to himself; "and Charles Domville: there was a man of that name at Oxford in my day, but that was long ago; the name now is amongst the moulderings of the dead. Time was, when that name would have troubled me sore; but now, it has gone down into the place of peace.—You stay a few days here, sir?" said the vicar; "then I shall have the pleasure of calling upon you; and you have only to command me if I can do anything for you while you stay."

The vicar turned his steps homeward. The journey was from one churchyard to another. That evening the good man sat in his study, and his meditations were amongst the tombs. His humble supper finished, and Mrs. Dillwort being buried up to her nose in her blankets, the vicar drew back the green silk curtain, which hid the little recess, and looked intently at one corner of the little graveyard. He was a troubled man; the tears were in his eyes, and his hand trembled as he took up the big magnifier, with which he was wont to read the inscriptions on the tombs, when he desired so to do. Not that that was often, for he knew them by heart; but there were times when he read what was written on tomb and headstone, and meditated much thereon.

This agitation was very unusual with the vicar. It was now midnight: the time when ghosts begin to think of taking such exercise as their health requires, when they come forth to transact such business as they have to do; and there must be ghosts, or something of the kind, to agitate the vicar's generally untroubled calm. Yes, there were two ghosts abroad; there were two folk about, who ought to have been in their graves, according to the inscription on a tomb. They should have been there—why, then, should they be troubling this calm and peaceful man?

The vicar threw the light of his lamp full on the corner of the little churchyard where this tomb had place, and, taking up the glass, read the inscription on it. The inscription was in Greek characters, and, being translated, was simply this—

HERE LIES CHARLES DOMVILLE:
ALSO
DOROTHY HIS WIFE.

The old man said the Greek words aloud many times; he paused between each, as though he would rivet it in his mind. "Read," he said to himself; "read, Jonathan Fayding; read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest; read and believe; read and act as though you believed; be not like Saul of old, to trouble the dead, and call them up again. Where they have lain for many years, there let them lie still; the furrows which they ploughed in your face have been filled up long ago: why rip them up again? What seed hast thou, Jonathan Fayding, to sow in those furrows if they be opened once more? and when it sprouts, and shoots, and blossoms, and ears, and ripens, what sheaves will it give for the garner of your heart? Oh, Jonathan Fayding, once your garners were full of such a crop as this—long since they have been swept clean—fill them not again! There are garners which it were well, Jonathan, to have full, and there are garners which it were well to have empty. The day that you said, 'Earth to earth, and ashes to ashes, and dust to dust,' at this grave's side, you did not say—as how could you have said?—'in sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection.' This grave covers death for ever: if it were given to you to have any grave opened in this churchyard, and to be able to say to its dead, 'Come forth,' this assuredly would not be the one."

It must have been between two and three in the morning, when the old man got up from his knees. He needed to pray long and hard, that night; but when he arose, the old peace was upon his face, his hand was steady, neither would he trouble the dead in their graves, nor would he allow their ghosts to trouble him. The vicar of Daysford was himself again, the man upon whose face was written the Past—was written "Peace." To make a "Past" is one great secret for making "Peace."

Yes! reader, whether you care for such things, or not, whether you think that "preaching" should have no place here or not, be sure of this; the Author of all peace Himself, He who knows the preciousness, the power of peace, He bound it with the past; there can be no peace where there is present sin, and our sins and our iniquities will He remember no more. He casts them behind His back. He casts them into the depths of the sea. He has washed them out with the most precious blood of His dear Son Jesus Christ; that blood belongs to every one that believes; that is beyond all tales, and that peace cometh out of death.

The vicar of Daysford rose up strong from his knees, and went to bed, and slept the sleep of the just; the bed-clothes were almost unruffled when he rose in the morning; he had not tossed to and fro, nor had he been affrighted with any visions of the night. He had dreamed, it is true; but the dreams must have been unvexing to the spirit; for when he came down in the morning, the old peace was on his face; the sun seemed to have risen upon it even as it had upon the earth, warming with a gentle beam the autumn flowers; and brightening the deep pools in the stream which flowed at the churchyard's foot.

Time was, when a dream, such as the vicar dreamt, would have lashed his whole being into madness; and, in all probability, the pillows would have been found at one end of the room, and the bolster at the other; but it is not so now. It has done the old vicar good to tarry in the little churchyard before he went to bed, to read the inscriptions on some of its tombs and headstones, but especially upon one—the one which had on it these few words—

HERE LIES CHARLES DOMVILLE:
ALSO
DOROTHY HIS WIFE.

It was of Dorothy, this Dorothy, the wife of Charles Domville, that the old man dreamt; had he dreamed of Charles Domville too, his dream would very probably have been different from what it was. It was curious that, in that little churchyard of the vicar's, this was the only double inscription. There were several graves there; but their headstones in every case mentioned only one person, with the exception indeed of one stone which had three great names on it; but here, two lay buried out of sight. Why were there not two graves side by side—the one to Charles Domville, and the other to Dorothy Domville?

And why should the old vicar have dreamed only of the one; and that one, the Dorothy aforesaid? And when the vicar dreamed, what was it that he saw in the visions of the night? Just a sunbeam, then a lightning flash, and then a sunbeam again; and this last sunbeam was the same as the first sunbeam; and where he went, it went; and where he tarried, it tarried; and it shone round about him, and through him, and above him, and around him, and encompassed him with its light; just as one can imagine it is in the perfect fellowship of love eternal, as it shall be in the companionship of saints in light. It was all mysterious, all unlike earthly communings of any kind; and it left lingering traces of its radiance upon the old man's face, and more than lingering traces on the heart.

It was a part of Mrs. Dillwort's mission in life to make daily observations on her good old master's face, and to minister with utmost carefulness to his wants. What concerned him concerned her; that is, when she could know anything about it, and knowing, could enter into it. For, as you doubtless know, good reader, there are limits to all our capacities. Some things we can't even know; and some we can't enter into, even if we know that they exist.

Mrs. Dillwort was proud of Dr. Fayding. "Ain't he the heavenliest face in all the country round?"

said she many a time to her neighbours—and especially to Mr. Drailes, the sexton; always throwing up her two hands when she made such utterances, as the most appropriate action. "Ain't heaven shining in it, like the sun in our duck-pond?" exclaimed the good woman, when she ventured on the poetic. And when the educational, and the disciplinary, were strong upon Mrs. Dillwort's soul, she used sometimes to shake an urchin of two or three who was crying and making ugly faces in the act, and say, "Fie upon you! you 'll never be like the vicar, if you begin like this. I suppose the Doctor never cried in all his life—if ever he did, he 'd have spoiled the heavenly face he was sent with into the world." "All these here heavenly faces come slap down from heaven into cradles. You can't make 'em, John Drailes," said Mrs. Dillwort, waxing very energetic with the sexton one day. "Mrs. Drailes has had sixteen babies, and she 'll tell you that the only one as looked at all heavenly died a week after it was born; and if you 're for believing anything different from this, John Drailes, I go out from this house this moment, and never drink a cup of tea in it again."

"Well," said the sexton, "I 'll only tell you what I 've heerd an old man say, when I was quite a young chap: he was a man who had a face for all the world like the vicar's."

"What 's that you say, you wicked man?" cried Mrs. Dillwort, starting up; "you say that again, and I 'm off—I 'm out of that door, or through it, if it 's shut, as sure as my name is Dillwort and your name is Drailes. Like our vicar! and you the sexton too—that makes the matter worse. Ain't there any shame in our part of the country, Mr. Drailes—and if there be, ain't there any in our parish? and if there be, who next to the churchwardens should have it but yourself? Mr. Drailes, you 're a married man, and there 's your wife—I suppose she knows all about you; anyhow, she ought; 't would be much better for married men if their wives knew more about them than they do; and I ask Mrs. Drailes if she knows anything about this old man, and how he looked, and what he said."

It was Mrs. Drailes' interest, culinary and otherwise, to keep in with Mrs. Dillwort; so, not to offend her, she then backed all the responsibility on Drailes. "Let him answer for himself," said Mrs. Drailes; "he 's the one that says he heerd and see'd the man; so he 's the one to speak."

"Speak up, Mr. Drailes," said Mrs. Dillwort to her victim; it was a cat-and-mouse business, and the cat was willing to let the mouse go so far, before she put an end to it altogether.

"Well," said John Drailes, "if you 'll let me say it, this man was smooth-faced—there 's no harm in saying that."

"Maybe his wife ironed it," chimed in Mrs. Dillwort ironically.

"It was my own mother," continued the sexton, "who was talking to him, and she said, 'Master Salem, how is it that you look so peaceful like, when my face, and the faces of most of the folk a'bout, are as if they had been under the plough; and they were forgotten to be harrowed, or rolled, or anything else done to them afterwards. I suppose you 've kept always just exactly as you were when you were born; and you 've had nothing at all to vex you like, as you 've gone through the world.'"

"'Missus,' said he, 'I 've been in trouble like other folk—it may be in more trouble than other folk, but I let trouble do its work on me. It makes all the difference whether you work trouble, or whether you let trouble work you. Trouble is only a tool; no, many tools—every trouble a different tool; and the hand that 's willing to use those tools, and the only hand that knows how to use those tools, is God's. It 's my troubles that have brought me my peace; they 've cut off, and filed away, much which had need to go; and they 've brought, and filled in, much which I never could have had myself; and that 's how there 's peace in my face—because there 's peace in my heart.'"

"Humph," said Mrs. Dillwort, "that might have been all very good for him; but there 's roast and boiled in this world, and there 's hot and cold; and 't isn't because this was the way with your man, that it should be the way with that blessed man we have here. There 's that as comes 'spontaneous'," said the vicar's housekeeper, "and this heavenly countenance has come 'spontaneous' on our vicar. Take my word for it, and, if you don't believe me—now look at a mushroom; how does that come? Ain't the answer 'spontaneous?' and if that isn't enough, look at the mistletoe; how does that come? Ain't the answer to that 'spontaneous' too? D 'ye see that wart?" said Mrs. Dillwort, exhibiting an excrescence about the size of a grain of small shot upon her thumb; "how did that wart get there? The answer is 'spontaneous;' all which shows that things can come in that way; and if you and I, John Drailes, are to hold together in this parish, as I hope we may do for many a day, you 'll believe that the vicar's face is 'spontaneous,' and nothing else. If you 're inclined to hold to your own way of thinking, remember mushrooms, mistletoe, and warts are 'spontaneous.'"

John Drailes' wife looked at him; John himself smelt a long perspective of savoury smells in Mrs. Dillwort's goodnesses yet to come; he knew well that these must be spontaneous on her part; and so, to all outward appearance, at any rate, he fell in with the "spontaneous" now.

Mrs. Dillwort knew not the cause; but she thought this morning she had never seen the vicar's face so full of sweet soft light and peace.

(To be concluded.)

Evening Hymn.

Words by J. Huie.

Music by the Rev. F. Peel, B.Mus., Oxon., Vicar of Heslington, York.

2. Shades of evening, calmly closing,
Fold away all earthly care;
Let my heart, on God reposing,
Find its rest in praise and prayer.

3. Shades of evening, stars revealing
In the peaceful arch of night,
Peaceful o'er my spirit stealing,
Show me Christ, my Star of light.

4. Shades of evening, holier living
Bear me from the heaven above,
Rest in God's own sweet forgiving,
And the gladness of His love.

5. Shades of evening, slowly stilling
All around in rest secure,
Let me rest, and wait fulfilling,
Trusting God, for God is sure.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

(PREACHED BY APPOINTMENT IN A CITY CHURCH.)

"Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas."—PSALM viii. 6, 7, 8.

THERE are times when the minister of the Gospel is called, as I am by special appointment this evening, to discourse on themes apart from the ordinary. There are topics which benevolence, or patriotism, or public utility suggest, which may seem, so far at least, out of place in the pulpit, as demanding or implying a departure from St. Paul's noble motto and vow—"I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." Let us not, however, brethren, cherish the erroneous impression that to such a subject as is now to engage our thoughts there can be imparted no evangelical tone, or that it is incapable of enforcement from evangelical motives. I have made selection of the text because I believe that the cause I plead is in harmony with the sublimest truths of our faith, and may obtain its loftiest arguments and illustration by linking it with these. I might have found many passages more rigorously appropriate to the topic which has been entrusted to me, but I have taken the words of this Psalm, conceiving it the bounden duty of the ambassador of Christ with regard to themes, not perhaps in themselves of highest religious importance, to connect and exalt them where he can, directly or indirectly, with the work and Name of his Great Master.

I need not stop to show that these verses, and, indeed, those of the entire Psalm, apply to the Redeemer. The second chapter of Hebrews is sufficient commentary here. It is a Psalm which speaks of the exaltation of the human nature in the glorified Person of the Mediator. He is described as "crowned with glory and honour, and having all things put under His feet." And sublime truth surely it is that the vast universe of God is designed to redound ultimately to the glory of Jesus. "All things," we read, were created not only "BY Him," but "FOR Him." While in one sense this is true in regard to His original essential Godhead-nature, it is specially as the Christ, the Saviour of our race, that He has thus been enthroned as "King of kings and Lord of lords." Who can attempt to grasp this wealth of empire? Look upwards to the firmament, and, as you hear the stars in their courses telling "nightly to the listening earth the story of their birth," let them tell, too, the story of their end and destiny. Let imagination climb her ascending way through galaxies of suns and planets and systems, and remember that this crowded concave is a vast coronal or diadem for the brow of the Mediator: no mere masses of dumb materialism, either, but doubtless teeming with intelligence and life. Before Him every knee is bending, every tongue is confessing, every lip is adoring; angel and archangel, cherubim and seraphim, veil their faces with their wings before Him; while the white-robed and palm-bearing multitudes of the Church triumphant add the Redemption note peculiarly their own.

But does this exhaust the host of dependent existences who own His sway? No. "One star differs from another star in glory." There are other revenues of praise from other orders and other creatures, which, though inferior in nature, are still part of the great commonwealth. "Crown Him Lord of all!" is the key-note struck by the loftiest worshippers; but it is caught up by every unit in the graduating myriads, down, aye, down to the lowliest. "Thou hast put ALL THINGS under His feet!" Who is to limit these all things? It is a stream flowing from the eternity that is past, and pouring its ever-deepening floods into the ocean. The tiniest rill is there to contribute its part. The archangel in his might, and the little child on its knees, thrones and dominions, and principalities and powers, man, and beast, and worm, all are there, the subjects of His sway, the denizens of His Kingdom.

The argument drawn in connection with our subject from this is: If the lower creation were not too insignificant or worthless to contribute to the glory of Jesus, they cannot be deemed too insignificant for Him to care for, and for us to protect and honour. We know it is said of His saints that "He that toucheth them, toucheth the apple of His eye." In other words, He feels what is done to His people as sensitively as if it had been done to Himself. And, of course, while there is a sense in which, using human language, He must be jealous of them as He is in regard to no other (they being emphatically the fruit of the travail of His soul), yet if all creatures have been entrusted to His sovereignty, and are the subjects of His sway, He must regard any wanton injustice or cruelty inflicted on the meanest and the lowliest as an unwarranted aggression on what the old divines call His "rectorial rights." It may seem to some an unnecessary straining of the subject: that it would be better to rest and vindicate it on principles of ordinary benevolence. It is well, indeed, that we can take up the lower ground too, and, for those who would scorn the appeal to Gospel motive, address ourselves to the claims and sympathies of our common humanity. But I do confess it seems to me that the theme of to-night secures a far more commanding demonstration when we see the lower animals, whose oppression we are called to denounce, placed under the especial care and authority of the Redeemer; that as the living creatures were brought one by one to the first Adam to be named and placed under his protection, so the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, who is to restore in every respect what the other forfeited, has had, among the "all things put under His feet," "all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, and the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea."

Though the members of the lowlier creation are represented in the text as subjected to the rule of Christ, they have been subordinated by Him to the care of man. To man, as high priest of creation, they have been made over at once for his use, and to secure his protection and kindness. In thus consigning them to his custody, this great Lord of Nature has given significant intimation of the treatment He Himself designs them to receive at the hands of their deputed governor. He has manifested on every side a desire for the happiness of His creatures. Pain is in no instance the law or condition of their being. The sport of the insect, the carol of the lark, the gambols of the quadruped, the gush of summer song in the groves and woods, all read the design and intention of a bountiful, beneficent, and benevolent Ruler. And if man, therefore, abuse his delegated authority, and instead of the merciful guardian and friend of the helpless, become the rigorous tyrant and torturer, does he not thereby set himself up in guilty defiance of the purposes of the Almighty, and do what he can to abridge the happiness he was commissioned to provide and promote?

And who can cast a glance around him and fail to see that man, in a thousand guilty forms, does thus seek to frustrate the great design of the Creator, and put a wanton arrest on the happiness of those below him in the scale of being? It were easy to present harrowing and common-place details. For many reasons I refrain from doing so. We may, in passing, advert alone to one, perhaps the most familiar phase and form of abuse, and which may be taken as typical of many others. How sad to witness even those animals which subserve the highest purposes of usefulness, and in no mean sense may be deemed at once the servants, the companions, and the friends of the human race, made the object of merciless exaction, vindictive passion, cruel and oppressive servitude. If the dumb could speak, how deep often the language of rebuke which a thing of mere brute instinct could utter against the tyrant immortal who frets and galls him! The yoke could tell many such tales of shame: aye, in the case often of those (and the outrage always seems here intensified) who have at one time been pampered and caressed. We always manifest peculiar sympathy for any of our own brotherhood or sisterhood, members of the human race, who have "seen better days"; who by one or more of what are called the throws of capricious fortune, are driven from comparative affluence to penury and want. How sad the spectacle which not infrequently meets us on the street, of the mother singing in order to save from starvation herself and the squalid infant she carries in her arms. SINGING! These joyous notes are in mournful contrast and disharmony with a smothered tale of misery and woe. But what is it, in her case, that awakes our tenderest pity and compassion? Is it not because the ear is quick to discern that the owner of that voice was once the inmate of no beggar's hovel: that these once jewelled hands were accustomed to something else than the stinted pittance of the passers-by? That pining withered flower once shed its blossoms in a genial sunny home; but the blast of adversity came, and it may be through no wrong-doing of her own she is now drifting an outcast on the cold, pitiless waters. She has seen better days!

Is it different (ought it to be different?) with the dumb creation—especially with the noblest and best known of our quadrupeds? Yet how many of these, once fed and fondled by gentle hands, the companions of a generous owner, the pets of his children—how often are such sent forth to spend the dregs of life in toil and torture! And, not to make the picture too realistic and repulsive, how frequently do we see this once friendly helpmate compelled to drag the heavy load for which strength is unequal, the heaving nostrils and palpitating sides and distended veins conveying silent but ineffectual remonstrance to the task-master! Nor is it the jaded and superannuated alone which are subjected to similar treatment. Fashionable stables and costly equipages must be included, we fear, in the indictment. Some of us have been too often the unwilling spectators—I include myself—of cruel wrong inflicted on creatures who can only resent the insult by restive plungings, or tossing the foam from their polished bits. I feel for a high-bred horse as I would feel for an insult poured on the cultured scion of a high-bred, aristocratic family.

But it would be alike unpleasing and idle to prolong. Alas! the instances, as you well know, might be painfully multiplied and diversified. We shall rather proceed to enforce, from a few brief considerations, the duty of abstaining from the infliction of pain on the inferior creation, and their paramount claims on man's sympathy, protection, and kindness.

Let us advert, at the outset, to a lurking and widely accepted fallacy with regard to the lower animals having a comparative insensibility to pain. That they are capable of a certain amount of suffering none dare dispute, but we question if there be not at the root of much of that reckless torture of which they are the subjects, an impression that their wild and untamed habits of life and their iron frames make them proof against the physical anguish of which the human being is susceptible. I would ask what in anatomy, what in physiology is there to bear out such an hypothesis?

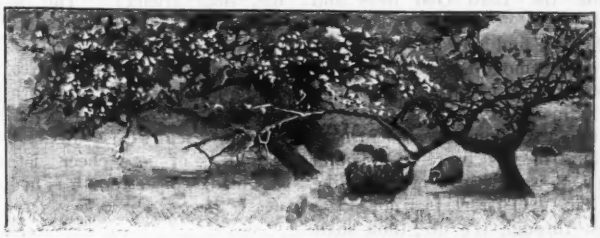
Is there aught in dying humanity so piteous, harrowing, and heartrending as some of their death cries? An officer walking over the bloody field of Alma the night of the battle, mentions that nothing to him was so terrible as the moan of the dying horses, and that look of unutterable anguish so truthfully depicted by the greatest of our animal painters in his well-known work, "Time of War." Or, when rude violence is done to the instincts of other members of the lowlier creation, as, e.g., when the female quadruped is robbed of her whelps, how piteous the howl which follows the footsteps of the plunderer as he leaves behind him what was the scene of brute affection and tenderness! Injured instinct pines under its own torture, without those moral supports which the human heart has to mitigate and reconcile.

We do not profess ourselves qualified to enter on the niceties of the anatomical question, from the organic structure of the lower animals as compared with the human. This has been fully discussed, and what we are now seeking to vindicate established by medical writers in treating of the subject. There is, indeed, little need of any scientific investigation. The very look and expression of what are perhaps misnamed the "inferior creation" at the threatened infliction of pain, is enough to tell us that they can affect and afford no stoical insensibility. See how even the lordly lion in his den cowers and winces under the lash of his keeper! But am I not warranted in repeating and emphasising the remark just made: that where there is the absence of all moral sensibilities, the mere animal and bodily ones must be proportionally more intense! A human being has become the victim of cruel disease, or by sudden accident is racked in anguish. We know the kindly sympathies that gather around his couch. We know how far looks of tenderness and deeds of love at his bedside, and the kind and anxious inquiries from a distance, go to alleviate suffering. And even when there is the presence of no such soothing ministrations: as, for example, the soldier expiring on the field of battle, or stretched in a dreary hospital-ward in a land of aliens, where the music of home voices is separated by intervening oceans—even then, as life's pulses are fast ebbing, there are moral supports to divert his thoughts from being absorbed in mere excruciating physical pain. There may be the chivalrous consciousness of suffering in the discharge of duty; the feeling of high-toned patriotism, that in his country's cause he heroically fought and fell. Or if he be a Christian soldier and a Christian man, there are higher encouragements from the prospects of a crown of glory which fadeth not away. In many or most of the diversified cases of human suffering there will thus be found some such mitigations to blunt the edge of mere physical sensibility. But in the case of the lower tribes there is a monopoly of brute feeling and pain, without one ennobling element to assuage. The animal can think of its agonies, and nothing else. Man can find mitigation in looking forward to death as a relief from torture; but the brute, all unconscious as to what death is, knows not how long it may have to linger on in that mystery of endurance. The mother (the Christian mother), bereaved of her infant, can follow it in its arrowy flight up to glory: she can visit the grave which contains that treasure of her yearning heart, and dry her tears with the thought "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." But yonder bereft mother-bird, as she flies from bough to bough, wailing out her dirge of sorrow, has not one moral solace! She carries with her into her leafy chamber of solitude the most broken and disconsolate of hearts.

We would seek then, believing as we do in the sensitiveness of the animal creation to pain, and treating that as a false assumption that would represent them as callous and obtuse to it, we would urge on all, the obligation by every means in their power of diminishing the amount of physical suffering, and holding up to reprobation those who would causelessly augment these; we would call upon parents especially to regard it as a solemn duty to inoculate the minds of their children with a detestation of cruelty towards their inferiors, and to associate this (as it ought to be associated) with the mean, the selfish, and the coward! We believe it will be found that those readiest to inflict pain on the helpless would be the first to quail under it themselves. Such would be "the last infirmity of really noble minds." The manly boy would scorn to commit a piece of wanton, mean, and petty aggression on victims at once inoffensive and powerless. Beautifully does one of our old lyric poets put the words into the lips of the speaker:—

> "I have found out a gift for my fair;
> I have found where the wood-pigeons breed;
> But let me the plunder forbear;
> She will say, 'T was a barbarous deed.'
> 'For he ne'er could be true,' she averred,
> 'Who could rob the poor bird of its young.'
> And I loved her the more when I heard
> Such tenderness fall from her tongue." *



But, after all, dear brethren, the true panacea for these evils, the true, and real, and only cure for this widely existing cruelty, as for every other moral obliquity in our fallen natures, is to be found in the Gospel's power to elevate all that is debased and debasing, corrupt and corrupting—what is "earthly, sensual, devilish," to what is pure and ennobling and benevolent, lovely and of good report. It is this which has proscribed and banished the amphitheatres of Rome, and which brands with righteous stigma such spectacles as Spain can still exhibit amid the plaudits of her assembled aristocracy. Yes, it is by Christianity, and by the expulsive influence of its new-implanted affections, that the malignity which lies at the root of wanton cruelty is driven out. Filled with the love of God, that love would pour the tide of its benignant outflowings on all within its reach. It is the motives and principles of the cross of Christ enthroned in the heart which will prove the determined and successful foe to tyranny and oppression. We know, at all events, the day is coming when these exalted and beautiful influences will triumph, and when we may warrantably entertain high hopes of a brighter and holier economy; when the creature and the creation shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, and translated into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

I have incidentally spoken of the treatment of a stern subject by a great master, where the power of his pencil is concentrated on the glazed eye and distended nostrils of a war-horse expiring amid blood-stained ruins. There is an equally noble and truthful companion-picture, familiar to many, by the same hand. A bright sky is above; a calm sea, with its peaceful port, is beneath. Nearer and more conspicuous in the sunny foreground reposes the shepherd with his fleecy charge. There are there also warlike relics and memorials of other days. But a lamb, in fearless innocence, pillows its head on the cannon's mouth! It is the artist's beautiful type and embodiment of the "Time of Peace," the modern reproduction of the inspired picture of the prophet-painter of millennial bliss—"The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them."

How can I more befittingly sum up this subject than by a closing reference and reply? Some have ventured to assert that the lower animals, being infinitely beneath us in the scale of being, are unfit subjects and objects for any such special and exceptional tenderness as that for which we plead. I ask, Where should we have been at this moment if this were a recognised and universally-acted-upon law in the government of God—that a being, because superior in the scale of existence, should refuse to bestow regard or interest on those who are some degrees beneath him? Is not the whole scheme of Redemption one marvellous display of the condescension and kindness of one Being to those immeasurably below Him? Man's condescension to the lower animals! What is this in comparison with God's regardfulness of Man? The former is but the attention and kindness of one creature to another, both springing from earth, both hastening to dissolution. But the kindness of God to the human offspring is that of the Infinite to the finite, Almightiness to nothingness, Deity to dust! Oh, if God, the great God Almighty, thus visits the guilty with tenderness, shall we visit the innocent and unoffending with cruelty and oppression? when He has thrown the shield of His merciful, but unmerited, protection over us, shall we thus requite His kindness by acting toward the humbler creatures of His hands with contempt and disdainful neglect? No! as we behold His Kingdom stretching downwards from the pinnacles of glory to every living thing in the habitable parts of the earth, where from the beginning His delights have been, let us recognise the beauty and profound meaning of that magnificent vision which burst on the prophet by the River Chebar—significant exposition of the Mediator's sovereignty: the fourfold resemblances or images of creature-forms, of which only one was human, and the other three of the lower animals—the lion, the ox, and the eagle; while over all, in the sapphire firmament, we read, was "the likeness as the appearance of a man." It was the very truth and language of our text embodied and symbolised: the all-glorious and glorified Mediator presiding over the Kingdom of Providence, and demonstrating in the most extensive sense "His Kingdom ruleth over all!" Seeing, then, that all creatures thus wait upon Him, that He gives them their meat in due season, let the topic of our meditation (pleading, and pleading all the more earnestly for those who cannot plead for themselves) receive the loftiest enforcement by joining in with the loyal ascription of the Psalmist—"Thou hast put all things under His feet: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea."

"MY GRACE IS SUFFICIENT FOR THEE."

A PAGE FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

THIS message, that long ago came as the Master's whisper to the Apostle who entreated thrice that his own special trouble might be taken away, is an assurance of ever-present strength and comfort, that meets every step, every hour, every possible heart-ache.

"What aileth thee, beloved?" we seem to hear the Master say. "Art thou anxious and cumbered about many things—about thine own feeble health, thy loved ones, the needs and difficulties around? Yet, through every shadow, My grace is sufficient.

> "I know thy sorrows, I mark, I see;
> Think not thy God hath forgotten thee.

My ever-living, ever-mindful love hears the secret sigh, beholds the tear unguessed by others. My heart understands the full measure of thy cross—each pressure of the lingering thorn. My grace is sufficient for thee."

There have been others led through shadows besides ourselves, and the grace of God was sufficient to sustain them, and to bring the glorious daybreak at last. Think of Joseph, away from his kindred, imprisoned, blamed, to human sight helpless and hopeless—did God forget Joseph? "His bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob." David, flying before his enemies, knew weariness, depression, heart-sinking; was David left alone in trouble and darkness? In Psalm xviii. he exclaims: "By Thee I have run through a troop, and by my God have I leaped over a wall. As for God, His way is perfect; the Word of the Lord is tried; He is a buckler to all those that trust in Him." Poor Hagar found herself of old in a desert-place, with none but God to care for her and hers. Ah, but we need not fear life's desert-places, while the Lord God lives and loves.

None of us will ever find ourselves worse off than Daniel, cast down among the hungry lions; yet He with Whom nothing is impossible forsook not His servant in his need.

Think, too, of that seven-times-heated furnace wherein the servants of God were cast, bound and helpless—but One was with them there, like unto the Son of God. "O Israel, fear not: . . . when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." So we see the Lord remembered His tried and afflicted ones in days gone by. Now, I should like to quote to you a few words written to one in trouble by Frances Ridley Havergal, who learnt amid the shadows herself to bear the light to others. "Whatever the near bothers or the far griefs may be, you and all your matters are in the dear Saviour's hand. He says, 'My grace is sufficient for thee'; and I like to take a still simpler Saxon word and say, 'My grace is quite enough for thee.' Yes, quite enough for the sorrows and trials, little and great—quite enough for you in spite of all."

A Christian visitor records that he was amazed at the restfulness and quietude of the father of a family, who lay upon a bed of weakness and pain. God had shown him at last that he could just leave Him all his anxious cares, and in perfect peace he said one day to the visitor: "I worry no more about my dear ones; the Lord who is so tender and good to me will supply their every need." There is no perplexity beyond the measure of this comfort—no sorrow so deep as to be beyond the reach of the Divine whisper, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

Remember, the Apostle did the best thing he could with his trouble; he took it to the Master. Tell Jesus your every care, your utmost need; pour out your hearts before Him. That thrice-repeated prayer was not unheard, for the strength of the Lord shone through His servant's weakness, and made that thorn as a star of fadeless glory. "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," is the Apostle's witness. Yes, all things can be done and borne when we think of God's grace joined to our weakness, His all-sufficient lovingkindness the pillow of our infirmity. I have read a minister's beautiful reminder how the bird-trainer covers the cage, to teach the little birds tuneful songs. Who knows what music God is teaching you in shadow? for no mist hovers round you that His grace has not blest. But how shall God's grace come down to you and me? How shall the Royal grace of the King bless our own everyday life, dear friend? "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." Jesus Christ—He is the Grace of the Father made human and alive, and clear and real, to the humblest heart that trusts and loves. He Whose glory-crown was woven in thorns, whispers still to each weary, anxious, heavy-laden one, "Soul, be of good cheer; let not your heart be troubled. My strength is made perfect in weakness; My grace is sufficient for thee."

FENELLA.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS. BY BEATRICE WHITBY, AUTHOR OF "THE AWAKENING OF MARY FENWICK," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

AT a small railway station upon the Great Western line which curves through the lovely vales and between the rugged hills of South Wales, a little tragedy was being tragically enacted by two young people.

The morning express had just rushed alongside the platform, and paused in its hard-hearted career to engulf the owner of a most lugubrious face, which obtruded itself from one of the railway carriage windows. The face was a handsome one, with well-cut features, dark expressive eyes, meant for laughter, not tears, but now suspiciously humid, the whole arising from a pair of broad, well-drilled shoulders, the turn of which proclaimed their owner to be a servant of his country, a member of that profession dear to the female heart—in fact, a soldier.

That this soldier was dear to one female heart was very evident, for a girl, too miserable to care for the notice which she attracted from the solitary porter and the consequential station-master, or for the curious glances of ill-bred passengers, stood staring up into his face while the tears rolled down her rosy cheeks, and her lips quivered into those hideous contortions which most of her sex, unless rendered reckless by woe, are careful to conceal by their pocket-handkerchiefs.

The sun streamed down from a cloudless June sky upon her slim figure, clad in a blue cotton dress, and crept beneath the brim of her sailor hat, worn sprucely on a trim brown head, to illumine, with cruel frankness, round blue eyes drowned in tears and a forehead puckered and creased with a conflict of dismal emotions.

"Harry, you will write—you will write constantly? You won't forget me?"

The words were drowned in the hissing of the engine. Harry guessed their import, but dared not trust himself to speak. Notwithstanding his twenty-four years, notwithstanding his moustache, he had a lump in his throat and a pain at his heart which were momentarily increased by the undisguised wretchedness of his hitherto high-spirited and sprightly lady-love.

"Harry, you won't f-f-flirt going out; because I know the girls who go to India are so f-f-fast."

The whistle very properly blotted out this last petition by a prolonged shriek. Harry raised the hands which he held in a desperately tight grasp to his lips.

"Good-bye, Ellie! God bless you! good-bye, dear."

One last kiss: the tear on his cheek must have been hers; he brushed it away, and as the carriage began to move slowly alongside the platform, he leaned still farther from the window watching that forlorn blue figure until the ever-increasing speed of the train whisked him out of sight.

These two—Mr. Lewis, Lieutenant in Her Majesty's 220th Regiment of Foot, and Miss Fenella Yorke, were engaged to be married, but between them and their anticipated wedding stretched a long year of parting. Fenella had neither mother nor sister; her father, who acted as land-agent to one of the finest properties in Bradnorshire, was engrossed by his profession; and though in all relations of life he bore an unimpeachable character, one necessary quality was missing from the catalogue of estimable virtues which he owned; he lacked sympathy. That fatal deficiency was a barrier to popularity; Mr. Yorke was universally respected, but not loved, and his daughter's affection for him was tempered by fear. When, three months previously, Mr. Lewis had taken up his quarters in the village inn, ostensibly to fish, in reality to see Miss Yorke, whose acquaintance he had made at the house of a mutual friend, Mr. Yorke had asked him to the house and patronised him as the true sportsman he had proclaimed himself to be by facing the discomforts of that primitive inn for the sake of his craft.

However, the young man had disappointed him; though he lingered on week after week in the village, he proved himself a wretched and apathetic fisherman, and added to his offences by one morning entering the library, upon an occasion when Mr. Yorke was more than usually busy, to inform the astonished father that Fenella had consented to marry him.

"If you mean to keep her upon the fish you catch," said Mr. Yorke severely, "it won't do, for Fenella has a remarkably large appetite."

But such was not the young man's intention. He had inherited an ample income from his parents, now dead, and he was, he urged, in a position to marry at once; indeed, the wedding must be celebrated immediately, for he was obliged to return in June to India, where he was stationed until the following summer.

"Fenella is under age, and I do not wish her to marry yet," Mr. Yorke responded, thus implying that his wish was indeed law. "India ruins the health, disposition, and appearance of women. Next year you will probably have got your company; certainly you will have returned to remain for some time in England. You will both be older, and, I hope, wiser by the delay; therefore wait to be married until then. No real affection was ever damaged by keeping."

Mr. Lewis was a more ardent lover than sportsman; he argued hotly that in so short a life a year of happiness was too long a period to be wasted; but he argued in vain.

"Pooh! my dear fellow, don't be so impulsive. A year of the anticipation of happiness will possibly prove more agreeable than a year of marriage. You and she are too young to know your own minds; you are a boy and girl, and matrimony is too serious a matter to be undertaken without serious contemplation. I do not object to you as a son-in-law, but I do object to my daughter marrying you until you have proved the sincerity of your affection by a period of probation. I will consent to your engagement, but only on this stipulation."

And thus it came to pass that upon this lovely June day these two young people had bidden one another a long good-bye, and had, for almost the first time in their lives, learnt practically, or rather physically, the unpleasant meaning of that expressive term, "the heart-ache." Hitherto—until, indeed, the acute pain of parting had wrung some token of deep feeling from them—they had been a most undemonstrative pair of lovers. For sentimentality and converse of the soul they cared nothing; practical jokes usurped the place of embraces, a fire of banter and repartee ousted tender speeches, and most wild and mischievous escapades had absorbed the attention of this harum-scarum couple. As the gardener had one day remarked to his wife: "Deed to gutness, Betsy, they are like the young pooppiess, all their trouble afore them."

"'Harry, you will write constantly? You won't forget me?'"—p. 547.

Now their troubles had begun. Fenella, as she waved her hand to the vanishing train, and then stood gazing down the valley until the last faint streak of smoke had melted into air, felt that the sunshine was no longer cheerful, nor the air sweet, nor the country good to look upon, nor the flowers worth picking, because he with whom she had shared such things had gone, and taken with him the brightness and the beauty from them. But, being a brave girl both by nature and habit, she mopped her eyes with her soaked handkerchief, choked back a sob, and told herself with decision that a year was a very, very short time; only, oh, cheerful thought! fifty-two Sundays, and she should again be waiting on that very platform—in a brand-new frock which should be pink, because pink was his favourite colour, with a rose in her waist-belt which should match her cheeks, flushed with the thought of meeting him; and the train would come winding up the valley, and that very head which had just disappeared would again be thrust from the window, and in the delight of the meeting all remembrance of the parting would be obliterated.

By the time Fenella had cheered herself by these reflections, she had left the station far behind, and had approached the stile which led to a short cut across two fields, by which was reached Capel Issa, the ivy-covered house where Mr. Yorke, his daughter and his boy Bertie, lived. Upon the stile Bertie was seated swinging his feet, and whistling a lively air—a very lively air, because his spirits, too, were strung below their usual pitch, for, with his future brother-in-law's departure, he had lost his ideal of manly perfection, and a source of constant wealth.

Bertie Yorke, to his own and his neighbours' sorrow, suffered from delicate health, and although he was a tall boy of twelve, he was not considered strong enough for school life, but remained at home, where his lessons became the daily trial of the middle-aged vicar, who had, at Mr. Yorke's earnest petition, undertaken his tuition. He, Mr. Pierpoint, the vicar, was a bachelor, old, staid, and retiring; but ever since Fenella was a baby he had thought her face the sweetest, her manner the most winning, and herself the only woman in the world whom he desired as his wife. For her sake he patiently endured for three mortal hours each morning the presence of the most restless, most idle, most mischievous of boys, and even drew some satisfaction from the infliction because Bertie's blue eyes had a look, and Bertie's voice had a tone, of his sister's. His perceptions, sharpened by his love, foresaw, with Harry Lewis' arrival, the collapse of the dream of his life; but when the engagement had been announced no congratulations had been heartier, no hopes for her happiness had been so sincere as his. Nature delights in contrasts; she had formed the outward man most awkwardly—he was shy, ungainly, ugly; within, every attribute was perfect—no truer, more constant, more unselfish heart ever beat beneath a shabby waistcoat. The tougher and rougher the rind, the sweeter and better preserved the fruit.

"Halloa, Ellie, here you are at last! The train went off an hour ago. Do look sharp! Old Pierpoint's waiting."

Fenella found her voice with difficulty; it quavered as she spoke.

"It is so naughty, Bertie! This is the only day I have not taken you down to the vicarage, and you have not gone at all."

"I'm going, ain't I? I meant to have gone down to the station with both of you, only Harry gave me half a crown not to come. Fenella, you have been blubbing."

"I have been crying," said she; she spoke with dignity. To weep was so unheard-of an emotion with her that she could not treat the circumstance lightly.

"It will be pretty beastly without Harry," the urchin continued, wriggling down from his seat on the stile, and beginning to walk very leisurely along the high road which led to the vicarage; "but he will turn up again next year; and if he don't, why, we did very well without him until now, so I shouldn't blub if I were you."

This young philosopher's words annoyed his sister.

"You do not understand what you are talking about, Bertie. Of course—of course—of course he will come back; I should die if he didn't."

She finished her outburst with a sob which amazed the boy.

"Don't be a fool!" he said, thrusting his hands far down in his pockets, and staring up into the sky; "he will come back all right if he isn't killed, and if he doesn't meet some jollier girl than you."

"Bertie, if I thought it would hurt you," Fenella cried, exasperated, "I would box your ears. You need not laugh—I mean it."

As she spoke they reached the corner of the road where an iron gate, set open, disclosed the short drive leading to the vicarage. Upon this drive stood the long, lean figure of a clergyman, surmounted by a face which looked out thoughtfully from beneath an untidy head of hair and above an unkempt beard. In one hand he held a basket high piled with ripe strawberries, in the other a great bunch of roses.

"Oh, Mr. Pierpoint," said Fenella, addressing him eagerly, "Bertie has kept you waiting again, but this time it was not my fault. He promised to go to you punctually, so I went down to the station and left him. I am so sorry!"

"I haven't done that Latin exercise," Bertie admitted candidly. "Ellie was tattooing F. Y. with gunpowder and a needle on Harry's wrist, so she would not help me." To Bertie's intense surprise, his quiet tutor reproved him sharply.

"Can you never do your duty, Cuthbert, without the assistance of your sister? Do you expect to have her at your beck and call through life? Is she to be constantly employed in urging you to perform your tasks, and must she not only undertake your responsibilities but apologise to me for their non-performance? Go on into the house; go on. I say, this moment, and get to your work." Mr. Pierpoint energetic and angry was so novel a spectacle that Bertie, awed, slunk off obediently and immediately in the direction indicated, while Fenella fell back a pace, and raising her tear-stained blue eyes to his in wonder, looked at him from under the brim of her white sailor hat.

"My dear Fenella, I know you have enough to bear to-day," he began, his manner and the tone of his voice altering to one of gentle solicitude, "and your little brother's unbridled tongue is trying at times—I know it." Then, with a sudden uncouth gesture, he thrust the basket of fruit and the nosegay of flowers towards her: "I have gathered strawberries and the Maréchal Niels for you. Nay, don't thank me; I cannot wait to hear you. I only wish they were a thousand times better, so that they might be more worthy of your acceptance;" and, turning away, he hurried into the house, tripping over a stone and stumbling up the low step which led into the house in his hurry.

Fenella watched him with an indulgent smile; what a kind and thoughtful man he was, and yet how ungainly. Until lately she had never remarked his deficiencies. It was with Harry's self-reliant bearing, his prompt, decisive movements, his spruceness, his sleek head and clean-shaven face, that she now contrasted the clumsy and dowdy vicar, to the latter's appalling disadvantage.

Although women will not allow it, and men do not believe it, the razor has a mighty influence in affairs of the heart, and the want of a barber may ruin the happiness of a lifetime. When an unkempt beard is connected with awkwardness of manner, then woe to the possessor of the combination if a-wooing he would go.

How slowly three months pass when into them are pressed such wretched moments as poor Fenella experienced during the period which lay between that June morning and the following September! How hope deferred can make the most buoyant and elastic young heart ache! The girl, as I told you, was brave, and to her sturdiness was added a pride which compelled her to keep her trouble to herself, and to let no one guess why she had grown silent and sedate, why her laughter was never heard and her smile seldom seen, why she came down to breakfast heavy-eyed and pale, why her restless hands rattled the tea-cups behind the urn as her father unlocked the post-bag and tossed its contents upon the breakfast-table. But, as everyone knows, truth will out, and so, upon one morning in September, poor Fenella's secret became public property.

Mr. Yorke, between his professional work, which was considerable, and the sport that occupied his spare hours, had not much leisure in which to notice the growing alteration in his daughter's mood. It was Bertie who drew his attention to her in the following manner. He stood in no awe of his reserved father, and had invaded the library uninvited, and addressed his parent abruptly.

"I say, dad, old Pierpoint says that if you don't look after Ellie she'll die, and then you'll be sorry."

"What, Bertie?"

"That's all. I can't stop: Ellie's waiting for me on the drive."

Breakfast was just over, and it was the hour when the boy and his sister usually started for the vicarage.

"Wait; I forbid you to move. Come over to me and explain what you mean."

"It's old Pierpoint, father. He talks about Ellie all the time. That beast Harry was going to write from Gibraltar, and from Malta, and from Suez, and from India, and he has been gone for ages and never written a line. If," with a significant gesture of his little clenched fist, "I was a bit older, I'd give him such a licking. Ellie's no good at all, now; she don't care about anything but the post."

Mr. Yorke glanced down at the open account-book before him on the table, and carefully wrote down an entry; then he closed the book and rose.

"You may go now, Cuthbert, and send Fenella to me. Send her to me immediately; you can walk to the vicarage by yourself for once in your life."

"All right! but old Pierpoint will be awfully disappointed."

Mr. Yorke was extremely disconcerted by this news of his son's, and when the door opened to admit Fenella, he turned towards her with some irritation. The irritation arose from perplexity, for he felt that to console a love-lorn maiden was a task altogether beyond his powers. But Fenella was perfectly composed and cheerful. Her short upper lip, which seemed formed for laughter, was drawn down, and met the nether lip in a firm straight line; she held her head high, and looked wonderfully pretty in her covert coat and cloth cap; her appearance was reassuring—consolation would be superfluous.

"You want to speak to me, father, Bertie says. I paid the butcher's bill last night, and put the receipt upon your desk."

"Yes, yes, my dear, I saw it; but it was not on that subject I wished to consult you. On a less—nay, I should say a more—important business. This young Lewis, to whom you are engaged: Bertie informs me that—ahem—he is not a good correspondent. Ahem! in fact, you have heard nothing from him since his departure. Is that true?"

"Perfectly true."

"How do you account for this preposterous defection?"

The probing of a fresh and bleeding wound is a painful operation, but Fenella bore it without wincing.

"I cannot account for it, father."

"Do you consider the man is a scoundrel? Or that he is incapacitated by illness from holding a pen or dictating a letter?"

"He is well. I thought he might be ill, and I wrote to his sister. I got the answer yesterday."

"Let me see it, if you have it here."

In silence she drew the letter from her pocket and handed it to him. This was it:—

"DEAR FENELLA,—Many thanks for your note; it ought to have been answered before, but my children have been ill, so I was busy. I heard from Harry last mail—a very cheery letter, full of picnics, polo, and all kinds of festivities. You were a weak young woman to let him go to India without you, because, you know, Harry is a great ladies'-man, and such a flirt, though the dearest boy in the world. I hope you will come and stay with us in the winter. I do not see why Harry should be the only one to enjoy himself, and I am very anxious to make your acquaintance. Yours affectionately,

"MADELINE WYNNE."

Mr. Yorke frowned as he read the letter.

"Did you tell—this person of her brother's extraordinary behaviour?"

"No."

"Then on what subject did you write to her?"

Fenella had written merely as a means of extracting an answer in which it was probable she might hear some tidings, however disastrous, of Harry Lewis, and she said so.

"Then sit down there, and write to tell her that her brother is a most unprincipled young man, who has behaved to you in a way so disgraceful as to be actionable. Tell her that the engagement is at an end, and that if your father could break his stick across the fellow's shoulders it would be the proudest moment of his life," etc., etc., in the same strain. Mr. Yorke relieved his anger by violent language, to which his daughter listened with head still held high, though her face, and her lips even, grew as white as her linen collar. As soon as the tirade was over she answered—

"I cannot write, father; he must tell her himself. I will never see his name, nor hear it, nor think of it again. I have quite forgotten him already."

And she stamped her little foot on the ground, and her beautiful blue eyes were as cold as her voice.

An hour later this frigid, proud young woman lay upon the floor of her bedroom with her arms round the neck of a black poodle, which had been her faithless lover's last gift to her; and with tears rolling down her cheeks, and sobs jagging her breath, she told the sympathetic dog that she loved him—him—him, better than the whole world. Whether "him" meant the poodle or his master, she did not say.

CHAPTER II.

SUMMONING her courage and her pride to her aid, Fenella Yorke bore unflinchingly that cruel kind of notoriety which a girl who has been jilted acquires in the eyes of her neighbours. Officious inquiries after her health, commiseration over her pale cheeks, suggestions for change of air and scene, assailed her from all sides, and were dreadful to her. She shrank from pity, and consequently from society, choosing for her chief companion the quiet vicar, who had never by word nor look approached that painful subject which was too fresh to bear the most delicate handling. She had selected Mr. Pierpoint as a friend because of this forbearance on his part; she had no idea that he had more affection for her than he bestowed upon the flowers in his garden (her only rivals), and at which he looked in much the same indulgent, tender way as he looked at her.

Upon one winter day, when the flowers were dead, and Christmas was close at hand, Fenella, on her way to the village post-office, passed the church, and, seeing the door standing open, she wandered through and stood in the dimly lighted aisle coloured by the stained glass of the window, looking about her with sad eyes. Every spot was full of memories, but the church was the fullest of them all. Her thoughts rebelled against her control, and rushed back to the time when that stalwart, upright figure—a prince of men amongst the rough country folk there—had sat, and stood, and knelt beside her in that dark pew in the chancel. She clenched her little hand and swallowed a great sob. Then a voice, deeper, softer, fuller than any voice she had ever before heard, addressed her—

"My darling," it said, "I have suffered as you are suffering now for years. I love you with my whole heart, Fenella. Yes, my dear, this is a sacred spot, I know, but these words hallow it—they are sacred too."

How the Fenella of old days would have laughed at such words, and of such surprising import, from Mr. Pierpoint! But the Fenella of to-day had changed; she was silent, and in silence they left the church and walked across the churchyard side by side.

"I am too old for you, my dear—too old in looks and ways, if not in years, I fear. But, if you can, give me hope, only the faintest ray of hope, that some day in the future you will remember what I say. I understand my flowers; they thrive under my care—I might learn in time a way to make you happy. You should have everything you want. I have money, more—much more, than I need. That is nothing, I know; I should not have even mentioned it to you, but that I love you so much that I try in every way to win you merely to think of me, Fenella."

Not a word of the old time had he spoken; she had shivered for fear of it, but she might have known him better.

"Do you want to marry me?" she said. (What a contrast—her calm question to the agitated manner of the first speaker!)

"I have told you that I love you very dearly."

"Then," turning her blue eyes to his white face and looking at him anxiously, "I will marry you. Of course I will: you are so kind to me. And we," speaking rapidly, "could be married soon—at Easter; we will put the wedding in all the papers—all of them, every one. We need not live here, need we? At least, we might go away for months and months. Bertie might come, too; you would not mind that? for he would miss me if I left him."

And so it came to pass that Fenella Yorke's engagement to the Rev. Andrew Pierpoint was duly announced in the papers where such notices appear. And the neighbours talked, and wondered, and laughed. The women said, "Foolish girl; she is marrying out of pique!" and their husbands answered, "Nonsense! the vicar is the best fellow in the world, and the woman who marries him is the luckiest woman in it." But they repeated, "She is marrying out of pique."

Neither the expectant bridegroom nor the bride-elect was troubled by the gossip. If the bride-elect's spirits flagged, her gentleness and sweetness had increased. Her manner to Mr. Pierpoint was perfect in its way; she treated him with deference, and was always ready to yield to his wishes. The little coquette, whose pranks and uproarious spirits had once fascinated and captivated Mr. Lewis, had gone, and in her place was a calm, indifferent girl. Only the poodle knew from what a tempest of sorrow that calmness and indifference had grown.

It was a pleasure to look at the vicar. Happiness is a cosmetic which rarely fails to beautify the plainest face. He had grown both handsome and energetic, and, if he still stumbled over steps and foot-stools, knocked over tea-cups, and bumped against his neighbours whenever he could find an opportunity of so doing, Fenella never noticed it. He might be graceful or awkward; it was one to her.

Bertie was the only person who found fault with her engagement.

"That old chap your husband?" he said. "Bosh, Ellie! Why don't you wait? Someone smarter than he might turn up. I wouldn't marry at all if I couldn't find anyone better than an old Father Christmas like that."

"You are only a silly little boy, Bertie, or you would know that one doesn't marry a person because he is young or—or—smart, as you call it."

"I ain't a fool," he growled. "You should marry a fellow because you like him; but you don't like him; he is such a funny old chap, with black teeth."

"Hush, Bertie! Mr. Pierpoint is much, much too good for me."

"I daresay he is, but, all the same, Har——"

But Ellie had gone out of the room, so he said no more.

The last days of blustering March had arrived; the dreary long weeks were nearly over, and the expected wedding was close at hand.

In the vicarage library the vicar was sitting over the fire with a book in his hand, but he was not reading; his happy eyes were fixed dreamily on the blazing coals in the grate, among the caves and caverns of which he saw blissful pictures of his future life. An hour before, he had parted from his sweet lady-love. She had gone out into the hall at Capel Issa with him, and had assisted him to wriggle into his great-coat. She had laid her white hand on his sleeve, and had not drawn away when he kissed her pale cheek and smoothed her brown hair.

"Can I make you happy, Fenella?" he had whispered brokenly, and she had answered back, with a brave smile—

"I shall be hard to please and most ungrateful if you cannot, Andrew."

Yes, he would make her happy; she was so young; as the years passed she would surely forget that—— He shut his teeth hard, and looked the anathema he would not utter—and he, steadily, unceasingly persevering in his effort to win her love, must succeed; he was confident in his own powers; nothing should resist him.

A rap at the door roused him. His "Come in" sounded impatient; he was loth to be disturbed from the building of his stately air-castles.

"If you please, sir, you are wanted at once. Mrs. Williams, poor woman, is dying. Indeed, it 's sad, sir, for she was as well as you or I this morning."

"Did she send for me, Keziah?"

"Yes, sir; her son, poor fellow, has come for you; 'deed now, he ran every step of the way. She is asking for you all the time, he says, and won't rest till you go."

With alacrity the kind-hearted vicar rose.

"Fetch me my hat and coat, Keziah; I will go immediately. Make up a good fire; I have some—ahem—work to do when I come home."

He would return shortly to those pleasant day-dreams, and sit far on into the night while he indulged them; but he was concerned to hear of his old parishioner's sudden illness; life was so sweet a thing that it was sad to leave it.

Three hours later, on the stroke of midnight, the vicar re-entered his library. Keziah had made a glorious fire: red-hot caverns, blue flames, black mountains, were all there ready to minister to his fancy, but he never saw them. With a drawn face which worked and twitched from the force of some powerful emotion, he slowly dragged his awkward feet over the threshold, and sank upon his knees before the writing-table, bowing his rough head upon his clasped hands.

The caverns and the mountains of the fire had sunk—as though they themselves had been no better than day-dreams—to grey ashes before he moved, and when he lifted his face it was wet with tears, but calm, steadfast, and passionless.

He seated himself before his desk, and taking a pen he began to write rapidly; he filled sheet after sheet, but, as soon as he re-read what he had written, he was dissatisfied with his work, for he tore the paper into fragments and began again. The dawn had crept through the chinks of the closed shutters before he relinquished his pen. The result of that night's labour lay within an envelope directed in a firm hand to

"MISS YORKE, CAPEL ISSA."

This envelope was brought to Fenella the following morning while she, with her father and Bertie, were having breakfast. Such notes were of frequent occurrence; she finished her porridge and cracked her egg before she opened and read it:—

"MY DEAREST FENELLA,—A circumstance has arisen which will prevent our marriage taking place at Easter. The circumstance is one that it was impossible either to foresee or to prevent. My presence is required in a distant land to transact a business of urgent importance and necessity, upon the immediate performance of which the happiness of those most dear to me depends. As this is the case, I cannot choose but hasten to discharge my duty—a duty which compels me to leave you for a period of many weeks. I have seen your father this morning, and have explained my meaning fully to him. He agrees with my decision. To-day I leave the vicarage, to-morrow I set sail from England; I will not bid you good-bye in person, Fenella—I could not bear to do so; nor shall I write to you during my absence; but, God willing, I shall return to England in June, at the latest, and then you will hear again of one to whom your goodness has given the happiness of his life. God bless you, dear. "ANDREW PIERPOINT."

Mr. Yorke watched his daughter attentively as she read these words. He had lately parted from their white-cheeked, haggard-eyed author, and now he expected to see a corresponding gloom spread over her pretty features. But, no; a smile crept round the corners of her mouth, a colour rose into her cheeks; she dropped the letter upon the table and looked up eagerly.

"You have seen Andrew, father—you know he has gone away; the wedding is put off until the summer."

"What?" screamed Bertie. "Gone away? Old Pierpoint? Has he chucked you over too, Ellie?"

The idea of being "chucked over" by Mr. Pierpoint amused Fenella; she burst out laughing—a laugh that was nearly a cry, for that too of Bertie's hurt her.

"You are most heartless, Fenella," said her father sternly. "Pierpoint is a vast deal too good for you."

"I know it, father, I know it," she cried; "but Easter is so near, and I should have had to leave you both—and everything; I can't help being glad to stay on a little longer."

"You didn't seem to mind leaving home," began Bertie, "when you were going to marry Har——"

"Cuthbert, be silent. You are speaking with your mouth full, sir."

As the weeks rolled by, Fenella became ashamed to find how she grudged their departure, and how content she was to have a locum tenens at the vicarage, and her days to herself. Mr. Yorke was very kind to her; they were more together than they had been hitherto. She often found him watching her anxiously. Of what Mr. Pierpoint's urgent business consisted Fenella was not told. Her father said that for the present it was a secret. Some day she should hear every particular. She was content to wait. Indeed, she thought very little of her lover, and that period of their short engagement which they had spent together seemed almost like a dream.

"She heard a distant step upon the road."

The spring had faded into summer, and June, the month of roses, had come, when upon one lovely morning, bright with sunshine, gay with the singing of birds, and sweet with the scent of flowers, Fenella received the following note:—

"My dearest Fenella,—I arrived in England last night, and shall reach home to-morrow. Will you, upon the evening after you receive this, meet the seven o'clock express? Do not go to the station—I have a particular reason for requesting this—but wait at the stile that leads to the path across the fields. Do not fail to be there, my dear, or you would grievously disappoint one who loves you with a deep and constant devotion. "Andrew Pierpoint."

All through that day Fenella was never still. She wandered from room to room in the house, she roamed the garden, she went down to the vicarage and cut bunches of the early roses blooming in the flower-beds there, with which to decorate the rooms in readiness for their returning master. She tried hard to rejoice over the anticipation of the reunion, but she was sick at heart.

How sad and still the summer evening seemed, as she reached the trysting-place appointed by her lover, and took up her position, leaning against the stile in a listless attitude. Fenella, only a year ago, had stood in that very spot waiting for someone else: someone who had proved himself unworthy even of her thoughts, someone who had forgotten her, but whom, alas for her! she could not forget. The thrush was calling his name, the very air breathed of him. She heard a distant step upon the road, and could have fancied the tread was his. Impatient with herself, she turned her face to the fields, and leaning her elbows on the top rail of the stile she supported her cheek upon her hand. Tramp, tramp sounded along the road. The alertness of that bounding step was familiar. It was—it was (her heart beat fast at the fancy) like Harry's step. Shame! It was treachery even to remember his name at such a moment. She would turn to see the comer—she must break this illusion which had set her trembling and flushed her pale cheeks. She would turn, she must turn. The steps were not ten paces distant. Slowly and reluctantly she withdrew her arms from their support and moved round. If her ears had deceived her, then her eyes were traitors too. Close to her, at arm's length merely, stood he who had been her first, and who, she knew, would be her last love. For a moment they looked at each other, and then he was at her side.

"At last, Ellie!" he cried, catching her hand in his, "at last, my darling! If you only knew how I have longed for you!"

"You speak to me like that!" She drew herself away from him, and held up her small head high, speaking steadily, and in a cold and constrained voice. "You dare to speak to me like that! I do not know you; I am waiting for my lover, to whom I shall be married soon."

Though Fenella's dignity was strange to him, the young man was not awed; he put his arm round her, and drowned her words with his kisses.

"He is here, Ellie! your lover to whom you will soon be married is here. I am he."

"Let me go; you do not speak the truth. I am going to marry Andrew Pierpoint."

"No, dear, no; you are going to marry me. It was Andrew Pierpoint who sent me to you, God bless him! Don't cry, my sweet. It 's all right. It 's all settled. There, let me dry your eyes. If you will give me a chance, I can explain everything."

"Then go over to the other side of the stile first," sobbed Fenella. "I would rather you were the other side of the stile."

But Mr. Lewis did not fall in with this mandate; he stood before her, and holding both her hands in his he told her his tale—not just as I have written it, for my space is limited, and I must condense the explanations. The superfluities of his discourse I have omitted, though Fenella remembered every one of them.

"I was awfully down when I left you, Ellie, and the only pleasure I got for the first week or two was in writing you letters. There wasn't much to write about on board ship, but hardly a day passed that I didn't find something to dot down for your benefit. Before I got to Bombay I was rampant for a letter from you. However, none arrived. Mail after mail came in—never a line from you. I wrote you an awfully sharp letter to ask what on earth you meant by your silence, but I got no answer. I began to be afraid you were ill, dead—I had all sorts of fears about you: and then Madeline wrote and told me that she had heard from you, and that you seemed very cheerful. I felt pretty mad, I can tell you, and when I saw your engagement announced in the Universal Post I was desperate. I went to a party that night and proposed to the first woman I met. Luckily she was engaged to another chap, or I shouldn't be here. None of our fellows knew what was wrong; I hadn't the pluck to tell a soul that I had been jilted, so they thought I was off my head, I was so precious bad-tempered and disagreeable. I had believed in you so thoroughly; you had seemed so true and good (as well as such a darling), that it nearly broke my heart to think how you had hoodwinked and deceived me. One night when I was, as usual, sulking alone in my own quarters, in a mood the reverse of amiable, imagine my amazement when the door opened and the vicar, Andrew Pierpoint, walked in. Ellie, he is a splendid fellow! how you can care for me when you know him is wonderful. He had come out to India to put things straight between us. He had left you, giving you up of his own free will; and for fear of delay or renewed misunderstanding he came to me himself. It seemed that he, as a clergyman, had been called to see a dying woman, one of his parishioners, the postmistress in the village here, and had received a confession wrung from her by the consciousness of coming death. The woman was a widow. She had a son, an only child, to whom she was passionately attached. He was a wild fellow, harmless enough, but reckless, and an inveterate poacher. At your father's instigation his movements were carefully watched by the keepers, the consequence being that he was caught in the coverts with the nets and game upon him. He was brought before the bench and sent by the magistrates, one of whom was your father, for a term of imprisonment; a severe sentence, I believe, but one which he probably deserved, for he had handled the men who apprehended him very roughly. His mother, who held her head high and was as proud as Lucifer, felt the disgrace acutely, and conceived a rabid and unnatural hatred of Mr. Yorke, and, through him, for you all. The chief thought of her life was how to revenge herself upon you. The anticipation of sorrow for any of your family became her delight. When I left you, revenge seemed at last in her power. Your letters to me, my letters to you, passed through her hands; they, at least, should never reach their destination. Each letter as it came she flung into the fire, and waited eagerly to see what trouble would come of her action. It came soon enough, wretched woman; but de mortuis nil nisi bonum. She made what amends she could by confessing to Mr. Pierpoint what she had done."

An hour later, the Yorke family and Mr. Lewis were seated round the dinner-table. Dinner was over, and the two men were talking seriously and with animation over the past months, and about the coming wedding. Fenella was pensive and subdued, but her eyes were bright with a light that had not shone from them for many a long month.

"I tell you what," Bertie broke in upon his father's discourse, "I should like half a glass of lemonade, dad, to drink old Pierpoint's health and happiness."

"Poor old Pierpoint!" said the happy lover with a sober smile.

"Health and happiness to him," said Mr. Yorke; "and he will have it too—mark my words; such a heart as his is a bank from which stores of health and happiness can be drawn ad libitum."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

DARE TO BE DIFFERENT.

THE manly motto of the Keiths, Earls Marischal of Scotland, of "They say; what say they? Let them say," too often gives place in these days to, "They say. Oh, do they say so? Then we shall, or we shan't do it." We follow the multitude to do evil, and bend our knees to tyrant custom. Few of us dare to be different from others, for our aim is respectability rather than goodness. When others are crying, "Not this man, but Barabbas," we join in the cry in order that we may not appear "queer" or singular.

WHAT HE CAME INTO THE SERVICE FOR.

In the days of the second war with England, a young midshipman named Joel Abbot was serving under the United States flag. He was ordered to the frigate President as aid and signal officer to Commander Rodgers. Winning the good opinion of the commander, he was put in the way of promotion by being commended to Macdonough, then controlling the forces on Lake Champlain. He was exactly the sort of man on whom the eye of a leader would fall if ugly work had to be done—smart, brave, self-reliant. Considerable energy was being put into the struggle, and Macdonough received reports that the English were accumulating a large supply of spars at Sorel. Could they not be destroyed? Who would undertake the task? Joel Abbot was sent for. Grimly the commander asked him if he were willing to die for his country. "Certainly, sir; that is what I came into the service for," was the prompt reply. Entrusted with the dangerous commission, Joel Abbot fulfilled it in the spirit of his words. The perils and privations of his exploit were so great that although he came back alive he was completely prostrate for a considerable time, and his recovery was slow. Later, a sword of honour was voted him for his gallantry; and the recognition was surely deserved. How is it with soldiers of the Great King—workers for Christ? The test-word of this service is "Self-surrender." If the call to sacrifice comes, shall it not be obeyed? Is not this the fitting answer—"That is what I came into the service for"?

FOR TEACHERS.

Is not teaching the hardest, most useful, and noblest work in the world? In planting beans, the old practice was to put three in each hole—one for the worm, one for the crow, and one to live and produce the crop. In teaching children, we may well give the lesson once, expecting the child's frail memory to lose it; twice, reckoning that the devil, like an ill bird, will steal it; thrice, hoping that it will take root downward, and bring forth fruit upward to the glory of God. See our Lord's explanation of the parable of the sower.

A HELPFUL LETTER MISSION.

An excellent feature in connection with the Theatrical Mission (Macready House, Henrietta Street, W.C.) is the letter mission, whereby each girl and child is provided with a lady to correspond with her every month. Letters are eloquent messengers, often finding a hearing in the quietude of rest after toil, coming sometimes just when the heart, by reason of trouble, is open to the message of uplifting and grace. Mr. and Mrs. Courthope Todd relate an encouraging incident of the good wrought by means of correspondence. One bright afternoon they were assisting in a picnic for the young at a seaside resort, and one young lady made herself busy as a voluntary assistant among the children. They thanked her, and presently entered into conversation with her. "You do not seem to remember me," she said; "I'm Madge—I used to be a ballet-girl." For two years she had been governess to a minister's children, and she was teaching them to trust in Jesus, having been brought into the joy of believing by the earnest letters of her "lady correspondent." Teachers and Christian workers, whether able to visit those in whom they are interested or not, will find in letters powerful weapons for good. The young have not reached that experience which sometimes in maturity prompts the busy life to excursionise beyond reach of the familiar post; they rejoice in receiving letters, and the silent page has often become an instrument used by Heaven to turn from evil and lead to eternal decision for right.

FROM THE FAR WEST.

The following interesting communication from "Daisy Croft" has reached us from the far West of Canada: "I have been in this country now nearly eight years, and for over six years could have counted on one hand the numbers of times I had attended a place of worship. We were over twelve miles from the nearest place. Last winter . . . we had a service of the Church of England opened in a neighbour's house about three miles away. The services are held in the afternoon, one Sunday by the clergyman, the other by a lay reader. They are like 'rivers of water in a thirsty land.' How one misses here the 'gathering of ourselves together'! Here we have no meetings except those I have spoken of; the people are too scattered. In winter, the time when in England these meetings are in full swing, our roads are often almost impassable. Last Sunday week the clergyman and myself were over an hour going the three miles, and he had a good horse and light cutter or sleigh. We have such large drifts of snow. But these have their compensation, because the more snow in winter the more grass in summer. But I wish mainly to encourage you by letting you know that even in this distant land your work carries balm and gladness, and lifts up the weary hand. In my youth I was engaged in work for God, but here I am like Moses in the middle of his life, cut off from work for God, and I can only leave myself in His hands. May your work prosper and grow, and still be more and more a blessing in the earth. I often think of the many advantages of my youth, when I never thought that I should be so far away from the ordinances of God's House. How it should stir us up to use our advantages when we have them, for we know not what lies before us in the future." Is there not a lesson for all of us in this message from the New World?

HOW THE WEDDING-RING WAS USED.

HOW THE WEDDING-RING WAS USED.

A beautiful and suggestive romance of home has for its heroine the wife of Avisseau, the potter of Tours. The secret of enamelling gold had perished with the great Palissy. But Avisseau determined to rediscover it. Such were his eagerness and resolution, that he went on experimenting until he had spent his whole substance; and the object of his close quest still eluded him. One day as Avisseau sat in his bare hovel, plunged perhaps in despair, his wife noticed a sudden change. His manner became agitated; his frame quivered. It was an idea that shook him. The poor potter, so often baffled, was almost sure that he had mentally hit on a combination that would succeed. But gloom was soon back upon his brow. Like the ancient alchemists, he needed gold to cast into his crucible. He had neither money nor goods. Avisseau's wife divined the need. She drew her wedding-ring from her finger. "It is our own; take the gold and melt it down," she said. Surely in a new humbleness of hope Avisseau worked again at his problem. His guess had this time gone to the mark; the brave sacrifice had won its recompense. A supreme love had found the opportunity to serve and save. Occasion came when most likely unexpected; and it is often so. The crisis may be a very small one, but if wife, or sister, or dear home friend of either sex, has the gift of insight and the will to forget self for a little space, well will it be for all who make up the family circle. Moreover, many a spring of Christian and philanthropic work has possessed the power of leaping into beneficent life before men, because of the systematic use of home opportunities of help and encouragement.

TEACHING ALL NATIONS.

Stay-at-home Christians have but a very faint conception of the dangers and difficulties that have to be faced by those who go out, in fulfilment of our Lord's last command, to teach all nations. Some idea of their sufferings from heat and from cold, from savage beasts and more savage men, may be gleaned from "Conquests of the Cross," of which the first volume has just been issued by Messrs. Cassell. The work is a fully illustrated record of missionary life and enterprise, and, as such, should find a warm welcome in every home, and in every school library. And while the claims of mission work abroad are before us, let us not forget that nearer home, in the highways and by-ways, the Lord's servants are hard at work, and need all the assistance and encouragement we can give them. "In His Name" is the title which Mr. John Kirk gives to the record of two years' work of the Ragged School Union; and, apart from its interest as an account of good service rendered, the volume is made more interesting by the many portraits and biographies which it contains of those who have been connected with this and similar labours of love. And, at the same time, we have on our table the report, just issued by the National Temperance Publication Depôt, of the congress held at Birmingham in October last year. The volume has been kept back by a variety of unavoidable causes, but the practical papers it contains should be none the less useful to those who are labouring in the temperance cause.—How can we expect our ministers to be helpful teachers of others if we do not supply them with all the assistance that may be derived from the printed works of their fellow-labourers, above all in these days of broadly sown doubt and distrust of Christian truth? To supply this want is the object of Mrs. Spurgeon's Book Fund, the report of which for 1889 has recently been issued by Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster in a form as attractive as is the spirit that animates the work it records. Everyone who is in a position to do so should help the Book Fund, which is always ready to come to the aid of those desiring its assistance.—Probably no part of the Gospel story is more bitterly attacked by those who do not accept it than the accounts of our Lord's miracles. Great teachers who have been taken from us, and some who are still with us, have given to the world the results of years of thoughtful study in works on this subject; and yet the point is not exhausted, so full is it of teaching. The latest volume on this topic is from the pen of Professor Laidlaw, of Edinburgh, who has given us in "The Miracles of Our Lord" (Hodder and Stoughton) a series of most able and scholarly chapters on the various miracles recorded by the Evangelists. Perhaps the introductory chapter on the "arrangement and significance of the miracles" is as valuable as any in the book; but, throughout, the comparisons and contrasts which the Professor draws are most helpful and suggestive, and the work is one that all preachers should study. In a pretty volume, published by Mr. Elliot Stock, are collected the poems of a gifted young Scotchman, William Leighton, whose life was prematurely cut off some twenty years ago, but whose work is still remembered and loved by many readers. The verse is unequal, perhaps, but through it all there is a rare beauty of feeling that cannot fail to commend the volume.

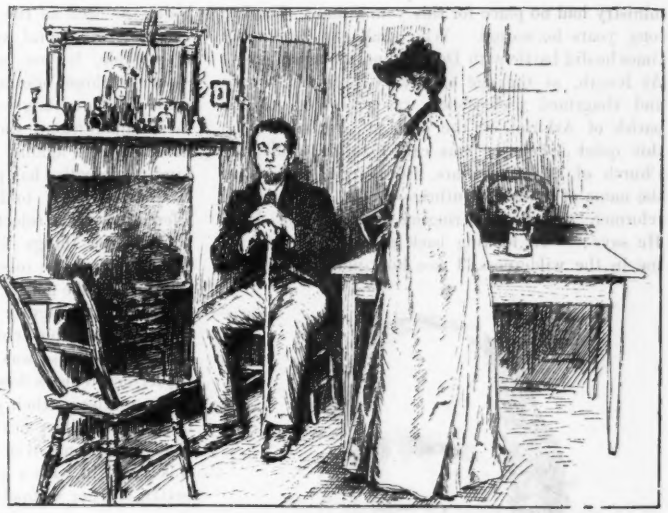
A WORK THAT PAYS.



"Don't leave out the boys," is a motto to which Christian enterprise is giving heed at the present day; and those who know boy-nature best, acknowledge gladly that care for such is a work that pays. A teacher had been discouraged concerning the witty, wild, indolent one in a Bible-class of boys; nothing seemed to fix his attention or to gain his heart, yet when Christmas arrived Master Merryface of all the class distinguished himself by a dainty gift, and a gorgeous card of greeting—tokens that, where least expected, kind words had been appreciated, and affection met with inward response. The friends who manage the Christian Institute for Lads, 9, Cumming Street, Pentonville Road, believe in the hopefulness of boy-nature, and have a record of success and cheer. A short Sunday evening service (when two or three boys made their appearance on the scene) led to an overflowing meeting, till the necessity arose for a club wherein the elder lads could spend their week-evenings. A loft over a stable was painted and decorated, and here for a time the work went on; but still it continued to grow, till the halls in Collier Street were taken, an additional house having lately been opened. The attractions at this institution include a gymnasium, penny bank, reading-room, "games room," lending library, and refreshment room. There are also Bible and educational classes. When we remember the throngs of lads hanging about street-corners and learning evil lessons every evening, and when we consider from what a small beginning this helpful institute has arisen, we long to plead earnestly with some who may be seeking some work for the Master, to go and do likewise, and bless the lads for this life and the life which is to come.

THE "GAMES ROOM" IN CUMMING STREET

USE HOSPITALITY.

The social entertainments that are given in "church parlours" in America are much needed in England. Dinners are said to "lubricate" business; but if it is not possible for a congregation to dine together, the young might occasionally be brought together under the shadow of the Church by some less elaborate entertainment, and allowed to enjoy themselves in an innocent way. We hear of an army chaplain living abroad who, feeling that soldiers, in a country where they cannot speak the language, are very friendless, has an "at home" for them at his house one evening in the week. They are received in the drawing-room just as officers would be received, talked to in a friendly way, and shown books, photographs, and curios. Then they have tea, sandwiches, cakes, fruit, and such-like light refreshments. Afterwards there are recitations and music, and a hymn before parting. As these are social entertainments, for the purpose of getting upon a friendly footing with the men, the chaplain does not invite more on each occasion than can be talked to individually, and he keeps from lecturing and asking impertinent questions as much as he would if he were entertaining officers. He knows that soldiers are of the negro's way of thinking—"If you floggee, floggee, and if you preachee, preachee; but no preachee and floggee both."

"Take the blind by the hand."

LIGHT IN SHADOWLAND.

The Somers Town Blind Aid Society maintains its helpful and devoted work. The report tells us that about two hundred members have been the recipients of Christian care and practical sympathy. "Many a home," say the workers in this mission, "has been made more homelike, and many a sad life better." The blind have been led to help themselves, pensions are granted, pleasant evenings and treats arranged, medical advice is supplied, country trips are provided, homes regularly visited; and by these and various other kindly ways, the great object of the Society is furthered—namely, to influence the blind Christward and heavenward. Friends interested in these labours of love are cordially invited to the weekly meetings, held on Thursdays at seven o'clock, at the Aldenham Board School, Hampden Street, Ossulton Street, Euston Road. The Society (of which Mrs. Starey, 53, Hilldrop Road, N., is honorary secretary, was started several years ago in connection with Regent's Square Presbyterian Church, and it has won many earnest helpers, who with tender solicitude "take the blind by the hand" and smooth for them life's rugged places. Many of these have seen better days: blindness comes sometimes to those who work with brain and pen, comes with mysterious and sorrowful clouds, and the way of plenty is darkened apparently for life. "But God has been good to us all through," testifies the wife of such a sufferer; Christian sympathy has reached their case and lifted the shades of despair.

CONCLUSIVE REASONS.

An official said to George III., "I have the most conclusive reasons for supporting your Majesty's policy; in fact, I have eleven such reasons—a wife and ten children." If these are reasons for a married man to serve an earthly Sovereign, whose policy can sometimes only be supported by the sacrifice of principle, how much rather ought he to serve the King of kings, who only wishes him to do what is right, who gave him his family, and to whom he must account for their welfare here and hereafter!

HOW GUTHRIE WAITED.

At the beginning of the second quarter of the present century a young Scotchman, who was duly licensed to preach if only he could obtain a charge, was, as he phrased it afterwards, "waiting by the pool." At one time he might have been found in Paris, studying medicine at the Sorbonne. At another time he pored over bank-ledgers in his native town. It seemed as though the Christian ministry had no place for this young man. For five long years he waited. Who shall say how many times he did battle with Despair and his myrmidons? At length, at the age of twenty-seven, the weary and chagrined probationer was presented to the parish of Arbirlot, on the coast of Forfar. From this quiet sphere he was called to the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh. And soon the name of Thomas Guthrie—orator, philanthropic reformer, writer—was ringing through the land. He says:—"In looking back on the way God led me in the wilderness, I see how much better He chose for me than I would have chosen for myself." Guthrie recognised that his probation years were, after all, growing years, and therefore good years. There are many who are being bidden, by unpropitious circumstances to-day, to bide God's time before He gives them the fruition of quite lawful desires and hopes. There are Midians for us, as in a past age for Moses. The question is, How and in what spirit do men wait? If the waiting is patient, and wedded to persistent labour, the probation time will be a power-perfecting season.

PRAYER AND PRACTICE.

A well-known recitation tells of a poor widow with whom a benevolent gentleman came to pray, but whose thoughts seemed far from his earnest petitions. All she was heard to utter was the one word "potatoes," and it struck the deacon at last that he had better send her in a supply from his own plentiful store. After that, he found she too was in a prayerful spirit, and her heart was open to derive benefit from his ministrations. The religious work of the present day imitates the Master in caring for the bodies as well as the souls of the needy, and providing for temporal as well as spiritual necessities. If possible, let us not go empty-handed to our poorer brethren, offering them religious advice only, while they are hungry and cold. The Master knows their human frame, and sees how often the heart is hardened even against the sound of His name, till kindly sympathy has practically mirrored His love. A district-visitor told us that in one house the offered paper was rejected with the words, "We have no time for things like that." Some might have been inclined to rebuke with sternness the cold refusal, but she gently tried the force of persuasion, and soon the dignity broke down. "We have no time to read; our child is dying." The one little lamb of the house was very ill, and all the visitor's tender-heartedness flowed forth to her new acquaintances, taking up their grief as her own, and offering them aid. When next she called at that house, a change had come over the manner of reception; she was asked in with a glad welcome. The child was better, but her sympathy in their straits had paved the way for the religious literature and Christian work they had coldly opposed at first. System and method, and so many houses in so many hours, are praiseworthy indeed in their way; but heart must touch heart, and ministering hands must smooth life's rugged pathways, if the work of Christian visitation is indeed to reveal to the people the Lord of Love.

A SKYWARD JOURNEY.

THE ASCENT OF MONT PILATUS: EMBLEMATIC OF THE HILL OF LIFE.

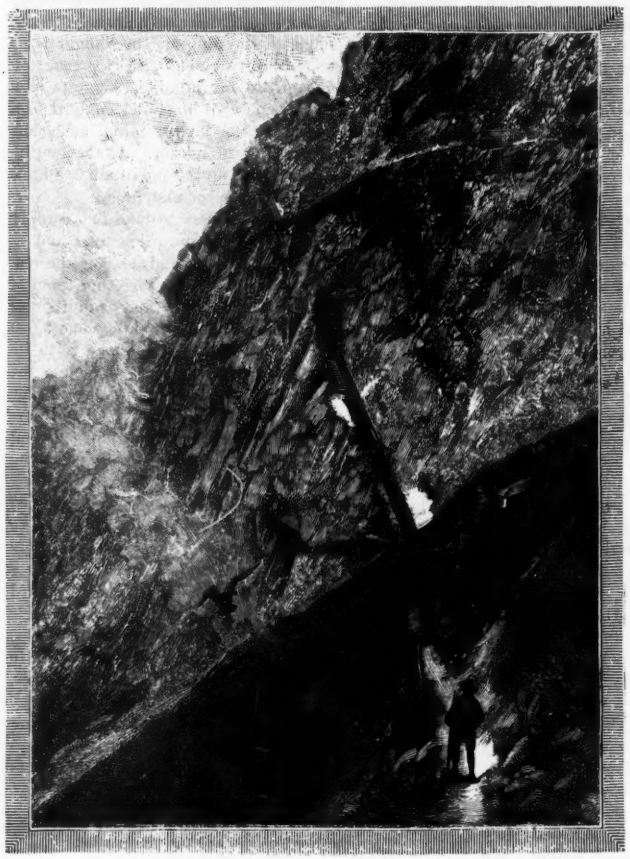
BY THE REV. ARTHUR FINLAYSON, AUTHOR OF "EVANESCENT PHILOSOPHIES," "THE ETHICS OF ATHLETICS," "CONSECRATED INFLUENCE," ETC.

AN ENGINE ON THE MONT PILATUS RAILWAY.

WHILE thousands were attracted to the famous Eiffel Tower in the overcrowded Paris Exhibition, the claims of the new railway up Mont Pilatus, the rugged and serrated mountain that looks down so defiantly upon the beautiful shores of the famous lake of Lucerne, were comparatively forgotten. My wife and I were returning from Italy by the unrivalled St. Gothard route; we had made the ascent of the Righi by the cog-wheel railway, and feasted our eyes on its glorious views at sunrise and sunset; and the result of living and travelling in such high altitudes led us to attempt the ascent of Mont Pilatus by the new railway which was opened in June last during our stay in Lucerne. The wonders of the Righi railroad are familiar to many tourists; but, as compared with the Pilatus railway, the Righi is a level road. The Righi gradients never exceed 20 per cent. On the Pilatus the mean gradient is 42 in 100, and the maximum gradient 48 in 100. These figures will be sufficiently astonishing to the ordinary British reader accustomed to the simple gradients in the United Kingdom. The Pilatus railway has been constructed to take the passengers to a height of nearly 7,000 feet above the sea-level. The highest peak of Pilatus is 6,998 feet (the Righi is 5,905 feet) above sea-level; and the terminal station on the summit of Pilatus is 6,791 feet. Instead of following the capricious windings and irregularities of the mountain-side, the railway leaps boldly over all the intervening hollows and ravines, and, rather than make a troublesome détour, tunnels through the solid rock itself whenever it threatens to bar the way. To effect the ascent, a rack-rail runs midway between the two smooth rails, but at a somewhat higher level. It is of wrought steel, and has a double row of vertical cogs milled out of solid steel bars. Every engine and carriage has two horizontal cog-wheels which grip this raised rack-rail from either side; the brake can be applied to them at any moment; and they are also fitted with vigorous automatic brakes. We took our seat in the carriage, which is divided into four compartments, enabling the train to carry thirty-two passengers, and began the upward ascent of nearly three miles, going at a speed of 65 yards a minute, which is maintained both in ascending and descending.

We have undertaken a journey of terrific steepness, and as we slowly rise above the steep rocky sides of the mountain, we gaze down into its fearful precipices, and then again look upwards to points at so great a height above us, and to rocks of such terrific steepness, that we involuntarily ask ourselves whether it is possible for a train to reach that point. But the next moment we realise the possibility as we turn our gaze downwards, and see below us peaks which but a short time ago, as we viewed them from the lake, were soaring skyward so haughtily and defiantly. I overhear the remark, "It seems wrong and suicidal to attempt so dangerous a journey." But, paradoxical though it may appear, the danger is so great that there is really no risk. Every precaution has been taken; and, to my mind, it suggests how wonderfully God has endowed man, and enabled him to bring into operation the law of mind, and thus to triumph over the law of matter. As the engine slowly pushes our carriage up the mountain, we have two constant views—retrospect and prospect. Now the train stops at a halting-place to take in a supply of water before continuing its upward course; and as we gaze down into the ravines and see, on the one side, a dense forest of beech, and on the other, though much lower down, the fruit-trees and walnut-trees interspersed among the meadows—while some 3,000 feet below are the placid waters of the lake, with its steamers looking like rowing-boats—a feeling of thankfulness that we have been brought safely so far steals into the mind, bringing with it confidence as we contemplate our further skyward journey, and look, with sombre and awe-inspiring feelings, at the bleak heights above us.

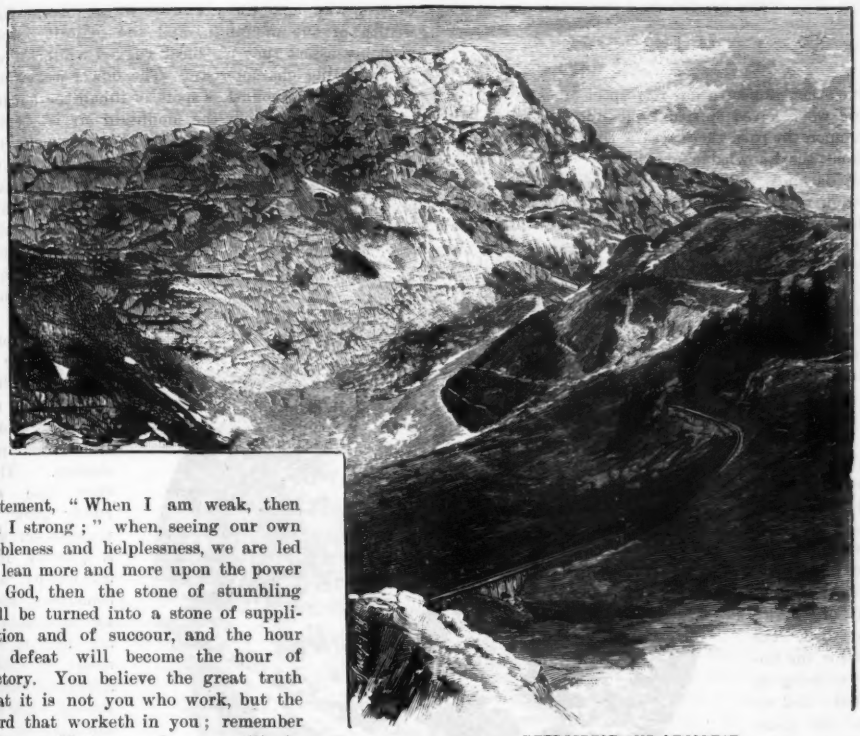
The ascent of Mont Pilatus seems to me emblematic of the hill of life. Many readers may share my mountain reverie. As we journey along life's upward path, it is well to look back and review the track we have trodden, while we look forward hopefully to that which lies before us. Life is made up of two looks—RETROSPECT and PROSPECT. It is well to look back on the road we have traversed, to remember our mercies, to take note of our deliverances. As we look back upon the past, and review all the way through which God hath led us, we shall find much to call forth our gratitude, and to give us hope and confidence in the future. Before us all there may lie cloudy and dark days—



> "When life is low,
> When the blood creeps, and the nerves prick
> And tingle, and the heart is sick,
> And all the wheels of being slow."

Our path in life may lie along some wildly precipitous incline, or (so to speak) along some savage mountain mass, whose steep sides are scarred by many a dark cavern and gaping chasm. But if we have Christ for our guide, no road will be insuperably rough, no declivity excessively steep, and no mountain-peak wholly inaccessible. "To Him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My Throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His Throne."

In climbing the hill of life you and I may never have been in circumstances of much peril, but we have none the less had our deliverances. It is well, therefore, at times, to look back upon the past history of our lives, to remember our deliverances, to take warning by our falls, and to thank God for His mercies. Thus doing we shall be the better prepared for the ascents that lie before us.



Yonder is the ravine we traversed amid sickness and suffering. When the foot was heavy, the hand weary, the head aching, and the heart sickening, we felt as though our daily work was a burden to us, and our ordinary care more than we could bear. Yet God in His mercy raised us up again, and now we rejoice in health and strength. Shall not the health and strength we now possess be gladly and gratefully given to God's service? Shall not that ravine of sickness speak to us of His mercy and love in the months to come, and in the journey that yet remains before us?

Yonder in the valley are the rocks which we might christen "stones of stumbling and of succour." Here is the place where we stumbled, and where God's mercy alone held us up. Here is the place of suffering and supplication, and here also the place of succour. The hour of defeat became the hour of triumph. In secular history we often find that where the greatest defeats had been sown, there the greatest triumphs have been subsequently raised. And this is true in the lives of individual men as well as nations. My brother, have you no such places in your mind's memory along the track you have traversed this last year or month? What! Have you had no stumblings? Perhaps you began with many good resolutions. You determined to be less irritable, less selfish, more charitable, more thoughtful for the happiness of others. You had a noble ambition. You wished to make that little world in which you move happier, brighter, and better. If you say that you set out without a single good resolution, then you confess at once a terrible defeat. But I will not think so badly of you as this. You did form resolutions. Trouble in your home, or perplexity in your business, or the sudden death of a friend, arrested your thoughts, and you perhaps said, "I will turn over a new leaf; I will try and lead a good life."

"We look upwards to rocks of terrific steepness."—p. 563.

Brother, you did well. You made a good start. Did you succeed? Thank God if you have been able to persevere. But be honest with yourself. Back, as the echo of your own resolution, comes the mournful word "Defeat!" Or perhaps you were a decided Christian. You were determined to live for God. You faced many foes, and by God's grace overcame them. But in an unguarded hour your temper was not controlled, or one word of sarcasm wounded a friend, and you knew at once the pain and the reality of defeat. Yet, in spite of this, I ask you, as you read this message, to raise your Ebenezer, and to make it a real stone of help in your pilgrimage of progress. When we enter into the truth of the Apostle's statement, "When I am weak, then am I strong;" when, seeing our own feebleness and helplessness, we are led to lean more and more upon the power of God, then the stone of stumbling will be turned into a stone of supplication and of succour, and the hour of defeat will become the hour of victory. You believe the great truth that it is not you who work, but the Lord that worketh in you; remember this steadfastly, and you will be enabled to overcome all evil powers, and to strengthen and confirm your resolutions. Don't be afraid to look at and confess your defeat; and then you may be able to raise an Ebenezer of victory as you cry, like Israel of old, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."

RETROSPECT AND PROSPECT.

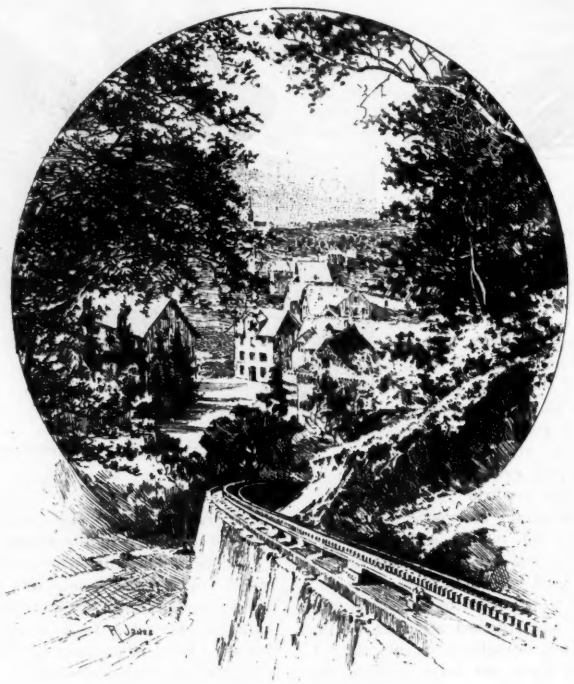
God leads us forth to the place of sorrow to wean our hearts from self and sin and all earthly aims, that we may say, "Thou broughtest us into the net; Thou laidst affliction upon our loins. Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place. I will go into Thy house with burnt offerings: I will pay Thee my vows, which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble." And as we manfully and cheerfully march on with staff in hand through the dark night of life, we find ourselves insensibly surmounting obstacles, scaling precipices, and piercing the overhanging clouds of doubtful fear that brood over us, introducing us to the realm of golden sunshine, whence all mists are dispelled and the eye can see with clearer vision.



> "The darkest cloud is not all darkness,
> The roughest wave hath white foam near it,
> And sparkles through the gloomiest night,
> Some solitary star to cheer it."

The difficulties we have faced, and the deliverances we have experienced, should call forth the homage of a grateful heart while inspiring us with fresh courage and hope in the future.

Yonder is the valley where we suffered our bereavement. We were climbing the hill of life together when death crept near and struck down a sweet child, a beloved wife, a loving mother, or a dear father. In that moment we fancied that life had lost all its brightness and joy for us. We felt sorely stricken. Yet God gave us grace to bear the blow; and though our heart still aches, we have a clearer vision of the inheritance upon which these loved ones have entered, so that we are now, perhaps, beginning to say, in humble submission and childlike confidence, "It is well." Then let the heritage of those dark days cheer us if the future bring us trials, and if we are called to weep over those who have "gone before." "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good," has a talismanic influence. Here is the soul's anchorage while it looks forward to the thought of reunion in the Resurrection. This hope is a tonic to the soul. It reminds us that we are pilgrims on earth, emigrants to the heavenly country. It bids us cultivate deeper views of self, clearer views of sin, brighter views of Jesus, and nearer views of heaven. And ever and anon, as we press onward and upward on the hill of life, there lingers, perchance, with our march the refrain—

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er:
I'm nearer home to-day
Than e'er I've been before."

One other glance in our retrospect takes in the hill where we received spiritual blessing. As we look back upon the past, there was a time when we were without the knowledge of Christ. "Ye were sometimes darkness." This was then our condition. Our question to the earnest believer in Jesus was: "What is thy Beloved more than another beloved?" But now through trial, or the preaching of the Gospel, or the words and pleadings of some Christian, or the quiet perusal of some tract, or the silent example of some loved one in the home, we have been drawn to the Saviour. The load of sin has rolled off; we have been melted, subdued, and won by the love of Jesus, who died, the Just for the unjust, to bring us to God; and we have the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, guarding our hearts and our thoughts in Christ Jesus. And as our retrospective glance shows us the various stages of our spiritual progress, if the recollection of the past does not stimulate to greater earnestness, louder praise, more fervent prayer, and stronger faith, the knowledge that Jesus Christ is "the same yesterday and to-day and for ever" most assuredly will; and these past tokens of His grace and love will become so many additional pledges of His presence and His power as we face the future leaning upon His promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

LOOKING BACKWARD.

The flora of Mont Pilatus is scarcely surpassed by that of any other of the Swiss mountains. As many as twenty-three different species of orchids may be found on the mountain, and its garment of flowers includes nearly five hundred different species, making it among the gayest and loveliest of those which deck the countless peaks of Switzerland. Yet comparatively few of those tourists who make the ascent are aware of the floral wealth of the mountain, and the majority would probably assert that a "bleak rugged wildness" was its prevailing characteristic. The flower-seeker may feast his eyes at countless spots, or inhale the delicious fragrance with which the mountain air is scented, while almost every step reveals some new object of delight. And so in climbing the hill of life, there are many who see nothing of the beautiful blossoms or peerless petals which stud life's journey; they travel through this world as though it were a weary wilderness, an arid desert. They are often unconsciously afflicted with a species of mental hemiopia, in which they only see one side of the hill of life, and that the worst side. Hence their pessimism. Thus they lose the ruddy glow of joyousness; and a gloomy misanthropy, and sometimes mental decrepitude, are apt to derange all their affections. Others indeed, while not unconscious of the rugged aspects of life, pursue their journey as through a well-watered garden, delighting in the green mountain pastures, resting amid delicate fronds and ferns, and enjoying the constant and ever-changing hues and fragrance of multitudinous flowers. Now what is the talisman by whose aid we may climb the hill of life? It all lies here: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him, and He will show them His covenant." Life apart from God is a mere existence; all is dark, gloomy, cold, and cheerless. But "He careth for you" has a talismanic influence. It strengthens, stimulates, and invigorates the whole being. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." And as we toil along life's rugged hill, the prayer of one of old becomes our own, "Hold up our goings in Thy paths, that our footsteps slip not;" and thus praying we pass through the changing scenes of a changing life, assured that if we can only hear the Master's voice whispering,

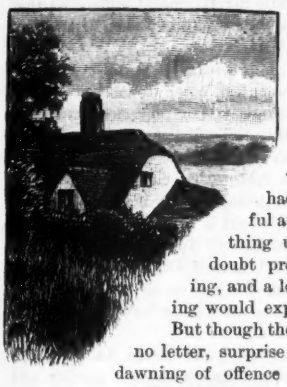
"This is the way, walk ye in it," all life's trials shall be sweetened, and life's burdens lightened, and crosses and losses be working together for our good.

Here, then, is our wisdom. "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe," is the prayer that swells from the heart, as with fresh energy and courage we climb the hill of life. Our way may lie through a labyrinth of dark ravines and deep glens, of rugged ridges, sharp crags and lofty pinnacles enshrouded with heavy clouds, but committing our way unto the Lord, and following where He leads, we may trustfully face all trials in the spirit of the beautiful words of Robert Browning—

> "I stoop
> Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud.
> It is but for a time. I press God's lamp
> Close to my breast; its splendours soon or late
> Will pierce the gloom. I shall emerge some day."

The future may have dark days in store, but there are brighter beyond. The guarantee of the believer's hope lies in the word of the Lord Jesus, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

Two women of old, when approaching the tomb of their risen Lord, discussed the question how the stone, which was too great for them to remove, should be rolled away; yet, undeterred by this, they advanced with their spices, and found the difficulty gone, and the stone already rolled away by an unseen hand. And every honest and true heart when advancing to duty in the face of appalling difficulties has the like gracious record of experience—the stone of difficulty has been rolled away, the rough path has been made smooth, and the formidable hill surmounted. "Forward!" then, be our watchword, "Excelsior!" our motto.



WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

BY E. NEAL, AUTHOR OF "MY BROTHER BASIL," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

FOR PITY'S SAKE.

"For Pity is sworn servant unto Love."—Daniel.

AVICE had been surprised rather than alarmed by her lover's absence on the day which Caillot's visit and the fire had made so eventful at Verecroft. Something unforeseen had no doubt prevented his coming, and a letter in the morning would explain what it was. But though the morning brought no letter, surprise and the faintest dawning of offence was all she felt.

"He might have written, I think," she said, when Mrs. Meredith had left the breakfast-room; but Daisy did not answer. She was reading the war news in the morning paper, and had neither eyes nor ears for anything else.

Suddenly she looked up with dilated eyes, and uttered a sound of such acute distress that her sister's arms were round her, and Avice was soothing and comforting before she even understood what the trouble was.

"Read it," said Daisy, pointing to the official list of "Killed and Wounded" that recorded the British loss at Tel-el-Kebir. "Oh, Avice, Avice! do you think he will die?"

Avice looked down the column, where Captain Hallam's name appeared in the list of wounded, and pointed out that the asterisk which meant "dangerously" was not attached to his name.

"But slight wounds hurt," said Daisy, shuddering. "I know how it felt when I cut my hand."

"You little goose! Do you suppose a soldier minds a little pain? One ought to be thankful his life is spared."

"I am, I am indeed! But I can't bear to think of his suffering, and no one with him who really cares. And even if it is a slight wound, it may get dangerous in that hot climate, and he may die, and—and never know!"

"Know what?" asked Avice gravely. "Would you wish him to know, dear, unless he cared himself?"

"But he does—he does! You don't understand, I know, and I can't explain—but oh, Avice! he loves me—he told me so! And I was so—so horrid to him! And now he'll never know."

Daisy gave way to a fresh burst of grief, and Avice regarded her with a very puzzled face.

"'Horrid'?" she said, with a faint sad smile. "I don't believe you could be that if you tried; and I'm sure I don't know why you should have tried. Oh, Daisy! how could you be so foolish? If two people love each other, it seems to me that they should let nothing—nothing—ever come between them."

Daisy said nothing. She could not defend herself without betraying the secret that was not only hers but her mother's also. She let her head drop in her clasped hands, with a hopeless, despairing sigh that made Avice only anxious to console.

"Don't grieve so," she said gently. "It will come right in time. And if it did not, you could bear it, I think, now you know he cares. Oh, Daisy! one could bear anything if one were sure of that!"

Avice clasped her hands and gazed before her with a wistful, far-away gaze, and a long, envious sigh, and Daisy looked at her wonderingly.

"But you are sure, are you not?" she said simply. "Surely you don't doubt Ray just because he did not come when you expected him yesterday?"

"Ray? I was not talking about Ray, or—or myself," stammered Avice, with a painful burning blush. "Ray is only too good, too loyal and honest and true. I wish I were worthy of him."

The sigh that Avice breathed came from her very heart. The sense of unworthiness, of disloyalty, almost of baseness, increased with every returning day. She told herself that it was impossible to break off her engagement: that to do so would wrong Sir Raymond even more than to continue it; but the hopeless struggle to conquer her love for Lancelot, and the painful consciousness that every thought she gave to him was a wrong to his cousin, was a perpetual humiliation and reproach. Sometimes she thought that she must break it all off, or at least tell Sir Raymond that affection was all she had to give him, and leave it to him to decide. But how could she pain him so? She would be patient, try a little longer, and fight with herself a little harder, and surely peace would come at last. But even as the thought, that was rather an aspiration than a hope, passed through her mind, the little parlour-maid announced, "Mr. Vereker," and as Lancelot came in, Avice knew that if peace were some day to be won, she was very far from having won it. She stood up to receive him with outward composure, but her heart beat like a caged thing in her breast, her head swam, her hands were like ice. She felt herself turn pale, and then crimsoned with shame at her own agitation.

Lancelot was too much agitated himself to notice it. He had ridden in to tell the news of the fire, and of the injuries it was feared Sir Raymond had received, and was only anxious to get his news told with as little shock and pain to Avice as he could. "I believe he is better than the doctor thinks," he said confidently. "I have telegraphed to London for Sir Baldwin Smith, and I shall take a doctor back with me from here. There are no broken bones, at all events, and a sprain always seems worse than it is. But Ray, poor fellow, fancies himself badly hurt, and wants to see you—if—if it would not be too trying or painful for you?"

"I will come, of course," said Avice quickly.

"Thank you. He will feel it very kind. We have telegraphed for Lady Vereker, and she will be at Verecroft this afternoon. I thought that if you would come, the carriage that will meet her at Warwick might call here first for you."

"Tell him I will come, please—and—and give him my love."

She could not say less, and even to herself, in the access of new emotion, it did not sound insincere. Sir Raymond, gay and happy and aggressively demonstrative, and Sir Raymond stricken down and injured in the heroic effort to save his cousin's—to save Lancelot's—life, were two quite different things. Her heart was divided between a gratitude that might not be spoken, that might hardly be acknowledged to herself, but that transfigured Sir Raymond into something between a hero and a martyred saint, and a flood of pity for the young man, struck down in his prime of youth and strength, and appealing to her from his couch of suffering for the love and sympathy in which he so entirely believed.

In the onrush of pity, and perhaps of remorse, a great tenderness awoke in her breast. Was it only an hour ago that she had seriously contemplated breaking off her engagement? She did not contemplate it now; she only thought with shame how best she might quicken her cold half-hearted troth into a vital reality, and so make the future atone for the past.

It was characteristic of Avice that neither when she first accepted Sir Raymond's offer, nor now, when she dedicated her life to him afresh, had his title or position weighed as much as a feather in the scale. Whatever her faults, a vulgar ambition was not amongst their number. When Lancelot walked by her side in the fair sweet fields so many lovers' feet have trod, and pleaded his cousin's cause, it was not the thought of being Lady Vereker that won her consent—it was the hope of keeping her miserable secret, and proving her indifference to himself. It was pride then; it was pity now. Her duty, it seemed to her, was plain. Whatever might happen, Sir Raymond must not be agitated by painful questions, and anything she could do to further his recovery must be done, at whatever cost to herself.

She was so gentle and sweet, as she bent over Sir Raymond's couch for the kiss she could not refuse, that Lady Vereker felt, with a thrill of tender delight, that it would not be difficult to love her daughter-in-law; while Sir Raymond whispered that it was worth while to be hurt to have her look at him like this.

"You must come again," Lady Vereker said, "as soon as he is well enough to come down-stairs;" and Avice promised willingly. For pity, while it is in the ascendant, is hardly to be distinguished from love. She need not fear to meet Lancelot, she told herself, if she could always feel to his cousin as she felt to him to-day. The throbbing of her heart as Lancelot put her in the carriage told a very different tale, but as she drove home in the soft dusk of the September evening she persuaded herself that it was only the reflection of a bygone folly, even as the flush in the western sky was but the after-glow left by a vanished sun.

When she reached home she found Lady Rosalie Finch in the drawing-room with her mother and sister, and as anxious as they were to hear how Sir Raymond was. Lady Rosalie had only come back from Scarborough an hour before, and had come into the Hermitage to hear and relate whatever news she could. She was, indeed, burning to deliver herself of a piece of intelligence she had carefully kept out of her letters, but the absorbing news of the Verecroft fire and Sir Raymond's injuries engrossed them all till Avice's return.

"Internal, are they?" she said, when Avice had given her report of the doctor's opinions. "I hope it isn't as serious as it sounds! Is Lady Vereker very much cut up?"

"She is much grieved, of course; but the doctors are hopeful, I believe, and he is so good and patient——"

"And will have everything done that money can do; so he ought to pull through. How much of the house is really burnt, Avice? The servants told me Verecroft was burnt to the ground, but your mother says it isn't as bad as that."

"Oh no; it is only the right wing. But that is quite wrecked, and the water has done a great deal of damage to the other part of the house. The pictures——"

"Oh, what do pictures matter? They won't mind about them if Sir Raymond gets on all right," said Lady Rosalie, who was getting a little tired of the Verecroft fire, and was, besides, too anxious to tell her own news to dwell too long on any other topic.

"What do you think?" she cried. "I've such a piece of news for you! I've been dying to tell you the last three weeks, but I've bottled it up, and not given you the tiniest hint. Now you shall guess—I'll give you three tries."

"That is the way people tell wedding news," said Avice. "Is Miss Jackson going to be married?"

"Turning the ring he had given her round and round."—p. 574.

"She is married!" cried Lady Rosalie, enjoying their astonishment. "She was married last week, and she and her Ruggles are in Italy, billing and cooing, and doing interminable picture-galleries, poor things!"

"Mr. Ruggles? Oh!—I thought you didn't think him quite——"

"A gentleman? I don't believe he is—in fact, my dear, I know he isn't—but that's her affair, isn't it? He's very well off; and so he ought to be, considering what his profession is!"

"I thought he was in the Commissariat Department?"

Lady Rosalie broke into a laugh that echoed through the little room.

"So he said, my dear! But—you'll never tell, will you? Hilda would kill me if she knew I'd let it out! I found out all about him through a man who was staying at the 'Grand,' and knew him. In the Commissariat Department!—he's a sort of glorified contractor, and supplies the Government with pork!"

Lady Rosalie's laughter was infectious; but when she had gone they all owned to a good deal of disgust at the man, not for being what he was, but pretending to be what he was not.

"Lady Rosalie will miss Miss Jackson dreadfully," said Mrs. Meredith; "but I don't think a woman who could make a marriage like that can be really nice."

"She isn't nice," said Avice, "and Lady Rosalie will be a great deal nicer without her. She was always making her do things she only half liked."

And, indeed, though Lady Rosalie deplored her friend's departure as if it were the greatest misfortune that could have happened to her, the release from Hilda's overbearing presence was probably a relief. Lady Rosalie flooded her rooms with photographs of her absent friend, and declared she missed her more than ever she had missed her "poor dear Charlie"; but she was able now to come and go as she pleased, to enjoy her maid's undivided services, and to get out of debt. Before she had been home a month she confessed to Avice, with a guilty look that amused her very much, that she would not have had Hilda back again for the world.

CHAPTER XXX.

DALRYMPLE PASHA.

"Innocence shall make False accusation blush."—SHAKESPEARE.

THE statement which Private Franks had made to Captain Hallam, as they watched the Khedive's triumphal entry into Cairo, was so extraordinary that the astounded officer looked at his companion to see if he had taken leave of his senses.

"You forged it?" he cried incredulously. "You don't know what you are talking about, my poor fellow! Have another pull at the seltzer, and lie down quietly. You've no business to be sitting up like this."

The concern in Philip's honest face made the other smile, though it was a smile that had more bitterness than merriment in it.

"I know what I am talking about quite well," he said quietly. "I forged the endorsement of that accursed bill, and I've never been able to look an honest man in the face since. I've just gone down—down—down—and here I am."

"And Dalrymple is innocent!" said Philip. "Franks, if you can prove that——"

"I am not Franks, and therefore I can prove it. I told you I am Ned Fazackerley, Mrs. Dalrymple's brother. I shall never see her again, but I'd like to clear her husband before I die. I'll tell you just how it was, if you care to hear."

If he cared! Was it not Daisy's father whose innocence was to be proved? He assented eagerly, and Fazackerley proceeded, not unwilling, perhaps, to unburden himself to a friendly ear.

"Hugh and I were brothers-in-law, as you know, and very good friends. My father, however, hated him, for he'd been against the marriage from the first. Madge was a beauty, and no mistake, and he had always meant her to make a great match; but she could be as obstinate as he was, and stuck to Dalrymple through thick and thin. The end of it was they ran away together, and my father vowed he'd cut her off with a shilling. It was rough on Dalrymple, who had nothing but his pay, but he took it very coolly, and said it was Madge he wanted, and not her money: which was true enough, I dare say; but the money would have been extremely convenient to a man more or less in difficulties, as it turned out Dalrymple was. We all thought my father would come round, but he wasn't built that way, any more than Madge. He would have nothing to do with them; but I saw a good deal of them from time to time, though the governor would have been furious if he had known. Well," said Fazackerley, moistening his dry lips, "it is no use laying one's sins on other people's shoulders; but I think if the governor had not been the harsh and stern man he was, all that misery would not have happened. I was frightened of him, and when I found myself pressed for a considerable sum of money I had lost on the turf, my great anxiety was to keep the whole matter from my father's ears. He had paid my debts once, and vowed that if ever I laid another shilling on a race, he would turn me out of doors."

"What did you do then?" asked Philip.

"I got Dalrymple to back a bill for me; but the money-lender had got wind of his difficulties, and wouldn't be satisfied without another name. I knew well enough I couldn't get one that would satisfy old Moss, and I forged one that would—though I swear I had no thought then of hurting poor old Hugh."

"But you must have known——"

"Not then, I tell you," said Fazackerley impatiently. "I knew it afterwards, of course; but I always hoped to find the money before the bill came due. As it turned out, everything went against me, and when Dalrymple was arrested, I—I—— Well, you see, the long and the short of it is, no one could clear him but me, and—I didn't! I told you to shake hands with me first—I knew you wouldn't afterwards!" ended Fazackerley, turning his face to the wall.

Philip sat looking at him in silence, divided between pity for the man and horror at his crimes. It seemed to the upright and honourable Philip that the forgery was as nothing compared with the turpitude of letting his friend suffer in his stead; and, as he looked at the wasted hand with which the perjured man had covered his face, he felt that Fazackerley was right in saying he would not shake hands when he knew. It was true. He could not have taken that hand in friendship now, though it was the hand that had saved his own life.

The silence lasted long, but at last Fazackerley spoke.

"I knew how it would be," he said bitterly. "I was a gentleman myself once! I don't know why I told you, except that I felt as if I couldn't die with that on my mind. But perhaps it would have been better if I'd kept it to myself."

"No—oh no!" said Captain Hallam earnestly. "I'm no parson, but I know it must have been best, even for yourself; and think what it may be for him! Think what it will be for his wife and children to have his innocence proved at last!"

"Yes," sighed Fazackerley. "It's been rough on Madge—such a lot as she thought of Dalrymple. Poor Madge! And how fond she was of me once! I wonder what she'd think if she could see me now!"

"How long is it since you saw her?"

"Not since the trial. I couldn't have faced her after that. I'd give a good deal to know what became of her."

"I can tell you that," said Philip. "She is living in Leamington with her daughters. They call themselves Meredith."

"My mother's name! Madge was christened Margaret Meredith. I might have guessed she would call herself that, if I'd thought of her changing her name; but somehow I never did."

"You didn't know where they were, then?"

"No; I lost sight of them when I enlisted."

Again there was a silence in the room. Outside, the square was still crowded with people, though the procession had long since gone by, and the early Egyptian twilight was already falling, and a muezzin from each of the four hundred mosques was calling the "faithful" to prayer.

There was no perceptible diminution of the motley crowd in the Mahmoudieh Square. Ever changing, it seemed ever the same, with the same confusion of race and dress, with the same polyglot babel of tongues, and the shrill Egyptian voices rising harshly over all.

But Captain Hallam and Fazackerley had neither eyes nor ears for outside things. Hallam was urging on the wretched man the duty of making such reparation as he could before he died, and considering how best Dalrymple's innocence might be established. He wished his father were there—his father, who had tried the case, and would know just what needed to be done. That something should be done, and at once, Philip was determined. In any case he would have felt it an imperative duty to do his best to help to right an innocent man, but the thought of Daisy quickened the natural impulse into immediate and energetic action. What might not a man hope for who could bring to her the news of her father's innocence, who could say to her, "He is restored to his country and to you through me"?

He insisted sternly that he would not sleep till Dalrymple knew the truth, and Fazackerley alternately promised to do whatever he asked and shrank from every plan that he proposed. See his injured brother-in-law he could not and he would not, he declared. He would repeat his confession before any witnesses Philip liked, or sign any paper he pleased; but he would not see the friend he had betrayed, or utter a word if he was brought into his presence.

And so, while the illuminations that testified the fickle Cairenes' joy at the return of the Sovereign they had rebelled against were turning the shabby old town into a fairy city, Captain Hallam made his way up to the Citadel, and asked for Colonel Selby, and was lucky enough to find him in his quarters.

"They do these things better in France," said the colonel, looking down on the twinkling lights below. "I've no fancy to risk my neck amongst all those howling blackguards, but you youngsters will go anywhere for a lark."

"It isn't for a lark I'm out to-night," said Philip gravely. And then he told his story, and found the colonel ready enough to go anywhere and do anything he desired.

Half an hour later, the two officers and an English chaplain they had brought with them stood by the dying man's pillow; and when at length Colonel Selby and Captain Hallam retired to another room and left him to the chaplain's ministrations, Philip felt, with unutterable thankfulness, that he held in his hands such proofs of Hugh Dalrymple's innocence as could not fail to win for him his full vindication before the world.

He lost no time the next morning in applying for an introduction to Dalrymple Pasha, and though he found it a more difficult matter than he expected, he obtained an audience at last, and was ushered into a room fitted up in the usual Egyptian manner, with a blending of Eastern luxuriousness and Parisian adornment.

A man dressed in Turkish uniform was writing at a table in the centre of the room, while two or three others stood around him, and as Philip entered, he rose and bowed rather stiffly. Dalrymple Pasha seldom saw his fellow-countrymen, and never encouraged their visits. With those who did not know his previous history he felt in a false position, while to those who did, a morbid sensitiveness made him fancy himself the object of a vulgar curiosity he had no inclination to gratify. He looked rather haughtily at Captain Hallam as he inquired his business, and was evidently profoundly surprised when Philip replied that it was of too private a nature to be explained before the Pasha's attendants.

"They do not understand English," said Dalrymple, shortly; "and I must warn you I am a busy man, and have little time for private affairs. I, can indeed, scarcely imagine what business of a private nature a stranger can have with me," he added, looking curiously at Philip's agitated face; "but whatever it is, I must ask you to be as brief as you can."

Philip did his best to comply with the injunction, and in a very few minutes Dalrymple was aware that his innocence had come to light, and that the man through whose crimes he had suffered so much had made a full confession of his guilt. He received the news with a dignity that impressed Captain Hallam very much.

"I always believed the truth would come out," he said quietly. "It has come too late for happiness, but not for honour, and I thank you with all my heart. I do not know why you should have taken so much trouble on my behalf——"

"Oh!" cried Philip, "I am thankful—more thankful than I can say—to have been of use to you."

He spoke in a tone of such genuine feeling, that once more Dalrymple looked at him in surprise.

"I did not know you in England, did I?" he asked. "No, you are too young for that. But your name seems not unfamiliar to me. Hallam? Why, that was the name——"

He stopped short, and a dark flush covered the bronzed cheek.

"Yes," said Philip, entirely understanding it, "my father, Lord Blackstone, was Mr. Justice Hallam, the judge who tried you for the crime you never committed. No one, I am sure, will be more rejoiced to hear that your innocence is established."

"He only did his duty," said Dalrymple, "and I bear him no grudge, I assure you. Is it because of your relationship to him that you have given yourself all this trouble for me?"

"Partly," said Philip, with an ingenuous blush. "But I believe I did it chiefly for the sake of your daughters."

"My daughters? Is it possible you know them? Oh, why did I never meet you before? The years that have passed without seeing them, without knowing even if they were alive or dead!"

He was profoundly agitated, but, like another Egyptian ruler of alien blood, he "refrained himself," and speaking a few words in Turkish to the Orientals round him, he waited till they had gone before he gave way to his emotion, or inquired further of the children he had not seen for so many weary years. Hallam was very willing to tell him all he knew, and unconsciously betrayed a good deal more of his own feelings than he was at all aware of; but Dalrymple made no remark.

"Please God, I shall see them again soon," he said, shaking Philip's hand; "my wife will hardly wish to keep them away from me now."

The next moment he repented of the bitter speech.

"I do not blame her," he said quickly. "The evidence was too overwhelming, and who could dream of perjury in a boy like that? I declare that as I looked at him, standing up in the witness-box, with his fair, boyish face, and innocent blue eyes, swearing away my liberty and honour, I almost began to think I must have done it after all!"

"You will write to Mrs. Meredith—to Mrs. Dalrymple, I suppose?" said Philip, stumbling over the unfamiliar name.

"No," said the Pasha, laying his hands upon the proofs of his innocence. "She did not believe my word before, and she might not again. I will say and do nothing till I can stand before her face to face, and show her these."

CHAPTER XXXI.

DOOMED.

I hear a voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay,
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away."—TICKELL.

"BETTER, thank you, much better," was Lady Vereker's unfailing reply to those who inquired after her son; and indeed, it seemed as if Sir Raymond were struggling slowly back to health and strength at last. He had begun to come down-stairs, and even to go out a little in a pony-chair that had belonged to Mrs. Kenyon; and Lady Vereker and Lancelot hailed every little advance towards convalescence with a rapture no one had the heart to damp. No one ventured to suggest to them that convalescence ought not to have been so long in coming, or that Sir Raymond was looking thinner and paler from day to day. Sir Raymond was quite aware of it himself, and had his own thoughts concerning the future which Lady Vereker and Lancelot were fond of painting for him in such glowing colours, but he did not try to undeceive them. They would know soon enough, he thought. There was no need to make them unhappy before the time. He was not unhappy himself. He felt that the position into which he had been forced was too strained, too full of difficulties to be bearable or even tenable for long. If he got well he did not think it would be possible for him to be really happy in so false a situation. Always he would feel a pretender and impostor in the dear old home, a defrauder accepting love and honour and respect to which he had no right; but this would make it all easy, and meanwhile he could rest in their love as he never could have done if he had been going to get well. Avice was at Verecroft again, and he lay on his couch and watched them from day to day, the three who were each and all so dear to him, and felt that for Lady Vereker and Lancelot, at least, it was best that he should go. Who could tell that Caillot would not return, that Dr. Fletcher and M. Martel would keep silence? Who could say how long a secret that was known to three people would be kept? He had not felt at liberty to contest Lancelot's decision, but how full of peril, of strained relations, of impossible situations, the future was! Even for Avice—for Avice, whom it was impossible to leave in ignorance, and to whom it was equally impossible to reveal the truth—even for her it was best, the young man thought, looking at his betrothed through a dew of tender tears.

For the thought of Avice was the bitterest drop in the cup of renunciation he drank so uncomplainingly that no one knew how entirely he realised that he had done with life, and the hopes that this life holds. Sometimes he thought of winning her consent to an immediate marriage, that she might reap whatever advantages might attach to the position of his widow; and then a bitter smile answered his own thought. Of his widow! Could he saddle the estate—the estate that was not his, but Lancelot's—with charges for a fictitious Lady Vereker? It would only be perpetuating the fraud of which he was as much a victim as Lancelot himself. He could do nothing, nothing but commend her to Lancelot's care; and one day, when Avice had gone out with Lady Vereker, and Lancelot was sitting by him, he laid his hand on his cousin's, and looked up at him with an earnest appealing gaze, that made him wonder what was coming.

"I want to speak to you, Lance! I want to talk to you about Avice."

He was too absorbed in his own ideas to notice how Lancelot changed colour, or the look of startled apprehension that came into his face. Had he betrayed himself, Lancelot wondered, and was his cousin jealous? He came round to the head of the couch, where his own face was out of Sir Raymond's sight.

"What about her?" he asked shortly, not trusting himself to speak her name.

"I want to tell you just how I feel about it; and, Lance, dear Lance! be patient, please, and let me say all I want. You think I am getting better, and perhaps I am, but I want to talk now as if I were not. I want to think what will be best for Avice if I do not get well."

"Well?"

"I mean—I know that though I am Vereker of Verecroft in name, I have nothing really of my own——"

"Bosh!" said Lancelot briefly.

"And I would have liked to leave her a little, just to show how much I love her——"

"Raymond," said Lancelot earnestly, "as far as I am concerned, I can only say you are free to act as if Caillot had never been here to spoil our peace. Forget that he has! Do what is right and fitting for Sir Raymond Vereker, do whatever is in accordance with your own wishes, and believe that the more you do for her, the better I shall be pleased."

"How good you are!" answered Sir Raymond.

"Good? Not at all! Did you think I wanted you to be a dummy in my place? You are Vereker of Verecroft, to do what you will, and I am more than content. There is only one thing in which I will be master, and it is this. I have given in to an invalid's whim once, but I will not do so again. Make your will, and welcome—it is what every sane man ought to do, well or ill—but dismiss the idea that you will not get well. You will, you must, for our sake and for hers."

And then Lady Vereker and Avice came back, and nothing more could be said. Sir Raymond never alluded to the subject again, but he made a will leaving to Avice a sum exactly equivalent to that which Mrs. Kenyon had left to Lancelot, and which was to revert to "the young man known as Sir Raymond Vereker," should he be in need of it while Lancelot was not. No doubt she had foreseen that the truth might come to light, and had intended to provide for the innocent agent of her own fraud, should he be dispossessed of Verecroft. This he might fairly regard as his own, and this he might leave to Avice without wronging Lancelot. It was a great relief to him to have the matter settled, for he had dwelt on it with all an invalid's persistence. There was nothing on his mind now, he told Lancelot, cheerfully, the first time they found themselves alone, except that he could not quite rid himself of the idea that he ought perhaps to do something for Caillot.

"For Caillot?" exclaimed Lancelot. "My dear Ray, you need do nothing for him, unless you like to take out a warrant against him for arson. I wouldn't say anything before, but I've pretty good proof that it was he set fire to the house. Wait a minute." They were sitting in the garden, but Lancelot went into the house and returned with a singed and blackened newspaper printed at Geneva. "This was part of a sort of slow-match found amongst the ruins, and it's a little odd that M. Caillot has neither been seen nor heard of since."

Sir Raymond shuddered, and turned his eyes from the coarse and badly printed sheet, and as Avice approached them Lancelot took it away.

"Ray gets on famously, doesn't he?" he said, as he came back to the bench where the lovers were sitting in the sun. "We shall have him hunting before Christmas, you will see."

"He doesn't look very fit for hunting," said Avice, with a sigh.

"Nonsense! He doesn't know what he can do till he tries," said Lancelot, almost roughly. "You spoil him, Avice, you and Lady Vereker together. He wants rousing, and a good gallop would do him all the good in the world. He'll have to be careful at first, of course.—You mustn't try to lead the field, Ray, till you're thoroughly strong again."

"All right, Lance, I won't," Sir Raymond promised, with the faint ironic smile that was yet so pathetic and so sweet. "I'll not lead the field till I'm well enough; but I think we'll go in now."

He put his arm round Lancelot's shoulder, and, leaning on that faithful, firm support, crept back into the house and sank on the couch that always stood ready for him in the hall; while Lady Vereker came to meet him with anxious looks, and asked Avice to pour him out some tea.

Sir Raymond lay back amongst his pillows, and let himself be waited on with a smile of full content, whose inner meaning no one quite understood. "How good you all are to me!" he said, as Lancelot brought him the tea Avice had poured out, while Lady Vereker arranged his pillows, and pushed back his hair with soft, caressing touch. "I wish I could make you understand how grateful I am."

He was grateful indeed, this poor Giuseppe Balmano, who was yet Lady Vereker's son, and Lancelot's cousin, and Vereker of Verecroft to the end—the end that was so much nearer, he felt, than any of them knew.

The westering sun streamed into the hall, and shone on the armour on the walls, on Avice's bright hair, on the gilded organ-pipes, and the little gold locket that hung from Lancelot's chain, and concerning the contents of which Sir Raymond professed a good deal of curiosity. Lancelot had admitted that it was to recover his watch that he had gone back to the burning house on the night of the fire, but Raymond wondered if the locket concerning whose contents Lancelot was so impenetrably silent, had not had as much to do with that perilous return. If he could have known that the portrait it contained was one of Avice Meredith! Daisy had given Lancelot a photo of her sister and herself, taken together, and Mr. Vereker had ungratefully cut out the face he wanted, and committed the other to the flames. No one would ever know, he told himself, and it could do no harm to Sir Raymond. If he gave up the original, his cousin could not grudge him the poor presentment of the face so dear to both.

That it was dear to both was an idea that had only lately crossed Sir Raymond's mind; but eyes that know and feel they are looking their last on earth are often gifted with a curious clearness of vision. Rigidly as Lancelot guarded himself, there were moments when the mask dropped unawares, moments when his soul looked out of his eyes, moments when his hand trembled at Avice's appearing, and his voice thrilled with the utterance of her name. It was by faint and imperceptible degrees that Sir Raymond arrived at a suspicion of the truth; but when once suspicion was aroused, it leapt unerringly to certainty, and every little incident of their daily lives seemed to confirm the truth. He noticed how silent Lancelot was when she was by, how he avoided everything that was likely to throw them together, and one day, coming into Lancelot's room with his noiseless invalid tread, he saw Lancelot standing by the window, with a look on his face he had never seen before. The passion and the pain in it, the struggle and longing and suffering, were so unlike the calm and equable Lancelot, that Sir Raymond stood arrested in the doorway, too surprised to speak. What was his cousin looking at, he wondered, that could move him like this?

And at that moment Avice, his Avice, crossed the window, with downcast head and musing eyes, and his question was answered.

"And he pleaded my cause, he won her for me!" he thought, with reverential wonder, as he went back as noiselessly as he had come. "Oh, Lance, Lance, Lance! was there ever anyone like you in this world?" He said nothing to anyone of the discovery he had made. He only lay on his couch and watched them both with the sad, calm eyes from which all earthly passions seemed to have been purged away, and so grew to know as much as—nay, perhaps more than they knew themselves. And so the quiet days of Avice's visit rounded to a close, and the last afternoon came. For the last time they gathered round Sir Raymond's couch, and watched the sober glories of the autumnal sunset, till the shadows crept along the floor, and the glory paled to grey, and a star shone clear in the fading west.

"Won't you ring for lights?" asked Lady Vereker, as Lancelot stirred the fire into a brilliant blaze.

"Not yet," entreated Sir Raymond. "Let us have some music, Avice. It will be my last chance."

"Avice will come again," said Lady Vereker, in a voice sharpened by anxiety and unacknowledged dread; but he only smiled at her affectionately, and reiterated his request.

"Sing 'Angels ever bright and fair.' There's nothing I like so much, or that suits your voice so well."

Avice obeyed, as she obeyed all his wishes now, and her voice rose in the grand old air, pure, and clear, and sweet, and high, as an angel's voice might be. Sir Raymond lay and listened with rapt exalted gaze, and Lady Vereker stole away, overcome by emotion she could neither hide nor repress. Lancelot stayed till the end, and then he too disappeared, and Avice and her lover were alone.

"Come here," he said suddenly. "I have something I want to say."

She felt that it was a farewell, and came and knelt beside him, touched and awed, and the lean brown hand, that was so unlike an Englishman's, closed gently upon hers. For a moment he was silent, turning the ring he had given her round and round upon the thin white finger, and looking at her with a tender searching gaze she could not meet.

"I want to thank you, dear, for all your goodness to me, for the kindness and affection that has been so much more than I deserve. It is not your fault that you could not give me love——"

She started, and looked up in crimson astonishment, but something in his glance made her eyes fall.

"Oh, Raymond! I tried, indeed," she faltered.

"I know," he said gently. "I am not reproaching you. I know that you tried your best—and failed. I have been wondering lately if you would be happier if I asked you to give me this again"—holding up her hand, where the diamonds flashed in the flickering firelight; "but I think there is no need. You will not wear it long in this way, but I should like to think you will wear it always in remembrance of me. Even when a nobler and better love is yours——"

"Oh, hush! hush! No other love will ever be mine," she said, in a voice of such exceeding pain, that he drew her head to his breast, and stroked her hair, as he might have comforted a child.

"Will it not? Well—it is not for me to say. Only, if such a day ever comes, I should like you to remember that I want no thought of me to come between you and happiness. If I had my life before me, I could not have given you up. I am not great and noble, like someone we both know, and I would have loved you so, I must have won your love at last. But now——"

"Oh Ray, Ray! don't talk like that," she murmured, in such distress that for very pity he bent and kissed her brow. "I do love you—I will!—only get well, and you will see."

"Shall I, I wonder?" he said dreamily. "I shall not get well, my dearest, but perhaps I shall be allowed to see. I can at least guess how it will be, and I am glad to know it. I shall not say good-bye now"—as the sound of wheels showed that the carriage was coming round to the door—"I shall see you again, I hope, yet. But when the end comes you will be good to my—to Lady Vereker, will you not! And Lance, my poor Lance——"

He broke off. He could not trust himself to speak of the comfort he believed she would bring to Lance.

"I will do what I can," she whispered brokenly. "Do—do they know?"

"They will not believe it! And I cannot tell them how sure I am; they love me so much," said Sir Raymond simply.

The unconscious reproach smote her to the quick. How her indifference must have pained that loyal, loving heart!

But when she had gone, and he lay musing on his couch with a little leather case that contained her likeness in his hand, his face wore an expression of such serene content that Lancelot was quite struck by it.

"What are you thinking of?" he asked, not seeing the photograph he held.

"I am thinking how happy you will be some day," said Sir Raymond, looking up at the man whom Avice loved.

* * * * * *

And meanwhile, Avice was driving home, in a whirl of contending emotions and conflicting feelings. She dared not let herself dwell on her talk with Sir Raymond; she scarcely dare confess, even to herself, all that it meant.

He had divined one half her secret, she admitted, but surely—surely he had not guessed the rest? He knew that she did not love him, but how could she ever meet him again if he knew she loved his cousin? And then the thought forced itself upon her that they might never meet again—that she had perhaps looked her last on the face that had become even dearer than she knew. She did not love him as she could have loved Lancelot; but if there was no desolation, there was real affection and sorrow. She wept as she had never dared to weep at Verecroft, till the familiar towers of Warwick warned her that she was nearly home.

By the time she reached the Hermitage, she had regained her self-control. She put down the window and let the cool breeze blow on her hot, glazed cheeks, and hoped they would cool down enough to escape notice. She need not have distressed herself about it. Neither her mother nor Daisy came out to meet her; but Lady Rosalie came flying down the garden in a state of incoherent agitation and delight.

"My dear girl, I'm so glad you've come. He 's dying to see you, but I said I 'd come and break it to you, to avoid any shock."

"Break what? Who is ill? Not mamma?" cried Avice, in alarm.

"Oh, no, no, no! No one is ill here—but really I don't know how to begin! No, you must not go in the house yet—he 's there!"

"He? But who is it?" said Avice impatiently.

"Now, keep calm, dear, keep calm," said Lady Rosalie, who was trembling with excitement herself. "It is Dalrymple Pasha, your father, you know—no, I mean you don't know—but it 's quite true, and Mrs. Meredith is nearly out of her mind with joy, and Daisy too. But come in now, and they 'll tell you all about it. He never did it, and is as innocent as an unborn child, and Hilda ought to be ashamed of herself, and I 'll never speak to her again!" Lady Rosalie was laughing and crying in a breath, and Avice looked at her in utter bewilderment. Had she taken leave of her senses? she wondered, as she followed her soberly into the house. "They 're all in the drawing-room," said Lady Rosalie. "Go in, dear, and I 'll run away, and leave you all together," added the kind little woman, with a delicacy she did not often display. She was indeed burning to go and spread the news, but Avice was not thinking of Lady Rosalie or her motives. The drawing-room door was open, and through it she could see Captain Hallam and Daisy side by side, and looking at her with radiant faces; and on the hearth-rug a tall, soldierly man, who held her mother's hand in his, and came to meet her with eager, expectant eyes.

CHAPTER XXXII.

AFTER.

"After long storms and tempests overblowne,
The sun at length his joyous face doth cleare;
So when as Fortune all her spight hath shownе,
Some blissful houres at last must needs appeare."

SPENSER.

It is high summer at Verecroft once more, as it was when Sir Raymond came of age, nearly a year ago. Sir Raymond himself—or more truly, the man who was known by that name—has been sleeping in Buddington church-yard for many months now, and Verecroft has been shut up all the winter, for Lady Vereker and Sir Lancelot have been travelling abroad ever since his death, and have only just returned. Lady Vereker is in very deep mourning, and her face is pale and sad, but she cannot help feeling it sweet to be at home again; and though the first visit she pays is to the grave in Buddington church-yard, she presses Lancelot's arm as they turn away, and whispers through her tears—

"I have you, Lance, still, thank God!"

They had both dreaded coming home to the blank, empty house; but the new baronet had business that could no longer be put off, and Lady Vereker was one of the home-loving women who are never happy away from the familiar hearth. Verecroft, though it is Sir Lancelot's house, is home to her still, and will be all her life.

"Your home now and always, so long as you will bless it with your presence," he assures her, and she rewards him with one of the gentle smiles that have always been so precious in Lancelot Vereker's sight.

"I should like to think so, Lance, but I will not let you make rash promises. You will marry some day, I hope, and your wife may like to have her house to herself."

He does not protest, as he once did, that he will never marry. He only smiles gravely, and says: "My wife, if ever I have one, will feel as I do about that."

The Dalrymples have left Leamington, and gone to London, where, to his infinite amazement and disgust, Dalrymple Pasha, as people persist in calling him, finds himself dividing the honours, as lion of the season, with a negro prince and a New York stock-jobber of fabulous wealth.

Hugh Dalrymple is not a Pasha now. He has left the Sultan's service, loaded with decorations and honours, and is a simple colonel in the British Army, a position he values as immeasurably higher. The request to send in his papers, which followed on his conviction in the courts of law, was harder to bear than the sentence of penal servitude, and when he came home with the proofs of his innocence, he lost no time in laying them before the military authorities. There was enough romance in the story to make him an object of interest even to those who did not know him, and the announcement that Hugh Dalrymple had been gazetted to a colonelcy in his old regiment gave general satisfaction in the mess-rooms where the "Dalrymple Case" was once more the staple topic of conversation. Dalrymple never saw his brother-in-law alive. Fazackerley persisted in his refusal to see the man he had so deeply wronged, though he seemed grateful for the messages of forgiveness he received through Captain Hallam, and died with expressions of contrition on his lips.

Then the two men, whose destinies had been so strangely interwoven, came home together; and one night as they paced the deck side by side, while the blue waters of the Mediterranean lapped against the vessel's bows, and the stars shone overhead, Philip told his companion of his love for his younger daughter, and received his full approval of his suit. The more he thought of it, the more Captain Hallam felt sure that his love had not been unrequited. Something had come between Daisy and himself, and if only that unknown impediment could be removed, her answer would be very different from the one she had given him in Lady Rosalie's drawing-room.

It was not long before he tried his fate again, and Daisy owned, with many artless blushes, that only the fear of bringing her father's disgrace upon him had constrained her to refuse him.

"Was that it?" the happy lover cried. "Then, Daisy, you must have cared for me a little then?"

"A little?" said Daisy earnestly. "Oh, Philip, Philip! I cared so much that I would not have married you for all the world."

"You poor little thing!" said Philip tenderly. "If I had only known! See if I would have gone to Egypt then!"

"It was all for the best," said Daisy soberly. "If you had not gone to Egypt, Phil, my father would never have been righted, and we should never have been married at all."

It was so indisputable that Philip had nothing to say. He silenced Daisy's logic in the manner peculiar to lovers, and then he went home and told his father that he had proposed to "the Duodecimo Edition" entirely to please him.

The wedding would have taken place sooner if Lord Blackstone and his son could have had their own way, but Daisy declared she should not feel properly married unless her sister was one of her bridesmaids, and Avice would do nothing that seemed to fail in respect to Sir Raymond's memory.

She made no parade of grief, but she mourned him as she might have mourned for a favourite brother, and grieved sincerely for the stricken mother who had no other child, and for the cousin who had loved him so well; but her mother felt that she did not grieve as those who have lost their all, and again she confessed that she could not understand her child.

It was evident that all her thoughts and interests clung to Verecroft still, but when she was informed of the legacy Sir Raymond had left her, she could scarcely be persuaded to take it.

"You cannot hurt them by declining it," Mrs. Dalrymple told her. "Have you forgotten how kindly Sir Lancelot wrote about it?"

"He does not understand. He thinks I should have married poor Raymond if he had lived."

"My dear! Do you mean that you would not?"

"I did not tell you, mamma—somehow, I could not," said Avice, in a low, troubled voice; "but for some time I had felt that I ought to break it off. I should have told him, only it seemed so cruel when he was so ill; but—but he found it out, and I can't tell you how good and kind he was. He said there was no need to do anything—oh! mamma, I know he felt and knew how near the end was, though no one would believe it—but if he had lived, it would have been broken off."

"And Sir Lancelot did not know?"

"Lancelot? Oh, no—no indeed! And now he never need. What would he think of me? Oh, pray, never say a word—promise me!"

"Certainly," said Mrs. Dalrymple quietly.

It was all she said, for habits of reserve are difficult, if not impossible to break. She let her daughter go with a silent kiss, but she looked after her with eyes that were full of tears.

"So it was the cousin, was it?" she said. "My Avice, my poor Avice! What you must have had to bear!"

She remembered, with a thrill of sympathetic emotion, that Sir Lancelot Vereker had been bidden to the wedding, but she knew too little to be able to surmise if his coming would give Avice pleasure or pain. Avice herself betrayed neither, even to her mother's watchful eyes. She went about with the quiet, subdued manner that had become her usual one now, and seemed as absorbed in the preparations for her sister's marriage as everyone else in the house.

But when the last night had come, and the house was full of the bustle and excitement that precedes a wedding, Avice stole away to the deserted drawing-room, and sitting down by the open window, looked out into the soft greyness of the warm summer night, and lost herself in memories and dreams.

To-morrow—she would see him to-morrow, she knew; and if there was humiliation in the thought that his coming could move her to such passionate expectation, to a joy keen as pain and "wild with all regret," at least there was no longer the sense of wrong-doing to embitter every thought. She wronged no one by the thoughts she gave to Lancelot now.

Presently she went to the piano, playing softly in the dusk, and passing idly from one theme to another, till almost unconsciously she found herself playing the same melody she had sung in Lady Rosalie's drawing-room when Lancelot came in. It was full of the associations of meeting, and the thought of to-morrow had no doubt suggested it to her. Outside there was the tread of hurrying feet, the roll of wheels, the distant roar of the great city; but within, the room seemed very still. There was no fear that anyone would disturb her, and Avice's voice rose softly in the words that always brought Lancelot to her mind—

> "Ask me not how much I love thee,
> Do not question why——"

She sang it through, and if her voice faltered over the suggestive words, there was no one to notice how they moved her—

> "I am thine,
> While the stars shall shine,
> To the last—to the last!"

She did not see the door unclose, or hear the powdered footman, who had replaced the little parlour-maid of Leamington days, announce a visitor. She only raised her eyes as she struck the last sobbing chords, and saw Lancelot Vereker standing in the doorway, as he had stood at Lady Rosalie's, and looking at her as he had looked at her then.

For a moment her heart leapt in her breast, and then she came forward and gave him her hand with the quiet smile she had learnt to wear.

"Mamma is busy to-night," she explained, "but she will be here directly. They will be sure to tell her you are here."

"I think not," said Lancelot, keeping her hand in his. "I did not ask for Mrs. Dalrymple, Avice—I asked for you."

And then she understood. And the dusky London room was full of the light of Paradise, and to the man and woman walking therein came the perfect happiness that is so seldom known in human lives, because so few human hearts are capable of perfect love.

THE END.

A COMPARISON AND A CONTRAST.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D., PROFESSOR OF HUMANITY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREWS.

"He went away sorrowful."—ST. MATT. xix. 22.
"He went on his way rejoicing."—ACTS viii. 39.

IF we think of those with whom we were intimate in early life, and whose course was, for a time, almost coincident with our own, we shall feel how very widely our paths have, since then, diverged, and how very different are the destinations which we have ultimately reached. Let us call up before us the companions of our youth—those with whom we were most closely associated both in work and play, who read the same books, attended the same school, took part in the same amusements—and we shall see how far they and we have now been separated from each other. Many of them have perhaps entirely disappeared from our view; we have not heard of them for years; and were they now to address us, a strong effort would be necessary to recall their very names to our remembrance. Others of them whom we do recollect are, nevertheless, now no more to us than strangers. Our former intercourse with them has completely ceased, and we are severed from them by barriers which can never be crossed. Some have gone to distant lands which we have no chance of ever visiting; some, again, may have risen so high in the world as to be altogether above the circle in which we move; some, on the other hand, may have sunk so low that we never meet them; and some, while on much the same level with ourselves, have formed such different connections from ours, that our paths, though once almost identical, are now hopelessly distant from each other.

Now, what is thus apparent in the outward earthly experience of us all seems also to find an illustration in the moral and spiritual history of the two individuals referred to in the passages before us. For a considerable distance they are seen walking on the same road, and exhibiting the same spirit. They go hand in hand, so to speak, for a time; but then they part, never more, so far as we can trace them, to meet, and reach conclusions, the one of which forms a complete antithesis to the other. We shall look first at the points of comparison between them, and then at the separation which took place between them, with the contrasts which they present.

We glance, then, in the first place, at the similarities which this young Jewish ruler and the Ethiopian eunuch display.

I pass over those of a merely external or intellectual kind. Both were manifestly men of good position in the world. The one was noted for his wealth among the Jews; the other occupied a place of high dignity in the court of Ethiopia. Both were also, beyond doubt, men of superior intelligence. The young ruler indicates this by the evident pains he had been taking to solve the great philosophical question of his day, and attain to an acquaintance with "the good;"* the other shows it by the earnestness with which, though he was by birth a heathen, he devoted himself to the reading of the Jewish Scriptures.

But, passing over these and other points of resemblance which might be mentioned, let us notice, especially, those of a religious character existing between these two persons, and it strikes us at once that both were impressed with the importance of salvation.

The slightest glance at them is sufficient to convince us that such was the case. We see the young ruler eagerly running to the Saviour, and kneeling down before Him on the public highway, while we listen to the anxious question which then issues from his lips, as he exclaims, "Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" That man, we feel at once, is in earnest; there is truth in that upturned look; there is sincerity in these ardent words; there is deep anxiety about the future in the pointed inquiry of that youthful heart. Nor is it less plain that the Ethiopian stranger had been deeply impressed with the great realities of eternity. The ancient Scriptures had doubtless found their way into his hands through that Greek translation of them which was made in Egypt more than two centuries before the coming of Christ. And they had so greatly affected him that he could not rest in his own country, but, in spite of the long journey of hundreds of miles, had come up to Jerusalem to worship. Yes; both these men had evidently got a view of the eternal world. They had seen how brief and insignificant is human existence upon earth when contemplated by itself. But they had also seen what an unspeakable importance attaches to our present transient life, when regarded as the precursor of eternity. Their eyes had pierced into the distant future; they had perceived those unending ages which lie before mankind hereafter; and, knowing that now their destiny in the next world would be fixed, they were both thoroughly in earnest as regarded the attainment of salvation.

Again, both the persons here spoken of took pains to obtain information.

As to the young ruler, there was not probably another individual of equal rank in Judæa who made such efforts as he did to become acquainted with the way of salvation. He had manifestly exhausted every means of obtaining instruction. The writings of wise men belonging to the Gentile world had probably been consulted. The Word of God, as possessed by the Jews, had evidently been studied. And the appointed teachers of religion among the people—Rabbis and priests—had doubtless been applied to in quest of the desired information. Nor did repeated disappointment induce this young man to abandon the pursuit in despair. No sooner did he hear of Jesus, and of the extraordinary wisdom which He possessed, than he came to Him with that momentous question which had taken such hold of his heart. Caring not what mocking eyes might rest upon him, or what derisive speeches might be made regarding him, he came and knelt before Christ, and cried, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" As to the Ethiopian eunuch again, it is plain that he took all possible pains to become wise unto salvation. Not satisfied with having simply performed some ceremonial observances at Jerusalem, we see that, on his homeward journey, he is busily engaged in reading Esaias the prophet. The inspired page is to him very mysterious, but he is doing his best to understand it, and no sooner does he perceive a chance of obtaining some spiritual instruction than his chariot is ordered to stand still, and the stranger, who seems capable of shedding some light on the subject he has been pondering, is courteously invited to "come up and sit with him." Thus, then, it is clear that both the persons before us were further agreed as to the trouble they took to be instructed in spiritual things.

* R.V. reads at ver. 17: "Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?"

Once more—the two individuals here spoken of both received the plainest information.

Our Lord replied in no hesitating or doubtful tones to the question addressed to Him by the young ruler. He referred him, first, to the original law of works, and said, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." This test having failed to convince him of his deficiencies in the sight of God, the Saviour next addresses to him a precept which had a direct tendency to demonstrate his imperfection, while, at the same time, a promise was given him, if he followed Christ, of the sure attainment of eternal life. There was no ambiguity in the instructions which were conveyed to him, but in the plainest and most decisive terms, our Lord declared:—"If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me." The first part of this precept was fitted to deprive him of all trust in himself, since it led him to feel how far he was from being animated by that perfect love to God and man of which he had deemed himself possessed; and the second part taught him the necessity of coming to Christ, that he might discharge the duty and secure the privileges pertaining to the Saviour's followers. The two grand essentials of salvation were thus taught this Jewish ruler. He was convicted of his own deficiencies on the one hand, and enjoined to follow Jesus on the other—the two things absolutely necessary in every case that eternal life may be obtained. So, again, God left not the Ethiopian eunuch in perplexity. Knowing the obscurity which seemed to that earnest inquirer to hang over the way of salvation, the Lord directed Philip to go to his assistance. And it was providentially arranged that, when the evangelist reached the chariot in which this man sat, he was engaged in reading that very passage of the Old Testament which referred in clearest terms to the Messiah. The wonderful 53rd chapter of Isaiah, which seems more like history than prophecy, engrossed his attention, and furnished an admirable text to Philip for bringing before him in the fullest and most forcible manner the way of salvation. Accordingly, we read that the evangelist at once began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus—showed him how these ancient predictions had been fulfilled in Christ, and what they implied as to the means of obtaining eternal life.

Having seen the resemblances existing between the persons referred to in these two passages, we are now to glance at the contrasts, both with respect to conduct and consequences, which may be marked between them.

Let it be noted then, first of all, that the young ruler remained silent on listening to the instructions which were conveyed to him by Christ. He had professed, and truly, great eagerness to be made acquainted with the way of life; but now, when the desired information has been given him, he shows no inclination to act upon it. The truth is that he now beholds himself in a light which he had never seen before. Our Lord has probed his heart to its very depths, and has brought into view feelings which the young man had never suspected of existing within him. He had no doubt fully persuaded himself that the desire for eternal life was really the most powerful one in his bosom, and that there was nothing he would not do—nothing he would not sacrifice—in order to obtain it. But he is now brought face to face with an aspect of himself which he has never before contemplated. He sees that, after all, he has mistaken his own character, and that, notwithstanding all his professions, this world has a stronger hold of his affections than the next. Instead, therefore, of promptly following out our Lord's instructions as might have been expected, he stands inert and silent—having nothing to say against the directions which had been given him, but feeling utterly incapable of acting upon them.

How great the contrast which is presented when we turn to the history of the Ethiopian! His sincerity is conclusively established by his conduct. He has no latent passion lurking in the secrecies of his soul, and which, on being detected and brought to light, puts an end to his pursuit of salvation. On the contrary, every fresh word he hears from the lips of Philip only stimulates his desire to belong to Christ. The Evangelist describes to him the nature of the Saviour's work, and what is required of all who would share in the blessings which it has secured. He is told that a public profession of faith is necessary—that he must stand out prominently as an avowed follower of Jesus—and must begin this course of decided action by submitting to the initiatory rite of baptism. There was much in this teaching which might have startled him to whom it was addressed. He was perhaps the only one in his nation who knew about Christ. At any rate, he was certainly the first Ethiopian who had been taught that Jesus was the Messiah; and, if he now yielded to the instructions of Philip, he would find, on returning home, that he was severed from all his former friends, and had to stand alone in his profession of Christianity. He might, therefore, have shrunk from any decisive step on this occasion. He might have said that he wished longer time for inquiry, or that he was not yet prepared for openly avowing himself a Christian. He might have told the Evangelist that he was deeply impressed with all he had heard, and would give it his most serious consideration, but that he could not at once make up his mind to accept of Christ. However, he did nothing of the kind—he was, on the contrary, ready even to anticipate his teacher in the decisive course which he adopted. Having been told that a public profession of faith in Jesus was needful, and that there was a special ordinance appointed for this purpose, we read that, on their coming to a certain water as they journeyed, the eunuch exclaimed, "See, here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptised?" It was done: the decisive step was taken; the seal of Christ was visibly impressed upon the courtier's forehead; and whoever might marvel or whoever might mock, he should henceforth be known as the declared and determined follower of Jesus.

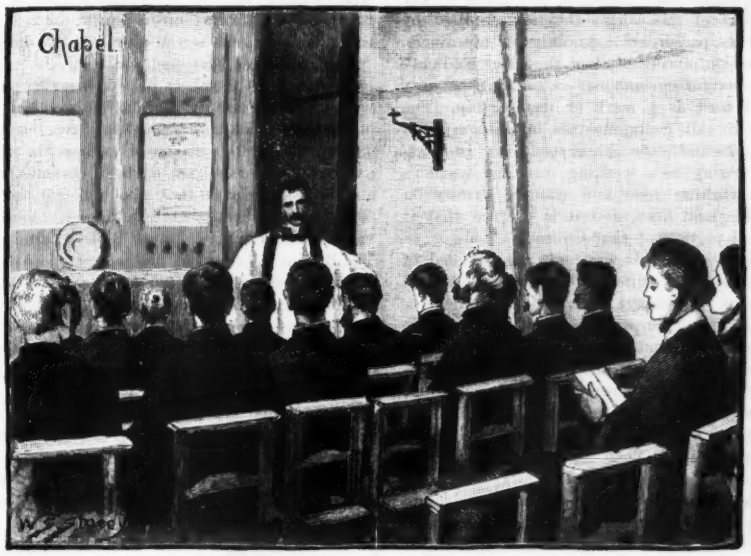
And now let us note the different consequences which followed.

Of the young ruler we read that "he went away sorrowful," and of the Ethiopian eunuch that "he went on his way rejoicing." Whence the sorrow in the one case, and whence the joy in the other? We shall experience little difficulty in replying to these questions.

The young ruler was sorrowful because he could not obtain eternal life. True, the way to do so had been plainly set before him, but he turned from it as one too difficult for him to tread. The same kind of regret has often been felt with respect to less important matters. Some have eagerly desired the fame and rewards of learning, but they could not undergo the labour necessary in order to acquire it. Others have longed for the reputation won by the daring and resolute, but they could not face the dangers which had to be braved before securing it. They look at the object of their ambition, and then at the price demanded for it, and, much as they desire it, they cannot prevail on themselves to follow the course by which alone it is to be gained, so that nothing remains but sorrowfully to relinquish it. Thus it was with the young ruler and the attainment of eternal life. He would fain have been saved, but, alas! he "had great possessions," and has been told that he must choose between these and heaven. He cannot make the sacrifice required—his heart cleaves to the world; he must have present luxury and indulgence; and, deeply grieved that salvation cannot be his on easier terms, he passes away in silence and sorrow from the Saviour's presence.



What was his future history we cannot tell. He may, after all, have made choice of the better part; and we would gladly hope that at last it became true of him, as of St. Paul, that "what things were gain unto him, those he counted loss for Christ." But such is certainly not the lesson intended to be taught us by his history. He is presented to us by the sacred writers as a type of that very numerous class who would fain secure eternal life, but who will not act in the manner which is necessary that their desire may be fulfilled. Probably, most professing Christians feel a wish at times to become heirs of glory, yet too many of them still shrink from a decided acceptance of the Saviour. Like this young ruler, they are unable to cast off the chains of worldliness and sin; and they go away from Christ's presence, grieved that it costs so much to obtain salvation. But shall such be the course which any will continue to follow? To guard against this, let us try to follow out in imagination the future experience of this young man, and then say if it shall be ours. We see him turning away from Christ with sorrow depicted in his countenance; and can we fancy that he could ever again be happy? No doubt he might plunge into gaiety; he might surround himself with all the pleasures which money could procure; he might even in his recklessness abandon himself to the wildest dissipation—but never could he erase from his memory the words which Christ had spoken, or chase from his bosom the sorrow which, on hearing them, had arisen in his heart. In his quiet reflective moments, often would he live that scene over again—the voice of the great Teacher would again be heard sounding in his ears, and would remind him that he had, alas! deliberately renounced eternal life. And then, when the hour of death arrived, what would he think of the choice which he had made? Those "great possessions" of his had now to be relinquished whether he would or not; and oh! could he help feeling how terribly he had erred in allowing them to stand between him and the Saviour, and in having, for the transient gratification which they afforded, forfeited the hope of eternal glory?

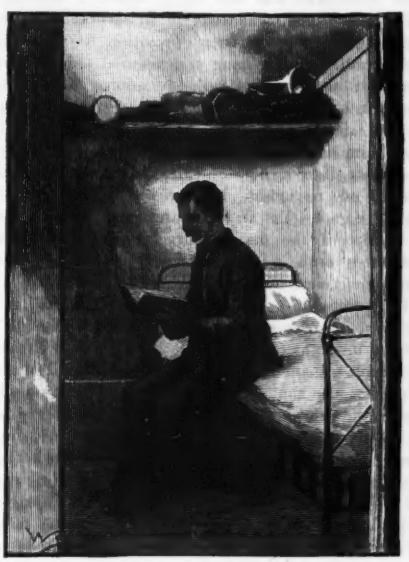
How different was the experience of the Ethiopian eunuch! We are told, as the first result of his conduct, that "he went on his way rejoicing," and thus there was struck the key-note of his whole future life. As need hardly be said, it was his decision for Christ which had given birth to that joy. He felt that he was now safe for ever, and the Spirit of grace shed abroad peace and gladness in his heart. Of his future history, nothing is said in Scripture. Tradition states that he preached the Gospel in his own country on his return, and afterwards travelled for the same purpose into Abyssinia, suffering martyrdom at last for the sake of Christ. Be that as it may, never did the joy of salvation die out in his soul. "He went on his way rejoicing"—on to the discharge of duty—on to the endurance of suffering—on to the encounter with death—on to the possession of never-ending glory. Let us decide as he did, and a like joyful experience will be ours. Let us be prompt and resolute, as he was, in giving ourselves to Christ. Whatever may have hitherto prevented this, let it do so no longer. Let us look at this world, with its passing enjoyments; let us look at heaven, with its unending happiness; and let our choice at once be made. Let the language of our heart be: "Mine, O Christ, shall be Thy salvation—mine the course trodden by Thy disciples—mine the faith, and patience, and self-denial of Thy true followers"—let this be our choice, as it was that of the Ethiopian eunuch, and then, like him, we shall ever henceforth "go on our way rejoicing."

XUM

A DAY WITH THE CHURCH ARMY.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

"STEADY, lad! God loves you, and wants to make a gentleman of you!"



It was a clergyman who spoke. The man whom he addressed was standing outside a public-house, swearing dreadfully. And the clergyman put his arm round the man's neck and checked him thus.

The man was touched. There was something good in him beneath his bad language, after all, and he dragged the clergyman into the house, and—strange gift to such a one!—offered him the remainder of his beer. It was all he had to give!

Now this little incident illustrates, in a striking manner, the chief object and aim of the work of the Church Army. The clergyman was the Rev. W. Carlile, founder and honorary secretary of the Army. Its agents engage in house-to-house visitation, but work in the streets is the greater point. In fact, "chumming up"—as Mr. Carlile calls it—in the streets is intended to be the principal feature of the work.

But its methods are very elastic. It never enters a parish without the invitation of the vicar, and the officer who is sent in response is under the vicar. Should the latter desire the big drum to be beaten, it is thumped vigorously; should quieter measures be desired, they are adopted. In short, the Church Army is in each parish what the vicar desires it to be.

Its officers or evangelists are trained at headquarters in London, as are also its Mission Nurses. The former wear a neat, dark-coloured uniform with tight-fitting jacket buttoned in front, with a plain "C. A." on the collar, and a peaked cap. The Nurses are clad much as others of that profession, in long, flowing, overall mantle, quiet bonnet, with white collar and cuffs. These evangelists and nurses are commissioned officers, and receive a weekly wage. The soldiers, on the other hand, pay something weekly to the support of the work; they are enrolled by the vicar of the parish, are communicants, abstainers, and helpers of the officers. In fact, the term "soldiers" answers to that of "members." Usually they wear a small red cord as a mark of membership. The evangelists are all communicants, abstainers from alcoholic drinks and tobacco, and speakers. In short, the Church Army is a working men and women's mission to working men and women, strictly on Church of England lines, and it is claimed that it is an integral portion of that Church.

The Army began in this way:—It was founded in 1882 by the Rev. W. Carlile, who has since remained with it, and is, we suspect, its real superintendent, with a committee. He was a curate at St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington, and was wont to go out to the High Street, opposite the railway station, and endeavoured to develop the power of some grooms and butlers to speak instead of himself. He found the audience listened even more attentively to their own fellows than to him. That set him thinking, and the Church Army grew out of it.

He left the parish where he had been curate, and set to work at Westminster to train working men evangelists. At first the organisation, if such it could then be called, had no home. There was a good deal of failure; but some success rewarded its founder, who toiled on with perseverance. The principal helper at the commencement was Mr. Edward Clifford, who visited Father Damien at the leper island of Molokai, and he has been treasurer right through.

The movement was not much opposed, however, until a real change was wrought in several members of a gang of thieves. Then opposition began. One of the leaders of the gang endeavoured once, in the open air, to win back an old companion. Mr. Carlile stepped in between them, and the thief struck him on the head and body, and when he fell to the ground, kicked him on the head. The clergyman was raised and taken into a house, while his assailant was marched off to prison. He was sentenced to six months in gaol. Yet in this case again, beneath the sad surface of the man's character and life, there must have been something good, for one of his chums was heard by Mr. Edward Clifford to say—

"If he gets three stretchers" (years) "I shall get a brick and break some head, and work alongside."

There must have been something good, we say, in the man to have inspired such affection, and in his companion also that such feeling should be aroused. In gaol the prisoner wrote to Mr. Carlile, apologising for his assault, and signing himself "your loving friend." When he was released, he entered the Army, and the last Mr. Carlile heard of him was that he was engaged in mission work in Chicago. Mr. Carlile cannot say that any change in the man was due to the efforts of the Church Army. It is quite likely, he thinks, that the man became disgusted with and ashamed of himself.

In any case, we may regard the whole incident as a striking and touching instance of some goodness at heart existing beneath a horrible surface of ruffianism. And it is to reach such, among others, that the Church Army exists. If there is a drunken man, he is the one for its efforts; or if there is a poor, outcast, or unfortunate woman, she is the object of its mission.

And its efforts have met with success. The Army has over 12,000 members or soldiers, the majority of whom are rescued drunkards, thieves, gamblers, and others of bad character, who have been reached in the streets. About 170 officers or evangelists, and thirty-five mission-nurses, are engaged, besides the staff, and it is calculated that about 40,000 outdoor, and 50,000 indoor, meetings are held yearly, while 400,000 visits are paid annually, with Bible-reading or prayer. The Bishop of Liverpool has said of the Army that it "has succeeded in reaching the lower stratum." The income received at headquarters is something over £4,500, and the amount received locally, mostly in the pence of working-people, is over £13,000. It is also estimated that the honorary work in connection with headquarters amounts to £1,000 yearly.

The headquarters of the Army are in a large building just out of the Edgware Road, in which great thoroughfare, indeed, they are numbered 128 and 130. Just over the busy road is the Mission Nurses' Training Home. Mr. Carlile is the head or father of the first-named, and his sister, Miss Carlile, is the head or the "mother" of the Nurses' Home.

The "cadets," or evangelists-in-training, reside in the one, and the women in the other; but the latter come across the road to listen to the lectures and take part in some of the meetings, etc. The lectures are given daily—in fact, the whole day is full of work, the training being hard, practical, and continuous.

The top floor is divided into a number of cubicles, or small rooms, formed by partitions. Each cubicle has a bed within it, and here the cadets sleep, Mr. Carlile having a cubicle like the rest. At a quarter before seven the first bell rings, and the day may be said to begin by the cadets meeting together on this floor and singing a chorus, which is followed by two short prayers by two of the men. Then, after the Lord's Prayer, the cadets are busy about housework. They scrub floors, clean boots, peel potatoes, and so on, until half-past seven, when the bell rings to prepare for chapel.

Here they assemble at eight o'clock. Several of the sisters, as the nurses are called in the Homes, are present, the Lady Superintendent playing the harmonium. The chapel has lately been enlarged by knocking down a wall and adding another room to the space. A portion can be curtained off to make an apartment for study, and the whole is bright and attractive. Here is a large picture by Mr. Edward Clifford, of a conference at Lord Mount-Temple's, in which are some well-known faces. The service is conducted by one of the four clergymen working at the Training Home, and he gives a brief address. One of the men reads the lesson.

Breakfast is served at half-past eight, and after performing various duties of putting their own cubicles tidy the cadets are at half-past nine instructed in the use of choruses. Music of a certain character forms no small part of the training, for at two o'clock, again, parts of the house resound with cornet and concertina practice. Each cadet is instructed in the use of these instruments, and there are some of the men who can beat the big drum, or blow a blast on the trumpet, with the best.

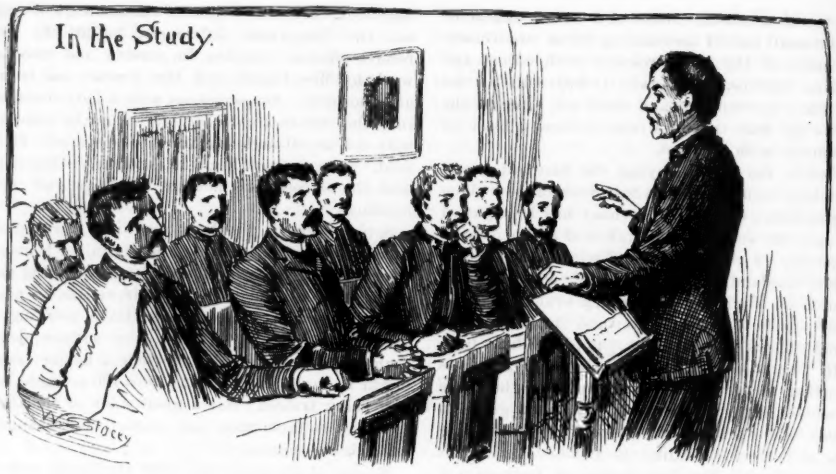
But before the cornet-playing, the first and second lectures have been delivered, a half-hour has been given to preparation, a quarter of an hour has been passed in the open air, and dinner partaken of at one o'clock. The teaching of the lectures is distinctly that of the Church of England. The cadets and "sisters" are to be Church of England working-men evangelists, and working-women mission nurses; and the view of the staff and officers is said to be, "to place Christ first, and His Church and Sacraments second;" and it is said further that, "Most spiritual men of the three great schools in the Church of England now give" to the Army "their prayers and sympathy." Most of the Bishops are patrons, including the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. The late Bishop of Durham said that the Army "had a very warm place in his heart," while the Bishop of Bedford wishes "it to be understood that" he does "identify" himself "thoroughly" with its work, and regards it as having "settled for ever" the question "How the masses are to be reached."

After the cornet practice, brief addresses are sometimes given by the cadets in the study at half-past two. At three they sally forth to the streets to hold brief meetings in the open air and sell the Church Army Gazette. Some days they visit the slums, or visit from house to house. Tea is held at five, and from half-past five until a quarter to seven a quiet time is theirs for devotion. After a short meeting to pray for the evening's work, they proceed to St. Mary's Hall, and thence issue forth again for processions and open-air meetings. About an hour later, a meeting commences in-doors, and again an hour afterwards a prayer-meeting is held. At ten supper is served, and at eleven, after a short prayer, lights are to be out, and silence reigns up-stairs.

The day of the sisters is much like that of the brothers—as they are called in the Homes. As we have seen, they join in some of the meetings; but there are two important differences, for all the sisters receive efficient training in nursing and ambulance work by Miss Carlile and Mrs. Franks, and training at a hospital. On occasions, also, a lady leads them into the streets for rescue work, and in connection with this an all-night shelter is to be opened. In "the field," when at work in parishes to which they may be sent, the nurses take mothers' meetings and cottage meetings.



Seven weeks is the length of time during which some of the cadets are at the Training Home, but others remain three months. A longer training might be given to all did funds and circumstances permit, but the fact is, a demand for these working men evangelists is rising — there is a greater demand than supply, and they leave when a longer training might be beneficial. About 120 to 130 per annum are now being trained; but a great want of the Church Army is suitable men and women for evangelists and mission nurses.

Several of the cadets are from the North, and have been colliers and miners; but other trades, such as that of plasterer and of bricklayer, have their representatives. The women have mostly been domestic servants, and some among them have served in shops. We think we may say that some of them represent the cream of the English working-class — hard-working and self-reliant.

A MUSIC LESSON.

One of them five years ago deserted from the militia when it was ordered for service in Egypt, and having enlisted under a false name, did not even claim a pardon in the Jubilee Year, for he felt so certain that he would not be discovered. "He became," said Mr. Carlile, "an earnest Christian, and a member of the Whitechapel Corps. On conscientious grounds he surrendered himself for desertion, at a risk of three months' imprisonment. His example had a great effect in Whitechapel. The magistrate dealt leniently with him, and let him out after a few days with a fine. He afterwards went into training to become an officer. He was a steady first-class Whitechapel bricklayer, and as he had a wife and two children to support, his surrender of himself was no slight matter."

Four of the Church Army evangelists have gone to India, where they are working under clergymen, and living at the rate of about sixteen or seventeen shillings weekly. One or two of the mission nurses also desire to go. The work of specialising agents is commencing, and one evangelist has been devoted to the London cabmen. He is of their class, and visits cab-shelters, cabmen's coffee-houses, public-houses, and also the families of cabmen. A recent Church Army Gazette—a popularly written and illustrated halfpenny paper—gave an account of a cabmen's supper-party which Captain Gosling, C.A., promoted, and at which the Bishop of Marlborough presided. A lodging-house and workshop for men has been opened, and it is also desired to set apart an evangelist to the tramps' lodging-houses, and to the gates of the prison. In the former he would have a vast field indeed for his efforts, for it is said there are more than 40,000 convicts and tramps in London lodging-houses.

The work therefore seems expanding. Much of the progress the movement has made during the seven years is no doubt largely due to the comparative sobriety and elasticity of its methods; sobriety and elasticity, however, which apparently are never permitted to interfere with the central principle that it is a working people's mission to working people.

KITTY FAIRFAX.

A MILLTOWN STORY, BY THE AUTHOR OF "A BROKEN ENGAGEMENT," ETC. ETC.

SPENDING some days in Milltown, I was inquiring after some old friends and acquaintances, and mentioned the name of Kitty Fairfax. Mrs. Ashby at once poured out a narrative in which a disguised nobleman, a linen-draper, and a gondola were mixed in bewildering confusion. Miss Elizabeth Marsden, being in full possession of facts, has kindly given me a correct version of Kitty's experiences (her sister Sophia throwing in a few reflections). The following letter was lent, in the strictest confidence, to Janet Scott; it runs as follows:—

KITTY TO CECILIA FAIRFAX.

MY DEAR CECILIA,—At last I am able to write you a long letter, instead of the little scrappy notes I have sent between you and Aunt Jane. We are still at Lucerne; the weather is too hot for Italy, and I do not feel the time wasted. Tom Scott's books are most useful. We go on the lovely lake, land at some sweet spot, stroll a little way, and then settle down to read or sketch. I will not attempt to describe the scenery, but my portfolio will give you some idea of it when I come home. I cannot tell you how happy I am. I feel as though I had never been alive before, when I contrast my days here with my life at Milltown, amongst all those dull, uncongenial people, with their silly gossip. You asked me if I were not afraid of Mr. Galbraith. Not the least bit; we like each other, and really I think he is beginning to be a little proud of me. He often laughs about his dreadful letter that caused me so much misery. Everybody—and the place is crammed with visitors: that is the only drawback—everybody thinks

I am his daughter, and when we were both sketching this morning, a lady came up and said: "Ah, that is clearly a case of hereditary talent." Mrs. Galbraith does not care particularly for art; she is very sad, and grieves about Helen. Aunt Jane need not have put in those hints about her wanting care, and little attentions; of course I should remember all that. As this will not go to Milltown, I must tell you what a trial my black silk has been. It was extremely kind of Aunt to sell her ring to buy it with, but people do make such unnecessary sacrifices. If she had given me instead that lovely soft Indian muslin, or even told me before she spent the money—— A black silk is so dull and inartistic, and to me it is such a vulgar idea that a girl must have a black silk for "best." I have spent the entire afternoon in altering it; cut the sleeves to the elbow, and put rich ruffles of poor mother's lace there and at the neck. By the way, I don't think I thanked you properly for giving me your share. But I am sure, dear, that dreadful Miss Williams would never have appreciated it, if you were wearing it yourself. I put your strings of little pearls round my throat. Whilst we were waiting in the hotel drawing-room for dinner, I was looking into the garden, and happened to say, "Those lovely cream roses, how I should like a bunch!" In about two minutes a gentleman came up with some, beautifully arranged, and handed them to me. Of course I thanked him, and fastened them in my dress; they just gave the finish it wanted. He happened to sit next me at table, and was very agreeable; has travelled a great deal, and talked well. He is an artist, he says. This letter is much shorter than it would have been, Cecilia, for Mrs. Galbraith has been in my room, and positively has been telling me that I must be careful "about receiving attentions from strangers." As if I were an ignorant chit of a girl, or a common flirt, like Mrs. Ashby's sister! However, I must recollect she does not really know me yet. Mr. Galbraith has far more penetration, and would understand that when the mind is filled with love for art, all meaner subjects fade into nothingness. I do miss you, Cecilia. I couldn't do my hair this evening. You are so clever in that coronet style. My love to Maynard; don't tease him too much. What do you find to talk about all day long?—Your affectionate sister,

CATHERINE FAIRFAX.

And now we will follow Kitty Fairfax to Venice, into that atmosphere of golden haze, and glamour of dreamy beauty, which "transforms the most prosaic of mortals into a poet," as Tom Scott had once informed Kitty. Every day seems to our traveller to heighten the charm of that enchanted city; but surely this gives the very crown of happiness—a morning spent in the Ducal Palace, and a long-planned excursion for the afternoon.

Mr. Galbraith had made the acquaintance of a party of Americans three years ago; they will join them, and a rather plain, quiet man of thirty; Kitty has mentioned him to Cecilia with the brief description: "middle-aged and dull!" David Sandle is a silk merchant, whose business requires an annual visit to Milan, and then allows a month's holiday of wandering further south. He is on the easy footing of old and tried friendship with both Mr. and Mrs. Galbraith, and returns their smile with a quiet nod as they remark Kitty's expression of rapt and ecstatic enjoyment. He is almost afraid to speak to her, after the withering rebuff she gave him yesterday, when the poor misguided man positively offered her some chocolate cream just as they were passing under the Bridge of Sighs!

"This is indeed the very poetry of motion!" Kitty murmured at last.

Several other gondolas were bound for the island, and as they landed, they found a rather large party was waiting for the appearance of the guide who was to conduct them over the factory. A handsome young Irishman suddenly left the group and joined the Galbraiths.

"Why, Sandle!" he said, "who would have thought of seeing you in Venice!" With a bow to Kitty: "I remember meeting you in Lucerne, and now I hope the pleasure may be completed by an introduction!"

"Miss Fairfax—Mr. Desmond," said Mr. Sandle, rather sulkily.

Kitty's delicate cheeks flushed, and her eyes sparkled. She looked charming, and Mr. Desmond evidently thought so, and singled her out for his special attention.

David Sandle became all at once anxious about the welfare of mutual acquaintances, but was cleverly suggested as a walking encyclopædia of information to an inquiring young American lady, and comfortably disposed of.

Kitty has to this day a very hazy recollection of the treasures and purpose of the Armenian factory, and when they came to the printing-room she gave up all pretence of interest; and Mr. Desmond easily persuaded her to leave the machinery, which, indeed, she regarded at all times with a want of interest truly feminine, and they strolled out into the lovely garden.

"It is so pleasant to talk to someone who feels the poetic side of Venice. I have heard so much of the historical part, and Venetian influence on commerce," began Kitty.

"Ah," said Mr. Desmond, laughing, "Sandle has not much poetry in him, I should think; and in my opinion, Venice can't be really enjoyed after four-and-twenty!"

"Did you notice those fishing-boats with their painted sails, gliding on a golden sea?" murmured Kitty. "The scent of the magnolia blossoms is like the lotos-flower—it makes me almost wish to stay on here for ever!"

"Would you—really—be happy to stay here, and with me?" whispered Mr. Desmond, with an expression in his deep blue eyes which thrilled Kitty with quite a new sensation. "To me it would be perfect rapture!"

"Will you like this rosebud?" she said, turning away to hide her blushes, and reaching a lovely spray just above their heads.

"My dear Kitty," said Mrs. Galbraith's voice at that moment, "we have been waiting to start these twenty minutes!"

"I ought to have asked after Miss O'Brien; she is in Venice, I hear, Mr. Desmond," said Mr. Sandle. And it was well that Kitty did not see the angry scowl of those fascinating blue eyes, as Mr. Desmond replied haughtily, "I will tell Miss O'Brien of your very kind inquiries!"

She followed Mrs. Galbraith to the gondola in dreadful confusion, but Mr. Desmond found a moment to whisper as he pressed her hand, "I shall have my rose yet! I must and will see you again!"

Mr. Sandle, fortunately, was again appealed to by the young lady of the inquiring mind, and joined the American party. Kitty could not have endured his solemn face, she thought. She closed her eyes in silent rapture, living that delicious half-hour over again.

"Why, Kitty, surely you won't take a nap in a gondola?" said Mr. Galbraith.

"I think I have had almost too much happiness for one afternoon—I can never thank you enough!" said Kitty earnestly.

"You are a dear, grateful child!" was the answer. —"And we must forgive her for wandering into the enchanted garden, must we not, my dear?"

"I am rather over-tired," replied Mrs. Galbraith. Kitty was too absorbed in her own thoughts to notice Mr. Galbraith's anxious look, as his wife shivered, and drew her fur cloak closely round her.

"You are not in bed yet; may I have a little talk with you?" said Mrs. Galbraith, coming to Kitty's room that evening. Then, with a visible effort—"If you were Helen, I should say just what I am going to tell you now. Aubrey Desmond is handsome and fascinating, I can see; but Mr. Sandle has known him a long time, and says he is that most obnoxious of mortals—a male flirt!"

"Does Mr. Sandle speak of all his friends in that kind way?" asked Kitty scornfully.

"He did not pretend to number him among his friends, my dear. I should not wish to—to interfere, but I could not help seeing. And, Kitty, he is engaged to be married to a Miss O'Brien, who is in Venice now with her mother, Mr. Sandle says."

"Mr. Sandle! Mr. Sandle! He has evidently a grudge against poor Mr. Desmond! I don't believe a word of it!" exclaimed Kitty, "not a single word!" And when Mrs. Galbraith had repeated her rather cold good-night, she took from her desk a bunch of withered roses, and covered them with passionate kisses.

Next morning, Mrs. Galbraith suggested resting and writing letters, and in the afternoon she still declined going out; so her husband, with Kitty and Mr. Sandle, strolled into St. Mark's, where Kitty proposed they should leave her for an hour, for David Sandle's society was intolerable! As she sat, screened by a massive pillar, she gave herself up to delicious day-dreams. She wondered if Maynard Williams' eyes could have spoken to Cecilia as Aubrey Desmond's had done to her. "We are sure to meet again!" the sweet church-bells seemed to be ringing. "I could trust him for ever!" sang her heart. One "jangled out of tune," at length broke in upon her reverie. It was a girlish voice, with just a suspicion of the pretty Irish brogue.

"Put a chair for me here, Aubrey," it said, "against this pillar, and sit opposite, so that I can see you instead of the pavement, which is too dreadfully like a bit of the English Channel! That's quite close enough, thank you. Give me Baedeker, and we'll pretend to be reading up the cathedral properly. And aren't you ashamed, then, that you didn't think of my commission yesterday? Whom were you thinking of, I should like to know?"

"Kathleen, if you pout like that I shall forget I'm not at Killarney again! Do you remember, darling?"

"No, I've forgotten all about it. And did you talk to old Miss Smith the whole afternoon, I wonder, and give her a pink rosebud, like mine? Aubrey, this is the last warning; you will be dangerously wounded directly by that arrow in my hat."

"As if I feared any darts like the look of your darling grey eyes!" was the answer.

And then Kitty Fairfax rose, and hurriedly joined a small crowd who were trying to understand the explanations of one of the guidse; and, partly screened by some heaped-up chairs, she turned and looked at the speakers. She need not have troubled herself; they were far too much absorbed to notice her. That was Kathleen O'Brien, then—a charming, roguish girl of eighteen—and it was Aubrey Desmond whispering sweet nothings into that small round ear.

"The old story," remarked a gaunt lady in a deer-stalker's cap, with a glance at the pair.

Kitty stumbled on the uneven marble slabs, and found her hand taken by Mr. Galbraith.

"Take care," he said. "You are quite tired with waiting, but I had forgotten how time was going. I have a rare treat in store for you after lunch—a picture of Bellini's, that gives one a taste of both rapture and despair;" and Mr. Galbraith's description and criticism fortunately lasted till they reached their hotel.

That afternoon poor Kitty vainly tried to appreciate the masterpiece; she gazed at it earnestly, and the old artist at her side imagined that his little friend was utterly overcome by its supreme beauty as he noticed her rapt, intense look and trembling lip.

Mrs. Galbraith went to her room soon after dinner, and Kitty, with the pretext of a pile of letters to read and answer, shut herself up with them and her aching heart. Mr. Galbraith and David Sandle sat in the tiny balcony over the Grand Canal; the privilege of an old friendship excused the latter's complete silence. The moon made silver paths on the water, crossed by the gondolas with arrow-like swiftness. Presently they heard a rich voice singing "The last rose of summer;" at the same moment a window above was opened, the gondola darted beneath it, and something thrown by an unseen hand was cleverly and eagerly caught by the singer, who disappeared in a moment round the old palace wall into a side canal.

"Aubrey Desmond!" exclaimed Mr. Sandle.

"That was Kitty's window. Was it a letter, David? She is not the girl to care for a scented puppy like him. I saw one of his daubs at Brown's last May, and it would disgrace a house-painter!"

"He is a very fascinating fellow, and Miss Kitty is little more than a child; but I did not think she would——" said David Sandle, and his voice sounded odd and hoarse. "There is a romance and sentiment about the place——"

"Hang sentiment!" growled Mr. Galbraith. "Kitty shall understand that there's an end of this kind of thing."

"Good-night," said his friend, shortly.

"My wife must have a talk with that silly child in the morning," thought Mr. Galbraith. "Heigh-ho! we have all been young once."

But with the morning came far other and more serious care. Mrs. Galbraith had been feverish and restless all day, and became rapidly worse; a doctor, summoned in all haste, spoke of acute inflammation. Her husband, completely unnerved, could only sit by his wife, clasping her hand tightly in his; and Kitty, whose violent headache would have overwhelmed her with care and petting at home, found herself with all the responsibility of a nurse, and forced to submit to listen to David's suggestions—most humbly offered. She had never made a linseed poultice in her life. "If only Cecilia were here!" she thought. Never had the poor girl felt so utterly desolate. One of those letters last night told her of Aunt Jane's happy meeting with Mr. Malyon; another of her sister's speedy marriage; and now, she thought with terror, as she listened to the short, laboured breathing, was she to lose this friend, whose little acts of thoughtful kindness now came to her memory in sharp contrast with her own selfish absorption?

"I will try and think exactly what Cecilia would do," she determined, as she stood by the bedside with trembling limbs and aching head.

I suppose we have all known people whose happy fate it is to have someone always at hand to shield them from trouble; as far as possible all the thorns and stones are carefully taken out of their path, and every chance ray of sunshine deflected for their especial benefit. Catherine Fairfax was one of those favoured ones. Aunt Jane and Cecilia had been her willing slaves, and now David Sandle voluntarily put his neck under the yoke. At this sad time, their delicate pink colour had forsaken the girl's cheeks, but her face had gained an expression of sweetness, and her voice had a softness, which made her, to his partial eyes, lovelier than ever; she was tasting for the first time in her life the delight of service. The doctor advised travelling on to Florence as soon as Mrs. Galbraith's strength would permit; the weather had become stormy and wet—that was the reason. Kitty's letter explained that she should not be sorry, after all, to say good-bye to Venice. She was secretly haunted by the fear that she should see those roguish grey eyes again: Mr. Desmond had called twice with polite inquiries, Mr. Galbraith had rather grimly informed her. Once in Florence, Mrs. Galbraith daily gained a little strength, and insisted that her kind nurse should not always stay by her sofa. All the slight coolness between them had disappeared. She was a good, loving woman, and therefore a matchmaker at heart, and since her illness, had discovered the fact that Kitty and David Sandle were admirably suited to go through life together.

The last afternoon of his stay in Florence, Mr. Sandle had persuaded Kitty to walk with him to San Miniato; she was glad to rest when they had climbed the hill, and almost in silence they watched the sunset glow fade over the city.

"How dreary my home will seem after these happy weeks!" he said at last.

"I can understand how you dread going back to it," said Kitty sympathetically. "Mrs. Galbraith has told me how devotedly you nursed your dear mother. I am so very, very sorry for you." A pause. "I wonder when I shall see old England again! Everyone is so kind to me, Mr. Sandle; there are very few useless girls like me who have the choice of three homes! Cecilia says I must share hers. Aunt Jane tells me that she and Mr. Malyon have planned just how my studio is to be arranged in their house at Edinburgh; and dear Mrs. Galbraith wants me to stay with her." And Kitty gave him one of her April smiles.

"I do not think it wonderful——" began David, when he noticed Kitty start; her cheeks flushed, and she fixed a scornful gaze on—Aubrey Desmond. He had come up with an easy smile, which quickly changed to extreme perplexity and astonishment; he walked on a few paces, then turned, and evidently supposing he could not have been recognised, he once more lifted his hat, and stopped an instant before Miss Fairfax, receiving again a stony gaze, before which he retreated in evident and wrathful chagrin.

Kitty drew a long breath of relief, as she watched him disappear in the avenue. "Mr. Sandle," she began shyly, "I have long been waiting for courage; I want to confess something."

"I promise to grant you absolution, Miss Fairfax," was the ready answer.

"I was so very rude to you in Venice because—because you told Mrs. Galbraith your opinion of Mr. Desmond, and I thought it uncalled for; but I afterwards found it was quite true. Oh, surely, you could not suppose when I threw those withered roses from the window, that I meant them for him? You could not have thought so! I did not know he was there. I had been silly enough to keep them," said Kitty, putting up her hand to hide her flaming cheeks, "and that afternoon, I found out for myself that—that you were right, and I threw the hateful things away in disgust. It was by the strangest chance they cannot meet till May, so many things may happen before then."

"I have no doubt, my dear," said her husband, laughing, "that Kitty won't be allowed to forget him, and letters will often be passing between us. For instance, she has promised to paint him a copy of his favourite picture, and the poor fellow couldn't have looked happier if she had offered him a kingdom. She will make a dreadful mess of it, I know. I should not be surprised if business takes him within fifty miles or so of Milltown, and of course he will his gondola was passing, though Mrs. Galbraith said perhaps he had been lingering about some time. I wonder you did not all scorn me as I do him, if you thought such a thing," ended Kitty, dashing away a burning tear.

"I am very much honoured by your confidence, Miss Fairfax," said Mr. Sandle; and his courteous, deferential tone was balm to poor Kitty's sensitive heart. They discussed indifferent topics the rest of the way; and that evening Mr. Sandle's gaiety quite surprised Mr. Galbraith, who had noticed how dull his friend had been of late.

"He didn't say anything to Kitty Maurice," said his wife to him that night, after bidding David good-bye—he was to leave early next morning. "And feel bound to call in on Miss Gordon! Oh, we shall be deluged with letters!"

"Perhaps he is wiser to wait," admitted Mrs. Galbraith. "And, Maurice, I was amused to hear Kitty say yesterday what a remarkably well-made head Mr. Sandle's was: that no one could call him handsome, but he had such a good, thoughtful face, and she couldn't endure handsome men! they were always conceited! Yes, I believe it will all come right in the end!"

"What a puzzle you women are!" said her husband, rubbing up his stiff grey hair. "Plotting and scheming to be rid of the child, and yet loving her with all your heart!"

An extract from a letter received by Cecilia Williams, in April, shall close my little story:—

"You no doubt remember, when I wrote from Venice, I told you of a very clever, intellectual man who joined us there—Mr. Sandle—about thirty, but looking much younger. Oddly enough, I don't think I mentioned him again. He came to Florence with us, and was extremely kind and considerate when I was feeling worn-out with nursing. He is now over again from England, partly on business; but he was anxious to spare Mrs. Galbraith all fatigue on her journey; so we have seen a great deal of Mr. Sandle, and you will be introduced to him before long, Cecilia, when we all meet at Aunt Jane's home. He is often in Edinburgh. Though not an artist, he has an intense appreciation of Art (you may laugh at me as much as you like—I 'm sure it ought to be spelt with a capital 'A'). I have just finished a copy of a favourite picture, and was quite surprised at the soundness and justness of his remarks; he enters far more into the spirit and meaning of my painting than Mr. Galbraith, who is still apt to be acrid and over-critical: he is human, and jealousy is a universal failing.

"You and Aunt Jane will like him, I know; it is a pity his parents fixed on 'David,' but I understand it is a family name. Even spiteful Mrs. Ashby would surely admit that a business which takes one to the south of Europe at least once every year—I told you, didn't I, that he is a silk merchant?—is, by that fact only, placed on an equal footing with one of the professions. There is nothing like travel for enlarging the mind; the very thought of living in Milltown is a perfect nightmare to me, though it will be fun to stay a week at Miss Marsden's and hear the gossip! I wonder if Miss Browne will patronise me now!"

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

June 15. The Rich Fool.

To read—St. Luke xii. 13—21. Golden Text—verse 15.

I.  QUESTION ASKED. (13—15.) Most children have seen a great crowd collected. What draws it together? Might be one of these reasons—

Something to see—as a fire, or a funeral, or a wedding, etc.

Something to hear—as a great preacher.

Something to get—as at a soup-kitchen.

What was it gathered this crowd together? (Ver. 1.) So many people that they crushed and trod upon one another. They wanted to—

See Christ—of Whom they heard wonderful things.

Get from Christ—healing, food, comfort.

Hear Christ—Who spake as none else did.

One man takes opportunity to ask Christ to do something for him.

What does he want? Christ to influence his brother to give him share of his estate. Why should Christ do so? Had gained a character for being just and fair. But was this what Christ came for—to settle disputes about property and such-like? So He declines—and bids all beware of covetousness. He shows how a man's life may be viewed in two ways, viz.—

(a) What he has—health, prosperity, riches, etc.

(b) What he is—honest, pure, God-fearing, etc., or covetous, selfish, unholy, etc.

Which make up man's true life? That which will last. Must leave all his possessions at death—but his character, good or bad, remains for eternity.

II. A Question Answered. (16—21.) Christ illustrates His sayings by a parable—commonly called "The Rich Fool." Notice—

(a) What the man had. The good things of this life—prosperity increasing year by year—all things that are considered able to give earthly pleasure and comfort.

Also had belief in the future—that he would have long life, health, power of enjoying what he had.

So he would be merry, and care not for future.

(b) What the man had not. Thanks to God Who gave all.

Thoughts of death, which might rob him of all.

Remembrance of the poor, whom he might benefit.

Knowledge of higher life than mere self-indulgence.

(c) What the man came to. An untimely end.

An unrepentant death—no time to turn to God.

A miserable future—wicked shall be cast into hell.

Lessons. What are true riches?

1. Those that will last—the fear and love of God.
2. Those that benefit others—true charity.
3. Those that bring ourselves peace at the last.

June 22. Trust in Our Heavenly Father.

To read—St. Luke xii. 22—34. Golden Text—ver. 30.

I. Earthly Cares. (22—30.) Last lesson told of a rich man trusting to his riches for happiness. Our Lord now gives advice about the things of this life. What are we not to do? Take anxious thought about eating, drinking and clothing. Notice about these things—

(a) They are necessary. (Ver. 30.)

(b) They must be obtained with toil.

(c) They are provided by God.

How does God provide for His other creatures?

Ravens and other birds find food at all seasons.
Are not we better than they?
Therefore God will provide for our wants.
Lilies and flowers cover the earth with beauty.
They are more glorious than Solomon's robes.
But are soon cut down with the mown grass.
It is God who clothes the grass with beauty.
Therefore He will provide us with clothing.

Whence come man's food and clothing? Remind of the sheep for meat and wool—the cows giving milk—corn for bread—cotton for calico, etc.

All these dependent on sun, rain, wind, etc.

Therefore all dependent on God—given by Him for use of man. (Ps. civ. 14.)

Why are we not to be anxious? (St. Matt. vii. 11.)

(a) Because God is our Father. As Author of our life bound to provide for His creatures' wants. As loving Father delighting to supply needs.

(b) Because God is our King—bound to do His best for His subjects.

Are we then to be idle? No! Man is to go to his daily work, but he may expect God's blessing on his labours. (Eph. iv. 28.)

II. HEAVENLY TREASURE. (31—34.) What is to be sought first?

A place in God's Kingdom. Then all things needed will be given.

See different titles by which God's people called:—

(a) God's children. He is their loving Father.

(b) God's subjects. He is preparing a Kingdom.

(c) God's flock. He is their Shepherd.

What have they to do?

(a) Give alms Not live only for themselves.

(b) Provide treasure in heaven—for this world passes away.

(c) Set hearts on heavenly things.

How different from the conduct of the Rich Fool!

Examples. Judas set his heart on money, and was lost. (Acts i. 18.)

Demas loved this world and deserted Christ. (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

Apostles gave up all for Christ, and received one-hundredfold. (St. Matt. xix. 29.)

Early Christians gave up all their possessions. (Acts ii. 45.)

Is our treasure in heaven?

JUNE 29. REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

Golden Text—St. John iii. 2.

INTRODUCTION. The lessons this quarter illustrate the Golden Text.

They show Christ as a Teacher sent from God—teaching by Words, Parables, and Miracles.

I. CHRIST'S TEACHING BY WORDS. 1. A Lesson of love. Remind of His Sermon on the Mount (ch. vi.), showing the difference between His teaching and that of old times. The Law taught punishment for evil, requiting of wrongs, etc. Christ taught love to enemies, blessings instead of curses.

2. A lesson of forgiveness. Shall we not avenge wrongs, insults, and the like—insist on debts being paid in full with interest? Christ teaches us to give liberally, lend without looking to receive back; to be merciful in conduct, lenient in judging, kind.

3. A lesson of prayer. The Lord's Prayer given as a model one. How?

Pray first for God's glory, then for man's needs.
Includes all people and all wants.
God as Father, ready to supply all wants.

4. A lesson of trust. For whom does God care besides man?

Birds are fed without their sowing or reaping.
Flowers carpet the earth with beauty.
Are we not better than they?
Therefore God will provide for His children's wants.

II. CHRIST'S TEACHING BY PARABLES. 1. The Sower. A tale of God's Word.

The hard heart receives no seed at all.
The shallow heart shows no permanent result.
The worldly heart chokes the seed with cares and pleasures.
The good heart receives and profits.
Take heed how ye hear.

2. The Good Samaritan. A tale of love.

The man in danger—could not help himself.
The priest and Levite—did not trouble to help.
The Samaritan a "friend closer than a brother."
Provided for all his neighbour's needs.

Type of Him who so loved us as to give Himself for us.

Shall He not also freely give us all things?

3. The rich fool. A tale of sheer folly.

A fool for taking no account of—
The uncertainty of life and all earthly things.
The insufficiency of riches for happiness.
The stewardship of money, for which must give account. His end—destruction.

III. CHRIST'S TEACHING BY MIRACLES. 1. The Widow of Nain.

An only son of a widowed mother raised to life.
Christ's compassion teaches us to weep with mourners.
Christ's help teaches to do all we can for others.
The man raised teaches the Resurrection.

2. The Ruler's Daughter. The young may die.
Christ's loving sympathy and care for children.

3. Feeding the multitudes. In the wilderness with Christ.
Wants supplied fully and freely by God.
Duty of order, thanks, and avoidance of waste.
The same Jesus the Bread of Life.
"Lord, evermore give us this bread."

JULY 6. LAWFUL WORK ON THE SABBATH.

To read—St. Luke xiii, 10—17. Golden Text—St. Matt. xii. 12.

I. SABBATH TEACHING. (Ver. 10.) Recall notices of Sabbath Day. Ordained after creation. (Gen. ii. 3.)
Blessed and set apart as holy by God.
Servants and cattle allowed to rest. (Deut. v. 14.)

No work (except preparation of food) to be done.
Divine worship to be celebrated. (Ezek. xlvi. 3.)
Scriptures read in the Synagogues. (Acts xiii. 27.)
Remind also of punishment for profaning it (Ex. xxxi. 14), and of blessedness of keeping it. (Is. lvi. 2.)
Principles of keeping it in Fourth Commandment.
1. A day of rest from ordinary work.
2. A day of worship and of hearing God's Word.

II. SABBATH HEALING. (11—17.) 1. A woman cured. Bent double with infirmity—eighteen years of pain—yet found in Synagogue on the Sabbath.
Came for spiritual blessing—found also temporal blessing. Received touch and blessing of Christ.
At once healed. At once glorified God.
God is able to do more than we ask or think.
2. A ruler protests. Why does he object?
Because Christ was "working" on Sabbath.
Had yet to learn "mercy greater than sacrifice."
How had Christ already taught this?
By letting His disciples pluck corn when hungry.
By healing man with withered hand (Golden Text).
3. Christ's answer. Why call him a hypocrite?
Because his indignation only a pretence to conceal his real feeling, which was jealousy of Christ.
See how Christ convicts him by his own conduct.
He looses his animals on Sabbath for water.
May not this woman be loosed from her malady?
She is a Jewess, under the law. The same Lord who gave the law has released her. If works of necessity may be done, much more may works of mercy.
The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath.
LESSONS. 1. Sabbath duties. Rest and worship.
2. Sabbath restrictions. (Is. lviii. 13.)
3. Sabbath privileges. Works of mercy.
All to be done to the glory of God.
4. Sabbath foretastes. (Heb. iv. 9.)

JULY 13. THE GREAT SUPPER.

To read—St. Luke xiv. 15—24. Golden Text—verse 15.

INTRODUCTION. Last Lesson told of observance of Sabbath—how works of mercy might be done. On another Sabbath Christ went as invited guest to a feast (verse 1—7), and healed a man who had dropsy. Then He turns the conversation to the heavenly feast—the Supper of the Lamb. Shows who will be partakers of that. (Rev. xix. 9.)

I. THE INVITATION. (15—17.) Notice the remark made by one of those at the feast (15). Had probably heard Christ speak of His Kingdom—perhaps heard the Parables of Mustard Seed and Leaven (xiii. 19—21). So he thinks that he—a Jew, one of God's favoured people—would be certain of a place in that Kingdom. Christ gives a warning by means of a parable. Many are called—but few chosen.
A certain man—God Creator and Ruler of all.
Great Supper—the blessings given by God.
Many bidden—God will have all to be saved.
The Supper ready—Now is the day of salvation.
The servant sent—Prophets, messengers, His Son. (Heb. i. 2.) Surely they will haste to the feast!

II. THE EXCUSES. (18—20.) They made light of the summons.
Excuse of business—bought land and oxen.
Excuse of pleasure—married a wife.
So insulted the host who invited them.
Whom do these people represent?
The Jews who refused Christ's invitations.
All who let this world keep them back from God.
How does God call us? By His ministers and teachers, His Word, His Spirit speaking to conscience.
Do people make such excuses still? Alas! they do. Some say, they have no time to be religious; some say, they must think of this world first; some let pleasure-seeking come between them and God.

III. THE RESULT. (21—24.) 1. The host angry. God will not always bear with men. If He is neglected, despised, will one day turn against us. See solemn warnings in Prov. i. 24—28.
2. Others invited. The feast is ready—others must come and partake.
The Jews rejected Christ—the Gentiles believed. See what St. Paul said at Antioch. (Acts xiii. 46.) Notice who were invited—
The poor in spirit—who shall see God. (St. Matt. v. 3.)
The maimed—who hunger after righteousness.
The blind—whose eyes shall be opened to know God's truth.
These were called, invited, compelled to come in.
So Christ invites sinners to Him still. He longs to receive them, to welcome them, to fill up His Home. Who can refuse?
3. The invited guests shut out. Not only the wicked cast into hell, but also all who forget God.
Therefore—Seek ye the Lord while He may be found.

THE COURTESY OF CHRISTIANS.

BY THE REV. DAVID BURNS.

A JEWISH greeting was not a bow and a passing word; it was the custom to observe many tedious formalities, and to recite prolonged salutations. Our Lord had this in view when He bade His seventy fore-runners "Salute no one by the way." He Himself was about to follow, and He was trusting to them to have a welcome waiting Him. Such lengthened civilities to the chance passenger would seriously delay their progress. The Christ must not be hindered that mere courtesies may be honoured.

We must be willing, as those early disciples were, to seem to be rude, if it is only thereby we can be true to Him. Often this is a most trying duty. Genteel society has its frosts and fires for any who slight its fashions. It has its cold stare of astonishment, its smile of mingled pity and amusement, its sneer, its shrug, its cold shoulder. These tortures are ever at hand. They are ready under the flashing lights and beside the outspread dainties. They are threatened in the midst of the kindliest, raciest talk. And the Face of gentlest grace and clearest rectitude is ill to catch in that glaring light. The still small voice is lost in the laughter of that crowd. The Christian too often joins with the world to crucify the Christ.

Our Lord, however, is far from careless as to the manners of His deputies. Immediately after He had told His disciples to allow no unnecessary salaams to stay them on their errand, He said: "And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, 'Peace be to this house.'" This was but a repetition of the instruction which before He gave to the Apostles.

Thus to the ministry of His Church and to the members in it He declares the same duty of courtesy. For this "Peace" was the common salutation. It was used as we use our "Good-day" and "Good-bye." Even with the business of the Messiah in hand, the disciples were not to burst into anyone's house, and fling down their message. They were to enter with the usual formalities. These were due to the householder, and would predispose him to welcome the visitor, and to honour his errand.

We, who claim to be the disciples of that Master, are busy with a like message for Him. Even although we may not mean it, we really are engaged in introducing the Christ to men. Wherever we come we make a welcome for Him whose name we bear, or else we create a prejudice against Him. We ought, therefore, of set purpose, to seek that Christianity in our person may meet the world always with a smile and a frank salutation.

This, of course, is to be done not by one set form of words, but by a constant spirit of peace. Any phrase needs but repetition to lose its meaning. The right feeling, however, the oftener it is exercised, grows deeper and warmer. Still our Lord in effect bids us be careful to use the ordinary courtesies of meeting and farewell. He names to those disciples the very words then in common use. We need not avoid the familiar phrases because they have long lost reality. The true value of a greeting is, after all, not the thought in it, but the heart with which it is said. Our kindliness may be conveyed by words whose actual sense we quite overlook. And why not fix attention on the meaning, and mean it? We may turn these phrases into a loftier prayer, just as Jesus transfigured the "Peace" of the Jews. Then they shall be gifts worthy of being presented in the Saviour's name. To do so would be to go far to fulfil the precept which enjoins intercession for all men, and also the larger law, which commands us to pray without ceasing.

He who in Christ's spirit is courteous in salutation cannot fail to be courteous in his whole behaviour. He has the secret, in fidelity to which he shall show himself a true gentleman. He is copying the King—the gentle, gracious, self-sacrificing Jesus. He does what he can imagine his Lord doing then and there. In truth, he is reproducing on earth the manners of the Heavenly Court. Such a courtesy is the truest and the most winsome. It comes not only from the heart, but from the heart of the heart, where the Spirit of Christ is warming and prompting the spirit of man.

The Gospel guides this courtesy, and urges it on to perfection. Our New Testament teaches us to do what fashion only plays at doing. More stringently than any code of etiquette, our life's directory shuts out of the highest society, which is God's, those who do not conform to His rules of conduct. They are such as these: He who is greatest must be slave to all. We are to wash one another's feet. The spiritual are to bear the burdens of their fellows. In honour we are to prefer one another. Such is the good-breeding expected from those who have been born again. By that birth from above, Divine blood flows in their veins, and a Divine tenderness and nobility are becoming their second nature and eternal life.

This true and lasting gentility is open to everyone. It is not reserved for cultured circles, or moneyed people, or any caste. The name of "gentleman" or "lady" may be denied us, but it lies with ourselves whether we are to be so or not. Let us set our heart on the fact, and care little for the title. Let us give our conduct that supreme charm which the worldling can only imitate feebly—the charm of simplicity and sincerity.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

THE sun, whose beams such bliss afford,
When skies are blue above,
Proclaims the goodness of the Lord,
And His unchanging love.

Deep in the woodland's calm retreat,
Its splendours pierce the gloom,
And, in the city's crowded street,
It lights the narrow room.

To children, stretched on beds of pain,
Its cheering rays descend—
Where lonely hearts in grief complain,
It enters like a friend.

How sweet in Heaven the beams must be,
Of glory and of grace,
The light of God's eternity,
The brightness of His face!

J. R. EASTWOOD.

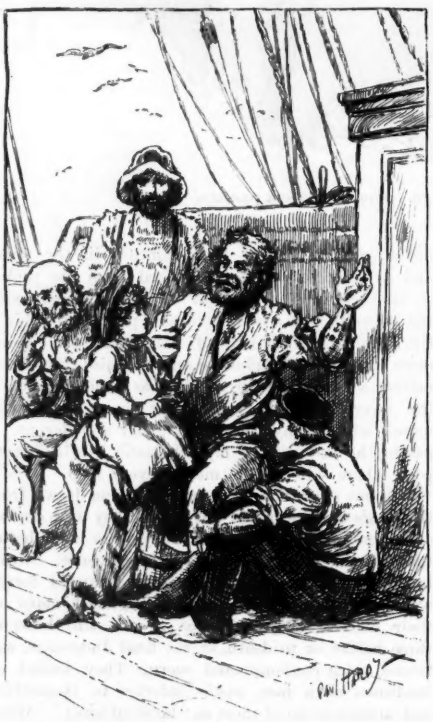
OUR SAILORS.

BY THE REV. F. TRESTRAIL, D.D

"'Jack, my dear fellow, give me a passage.'"—p. 594.

SAILORS' PETS.

HAVING lived for the first twenty-six years of my life in Falmouth, I had abundant opportunities of becoming acquainted with the character and habits of sailors. The harbour, one of the finest in the kingdom, was the rendezvous of the Channel Fleet during the war. There was also a Post Office Packet establishment of over thirty armed vessels, carrying only passengers, specie, and the mails for Spain, the Mediterranean, West Indies, America, and Brazil. These vessels, mostly built in the port, were very handsome, very fast, and very safe. Their crews, when not at sea, lived with their families in the town, and as they very seldom changed from one packet to another, were permanent inhabitants, and, with the crews of the coasting vessels, pilot- and fishing-boats, made up one-half of the population. Being more under social influence and restraint, they were neither so wild nor so reckless as their fellows in the navy. For the most their lives were fairly moral, while many were truly godly and devout. I passed the last year of my scholastic life in Devonport, where sailors were met at every step.



Without education, and many of them drawn from the dregs of society and our gaols, they were deplorably ignorant and immoral. They were little better than animals with a modicum of intelligence. Swearing, cursing, and vice, in their most awful forms, were common to the men, and disgraced many of their officers. Any reference to the sinfulness of these habits, or to death, or the final Judgment, was treated with contempt and scorn. They looked on landsmen as a race vastly inferior to themselves, and always spoke of them as "land-lubbers!" When on shore, they recklessly spent their money in riot and drunkenness. Having no settled homes, they had no motive to lay up a store for old age.

When, however, they were not infuriated by liquor, none could be more kind, generous, and gentle. Their hilarity and good nature, and boundless love of frolic and fun, made them the favourites of everybody. The "yarns" they would spin, the stories they would tell of the marvels of the deep, both in calm and storm, the tricks they would play on each other, and on their officers when they dared, especially the purser, were highly amusing. They were as simple as children; in action or in danger, daring and fearless.

Their love of pets was almost universal. A monkey, a parrot, a lamb, a dog, and even a pig, they would fancy, and teach all manner of tricks. Nor were they less fond of children. In coming into port after a long absence, if a child were brought on board, there would be quite a scuffle among them who should nurse it. How gently the little thing would be handled! They would play with it, sing to it, with evident enjoyment to themselves, and to the great delight of the young ones.

And if their ship was handsome, and a first-class "sea boat," and if their officers were thorough seamen, considerate and sympathetic, and sparingly using the absolute power with which they were invested to punish men who had misconducted themselves, their pride in the ship and officers would be almost boundless. With so many admirable qualities, one could not help pitying them for their profanity and recklessness, or refrain from offering many excuses for their excesses. Neglected by Christians, with bad accommodation on board, provisions often unsound, and the vegetable diet, so essential to a sailor's health, rarely enjoyed, all these combined with the tyranny which they had to endure when officers were martinets, to degrade their character.

"How gently the little thing would be handled!"

In these far-off times scarcely a day would pass without the occurrence of some amusing incident. I remember when standing at the door of an hotel, whence a coach was about to start, seeing perched on the outside a group of sailors. A gentleman came up to take a place, when he was told that the sailors had paid for the coach the whole way to London. So he shouted, "Hallo, on deck there!"—"Well, you land-lubber, what do you want?"—"A place to London; so, Jack, my dear fellow, give me a passage."—"Well, you may get into the hold if you like, but mind you don't come up here on the quarter-deck." He gladly got inside, and rode all the way to London, and had nothing to pay! I have often seen a sailor, half-tipsy, rolling along the street, and falling against a shop window, break it. Payment was of course promptly demanded. "How much, mate, for repairs?"—"Five shillings." So, taking out a half-guinea, the sailor handed it in. "There, can't wait for your beggarly change, so I will smash another. Now then, mate, we are quits."

In the Royal Navy sailors are often in the same ship for three or four or even more years. During this time the craft is their home, and they speak of it as such, and with an affection as if it were a living thing. Through the means of the ship the men may be wonderfully influenced. The late Captain Hall was in command of a remarkably fine frigate on the South American station, which he always kept in first-rate order, and of which he and his crew were justly proud. The handsome bust on her beautiful figure-head was brightly gilt, and great care was taken of it. The harmony which had generally prevailed on board was somehow disturbed. But instead of resorting to corporal punishment, he summoned the men aft, and in a simple, manly speech, pointed out the impropriety of their conduct, and concluded thus:—"So now, my lads, if this be not put an end to, and hearty goodwill restored, I'll blacken your figure-head and put the ship in mourning." Had a bombshell fallen at their feet the men could not be more astonished. To have their figure-head blackened! No; anything rather than that; and in that way order and harmony were restored.

What a contrast is now seen between the past and present condition and character of our sailors! It will therefore be interesting to glance at the origin of this change, and the instrumentality by which it has been effected.

Its author was unquestionably the Rev. G. C. Smith, more popularly known as "Boatswain Smith." When visiting Falmouth he was always the guest of my parents, who were exceedingly attached to him. His history was most remarkable. The ship of which he was boatswain got ashore off Ushant, and was much damaged. With great difficulty she was kept afloat and brought into Falmouth, and after temporary repairs was taken to Devonport to be docked. Here Mr. Smith was brought to a sense of his lost state as a sinner under the ministry of the Rev. Isaiah Birt.

"'Now then, mate, we are quits.'"—p. 594.

What time elapsed, what instruction he received, and by whom given, prior to his entering the Christian ministry, I never heard. I first knew him as pastor of Jordan Chapel, Penzance, where he was exceedingly popular and eminently useful. He gathered around him a zealous band of young men as local preachers, who carried the Gospel into the surrounding villages. He also sustained a missionary in the Scilly Islands.

The condition of our soldiers and sailors very early attracted his attention, and with characteristic ardour he attempted their reformation. Assisted by some wealthy Christian friends in different parts of the kingdom, he went on a mission to the British army in Portugal. The Duke of Wellington most cordially welcomed him, placed him on the strength of a regiment, and allowed him the use of a horse. Reports of his proceedings came first to my father, and were by him forwarded to London. I remember well how deeply interested we all were in their perusal. After an absence of some months, Mr. Smith returned to Penzance, subsequently resigned his pastoral charge, and removed to London.

His first notable work was the opening of a Refuge for soldiers and seamen in Wellclose Square. Then came the opening of seamen's chapels in some of our large ports. The "Bethel Flag" was his invention. I can now recall the feeling of youthful pride with which I assisted him to run up the first "Bethel Flag," hoisted in Falmouth Harbour.

His power over the rude multitudes that thronged to hear him was perfectly wonderful. He could enter the "Long Rooms" about Wapping, when they were filled with riotous sailors, with perfect safety. Even the most abandoned were respectful to the "Sailor Parson." On one occasion when he was preaching, some drunken sailors insulted him, when a strong woman, of the worst character, knocked them down, and kept them down until he had finished.

I remember whilst he was preaching at Falmouth a sharp shower came on. Generally, a shower will scatter a crowd. But on this occasion not a foot stirred. He could talk to sailors in their own tongue, and had the happy art of adapting nautical phrases to the illustration of Scripture truths. He replied to their rough jokes with imperturbable good temper, and could move them to laughter or to tears.

He was equally at home with persons of rank and wealth. His self-possession and courtesy in their presence never failed him, while his power of persuasion was extraordinary. He invariably maintained his self-respect. He neither cringed nor presumed. Though always a sailor in manner, he was anything but noisy and boisterous in private life; while his fine rollicking humour and open-heartedness imparted singular interest and poignancy to his talk. As a fireside companion he had few equals.

But what a voice he had! The three most remarkable voices I have ever heard are those of Mr. Spurgeon, Mr. O'Connell, and Mr. Smith. The first is wonderful in its distinctness, clearness, and power, and of great range and capacity of varied expression, but somewhat deficient in pathos. Mr. O'Connell's was indeed a splendid instrument, played on with marvellous skill. Humour, wit, invective, sarcasm, persuasion, pathos, and those whispers which are perfectly audible even in large assemblies, but which make one tremble, had a perfect utterance with him. But Mr. Smith's was even finer, and its range rose from the depths of the diapason to the dulcet notes of the flute. He could speak in tones of thunder, or entreat with the gentleness of a woman. It was very striking to look on this heroic man, who had seen peril in its most appalling forms, pleading with sinners in loving tender words, his whole frame quivering with intense emotion, while urging them to be reconciled to God. No marvel that multitudes hung upon his lips!

After years of severe toil, during which he was often in want, when no longer able to work, he retired to Penzance, where he began public life, and there died in a good old age. Many have since risen and walked in his steps, nobly carrying on the work which he began. But he has had no successor.

The first officer of distinction who seconded Mr. Smith's efforts was Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin, who introduced on board his ship the use of coffee and tea instead of rum. His attempts to promote sobriety were at first stoutly opposed, and sailors ridiculed his ship, calling her the "Tea Caddy." But other officers soon perceived the benefits arising from the change, and now the use of ardent spirits is greatly reduced in H.M. Navy. Coincident with these salutary changes, and owing very much to the passionate appeals of Mr. Plimsoll, the men are accommodated in better berths, have better provisions, and are better cared for. Provision, too, is made for their mental improvement, and a godly soldier or sailor is respected by both officers and men, when formerly he would be despised and persecuted.

One turns, with devout thankfulness, to say a word about the marvellous work carried on by Miss Weston and her colleagues at Devonport, Portsmouth, and Sheerness, which began in a very humble fashion, but has now grown to vast dimensions. Here are bright, cheery rooms, where first-class refreshments can be had at moderate prices, with abundance of innocent amusements. Temperance work is zealously carried on, and thousands have taken the pledge. A teetotal ship is now no uncommon phenomenon. A monthly letter is sent to every man connected with the Institute, in whatever part of the world he may be, which is eagerly expected, and read with delight and joy. No less than five public-houses have been closed as the result of this work, and on the site of three of the worst a fine building is rising to afford more sleeping accommodation to sailors when on shore. The lads on board the training-ships, when off duty, cluster round the place like bees round their hives. Anyone who is disposed can pass into the hall where religious services are held, and Bible-classes meet. The two departments are wisely kept separate, and religion is in no unwise way intruded on the men. All these institutes are self-supporting, and are managed by Miss Weston and her colleagues gratuitously.

At the earnest persuasion of sailors who did not know how to dispose of their wages, she became their banker, and has had in her hands as much as sixty thousand pounds at a time. By her repeated and earnest importunity the Admiralty have established a Naval Savings Bank, which has proved a vast benefit to our sailors. Some idea of the greatness of the benefit may be gathered from this fact. Recently H.M.S. Audacious returned from a prolonged absence in Oriental seas. Her crew, when paid off, received over twelve thousand pounds. The men quietly left by train for the homes of their friends and families. On the morrow not one was brought before the magistrates for riotous or disorderly conduct! Forty years ago, or in even a less time, the whole of this large sum would have been squandered in dissipation and vice.

Though I have not moved so freely among soldiers as among sailors, yet one cannot but rejoice in the noble work done by the late Mrs. Daniel, and now carried on by her daughter at Aldershot, as well as that maintained by Miss Robinson at Portsmouth, which is similar to Miss Weston's in extent and usefulness. But while thanking God for raising up instruments for carrying on this great work, and rejoicing in the rich and effectual blessing which He has bestowed on it, the name and the labours of the great originator of this vast reformation ought not to be forgotten or let die.

"UNTO ME:" A DREAM-STORY.

POSSIBLY Miss Heatherley would not have admitted that she was wealthy, but certainly she would not have denied that she was "very comfortably off." She had a pretty double-fronted house, enclosed in a garden where flowers and fruit alike flourished, in the airiest suburb of the manufacturing town of Riston. If she wished to go into the town, there were her victoria and pair of sturdy ponies, with a smart groom awaiting her commands. If she wished to remain in the garden, there were her crimson-and-white striped tent and luxurious American chair, amongst the rose-beds near the miniature fountain on the lawn. If she wished for society, she had but to ask and have, for she well understood the art of entertaining, sparing no expense to please her guests. Indoors, money and cultivated taste had made the bijou house almost perfection. Comfort and ornament were artistically combined; sunshine and fresh air were freely admitted. The odour of freshly gathered flowers was everywhere.

In Miss Heatherley's drawing-room one might be sure of finding the newest magazine, the most popular book. One might have good music too, for the lady was no mean performer on the superb grand that occupied a conspicuous place in the apartment. There were cushioned settees fixed into cosy corners, where delightful tête-à-têtes might be enjoyed, and lounging-chairs seemingly made on purpose for a land where it it is "always afternoon"—so tempting to drowsy indolence were they.

Yes, certainly Miss Lucy Heatherley was "very comfortably off."

Nor was she forgetful of the claims of those who were very *un*comfortably off.

The vicar of the church she attended found her ear and her purse equally open to his appeals. Her name could be seen in the subscription-lists of almost every charity. Neither was this all, for Miss Heatherley really loved her Lord, and really desired to obey His precepts. Therefore she was mindful of the injunction to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction. At many a wretched door in the lanes and alleys of Riston her victoria—well filled with various brown-paper parcels—drew up, while her portly figure, in its silks and laces or furs and velvets, entered to dazzle the eyes of the poor inhabitants.

She was wont to declare to the humble admirers who gathered at her charitable sewing-parties that "her life was not all play, by any means!"—whether it contained any real sacrifice of self, any positive self-denial for the Master she served, she never paused to inquire.

She was considered a model of charity—one of those whose religion is "pure and undefiled." In the depths of her heart she thought so too. She had known sorrow, and borne it well. She was sometimes lonely, yet never complained. She was invariably kind both to friends and dependents. The spiritual welfare of her servants was never neglected by her. Her public religious duties were faithfully fulfilled.

If her Lord ever said to her, "One thing thou lackest," her heart was never moved to distrust of itself. Perhaps amid the noise of many voices praising her, the still small accents were not heard; or it may be that it had never occurred to her to ask—"What lack I yet?" in the certainty that she was doing what she could, and from the sincerest motives.

One bitterly cold November night, Miss Heatherley sat by her bedroom fire reading her Bible before retiring to rest.

Through the closely drawn curtains the roar of the pelting sleet—the tempestuous wind—came with a softened sound that increased the warm comfort within. The shaded lamp-light, the glowing fire-light, touched with deeper hues pale rose-coloured draperies; sparkled here on the dead gold of a picture-frame, there on the gleam of glass or porcelain, and were fain to die in the depths of the soft rich carpet. Clearly they showed the owner of the luxurious room seated in her large arm-chair, padded with eider-down—the Bible in her hand. Miss Heatherley had discarded the handsome plush tea-gown she had been wearing for a dressing-gown equally handsome. Its silken folds disclosed the daintiest pair of fur-lined slippers; its delicate laces fell away from her shapely white hands, where the diamond rings—that were the envy of some of her friends—outshone the fire-light that touched them. With her still fair face, her eyes bright for all the fifty years they had seen, and her snow-white hair, Miss Heatherley made as pretty a picture in one way as her room did in another.

"Miss Heatherley made as pretty a picture in one way as her room did in another."

She had been reading the last part of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, with a pleasant remembrance of the gifts of food and clothing she had that morning been distributing. Her heart thrilled with the sweetness of the thought that one day she should hear those blessed words addressed to herself—"Inasmuch as thou hast done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, thou hast done it unto Me."

She looked round her room with a glow of satisfaction, appreciating her pretty things all the more because of the poverty and misery she had so lately witnessed.

"God has given me many good gifts," she said to herself, as she closed her Bible and rang for her maid; "but they've not made me forgetful of Him. I do what I can for those who are less favoured. The poor do not lie unhelped at my gate, whatever may be said of others. Thank God, I am not a Dives!"

* * * * * *

Perhaps Miss Heatherley had slept for two hours, when she awoke with a start, for it seemed to her that somebody called her by name. She sat up in bed, surprised to see the room full of soft light like moonlight, and, to her wonder and awe, a Figure, clothed in white robes and crowned with thorns, standing in the midst—a Figure so familiar to her thoughts, beautiful, majestic, and serene—the Lord she loved, the Lord who died for her.

Miss Heatherley had often pictured to herself the first meeting with her Saviour. She had imagined that she would fall at His feet, and kiss them in a transport of joy and rapture. She had imagined that He would smile approvingly on her, that He would raise her from the ground, and place her—who had given Him so much, and served Him so faithfully—close by His side in some position of honour. But now an overwhelming sense of sin and shortcoming made her cover her face with her hands when she met His grave, loving regard, while the self-abhorring cry of St. Peter rose involuntarily to her lips—"Depart from me, O Lord, for I am a sinful creature!"

As if in answer to that cry, He spoke—

"Arise! Follow Me!"

The words were gently, yet authoritatively spoken, and the trembling woman did not dream of disobeying, or even questioning them. She rose from her bed, followed the luminous Figure down the wide velvet-carpeted stairs, into the cold and empty street.

In a few moments, as it seemed, they had left behind the wealthy suburb, and were in the centre of the poorest quarter of the town. Miss Heatherley's Guide stopped at the door of a wretched tumble-down house in a narrow alley. In spite of the fear and awe that possessed her, she noticed a drunken man, who, with many uncouth sounds and gestures, was barring the entrance against fancied intruders. As the two approached, he shrank back, cowering against the wall, covering his face with his hands—very much as Miss Heatherley had done

The alley and the house were alike familiar to the lady, so was the low, ruinous-looking attic wherein she presently stood with her dread Companion. She had been there that very morning to take a blanket for the poor rheumatic old man who rented the miserable place. A sense of satisfaction stole into her mind as she remembered that gift, and the grateful pleasure of the recipient.

Why had she been afraid? Surely the Lord was about to commend her for her charity! The attic was very dark, but the radiance emanating from the figure of the Saviour fell full upon the pallet where the old man lay. It was bitterly cold. The broken window was stuffed with rags, but the wind and sleet, which had seemed to Miss Heatherley to cease when she was in the street, found only too free an entrance. The grate was empty, so was the cupboard. Cold and hungry, the man had gone to bed, and, in spite of the blanket, he was evidently cold still. Obeying a motion of her Guide, Miss Heatherley approached the pallet. It consisted of a very old torn straw mattress, with the occupant's coat for pillow.

"Oh, my old bones! my poor old aching bones!" he muttered, shivering audibly; "'tis a bonnie bit o' blanket, and a rare kind thing of a lady like that to bring it to the likes o' me! But I thought as how blankets was warmer, surelie I did. Why, three on 'em would hardly keep my old bones warm. Eh, good Lord, if I could get a bit o' warmth into me, I'd not feel the hunger so much, maybe!"

Before Miss Heatherley's eyes came a swift vision of her own luxurious room and bed. She felt the thick soft warmth of the blankets—three of them, and the best that money could buy—the silken coverlet, the cosy eider-down quilt. Then she saw again the poor pallet, covered with only the one thin cheap blanket her charity had given to her brother's bitter need—saw and trembled. "Thou hast done it unto Me!" her Guide said, not reproachfully, only sadly.

Then He laid His hand on the old man's head, and his restless mutterings ceased; he had fallen asleep, and in his sleep he smiled.

Out into the street Miss Heatherley, deeply humbled and ashamed, followed her holy Guide again. Again the storm was hushed until they entered a small, close room in a house built on part of a disused graveyard, and round this the tempest raged until the damp walls rocked. A very small room it was, and almost bare of furniture. But it was clean, and a few red ashes glimmered on the broken hearth. A candle burned feebly by the bed, wherein a sick woman lay propped up by pillows. An anxious-looking, half-starved girl sat by her side, vainly beseeching her to "try and eat."

"Try a bite o' this cake, mother, do! you 'at was allers so fond o' cake, and the lady a-bringing it, and all! She'll look for you to have eaten it, and me a telling of her how 'ungered you was, and as 'ow I couldn't 'ford to buy you what you'd ought to have! See, mother, it's real cake! There's currans in it, and—and, yes! a bit o' candy peel! Oh you'll eat that!"

"I'll have a drink o' tea, Meg; I'm sore set on tea, I am; and then mebbe I'll try and eat a bite o' cake. Aye, t'was good on her, a real, grand lady, with her carridge and all, to bring it to me hersen; but it do somehows stick in my throat. If she'd a-thought on a hegg—but there, I daresay I couldn't eat a hegg now, though I'm terrible set on 'em. Don't you fret, Meg! I'm ower grand for cake, or aught but tea, just like quality is!" And the sick woman attempted a facetious laugh that broke down in a hard racking cough. Against her will, but compelled to it by the silent monition of her Guide, Miss Heatherley drew nearer the bed, and once more there passed before her mental gaze a vision of her own home.

She saw her perfectly appointed drawing-room as she had seen it that afternoon, with its rose-shaded lamps, its masses of flowers, its heaped-up glowing hearth. She saw herself in her rich plush gown and shining jewels, dispensing fragrant tea—on whose delicate flavour she was complimented by a connoisseur—into frail cups of priceless china, for the fashionable ladies and gentlemen who made a brilliant group round their hostess. She saw the dainty cakes, the tempting biscuits, that were the commonplace of every day to her friends and herself. Then she looked down at the cup of cheap flavourless tea, destitute of cream and sugar, which the sick woman was drinking. With deepest shame she recognised the cheap cake that 'somehow stuck" in the invalid's throat.

And once more, and yet more sadly, sounded the words—

"Thou hast done it unto Me."

Then He bent over the dying woman, and smiled on her. Oh, what would not Miss Heatherley have given to have won such a smile! The reflection of it was on the woman's face as she returned the empty cup to her daughter.

"Bless the Lord!" she said fervently; "that have done me good, that have! I'm a deal better, honey, and may the dear Lord bless madam as thought on a poor widdy!"

It was dawn when the two unseen visitors re-issued into the street: cold, dark, winter dawn. The sleet had frozen on the pavement, the falling snow was blown into drifts by the piercing wind. This time Miss Heatherley was conscious of the cold—it went through and through her; never had she experienced such a sensation before in all her warm, guarded life. She would fain have crept closer to her Guide, whose viewless presence brightened many a worn, sad face as He passed by, but she dared not. Her heart was breaking with a passion of love, longing, and remorse. How little, she thought, had she loved Him before! How faithlessly she had served Him! The praises of her bounty that she had heard, together with many others she had been wont to receive with outward deprecation and inward pride, were as so many wounds to her spirit. She to be praised for her charity? She!

She dashed the hot tears from her eyes as her Conductor paused before a doorstep, where sat a small puny child, holding a yet smaller puner child in her arms.

"I'm cold, Janie! I'm so cold!" wailed the latter over and over again in a kind of monotonous chant. "I'm so cold!"

"Oh, not cold, Bessie dear; not cold in them nice new clothes wot the lady give yer! Why, yer'd only rags afore!"

"I am cold, I am!" insisted Bessie, "and you're cold too, 'cause I feel yer a-shivering."

"Shivering? not me! Why, I've a shawl on," trying ineffectually to draw the small knitted square that covered her shoulders further on to her blue arms. "I'm a bit tired, mebbe, 'cause yer 'eavy, Bess, but we ain't cold, you and me!

"Oh, I am! I am! and so are you, Janie: you're a-shivering wuss and wuss; the rags was warmer than these 'ere frocks!"

"Nay now, Bess," said brave Janie, rising and preparing to carry her big baby again; "to talk o' rags, and you and me dressed like ladies! Oh, for shame on yer!"

"Ladies! Miss 'Ealtherley ain't dressed like this!" quoth Bessie, with contempt. "She's warm anuff covered with fur like a pussy-cat, and a big muff and a welwet gownd——"

"I'll tell yer what, Bess! Let's play at being grand ladies, and let's pretend we're very warm, and not a bit 'ungry; that'll be a jolly game. Then we'll go back 'ome, and mebbe father'll have got in by then, and 'll be asleep, and mother 'll find us a bit o' bread."

Fain, fain would the conscience-stricken listener have shut out the sight that—as the child ceased speaking—rose before her. There were her ample wardrobes, her closets, and some yet unpacked boxes, full of the costliest mantles and dresses. Silks, satins, velvets, laces, and furs: all were there. In themselves they represented a small fortune!

For the first time in her life the wearer sickened of them, turning away in almost despair to the spectacle of the two children whom her charity had clothed. How thin, how poor, how ugly, were the garments she had bestowed upon them! Well might their little limbs be cold! Well might Bessie disdain the notion of their being "dressed like ladies!"

And again, with solemn emphasis, the Lord spoke—

"Thou hast done it unto Me."

Then He laid His pierced hand on the childish heads, and blessed them. As He did so, a city missionary came up to the two, who had begun to laugh and play merrily, and took them off with him to "give them some breakfast"—half wondering at the sudden glow of pleasure that filled his own heart. It was no rare thing for him to give away half his breakfast, or the whole of it, indeed, to some starving fellow-creature.

Quick as thought the scene changed, and Miss Heatherley found herself in her own house. Her Guide was still with her. From room to room she followed Him, compelled to note every useless or costly article that luxury loves, with eyes that seemed at the same time to see a dark background of rainy streets, of fireless attics, of bare rooms and wretched cellars, wherein the Lord Himself wandered homeless, lay in sickness, suffered hunger; calling for help—in vain. It was like a sword in her heart when that accusing voice spoke for the last time—

"I gave thee all, and what hast thou given Me in return? Thou hast spread a rich feast for thyself, and given Me the cold remnants. Thou hast glorified self, and not thy Saviour. Lookest thou for reward? Yea; thou shalt have it. A day is coming when thou shalt indeed hear the longed-for words which thou never thoughtest might condemn—Inasmuch as thou hast done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, thou hast done it unto Me."

With an exceeding bitter cry the remorseful woman fell upon her knees—catching wildly at the Lord's white robes as He was about to turn away.

"Oh, don't go! Oh, don't leave me in displeasure! Give me one more chance!" she cried, her tears bathing His feet. "Oh, Lord, I have lived for self; I see it, I feel it now! But Thou knowest all things: Thou knowest that I love Thee!"

Her voice broke in a choking sob, but still she gazed up in an agony of entreaty at the Divine Face, which, as she gazed, softened into a smile of such sweet forgiveness, such tender love, that it flooded her inmost soul with the very light of heaven. No words were needed: Lucy Heatherley knew herself forgiven—as only the crucified Jesus forgives—"all that debt!"

Then clasping her hands while still kneeling at His feet, she mutely offered to Him her wealth, her time, her life, her all—without one reserve—and besought Him of His mercy to accept the gift. Once more He smiled, and in the glory of that ineffable sunshine Miss Heatherley—awoke.

Behold, it was a dream! S. W.

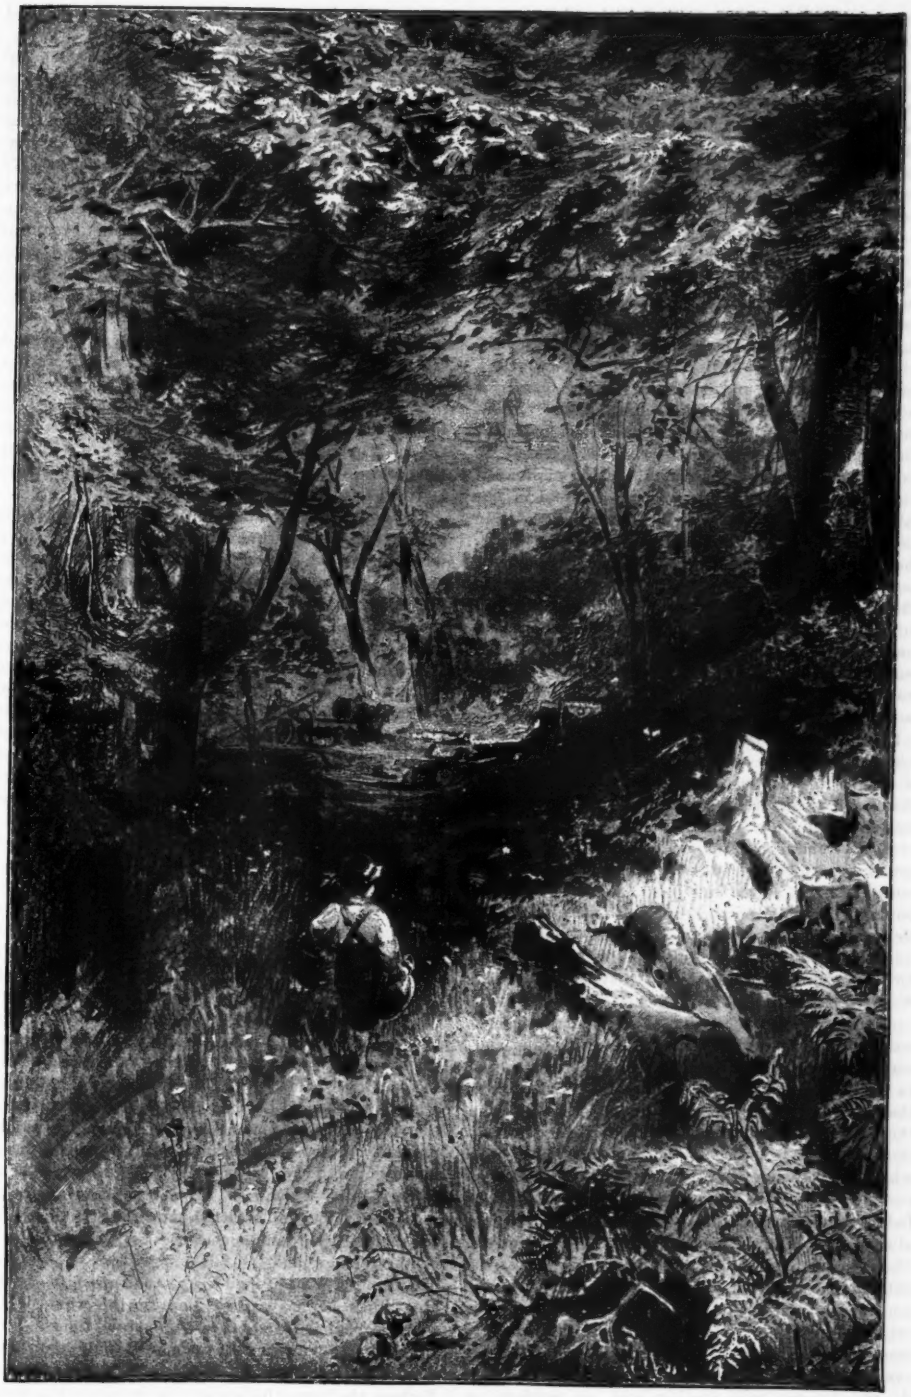
IN GOD'S GOOD TIME.

IN God's good time His chosen ones He calleth,
Seems this thing hard? Hast never learned to know,
'Mid forest clearing, every tree that falleth
For some wise end the woodman layeth low?

The tall straight sapling, its young crest uprearing,
The lightning-shattered trunk, with years grown grey,
The mighty tree in perfect strength appearing,
Each for the best is hewn and borne away.

E'en so with us, His children, is the dealing
Of the great Woodman, Father of us all!
We may rebel with dark distrustful feeling,
Yet ever for the best His axe doth fall.

The toddling child just ent'ring on Life's story,
The aged patriarch tottering down the years,
The man rejoicing in his manhood's glory,
Each one for good the ringing axe-notes hears.



And we, who see them fall, with bitter weeping,
Oh, that we all in perfect trust might rest,
Knowing our loved ones are in God's good keeping,
And whatsoe'er He doth must be best.

RELIGIOUS MOODS AND SEASONS.

BY THE REV. HARRY JONES, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

A SUCCESSION of seasons and moods is common, or I suppose inevitable, in nations, churches, and men. Otherwise, indeed, life would be monotonously intolerable. There is a time for everything, says the Preacher: a time to laugh and a time to weep. When one aspect of a matter has been offered to us, another is sure to present itself. The wheel turns round. From the first, the morning and the evening must needs be used to make the day, and sleep has ever been the necessary foil to wakefulness. The moods of nature (which is God's) are endless. He does not always give us light and warmth, but alternates them with darkness and cold. The earth has its belt of tropical fire and also poles of ice. In one sense the very weather (of which Jesus sometimes spoke) must reflect or indicate a Divine economy in the conduct of mankind. We have not only many men of many minds, but many moods of the same mind. And these are not to be blamed. A man need not tax himself with faulty changeableness when he is only subject to a dispensation which is natural. The really unnatural attitude is to affect a sublime monotonous immovability. Throughout the Kingdom of God, whether it be called spiritual or material, we have seasons of change. There are changes in matter and in mind. We see them in the Son of man Himself. Not only did He become weary with His journey, and so sit by the well-side or fall asleep in the Galilean ferry-boat, but we read how at one time He rejoiced in spirit, and at another said that His soul was exceeding sorrowful. There were also other mysterious moments in His life, when He suffered, being tempted, though perhaps a little while before He had amazed the people by His wonderful works.

"IN GOD'S GOOD TIME."

And so, in a measure, is it with us. We may have felt our hearts quickened with spiritual joy, and have seen difficulties recede. All has been bright. Then clouds have gathered, and the light has gone out of our faith. A distasteful contrast has come, or possibly (which, indeed, is worse) something not distasteful. We may enter a mood which does not distress us, but in which purer thoughts fade, and the voice of conscience becomes agreeably compliant. There are, no doubt, periods of glad conviction and enjoyment in doing right, but also, to the best of us, may arrive bad quarters of an hour when temptation has come either suddenly, or risen with the slow strength of a tide. Now the wind of the Spirit, which bloweth where it listeth, has moved us with a sense of gladness and strength. Then comes a mood of wearisome vacuity, when the Divine air has passed, and the sails of the soul hang flat and still. These changes come at no determined times, at no fixed hours. We cannot (as with day and night) tell when they will arrive. They are not foretold in our calendar, and move in no calculated orbit: at least, in none that we can measure and tabulate now. What, then, can be said about the matter? Shall we doggedly take them as they come, without any special effort to understand and use what they bring? I think not. There must be Christian ways of meeting and employing these moods and seasons. They may sometimes be shortened or prolonged; their influence may be encouraged or subdued; their very uncertainty may teach us much.

First, remember that they are natural. This is so, whether they seem to concern form or spirit, matter or mind. There is nothing necessarily "wrong" in change. A passing failure of interest in even religious matters, an access or period of indifference to worship, need not unduly alarm or distress us. Spiritual appetite is symbolised by that of the body. It is not continuous. It comes and goes. As when we are in fair health we are not, and do not want to be, always feeling hungry, so we must not think that we are spiritually disordered if sometimes we feel no taste for prayer, nor tendency towards devout meditation. We may be as truly filled with the life of the Lord, "nourished with all goodness," between devotional meals as when we are partaking of them. The husbandman is near God while he is honestly reaping the corn in the field as well as when he joins in a harvest thanksgiving within the walls of the church. Again, these attitudes of attention may come at comparatively short distances from one another, and last but a little while, or they may arrive at separated and lengthened periods of life. We must not wonder if an interest fades, nor think that the heart is colder if it is not always warmed in the same way or to the same degree. The calm of maturity is just as divine or right as the enthusiasm of youth. It is not, moreover, in the amount of interest we feel in a thing, but in our original estimate of the thing itself, that changes come. As bodily tastes differ, so do religious. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind, but do not let me call another cold, or careless, or extravagant because he does not care for what I value.

There is probably as great a variety in God's spiritual as in His natural kingdom. The earth gives food and fruit of many flavours, the wind blows from each quarter of the compass in turn, and in the same twenty-four hours we have light and darkness, heat and cold. So in the mental condition of men. We must not think that we are to be blamed when we experience varied religious moods. These considerations may help us to apprehend that God is ever near us. So the Psalmist felt when he said, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out and known me; Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising: Thou understandest my thoughts long before. . . . There is not a word in my tongue but Thou, O Lord, knowest it altogether. . . . Whither shall I go then from Thy Spirit, or whither shall I go then from Thy presence? . . . If I take the wings of the morning and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there also . . . Thy right hand shall hold me; . . . yea, the darkness is no darkness with Thee. The darkness and light to Thee are both alike."

God is always at hand. But our perception of this varies from time to time; and there is a right and a wrong use of these moods. They may lead to good or harm. They must not be left to the working of what we call "chance." Think then, first, of what we should do, of what is best, when trouble or doubt comes. Never say that the true Christian is always free from doubts which chill his inmost soul. Are we to learn nothing from the cry of Jesus, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Be sure there is a large meaning in the saying that "He was tempted in all points like as we are." Look at moods of unbelief. A breath of cynical scepticism, unlike honest inquiry, is passing over society, and it distresses many a soul which not merely sees, but is touched by it. What shall he do? It may be that when a man feels the cold air of incredulity he can do nothing, except remember that it is not always so. We do not give up our belief in the summer because we are sometimes congested by a north-east wind. The faculty of faith may be numbed for a while, and we can no more feel with our hearts than we can with our fingers. Then, maybe, we can only wait. Some have not force enough left to pray. But many who have only "waited" have found the power of trust come back. We must not be wholly dismayed at the access of spiritual inability. An Apostle once, in telling others what he and his friends had survived, admitted that they had been "cast down." The sun rises at last upon the infant "crying in the night, and with no language but a cry." There may be, moreover, seasons of incredulity which arise from sheer inexperience or ignorance. The uninstructed man who sees the ocean for the first time fancies that the rise of the tide is a coming deluge, and its fall a departure of the sea. The young Christian shudders at a faith-rending book. He thinks he has met a lion in the way. Well, some people have been killed by lions and tigers. But, in fact, men mostly kill them. They do not have dominion over the earth. Man is master, and supreme. Perhaps the beast which scares the neophyte is a mean one, after all: some wretched old heresy or 'ism at which the older Christian does not care to shoot; or, perhaps, like some books which have disturbed nervous souls, it is only stuffed—beautifully, scientifically stuffed—and is no living beast at all, but an interesting result of skill in literary fiction. The moods of disbelief, in some, arise from inexperience, or ignorance of the fact that myriads have survived them, or learnt that they are merely fictitious, or only temporary and partially recurrent. I admit that there appear to be persons who have an almost congenital inability to believe. They grow up into ripe and finished unbelievers. As some are colour-blind, and others cannot discern the difference between bitter and sweet, and may yet be as strong as athletes and enjoy perfect health, so there may be intellectual giants to whom whole phases of perception are denied. The Christian need not be staggered at these spectacles. He must not be hopeless because neither he, nor perhaps his friend, is always able to dispose of their ingenious demands and neutralise their influence satisfactorily. The riddle is not unanswerable, though we may not readily perceive its solution. Nor must he be cast down at his own moods of irresolution. Wait a while. The cloud will pass from over his sun. It is not extinguished because he cannot see it shine.

In saying a word about our carriage in bad moods: the most pressing, perhaps, are those in which our faith is not confused, but we are tempted to do what we know to be wrong. Who has been freed from this? Then, indeed, it may not be best to wait; we must indeed "pray." There need even be no words. But we must strengthen our knowledge of the evil; we appeal to the power in using which we have been kept from falling into it before, by raising our thoughts in prayer. "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." It puts us afresh into union with the Almighty. It tightens our hold on the hand of God. In hours of conscious temptation, pray; and then bravely face and do the act which has to be done.

A few words now about the "right" use of good moods. There is a time for everything. And many right courses or results are missed because men do not use, or are not prepared to use, the propitious moment when it comes. Of course it is not always easy to do this. We cannot always make the cutting of the hay in the field coincide with the shining of the sun in the sky; or we do not see the opening which presents itself. We often think of the right word or reply when the opportunity for saying or making it has passed. But favourable seasons are sometimes lost for want of sheer common observation, or by reason of inexcusable indolence. And this comes to pass even in the case of those who pride themselves on their activity or intelligence. Men sometimes put themselves to needless trouble by bestirring themselves too soon or too late. One will carry his boat to the water when it would be lifted in an hour by the tide. Another will (as we say) flog a dead horse, or strain his religious energies to reproduce some form of devotion or ecclesiastical discipline which has had its day—its useful day. He will vex himself over its interesting relics, which are no more to be quickened than a strong and beautiful shell which the living animal has left, and into which it is impossible to entice another. Thus time and strength are often thrown away in both the natural and spiritual world of action. Without admitting that God ever deserts His children, we miss those opportunities hinted at by the prophet who cries, "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found; call ye upon Him while He is near." We have accesses of influence and perception which we should be ready to use. We cannot force these moods, and yet it is worse than foolish to discard or neglect them.

The question, of course, comes—how shall we save the hay that is made in periods of Divine sunshine? How shall we store the fruit gathered in a warm propitious hour? How make the best of a healthy and gladsome mood? First, thus: If a satisfactory conviction arrives; if a promising resolve presents itself vividly to the mind, remember the old saying that "habit is the act of yesterday," and that "it is the first step which costs." Fix the new-born desire by translating it into immediate deed. Strike while the spiritual iron is hot; while the consciousness of a true reply to some difficulty is warm within. "Thou hast answered right," said Christ. "This do, and thou shalt live."

It is surprising how soon a new action may be set up in a man's life. People do not believe enough in the powers which God has given them. There is no more radically untrue mood than that which leads a man to say of such and such a proposal: "It is very true, fine, and beautiful, but it is no use trying." Why limit the power of trial? You never know till you try. A custom in which we may fancy that we have become confirmed, and from which we think it is hopeless to effect a departure, may be given up with surprising success if we have faith really to make the attempt. A large proportion of difficulties and some impossibilities are imaginary.

Take a commonplace example. Even that irritating fly in the perfume of culture seen in bad handwriting could be removed with a little carefulness in handling the pen. A few weeks of steady pains to the writer would bring lifelong relief to his or her friends. It is so with most vexatious commonplace habits. And it is true with those of a far more serious kind, even such as are not merely tiresome, but deadly. Moreover, with both, times arrive when they can be most, or more easily, shed off. If, therefore, a good mood comes, don't stop to enjoy it, but put it into form. Give it action. Recollect that it is sent by God to be used.

Much more, on the lines which I have followed, may be said about the alternation of moods, and the way in which they can be corrected and used. I will, however, add only a few words about what we understand by those called "good" and "bad." By a good mood I do not mean a dispersive generous humour, but an undefined sense of gladness and resource which makes the world look bright or tolerable: a mood in which work feels easier than it did, and our future is more promising than it was. No doubt the commonest cause of this, at some times of life, comes from good health, and we may be tempted, perhaps, to discount the value of a light heart in the healthy by saying that it is a matter of mere physical temperament and bodily sensation, and hardly to be reckoned among sacred enjoyments. But surely good health is a Divine gift, well called a blessing. Those who have it might see in its possession a sign of our Father's life; and the feeling of strength and cheerfulness which it brings may be called "good" in the best sense, inasmuch as it comes from God. But when we talk of using good moods, think how grievously this Divine gift of health may be spoiled and squandered by material indulgence. Think how the soul may be wounded through the body. The spirit ever suffers from the flesh. A sense of self-rebuke adds heavily to material distress. There was a profound diagnosis in Christ's treatment of that sick man to whom He said: "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee." Let those in health accept some moods which it brings as divinely good, and remember that it can be sorely injured by a disregard of conscience, as well as by what men call a neglect of sanitary precautions.

Take another good mood, apart from the sense of physical health. A man is pleased at having done well. Some sourly pious critics might deprecate this, saying, "You have not yourself to thank. It is God who enables you to do right." Yes, indeed; and herein is the best cause for exultation. "O be joyful" (says the Psalm so often sung), "be joyful in the Lord. . . . It is He that hath made us, and not we ourselves." There is no greater source of joy than the sense of having done right. It is most gladsome to feel that the great Doer of righteousness has been with us, making a mood which is truly good. Another comes when we receive a kindness which does not humiliate by its ostentatious patronage, nor shame by its transparent flattery. Especially does a kind appreciative word from someone whom we trust bring on a gladsome mood. It is an echo or foretaste of that Divine love which is felt by an honest conscience. All these good moods, from sweet health, from the sense of being right, from just and kindly commendation, are valuable, not merely in themselves, but because they are assurances of the life and love which remain and work in the world. They are also foretastes of fuller union with the Lord. They are holes in the curtain of the world through which we get glimpses of a brighter light beyond; and though they may pass, their memory is invaluable. We may move on into a dull humour, like a ship which, after sailing on a sun-bright sea, enters a bank of fog; still we are cheered by the recollection that all life is not clouded. Sometimes, indeed, the fog is very thick. I have already spoken about the pressure of temptation to evil, when our strength lies in prayer. Nevertheless, there are bad, heavy moods, when we are not urged to do wrong, but when the sense of uneasiness seems to be unaccountably accumulated, or sorrows are so plainly burdensome and sore, that a man thinks he sees no way of escape nor prospect of recovery. And they surely are echoes of that Divine dismay when Christ Himself cried aloud that He was forsaken. This communion in suffering might help us. If we ever have moods of profound distress, we may not at the time be able to think of our Lord's compassion. But now let us remember that He presently could, and did, commit His Spirit into His Father's hands, and that our life is hid with Him in God.

CHAPTER V.

THE Greys were the rich people of Downton; they belonged to the county, and only a few of the humble inhabitants who lived in the straggling little village had the honour of their acquaintance. Mrs. Karron, however, had been the wife of a distinguished naval officer, and Jocelyn and Hope both possessed a certain air, and had a certain gracious prettiness about them, which made people like to ask them to their houses. Not only were they intimate with the doctor's wife and the lawyer's daughters, but they also knew the Greys and the Percivals, and even the Mainwarings, who lived ten miles away. Cecil Grey had been in and out of the house since he was quite a lad, and the girls were in the habit of regarding him as a convenient something between a cousin and a brother. They laughed at him a good deal; they chaffed him unmercifully; but they were fond of him, and undoubtedly they made considerable use of him. There never was a more affectionate, obliging, good-tempered fellow; and even Mrs. Karron sometimes expostulated with Jocelyn and Hope for the amount of messages they gave him to do for them. His visits to town were often solely taken to match Jocelyn's silks and wools, or to get a very particular flower on which she had set her dainty mind, to accompany a certain costume to be worn at an evening festivity.

Girls of nineteen brought up like Jocelyn and Hope are very often thoughtless, and it never occurred to them to spare their obliging cavalier.

Cecil was one of the frankest, after a certain sense the most innocent, of mortals, and although he did feel a glow round his heart when he walked with Jocelyn, or looked at her, or listened to her words, and although even the delight of sport could not exceed in interest the absorption with which he obeyed her smallest behests, his eyes had never been opened to the true state of his own feelings until the evening of Mrs. Karron's sudden illness. When Hope flew up-stairs that evening, and Dr. Marvel, with what tact he could compass, broke the news to Jocelyn, she gave one full, frightened, piteous look straight up into Cecil's eyes, put out her hands and let him clasp them; and with that look, and that hand-pressure, the young man knew his own secret.

"'Mother, you understand, don't you?'"—p. 606.

He went home, feeling torn, aroused, pained, and yet full of ecstasy. Life was quite golden. Oh yes, even though there was gloom and misery at Oakdene; for he loved, and his love should be his.

On the day of the funeral, Sir Jasper Grey, Cecil's father, came suddenly into his wife's boudoir.

"My dear," he said, not noticing Cecil, who was lounging by the window, "I have just heard of such a catastrophe; it is in connection with those poor Karrons. Marvel told me—he said it is the talk of the village, and no secret from anyone—the girls are left absolutely penniless, my dear; and their mother—one does not care to blame her, as she is dead, poor soul!—but she was little short of a spendthrift. She speculated, and lived on her capital—fact, I assure you."

"And with two girls to provide for!" exclaimed Lady Grey. "I blame her, even though she is in her grave. Poor girls—nice-looking, both of them; particularly Jocelyn. But there is nothing before them now but governess-ships, or secretaryships, unless indeed, they would take lessons in cookery, and then teach what they know to inexperienced domestic servants."

"Not a bad idea at all, my dear," said Sir Jasper, who adored his wife. "This remark of yours seems to open up a new career for young women of the upper classes. But it is early days to speak of these things. The girls are terribly to be pitied; and the doctor tells me that their poor father left them fairly well off—that is, he left sufficient capital to secure to them a modest income."

"That wretched woman! I wonder she can rest in her grave," said Lady Grey.

"Well, my dear, she has gone to a higher tribunal to answer for her shortcomings. The girls are the people to think of now. I hear, poor Jocelyn is very ill; she is confined to her bed with a sort of feverish attack."

"Jocelyn?" said Cecil.

He had been standing perfectly motionless, drinking in his father's news. Now he came forward out of the gloom, and stood in the bright ring of light caused by the fire.

"I forgot you were there, Cecil," half yawned his mother. "You might ring for Hawkins, my dear. A cup of tea would be refreshing."

"In a minute," said Cecil.

He clenched his hands hard, and stood facing the fire; his boyish face was red all over. "You were talking about the Karrons—you have brought bad news of them, father; at least, at least, bad news for poor Hope—it doesn't matter so much about Jocelyn."

Cecil was delivering his sentences in so jerky a manner that Sir Jasper interrupted him with a laugh.

"Your mother and I are particularly struck with the clearness of your speech," he said. "Your remarks are most lucid. Is Jocelyn so ethereal that she can do without the necessities of life?—My dear, if Cecil won't ring the bell, I will. His ideas are so obscure just now as to be scarcely interesting."

"Hold, father.—Mother, you understand, don't you? Jocelyn will come here—she will be my wife—that is, I mean to ask her."

As Cecil spoke he dropped on one knee beside his mother, and taking one of her slender hands half crushed it between his own.

"You'll welcome Jocelyn as my wife, won't you, mother?"

"Very heroic," said Sir Jasper. "Really, quite a slice out of the old romances—the penniless damsel rescued by the young knight. Look here, Cecil; your mother and I are not going to listen to any such folly—you were only of age last summer—time enough if you bring us a wife in five years from now. The sooner you go back to Oxford the better, and put such folly out of your head."

Sir Jasper did not speak angrily. He regarded the whole matter as a huge jest. Cecil was nothing but a boy in his eyes; it was Quixotic of the lad to stand up for a pretty, penniless girl—and—that was all.

"You'll go back to Oxford in a week, my boy, and there'll be an end of this folly," he said, patting the young man good-humouredly on the shoulder.

Cecil sprang to his feet as if he were stung. His mother had not articulated a word; not by the faintest movement did she return his hand-pressure, not once had her eyes met his. His mother's conduct hurt Cecil more than his father's. He went out of the room, feeling miserable enough to satisfy the most exacting lover. He had appealed to his parents, asking them for bread, when the hardest stone of satire and indifference had been vouchsafed to him.

"He's nothing but a boy," said Sir Jasper to his wife, when he could find words to speak after Cecil had gone away. "We'll take no notice of him, my dear; and the silly affair will die of itself."

"She's a dangerous girl," said Lady Grey, "and the sooner she leaves the place the better. After all, we may perhaps regard it as a providence that she and her sister can no longer live at Oakdene."

"We must not allow ourselves to look at matters in that light, my love," said Sir Jasper, as he stirred his tea. "Poor Jocelyn! After all, she is a pretty creature. Young men will be young men; you must allow that, Susannah."

"Precisely, my dear. And mortgages will be mortgages, and money will remain just a little too short for our requirements; and Agnes Deane, who is the greatest heiress in the county, comes here in the spring—and—and—— But leave it to me, Jasper. I'll have a talk with Cecil this evening in my room."

When that talk took place, no one could be more eloquent than Lady Grey, and no dutiful son could have listened more attentively than Cecil. At the end of a conversation which lasted for over two hours, he made the following remark:—

"I don't want to do anything to hurt you or my father, and nothing would induce me to bring a wife here whom you could not respect, but Jocelyn is a lady. My thinking her beautiful and the best of all girls is perhaps nothing; but I suppose anyone, even you, mother, will admit that Jocelyn looks nice, that she makes a room all the brighter when she is in it, and—and—that she's the sort of girl no one need be ashamed of. She's just as well born as I am, and there is nothing in the world against her except that she hasn't got money. I have loved her for years. There is no one in all the world like her to me; and now, when she is in trouble and penniless, is just the time for me to come forward. I'm going to come forward, mother—I'm going to propose for Jocelyn. My father speaks of me as a lad; but I'm of age, and my own master, and if you won't receive Jocelyn here, why, I've got that little place in Devon that aunt Lucilla left me, and we can live there and be jolly enough until you and my father forgive us. I don't mean to be disrespectful, mother, and I love you as well as ever; but I won't give up my own girl for anyone, not even for my mother."

Cecil stooped down and kissed Lady Grey on her forehead as he spoke, and then he went out of the room without waiting for any last words from her. She had to acknowledge to herself, as she saw him go, with a queer mixture of pain, and pride, and love, and anger tugging at her heart, that he was not such a boy after all, and that Jocelyn was very much to be envied, and she, poor forsaken Lady Grey, very much to be pitied.

"It's Lucilla's doing," she said to her husband after she had related all that had passed between herself and Cecil. "She left the boy that wretched eight hundred a year; and he threatens to go and live at Leaside, away from us all, with a penniless girl."

"We can't permit that, whatever happens," said Sir Jasper.

CHAPTER VI.

"You understand all about it now, Hope?" said Cecil. "And you will speak to Jocelyn, and let me know. Perhaps if I could put off going away just for a day she could see me. Do you think so, Hope? Do you think there is any chance? It's awful not to have seen her for nearly a fortnight; it has half killed me—it has, really."

"I'll speak to Jocelyn," said Hope. "I don't think she'll be prepared—I don't, really, Cecil; for you have always been a sort of brother to us both, you know."

"Well, I'll be your brother still, and something nearer to Jocelyn. She couldn't make that objection now, could she, Hope?"

"No; I'll certainly speak to her. Only, Cecil, Jocelyn and I have never thought about lovers—never once."

"But you've got to begin. There has got to be a beginning to everything. You'll have lots of lovers yourself, Hope, presently. Oh! you needn't colour up. You don't know what a jolly sort of girl you are. Of course, heaps of fellows will be wanting you, and you'll have only to pick and choose. But now about Jocelyn. You'll speak to her—you'll give her my message—you'll make the most of me you can: and I'll come down this evening to get my answer. It can only be the best kind of answer, can it, Hope?"

"I don't know," said Hope. "It seems to me that I don't understand. I'm very sorry for you, but I don't sympathise. I suppose it's because Jocelyn and I have never thought of lovers."

"You'll do your best for me at least," said Cecil.

Yes, Hope could promise that; and then it was arranged that he should call again that evening at nine, and if nothing had been accomplished—for Hope must find a fitting opportunity, and that might require longer time than between now and the evening—he would postpone his departure until noon of the following day.

Cecil went away, and Hope, pushing back her hair in a perplexed manner, went into Jocelyn's room.

It was true she did not understand, but it was also true that her heart was full of an undefined ache and pity for Cecil. His face had grown quite haggard in the last fortnight: there was no doubt at all of his earnestness, no doubt of the sincerity and depth of the feelings which caused him to speak.

Jocelyn was lying in a luxurious attitude on her sofa by the fire; her cheeks were slightly flushed, her red lips a very little parted. Her beautiful eyes had a contented smile and light in them. Hope was conscious of a feeling almost of repulsion as she glanced at Jocelyn's smiling beautiful face.

"She had no right almost to die of grief for mother, and now to look like that, particularly when Cecil is breaking his heart for her," was her reflection.

She came forward and stood moodily by the fire; Jocelyn looked up with a laugh.

"My Knight of the Doleful Countenance!" she said. Then a little petulance came into her voice. "Really, Hope, when I am doing my best to get better, and to cheer up after the terrible way I suffered, I think you might aid me instead of looking like Patience on a monument, and all the other dismal horrid things. Before you went out you tried to frighten me into my grave with visions of a bread-and-water diet. Then you stayed away for quite two hours, and now behold Minerva at least."

"Oh, don't liken me to anyone else," said Hope, suddenly laughing. "I am Don Quixote, Minerva, and Patience all in one breath. Listen, Jocelyn; I have got something really very interesting to say at last. It was quite true about the poverty; but you need not share it, darling. No, thank God, you can still have the pretty dresses and the nice things you ought to have; that you are suited for."

"I knew you were frightening me for nothing that time," interrupted Jocelyn. "The moment you mentioned Mr. Frost's name, I was sure of it. He's an ogre, and, in my humble opinion, keeps our fortune for himself."

"Oh! will you listen?" cried Hope, clasping her hands in despair. "It is not that at all; we are poor. It is—it is——"

"We are poor?" said Jocelyn. "Your manners are quite enough to turn anyone's head to-day, Hope. Do let's drop the theme. I am to have pretty dresses still; that is one comfort. Do you know, Hope, I have been thinking—I'm afraid it's a little rude to say it, but still I fear deep mourning won't be as becoming to you as to me. I have been rather fretting about that, for I want you to look very nice when we go our round of visits presently. But when I was writing to Mme. de Pompadour I told her to put as many frills and soft trimmings as she could possibly devise on both our dresses; so I trust the effect won't be so bad, as far as you are concerned, Hope Of course I shall be all right, with my fair complexion."

"I think it's only right and honest to tell you," said Hope, in a blunt voice, "that when I went out that time it was to despatch a telegram to Mme. de Pompadour, telling her not to execute your order. There, will that make you believe in our poverty?"

Jocelyn sat upright on her sofa. An angry spot glowed in one of her cheeks. Her eyes, sparkling and eloquent with reproaches, were fixed full on her sister.

"Is this your affection for mother?" she said at last. "Are we to wear no mourning for her?"

"Yes, the best we can make ourselves, with Jane's assistance."

"Hope, you haven't a bit of heart."

Down went Jocelyn's head on her pillows, and violent sobs shook her slight frame.

These tears filled Hope with compunction. She knelt down by the sofa, and putting her arm round Jocelyn's waist, kissed the back of her neck once or twice.

"Stop crying, Jo," she said. "I have not told you my news—the news which, after all, secures to you the pretty dresses."

Jocelyn half checked her tears, and Hope quietly, but not inefficiently, pleaded Cecil's suit.

This was Jocelyn's first proposal. In her way she was as innocent as Hope. Her tears ceased altogether. Her smiles came slowly back.

"Ridiculous!" she said. And then she broke into a laugh. "Cecil—Cecil Grey! But I'm not going to marry for years and years. I've never even thought of marrying, nor of lovers. Poor Cecil! he must have looked very funny. Did he, Hope? I wish he had asked me for you—I'd have loved so to watch his face."

"It's all over, then, for him," said Hope, rising. "I wasn't sure, for you and he were always great friends. But of course, if you can talk like that——"

"'Say "Yes," Jocelyn.'"—p. 611.

"What other way could I possibly talk? Do tell me how he looked, Hope."

"Very earnest, and manly, and handsome. He's in love with you, Jocelyn, and you ought to be awfully sorry for him."

"I'm not—it's too funny. He looked manly? Nonsense, he's nothing but a boy."

"He didn't look like a boy when he talked about you. Well, I'm sorry for him. You are quite positively certain, Jo, that you don't care the least little bit in the world for him?"

"Care for him? Of course not. He's a great deal too young; he's not the style of man I'd have for a husband, and I'm not going to tie myself to anybody for years, and years, and years."

Hope seated herself on the hearthrug.

"I'm glad, for my part," she said. "We'll be very happy together. We won't mind being poor—not a bit, after we've got over the first rub."

"Oh! being poor. How you do harp on that string. I suppose Cecil is well off."

"I suppose so. He said you and he could begin on eight hundred a year."

Jocelyn pressed her hand to her chin in meditation.

"I don't know what eight hundred a year means," she said. "But it sounds a good lot of money. Then, by-and-bye, I'd be Lady Grey, and we'd live at Grey's Park. I—— Hope!"

"What?" said Hope.

"Did he really look very manly when he spoke about me?"

"Yes" (a fierce light came into Hope's eyes), "a thousand times too manly to be married for his money or position."

"Oh, of course," said Jocelyn, shrinking back. "Whoever thought of such a thing?"

CHAPTER VII.

Cecil took his dismissal quietly enough. He turned very white, but he did not say much, nor did he ask Hope to plead his cause any further.

"Thank you," he said, as he rose to go away. "You did your best for me, and I'll never forget this to you—never. I might have known I wasn't half good enough for her—I always feared it, but I'd just a sort of half idea that she might put up with me—I mean, that she would have allowed me to be a sort of comfort to her. However, it's all at an end now. God bless you, Hope; good-bye—God bless you."

"I'm ever so sorry for you, Cecil," said Hope; "even though I don't comprehend your feeling."

"It's awfully good of you—your turn will come some day—sure to. It won't be the worse for you then that you were good to me now. Well, it's at an end, and I'm off to Oxford to-morrow. I might have known she wouldn't look at me. She's miles, miles above me!"

"Oh, don't, Cecil!" said Hope, relieving her strained feelings by a sudden laugh. "It does sound so ridiculous—poor little Jo!"

Cecil's face flushed hotly.

"You don't know what I feel," he said. "And even you don't know her, not as she looks to me. There's only one fellow in the world worthy of her, and I hope to goodness he'll never come across her."

"That's rather selfish of you, Cecil. What's the name of this wonder?"

"Oh, you needn't laugh; his name is Markham. He's a chum of mine at Oxford—he's awfully clever. He's ugly, too, but he can twist anyone, man, woman, or child, round his little finger. If he asks Jocelyn to marry him she won't say 'No.'"

"From your description, he must be unpleasant. We will trust that he won't spread his toils round Jocelyn. Good-bye, Cecil. I am deeply sorry for you."

"So am I for myself. Good-bye, Hope; you're a brick of a girl; he'll be a lucky fellow who has you for a sister. I only wish the luck were mine!"

Then Cecil went away, and Hope considered that episode in their lives quite at an end.

In a day or two Jocelyn came down-stairs again. She was quite well, and no longer particularly sorrowful. Neither could she any longer shut her eyes to the fact of their poverty, and once or twice she was inclined to be sulky over the home-made mourning.

With all her faults—and she had plenty—Jocelyn, however, was a very good-tempered, sunny sort of girl; and as all this time the shoe of poverty was only preparing to pinch, and had not yet given any very hard twinges, she and Hope lived happily enough at Oakdene, during their few remaining days there.

At last came the morning when Mr. Frost wrote to Hope, telling her that all debts were now paid, and that she and Jocelyn might walk forth free maidens into a cold world, with fifty pounds a year to sustain them. On the same day Jocelyn had a letter from Mrs. Seaton. It was long, and, to judge from her manner, was of absorbing interest to the young lady. So excited was she that she failed to notice Hope's disapproving tones. This was the first letter received from Mrs. Seaton since the day when Mrs. Karron had died, but this fact was also overlooked by Jocelyn.

"Lend me five pounds," she said to Hope. "I must go up to London to see Aunt Margaret. There is her letter; when you have read it you will understand."

Hope pushed the bulky envelope away.

"You forget, Jocelyn," she said, in a voice which she in vain tried to render unemotional. "I told you once what I thought of Aunt Margaret. I will not read her letter. I will not talk of her nor to her. It is a disrespect to our mother, Jocelyn."

Jocelyn coloured.

"You don't understand," she said. "You are a very prejudiced person, Hope. If you don't take care, you will grow hard. I see hardness getting into your face every day. Aunt Margaret was not to blame. You made an impossible request to her. If you read the letter, you will see."

"I will not read the letter. My request may have been impossible, but it was refused in such a way that it killed mother. She might have come down—she might have written tender words—she was mother's only sister. She knew her life was in extreme danger, and she wrote such a letter that she died. I saw her die, and of the letter. Aunt Margaret is nothing to me now. I'll neither read what she writes, nor accept assistance from her. And, Jocelyn, I will say it: if you are worthy of being mother's daughter, yes, and of being our father's daughter, who was a most honourable man, you will put that letter into the fire and give it no further thought. You owe it to our parents to accept nothing from Aunt Margaret Seaton."

Here Hope's voice changed. Her pliable, expressive face grew full of a great tenderness.

"Dear little Jo, poverty need not be hard if we stick together, and are of one mind," she said. "Let me burn the letter for the sake of all the happy old times, and because we both love our mother."

But Jocelyn was angry now. Hope came close to her. She pushed her away.

"You are all for heroics, Hope," she said. "I dare say they look very well in a book, but they aren't at all interesting in real life. Now I may as well tell you plainly that I am sick of this everlasting talk about poverty. I hate horrid dowdy home-made dresses. I hate pinching and contriving. I really don't know anything about the spending of money, but the income Mr. Frost is going to allow us every year would, I fancy, be spent by me in a single day. I see nothing for it, Hope, but that you must go your way, and I'll go mine. I have quite made up my mind. I have been making it up for the last week, since I saw you getting so horribly screwy. Aunt Margaret has written very kindly. She has given an explanation about what you choose to consider her unkind conduct to mother. She offers us both a home with herself, and for my part I am going to see her, and talk matters over with her, and that's what I want the five pounds for. I'm frank enough, Hope. You know everything now."

"I have a great mind to refuse to give you the five pounds," said Hope. "I think you ought to be protected against yourself. This conduct is not honourable."

"You refuse!" said Jocelyn, her eyes flashing angrily.

"Oh, Jocelyn, how changed you are! Yes, I have a great mind to refuse."

"Then I tell you what I'll do—what I've been making up my mind for the last week to do, until Aunt Margaret's letter saved me. I'll write to Cecil and bring him back; I'll marry him for his money."

"Oh, Jocelyn!" Hope gave a sharp cry. "Even Aunt Margaret is better than that," she said. She opened her purse, took out her solitary five-pound note, laid it on the table, and went out of the room.

CHAPTER VIII.

THERE were no more luxurious flats in LONDON than those to be found in Albemarle Mansions. They were well situated. They were in the centre of Mayfair, close to everybody and everything. In themselves the flats were large and commodious; the reception-rooms were spacious, and there were plenty of them. In every way the flats were suited to the requirements of fashionable people, and in one of them Mrs. Seaton and her daughter Lottie lived a luxurious life.

Mrs. Seaton was about five-and-forty—a handsome woman, young-looking for her age, with a slightly full figure, and a slightly arrogant bearing. She was a widow and enormously rich. Her husband had been the well-known city merchant of the name. When talking about her, people had added to her wealth, making it fabulous; but although it was not that, she had a great deal more money than she knew how to spend, and Hope's mother had been right when she said that Margaret Seaton would not miss two thousand pounds. In one sense that was true, in another it was not. Mrs. Seaton was fond of balancing her banker's book, and of lying awake at night counting over her stocks and shares, and the various items which made up her great wealth. Two thousand pounds on the wrong side of the ledger would not have pleased her, and she decided to deny her dying sister's request. In this particular she showed great hardness, but she was not generally considered a hard woman, and in many ways could be kindness and generosity itself.

She had one child, a girl of eighteen, a fragile, white-faced creature, not the least like herself, for she was full of vitality and energy. Mrs. Seaton considered Charlotte a beauty, and perhaps the glamour of her wealth might have made some people agree with her. But to unprejudiced eyes she was simply a very fragile, uninteresting little mortal.

"How bitterly cold it is, mother," she said, on this particular January day. "How detestable England is at this time of year; why do we stay here?—why don't we go back to the Riviera at once?"

"Well, you know, darling, I have been rather upset. Your poor Aunt Amy's sudden death; then our mourning, and then my resolve—suggested by you, if you remember, Lottie—that we should invite the girls to come here, offering them a home as companions to you, darling."

Lottie's fretful blue eyes brightened.

"Yes, yes, of course," she said eagerly. "But not only as companions. That sounds like the kind of person that writes your letters for you and reads aloud; that kind of person can be paid for. I want sisters, equals—girls who will put a little variety into my life, and be just the same to you that I am. Oh, I hope they'll come—I do earnestly hope they'll come."

Mrs. Seaton gazed full into her young daughter's face. A shadow quickly passed across her brow.

"You have been in the world ever since you were born, Charlotte," she said, "and yet you are the most absolutely unworldly person I ever came across. You talk of the possibility of your cousins refusing my offer. Do you think it likely that penniless girls will do that?"

"Are they penniless? How delightful! What fun it will be getting them all they can possibly want. Oh, mother, are you sure they will come?"

"Yes, I am sure."

"When did you write, mother?"

"Yesterday. Lottie, it does me good to see you roused and interested like this. When the girls come we will go to Cannes for a month or so, and travel about until it is time to come back here for the season. We might spend Easter at Rome."

"We might. It was rather dull there last year. What are my cousins' names, mother? It seems so funny we should never have met all these years."

Mrs. Seaton's face flushed.

"I will tell you the reason another time," she said. "Their names—I have no doubt you will admire their names, Lottie; for my part, I dislike fanciful titles. The girls are called Jocelyn and Hope. They are twins, and their mother, poor thing, used to write and tell me they were very pretty."

"What sweet names—Jocelyn and Hope—particularly Hope. Mother, I feel more excited about these girls coming than I have ever felt about anything in the whole course of my life. It is so uninteresting—so terribly uninteresting to be alone."

"And yet you have me, child. I am always alone in all the world but for you."

"Dear mother!"

Lottie went up, raised her lips lightly to the elder woman's face, bestowed a caress without much warmth in it, and sank down once more in a luxurious little chair opposite a glowing fire.

At this moment the room door was noiselessly opened, and a powdered footman brought in a telegram on a salver.

Lottie sprang to her feet, rubbing her hands excitedly.

"Is it from the girls?" she exclaimed.

"Yes, child, yes.—There is no answer, Williams."

The footman withdrew.

Mrs. Seaton tossed the pink sheet of paper into her daughter's lap.

"You will make me jealous of those girls," she said, with the finest shade of bitterness in her voice. "But your wish is likely to be granted, Lottie. They are coming fast enough."

The telegram on which Lottie's eyes feasted was brief:—

"Downton.

"Please expect me at three o'clock, to answer your letter in person. "Jocelyn Karron."

"It is half-past twelve now," said Lottie, looking at the clock. "What a long time we shall have to wait! Shall we go to meet Jocelyn at Paddington, mother? We can look up her train in Bradshaw."

"I should prefer to receive her here, Lottie. I will send Blake to Paddington in the brougham. I suppose this girl must remain for the night. She certainly is eager to come."

"I think that is so nice of her. I wonder if she is like me—very petite, and fair; I don't like being petite and fair. I wonder if she has got my tastes; I hate my own tastes. Heigh-ho, how weary life is! Mother, don't you think it's awfully uninteresting to be rich?"

"My dear Lottie, do you know that you are getting quite eccentric?"

"Am I? I suppose it's because I find everything so dull. It seems to me that riches hem one in and stifle one. Riches are just another name for all sorts of odious proprieties. Now, I should so like to take an omnibus to Paddington this afternoon, and stand on the platform and look for Jocelyn, and then bring her home in a hansom. That's what I should like, instead of doing propriety in this dull, dull room."

"Lottie dear, you are really talking such wild nonsense that I shall have to send for Sir James Porter to see you. You cannot possibly be well."

"I am ill in mind, mother, that is all. How I wish my father had not made his huge fortune. He must have been much jollier when he blacked shoes at a penny the pair."

Mrs. Seaton coloured all over her handsome face with intense annoyance.

"How dare you?" she began.

Then she paused. "If you weren't my child ——" she continued—then again she stopped. The colour faded from her cheeks and lips, leaving them chalky white.

Lottie surveyed her from the depths of her snug chair with a lazy, provoking smile.

"Poor papa!" she said; "he often talked to me about those days. Oh, what funny stories he had to tell! Do you remember the one about the slice of saveloy for supper? And that other story when he slept under an archway and found a threepenny-bit?"

But the drawing-room door was shut almost noisily; Mrs. Seaton had left her daughter to her recollections.

At about half-past three Jocelyn arrived. Her face was somewhat pale, her big eyes had a wide-open, appealing glance in them. She came up to Mrs. Seaton holding out both hands, her delicate colour coming and going.

"You have a look of my mother," she said, and there was really a pathetic note in her voice.

"Only a very slight look, my dear," responded the good lady, touched and pleased in spite of herself by Jocelyn. "Your mother was much prettier than I ever was. I am glad you have come, Jocelyn. Let me introduce you to Charlotte.—Lottie, this is your Cousin Jocelyn."

Jocelyn was certainly neither petite nor fair, after Lottie's somewhat colourless pattern. Her hair was golden, it is true, but the gold was very bright; her complexion was creamy and rich; her blue eyes were shaded by curly black lashes, her brows were delicate and dark, and her figure, slightly full for her age, looked generous in its proportions beside her shadowy sprite-like little cousin. Nature had endowed Jocelyn with a most affectionate and taking manner. She clasped Lottie's hand now, gave it a squeeze, then turned again to her aunt.

"You wrote me such a kind letter, Aunt Margaret."

"Well, my dear, well—I meant to be kind to you and Hope. I am glad you came here to-day to discuss my proposal. There is no time like the present. Take off your hat, Jocelyn."

"And sit in my easy-chair, please, Jocelyn," eagerly interrupted Lottie. "It is very comfortable—I'll put this glass screen between you and the fire. Are your feet cold? Let me take your furs. What exquisite sable!—Look, mother, you haven't got sable like this."

"It is a set that belonged to my mother," said Jocelyn. "Thank you, Lottie; this snug chair is very resting."

She leant back in it with an air of possession. But neither Mrs. Seaton nor Lottie was just then in a mood to criticise. Charlotte felt excited and charmed; Mrs. Seaton compunctious. She had many failings, but her heart was not really dead, and Jocelyn had a radiancy about her which brought back a vision of her beautiful young sister of long ago. She had quarrelled with this sister, and they had not met for years; her sister had made a dying request which she had refused. Now her penniless orphan daughter sat by her fireside. Mrs. Seaton said to herself—

"I will be very good to Jocelyn and Hope—I will make up to them for any little unkindness I may have shown to their mother."—"My dear," she said in a cordial voice, "after all, our consultation may be brief. I offer you and Hope a home—will you come to me and be my children, and Charlotte's sisters?"

"Say 'Yes,' Jocelyn," exclaimed Lottie, dropping on her knees beside her cousin's chair.

Jocelyn lowered her eyes. Now she raised them slowly.

"We have no money," she said.

"As if that mattered! Oh! mother and I are so tired of having too much money!"

Jocelyn felt herself colouring. She remembered the look on Hope's face, and the money which had been refused to her own dying mother.

"Aunt Margaret," she said, rising suddenly to her feet, and speaking with a visible effort, "there is nothing for it but for me to be frank. You wrote a letter which pained Hope very much—it also pained me. You explained your reasons for writing that letter when you wrote so kindly to me yesterday. Aunt Margaret, I accept your explanation—I—I—forgive you."

Lottie gave a little gasp. Mrs. Seaton drew herself up very erect, and half turned away. Jocelyn went a step nearer; she came right in front of her aunt.

"I forgive you," she said, "but that does not mean that I love you. Mother is dead, and Hope and I are very poor girls. I don't like being poor. You are rich. I like being rich. I like warmth, and nice food, and carriages, and beautiful dresses. I hate roughing it; I like to live in clover. I'll accept your offer, Aunt Margaret. I'll come to you, not because I love you, but because you are rich. I'll be a sister to Charlotte, and a daughter to you, outwardly; I'll do what I can. I can be bright, I can sing and play, and say witty, cheerful things, and keep a room alive, and I can always look pretty and be a credit to you. So perhaps, after all, I'll give as much as I get. You and Lottie look very dull. I don't think you'll be dull when you've got me. It's an equal bargain, I think. Is it to be one?

Lottie gave another gasp: she looked at her cousin in a half-frightened way. Mrs. Seaton remained silent for nearly a full minute after Jocelyn had done speaking.

"Kiss me, my new daughter," she said then; and she pressed a very light kiss on Jocelyn's brow.

"What about Hope?" said Lottie, after another brief pause. "Is she coming, too, to make bargains, and to—to——"

Mrs. Seaton spoke abruptly.

"Hush, Lottie, she said. "Jocelyn has put things in a sensible light. I did not expect so much sense from such a young girl; it took me by surprise. Of course, I respect it. No doubt, Jocelyn, love will come later. And now we must all try to appear affectionate."

"Yes," said Lottie, shivering. "All this is most exciting to me. I really never came across anything so refreshing and original. And I don't greatly care about the affection being left out. Still, I want to know about Hope. I think Hope has a prettier name than you have, Jocelyn. I suppose she is not hard, like you—she's the soft and gushing sort?"

"She's harder than I am," said Jocelyn, shivering in her turn, and growing pale.—"Aunt Margaret, Hope has sent you a message."

"Yes, my dear, yes."

"She does not forgive you—she won't come here."

"But she has no money!" exclaimed Lottie.

"There is fifty pounds a year left; she says she will live on that—she won't come here."

Late the next afternoon Jocelyn returned to Downton. Hope was waiting at the station to meet her, and the sisters walked back to Oakdene arm in arm.

Hope was looking very pale; her heavy black scarcely suited her.

"Oakdene is let," she said to her sister.

Jocelyn did not reply by a single word. She tugged her arm a little away from Hope's, who held it tightly.

"Is it all settled, Jo?" asked Hope, in a gentle voice.

"I feel stifling, Hope. Don't ask me any questions. Yes, though, why shouldn't you? I am to go there next week."

Hope did not speak for a full minute.

"Tell me about them, Jocelyn," she said then.

"There isn't much to tell. They have got what I want—riches and comforts. Aunt Margaret is a lady by birth; Charlotte isn't, but I like Lottie better than Aunt Margaret. It's all settled. I can have my own way. I shall want for nothing that money can buy. Hope, I did not know that Oakdene was to be let so soon."

"Mr. Frost found a tenant for it. He will take the furniture and all off our hands. It is a splendid chance."

"And you, Hope—you?"

"I am going to London, to the Frosts, for a week. We shall both be in London after all; I can sometimes see you."

"There will be a gulf between," said Jocelyn, in a choking voice. "I think I was mad to do it."

"It is not too late," said Hope eagerly.

"Yes, it is too late."

Jocelyn stamped her foot passionately on the snow-covered ground.

"I can't be poor, I won't be poor! And yet, Hope, how I hate myself, and respect you!"

PROMOTION.

A PARABLE FROM NATURE.

BY LADY LAURA HAMPTON, AUTHOR OF "MUSINGS IN VERSE," "THOUGHTS ON SICKNESS," ETC. ETC.

"Count misfortune's worst assaults
Triumph, not defeat; assured that loss so much the more exalts Gain about to be." ROBERT BROWNING.

NOW long the Oak had lived there it really could not tell; ever since it remembered anything it had grown and flourished where it stood. How the place had changed, to be sure, since first it poked its inquisitive young head up amongst the brambles, and took a look at the world around! Then it grew amid a forest of oak-trees, interspersed with hollies and furze bushes, and patches of bracken and green grass, among which the rabbits played hide-and-seek, or the hares sat quietly in the sun. The solitude was seldom disturbed; occasionally a stray cow or donkey would trample the ferns under foot, and seek fresh pasturage on the sward, or a poacher set his traps beneath one of the oaks, or some tramps pitch their tent for a night under the hollies; but these things were of rare occurrence; and as for human habitation, in the shape of house or cottage, there was none for miles around. Now how different it all was; one by one the oaks had fallen before the woodman's axe, squatters had taken possession of many sunny nooks, and built rude hovels there, only to be turned out by the lord of the manor, or, unmolested, to sell their strangely acquired "rights" to the highest bidder. So whilst the forest had become a common, and the common dotted with houses and gardens, and the old order of things had passed away, the oak-tree grew and flourished, and grumbled too, which was only to be expected; for when did the rising generation ever do right in the eyes of their elders, or the present ever reach the perfection of the past?

The long summer day was drawing to its close as the oak rustled its leaves mournfully in the breeze.

"Dear me!" exclaimed a Thrush as it hopped about amongst the branches in quest of a fat caterpillar for its evening meal, "dear me! you seem down in the dumps this evening. Anything wrong?"

"Anything wrong?" repeated the Oak; "I should think so, indeed! After all these years of independence and freedom I am to be enclosed."

"Well, and what harm will it do you if you are? Rather a good thing, I should say: keep the goats away from your hoary old trunk, and the cattle from making a rubbing-post of your sides. Not much cause for complaint, if that is all."

"All! why, what greater indignity could befall me? I, who have waved my free branches to the forest air, to adorn a lawn!"

"Well, you might be cut down, you know," chirped the bird, as, finding its search fruitless, it flew off to an adjacent garden.

A quiver of apprehension ran through the tree as it spoke, disturbing a mole who had her nest amid its roots.

"What is the matter?" she asked anxiously.

"Matter enough," it replied. "All our days of freedom are over; we are to be enclosed. There will be mole-traps for you, and—who knows?—perhaps the axe for me; and as for you, old Earth," it continued, drawing the moisture vigorously through its many rootlets as it spoke, "there will be trouble enough for you too: barrenness, and loss of sunshine and air, and a load of brick and mortar hiding you from the light of day; or the iron will enter into your soil, and the fruits and flowers will blossom at the bidding of man, and the children you love will be torn from you as weeds, and the work you would do naturally will be trained and pruned and twisted into shapes past your comprehension."

"Comprehension; yes," interrupted the Earth. "I agree with you there, and I do not dispute the trouble either; but I am older than you, and allow me to say that, as far as I have observed, the enclosing, the cutting down and the pruning, the digging and building are all by way of promotion: all lead the sufferers to a higher life and level."

"May be so," replied the Oak; "but as it happens, I am quite satisfied with myself as I am. Say now, of all your children have you any more ornamental than myself?" and it rustled its leaves proudly as it spoke.

"Nay, you are well enough," answered the Earth, "but have I reared you only to be ornamental, to be a joy unto myself? Do I not know that there is a need-be for every child of mine, a mission for each to fill, a separate life to be lived, apart from, though one with, mine?"

"Life is beautiful, and I am content. What need to talk of usefulness when simple existence is joy? Why speak of separation when we are all in all to one another? Higher level, indeed! Pray, which of my companions over-tops me?" and the summer shoots gave a fresh start as it spoke.

"Well done!" exclaimed the Sunbeam, who had been a silent listener to the conversation, "well done, O Tree; but yet thy action belied thy words. Wert thou really content with thyself, wouldst thou seek to grow? And thou, O Earth, fret not thyself. Must not the careless exuberance and joy of life precede the pruning, abundance of growth the cutting down, or the tree would be stunted and deformed, its usefulness impaired? Thou, O Earth, canst but counsel and rear; from thy master alone, and in his own time and way, comes the call to live solely for him and his service."

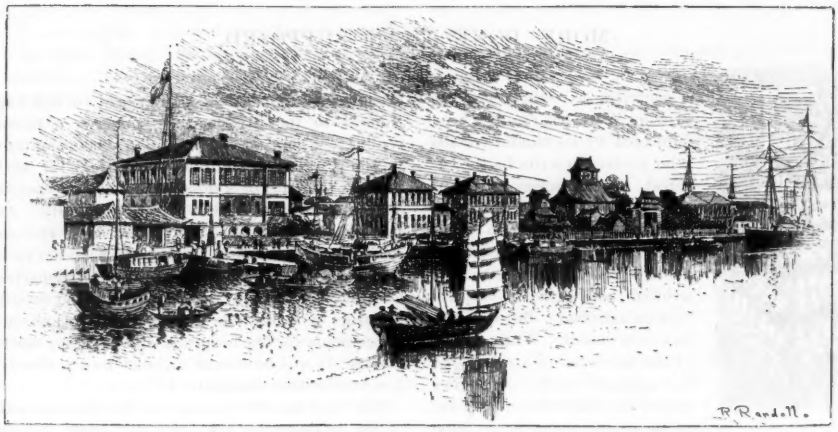
Autumn and winter had come and gone, and spring flowers were making gay the ground, but the oak responded not to the awakening voice of nature as it lay upon the earth, shorn of the beautiful branches in which it had gloried, bemoaning the joyous life of the past.

Two ladies approached who had been for some time watching the bricklayers busily employed in laying the foundations of a house close by; and sitting down on the trunk of the fallen tree, the younger one observed to her companion—

"You will think me very silly, mother, but do you know I always feel so sorry for the piece of ground that is built over—shut up in the dark, no more sun shining on it, no more flowers springing from it, not even seeing the life in the house above—just forgotten! And the trees, too: I cannot bear to see them cut down and destroyed after they have taken such trouble and such years to grow."

"You would cry out, 'Woodman, spare that tree;' and yet, darling, was it not for this they grew—to be of use to man, not merely ornamental? and the ground, too, over which you lament, serves his purpose as truly when it bears his dwelling, as when it brings forth grain for his food. May we not find a lesson in both? Does not the one speak of the higher life and service to which some are called through trouble and trial, which some reach simply by making the most of opportunities given for self-culture and improvement, and which ought to be the aim and object of all? and the other, does it not remind of the hidden influence which, if we forget it or remember, we each exert over all with whom we have to do, moulding their characters, shaping their lives, just as the ground-plan of our house lies forgotten beneath its floors? Have you ever, thought, too, that man, with all his inventions, with all his manifold works, has never placed on the earth what has not previously been in it, and of it? The cathedral was once the rock itself, the wood-work of our houses and furniture, like this oak, once grew and flourished in the forests; the pots and pans in our kitchens, the machinery of our manufactories once lay hidden in the darkness of the mine: the china we so much prize, the very bricks with which our homes are built, were first of the earth, earthy; and so through all, cultivation, invention, work, have raised the lesser to the greater, and developed its latent usefulness. It is even thus with ourselves. God gives to each of us a separate individuality and character, and bids us cultivate them so that we may by them rise to a higher and better life. There must always be a first and a last; we have not all ten talents, but we have all one. Let us see to it that, responding now to the influences of His Holy Spirit, moulded by the various dispensations of His Providence, we may 'so faithfully serve Him in this life' that hereafter He may acknowledge us to have been faithful in the least, and commit the many and more precious talents into our keeping of which 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived,' in the land of which it is written, 'His servants shall serve Him,' perfectly, and for ever."

MORE DONE THAN SUPPOSED.



THE criticism to which Foreign Mission Work has recently been subjected by its candid friends who profess to write in the interest of the missions themselves, has almost made us forget the fire of criticism to which it is constantly exposed from those whose attitude is that of avowed indifference or of positive antagonism. But that fire has not ceased. While many of the missionaries are engaged in pioneer work, labouring where no other Europeans are to be found, many more have their head-quarters in districts where merchants reside, or in ports frequented by the sailor and visited by the globe-trotter. Some of these do not hesitate on their return home, or in their letters, to disparage the missionary and his service. And what they write and say seems to carry great weight. Their deliverances are received as the words of the unbiassed critic direct from the scene of the missionary's labour—words sadly compelled by actual observation, and so on. The globe-trotter says: "I have been there, I have seen—or should have seen, had there been anything to see—the result of the missionary's residence abroad at the cost of the subscriber at home. And I am bold to affirm that that result is just nothing." And so authoritative is the air, so indignant the stamp of the foot, or so mournful the shake of the head, that the friends at home dare not refuse credence to their travelled relative.

From a recent number of the Chinese Recorder, published in Shanghai, we learn that a certain Lieutenant Wood, of the United States Navy, having served a commission on the coast of China, has considered himself qualified to pronounce sentence on the work of the American missionaries in that Empire, and that a number of newspapers have seen fit to reproduce his assertions. He is quoted as having said: "It is not extravagant to say that the work of the missionaries in China and Corea is absolutely without any result, except to hold them up to the ridicule of the natives. It has before been stated—and I concur in the belief—that there is not a Chinese convert to Christianity of sound mind to-day within the entire extent of China." This will seem pretty strong to those who are in the habit of reading missionary literature, and have read, therefore, of great numbers of sane converts in China. Apparently the lieutenant has been asked about these numbers reported by the various societies, for he has been at pains to explain: "They are merely the menials employed about the quarters of the missionaries, who have a salary of 4 dols. per month to become converts, but when discharged there is no further evidence of a 'change of mind.'"

As was to be expected, these severe strictures, getting back to China, have not been received in silence. The critic has been criticised. In regard to this explanation as to the existence of converts, a missionary replies: "There are at present 35,000 communicants in the Protestant Churches of China. If they are paid at the rate of 4 dols. a month, they cost 140,000 dols. monthly, or 1,680,000 dols. annually. As this sum is considerably more than double the amount spent by all Protestant Missionary Societies in China, including the salaries of all the missionaries, the building of churches, and parsonages, and schools, the printing of books, the supply of drugs and surgical instruments for the hospitals, and all other matters of expense, it will be seen at a glance how perfectly self-destructive this statement is."

The lieutenant's remarks on the literary activities of the missionaries lead him still more seriously to expose his ignorance of the subject on which he is posing as an authority. He says that the Chinese translation of the Bible "is in a lingo which stands in the same relation to the Mandarin tongue, or classical language of the country—which is used in court, and is the official language of the country—that an obscure negro dialect of Louisiana stands with classical English." Here those whom he criticises have an easy, if not pleasant, task in dealing with their critic. They are able to point out that several translations of the Scriptures have been made by the missionaries into the classical language of the country, and that one of these at least is acknowledged by the best scholars of the Empire to be in very excellent China style. They are further able to point out that "the Mandarin tongue" is not, as Lieutenant Wood seems to think, "the classical language of the country," but that it is simply one of the dialects—though the dialect that has the widest range, and is in use as the official language—and that translations have been made into it, as into the other dialects of the Empire. They are yet further able to point out that none of these dialects finds any parallel in the negro dialects of Louisiana, but that they are the only spoken languages of the people, the classical language being so exclusively a written language that, when a person is reading aloud from a book printed in it, he does not read what is written, but translates as he goes along into the colloquial dialect. Yet a man capable of such sweeping statements on so slender a foundation of knowledge is hailed by the newspaper editors as "an unprejudiced observer," while the friends of missions who know enough about China to see at once that the statements contained in his criticisms furnish evidence of the little worth of his "actual observation," are taken severely to task for not welcoming "all obtainable facts as to the progress of the work, whether favourable or unfavourable." "Obtainable facts" are good, but fictions—well, they are more obtainable than profitable. It does not follow that because a gun-boat lies in a Chinese harbour, every lieutenant on board will see all the work that is being done by the missionaries on shore, much less that he will be qualified to appreciate it. There is more being done, and of a higher nature and more important character, than is thought or suspected even by those whose own business takes them into the very localities where it is being done.

A rather sad story in illustration of this occurs in a letter from a missionary in the South Seas, published in the Chronicle of the London Missionary Society. A large ship bound for Sydney ran one dark night on to the reef of one of the Penrhyn Islands. The captain had his wife with him, and, moved by a terrible fear of the cannibal propensities of the Penrhyn Islanders, he sent her off with a boat's crew to try and make the island of Manihiki, some considerable distance off. The boat was capsized and the poor woman drowned. Next morning the captain himself was welcomed in a civilised and friendly manner by the natives, one hundred of whom—out of a total population of 373—were church members. The body of his wife was washed ashore and interred in solemn Christian burial by the very men whom he had credited with a readiness to devour it. We must pity rather than blame the poor man. But though he may often have marked his course past those islands, a little more accurate knowledge as to the success of missionary work in them than he evidently had, would have been of much service to him that night. It is obvious that he would never have exposed his wife to the risk of going to Manihiki in an open boat to escape a landing among the Penrhyn Islanders, had he not been convinced of their savage nature—so convinced, indeed, must he have been, that, had he arrived at Sydney without delay or mishap, we may hardly doubt but that he would unhesitatingly have replied to a question regarding their character in the same sense in which he practically answered it when his vessel was on that reef. We may almost hear him say: "The Penrhyn Islanders, sir—they are horrible cannibals. I would rather send my wife five hundred miles in an open boat than risk her landing among them!" A. J. B.

A SUMMER THOUGHT.

OH, faint and low
The breezes blow,
When the summer sun is in the West,
And through the trees
That faint low breeze
Goes singing songs of sweet unrest.

That music thrills
The eternal hills,
Till the listening valleys catch the strain,
And the swelling song
Is passed along
From the mountain top to the distant plain.

And the music saith,
"Oh, why is death,
When all the world with life is filled,
When all is blest
With peaceful rest,
And pain is not, and grief is stilled?"

And a voice springs out of the lowly sod;
"Death is but life in the hand of God."

J. T. BURTON WOLLASTON.

A BROKEN WILL.

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

"MY mother says that I am to row you to the Willows, and that you are to stay to dinner with us, as you must feel lonely without Miss Morson."

"I 'm never lonely, Dr. Suffield," answered the mistress of the Towers, with a toss of the prettiest, fairest head in Milchester.

"Oh! very well; I suppose that means to say you don't want to come with me. Good-bye."

"Perhaps I do and perhaps I don't; who can say? You 're a doctor, and know a great deal; but, between ourselves, you aspire too much when you pretend to know what I don't want to do."

They sauntered side by side down the grassy slope. Atherton Suffield turned and looked seriously at Jessica Hunt; then he smiled as he read the mischief lying in her large dark eyes. When they reached the stream he stood by the boat and folded his arms.

"Well?" he said.

For all answer, she stepped into the boat. He followed her, and pushed off.

When they got well out on to the river, she leaned forward with the rudder-ropes over her shoulders, and said—

"You 're very generous, Atherton."

"Why?"

"I 've been expecting you to inform me for the last ten minutes that of course you were sure all the while that I should come."

"There 's no being sure with you, Jessica. I could only hope that you would come. My dear child, I wonder if you have an idea of what pleasure this gives me! You see, I am very hard-worked just now; everybody seems ill, everybody seems to want me, and I 've had so much night work that I 'm very tired. I fear I should knock under if it weren't for the few hours I spend with you now and then. So, naturally, I 'm glad you didn't stay away."

She frowned slightly. "That 's all very well," she said, not raising her eyes; "but what annoys me is that I 'm getting into a way of always doing whatever you ask me to do."

"Thank you," he answered, his face flushing with a sudden joy.

"Don't be too triumphant," she continued, still looking down; "I shall make a stand; I couldn't do just as anybody wanted me to do, I really couldn't; it 's against my nature. Now, why should I for you?"

"I never said that you did."

"But you know it, and—it vexes me."

She lay back pouting, and he rowed on in silence; he felt very happy as his glance rested on the white-robed, graceful figure before him. The sun was setting, the heat of the day was over, the boat sped past the cottages and the ivy-covered church, and the people sitting on the banks.

"Here we are at the Willows," said Atherton. He jumped on to land, and held the boat with one hand, while he stretched out the other to Jessica.

For a moment she stood up, undecided, in the middle of the boat; then she sank on to the seat and took hold of one of the sculls.

"Come, Jessica," said Suffield.

"No, I don't think I will, after all, thanks. Give my love to your mother, and say I have a headache, so I thought I should be better at home." She pushed off with a sudden jerk, and rested on the sculls in mid-stream.

He stood beneath the willows, all the happiness gone from his face.

"Ah! Miss Wilful! Miss Wilful!" was all he said.

"That 's a good name," she called back, laughing. "I forgot to shake hands. When will you come to see 'Miss Wilful?'"

But he turned and walked away without a word, and she laughed again as the boat bore her rapidly down the river.

"How pale you are, Atherton!" said Mrs. Suffield, as she met him in the garden walk. "Where 's Jessica?"

"She sent you her love. I rowed her up here. She said I was to ask you to excuse her; she has gone back."

Mrs. Suffield was a tall, elegant woman; her son had inherited her straight features, her refined manners, and quiet voice. But while he was in the strength of a powerful manhood, her grey hair and lined face showed that sorrow and trouble had laid their ineffaceable mark upon her.

"Poor boy!" said the mother, with her hand upon the son's shoulder.

He bent his head till his lips touched the slim fingers.

"Well, mother, it can't be helped; I think I'll go away for a few weeks and take a holiday."

"And yet——"

"And yet!—to be so seriously unyielding over petty things! She toys with life. Come, my best friend, let 's dine without her."

The next afternoon Mrs. Suffield heard a well-known clatter of ponies' hoofs, and looking from her rose-embowered window she saw Jessica Hunt in her pony-carriage. The sun's rays nestled in the girl's bright curls and soft cream gown with its gold trimmings; her tiny high-heeled shoes seemed to flash as she threw the reins to the groom and ran into the house. It struck Mrs. Suffield that she had never seen her look more dazzling.

Jessica did not wait to be announced; she went direct to the study, where she knew she should find Mrs. Suffield.

She threw her arms round her neck.

"Dear Mrs. Suffield, I thought I'd drive over and have tea with you this afternoon; Miss Morson is home again, and I told her not to wait dinner for me—that I should stay here if you'd ask me, and she wasn't to send for me; perhaps Atherton will see me across the fields."

"I'd like you to stay very much; if Atherton can't see you home—he's making arrangements to take his holiday—somebody else shall."

Atherton evinced no surprise at seeing Jessica; she was very lively at dinner, but he was very quiet. After dinner the three sat out in the old-fashioned garden, and Jessica nestled in a kind of appealing way up to Mrs. Suffield as Atherton discussed the plans he had already made for his holiday. He talked of going far, very far, thought Jessica, and her liveliness deserted her suddenly. As ten o'clock struck from the old church tower she said she would go, as it would take half an hour to walk across the fields. Atherton put on his hat as if it was a matter of course that he should accompany her. As she bade good-night to Mrs. Suffield and kissed her, she whispered—

"I don't want him to take that holiday."

"Then tell him so, my dear, or else I think he will;" and Mrs. Suffield smiled contentedly as she watched the two set off on their moonlight ramble.

At first they scarcely spoke, but at last Jessica broke through the constraint. She talked excitedly and nickly, though very low.

"You don't seem to appreciate why I came here to-day. You are very hard and unforgiving," she said.

"I don't understand you."

"Oh! yes, you do; I vexed you yesterday, so I've come to tell you to-day that I'm sorry; I'm always vexing people, but when I vex you I always tell you I'm sorry; you're the only person I can do it to, somehow."

"I was hurt and pained, not vexed. My dear little Jessica, I'm a man of thirty-two, and life has been a struggle for me; you're a girl of twenty, and you've found life a very easy affair; I'm not a poor man, but I'm not rich, and you are rich—very rich. I've come to the conclusion that we must look on the art of living from very different points of view, and that our paths will lie very far apart. What my regret is there is no need for me to say! You know how much I love you—you cannot help knowing it; I have not hidden my love from you lately. I think I have always loved you, ever since you were a little child and your parents were dead, and you seemed to have nobody in the wide world to protect you; and my sweetest ambition has always been to call you my wife. But I see I must give it up. There is a certain stubbornness in you that robs you of moral courage; and you give the weight of this to the slightest circumstance—from little things such big things arise. Fortune has spoilt you, that's my way of looking at it; but I may be wrong—perhaps fortune has only fitted you for your position in life; perhaps you are never to wish for a thing but you are to have it; perhaps you are never to will a thing but you are to have it as you will it. But I should expect otherwise of you; I should expect that if things weren't by chance just as you wanted them you would adapt yourself to the state of affairs—that you would yield if need be. You ought to marry a tyrant, perhaps; but I'm no tyrant, and I could not make you do things unless you did them from love of me. And I see"—his voice shook, and he turned his head away from her—"and I see, only too well, that you do not love me. If you had a different disposition, I should not have rested till I had made you love me. But after all, it is better as it is—and so, I am going away for a time, and I'm going to try very hard, Jessica, to forget you."

"You ought to make allowances for me," she said; "I've always been my own mistress; I've no father, mother, brothers, sisters; I've had nobody but that dear, kind little Miss Morson. It had always seemed quite natural for me to do just as I fancied till I came back from abroad last summer; since then it has gradually dawned on me that I must study your fancies before my own; you are the only man I care to speak to. Yesterday I wanted to go to the Willows, and yet I was obliged to rebel: but after I left you looking so sad and unhappy you haunted me; I couldn't sleep; I could scarcely think, till I had told you all this. But you are cold, terribly cold, and you don't care whether I'm sorry or not."

Atherton set his teeth together—nothing should alter his determination.

"Nothing matters now," he said, in a hard voice; "you'll go your way and I shall go mine."

Her shadow came close to his; she had slipped her hand through his arm, and she spoke in such a low whisper that he was obliged to stop and bend his head to hear what she said.

"Can't you guess, Atherton, why I care so much when I see you are unhappy—above all, when I have made you so?"

He would not answer.

The moon seemed to look down scornfully upon them.

They went along arm in arm a few paces without uttering a word, till they came to the stile that led to the Towers path. There he dropped her arm and got over the stile. Her face was piteously pale beneath her white lace scarf. She sighed, she trembled, she placed her hand to her heart. With his help she got to the top step of the stile; he supported her, and she looked with her large, soft black eyes into his. For an instant they stood thus, then he lifted her to the ground and held her panting in his arms.

He murmured, "Believe me, my darling, it is better that we part."

Her cheek rested against his, she clasped her hands round his neck. "But—— Oh! Atherton, I love you, I love you!" came from her quivering lips. Then she tore herself away from him and ran towards the Towers.

He clenched his hands; he would not follow her! no, he would not! And then suddenly he ran after her. In half a minute he had caught her up and was holding her in his arms again.

"Fool, madman that I was," he said, kissing her passionately, "to think that I could live without you! When will you marry me, Jessie?"

"As soon as you like," she said, her face ablaze with blushes and smiles. "Come with me to the Towers to tell Miss Morson—she'll be so pleased; and then run and tell your mother; it will make her so happy—she has always wanted it."

CHAPTER II.

It is more than two years since Miss Morson went to live with Mrs. Suffield at the Willows, and since the two ladies had welcomed at the Towers the return of the doctor and his wife from their honeymoon. It had been decided that the young couple must live there, because it had been in the Hunt family for so many generations. And so Master Harold Atherton Hunt Suffield was born in the house of his mother's ancestors, and very soon learnt to rule there as he did in undisputed sovereignty at the Willows.

"I'm glad to see he's so much like Atherton," said little Miss Morson, shaking her head till her crisp white ringlets flapped against her ruddy cheeks.

"He has Jessica's fair hair and dark eyes," said Mrs. Suffield.

"But Atherton's expression, bless the dear little soul! he'll be just such a man as his father."

"I'm sure Jessica has a sweet expression."

"So she has generally, but sometimes she hasn't."

"Well, there's nothing in that; I'm sure she has not a bad temper."

"Oh! no, of course she hasn't; I never said she had—far from it. But she's so self-willed. Poor Jessica!"

"I won't have you say 'Poor Jessica.'"

"But I do say it," and Miss Morson made her knitting-needles click furiously. "I'm so fond of her, and I know her so well, that I do say 'Poor Jessica.' If you had seen her as I have sometimes, even as a child, when she had to give in, you would not have said her expression was sweet."

"Her expression never could have been bad."

"Oh! no, never bad. But one could see what a storm was raging; she was always prostrate after one of these struggles for mastery over herself; the suppressed passion used to take it out of her to a dreadful extent. Even I could seldom get her to yield, and I used to be sorry almost when I did. She's not what I call strong; she's nerves—all nerves."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Suffield; "I've never seen a happier pair."

"Thank God!" answered Miss Morson, reverently; "indeed, they are happy. They love each other, that says everything. As for Jessica! she seems to live but to think as Atherton thinks."

This was all perfectly true—a happier pair could not be found. Dr. Suffield had always been thought a very able man, but Dr. Suffield who had married the rich heiress Miss Hunt, and who was now master of that magnificent place, the Towers, was really a somebody; he was looked on as a power in the county; he was expected to do very big things one of these days; nobody knew exactly what the big things were to be, but they were expected of him nevertheless. He and his wife could not help smiling at the position they had taken, and for which they were so well fitted. Nobody disputed his abilities or her beauty, or the charm of manner they both possessed. They were very hospitable; altogether they were a great success. And they were very proud of each other Atherton never thought of the time when he had doubted that the result of their union would have been different from what it actually turned out to be. And Jessica wondered at the marvellous way her nature seemed to have changed; she never felt rebellious now.

But are we ever sure of ourselves?

One afternoon Mrs. Suffield and Miss Morson had strolled over to the Towers to enjoy a few hours' worship of the son and heir. They found Jessica playing with him in front of the boudoir fire; she told them that he could almost walk, and that he would soon talk.

"And see," she said triumphantly, "he has pulled my hair down."

"Oh! my grandson is a wonderful fellow!" said Mrs. Suffield, bouncing Master Harold in the air, much to that young gentleman's delight.

"I wonder what your future will be, my son!" said the young mother, her flushed face peering from out of the mane of tawny curls. "I must do a mother's part by you; I must marry you to an heiress, at any rate."

"You must marry a dear, lovable girl, mustn't you, you sweet darling?" said the elder Mrs. Suffield.

"She must be an heiress," persisted Jessica; "all mothers like to marry their sons to heiresses."

"I don't think I studied whether you were an heiress or not when Atherton married you, my dear," said the elder Mrs. Suffield, balancing Harold on her knee.

"Oh! mother, I don't know! You can say that now, of course!"

"Jessica!" said Miss Morson.

"Well! I didn't say anything," said Jessica, getting up from her undignified position, and arranging her hair in a rough knot in front of the mirror.

"My dear Jessica, you didn't say anything, because I know very well that you didn't mean what you said!" And Mrs. Suffield smiled, and cooed softly to Harold, who showed his appreciation by untying her bonnet-strings.

"Of course she didn't mean what she said," said Miss Morson.

The figure before the mirror did not move, but appeared wholly occupied in the adjusting of some loose, curly tendrils of hair. There was a dead silence, which Jessica broke. She spoke very distinctly.

"I don't consider that I said anything," she said; "but I know one thing—whatever I said I meant."

Mrs. Suffield stood up and fixed Harold safely between two cushions in the corner of a couch—he immediately set to work to try and bite his toes—then she went across the room and turned Jessica forcibly round. She put her hands on her daughter-in-law's shoulders and looked at the mutinous face.

"I want to see, Jessica, that you are laughing."

"Why should I laugh?"

"You know I was always very fond of you, and that I thought you and Atherton would be very happy together; that I never gave anything else a thought."

"That 's ridiculous; I was very rich, and you were quite right to want the match; I don't blame you. As I say, I must do the same for my son."

"You don't retract your words, then?"

"There 's nothing to retract."

Mrs. Suffield loosened her hold, tied her bonnet-strings, and drawing on her gloves went out of the room.

"You silly girl!" said Miss Morson, rushing up to Jessica; "run after her this moment and make her come back."

"It 's all right; she 'll come back."

"No, she won't—not unless you make her. Go this moment when I tell you."

"Oh! it 's all right—it 's all right!"

"And I say it 's all wrong. You won't go? You stupid woman! I 'm sure she won't come back. It 's too bad! I must go to her; I must go to her." And Miss Morson also went out of the room, and she banged the door behind her.

Harold gurgled a triumphant infantine chuckle, having succeeded in getting his toes in his mouth, and giving the idea that he was about to swallow himself.

Jessica rang the bell impatiently, and sent him to the nursery. Then she sat in an arm-chair in front of the fire and stared moodily into the burning coals. She was annoyed; she felt herself aggrieved, she did not know why, except that she had no intention of being treated like a spoilt child; she would just show everybody that she was a woman, and not a silly girl as Miss Morson had said she was. She longed yet dreaded to see Atherton.

But when he came home she told him nothing of what had taken place, and made some excuse when he proposed they should go over to the Willows after dinner; she knew, however, it must all come out very soon.

The next evening he came into her dressing-room.

"Oh! do please fasten these pearls, Atherton," she said. "I was just coming to you——" She gave him one glance and could see that he knew everything. "Thanks! Now make haste and dress, because I want to get dinner over quickly; remember, we have a drive of twelve miles before us;" and she slipped past him like some lovely vision. They were going to a party; she had on his favourite gown—amber satin—and her pearl ornaments; and as she went down the old broad oak staircase, her amber satin train with its border of amber feathers trailing behind her, she felt armed for the fray and very confident; in fact, she rather enjoyed the situation.

When they were driving along after dinner, Atherton started the subject. He had called at the Willows on his way home; his mother was out, but Miss Morson had given him a description of yesterday's scene; he wanted to hear Jessica's version.

"What did she say?" asked Jessica.

He told her. When he had finished, she said—

"My version is the same as hers; you can trust Miss Morson—she always tells the truth."

"But how could you have said such a thing to my mother, of all women in the world?"

"I don't consider I said anything, and whatever I said I meant."

"Jessica, Jessica!" he said reprovingly, as he put his arms round her. "You 'll come with me to-morrow, love, won't you, and say that you did not mean what you said?"

"I can't tell stories, Atherton," she replied coldly, "even to please you."

"But you know you did not mean it."

She only shrugged her shoulders.

After a little while he took his arms from her, and sighed heavily as he lay back in the corner of the carriage.

At the party she was the one woman to whom none of the others could compare; Atherton himself had never admired her more, but he was shocked to find that his feelings were so strong against her just then that it seemed he had never loved her less. But he said to himself that he must have patience.

CHAPTER III.

AND he did have patience; he and Miss Morson both had patience. They tried argument and persuasion. They stated the case to her over and over again. A few impulsive words had become an insult through being reiterated. Mrs. Suffield had said nothing about it, but she had not been to the Towers—how could she, they said, till Jessica had gone to her and told her that they had only been impulsive words? But this Jessica refused to do.

"Of course, you can make me, if you like," she said to Atherton.

"I make you do nothing," he replied. "I thought you loved my mother; I thought you loved me."

"You know I do," she said impatiently.

He answered nothing this time.

Jessica feared all Milchester would talk of the altered relations xisting in the intercourse of the two Mrs. Suffields, so she asked Atherton to take her and baby to the seaside. Without a murmur he took them, but he very soon went back to Milchester to see his mother.

"Why did Jessica go away without saying good-bye to me, Atherton?" she asked.

"We must talk this over, mother;" and then, for the first time, they discussed the subject nearest their hearts.

When he was leaving, she said, impressively, "Now, understand, Atherton, you're only to get Jessica to come here; I don't see how I can go to the Towers till she does. She has no need to mention what has passed; only let her come to see me, only let her be my daughter again."

"I don't think that's right; she ought to own to you that she was wrong. I know she thinks she was, so she should own it."

"If I don't mind, what does it matter to anybody?"

"It matters to me; you 're my mother."

"And she 's your wife; my dear boy, the whole affair is getting too serious."

"That 's true, that 's true. You 're right, mother."

And so he told Jessica what his mother had said.

"You 'll go and see her as soon as you get back to Milchester?" he asked.

"Oh," she replied petulantly, "we 're not back at Milchester yet." Atherton dared not trust himself to speak—he was too angry.

And so the miserable days passed; he still stayed at the seaside with her and the boy, although it was near Christmas, but he made continual journeys to see his mother, whose name he never mentioned to Jessica now.

He was unhappy, and he knew Jessica was unhappy.

One evening she went over to him, and kissed him.

"Do you know, Atherton," she said, "I often kiss you, but you never kiss me now."

He kissed her coldly on the forehead.

"We must go back to the Towers for Christmas," he said; "you don't mind going?"

"No; I should like to go, very much."

In the next few days he noticed a great change in her; there was a strange submissiveness about her, and yet she appeared to be brooding over some set purpose. When they got back to the Towers he consulted Miss Morson.

"I must go and see her," said the brisk old lady.

"I 'm determined to ask to be forgiven," were the first words Jessica said to her.

"There 's no need for that."

"Oh! yes. I 'll show I 've no will left. I 'll do it

"For a moment she stood up undecided."—p. 617.

properly—I'll say I've come to ask you to forgive me—to forgive me."

Miss Morson soon left, and she cried when she got back to the Willows.

"She looks dreadfully ill—so haggard and thin; and I don't like that intense expression. I'm frightened—so frightened."

"I'm almost afraid she's making herself ill," said Atherton, who happened to be there.

"There must be an end to this," said Mrs. Suffield. "Tell her, Atherton, not to come to me—it's too cold for her to go out; say I shall dine at the Towers to-morrow and spend the evening with her."

"You kind, good mother!" said Atherton, rapturously. When he delivered the message to Jessica, she said—

"No, no; I'll do it, I'll do it."

All through the night he heard her mutter in her sleep, "I've come to ask you to forgive me—to forgive me."

The next day he had promised to assist at an operation on an old patient of his, who lived a long way off. When luncheon was over he said to Jessica as he kissed her—

"I shall be back in time for a cup of tea; and you are not to go out, mind; stay at home and play with the boy." He ran out without waiting for her answer, and he thought delightedly as he drove away that that evening everything would be right again. And yet he could not help feeling worried and anxious—Jessica seemed so strange, so highly wrought.

At about four o'clock, as he was returning, the horses pulled up suddenly on the dark road. Before he had time to ask what was the matter, the carriage door was pulled open, and Jessica jumped in and sat down beside him.

"To the Willows as quickly as possible," she called to the footman. Then she turned her burning eyes on Atherton.

"I have been waiting here for you; I knew I should catch you at this corner." She was breathing hard, and she moved her hands restlessly.

"We are going to the Towers," he said, "not to the Willows."

"No, no: to the Willows! We are almost there. I'm going to ask to be forgiven. I'll do it, I'll do it!"

In fact, at that moment they stopped at the Willows; he felt there was no fighting against the passion that was consuming her. She opened the door herself and leaped out.

"Come with me," she gasped, as she grasped hold of his arm. "I'll do it, I'll do it; you'll see, I'll do it."

They were soon up the frost-covered path, and inside the bright little hall. They brushed past the maid-servant into the drawing-room.

Mrs. Suffield and Miss Morson rose with a cry of delight as they entered.

Jessica walked up to her mother-in-law, and stood perfectly rigid before her.

"I've come to ask you to forgive me," she began in a harsh, strained voice; "to forgive me—to forgive me;" and then, with a piercing shriek, "to forgive me!"

Mrs. Suffield caught her in her arms. "Don't say that! there's nothing to forgive. Oh! my dear, I'm so pleased to see you." She felt the figure grow heavier and heavier, and then slip to the ground. "Child, child, don't kneel to me!"

Atherton rushed to his wife, who lay huddled in a heap at his mother's feet; he lifted the apparently lifeless form on to a couch.

"My darling!" he cried, "what can it be?"

"She has fainted!" said Miss Morson.

* * * * * *

Milchester never knew the rights of the tale; Milchester could only surmise that Dr. Suffield's wife must have gone out in the damp and caught cold, or that she must always have been delicate—women with those perfect complexions always are delicate, said Milchester—or that she must have had some severe shock to her nervous system; Milchester never knew exactly how it had come about, but Milchester knew one thing for certain—and that was, that since a couple of days after Dr. Suffield's wife had returned from the seaside a few years ago she had been an invalid; she had lost the use of her lower limbs, she was paralysed, and would be an invalid for the rest of her life, poor young thing!

The Willows is sold. Old Mrs. Suffield and Miss Morson have lived at the Towers ever since a certain fateful winter afternoon. Jessica never seems happy without them, and likes them to minister to her in her helplessness. Dr. Suffield has become in the last few years a grave grey-haired man. Harold can ride a pony now, and spin tops.

It is a beautiful summer's day, and the invalid's chair has been wheeled down the grassy slope at the Towers to the edge of the stream. Dr. Suffield comes and leans over his wife as she lies there so peacefully.

"Here are some roses, Jessie, the deaf old man in the village has sent you."

She chose the prettiest ones and called Harold to her.

"Run along, darling. These are the freshest; give them to grandmamma and Miss Morson with my love."

Harold ran across the lawn to the two elderly ladies to fulfil his mission.

Jessica followed him with her eyes.

"Atherton," she said, "when the boy is old enough he must be told my history."

"I don't see why."

"I should like it; it will teach him a great lesson: we mortals are such atoms, only some of us can't believe it."

She looked at the stream rippling by.

"Do you remember, Atherton, the day before we were engaged? You rowed me to the Willows, but I would not get out of the boat, and you stood under the trees, and called me 'Miss Wilful?'"

"I remember, sweetheart," clasping her hand; "but why think of that? it's such a long while ago."

"Yes, such a long while ago!" And with her hand still in his, she turned her lovely, sad, resigned face towards him.

"I'm not wilful any more," she said, "am I?"

"CAREFUL ABOUT MANY THINGS."

BY THE REV. C. F. S. MONEY, M.A., HON. CANON OF ROCHESTER, AND VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, KILBURN.

THE village of Bethany is distant about two miles from Jerusalem, at the back of the Mount of Olives. To a house in this village our Lord was accustomed to go, to rest awhile from His many labours, and to refresh His spirit with the society of those who listened to and loved His words. The calm retirement of that sweet place and the sympathy of His friends there were evidently much prized by Him. In the great city all was opposition; in the quiet home, respect and love. We look back, it is true, from the distance of many centuries, at the life and character of Him in whom is centred all our hope, and we are enabled to include, as it were in one view, the wonders, the glories, and the humiliations of His course. But it is a high privilege that we are enabled thus to mark the many traits of character which are recorded—the kindness, the gentleness, the weariness, and the weakness of the Son of Man—that we have thus brought home and pressed upon us the truth that in all things the Son of God was made like unto us, sin only excepted. And as we so follow the holy record of what He said and how He lived, of the outpourings of His love, and the ignominy of His death, and the glory of His resurrection, there comes to the awakened mind a light of surpassing brightness, and the traveller, as he journeys on through the wilderness, mistaking sometimes his way, and doing, alas! many things which are contrary to the name of Jesus, is arrested by the conviction of his sin and the matchless compassion of his Saviour. Oh! happy, happy they in whose hearts there dwells, by the grace of God, a true and lively faith: who become the followers and the home companions of the despised and rejected of men: who turn not from Him as He goes about from village to village and city to city: who see Him as He feeds the hungry, or heals the sick, or raises the dead: who listen to Him as, within the honoured house at Bethany, in answer to the question of Martha, He replies, "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

The family in which we find our Lord was staying consisted of a brother and two sisters, and we are left in no doubt as to the feeling with which He regarded them, nor the delight with which He conversed with them. "Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." Those were days of unclouded happiness and unbroken peace; but ere long the family who now received their heavenly Visitor so thankfully had their joy turned into sadness by the death of one of their number. The greatest earthly happiness, even when hallowed by the presence of Christ, is liable to interruption. There is no making sure of any comfort or any blessing which depends upon the creature and not upon the Creator. Into the brightest and happiest home will come, when least expected, a cloud that darkens all our years—an experience and remembrance which can never more be put away, but which, for our good or our misery, for our growth in godliness or our advance in unbelief, shall fasten upon the character, and influence the life. And thus was it at Bethany—the trial hour approached; the loving brother, the affectionate friend, is no longer there. Lazarus was sick, but Jesus came not; he died, and then He who had been their Guest proved Himself also their Saviour. With the voice which one day shall shake creation, He wakened Lazarus from his sleep; He restored him to his home. Oh, what joy did this send to that family at Bethany! What an appeal was it to their faith, and what a claim to their gratitude! On this occasion, when the Deliverer was approaching, Martha went to meet Jesus, whilst Mary sat still in the house. Martha went to ease her impatient heart of this reflection—"Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Mary sat still in her calm confidence and submissive spirit. There will be hours when you, too, will have to sit still, not doubting your Master's love, but uncertain what He has prepared for you.

Yet once more we are told that Jesus goes to Bethany. It was just before the Passover. They made Him a supper, and Martha served, whilst Mary, out of the fulness of her grateful heart, poured ointment upon her Master's head, and anointed His feet, and wiped them with the hair of her head. A little while longer, and this intercourse must come to an end. From the peace and quiet of this friendly shelter the Lord and Giver of life advances, through the shoutings of a maddened people, to a last struggle with death and a complete victory over the grave. But the words of our title were spoken at an earlier period, when a certain woman named Martha received Him into her house. She was the elder sister, and appears to have managed the household affairs. She was evidently a person of strong feeling, and one who acted upon the impulse of the moment. Her first thought is to do honour to her Guest, and accordingly she busies herself in preparation for their supper. She is right in this wish and endeavour. But how often is it that we set out with a right intention, and because we are not as watchful as we should be, an ingredient is introduced by the Evil One which changes our mind and mars our action! As the one sister becomes more and more intent upon her preparations, she beholds the figure of her sister Mary, calm and happy, sitting at the feet of Jesus. By degrees the thought crosses her mind that there is something selfish in this indifference to her cares and occupations. "Why am I left alone to prepare the feast? Why does not my sister come and help me? Why is not the Master more considerate?" And so, with a mind perplexed and dissatisfied, she renews her toil. At length, unable any longer to contain her vexation, and forgetting that respect which was due to her Guest, she addresses Him, and says, "Lord, dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me." Mary, who had sat still to listen to the words of Jesus, sits equally still as she hears the reproach of Martha. It was not from indifference that she thus acted, not from want of love to her sister. But her mind and soul had been contemplating other and higher objects, and she was willing to leave the matter in her Master's hands. "Dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her, therefore, that she help me." Send from Thy presence that eager, patient inquirer, that happy disciple who is drinking in the word of life—bid her to assist my preparations, and then we can listen to Thy words. Thus appealed to, our Saviour is no longer silent. He knew the whole history of Martha's distractions, which led her thus abruptly to break in upon His conversation; not one thought of her heart had been hidden from Him; and this was the rebuke He conveyed to her, this the encouragement He gave to Mary. The much serving is passed by unnoticed, but the earnest listener is richly comforted. "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

It is not easy to trace the way in which good impressions made early in life become not rooted up, but choked—how the child who was accustomed to listen with a solemn mind and a touched heart to the account of holy men who feared God will cease to be influenced by these examples. But it is well to remember that there is something which covers the garden of the heart with withering effect—and that is the cares, and troubles, and pleasures of this life. In the outset of life these may, indeed, appear to be but trifles, and yet if they are not daily examined and spread before God in prayer, they will master all opposition. The young heart which to-day has nursed some disquieting thought will be upon the morrow more alive to those things which distress; the sensitiveness is increased; and so an evil temper or a wrong bias may come to pervade the whole character. In the case of Martha it was not one thing, but many things, which troubled her: the gradual drawing off her mind from that upon which alone it should have rested, and the admission into it of those distracting thoughts by which it was engrossed. It is very rarely that one thing alone has the power of producing over-carefulness; it is the distraction of many things, the thinking of many things without delight, the performance of everything without success. When bereavement comes, however bitter the loss, however deep the sorrow, the effect is not to distract the mind, but to fix it. When loss of fortune takes place, or when the dream of life is dispelled, then come a variety of cares. The lost position in the world, the dreary waste which spreads around, the gloomy hue which everything wears—all this will combine to agitate and vex a spirit which has lost its spring. It becomes careful and troubled about many things, with the accompanying drag of painful thought, and sad remembrance, and conscious weakness. And so, whilst the memory is recalling past vexations, and the imagination is on the wing to create new joys, the message of peace, the voice of conscience, the teaching of Jesus, is unheeded and despised. I would desire to appeal to all who know that they are robbed of the benefit they should derive from holy ordinances, and solemn warnings, and earnest exhortations; and I would ask if you do not find that there is something in your life which counteracts the effect of these things—something of which at times you are half conscious, and at others wholly so—which chokes the good seed, grieves the Holy Spirit, turns you from Christ, deprives you of peace, fills you with uncertainty, keeps you from your knees, and hardens your heart? Have you found at times, as you listened to the Word of Life, the message of the living God, that it attracted you for the moment from the influence of habits and thoughts which generally control you—that eternity mastered in your soul the things of time?—that the glories of heaven outshone the vanities of the world? And with the contemplation of such themes, has your soul thrilled with a joy which made you feel its immortality, and tremble for its destiny? Oh, I may surely say, with the earnestness of Paul to Agrippa, I know that you have been thus impressed and aroused. But, alas! as the sun goes down at close of day, fringing with bright gleams the clouds which wait upon its course, even so has this heavenly influence declined, leaving only in your breast a waning reverence for those occasions upon which it has been felt. You had indeed resolved to lead a new life; but before you put that resolve into execution the old one had resumed its sway. You had determined to meet those temptations and anxieties which had hitherto disturbed you by casting all your care upon God; but an unexpected occurrence, an engrossing anxiety, an overwhelming suspense, an irresistible attraction, has encountered you, and you are once more involved in all the distraction from which you had hoped to be freed. Many there are upon whose hearts the seed has been cast, who have attended upon the ordinances of God's House and the preaching of His Word, who can recall hours when they seemed to be leading a new life, enjoying a new peace, feeding upon a new hope; and yet by daily cares and daily occupations, and nightly amusements, and increasing riches, the whole promise of their early life has been proved untrue, and they have turned from the easy service of Christ to the iron bondage of the world. With all such, then, I would desire now to plead—that if they feel and apply to themselves the force of Christ's remonstrance to Martha, they are bound to own the wisdom of Mary's choice.

It is not in anger that the Friend of Bethany would now speak to you. If it pleased Him—if it were for your good—He could send down his voice, past shining worlds and trackless wastes, and address you by name with affectionate earnestness, as He once spoke to the engrossed sister: "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

But the great Teacher was not satisfied with unfolding to one sister the wrongfulness of her course and the lurking evil of her heart; He told her of something else which was better, and which was calculated to satisfy her soul. And in the same way we, too, are bound to set before you the happiness of Mary's choice, as well as the misery of Martha's carefulness. It is not the strongest appeal to conscience, nor the most vivid description of judgment, nor the most appalling dread of death, that will convert and sanctify the heart. It is not the truth to which Scripture lays claim from its accurate analysis of your hearts that will lead you to obey it. No miracle and no threat will bring the sinner to God or prepare him for heaven; and if we were obliged to confine ourselves to consider the unhappiness here, and the misery hereafter, of those who give their hearts to the world and their lives to sin, we should be hopeless of rescuing by this means one sinner from the error of his ways and the ruin of his soul. We may gain a hearing for the message of the Gospel by this means, we may draw forth an acknowledgment of the world's worthlessness, but it is needful to do far more than this if we would have you to seek earnestly the one thing needful. We must point to that which can take the place of all you are summoned to give up. The all-mastering and wonderful love of Christ must be set before you; the hope of eternal life through Him; the preparation by Him of joys which shall never end; the readiness with which He will condescend to enter your heart, to come in and sup with you; the power and the gentleness, the skill and the tenderness with which He will comfort and relieve; the offer of a peace which passeth understanding, and of a rest which remaineth for the people of God—all this must be associated with "the one thing needful," in order to draw you from the world which passeth away, and to introduce you to that Friend who abideth for ever. And even when this is done—when the contrast is so strongly drawn that there rises up a desire to choose the better part; to cast in, once and for ever, our lot with the children of God; to leave no longer the soul's safety or the soul's peace uncertain and unsecured—even then, is it not true that there is felt a want of power to maintain the choice, to act upon the decision, to fight manfully, to strive for the mastery, to persevere unto the end? But if you feel this want—if, as you begin to find that "one thing" only is absolutely necessary for you, you at the same time mourn your inability to obtain it, then indeed, with the promise of God and the experience and example of His people, we are enabled to give you every encouragement. Many who once looked upon this world as very good, and found delight in those pleasures it affords, have been enabled to look beyond, to a purer land and a more enduring substance. Many who once found that the eye and ear of sense revealed to them a beauty and a harmony which thrilled their soul and captivated their mind, have now gazed on the King in His beauty, and rejoiced in the sweeter melody of redeeming love. Many who knew not how to give up the inclinations of a lifetime and the infirmities of a second nature have become transformed by the renewing of their minds and the imparted grace of God. Many who once cried with the publican, "God, be merciful to me a sinner!" or with St. Paul, "Wretched man that I am!" have finished their course, and kept the faith, and received for their portion "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." Many who once, under the plea of much serving, and the temptation of overcarefulness, neglected Christ and imperilled their souls, have been brought by the grace of God and faith in the Saviour to choose that better part which shall never be taken away from them.

And now I ask you to close with the offer which the address of Christ to the two sisters holds out to you. Let the effect produced by choosing the good part, and the promise that it shall never be taken from those who so choose it, excite an ardent desire in every breast to be numbered amongst those who are taught of Christ and pardoned of God. You have seen how Mary seated herself at the feet of Jesus and listened to His word. She was not attracted by curiosity—she did not seek for any temporal benefit—she did not pay Him a heartless homage—she followed Him not out of regard to human custom: she knew He was a homeless wanderer; she knew He was despised of men; and yet to Mary the proudest throne would have been less esteemed and less desired than that humble place at her Lord's feet. She had experienced the power and the sympathy of Christ, and that was the cause of her humility and earnestness. The spirit of God had taken of the things of Christ and had shown them unto her. She was convinced of her sin and her need of a Saviour—she felt her sin within, and she beheld her Saviour beside her. In the midst, then, of all the preparations which her less spiritually minded sister was engaged in, she found her duty and her pleasure in listening at the feet of Jesus. She had come to feel this truth: that "man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." The Saviour was to her not merely the deliverer from a future evil and a future danger, but her present Guide and her portion for ever. This gave her peace and tranquillity of mind. This made her afterwards, when death invaded her family circle, submissive under the stroke, and patient in expectation of deliverance. Let me, then, ask you if, like her, you have taken your place at your Lord's feet? Not one holy desire, not one characteristic of the faith exhibited in this happy and favoured disciple of her Lord, but you must resolve to seek, if you would partake of her blessing. Are you willing to learn of One who was lowly? Are you ready to bear His cross? Are you seeking now—are you conscious of possessing a real desire, deep and growing, to be conformed to your Saviour's example? There are many objects upon which the mind is wont to fasten, which the more they are contemplated the more do they disturb, perplex, and unsettle. But it is not so when Jesus is the object of contemplation and love. If He alone is looked to for deliverance—if He is entirely trusted—if His table is approached in order to obtain a closer union with Him, then will there reign a holy tranquillity within the soul. All the decision derived from having one object, and all the energy from feeling it to be very needful, will be the possession of one so living. The pleasures, and the cares, and the trials of life, will range themselves in their proper places. They will neither rend by their conflicting appeals nor overwhelm by their united pressure. Whatever is presented to the mind as matter for hope or distress will be referred to its connection with the one great object. The faith which has enabled the believer to put on Christ, and to rejoice in His salvation, will stand forth as a pattern for every other effort of the soul. When in some trifling matter which seems almost beneath the notice of Jehovah, but which is sufficiently great to master the strength of His servant, there is a strong temptation to be careful and cast down, then will the believer give himself to more earnest self-examination and prayer, and then will he renew that life of faith which first began beside the Cross. Then will he prefer to take his seat at Christ's feet rather than distract and endanger his soul with the cares, the pleasures, and the riches of this uncertain life.

Jesus loved Martha and Mary. Think you, my reader, that He loves you? Are you convinced that you love Him? Have you in very truth chosen the good part? and are you, in dependence upon God's grace, endeavouring to give your whole heart to the Saviour, and to draw your whole spiritual life from Him? It is by going to Christ in the first instance for pardon, for peace, for grace, that you will obtain strength for the performance of duty. Mary felt that the strength to do anything must be gained at the feet of the Saviour. There she would learn wisdom; there she would receive directions; there she would be filled with hope; there she would receive a blessing which would carry her through trial and care unmoved and undismayed. No soul that has not thus nestled close to Jesus, waited for His word, depended upon His grace, and received out of His fulness, can ever hope to serve faithfully or to serve rightly. Blessed, unspeakably blessed, is the relation which subsists between a soul that is filled with the love of Christ and the Saviour who loved that soul and gave Himself for it! High and holy and ennobling is the intercourse to which those are admitted who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. United by faith to the Son, adopted by grace into the family of God, there is henceforth no power which shall be able to pluck them out of His hand. Oh, then, strive to gain more, if you feel that you possess and realise any of your Saviour's love! Think of Him watching you! Think of Him praying for you! Think of Him as deeply interested in all that concerns you! "Be not careful, be not troubled about many things." Let your Master receive an undivided and unfaltering service, and then, whatever others may say of your contempt for earthly things, may this be the comfort and sweet encouragement which Jesus Himself shall pour into your soul: One thing is needful: and you have chosen that good part which shall never be taken away from you.

THE DREAMS OF DR. FAYDING.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," "THE VANISHING OPAL," "THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT," ETC. ETC.

PART II.

WHERE are some men to whom life seems destined to be one long discipline; the 'why' of this we cannot tell. Hope seems to exist only to mock them; for them fruit forms and swells, but either to ripen not, or, ripening, to be plucked by other hands. That these have their place in the great universe of God, I doubt not; but what their place is, why they should be ever in shadow when the sun shines over hill and dale; why they should be hot and fevered while the cool wind blows, and cold and cheerless while that bright sun shines; deaf, when there is music to be heard; blind, when there is beauty to be seen; bedridden, when there are moors and fields, and hills and vales, all of which would receive with welcome a human tread: the why of this I know not: I only have faith to say—"Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" I stand upon the shore of this sea of sorrow, though I venture not into its deep, and wonder and adore where I cannot understand.

"'Come here, young man, and listen to what's before you in life.'" p. 630.

Who started in life with better prospects than Jonathan Fayding? If the race were to be to the swift, and the battle to the strong, then Jonathan Fayding had a right to win life's Derbys, whatever they may be; and to be conqueror in its Waterloos, whatever they may be also. Jonathan Fayding had a right to expect a full hand; life was to be very good for him.

In family the young man was somebody. Old Sir Jonathan, his father, could go back almost to the Conqueror himself. In the grey matter of the brain, the quality was good: young Jonathan was at the head of all his classes at school. Limbs! yes; they were all right too—bowling or batting, running or leaping—in all of them the young man was first; and first he meant to be in life. Jonathan Fayding was endowed with all that ought to get a man on in this life; with all that would enable a man to enjoy himself with the things of this life. He meant to have them, and to enjoy them too.

But beyond this life he looked not; here there was enough to satisfy him; he would take it all; and this would be to him the fulfilling of the destiny of life.

But let it be recorded that there was nothing low or grovelling in the young man's idea of pleasure; on the contrary, his ambitions were noble, his affections pure, his tastes refined. The world was not worth having spent on it all that he had to spend.

It may be that there are some so largely dowered that it seems a tenfold shame in them to spend their gifts upon what must perish in the very using—in the very having; and the might with which they would have poured their life down the channels which Nature has hollowed out, is met by the might of boulder and shingle, drift and crag, turning that life away from the morass in which it would have been lost, to the ocean infinite—the sun-lit, the music-laden, the health-pervaded sea.

Jonathan Fayding, thou art the man! Of these "maybes" thou "art," and because thou "art," I write. There are those who through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. Mrs. Dillwort, you didn't know that, or you wouldn't have talked nonsense to Drailes the sexton about mushrooms, mistletoe, and warts: perhaps it was not necessary that you should know much about the matter. To do your duty in that state of life to which you were called—making puddings and beds—may be all that is required of you. Your trials will come to you after your kind—as wisely ordered for you, as other folks' are for them. Be faithful, all ye Dillworts, in your day and generation in what you are called to; only don't pretend to understand that about which you know nothing at all.

The gentleman at the "Three Owls" had yet a good bit of holiday before him—at least, quite enough to enable him to learn something about the Vicar of Daysford, and something he wanted much to know: he would give a good deal to discover the mystery of that peaceful face. If the vicar gave him the chance, he would cultivate his acquaintance, and perhaps get in some degree into his confidence. Whether the three wise-looking birds, under whose sheltered wings he lay that night, were hatching him into this wisdom, I cannot tell; but such was his determination. Moreover, he would spend at Daysford what remained of his holidays. If there were anything to learn, there was much; and, only imagine, having some inner rest like the vicar's, in the midst of life's hurry and worry—the London life he had to lead; for the visitor to the "Three Owls" knew enough of mankind to be sure that the vicar's face of heavenly peace was but the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace.

In the morning the good man called at the "Three Owls," which little incident, though in itself scarce worth the ink I am spending on it, caused a considerable sensation in the village. Why the vicar shouldn't let a man come and go without putting himself out of the way to come and see him, was what the landlady of the "Three Owls" couldn't understand. That day she had a great deal of dusting to do in the immediate neighbourhood of the visitor's door—indeed, on the door itself; moreover, she had to clean the key; and to clean the key she had to take it out; and then she had to look into the lock, to make sure that there was no dust inside; and as Nature had so arranged matters on the head of the landlady of the "Three Owls" that her ear was in close propinquity to her eye, she just gave it a chance of hearing what was going on. And what did she hear? Why, nothing short of an invitation from the vicar to her guest, to come and stay with him while he remained in Daysford. That such a thing should be, vexed her landlady soul; it was an affront to the "Three Owls;" it was a lost chance of many separate charges for breakfasts, dinners, and suppers; but why the vicar should so suddenly take up with a stranger, was from the incomprehensibility of it more vexatious still; and for the credit of human nature I am sorry to say the lady of the "Three Owls" looked pickles at her visitor as, that very afternoon, he took his departure for the vicarage.

Her only guest gone! and abstracted by the vicar! Well! could he be as good a man as people thought? If the "Three Owls" could speak, what would they say about it—that old one in the middle especially—she'd like something to come out of his beak; she'd like him even to wink, which wink being freely rendered might be translated, "You see, parsons ain't to be trusted no more than anyone else; they say, 'Thou shalt not steal,' but here's been one, and stolen the 'Three Owls'' only guest." She'd drop in in the afternoon to Mrs. Crook, and have a cup of tea with her. She'd like to know whether she could tell the meaning of it all.

The stranger took his departure all the same; and that evening found him installed at the vicarage, the guest of Dr. Fayding. The doctor had his own reasons for asking the Daysford visitor; and the visitor had his own reason for being glad to accept the invitation he received.

Charles Domville lived in the world, and what had the world done for him? He had toiled, and what had come out of his toil? Little more than thorns and thistles, as the fruit of the sweat of his brow. The girl whom he thought he had won had left him for another; the fret of that sore was eating him up; and now, though he wandered from place to place, he could find no peace. Moreover, he was a disappointed man in his profession; the Mastership in Chancery to which he thought he was entitled, and which he had every reason to expect, was given elsewhere, and here was something else to furrow his brows, and make them very unlike the Vicar of Daysford's; he was a restless man, and the vicar, whose eye was not dimmed, could see it all. And he pitied his guest, even as his guest envied him.

It needed but a short time for confidence to grow up between the two; the vicar's visitor somehow believed that his host could help him to rest; and the vicar longed to calm the fret which evidently corroded that visitor's life; and so they came together upon this point ere very long.

"Yes," said Charles Domville to the vicar, as they sat together by the latter's study fire, "I am the son of a man whose life had been unrestful, and his unrest is upon me; the father's inheritance is with the son—there has been an entail of misery, and I have come in for it. I will talk freely to you, sir, as I have not talked to anyone. I can make a father of you, and give you all the confidences of a son; it will be a relief to me; and perhaps you may tell me how my entail may be broken. Hah! when I have been tying up estates in strict entail, I have often shuddered, thinking of the entail that I have been obliged to come in for myself, whether I liked it or no.

"I knew nothing, sir, of my own history until my father was on his death-bed; then he told it to me, or, rather he told me his own, which, indeed, has woven itself into mine. My father was a restless man, a man who never prospered in life; he seemed always on the point of prospering; and when he was on the point of success, met with failure instead. And all his life was miserable. He was ever living with his losses and bygone troubles. All that was wretched seemed to live with him, to eat and drink, and walk and talk with him, and be his companion all day long. And he hated me; he used to tell me that I embodied his curse; he said he wished I had never been born. At last, he lay on his death-bed; and then he said, 'Come here, young man, and listen to what 's before you in life. 'T is now twenty years since I robbed a man. I robbed him not of gold and silver, not of lands, but of love—no, not of love, but of what he loved; to steal is bad enough, but to steal from my own friend was worse. It doesn't matter what his name was, he was my friend, and I was his, until I became a thief, and stole from him the jewel of a heart; nay, not that, though that I did my best to steal. I only got the casket, after all. But why shouldn't I tell you his name? Shame was going to keep me from it; but how can you do what I charge you now to do, if ever you meet that man in life? His name is Jonathan Hopeton. Jonathan Hopeton was my chief college friend; and Jonathan's heart was as open to me as the sky is to the sun. And Jonathan fell in love—in love with the daughter of a poor, proud man. She had a brother at the University, and she came up to the Commemoration to see, like many; but not to be seen, like still more.

"'There I saw her; and no sooner had I seen her than I determined to have her; but her heart was Jonathan's. There was no chance of my cutting him out; he was handsomer, cleverer than I. I know not what demon possessed me, but I would have killed Jonathan, killed my friend, rather than not get that girl, whose heart was his.

"'But there was no need of running any gallows chance; we managed the thing more cleverly than that. The girl's father was poor, very poor, for his position in life; and his son, who was as poor in heart as he was in purse, fell in with the plan which was to rob Hopeton of his sister; not of his sister's heart—mind you, I never said that—but of his sister herself. I paid for the whole lot to go abroad; and the girl's wretched brother was in my pay. He stopped all Hopeton's letters; he stopped all hers; the rascal worked the oracle with a vengeance; for he was promised two thousand pounds by me, on the day I married his sister. He worked double death, and worked it well; many a time since, I could have blown out his brains for his cleverness and success. She believed Hopeton was dead, and he believed she was dead; and then I came in, and father and brother hung about her, and coaxed her, and kissed her, and flattered her; and to save the lot of them from ruin, she consented to call me husband.

"'Hah! it all came out. I never had her heart, and woe betide the man that takes a woman without her heart. And when it all came out, she just died; it was all that was left her to do; but she left you behind; and I wish she had not, for you have just served to keep up the memory of what has been my life-long curse.

"'Now then, young man, listen, and my curse (whatever that may be worth—perhaps more than my blessing) be upon you, if you don't carry out what I say. If ever in your life you come across anyone of the name of Jonathan Hopeton, go down upon your knees before him; and put your two hands together, the way children do when they are saying their prayers, and ask his forgiveness on your miserable father. Tell him that, from the day he did him this tremendous wrong, no prosperity has fallen upon his life.' I carry the burden of that," said the vicar's visitor, "on my heart; I feel as if I had to bear his sin about, until I find the forgiveness that will roll it off, until I find the man; and if I do find him, how do I know that he will forgive? And I have my own troubles too. I must carry about for ever with me a heart trouble of the selfsame kind; only I am not the wrong-doer, but the wronged. The world too has gone awry with me. I am disappointed in both position and purse; and all I have, or indeed all I hope for now, I would give, Doctor, to have in my face the peace that there is in your face—the peace in my heart that there is in your heart. The secret of peace is with you; and I would give all I have, or hope for, to have the secret of peace with me."

There was a long silence in that study, and the younger man and the old looked both of them into the fire; it may be that each was seeing in the coals the embodiment of what was filling his thoughts and heart.

At last the younger man said, "Dr. Fayding, you have the secret of peace; if that secret can be communicated, tell it to me."

The old man said nothing, but taking his visitor by the hand, led him up to the green curtain drawn in front of the little churchyard in the recess. The lamp was already so placed, as to throw its light full in upon the peaceful looking little spot. The Doctor drew aside the curtain, and pointing to the little graves, said, "The secret of peace lies pictured there."

The vicar's visitor stood before the little recess, utterly amazed. There, in truth, was the exact imitation of the home of death. This, then, was what he had heard of from the sexton in such confidence; this was the churchyard which the vicar kept in his house. Was it a toy? Nay, the old man was too serious for that; he stood in front of it with too much earnestness and reverence in his face, for that; he was a man, and an old man, and a tried man, and having become a man he had put away childish things.

The vicar's visitor felt that it was not for him to speak first, especially as his host seemed lost in contemplation; indeed, he observed that his lips were moving silently, as though in prayer. But all still remained peaceful—no cloud passed over the old man's brow.

"You say," said the vicar, "that I have peace on my brow, and peace in my heart; it is true. And the secret of that peace you want to know. The peace I have all comes through death. Death is the gate of life. The peace of forgiven sin is the first peace of all; the peace of accepted death comes next. We live in a world of dyings; and he who struggles with death shall have a life of spasms, and not of peace. The acceptance of death—of Christ's death for us—of our own selves in us—of the dyings which are around us—in these there is peace.

"You are a scholar," said the old man, "your profession tells me that; there is a glass—it will enlarge the letters on the tombs and headstones in this churchyard: you can study them until I return. Lock the door that no one may disturb you; in an hour I shall come back." And the vicar left the room to his guest, who locked the door; while the vicar went to his own room and did the same.

It was well that Dr. Fayding took into that room the peace which indeed was his; there are times in life when war would arise in the heart, if it were not that it were hopeless to blow the trumpet, and uncover the shield, and bring forth the spear, in a land, the very atmosphere of which is peace.

The vicar gone, his visitor, with strange feelings indeed, applied the glass to the little churchyard which lay before him; and strange were the revelations which it made.

The first inscription he came on was, when freely translated—

HERE LIETH £10,000.
Died May 1, 1826.

Ten thousand pounds dead! he could put no meaning to it at all. There was not a word of explanation; simply "died." Close to it was another headstone—

HERE LIETH CLOVELY MANOR.
Died June 14, 1828.

Clovely Manor! well, here was a name, at any rate. Who was he? what did he die of? he was a relation, no doubt. Poor fellow! in all probability he had a history; it was just such a name as one would find in a novel. Perhaps Dr. Fayding would tell him something about him. Perhaps he, too, had a love affair, and maybe died of a broken heart. Although a lawyer, Charles Domville had some imagination; and as he was not engaged upon any case, he allowed it a little grace.

But he could not tarry long in his reverie; there were other graves to be examined; and it took some little time to decipher some of the stones. Who lies in this row? Ah, no doubt a family. Fayding! why, here's the vicar's own name. The old man never had wife or child. Surely he hasn't buried himself? Let me see:—

"HERE LIETH JONATHAN FAYDING,
BISHOP OF CUMBERLAND.
Died January 14, 1840.

"No doubt his grandfather," said Mr. Domville. And next to him—

HERE LIETH JONATHAN FAYDING,
DEAN OF DORWICH.
Died February 3, 1842.

"No doubt his father," said the visitor; "the Church runs in some families, just as medicine and the law."

Again—

HERE LIETH JONATHAN FAYDING,
CANON OF THWAITDEAN.
Died July 9, 1844.

"Bless me!" said Charles Domville, "how 'Jonathan' and Church preferment run in this family. Who was he?"

HERE LIETH THE LORD CHANCELLOR:
ALSO HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: ALSO
THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY.
Died November 4, 1848.

"What! all three of them?" said Charles Domville. "What a terrible mortality in high places! I wonder if there were any epidemic then? But I don't remember reading of this; surely it is so remarkable that I must remember it if I had read of it. I can't make out this place at all; there must be something allegorical in it. Ah, yes, no doubt, for here is another:—

"HERE LIETH HEALTH.
Died September, 1855."

And after reading this Charles Domville would have been sure that it was all a mystery, to which only Dr. Fayding could supply the key, when the glass almost dropped from his hand as he read the name of his own father and mother:—

HERE LIES CHARLES DOMVILLE:
ALSO
DOROTHY HIS WIFE.
Died July 2nd, 1822.

And the date, what was it? Not the year his father, to his certain knowledge, died, not the year his mother died, but one year before this last. Both dead, dead together! And what was the year? It was that of their marriage, not their death.

There were more graves, but the vicar's visitor did not care to read the inscriptions on their headstones; he threw himself down in the arm-chair, and, with his head between his hands, felt like a man who found himself suddenly in a maze.

"Jonathan," that was a well-known name—it was one of the two impressed by his dying father on his mind; but the other name, "Hopeton," what connection could Fayding have with Hopeton? And yet, if there were no connection, how came it that his father's and mother's names were in this churchyard? There could not have been two Charles Domvilles, and each of them married to a Dorothy; the whole thing was a tremendous tangle and bewilderment; but the vicar could no doubt explain it all. Indeed, the whole affair of this churchyard needed explanation, the inscriptions on the other tombstones as well as those on this.

The vicar's visitor had not long to wait, for the hour was up; and the good man knocked at the door. He was himself calm and peaceful, but with another-world look upon him, more than there had been before.

The vicar gazed for a few moments silently, and with a look of unutterable interest and pity, on his guest; and then laying his hand upon his shoulder, said:—"Hear the parable of the churchyard. That grave," said the vicar, pointing to the one which had so staggered the young man, "is the grave of your father and mother. You will observe the date; on that day they died to me; and I numbered them deliberately amongst the dead. Yonder little church has no registry books; the registry of this churchyard is kept in my heart. This churchyard is the cemetery of life, hopes, and expectations—those things which died, and which for my peace I learned to bury, to put out of sight. Tell me what inscriptions you have read, and I will explain them all."

"First and foremost," said Charles Domville, "my father's and my mother's grave."

"To explain that," said the vicar, "must be to tell you also how this graveyard came into existence; no toy to please me as a child, but a substantial parable, if I might so speak, to help me as a man. We are all of us differently made; and to me, it may be, in my weakness, this has been a real help. I am the Jonathan whom your mother loved."

"But his name was Hopeton—Jonathan, it is true—but Jonathan Hopeton."

"And so was mine—my name was Hopeton; but a sister of my father's, Mrs. Elizabeth Fayding, left me the estate of Clovely Manor, on condition of my taking her name, and so I became Jonathan Fayding.

"The history of this churchyard is indeed my own; none lie buried in it but those who belong to me, or were connected in some way with me. That is how your father, as well as your mother, come to lie here.

"When I heard of your mother's marriage, I was struck down with fever, and for a long time lay between life and death; and before I might be said to be really well, she had died. It was during that long time that I made this churchyard. 'They shall be dead,' said I, 'indeed to me,' and to root it and ground it in my mind, I made this cemetery, and their grave. Lost friendship and lost love I buried there; if my mind wandered to either your father or your mother, I turned it at once to the churchyard, to death; and said, 'Buried—gone—belonging to the earth no more.'"

The young man dropped on his knees, and putting his hands together said, "Grant to the dead the forgiveness I was given a life-charge to implore."

"Take it, take it freely," said the old man, raising him up. "I have no enmity to the dead."

"And my mother!"

"As your father's wife, her grave shall be undisturbed; as anyone's wife but mine, she lies buried there."

"But herself?"

"Why should the living be sought amongst the dead? She, she herself was never dead to me. I knew I had her heart; how could I ever bury her? In unembodied love I knew I ever had her heart as she had mine. You have told me to-day more than I knew before, but I knew enough to keep me from ever laying her here. Oh, no! she lives with me every day; it is only the hope of earthly union, it is only a human friendship, which lie buried there, never to disturb me more.

"Well," said the vicar after a pause, "a little time passed on, and one day coming on the text, "Let the dead bury their dead, but go thou and preach," I thought, 'That word is for me,' and it ended in my taking orders, and becoming a curate in a place where there was so much to do, I had scarce time to think of the trial by which I had been vexed so sore. I did not allow this death to paralyse my life, but into the ministry I took with me the flesh and its ambitions; none the less the flesh—it may be, still more the flesh—because they intruded where of all other places the flesh should not come. Family, talents, interest, all led me to expect high preferment in the Church; but one hope after another perished, and one patron after another failed. They all lie buried there. They trouble me now no more. They have not even ghosts; and, if they had, those ghosts would have nothing to do with me. One by one I buried my ambitions there;" and the old vicar pointed to the graves of the Bishop, the Dean, and the Canon, all Jonathan Faydings.

"And with those," said the vicar, "I buried those three great personages—the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the First Lord of the Treasury. I had expected a bishopric from the last, and then I came down to a deanery; but my hopes were disappointed, and I buried bishopric, and deanery, and First Lord, all hard by each other; the Archbishop and the Lord Chancellor had to be buried on the same grounds. As long as I was expecting everything and anything from man, I had unrest; but when I gave all such things up, and died to them and the people connected with them, I said, 'What helped me in one death will help me in others.' I buried them; I did as should be done with the dead—I put them out of sight—and they have never turned in their graves; they have never vexed me more. I have seen that in these things 'the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong,' and that 'a man's life consisteth not in what he is called, or what he has.'

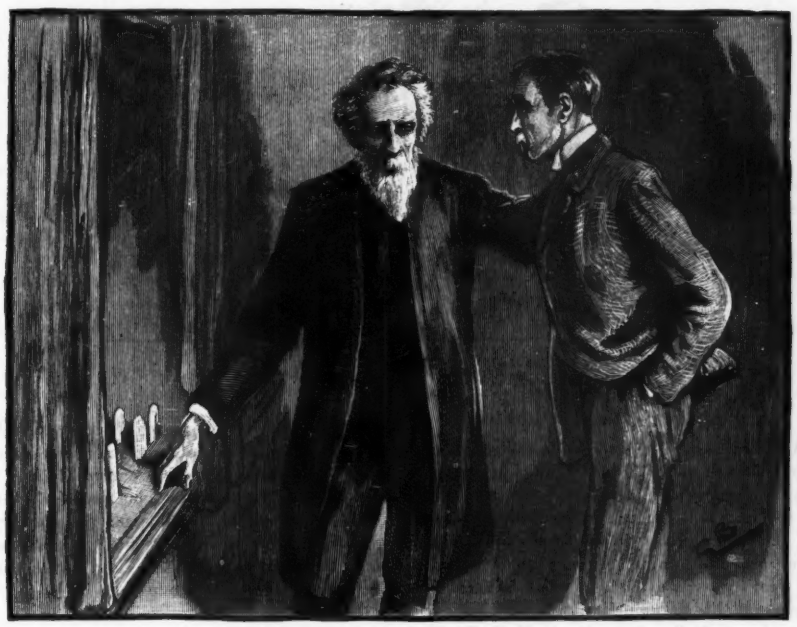
"As life wore on, I had to accept as dead—yes, and if I were to have peace, to account as dead —what you see on those stones ; and which, once put there, had no place for further disturbance in my heart. Ten thousand pounds I lost by the collapse of the firm with which it was placed. When I knew that beyond all doubt it was dead, I interred it there. Clovely Manor was taken from me by a flaw in my poor aunt's will, and there it lies ; I respected her good intentions, and kept the name she wished to have perpetuated. The last that lies buried here is 'health :' it passed away gradually ; so much so that for a long time I fought against the idea that it would go ; but its time came, and when I recognised that it was dead, I laid it reverently here."



"But can you banish all these things from your mind ?" asked the visitor.

"I can think of them as dead," says the vicar, "and thinking of them as 'the dead' does me good. They have had their relationship to my life, and they themselves have passed away. We pass through death unto new life, and that life is peace. There are hopes, there are desires, there are grievances, there are losses, there are ambitions, there are relationships which must be buried—accepted as dead—if there is to be in the heart anything of a perfect peace."

"But how can you have any brightness," asked Charles Domville, "if you are thus always a dweller amongst the tombs ?"

"But I am not always a dweller amongst the tombs," said the vicar. "Do I look as if I were ? I believe in resurrection, and life everlasting, and in the world to come. What I have sown here in corruption, I expect will rise in incorruption ; the dead hopes of earth transformed into the living realisations of heaven. Earth's losses in love, and wealth, and health, and human honours, and all that this world can give—when surrendered with a chastened will—when passed away from the fret, and cankering care of unsanctified Nature, when dead in their bodily form, can live in their essence, and in their new forms above. How they will rise, and with what body they will come, I know not ; but God will give them a body as it pleaseth Him. There is not for any man who surrenders all to the will of God, a final death to aught that is good, be it of mind, body, or estate ; it dies in form, but in essence it shall arise and live."

The vicar reverently drew the curtain across the little graveyard, and his visitor had learned the secret of the holy calm that sat upon his face. God is a God of peace, and through much tribulation we enter into the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom that is now, the Kingdom that is yet to come.

SHORT ARROWS.*

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"WHAT 'THE COUNTRY' MEANS."

THE WEATHER.

A MAN who had been complaining because it had not rained for a good while, when the rain did come then grumbled because it did not come sooner. It is the rich rather than the poor who talk of the "wretched weather," because they have fewer real sorrows to grumble at. "What wretched weather we are having!" said a man to an old woman of his acquaintance whom he passed on the road. "Well, sir," she replied, "any weather is better than none." Fuller tells us of a gentleman, travelling on a misty morning, who asked a shepherd (such men being generally skilled in the physiognomy of the heavens) what weather it would be. "It will be," said the shepherd, "what weather shall please me." Being asked to explain his meaning, he said, "Sir, it shall be what weather pleaseth God; and what weather pleaseth God, pleaseth me."

WHAT "THE COUNTRY" MEANS.*

A teacher in a London school recently asked the little ones forming her Kindergarten class to draw a tree on their slates. The children all complied with the request; but one of the mites gave even more than the teacher asked for, and drew the railings round the tree at the same time. This city child could not imagine a tree without railings round it. She was one of a large class of London children who know nothing of the pleasures of a country holiday, and whose friends cannot procure one for them unaided. Here the Children's Country Holiday Fund steps in, and we shall be glad to hear that our friends have made it possible for the managers of the Fund to teach many more little ones this season what "the country" means. Now is the time to help, while the season is young.

* Special attention is directed to the italicised note at the end of "Short Arrows," on page 640.

THE STRENGTH OF WEAKNESS.

St. Paul said, "when I am weak then am I strong," and many another has had the same experience. In fact this seems to be one of the ruling principles of our lives. Successes come, in many more cases than those in which we can discover the connecting-links, from failures, happiness from unhappiness. We learn in suffering lessons which are of use for our own future guidance or for the guidance of others. The weak do not always go to the wall. The invincible might of weakness protects them from many dangers and temptations that destroy the strong. The following little speech was made by a successful competitor for the prize in a foot-race: "Gentlemen, I won this cup by the use of my legs; I trust I may never lose the use of my legs by the use of this cup." The fact that men of great health and strength often die before weak ones, because they think that they can indulge their passions with impunity, and need not take care of themselves, justified the fear of this successful competitor.

XUM

A "QUIVER" HERO.

It is some time since the medal of The Quiver Heroes Fund was awarded for the saving of life from fire, but we are glad to note that our readers have not lost sight of this side of the Fund's work. Our attention was drawn to the following act of bravery on the part of Assistant-Superintendent Reeves, of the Southampton Fire Brigade, and we were glad to recognise such gallantry by the award of The Quiver Medal. On the night of February 6th last the brigade was called to a fire in French Street, Southampton, and by the time the firemen reached the house the flames were well in possession of the building. A cry was raised that there were children on the second floor, and the firemen reared their ladder to the windows and tried to force an entrance by breaking the old-fashioned frames in. But they were driven back by the heat and smoke, and had turned their attention to the floor below, when Assistant-Superintendent Reeves determined to make another effort to reach the imprisoned little ones as speedily as possible. He mounted the ladder, and, although he was overcome by the smoke when he first entered the room, succeeded in bringing out one of the children. Unfortunately this child afterwards died from the shock, and her two companions both perished in the burning building, as the gallant fireman was too much exhausted to make a second visit to the room, and his comrades did not succeed in making their way into it in time to do more than recover the burned bodies.

MORAL COSMETICS.

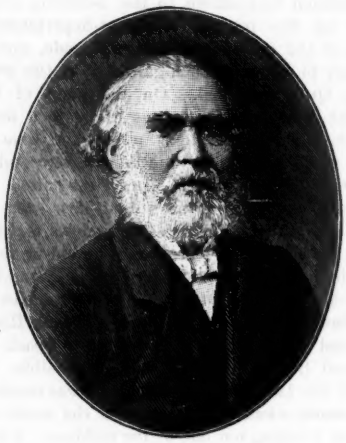
No cosmetics are so capable of enhancing beauty as the smile of good-temper, and a desire to please. On the other hand, even small-pox is not as great a foe to beauty as sin. We quite agree with Mr. G. Richmond, R.A., when he says that every man makes his own face.

IDOLS AT THE PAWN-SHOP.

A missionary in China tells the following story :—"I want to send home, among other 'curios,' some idols that have been actually used in worship," said a traveller we lately met in China. "Can you help me in the matter?"—"Hardly, I fear," was the reply. "I never heard of priests or people selling such articles." But next day, wending our way through the streets of the native city of Shanghai to our Mission Church, we bethought us to make inquiry on our friend's behalf at a shop where we had often stopped to survey the hideous deities of wood and plaster arrayed in the open window front, and to watch the manufacture of such images going on within. To our surprise a good supply of second-hand images was produced for our inspection. "How do you get these?" we asked.—"The people, when they are in want of food, bring them here to pawn." What a startling supplement, we thought, to the prophet's splendid satire on the idolator of his own day! "He heweth wood and kindleth it and warmeth himself, and baketh bread and roasteth meat; and the residue of his fuel he maketh a god; he boweth down to it;" and then, when he lacks bread to bake and meat to roast on his firewood, he takes the god made from its refuse, and raises therewith a few copper coins. Is there any limit to the reason-blinding power of the god of this world? Truly, were not the God we serve the Light- and Sight-giver, our service in this heathen land were hopeless.

THE WORTH OF FRESH AIR.

A humorous writer remarks of a certain locality that the advantage, if you go there for change of air, consists in the fact that you can cut off a portion and bring it home with you. Very strong likewise is the atmosphere at times in the experience of those who go in late to meetings; they certainly pay the penalty of unpunctuality in a feeling of heaviness and oppression that seems to pervade the building. "Never be late for service" is good advice, but worshippers may have been wanted elsewhere, and cannot always control their time. Entering amid the throng, they recognise the lack of pure air; but, whether realised or not, that want is harming very many, and detracting from the good wrought by the service. A medical contemporary points out that we must not too hastily blame the preacher, if drowsiness overcomes us in church—this may be after all a question of ventilation. The atmosphere is close and oppressive, and preacher and hearers alike suffer for want of God's free gift of pure air. We know a good lady who makes it her mission to tarry after Sunday-school is over to ventilate the place more thoroughly and renew the air. There are some who appear to possess a holy horror of fresh air in schools and churches, but when thoughtful care secures it to the exclusion of draughts, spirit and body are undoubtedly helped, and headache and weariness are prevented. "We are inclined," says the medical authority to whom we have referred, "to advocate, in winter, the admission of fresh air warmed by contact with hot-water coils beneath gratings in the floor, and numerous exhaust ventilators in the roof, provided with rings of gas-jets to keep up the temperature of the escaping air." In summer it is advised that the exhaust ventilators should still be used, fresh air being admitted by revolving panes in the windows, so as to secure an upward direction. Take care that the foul and injurious air escapes, take care that pure air is supplied without subjecting the assembly to draughts, and the services must certainly be brighter and more helpful, and congregational naps become "beautifully less."



NEW BOOKS FOR BUSY WORKERS.

We hear much in these days of the effect of "modern critical research" upon the study of the Bible, and some of our friends have taken alarm at what they have supposed to be the result of this criticism. Let them turn to the "Lesson in Biblical Criticism" which the Rev. J. Paterson Smyth, of Kingstown, offers them in his most interesting work on "The Old Documents and the New Bible" (S. Bagster and Sons, Limited), and they may be reassured. They may learn how, in the case of the Old Testament, the manuscripts of the Scriptures were preserved, and how the Jews were taught to read and interpret them, as well as the quarters from which errors of copying and the like are most likely to have come. The lesson is a most valuable one, and it is one that cannot but make us even more thankful for the open Bible which has come down to us by so many wonderfully ordered steps. A companion volume on the New Testament is promised.—"Rescuers and Rescued" is the title the Rev. James Wells, M.A., of Glasgow, gives to a volume of "Experiences among our City Poor," just published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. If there are any of our readers who are downcast because they see no fruit as the result of their diligent sowing, let them turn to Mr. Wells's book and read the instances there recorded of God's wondrous power and grace. And in the light of the author's clear testimony let them take fresh heart, as well they may.—In "Sweet Home" (J. Nisbet and Co.) we have a series of earnest chapters by the Rev. J. B. Figgis, M.A., of Brighton, on "Home, and the Way from Home to Heaven." Volumes have been, and might still be, written on the influences for good or evil of home, and no apology is needed for any thoughtful consideration, like this, of the subject. The keynote may be guessed from the beautiful dedication of the volume "to the memory of my mother and the 'Sweet Home' of my childhood." May this volume help to make hundreds and thousands of homes sweet, in the highest sense, in that they are gates on the way to Heaven. We are reminded of another sense in which homes should be "sweet" by Dr. B. W. Richardson's admirable condensation of a more elaborate work, by Sir E. Chadwick, K.C.B., under the title of "National Health" (Longmans.) For many years Sir E. Chadwick has been among the foremost experts in the land on this subject, and we heartily commend to all workers among the poor this excellent précis of his teaching. There are some chapters in the section on "Health in the School" that all Sunday-school officers ought to see and study carefully.

THE FRENCH COLONY IN LONDON.

M. Barbier's evangelistic work among the poor French in the neighbourhood of Soho has gone on steadily for about twenty-two years; the chapel and Sunday-school are in Portland Street, and in this school more than a thousand children (most of them belonging to Roman Catholic parents) have been instructed in the truths of the Bible. There is also a day-school, which has become an important part of the mission, and young foreign girls seeking situations as governesses or maids, are received in a Home under the immediate care of Madame Barbier. The employment agency has been a help to many in difficulty. Bibles and Testaments are freely distributed among the French in London by post; and among the young foreigners who are scattered all over Great Britain and the Colonies, this mission circulates a Gospel paper, L'Ami de la Maison, which has been a help and blessing to several who once attended the services. Amid the "French Colony" are many who have renounced Romish doctrines, but reject all that is Protestant; many refuse all religious ideas; yet from these ranks souls have been won, and the open-air preaching has been the means of reaching numbers who would never trouble themselves to enter a place of worship. "Think," says M. Barbier, "of these poor Frenchmen and Belgians in a foreign land, destitute in body and soul; our work is essentially a missionary one. We depend upon the help of our brethren and sisters in the work the Lord gives us to do in this great city."

THE TASK WAS HIS OWN.

The desire to get wealth may easily become a numbing power in the life, affecting every form of Christian work. It has often proved so with the men who have migrated west, and ever farther west, in the new lands of America. Some time since there was a minister who went with the tide. He left his people and changed his occupation. Instead of testifying of eternal righteousness and infinite mercy, he gave all his care to money-making. But though he prospered, he was not happy. The sharp prick of conscience was in his soul. Years passed, and the old peace did not return. Here, on the edge of the wilderness, was a sad famine of all provision for the spiritual needs of the people. The settlers themselves came to feel a want. One day the minister was standing at his gate, looking moodily out on a fair prospect. There was about him no mark of the preacher. His true calling was not known in the district. He saw two men coming down the track past his "lot." They stopped and asked a curious question. Could he direct them to a minister? The longing to receive Christian instruction had become too imperious to be denied. These men were a search deputation. It was a touching story they told. A light came on the listener's face. Was it not his Lord's gentle, forgiving summons to neglected work? He would forsake everything and obey. Very humbly he made answer, "I think, friends, the task is my own." He went with the messengers and did high and holy service. And if we are conscious of some duty evaded, some labour left unfulfilled, we too may rest assured that joy waits on frankly admitting in word and deed, "The task is my own."

THE PUNISHMENT OF UNDUTIFUL CHILDREN

is to have undutiful children. A man complained that never father had so undutiful a child as he had. "Yes," said his son, "my grandfather had."

FOR COASTGUARDS.

A kindly and helpful work has been arranged on behalf of our British Coastguards, many of whom lead isolated lives, and need all the cheer and the good influences that Christian correspondence and healthy literature can effect. Now and then appreciative visitors like to seek out, amid their travels, the picturesque-looking guardians of our shores, and to listen to stories of the sea that inspire the young with a longing to become Coastguards themselves, and pace the cliff-path at night to the music of the waves. The summer brings stray largesse at times to the Coastguard, admiring comments as to his spotless abode, sociable chats with tourists, sunshine across boat-house, rocks, and sands; the bright side of his life is visible then. The post of trust is valued by the seaman who has spent year after year on the changeful waters; home and home love are dear to him. "It's something to eat a good dinner cooked by one's wife!" remarked a Coastguard of our acquaintance once, sitting down amid snow-white surroundings, and watching the deft manufacture of an apple-tart. But the circumstances of Coastguards vary, and there is loneliness enough in their career to arouse the wish in Christian hearts that all should be supplied, on an organised plan, with tracts and Gospel papers in a monthly packet. There are bright, wholesome, attractive periodicals that set forth the way of salvation, the beauty of holiness, the things concerning righteousness, faithfully and earnestly; this mission would fain spread such among the Coastguards. Occasional letters of friendship and Christian counsel are also desirable, and highly valued by those who receive them. Those who, through personal knowledge of the Master, are longing to reveal Him to others, have here a field of wide and useful effort, and their labours will brighten many a home, fill lonely hours with helpful thoughts, and, above all, echo the Saviour's call in all its fulness of strength and comfort to the sentinels around our shores.

A CRY FROM AFAR.

The opium question is one over which controversy has now been waged for many years. The members of our various Christian Churches are probably almost unanimous in their view of it, regarding the trade in opium with intense abhorrence, holding that the drug is destructive to the body and soul of the man who indulges in it, and holding, further, that our country is responsible for having forced it upon China in what is familiarly known as the Opium War. There are persons, indeed—and persons whose opinions are likely to weigh with successive Secretaries for India and other Government officials—who deny this view, maintaining that the opium habit does not tend to excess, and that the moderate use of the drug is not only not pernicious, but positively beneficial. They deny also the responsibility of England in the matter, on the grounds that opium was used in China before its importation by the East India Company, and that of the opium used in China to-day, the larger proportion is native-grown. But neither the clerical nor the medical missionaries (who have a great number of opium patients passing through the hospitals every year) have been able to acquiesce in this more favourable estimate. These live in touch with the people as no other foreigners can, whether consuls or merchants; and that this feeling accords with the feeling of the Chinese themselves is shown by the contents of a letter or memorial recently received from representatives of the Churches in Canton. This memorial is signed by fourteen Chinese Christians, belonging to six different missions representing 2,430 native communicants, and appeals to British Christians "to combine their strength in devising some efficient means to remove this curse of opium." As the accompanying English translation reads: "Our hope is that your Christians will with one heart exert themselves without regard to profit or loss, and be enabled to abolish opium, that the Chinese may be released from the yoke of bondage, and the obstacles to the preaching of the Gospel be removed." The memorialists affirm that "the calamities that opium brings are numberless," and proceed to enumerate some of them. The consideration to which most weight is evidently attached by them, and to which most weight ought to be attached by the English Churches addressed, both because of its gravity and because it is a matter the writers are most competent to judge, is the hindrance that the opium traffic places in the way of the spread of the Gospel. Rightly or wrongly, the Chinese associate together the opium merchant and the missionary. They are both British subjects, and the evil traced to the one throws suspicion on the intentions of the other. Moreover, the prejudice thus created against the missionary is the greater from the fact that the trader is not an individual who, though of the same nationality as the missionary, may be disowned by him, but a British Government, with which, in the Chinese mind, the British missionary cannot but be associated. These Cantonese memorialists urge upon us not only that the work of our missionaries is being hindered by the action of our Indian Government, but that our own character at home is touched. Very pointedly they ask: "Now, when your Government plants and sells opium to minister to the evil propensities of the Chinese, you are partakers with them; and what can you say in excuse thereof?"

"'I could tell her all about the flowers.'"—p. 638.

Lord Hartington, in a speech made in the House some years ago, when he was Secretary for India, after giving "some of the reasons why the House should not readily conclude that the importation of opium from India to China is an unmixed evil, or that the Indian Government, by sacrificing a large amount of revenue, would do any good whatever to the population of China," added: "But I am quite ready to admit that the Government of India is, in the circumstances of the traffic, placed in a somewhat invidious and false position. The Indian Government are, as regards Bengal, manufacturers and dealers in a drug which, though not universally abused, is capable of abuse. I think that a great deal of the objection entertained in this country to this source of revenue is owing to that circumstance."

THE BIBLE FLOWER MISSION.

This society has for its object the spread of Scriptural messages, and the visitation of hospital and infirmary patients, with a gift of flowers, to which a text is attached. Lavender-bags are sometimes presented, and ivies, mosses, grasses, ferns, small cones, acorns, or their empty cups, can all be utilised. This mission may be helped by cultivating suitable flowers, ornamental grasses, or "everlastings," writing texts, making bags, etc. In last year's report several interesting cases of help and blessing by means of the "voiceless lips" of flowers are thankfully recorded. "Shall I read the text?" asked a City missionary, as he offered a bunch of flowers to an infidel lecturer. The sick man said, rather ungraciously, "You can, if you like." He made similar responses on future visits; but the words of Scripture and the visitor's kindness at last touched his soul, and he is now restored and preaching the Gospel. We heard recently of a gardener who lay ill in one of the London hospitals, and was greatly cheered by the gift of a smiling posy and the kindness of the giver. "She stayed talking with me quite a long time," he proudly told his relatives, "for I could tell her all about the flowers, and every one of their names, seeing I've been among flowers so long." Sometimes we feel too low and weak for the ministry of our fellow-creatures; what so restful and comforting then as the Lord's own words brought home to the heart by the sweet, tender faces of the flowers!

A DEAF-MUTE'S ANSWER.

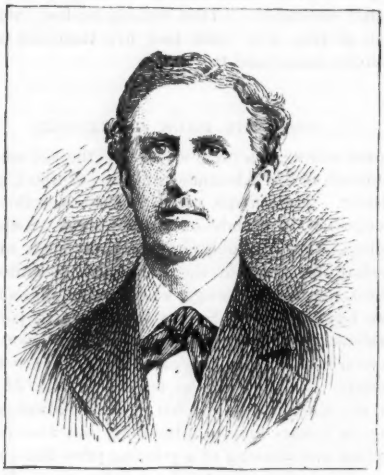
A somewhat strange question was, we have heard, asked by a gentleman not so very long ago at a school for teaching deaf-and-dumb children. "Why," wrote he on the blackboard, "Why did God make you deaf-and-dumb?" An added silence—if we may so express it—fell on these silent children—a silence probably of surprise at the question, and of ignorance as to the answer; till one little lad stepped up to the board and wrote—"Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in Thy sight!" The answer was surely of the very essence of childlike faith, and also of that wise and cheerful philosophy which resigns itself to the inevitable, and seeks to make the best of irremovable trials and difficulties.

AN UNANSWERED QUESTION.

We read once of a Christian man who was conversing with a sceptic, and who asked the question why it should so greatly shock society when a religious man falls into sin, while it excites little or no surprise for an unbeliever to transgress? The scoffer, who had been dwelling on the imperfections of professing Christians, was drawn into the admission that it was expected of believers that they should be holy. "Don't you see," said the other, "you are admitting Christianity to be a holy religion, and thus paying it the highest compliment in your power?" The sceptic could not reply; his very indignation against the inconsistency of believers was turned into praise for the religion which is good and pure, and claims truth and righteousness in its followers. Everyone cries out when a Christian falls. Praise be to God! there is no need whatever to stumble by the way, seeing He can keep us from falling, and present us faultless before the Everlasting Throne.

EAT SLOWLY.

Africius wished for the neck of a stork, so that he might enjoy his dinner longer. Without changing necks, we could get greater enjoyment and nourishment out of our food by simply eating more slowly. And it would do us more good—if, at least, Mr. Gladstone is right in attributing his success in life to a habit, acquired early, of biting forty times each bit of food. We commend the following to those who lately discussed in some of the papers whether our soldiers had enough to eat. Macaulay tells us that a man named Rumford proposed to the Elector of Bavaria a scheme for feeding his soldiers at a much cheaper rate. His plan was simply to compel them to masticate their food thoroughly. A small quantity, thus eaten, would, according to that famous projector, afford more sustenance than a large meal hastily devoured. "That nothing be lost" was the wish of Him who could feed five thousand people with five loaves and two fishes.



FROM THE DARK CONTINENT.

Just as we go to press we receive the sad news of the death of Mr. Alexander Mackay, of the Uganda Mission. The portrait which accompanies this note is engraved, by permission of the Church Missionary Society, from the only known photograph of Mr. Mackay, taken about the time when he sailed for Africa, fourteen years ago, when Mr. Stanley's letter from Uganda led the Society to send out a party of missionaries to Mtesa's subjects. Mr. Mackay was by profession an engineer, and turned his great mechanical skill to excellent service for the Mission and for King Mtesa and his successor Mwanga not only in house- and boat-building, but also in the erection and working of a printing press that proved a most valuable ally to the missionaries. It was Mr. Mackay who sent to Europe the news of Emin Pasha's position which led to the despatch of Mr. Stanley and his expedition to the relief of the beleaguered governor of the Equatorial Province, and it was to him also that we owe the recovery of Bishop Hannington's last diary. Mr. Mackay first reached Uganda, after many delays, in December, 1878, and there he lived and laboured until July, 1887, when (as his comrade, Mr. Ashe, tells in his admirable "Two Kings of Uganda") the missionaries were driven out of the country by the opposition of the slave-trading Arabs. Mr. Mackay retired, with his friends, to the south of Lake Victoria Nyanza, and there, it is supposed, he died of fever in February last. Any reader of Mr. Ashe's book will know how great is the loss which the removal of Mr. Mackay causes to this most enterprising Mission. God grant that the example of the noble martyr life and death of this hero of the Cross may stimulate others to follow in his steps—

Some idea of the dangers which beset the missionaries in Central Africa may be gathered from Professor Henry Drummond's "Travel Sketches in our New Protectorate," which, under the title of "Nyassaland," Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have just published. The little work consists of chapters reprinted from the same author's "Tropical Africa," and in its present handy form should prove useful to many readers who cannot procure the more expensive volume. In another work issued by the same publishers, "The New World of Central Africa," Mrs. Grattan Guinness tells once more the stirring story of the Livingstone Inland Mission. Alas! Mr. Mackay's is not the only bright young life that has been sacrificed in the wilds of tropical Africa. But how grand is the heroic spirit which animates one and all of the labourers whose tale of service is here told! The story Mrs. Grattan Guinness tells is one that should be read in every Christian circle, for if it tells of the discouragements and the checks of the past, it tells us also of the work of the present and the hope for the future.

CHAPTER I.

THEODORA.

"So tired, so tired, my heart and I!"—Mrs. Browning.

"NO letter to-day, Miss Theodora."

Theodora went wearily out of the tiny post-office, and down the village street. The villagers liked to see her pass, she was so certain to have a smile and a kind word for each of them. The women worshipped her, the children idolised her, and even the rough men and boys were less rough and uncouth while she spoke with them. They knew the sweetness of her smile, and the gentle patience with which she bore with them, and helped them. Whoever else forgot them, Miss Theodora never did. She never confused their histories one with the other; she always knew whose lad it was who had got into trouble poaching, and whose boy was the pride and joy of his parents' heart; she never asked one old lady after the pains and aches specially appertaining to another; she knew all about them, and carried her share of their every sorrow. Wherever sickness came, or want, there too came Theodora Holbrook, her very presence bringing help, and comfort, and light.

To-day, however, she did not stop upon her way to speak or smile, and the villagers, watching her go by in her soft grey floating draperies, did not guess that there were tears in the brown eyes usually so calm and bright. Long years of pain had graven very patient lines about her mouth, but nothing had ever seemed to dim the dewy softness of those wonderful brown eyes. The light in them was like the light in some precious stone: inherent, not affected by environment or circumstance; but to-day they were dim and heavy, and the long dark lashes were down-drooped to hide the hot tears of disappointment that would come, despite her best efforts.

She walked steadily on, leaving behind the little red houses and the great grey old church.

The open country was not very beautiful just about here. It was flat and colourless, the road bordered with rows of Scotch firs. On this still, grey day the distant outlines were blurred and dim, the clouds lay low, the brook in the copse beyond the meadow murmured sullenly, the birds only feebly chirped now and again as they flitted across the road: all Nature seemed to have paused and swooned.

When she reached the open country she sat down by the wayside, for she was weary physically as well as mentally. Across the meadow the larches on the rising ground beyond the brook lifted their yellow branches against the lowering sky. On a fine day, even this flat unlovely country did possess its own glory; the river's song would be all of life and laughter; the birds would sing; mayhap a lark would mount up, full-throated, just above where she sat now, and pour its ecstasy out in thrilling song; the rooks would sail and caw in long lines across the sky; the rabbits would scud in the open with a whisk of white tail, and disappear; there would be life all round: life upon tree and field and river, instead of this dumb, depressing, death-like stillness.

It was her birthday, and no letter from Harold; this was no cogent reason for the depression she felt, but it relieved her over-charged heart and over-wearied frame to sit there in the stillness and weep.

No one at home had remembered that this was her birthday: not even her mother; nor the children, whose birthdays she never forgot. She realised forcibly how irretrievably gone was youth; whatever the future might hold for her in store, this much, at least, was certain. She might be happy, she might be contented, she might be free from the cares which now beset her; this wretched, baffled, thwarted existence might glide into the past, where so many happy days had vanished, but never, never could she be young again. Youth, with its dreams and hopes, its perennial springs of joy, its charming illusions, was gone. For many years now she had stared the hard facts of life in the face, and she was twenty-five to-day. She had never wished for riches, or position, or influence; she had only wished to be loved. First her father's love—and he had gone away into the great silence so many years ago; her mother's love she had never possessed. And Harold? He was in far Australia, working as his father's son ought not to have to work; what was his love to her? And once, when she too was young, and believed, as young things always do, that surely happiness was to be her lot, another love had come to her. Hearts had met, though lips were silent: and—why she never knew, though never did she mistrust him or doubt his truth—he had gone away.

It is a dreadful thing to be tired of life when one is only twenty-five. And Theodora was honestly and heartily sick of hers. It was with her no ephemeral passion of discontent, which would pass when the sun shone and the skies overhead were blue. She had a pain in her heart the whole day through, from the moment when she opened her eyes in her little attic under the roof, until late at night, when she went wearily back there. She, who so seldom wept, now wept strongly, every tear like a separate drop of purest pain wrung from her heart; she was so weary of life; sick of the years that came and went, and brought no good thing; sick of the sordid, narrow, jarring home life; weary of the clamour of the children, and the mother's peevishness and the father's coarse vulgarity; weary of the insolence of servants, and the hard words of creditors; weary of the bickerings and the lovelessness; weary of the great and real sorrows; and oh! how pathetically weary of the thousand and one little daily pinpricks. She saw no good in anything to-day; no gleam of brightness anywhere. Not trees, nor skies, nor running water could charm her, nor the pale primroses beginning to bloom along the hedgerows. So often she had with loving eyes watched Nature unfold, so long she had listened to that brook singing on its way to the river, so many times the trees had lit into tender vivid green before her eyes, in so many springs she had watched the chestnuts unfurl their wide green fans, dropping the pink silvery husks upon the meadow grass below, so often she had seen those fruit-trees yonder blush with the fulness of their blossom, and the flowers all around come and bloom and pass, and the foliage of how many Septembers crimson and tremble and fall when the wild winds rose and blew hither and thither. To all things the years brought life and the fulfilment of life. And to her? Nothing.

At the present moment, however, something was coming to Theodora. A high-stepping bay mare under a doctor's gig was swiftly traversing the high road from the village, and in the doctor's gig, driving the bay mare, was a young man. Theodora heard the wheels, and sprang to her feet, earnestly hoping her eyes were not obtrusively swollen or her nose very remarkably red. With what dignity she could command—and Theodora was very tall and very stately—she began walking along the road towards the village, making a gallant pretence of gathering primroses as she walked.

"It is Dr. Harden," she thought, stooping for the sparse pale blooms which here and there peeped out.

The next moment the driver of the gig, recognising the figure of the primrose-gatherer, drew rein with an exclamation of pleasure, not unmingled with surprise.

"Why, it's Miss Holbrook!" he exclaimed; and Theodora had to raise her eyes perforce to his. It was not the old doctor, with his keen shrewd face, but William, the doctor's only son, the pride, and prize, and joy of his home. William sat staring at her, as if he could by no means account for her presence. The mere sight of Theodora generally did deprive William of the few wits Nature had endowed him with. Miss Holbrook did not care that he should know that she had been crying, so she toyed with the primroses in her hand, and awaited further development of the situation and of William's genius for conversation.

"So there you are?" he remarked, with a grave pride in the discovery not unworthy of a second Stanley.

"Yes," said Theodora, "here I am."

She did not feel called upon to enlarge upon so very evident a fact.

William sat and gazed upon her from his exalted perch.

"I am driving father's trap," he next remarked.

"So I see," said Theodora; and forthwith another abyss of silence yawned.

William smiled at her laconic response, and seemed to imagine that the conversation was really getting on very well.

"You're gathering flowers?" was the next luminous remark his powers of observation suggested to him.

"Yes," she replied, and laughed as she looked up.

She wondered how soon William would get through his list of announcements, and leave her in peace. If this went on much longer, he would soon tell her that this was the fifth of April, that the season was backward, that the wind was in the east, or perhaps that Queen Anne was dead.

But William said none of these things. On the contrary, William's next remark surprised her very much indeed. William was rather a genius in that slow way of his; at least, he was most alarmingly veracious, and always spoke the thing he thought, which—good and lovely as is the truth—is not ever and always an advisable proceeding. And so Theodora was not a little disconcerted when William proceeded to inform her, "You've been crying."

"Yes," said Theodora, "I have."

"You shouldn't," said William earnestly. "You'll spoil your eyes, and that would be a pity—they are so pretty."

Theodora looked at him with grave reproach.

"You must not talk like that, Mr. Harden. I do not like it. It is silly."

William flicked his whip absently.

"Whether I'm silly or not, Miss Holbrook," he said, his voice brimful of honest meaning, "I do wish you would not cry. It makes me quite unhappy only to think of it; and what must it be to you to do it?"

"Oh, but it does me good" she replied lightly.

"But I don't like it. Why should you do it? If anything frets you, can't you come and tell mother? She loves you as if you were her own daughter."

And William blushed to the roots of his hair; but Theodora did not see—she was still arranging and re-arranging her primroses.

"What do you cry about, anyhow?" he asked, as she made no reply.

"Oh, hundreds of thousands of things! Chiefly because I want plum-cake, and get nothing but stale bread."

"Cake!" cried William, thoroughly mystified, as perhaps naughty Theodora meant he should be. "And stale bread! Why don't you speak to the baker, if he brings it stale?"

Theodora threw back her head and laughed. Another man would have been offended, but not so William; he was thoroughly gratified to hear her laugh. A smile spread itself in response over his wide face.

"That's better. I like to hear you laugh," he said.

"I beg your pardon," she said; "I was talking nonsense. I talk nonsense very often, though you might never suppose it; I do it with such gravity."

"Whatever you do, I like," said William decisively, closing the discussion upon that head. "Mother is making cake to-day. She never makes plum-cake, though; she says it is not wholesome."

"She is right, I am sure," said Theodora.

William wondered if he had said anything witty without knowing, Theodora's eyes were so bright.

William Harden was not beautiful: in fact, one could call him downright ugly without being libellous. He was a big young man, square-shouldered and raw-boned. At least, I suppose his bones were not rawer than other people's, but when bones obtrude themselves upon public notice in the way William's did, it appears to be the usual thing to call them raw. His nose was remarkably long and remarkably red, going off to violet at the tip. His hair was a brilliant red, so were his eyes, and his large flat hands were as red as they could be. And when Theodora smiled, he did not know the reason, but he liked her to smile, all the same.

"I am going to fetch my father from Hinkley. Will you come?" he asked. "Father was sent for there for a consultation. Things are so upset in consequence. Here am I driving out, instead of studying my three hours. And my mother is making cakes in the afternoon—a thing she never does."

"A general upheaval of everything," said Theodora. "How glad you must be! What I most dislike in life is its monotony."

William looked alarmed at this revolutionary speech. "I never feel like that," he said. "I like things always the same. Then you don't get puzzled. When you know just straight along all day what you have to do, it's far easier than having to ask every minute. But will you come to Hinkley?"

Theodora would have liked the drive in the swift keen air very well, but she hesitated. It was time for her to go home and get the children's tea. But her letter would probably be at Hinkley, and she would dearly love to go and fetch it.

"No, thank you," she said at length; and William drove away alone.

Late in the evening, when the younger children had gone to bed, Theodora sat by the window of the room popularly known as the schoolroom. The elder children were romping in the hall—proof sufficient that the master was out. A shadow fell across the work she was bending over, and she looked up in alarm. She beheld William Harden just going out at the little gateway which gave upon the street. He saw her as he turned to close the gate after him, and pointed towards the window. She saw on the sill a parcel in white paper lying there. She took it in. It was square, and soft, and warm, and a note in William's straggling hand announced:—

"This is a sponge cake. I am sorry it is not plum, but mother never makes any. The letter I got at Hinkley. "W. H."

The letter—joy of joys—was Harold's missing birthday one. He had never failed to write to her for her birthday, and, dear old boy! he had not failed this time. It had been the postman's fault, not his.

CHAPTER II.

LITTLE BETH.

"Of all things in the world, a great heart in a small house is that which touches me the most."—Lacordaire.

The schoolroom was in a condition of the wildest clamour. All the children were piled up one upon the other in the sole window the room possessed, looking out. In vain Theodora, by the table, called to them to return to their tasks.

"We can't come. We must see the start. The Clockwork Family is about to take its daily drive abroad, and we must see," replied the eldest girl gleefully.

"I think you have seen the sight quite often enough," said Theodora.

"'Time cannot wither nor custom stale its infinite variety,'" said Alfred, looking up from his books. He alone, of all the youthful Ansleys, paid any heed to Theodora.

"Here comes Mrs. Harden and the grey shawl," shouted Vincent.

"And here is sweet William," giggled Maggie, the second girl, with her chin sharply perched upon Vincent's shoulder.

"And he's blushing. He knows Theo is looking at him," cried another.

"But she is not," put in Alfred from the table.

"But he thinks she is, so it's all the same. He thinks she's spying through a hole in the curtain," said Polly.

"There are a good many holes in our curtains," said Maggie, contemplating one; while Vincent seized the other, and ran as far into the room as its length would permit. Then, with a wrench, he dislocated two of its feeble attachments to the pole, and rushed to the window again.

Theodora went on correcting Vincent's Latin themes. It seemed sometimes as if Vincent deliberately went wrong: either that, or his genius for mistakes was superhuman. Presently the children came, dropping back reluctantly, one by one, to their tasks—Vincent to frown over the long scores drawn by Theodora's pencil through the absurdities of composition and spelling he had indulged in; Maggie to grumble audibly because half of her drawing had to be rubbed out and done in again; Polly to crumple her white brows over a piece of French translation; little Alice, the pet, whose lessons were done, to draw "ladies" with blue and red pencils in an old copy-book of Alfred's—such wonderful "ladies," the like of which were never seen on sea or land, such mincing mouths they had, and such pointed toes, and tightened waists. The little one sat absorbed, and Theodora smiled at the pretty picture she made, with flushing cheeks and the mane of golden hair falling forward to the table.

"William is coming here to tea to-night," remarked Margaret presently.

"Yes," replied Polly. "I saw a stern resolve to do so legibly expressed in that very remarkable nose of his."

Theodora looked up from her book.

"Does your head ache, Theo?" asked little Alice lovingly.

"No, dear. But, Maggie and Polly, I do not like to hear you continually mock and gibe at William Harden as you do. There is really nothing at all funny in it, and it is rather vulgar."

A dead silence, and all the eyes in the room fixed on her brought a slight flush to Theodora's face. Before she could continue with her little elder-sisterly speech, the audience burst into a roar of unlimited laughter.

"Yes, I mean it," said Theodora, lifting her voice above the tumult. "It is wrong and unkind to mock him as you do. It is a thoroughly mean thing to receive kindness at anyone's hands, and then ridicule that person. William has been very kind to every-one of you. What is there to laugh at in him!"

"His nose."

"His eyes."

"His hands."

"The way he coughs."

"How he blushes when he looks at you."

"He's such a goose, take him for all in all."

"Such a duffer—can't ride, or skate, or shoot, or anything."

"He's a silly old thing. Offering me dolls and things."

And at this seven-year-old verdict, even Theodora, who was doing her best to look solemn, had to smile. William had grievously offended Alice the last time he returned from London by the gift of a waxen doll, fit for a baby of five years, perhaps, but not a suitable offering to make to a lady of her mature years.

An idea dawned upon the audience. It originated in Maggie's romantic brain, and Polly, who read surreptitious penny-dreadfuls, was quick to receive it. The blunter masculine mind did not all at once grasp it, but when it did it spoke out with truly masculine directness.

"I believe you're soft on William," said Alfred, looking wonderingly at his sister's fair flushing face, and the eager light in her brown eyes.

"If you mean by that that I like William," she said, looking at him in a way which made him feel rather ashamed of himself, "you are quite right."

"She likes him!" murmured the astonished crowd.

"We'll have a wedding in the family directly," cried Polly, getting up, and executing a war-dance round the table.

"Theodora Harden—Theodora Harden!" chanted the little boys, as they also jumped and pranced.

"Oh, that will never do," cried Maggie; "for you know, 'To change the name and not the letter, is to change for worse, and not for better.'"

"'For I'm to be married to-day, to-day!'" sang Polly, still dancing.

"To-day, to-day!" shrieked the small boys, only too glad to make a row.

Theodora had fairly brought the house about her ears, and she laughed merrily.

"Think of his nose, Theo!" implored Maggie.

"I don't mind his nose," said Theodora, standing up. "I know other people whose noses are very straight and handsome, and yet who are not half so kind and tender to poor sick weak people as William Harden always is. And if he is ugly, he has a very beautiful heart, and for that I like him."

And then the bell rang for dinner, and the children ran away.

Theodora put the place straight, tidied the rumpled carpet, pulled the inky tablecloth into place, and made up the fire. Then she went up-stairs to fetch down little Beth.

Poor little Beth! how still she lay, and how waxen-white was the small face, when Theodora gently placed her on the old schoolroom sofa, which the boys often grumblingly said was as hard as the nether millstone. The child was blue and wan with cold, for there were no fires permitted except in the drawing-room and the schoolroom. And when Beth's head ached she could not endure the noise and racket of the schoolroom—at least, so the loving elder sister fancied. If the child did suffer from the clamour her brethren raised about her couch, none could tell. Little Beth could not speak—had never spoken—for in some mysterious way she had been paralysed from babyhood —never spoken with her lips, but the great mournful dark eyes had spoken straight to Theodora's heart. Those dark sad eyes asked questions which no one could answer—told of pain silently endured, pain which no love could reach or relieve. And piteously, it seemed to Theodora, they prayed for release, wondering what all this suffering meant. If she could have wept and wailed and struggled like other children, it would not have been so pitiful; but this pathetic unbroken silence, and the mute pain which was never to be told, was sad in the uttermost. Theodora never could tell if all her efforts helped or hurt the child, nor if she soothed the pain in any smallest degree. She had tried everything that tenderness could devise, and yet she knew that within that little fragile frame was torture she could never reach, nor could she ever answer the questioning of the wild suffering eyes. Beth was Alice's twin—Alice, the little dancing, radiant fairy, with blue eyes always smiling, and laughter for ever bubbling from her rosy lips, the picture of health and grace; her mother's pride, and the only one the father's roughness spared. And Beth, a forlorn little cripple, all the young life passing over in unfathomable mists of pain—pale lips that never smiled, wan eyes that did not weep, shadows that lay deep about the pallid brow and lips. A hideous child, the mother said, looking from her to Alice; and yet Beth's little face was not plain—to Theodora it shone at times as the face of an imprisoned angel.

The door opened, and Mr. Ansley walked in. After one glance at his face, Miss Holbrook laid the child on the sofa, and stood up, facing him.

"Do you suppose I am going to touch the child?" he said savagely.

Theodora folded her hands together and made no reply, for he had been drinking. The pretty pink colour faded from the girl's face; but it was disgust, not fear, that she felt, as she stood motionless by little Beth's sofa.

"The child is my own child," he went on in his savage blustering way. "I needn't let you be with her, or have the care of her, except I choose."

Still Theodora held her peace. She seemed frozen into stone. She was no longer the tender, loving, breathing woman who had bent above the child, but a statue, cold and repellent, her eyes stern, her lips unsmiling. This man's blustering ways and rude speeches never touched his step-daughter. He felt this, and fumed at the knowledge. He knew he had no power over her, that she alone of all his household stood apart, untouched by his influence. She did not care one whit if he smiled, or shrink if he stormed. She was as far above him as the sunset clouds or the stars in the midnight sky. Presently he remembered with what object he had sought her, and his manner abruptly changed.

"But indeed, Theodora, you wear yourself out with the child," he began, altering his voice and manner. "She can't want all the attendance you give her, though I am sure it is very good of you."

He walked across the room, and stood at the window, looking out, his hands buried deep in his pockets. An April shower was falling, the raindrops raced down the window-panes, and the ragged curtains eddied dismally into the room. Theodora went on attending to the child, as though he were not present. Her lip quivered as she noticed the flush on his blurred handsome face, and the unsteadiness of the hand which drew the blind up. The morning had been spent, as so many of his mornings were, lounging about the bar of the village inn, "The Dew Drop" its innocent and pretty name—the "Do Drop in," the Ansley children facetiously termed it.

"Have you any money about you, Theodora?" he asked, endeavouring to make the remark sound casual. "I want five pounds at least," he added jocularly; "so hand it out, there's a good girl."

"I have not got five pounds, Mr. Ansley," she replied.

He turned upon her.

"What you do with all your money passes my comprehension," he exclaimed. "How much have you, then?"

"I have twenty-five shillings exactly."

"Give me that. I'll pay you——" He paused.

"When?" she asked, raising her dark eyes to his.

"Oh, some time; when I can."

"That means never, Mr. Ansley, and I want this money. Beth has nothing for the summer."

"What does that cripple want with finery?" he said, fuming. "And you heard from Harold yesterday. Did he send you no money? He's a model brother!" he went on, with a sneer. "I wonder he wouldn't be ashamed to have you here living on us."

Theodora made no reply, though many a true and crushing one rose to her lips: she thought of Harold's money, and the road it had gone during his minority.

"Come," he said roughly, "no more humbug, Miss Holbrook! You live in my house, and you must pay your way. Will, or will you not, give me that money? or must I go to your room and take it?"

"I do not want to live in your house, Mr. Ansley," she said, with dignity; but he held up his hand warningly.

"There, there! don't fly out at me about nothing. I am sure I am very glad to have you here; and you are a very good girl, Theodora, and you take good care of the children. I do not know how we'd get along without you. I wish you to stay here and share our home, so don't mind what anyone else says to you."

In silence Theodora drew out a shabby little purse, and laid a sovereign on the schoolroom table. Mr. Ansley took it quickly, wondering audibly what good a paltry sum like that was to him. Then he left the room.

Half an hour later Theodora crossed the hall with little Beth in her easy-chair. Mrs. Ansley called to her from the drawing-room, and Theodora obeyed the call. William Harden had made this little chair on wheels, because he could not bear to see Theodora carry the sick child in her arms as she used to do; he was clever with his lathe, and would positively have shone in life if his parents had only been satisfied to allow him to be a carpenter.

"Oh, you're going out, of course," said Mrs. Ansley, as she looked at her tall daughter standing in the doorway, "amusing yourself?"

"I'm taking Beth out, mother."

"Oh, that child, of course! All the world must give way to her. No one ever thinks of the life I lead."

"Will you come with us, mother?"

"Do you imagine I would be seen with that child, in that ridiculous chair, and you pushing it like a common nursery-maid?"

"Well, when I come back with Beth—will you come out then? We could walk round by Ivy Bridge before tea, and I will try and not look like a nursery-maid."

"Theodora, you surprise me very much. You persist in wilfully ignoring how delicate I am. You should really struggle against the selfishness of your nature. Because you are big and strong, and able for everything, you forget that there are more highly strung nerves and more delicately organised constitutions in the world."

"Then, what did you call me for, mother?" asked Theodora, drawing on an exceedingly shabby pair of gloves as she spoke.

"I wanted to ask you if you have lent your father money?" said Mrs. Ansley plaintively. "Of course, if my own daughter cannot afford me five minutes of her valuable time, I can't help it. You are really very brusque, Theodora, and no truly lady-like girl ever is brusque. And I notice Mary and Margaret are getting brusque also. They are learning it of you, and it is most painful to me. When I asked you to undertake the girls' education, I am sure I thought you would have made their manners presentable also. I cannot positively take any of my children out but Alice. There is a natural grace and refinement about that child. Please don't stand there so stupidly, but tell me did you lend your father any money to-day?"

Theodora winced. "Mr. Ansley"—with a deliberate emphasis on the words—"Mr. Ansley asked me for money; but, as you know, I had hardly any left."

"What do I know of your affairs, Theodora? You keep everything from me. Even Harold's letters you do not show me. I know you had one this week."

"Because when I did, you told their contents to Mr. Ansley," replied Theodora, buttoning on her gloves. "But I had nothing but a sovereign to lend to-day."

"Oh, I don't want the details of your expenditure, I am sure," Mrs. Ansley cried peevishly. "You are old enough now to manage your own affairs, surely. But how foolish of you! Do you imagine he will ever pay you?"

"I should need to be very sanguine if I did, mother," she replied, with a slight smile.

"He's been playing cards all the morning at the inn," went on the wife. "He smelt so abominably of bad whiskey and vile tobacco, I had to ask him to leave the room just now. Then he went off to look for you, although I assured him I knew you had no money. Why did you not tell him so?"

"I had twenty-five shillings, mother."

"What's that? You might easily have said you had nothing, if you had only that much. And really, Theodora, I want a bonnet so badly: the one I have is not fit to go to church in. And knowing that, you fling away twenty-five shillings: actually helping that man to continue in his bad ways."

"I can't help his ways, mother," the girl replied. "And you know the scene there would have been—that there always is—if I refuse him my money. He watches it from the moment I get it: in fact, I believe he keeps a more accurate account of it than I do."

The scorn in her voice roused her mother. "Why, in what a disrespectful way you speak of him!" she said wrathfully—"the man that is in your father's place! I am surprised, Theodora."

"He is not in my father's place so far as I am concerned," said Theodora, her voice vibrating with feeling; "and never, never has been. And you know that perfectly well, mother."

"Indeed, your disrespect towards him from the very first has been only too pronounced," said Mrs. Ansley. "And you taught Harold the same thing; and now you are teaching his own children the same."

"Mother, I have never spoken slightingly to the children of their father—never. I do not speak of him to them ever, because there is nothing to say that is not dreadful and painful. But I cannot help that the children see him as he is. Can you expect them to love, and honour, and respect him?"

"If you set them the example, they would," said her mother tearfully. "What would your poor father say if he could look out of the grave and see the miserable position I am in?"

"What indeed?" thought Theodora.

THE HARDENS' OTHER SON.

"The lad took up his knapsack: he went, he went his way."
JEAN INGELOW.

ONE narrow street, badly paved with cobble stones laid down some time in the last century; two rows of small irregular houses, some of red brick, some of yellow, all the worse for the wear and tear of time; a smithy, an inn, and a pump in the middle of the roadway just opposite the inn, composed the village of Drueling. There are many hundreds of pretty villages in England, nestling amongst fruitful gardens, and surrounded by opulent pastoral landscapes, but Drueling was bleak and ugly, in the heart of a flat, wind-swept country. Why built, and why, when built, anyone lived there, was, to an inquiring mind, a problem. There was nothing to see, or to do, or to think about. People just existed, and it was hardly a change when they went to the churchyard and stayed there. A narrow, aimless, objectless existence—no knowledge about, no interest in, the great living outside world which went on its way, and heeded not Drueling—Drim-and-Drueling the Ansley children, who had a genius for the inversion of names, called the place. The post-office was an "innovation," with its green shutters, and postal directions nailed outside. It was the only link the place had with the great world. To send a telegram, you must go to the nearest town; likewise to do your shopping; for although Miss Oldham held Man wants but little here below, but still the mildest man wants more than he could get at Miss Oldham's shop. THE HARDENS' OTHER SON.

Miss Brown kept the post-office, and in her leisure moments attended upon the curate, who lodged upon her drawing-room floor. Opposite the great old grey church, upon its grassy slope, was the rectory. The inhabitants of Drueling might easily have fitted in the chancel of the church, so great and grim was it. One hawthorn-tree at the gate, circled about with a rustic wooden seat, was all there was there in the way of verdure. A few square tombstones in the grass bordered the path from the gate to the porch, and the paths were laid down in cinders, which crunched unpleasantly beneath one's feet. The rectory was screened from the vulgar gaze by a high stone wall. Within, a long, low, rambling house, of stone like the church, a grassy lawn, which was gorgeous at the season of red and yellow tulips, and dull all the rest of the year, and a row of tall elms, where the rooks built in the spring. Half-way down the village street, in a square house, with a pseudo-Greek portico in front, lived the vicar's sister, Mrs. Casson, and her niece, Belle. In "Golden Hall," standing away from the roadway, with two chestnut-trees in front, resided Major Morley and Mrs. Morley, and Julia—sole daughter of their house and heart. At the other end of the village the Ansleys and the Hardens lived. These families composed the upper circle of Drueling society, except when His Grace the Duke of Raylington was at the Castle, when the upper circle consisted of him alone. There were, indeed, the three Miss Darleys, a little way from the village, but they called themselves county people, and had to be very particular indeed as to whom they knew, being quite unprotected and alone in the world.

"She saw no gleam of brightness anywhere."—p. 644.

Mr. Dobson, his Grace's land-steward, was standing in front of the gate of his little cottage garden, debating in his own mind, apparently, in which direction, up or down the village street, he should turn his steps. While he mused, Theodora, pushing little Beth's chair, came in view, with Alice, skipping now in front, now beside them, now pausing to study the games of sundry village urchins playing in the roadway. "Hard work, pushing that chair," thought Mr. Dobson, who hated to see a woman doing anything laborious; "and she looks tired and pale. Poor girl! she's a bad enough life of it, I am sure, with that Ansley; and her mother seems a stinging lady enough."

Theodora stopped, with a pleasant smile, to speak to Mr. Dobson, and that worthy gentleman beamed all over his honest ruddy face.

"And how is the little lady to-day?" he asked, with a compassionate glance at Beth's mute suffering face, putting a bronzed finger for an instant on the small waxen hand.

"Not so well. The sharp spring weather tries her," replied Theodora sadly.

"These winds will soon be over now," said the steward—he always took the cheeriest view of life—"and then you must all come for a day to Raylington. His Grace is shooting in the Rocky Mountains now, so we have the place to ourselves. The little ones will like a run in the country."

Alice skipped and jumped with joy at the mere suggestion of such an expedition. She knew what Mr. Dobson's hospitality meant. A day at Raylington under his auspices was a day of unlimited bliss. Fruit, cream, cakes, and liberty without end. Alice jumped and her eyes shone. Beth lay still and pallid in her little chair.

"What a difference!" said Mr. Dobson, looking from one twin to the other. Theodora sighed, and stooping, settled Beth more easily, and kissed her.

At this moment the vicar's daughter, Selina Marks, and her cousin, Belle Casson, bore down upon the little group, perceiving which, Mr. Dobson raised his hat and fled. The spring-like sunshine had tempted the young ladies forth in very astonishing costumes, not more than two years behind the fashion, and Selina twirled a scarlet parasol, to the great envy of Belle, who had only a white one rather the worse for wear.

"We were just coming to see you," said Selina graciously. "But to meet you will do just as well. You need not think of turning back; we can go on and call at the Darleys, Belle, as Miss Holbrook is out."

"Such news!" cried Belle: "the Morleys' second son is at Golden Hall. We saw him draw up the blind just now as we came past. He arrived last night."

"And the weather has become so delightfully fine, we are beginning tennis to-morrow. Mamma bid me ask you will you join us? So happy, if you will. We can't make up eight any other way. There's Belle and me, and Mr. Wilkinson, and Captain Morley and Julia, and William Harden, and the youngest Darley plays, though at her age it's absurd."

"Either Maggie or Polly, or even Maudie, play better than I do, Miss Marks. I am getting too old for these violent amusements," said Theodora.

"Nonsense!" cried the young ladies—neither of whom would ever see thirty again.

"But Polly can come if you like," said Selina ungraciously.

"That reminds me," said Belle, with cheerful irrelevance: "did Mrs. Harden ever tell you about their other son?"

"The Hardens' other son!" repeated Theodora. "No; why, there is no such person."

"We were thinking perhaps you knew and could tell us," said Miss Casson, "as you and she are so much together, and everyone says you 'll marry William some day. Selina overheard her mamma and papa talking about it. I asked auntie, but she knows nothing. You know, we're not long living here; but from what Selina heard, the Hardens have another son, and he did something disgraceful and ran away. You could ask your stepfather. He has always lived here; Selina was so long abroad at school, you know. Couldn't you find out from Mrs. Harden? We're positively dying to know all about it."

"I would not tell you if I knew," said Theodora bluntly, with a sudden colour in her cheeks; and very stiffly she said good-bye, and pushed on Beth's chair. Neither of the young ladies had noticed the child, nor Alice, who had stood listening, open-mouthed, to their conversation.

"Ain't they rude things?" said Alice, with keen juvenile scorn, as they moved on. "Selina is as mad as anything, all because William likes you; as if he would look at her! And she's too grand to speak to Mr. Dobson; and I like 'im," said Alice valiantly, although a trifle uncertain about her h's.

Theodora could not believe that the Hardens had any such secret in their calm, colourless, untroubled lives; their life was patent to all—the doctor's kindly benevolence, the quiet goodness of the doctor's wife. Year in, year out, they lived the same ordered and unvarying life. One day was the same as another in the Hardens' household—"The Clockwork Family" the disrespectful young Ansleys had named them long since. No disorder, no confusion, ever was known within the walls of their house, and also no change, no variety. To think that so carefully regulated a household should be living upon the buried cinders of a disgrace or crime was simply impossible. There was not even a photograph of the vanished son, nor a book with his name on the flyleaf. Theodora felt quite sorry for him, and wished he would come home again. He could not have done anything very bad, and be his father and mother's son. Upon that point her mind was quite made up.

CHAPTER IV.

THE VEILED PICTURE.

"No cord or cable can draw so forcibly, or bind so fast, as love can do with only a single thread."—BURTON.

THE doctor's house faced the Ansleys' disreputable abode, and was a great contrast. There were two windows each side of the hall door, and five in a line above, each with a half-blind of muslin tied into the shape of an hour-glass with a band of blue ribbon. The brass knocker, letter-box, and handle were literally dazzling. At each side of the steps was a terra-cotta vase upon a pedestal; and a neat tiled walk, between two carefully clipped rows of box, led to the garden gate. At the Ansleys', chaos reigned supreme. Theodora, single-handed, had struggled for years, and struggled still, to keep things straight; but when ten people continually and for ever put them crooked, the efforts of one do not count for much. Her arrangements were reduced to chaos almost before she had them completed. Ink was spilt, water overturned; carpets were torn, curtains dragged down, rugs burned, window-panes smashed daily and hourly, so that the only wonder was that there was anything left to burn, or break, or rend. In her own little attic room Theodora could indulge her taste for order. When one of the children was sick, or naughty, or in affliction, the sufferer prayed to be allowed to go to sister Theodora's room. There, in the silence and neatness, tired nerves were apt to settle down, and bad tempers to vanish; and it was almost a pleasure to be sick there, and have Theodora to attend upon one's wants.

The outer gate hung by one hinge; the path was rough and partially unflagged; the small garden plot was full of weeds. Theodora was housekeeper, cook, nurse, governess, butler, carpenter, doctor, and general contriver to the house, but could not fit in gardening and smithy work, or I believe she would have mended the gate and dug up the weed plot outside. The bell-handle had long since been torn from its roots, and hung out disconsolately; it was a feat of agility to knock anything but your own fingers with the wobbling knocker, and all the windows and all the blinds were maimed in some way. The doctor's house across the way was a standing reproach. There everything marched along in majestic order. At seven the rising-bell; at eight the praying-bell, as Mrs. Harden called them in her gentle, vague fashion; at eight precisely the door of Mrs. Harden's room opened, and she came down the stairs, looking like a rose, with her soft grey gown and pink ribbons in her cap; the doctor appeared from the garden, where, wet or fine, he took a constitutional every morning. William, with his wide smile, rubbing his large red hands, came from the study, where he had been having his morning hour of study; and Johnson, and Anne, and Peter the boy, filed upstairs, from the kitchen. The doctor cleared his voice, put on his spectacles, and read prayers; Mrs. Harden's gentle eyes rested upon her hands folded in her grey lap; William blinked in the morning light, and endeavoured not to think that Theodora lived right opposite.

William at breakfast had a particularly stolid appearance. He stowed away large quantities of toast and eggs, fish and ham, scones and marmalade, in that capacious mouth of his. After breakfast he retired to his father's waiting-room, which looked out at the end of the house, and commanded a full view of the village street—a waiting-room in which no patients ever waited, for in the country the doctor goes to his clients. The room might as well have been designated William's study; but was not, lest it might make him uppish. William, if you asked his parents what he was doing, was in that transition stage known as "going into the Church." William had studied at Cambridge, but while there, had been unable, owing to the magnitude of his mind, to thoroughly explore its depths, and find out to his satisfaction what he really wanted to be. Of course all positions were attainable, the difficulty was to choose—at least, so his fond parents thought. William himself felt he would like to "do good," and as he was an honest, true-hearted fellow, he was quite likely to succeed, although he was not clever. His progress towards the desired end was snail-like, for, unaccountably enough, no matter how hard he read, the examiners never thought of touching upon subjects which he knew. And so many long hours floated by, and found William patiently reading in this little den. So steadily he stuck to his work, that if he knew Theodora was walking along the village street, he would not have "left the web and left the loom," or "made three paces through the room," to see her pass. At luncheon-time he was free to lay aside these perplexing tomes, and hie to his mother's side. At luncheon they talked about the weather and the crops, for neither Mrs. Harden nor William shone conversationally, and the doctor was never in the house at luncheon-time. Anne attended, and reproved William with much asperity whenever she considered that he needed it. Then William and his mother took a short drive, and after that William did his "three hours'" reading. William and his "hours" were an unfailing source of amusement to the Ansleys, as was also his patent adoration of Theodora.

It was like haven after stormy seas, cool twilight after burning noon, rippling waters after desert sands, to Theodora to find herself a guest at Mrs. Harden's. The old lady, so sweet and placid, with her serene gentle smile, her knitting, her pretty grey gown, her cat purring at her feet, and her soft cooing voice, was a soothing presence after the uproar of her own home. The orderliness charmed her; nothing broke the silence but the "drip-drop" of a water-clock—the doctor's "own invention"; the furniture stood decorously round by the walls, the carpet was straight, the curtains fresh and dainty, the table set for tea in the old-fashioned way, with snowy damask, and silver and flowers. How Mr. Ansley had scoffed at the notion of flowers upon his dining-table when Theodora had put them there when first she came home to live! Theodora loved Mrs. Harden, and the rest and quietness of this true home attracted her strongly. It did not occur to her that William thought of her too much for his comfort. She knew the children mocked about William's adoration for herself, but she knew also that they had learned this delicate style of badinage from their father, so she paid no heed to it. She felt herself as likely to fall in love with Peter as with William.

"'Mrs. Harden,' said the girl suddenly, 'what is that curtain for?'"—p. 653.

"Yes," said Mrs. Harden gently, as Theodora handed her back the socks she was knitting for William, with the stitches counted. "Yes, my dear Theodora, it is a great pleasure to me to have you over here of an afternoon, and it is very good of you to come to an old woman like me. I always wish I had had a daughter, my dear: she would have seen after things. I sometimes feel the house is not quite what it ought to be. I fear the things are old-fashioned, but the doctor and William seem quite contented."

"Of course they are contented when they have you," said Theodora, with the smile which was one of her chief charms.

"If you would make suggestions, dear, I should be so glad," said the old lady, looking round her with a troubled glance. Theodora thought her suggestions would be rather sweeping, perhaps. Over the massive sideboard hung the similitude of a ship in full sail upon a grass-green sea, worked in tapestry-work by Mrs. Harden when she had been Letitia Morton. A portrait of the doctor faced the windows, a beautiful temple (of Fame presumably) behind him in the middle distance, and his hand resting with an air of achievement upon a pile of books. Under this one of William's certificates, framed and glazed for all the world to come and wonder at; over the mantel-piece a portrait which had always exercised Theodora's mind when she spent an afternoon in its society. Mrs. Harden was there—represented by an artist, who had caught the plainness of her face, but missed the beauty of her smile; and upon her lap reclined William, an exceedingly ugly baby in a flowing muslin robe, and with a fair promise of what his nose was to become in the future. But what disturbed Theodora was that half the picture was concealed from view by a heavy curtain. Now, the Hardens were not "cultured," and "draping" was unknown and undreamt of in their philosophy, so this curtain must have meaning other than "artistic"—which it certainly was not. As Theodora did not answer immediately, Mrs. Harden went on with her knitting. She always counted her stitches in French. She said it kept up her memory of that language, in which she had been considered very proficient in her youth.

"Un, deux, trois, quatre." And the canary began to sing, and the water-clock "drip, dropped" on its way, and the great clock in the hall ticked solemnly. Anne had just replenished the fire, and it burnt steadily; and Theodora as she sat wondered if Mrs. Harden could be excited or surprised about anything, and then she suddenly thought of the missing son, and if the mother had forgotten him, and why had he gone away.

"Mrs. Harden," said the girl suddenly, "what is that curtain for?" Theodora never knew what possessed her to ask this question. She was reserved enough herself to respect the silence of others, but the words left her lips without reflection. Mrs. Harden's knitting fell from her hands, her face grew pale, almost as white as her hair, and her lips quivered. Theodora rose and knelt beside her. "Forgive me!" she cried, putting her strong young arms round the old lady's trembling form.

But Mrs. Harden put her away gently, and rising from her seat, walked to the window. She made a pretence of straightening the canary's cage upon its chain, then she came back to the fireplace, where Theodora stood looking the picture of misery.

"Do not look so unhappy, my child," she said, with a sweet patient smile, though her eyes were dim with tears. "I am a foolish old woman, and easily excited. Sit down, and I will tell you all about it."

"No, no; pray do not," pleaded Theodora. "It was horrid and rude, and utterly thoughtless of me. It will be a punishment if you tell me anything."

"It will comfort me to tell you," said the old lady. "Indeed, dear, I have often wished to do so. I have often been upon the point of telling you, but that I did not like to shadow your life with my sorrows. Sit down here. No, stay; look in the hall, dear, that we may not be overheard."

Theodora went to the door. The hall was empty, save for the clock and two long slanting rays of dusty sunlight which came in each side of the hall door.

"Leave the door open," said Mrs. Harden. "When you have anything special to say, it is much the safest plan. Now come here, close to me, dear child, and I will tell you about my Jack. It is Jack's picture which that curtain hides—I sometimes draw it back and look at it. The doctor wanted it painted out, but I begged and begged, and then he let it remain. Such a dear little lad as he was, how could I bear to have his little face painted out, just as if he had never lived at all? Everyone loved him, he was so sturdy and strong and graceful; and in all his little life I never knew him deceive me. 'Mother, it's the real truth,' he would say, when I questioned him about anything. My brave little Jack! we never speak of him now. My heart is very full of him often; for how can a mother forget? Do you think it is very wrong of me to remember him and to love him, Theodora?"

"Why should you forget him, dear Mrs. Harden? Who would think of him if his mother did not?"

"But my husband would not be pleased. The doctor is so upright and honourable, you know, that it was agony to him that his son should have done what was wrong. But men judge each other in that hard way, my dear. I love my darling still, and I pray for him day and night; and surely God's goodness and tenderness must be greater than a mother's, and He will pardon the lad, I surely think."

"You are right to love him, and think of him, and pray about him!" exclaimed Theodora.

"Do you think so, dear? I am very glad. For a woman's first duty is to obey her husband; and my husband said to me that dreadful day, 'Remember, he is son of ours no longer, Letitia; never speak his name again.' It was hard to try to obey. My eldest, first little son, I always loved him the best. Perhaps I spoiled him. He was so bright and clever and handsome, always saying such clever, funny little things; and I was so proud of him. And then to be told that he was to be dead to me henceforth!"

"And is he dead?" asked Theodora softly.

Mrs. Harden was weeping bitterly. She bowed her head in answer.

"Then let him be forgiven," the girl said, and with deliberation she swept the curtain from before the picture. A lovely little lad stood there by his mother, with brave laughing blue eyes, his golden curls thrown back from the eager child face. The artist had done Jack justice at least, although he had dealt out justice untempered with mercy to the long-nosed baby. It seemed to Theodora that the boy looked straight at her, smiling his thanks for letting him see the light once more. It was incredible that this laughing, lordly, lovely boy should be William's brother. And it seemed to her also that the longer she looked the more familiar was the child's face. Surely she had somewhere met that frank gaze, had looked into the clear truthfulness of those eyes, had known that sunshiny smile? Faint echoes of the past thrilled through her as she stood and looked, wondering, more deeply puzzled every moment. It was not possible that she could ever have met and known Jack Harden, and yet his pictured face was perfectly familiar to her.

MUSIC IN THE CATACOMBS.

BY J. F. ROWBOTHAM.

IN the days of Imperial Rome, during the second century of the Christian Era, and while the Christian disciples of the faith were compelled to carry on in secrecy and stealth the rites of the new dispensation which had been revealed to them, the following incident was not of uncommon occurrence :—A belated banqueter, coming home from those glittering entertainments which marked the downfall of Roman nobility but the rise of Roman luxury, as he passed along the Flaminian or the Latin Way, or along a similar road on the outskirts of the city, would have his attention arrested sometimes by the sight of lights moving among the tombs, or glimmering from the catacombs underground. Muffled voices would strike his ear as of men engaged in secret prayer, or in the practice of forbidden mysteries. He had been, let us say, at an entertainment given by one of the Lamias, the proudest family in Rome. He had seen the progress of a brilliant banquet, extending over eight or ten hours and accompanied with all the meretricious delights which luxury and effeminacy could procure—tight-rope dancers bounding above the heads of the banqueters, swells of delicate and melodious music from the sweet instruments of Syria and the East, odours of the most priceless rarity burning in boxes and diffusing their perfume through the apartment. From this scene, and from the midst of such a world of the senses, he was brought face to face with the extraordinary and mysterious doings among the tombs and catacombs of the Latin Way. What would he think of those strange anchorites? How could he in the slightest degree sympathise with their feelings and their faith?

The singing and the services of these early Christians have fortunately not been suffered to pass away without sufficient description being handed down to us to enable us to form a very faithful, if not a minute, picture of the manner and practice that prevailed. Their singing was limited to psalm-singing. There were no hymns then. The hymn—that melodious joy of worship—had not at that time come into being. The first hymns date from a considerably later period, and not till the time of Prudentius, Ausonius, and Hilary of Poitiers do we find any traces of what has been well called "the sweet prattle of the soul." There was no sweet strain such as this to rejoice the hearts of those poor outcasts. In psalms alone could they lift up their voices—psalms which had little that could be considered rhythmical or musical about them, but were simply the Hebrew Psalms of David translated into the vernacular Latin, without metre, poetical form, or measured cadence. The peculiar circumstances under which the rites were performed rendered loud and hearty singing out of the question; and we are told that the furtive worshippers "muttered or mumbled them rather than sang them." They repeated the words, therefore, in a low and timorous voice, not daring to vent their emotions to the full. On holy days and feast days they would exalt their voices a little, and use a louder cadence, according to Isidore of Seville; but yet, he tells us, even this was far from what we understand by the word singing. Their psalmody has been compared to the murmur of the sea by one of the Fathers; and doubtless such a description came very near the truth, when the psalms were heard ascending from the depths of the catacombs by chance listeners or passers-by overhead.

Of the service which accompanied this early psalmody we know the outline, and are captivated by its solemn simplicity. Their worship began with reading the Scriptures; after which an address was given by the Presbyter or the chief man of the meeting. Then came the psalmody; and then they would read from the diptychs, or tablets of wax, the names of those Christian martyrs who had died for the sake of the Lord Jesus, as they, too, were prepared to die.

The psalms in the Latin translation wore the same form which they do in the Hebrew original, and which is so well preserved in the Prayer Book and Bible versions of them in the English text. That is to say, the verses were divided into two well-marked parts. We separate these parts by colons, and this is but the continuation of a method which the earlier pointing of the manuscripts indicates. The peculiarity of structure here mentioned gave the first rude outline of form to the untrained psalmody of the singers. But for some such source of steadiness, their tones would have been "like the sea" indeed—vague, confused, and meaningless. This simple feature, however, brought order with it. Three distinct customs were prevalent in chanting, or, as we should rather say, in murmuring, the psalms. It was the custom for one singer to begin the verse and repeat it half-way through; then for the rest to join in at the second half and sing along with him till the end of the verse. Another method was even more peculiar. One chosen singer or reciter would declaim the whole psalm until the last verse of all was reached; then the congregation would take up the singing, limiting themselves to one verse alone. The third method approximated somewhat more nearly than the preceding to a habit of singing usual at the present day: the congregation would divide itself into two parts and declaim verse about, or the halves of verses, and in this way go through the entire psalm. The latter custom of chanting does not appear, on investigation, to have been in any degree more common than either of the two former, though naturally we might be led to think so, because we find in it the rudiments of the modern practice.

Each of the three before-mentioned styles had its name. The first was called the Acrostic style of psalmody—the name "Acrostic" being derived from the last line or last half of the verse at which the congregation joined the solo singer. The second style was termed the Acroteleutic, because the "end verse" was the one selected for the entry of the other voices; while the third manner of psalmody was known as the Antiphonal, and may be supposed, on very good grounds, to be identical with the manner of singing the psalms that prevailed in the Temple services at Jerusalem. Such a hold did these primitive means for variety take on Christian minds that, even under the gilded cupolas of Constantinople some centuries later, the Acrostic, the Acroteleutic, and the Antiphonal styles of psalm-singing were cultivated in their several characters by the artistic choristers of the Byzantine Court.

How very different was such simple and unsophisticated music, which curious Romans might hear issuing from the weird receptacles of the dead, from the gay and vivid Pagan melody which at this time was in its heyday in the Imperial City! Yet which had the greater vitality, and which has lasted longer—those tremulously murmured cadences which were the veritable beginning of the great literature of ecclesiastical music, or the light and buoyant tunes of the theatres and the pantomimes, which, except from hearsay, have passed entirely out of memory? Had the art of early Christianity been in any sense a carrying on of Pagan traditions instead of, as it was, an entire severance and breaking therewith, we should have had a very different music in our churches to-day. By the times of Imperial Rome, Greek minstrelsy had reached its climax of magnificence, and was conducted in a style of grandeur and extravagance which well might recall the descriptions of fable. Its rhythmic, melodious strains were rung out in the theatres by many hundreds of singers, who were accompanied by vast orchestras, wherein every instrument of Greek or Oriental invention had its representative. "The passages are full of singers," says Seneca, speaking of one of these occasions, "the orchestra is thronged with trumpets and every kind of musical instrument peals from the stage." Gibbon, in narrating these stupendous performances, describes the gigantic lyres, the immense water-organs, and other paraphernalia of secular music which were assembled in those temples of pleasure and of sin—the Roman theatres. In contradistinction to these forms of music, the early Christians, from the very first, took up an entirely opposite attitude. There was something of the reactionary spirit in their views; they went to the contrary extreme in everything, deeming that purity and propriety in their art could only be gained by placing as great a distance as they could between themselves and the Pagan fashions. The simplicity of their early singing, which we have recently described, may in a great measure be accounted for by the desire to act counter to the spirit of the world around. There, in that great world of Pagan Rome, they might hear echoing from the taverns in the Campus Martius, or from any of the dens of impiety which were so rife about the city, the sweet, sugared melodies of Greek composers, the florid runs, the trills, the embellishments which the late art of Athens cultivated in such profusion, and which Rome had received among other heirlooms from its sister race, and had multiplied and improved on. But in direct contradiction and opposition to this came the severe exhortations of the teachers of the infant Church. "Servants of Christ," says one, "let the words of your singing be your delight, and the holy thoughts those words convey; not the tones they come and go in." They were bidden to despise melody and its beauties as a thing of no concern, and to concentrate their whole aims on breathing through their voices the fervour of the spirit. "God desires no such vanity," says another early writer, "as sweet tunes and melodious utterance." "It is not with the voice, but with the heart, that we must praise the Lord," maintains Jerome, clearly hinting thereby what contempt he entertained for anything approaching to laboured and artistic tune.

In a similar spirit, all artificial aids to song were looked upon by the early Christians with disfavour. Instruments of whatever kind were eternal absentees from their services. Partly, the reason came from the close connection of musical instruments with those performances in the theatres which contained so much of evil, and were, in their strong language, characterised as "temples of demons." Partly also the cause lay in the meretriciousness of sound which instruments add to melody, and which, when it occurred, even in the simple outpourings of the voice, was, as we have just seen, regarded with bitter aversion. But let us hear some of the prohibitions of this instrumental music, and see how fervently it was denounced. "The only instrument we use," says one of the early Christian writers, "is our voice. The Word and the word of peace is enough for us. Let syrinxes be given to silly clowns; the pipe to superstitious men who pay honour to idols. Such instruments ought to be banished from all sober company, and are more fitted for beasts than men. How far, then, must they be kept from the assemblages of Christians? Be far from us their florid strains, and dissipated music, such as theirs, which corrupts the morals." Another claims Divine sanction for the exclusion of instrumental music: "As David sang psalms on a harp to the Lord," he says, "so do we too sing; but on a harp whose strings are alive. Our tongues are the strings, and more the Lord does not require."

The Christian service and singing, established and conducted as we have described it, remained the ideal of the early Church for centuries to come; though it was often departed from as time wore on and refinements were introduced on the ancient simplicity. So late as the time of Athanasius we have that prelate maintaining that Christian singing should proceed with as little inflection of the voice as possible, that it should be the prime of simplicity, in imitation of those early services of the infant Church. Isidore of Pelusium, in like manner, inveighs against any approach to honeyed melody as a thing impious and profane. Innovations with this end in view always provoked an outcry in the early Church. The introduction of a phonascus, or "voice-trainer," to lead the psalmody and keep the congregation steady—whose office is mentioned in the "Apostolic Constitutions"— was one of the first departures from the ancient simplicity. Next came the establishment of regular choirs, and, lastly, the admission of women into these choirs. This latter step was thought nothing short of a desecration by the severer Christians. The female choirs of Paul of Samosata and their theatrical displays are familiar to readers of ecclesiastical history. But females in a choir at all excited much heart-burning in the Church, and were said to impart those very elements into the service which the zeal of earlier times had striven to eliminate. They endeavoured, we are told, "to thrill the senses of their hearers with mellow tones and sweetness of voice, which was a vicious thing to do." Various similar charges are laid against the female choristers, all of them testifying only too plainly to what the genuine ideal was, and how far it had been departed from. The rudimentary service laid down by the first followers of the Church, which went no further than psalm-singing of so simple a character that it differed but slightly from ordinary speech, remained as the unapproachable beauty of purity, which every century gravitated further from.

The legend of St. Cecilia, which belongs to the early ages we are speaking of, has suffered some corruptions in its passage through hands unacquainted with the real character of early Christian song. There was a time, as the picture of Domenichino informs us, when the popular belief was ready to accept the fact that St. Cecilia was a player on the organ, and that with this instrument she produced those beautiful tones which "drew an angel down." Later times admitted that an organ was an anachronism, and the lyre or lute took its place as the instrument of the celestial singer. At length even this assumption must be waived, if we would retain the last shred of credibility in the beautiful tale. "A Christian maiden," said Jerome, "must know nothing of any such profane things. If by chance she ever hears a Pagan song, she must shut her ears and not listen to it. As for a flute, a lyre, or a harp, she must not even know what the words mean."

To follow the consequences of these early establishments of musical ritual would be too elaborate an attempt for our present purpose. Suffice it to say that the main element of the service at the present day—the simple chanted psalm or canticle—was laid down and organised in the primitive worship of the Catacombs. That dual arrangement of the music, which we may still observe in single and double chants, was even at this early time in existence; and the contour of the melody then differed but little from ours except in being less buoyant and gay, in wearing a more sombre and sedate hue. When Gregory the Great made his collection of chants for the first antiphonary, we are assured by reliable tradition that many of the old melodies which had grown up in the secret assemblages during the times of persecution were incorporated with loving care, and with a laudable desire to preserve scrupulous correctness; and the strains of the primitive psalmody were thus preserved for purposes of future art in many of the Gregorian tones. The corruptions which crept into the Gregorian system as centuries wore on were almost as numerous as those which vitiated the purity of worship itself; and the effect of the Reformation was in both cases to restore the primitive simplicity. In the plain and straightforward Anglican chants at the present day, we may rest assured that we have as near an approach as it is possible for modern scales and harmony to make to the ancient music of the Catacombs. The tunes, of course, are different, but the musical outline is precisely identical.

"CAN'T KEEP STILL."

"THAT TROUBLESOME CLASS."

BY A SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT.

"MR. ——, I shall really have to give up that class of mine." Is there a superintendent past or present who has not had to listen more than once to this confession? It may differ a little in form, and in the voice that makes it, but whatever shape and accent it may have, it is a confession of felt failure. Often it is not a confession of real failure, but only the result of a temporary despondency, and often it is the cry of an earnest heart, trying to do "some great thing" for God, and forgetting for the moment that in His Kingdom there are no such distinctions as great and little works. Whatever may be the cause, the class has really nothing to do with the matter. The disease is in the teacher, and to him the remedy must be applied, either in the form of kindly encouragement, or of honest practical instruction as to the true character of Christian work.

There are times, however, when this cry really arises from the class work, and the question how to deal with it then may well demand the most prayerful thought, and the most careful action on the part of both superintendent and teacher. If the trouble always arose from the same cause, the remedy might easily be discovered, and having been found, could be at once applied; but unfortunately the causes are numerous and widely different—sometimes, indeed, directly opposite. Still, they are capable of classification, and may be broadly described as of three characters—those which arise from outside causes; those which arise from individual scholars; and those which arise from the class as a whole, or, as it may be put, from it as one corporate body.

There are times when an epidemic of misconduct appears to rage, some classes suffering more severely than others, but very many of them being affected. As it is highly improbable that a majority of the teachers are incompetent, or the bulk of the scholars utterly bad, this is evidently a case of outside causes; and ventilation, warming, the arrangement of the classes, and similar details, need attention. Many a scholar and teacher have been blamed for the errors of the architect or builder and the poverty or parsimony of the church with which the school is connected.

It is, however, rarely that class trouble can be put into this first category as due to outside influences, for generally it is confined to one description of scholar—the boys of from thirteen to sixteen years of age. Girls of all ages, and boys younger than thirteen, can form some very unpleasant combinations, and at times have a peculiar aptitude for getting into mischief, but as a rule they are fairly amenable to control if it be just and regular. I have one boy in my own school with whom for a long time no teacher seemed to be able to cope, though at that time he was only about ten years of age. I had at last to make a class of him to himself, and give him a seat in front of the desk. There, with his back to the school, I set him to learn texts, and when I could spare a few minutes, I sat beside him, hearing and helping him, and trying to get him to grasp the meaning of what he had read. After some weeks of this training, a new teacher joined us, and to him this boy, with others, was entrusted, and he has proved himself by no means a bad scholar. Such cases are comparatively uncommon, and, as a rule, a slight exercise of the superintendent's authority will check trouble in the younger classes, particularly if not allowed to go too far. With the elder boys, who are just beginning to feel themselves of importance in the world, and are perhaps in the first glow of pride at having left school and "gone to work," the case is very different. Among such there is frequently a rooted belief that they are conferring a favour on the school, and all connected with it, by coming at all. Considering the many rewards which are given in one form and another for mere attendance, the idea is not unnatural, but it is most serious in its consequences. The scholar feels that having so far obliged the school officials, as to come, the least he can do is to reward his own virtue by acting according to his own sweet will while he stays. In such a case a clear and sharp assertion of the true position of affairs has a salutary and very often a prompt effect. Sometimes these scholars are possessed with a spirit of malicious and intentional insubordination, which is the very worst form in which trouble can arise. Happily such cases are rare in most schools, but when they are found they permit but of two courses: reformation or expulsion. From the latter everyone shrinks, for the thought will come—what will the boy do? Still it is far better to accept this alternative, with all its responsibility, than that the spirit of insubordination should spread through the whole school, as it inevitably will do if any one scholar is permitted to be master. Many of our children receive their only lessons of submission to authority from their Sunday-school teacher, and if that principle be not there enforced, they are injured rather than helped. The extreme penalty need scarcely ever be threatened, and certainly will never have to be enforced, if superintendent and teacher both possess the three great qualifications for control—firmness, patience, decision. These are needed in all classes, but they are absolutely essential in dealing with those which are troublesome. Every scholar is quick to discern any uncertainty or wavering in the minds of those who attempt to control him, and the worst offenders will submit if they feel that there is "the iron hand" in "the velvet glove," while comparatively tractable boys will break out from the rule of a teacher who has not a clear idea of what he wants, and a firm determination to get it, and never to relax his efforts until then.

Much more common causes of trouble than this intentional insubordination are those which arise from no vicious motive, but because the scholar really cannot help it. For instance, in many schools there will be found one or more boys, generally of respectable parentage and fair education, and by no means unlovable, who cannot possibly be still. Such a boy is moved from class to class, in the hope that some teacher will be found who can control his mercurial temper. It is a vain hope, for the remedy intensifies the evil. Fresh teachers and fresh class-mates excite rather than check, and the mere fact of moving into a new class is a pleasure to such a boy, and a thing to be sought rather than shunned. Yet something must be done with him, especially as, like all troublesome boys, he has the material in him for making a good man, if it can only be properly wrought. Experience and report tend to show that the best thing for nearly all classes is to have a separate room for teaching; but with the present system of school building that is impossible to obtain. A class-room for the teaching of this restless lad is absolutely imperative; he must be out of sight of other classes, and of all the things in the general school at which he can look, and to which he can draw the attention of his fellows. If, in addition to being put in a class-room under an able and conscientious teacher, he can be put into a class of well-behaved and studious boys, his cure will be so much the more rapid and complete. In a class-room the sounds—or perhaps more often the silence—of incipient mischief are more easily noticed than in the general school, and it can be nipped in the bud; and there being no outer attraction, interest in the lesson is contagious, and will ultimately be aroused in the most careless. This kind of scholar is intermediate between the wilfully insubordinate and those who have not the slightest wish to upset their teacher or annoy their fellows, and yet who contrive to do it thoroughly. Typical among these are the dull ones who cannot take an intelligent interest in the lesson, the idle ones who will not, those who are too clever, and those who think they are so. The dull or idle boy will either sink into passive inattention, and thence into becoming a disturbing element, or he will irritate his fellows by asking questions and saying things they consider silly, and become their laughing-stock and butt. The too clever boy will answer all questions, find all references, and ask for all information, and unless the teacher is possessed of an exceptional amount of self-denial, he will practically become the only person in the class so far as teaching is concerned. The other boys cease to care for the lesson, and in addition to that, they think their teacher favours their cleverer compeer, and that he himself must fancy himself better than they are. They thus come to dislike their fellow, and to have little respect for their teacher, and carelessness, indifference, mischief, and annoyance ensue.

"HE CONDESCENDS TO COME."

The boy who simply thinks himself too clever must be left, with the idle boy, to be dealt with by the teacher, who, by judicious snubbing or spurring, may repress the one and stimulate the other into better ways. The ignorant and really clever boys can only be dealt with by prompt removal to a class more fairly on a level with themselves, whether in ignorance or knowledge. Very often this is a task of considerable difficulty and delicacy, as the dull boy may have to be put among those much younger than himself, and he does not like it, while the clever boy has to be put among those much older than himself, and they object. In the latter case there is the added difficulty that no teacher quite likes to lose his very best scholar, and to have left with him only those with whom he has not been working altogether amicably.

Where a whole class is found unmanageable or troublesome, in every instance I believe the fault may be traced to the teacher, and not to the scholars. Not for a moment should it be thought that the teacher does it intentionally, or even that he dreams that he is to blame, yet it is not the less true. It may be that he is not fitted for that particular class—superintendents, so far as I know, not being able to tell on a first glance exactly what every person they meet is best able to do. Hence, a teacher who has frequently to complain of his class as a whole had better have a new class found for him, and there possibly he will be more successful. On the other hand, it is possible that the teacher is utterly unfitted for Sunday-school teaching—some of the very best of Christians are so. One most estimable man whose history I know, had a continually unfortunate experience. He was well educated, being particularly well read in Bible subjects and in the branches of general knowledge which tend to make Bible study interesting. He was not ill provided with anecdotes, and could put the sacred narrative into descriptions which always proved interesting to adults; yet as a teacher he did not succeed. The cause of failure seems to have been the want of that self-assertion which must accompany mastership of any kind. The want of this —whether from Christian goodness or any other cause —boys are quick to detect; the teacher is looked upon as weak, liberties are taken with him, and then, so far as that class is concerned, comes chaos. He visits the homes of the scholars and talks over their shortcomings, not with the intention of complaining, but hoping to be strengthened by the parental authority. That hope is quite a broken reed, and provokes rebellion rather than submission. Home visits should be visits of friendliness to scholars and parents, the troubles of the class being kept secret except as a last resource, and then the complaint to the parent should be by the superintendent, and not the teacher. Many a boy who would have become utterly bad through complaints to his parents, has had his heart won by the "brilliant silence" of his teacher in the periodical visit. Other teachers who cause their own trouble are those who will not prepare their lessons; who are sometimes very free, and sometimes mightily dignified; who attempt to make up for general laxity by occasional outbursts of extreme severity; and above all, who, having made a promise or threat, do not carry it out.

The periodical visitation, and personal week-day acquaintance of teachers and scholars, is perhaps the best of all preventives of class troubles; but as it is part of the duty of every teacher, it can hardly be said to be a special means to that end or a remedy for trouble when it has arisen. Remedies must be sought in attention to comfort; by selection and arrangement of scholars and classes; and by careful appointments or alterations of the teachers. These are matters for the superintendent; but nothing he can do will be of permanent good unless the teacher has mastered the real secret of good government—decision to know what he wants, firmness to insist on having it, patience to keep on striving after it in spite of apparent failure. When I was quite young in the work, I had occasion to notice one particular class. It consisted of ten boys of about fourteen years of age. They were working lads, somewhat rough, with little or no home training, and they had just entered on their career of wage-earning, and had not learned the Apostolic injunction, "Not to think more highly of themselves than they ought." For many Sundays after the class was formed, the teacher never seemed to have a moment's peace in his work. His eyes had to be everywhere and his ears constantly open, and though unimportant things never appeared to be heard by him, every tendency to insubordination was checked. Often it was after a long struggle and with great difficulty, but it was done at last. He prepared his lessons carefully, and with an eye to his own particular class; and he knew the homes and parents of his boys, never passing a scholar or a parent, or, I really believe, any member of any of their families in the street, without recognition. The work told, and the class became regular and orderly, and more than once strange lads put into that class for one day have in it been kept in order not so much by the teacher as by the scholars.

HIS LAST PICTURE.

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"WHY, how worn you look, Phillis!" a young lady remarked, as she entered a room, half studio half living-room, which the other was setting straight. "What is the worry now?"

Phillis Whately turned and laid down the dust-brush she held. "Oh, Helen, how glad I am to see you! Sit down. No, it is past worry; it is real trouble."

"Is your brother's cough worse?"

"More than that. He has an attack—slight, the doctor calls it—of inflammation of the lungs, brought on by coming through the fog from that wretched dealer's. He is in bed, and cannot touch a brush for a week at least."

"Poor Jem! And so much work as he has in hand. Is that his 'Close of the Day' you have turned up from the corner? How beautifully it promises! What a shame that it is laid aside!"

"Yes, yes; but there are other things more important. You know he has been copying lately. He hates it; grudges the time spent while unpainted pictures crowd his brain and his sketch-book; but it pays, and promptly. A while ago Gibson, the dealer, gave him an order to copy the new Paolo Veronese of the National Gallery, 'The Vision of St. Helena.' The same gentleman who had bought the little Raphael Jem copied—a great art-connoisseur—wanted it. Well, Jem did not hurry to begin: he was just full of an original sketch, and on cold days I tried to keep him from the Gallery. But he began last week, and then Gibson sent word that he heard he wasn't getting on, and that if he could not execute the order at once he must relinquish it. And now Jem is laid up!"

"The picture and Gibson will have to wait."

"But he won't wait. He was very serious; his client wanted the picture, and someone else must do it, he said, if Jem could not. (I can't help thinking he has found someone who will work cheaper for him.) He even said if Jem were not at the Gallery on Thursday, he should expect the first instalment already paid to be returned. And now comes the worst of it, Helen. That ten-pound note that lay in the desk—our bank—is already broken into! I had begun to use it—so many extras as there have been lately."

"Oh! And does Jem know?"

"I can hardly tell: he takes so little notice of money. But he said this morning, when he found he was too ill to get up, that Gibson must have his ten pounds back. I could not distress him by a discussion then."

"What is to be done? Do you think if I went to Gibson——"

"It would be no good in the world, Helen. He is a hard, bad man, who would not go from his word if it were to kill Jem."

"And the art-connoisseur—do you know his name?"

"Yes, it came out accidentally: Mr. Bosanquet, 18, Beckwith Square."

"Suppose you appeal to him. With his sanction for Jem to wait, Gibson would be powerless."

"I never thought of that. But how can it be done?"

"I can go."

"You, Helen?"

"Why not? You cannot leave Jem while he is so ill, and it is but a little thing to do."

"But you? Oh, no! Your father kept you so sheltered from the outside world; and you are reserved and shy to those who don't know you. No, it would not be right, and it would vex Jem."

"He need not know; and I shall go, Phillis. The great picture-buyer, ogre though he is, can't eat me. Ah! Phillis, how we struggling artists hate the class—our masters and our slave-drivers—and yet we live by them. They may be human, after all; I will see. There, write me down the address—I shall not stay to see your frowns; keep up your spirits, and expect me back before dark with the best news—the kindest message that a rich man could concoct. Goodbye."

And the girls kissed each other with something of the fervency of a great occasion, which indeed it was to Phillis Whately in the depth of her trouble; while it seemed almost that to her friend, in the sudden call made on her resolution and courage.

CHAPTER II.

AND Helen Pilgrim's temperament was not one that would be first of all described as resolute and courageous. She was perhaps not entirely without those qualities, but they were hidden in a complex nature whose many feelings checked and held one another in a control that appeared outwardly—in spite of the delicate sensibility of her looks—like quiescence. She had not realised, when she made the offer, how much it would cost her; she could not know how greatly it was to tax her powers of endurance. London born and bred as she was, it had seemed quite easy, though it took time and exertion, to make her way to Beckwith Square; and when told there that Mr. Bosanquet had left yesterday for his country house, Caxfield Manor, it was a spontaneous thought, in her disappointment, that she could follow him. She knew Caxfield, or she remembered passing the station on the Great Northern line, and it had seemed but a little way out of town. But what looks like a short distance at the beginning of a long journey, often appears the reverse when undertaken on the spur of the moment, when noon is passed, and a good deal of energy spent. The first train she could get from King's Cross was a stopping one, and she began to wonder despondently, as she sat preoccupied and upright in the third-class carriage, how long it would be before she arrived at her destination. Certainly she would not get back to Phillis before dusk: nor would old Hannah, her only house-companion since her father's death, see her home for tea. Then, when at last she stepped hopefully on the platform at Caxfield, she was told that the Manor House was two miles away, and that a fly was not to be had. As she looked out on the dusky unknown country road that a friendly porter directed her by—it was a good road, and no mistaking it, he assured her, and there were the lights of the Manor already kindled on the rising ground, and would be before her all the way—when she looked up at the low clouds, whence a few snow-flakes were quietly dropping, and felt the bitter air, more biting now the December day was closing—something like consternation overcame her. Had she done, after all, an ill-judged thing in coming? But, courage! she had come: she must go on. In little more than half an hour she should be there, even if the snow thickened. And the deed once done——!

The lights that spurred her on through the gathering night were brightening the interior of a beautiful home. In Mrs. Bosanquet's room, where the invalid spent most of her time, she was sitting with her maid, looking forward to the brightest hour of her day, when tea would be brought, and Laurence would come in for a chat. Her son for the moment was in his study. He had been riding all the afternoon, and now, seated in his easy-chair out of the direct rays of the fire, and turning over some art publications that lay on a little table about the shaded lamp, he was enjoying the physical comforts of ease and warmth, after experiencing the bitter air outside. The lamplight was soft and local, but the chief points of the exquisite room in which he sat could be made out. The walls were panelled in oak; a dado of delicate modern carving ran round them rather high; and above were hung, in plain oak frames, rare old etchings, whose value only the connoisseur could know. Low bookshelves stood below; and behind their locked metal gratings great cases of scarlet morocco gleamed, on which—with ampler light—the names of Marc Antonio, Dürer, Lucas van Leyden, Rembrandt, and others, might be read, and their precious contents guessed at. There were stands, too, for locked portfolios, and a writing-table; but besides the few pieces of pottery on the high carved over-mantel, there was not an ornament in the room. The master of this apartment was perhaps as well worth looking at, in this Rembrandt-like light, as the rest of its contents. A wide brow, from which the once abundant hair had retreated a good way, gave distinction to the head; the full, prominent eyes were cold and critical in expression; while the well-formed lower face was just saved from the weakness of the Charles II. type by a firmer, hairless mouth. It was a fine head, though it might not attract; and its defects were all known to its possessor.

His manner, that matched his expression, was apparent when a servant announced, in a subdued utterance, that someone wished to see him.

"'Would you like to see the pictures?'"—p. 662.

"Who is it, Evans?" he asked, with a certain slow impatience.

"A—a young person, sir: a lady."

"Isn't it Mrs. Bosanquet she wants to see?"

"No, sir; she said you partic'lar; she wouldn't detain you more'n a few minutes."

"The drawing-room is not lighted? Well, show her in here, and see you let me hear her name."

So it was a loudly spoken "Miss Pilgrim" that Helen—feeling weary, relieved, and yet anxious—followed in person. She had arrived at last; the worst would soon be over. She had shaken the snow from her skirts, though the wet of it gleamed here and there about her; and now, dazed with the fire and lamplights after the darkness of the roads, she paused within the doorway, failing for a moment to see the occupant of the room in the shadow. The objects about struck her, artist's daughter as she was, with a sharp, distinct impression. How lovely it all was! the rich man's room; and ah! there was he, the rich man himself, the picture-fancier, the captious buyer, who passed by so many works of gifted struggling men because they did not altogether please his critical sense. Certainly he was worse, more chilling, more unapproachable, than she had feared.

He had risen, and waited till her eyes fell upon him. "Won't you come forward?" he asked then, in his ordinary manner.

She advanced within the circle of light, and grasped nervously the back of the chair he had motioned her to: she never thought, weary as she was, of seating herself. In spite of her pretty smile of salutation, she looked across at him with an unconscious and proud condemnation.

"Thank you; I have a favour to ask," she said. "I have come on behalf of a friend—Mr. Whately."

"Mr. Whately?" he repeated absently. He was observing her curiously. It was long since he had seen a face so quiet, with so little about it to catch a common casual eye, that promised so much, that might mean so much. And she was going to ask a favour from him, was she? It did not appear so.

"Yes," she affirmed, while this went on in his mind. "You ordered a copy of the 'Vision of St. Helena' through Gibson the dealer, did you not? And he gave the commission to Jem Whately."

"Ah?"

"And now Gibson says you will not wait: that if Mr. Whately does not execute the order at once he must give it up."

She paused a little breathlessly; she had reached her point.

"Well? I did hear that the artist was shilly-shallying (you are his emissary, then?), and I suggested he should be pushed."

"Oh! but he is ill. He has begun, but the doctor says he may not work this week, at least. I have come to tell you that—to ask you to wait that time, perhaps a little longer, until he should be better—to give the order nowhere else."

"Is Mr. Whately particularly anxious to retain it, then?"

This was not the direct, the final answer she was hoping for. "Particularly? yes," she said, with rising colour, and a clear, lofty utterance. (Oh! why was poverty bitter to acknowledge?) "He is poor; he needs the money." But beneath this difficult statement her distress was not altogether hidden. He met it strangely.

"I wish," he said, with polite authority, "you would sit down. We could discuss the matter more comfortably then."

She could only obey; and, singularly, when her eyes were no longer on a level with his, her strange defiance yielded.

"I'm afraid I should not have said that," she said more meekly; "yet it is true. My father always said there was genius in Jem Whately, but he has never got his chance yet to let the world know it. It will come, if he lives. If—if it could only come now! You, who love good art, should see his sketches."

"Perhaps I may, some day. Then, was your father an authority?"

"My father?" she looked up quickly. "My father was John Pilgrim."

"Ah! I might have thought of it. I have two of his pictures, which I am very proud to possess."

A light of happy memories spread over her face. "You have?" she exclaimed, meeting his eyes at once with a glance of sympathy. "I remember; he sold his 'Hereward in the Forest'—how it all comes back to me!—to a Mr. Bosanquet, who came to his studio sometimes. He talked of you; but that is a good while ago."

"Would you like to see the pictures?"

She was looking at him eagerly, and had said, "Ah, so much!" before she knew. Then she checked herself. "Not now; no. There is Jem Whately. I must not forget; and I want to go. If you will kindly tell me—you can help him just by waiting!"

But again he did not answer her unfinished appeal.

"If Mr. Whately was in a difficulty with Gibson," he asked deliberately, "why didn't he communicate with me at once?"

"Perhaps he did not like; he is proud."

"He sent you instead?"

It was not a pleasant inference; a sudden red spread over her face. "No, oh no! You must not think that. He does not know I have come. Perhaps it was a mistake; his sister and I planned it."

"A woman's scheme!" he remarked, with a laugh. "Then you came because—because—you are seemingly very much interested in Mr. Whately."

It was the look and tone, perhaps, more than the words, that brought the red again to Helen's cheeks, and made it difficult for her to acquiesce. But she looked at him frankly after a minute. "Yes, he is my friend; almost as much my friend as his sister is, and both have been my companions for years." She rose. "I hope my coming is not a mistake. Mr. Bosanquet, you——" But the pause she left was not filled. "You will let me take good news back to them? You will let me tell them that you will wait for the picture a little while, till there is a chance of Jem's recovery?"

Her tone was pleading, her glance dewy. She began to fear this answer, so long delayed. But he was smiling; there was a kindling animation in his looks. He had gained time, and now he knew his mind—on a minor point, at least. There was no need to lose sight of this beautiful suggestive creature, even if he gave her the answer.

"You may tell them that—yes. I want no one's work in the 'St. Helena' but Mr. Whately's; and Gibson knew it, for it was simply the excellence of his little Raphael that caused me to order it; copies as a rule I avoid. I hope to visit Mr. Whately's studio when he is better. You may tell them all that——"

But she interrupted him. A glad relief shone in her face; she had been unjust; it was good to feel compunction.

"Oh! thank you," she said, with fervency. "You are kind and good. I did not know." She was looking already towards the door; she moved as if to go.

"You may tell them that," he repeated, in a tone that arrested her attention, "when you see them. To-night I hope you will remain with us."

"No, I must go at once," she exclaimed, disturbed and eager. But already, with a quiet "Excuse me," he had left the room; and in a few minutes more he led her to his mother. And then a beautiful old lady smiled upon the weary, startled girl, and took her hand. She had heard, she said, of Miss Pilgrim's generous errand, and she could not be permitted to go back through the snow. She must be good, and stay with her, and Laurence would telegraph to her friends. And Helen stayed.

CHAPTER III.

The winter had ended, and spring was melting into summer, before the "Vision of St. Helena" was finished. It had been manfully worked at, in spite of ill-health, and now it stood in the artist's studio, receiving a last touch from his brush. He was a very young man, with a face thin and worn, and in his luminous deep-set eyes there was a look that, once seen, was not lightly forgotten. His sister moved about the room with the air of a fidgety person trying to keep quiet, and then the silence was broken by the entrance of Helen Pilgrim. After cheery greeting, Jem Whately turned to his canvas again.

"One sees little of you now, Helen," he said; "your time is so taken up with your grand friends."

"Oh, Jem, that is not fair," she answered, though the reproach had brought the colour to her face. "I stay with Mrs. Bosanquet: she is so patient and good. And see, I have come the first morning I am back. I could not help it; I wanted to come."

She looked rather radiantly at him.

"Don't mind him," Phillis advised; "he only says it to hear your contradiction."

"I don't," Jem interposed quietly. "I said what I thought."

"Then that was unkind of you," Helen said. She had come up behind him, and was looking at the picture. Yet she hardly seemed to see the vivid presentment of the seated woman by the window, with cheek resting on hand, and spirit visibly escaped to dreamland. Or she saw it in a dream of her own; it seemed mixed up with her life, and led her thoughts to other things. She recalled herself with an effort.

"So it is finished. And how good! What does Mr. Bosanquet say to it?"

"Mr. Bosanquet? Oh, he has expressed his lordly approval; and I am given to understand that it is highly honoured in receiving a place in his collection." There was irritation in his tones, and he did not see the pained look that crossed Helen's face. He was still working, as he went on in a lower voice, "That reminds me, Helen: I can't forgive myself for what Phillis let you do about the picture, though I knew nothing of it at the time. Mr. Bosanquet is generous: I hope I do him justice; but I would rather have starved than that you should have gone to him with a favour to beg. I hate to think of it!"

A flaming red showed on the listener's face. "Don't say that," she cried. "I never regretted it—except perhaps for the first ten minutes after I saw him, when I did not know him. You must be glad; for it has brought me—what I came to tell you of—a great happiness. I——" There was a pause, and she said, with a dropped voice, "I am going to marry Mr. Bosanquet."

The brush fell from the artist's hand, and as he stooped to pick it up, there seemed a sudden stillness in the room. Helen had turned to Phillis, looking perhaps for sympathy, but she met a startled gaze that looked more like sorrow than gladness. Then her friend hastened to atone.

"This is most surprising, Helen. Oh! sit down and tell us all about it. 'Tis like a thunder-clap to hear that you're going to marry a rich man, a picture-buyer!"

"That's the way we have always talked; as if there were any real difference between picture-buyers and picture-makers. If you only knew him!"

She was feeling sore and hurt, and fighting against a conviction that she was alone in her joy. But now Jem Whately came to her with his hand stretched out, and he clasped hers tenderly, and looked at her with his luminous smile.

"Forgive me; but it seemed sudden enough to take one's breath away. Helen, I won't wish you happiness, for you say you have got it. If that is so, you know—you know without me saying it, how glad it makes us." He dropped her hand, and went back to his easel.

But when she had gone he left his work, and sat down wearily by the fire. He did not notice Phillis, who was watching him from behind, till she put her hand on his shoulder and spoke.

"Oh! Jem, Jem. It was I who let her go. It has brought all this about."

"Phillis, don't!" he said gently. "She says it has brought her happiness; then how can we regret it? Let us learn to be glad too, for her sake. Renunciation is sometimes the only proof required of us that our love is worthy."

"The Vision of St. Helena" was his last piece of work. When the picture was hung in its place, the hand of the artist was still and cold; his face, his wonderful smile, had vanished from the earth, or lingered only like a vision, as beautiful as that of the dreaming saint, in the memory of those who loved him. Helen wept out some of her tears on her husband's shoulder. "Oh, it is hard! Sorrow and death for him, while we love and are happy. Why should such things be?"

"I cannot tell, Helen. Perhaps death will teach us what life does not."

THE REJECTED PLANKS.

BY THE REV. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., AUTHOR OF "TURBANS AND TAILS; OR, THE UNROMANTIC EAST," ETC.

"Base ingratitude! Base ingratitude! Is this the way in which to treat an old and faithful servant?"

Some Chinamen were mending a junk on the seashore. They had just taken out a plank from the top of the square bow because it was rotten, and were fitting in a newer and stronger one. It was the old plank lying on the sand who was muttering to himself—

"Did ever anyone hear of such conduct before? To discard me, and to put such a plank in my place! Why! the tree I was part of was well grown and mature before that from which he was cut was more than a sapling!"

There was another old plank lying near, which also had been taken out of the junk and cast on one side. "We are alike in our fate," said this other, "but I am not sure that we agree in our opinion."

"Not sure that we agree in our opinion!" responded the first plank; "why, what difference can there be? what other opinion can anyone hold in regard to the treatment to which we have been subjected? Here am I, cast on the sand as of no value, and yet for years I have been the topmost plank of that junk's bow, riding highest over all the waves, firmly fixed in the very place of honour, so that wherever the junk went, I was the leading timber in its course!"

"But is it not true, as the junkmen seem to have judged, that, after all these years of service and honour, you are not quite so strong as you were? For myself, I have not been quite so long on the junk as you, yet I am bound to admit that it would be no exaggeration if anyone should say that I was rotten."

"Well, yes, I am a little decayed, I suppose; but then, think of the years of past service; and, besides, if I am getting a trifle feeble, is not that a claim for increased consideration? I have ever had in mind the honour of the junk of which I formed the foremost plank. I have served my fellow-planks well, and, considering my honourable past, I can only say that these men have not only acted in a way that is ungrateful to me, but that is also contrary to their own interest as owners of the junk in discarding so tried and trusty a servant. Where is the plank that can boast a more efficient or distinguished service, I should like to know?"

"It seems to me that you are somewhat mixing in your mind two things that differ. That you have been a trustworthy plank in that junk has been proved on many a voyage down the coast, and more than once in typhoons, in which not a few junks sailing with us have gone down. But I do not quite see that because you were a trustworthy and sound plank before you were decayed, you are therefore sound and trustworthy now, when, as you yourself confess, you are—well, at least a trifle decayed. The fact that you have rendered good service in the past by no means proves you capable of rendering good service now—does it?"

"Well, but to think of the dishonour of being deliberately rejected, and seeing another put into my place—another that I can safely say has never been a river-trip—let alone a sea-voyage—in his life!"

"Now, brother Plank, you are on another subject. May I ask you a straight question?"

"Yes, of course."

"You promise not to be offended?"

"What do you think of me? Of course not."

"Well then, tell me: Are you more anxious to help in the junk, to do your share in keeping her afloat with all her crew and cargo, to be of service to the owners, or, to have the honour of being the most prominent plank in her? In other words, do you complain of your having been taken out of the junk because thereby you suppose she has been weakened, or because thereby you suppose that you have been disgraced? Is it the junk's seaworthiness that you are anxious to maintain, or your own personal honour?"

Notwithstanding his promise, the complaining plank was dreadfully angry. He so thoroughly shook with indignation that, being more rotten than he suspected, he almost shook to pieces. "Do you suspect me of such vanity as that?" asked he, his voice quivering with excitement. "Has it not been as a member of the junk that I have crossed the waves? How can you suppose it possible for me to have any thoughts about myself apart from her? Of course"—this with increased emphasis—"of course it is the junk that I am thinking about, and not myself."

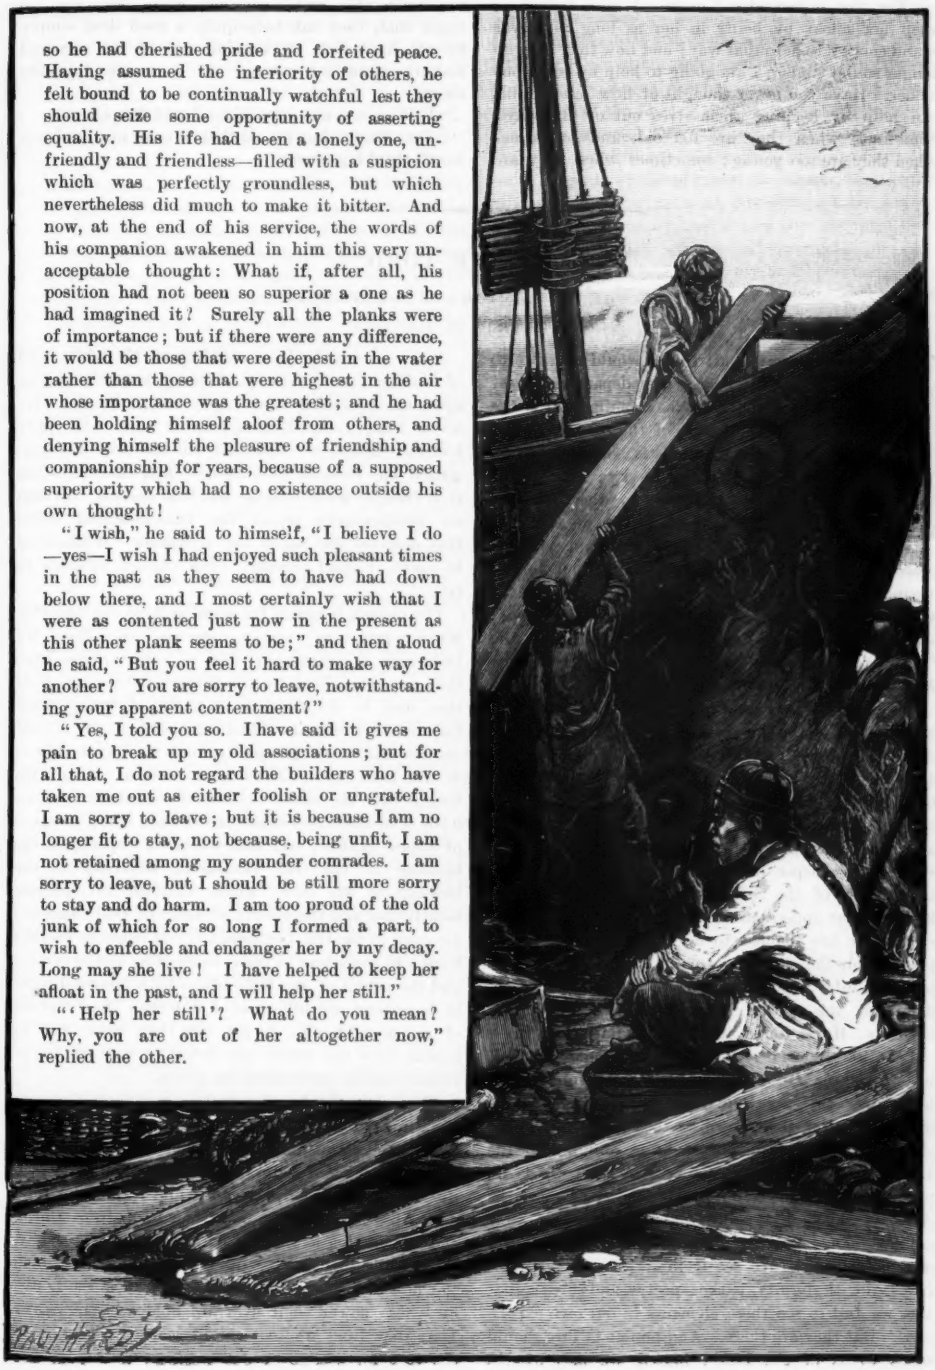
"I beg your pardon, I am sure, if I have offended you," said the other.

"Well, you must admit that your question implied an unpleasant reflection on me which was not likely to be gratifying to my feelings."

"That is why I hesitated, as you know, in asking it. But you must admit that your present resenting of my question as not being gratifying to your feelings makes it possible that the same reason led to your resenting your rejection from the junk's bow. However, we will forget that. You say that you are thinking exclusively of what is best for the junk, not of what is most pleasing to you. Now, if that be so—and I am bound to accept your statement—may it not possibly be that you, getting a trifle feeble, as you acknowledge, may serve the junk best by making way for another plank—one that is perfectly strong? Remember"—the plank hurried on, as his aggrieved companion seemed inclined to reply before he was finished—"you say you have no thoughts about yourself in this matter, but only about what is best for the junk. Now, would not she be weaker if even one board were a trifle unsound than if all her planks were strong, and not a single one beginning to decay?"

The answer with which the other had a moment before tried to interrupt his questioner never came. He was silent. He had not seen the matter in just that way before, though it was so natural a way for others to see it in.

The other went on: "I, too, have been rejected, and it is not without a good deal of pain that I break up all my old friendships, and face the fact that once having been removed from the junk I shall never return to her. You were away up in the air, riding proudly, as you say, at the very front, and did not see much of us who formed the flat bottom; but we were a jolly set, very much attached to each other, and having a good deal of fun amongst ourselves; and though, whether in the water or on the beach, we were out of sight, we had a feeling, not altogether unjust, I believe, that there were no planks in the whole junk that had more to do than we had in securing her strength and safety."



The other sighed. These words gave him a glimpse into a scene of happiness such as he had never enjoyed. He remembered that not only had he known nothing of the planks at the bottom, but that he had known little of those whose place was next his own. His elevated position had led him to consider himself altogether too great a plank to associate with others.

so he had cherished pride and forfeited peace. Having assumed the inferiority of others, he felt bound to be continually watchful lest they should seize some opportunity of asserting equality. His life had been a lonely one, unfriendly and friendless—filled with a suspicion which was perfectly groundless, but which nevertheless did much to make it bitter. And now, at the end of his service, the words of his companion awakened in him this very unacceptable thought: What if, after all, his position had not been so superior a one as he had imagined it? Surely all the planks were of importance; but if there were any difference, it would be those that were deepest in the water rather than those that were highest in the air whose importance was the greatest; and he had been holding himself aloof from others, and denying himself the pleasure of friendship and companionship for years, because of a supposed superiority which had no existence outside his own thought!

"I wish," he said to himself, "I believe I do —yes—I wish I had enjoyed such pleasant times in the past as they seem to have had down below there, and I most certainly wish that I were as contented just now in the present as this other plank seems to be;" and then aloud he said, "But you feel it hard to make way for another? You are sorry to leave, notwithstanding your apparent contentment?"

"Yes, I told you so. I have said it gives me pain to break up my old associations; but for all that, I do not regard the builders who have taken me out as either foolish or ungrateful. I am sorry to leave; but it is because I am no longer fit to stay, not because, being unfit, I am not retained among my sounder comrades. I am sorry to leave, but I should be still more sorry to stay and do harm. I am too proud of the old junk of which for so long I formed a part, to wish to enfeeble and endanger her by my decay. Long may she live! I have helped to keep her afloat in the past, and I will help her still."

"'Help her still'? What do you mean? Why, you are out of her altogether now," replied the other.

"Yes, that is just what I mean. I have helped to keep her afloat by being in her as long as I was sound enough to help that way; and now that I am no longer sound timber, I am going to help by being out of her. Have you never thought of how much folks can help by keeping themselves out of the way? Sometimes when they are too old, and sometimes when they are too young; sometimes when they are too much this, and sometimes when they are too much that, they can help quite a good deal simply by not hindering, by keeping out of the way and making room for others. It is worth thinking about."

"It is quite a new idea to me," said the other.

"Very likely; but for all that, it is an idea, as I say, worth thinking about."

"IT IS THE LORD."

BY THE REV. MICHAEL EASTWOOD.

"It is the Lord."—ST. JOHN xxi. 7.

O all things would conspire to say. The departing night and the coming day; the ripple of the sacred sea and the mystic shadows of the morning sky; the birds awaking to their matins, and the cattle on the hills around; city and village; peaceful life and tragic history; Galilee and Jordan distinctly marked through the sea; prosperity in the adjacent towns and failure in the returning boat; all these details cluster round the figure on the "shining shore," and seem to whisper with the Apostle John, "It is the Lord."

Like St. Peter, we need some such reminder. And we have it. St. John's whisper comes to us after eighteen hundred years, falling upon our heart more distinctly than upon St. Peter's ear. And in that brief whisper he sums up the story told in the last chapter of his Gospel. And as we read the story, and gaze upon the picture, we have more than the suggestive whisper of St. John—we have the still small voice of the Spirit quickening our faculties, kindling our imagination, and convincing our soul; so that we are enabled to say not only of the sacred presence on the shore, but of all things besides, "It is the Lord." We learn to see the Lord in every detail of the picture. He stands within all its shadows; He is found in all its radiance. Thus—

1. DARK GLOOMY FAILURE should sometimes tell us, "It is the Lord." The shadows of night still hang over this apostolic picture, throwing a sable distinctness on the returning boat, deepening the gloom on seven disappointed faces, and hiding the Lord Himself, or so disguising Him that He is no more than some would-be purchaser whom the Apostles must disappoint, and whose money they cannot take. Vulgar, prosy, common failure and disappointment! We see it in its diviner bearings, invested with dignity, pathos, poetry, and spirituality. But we fail to see these elements in our own experience. But they are there. And honest failure should speak to us of the Lord; indeed, we may ascribe it to Him.

When we see the Lord standing on the white sand of Galilee (the "shining shore"), tenderly gazing upon the returning boat empty of all freight save seven hungry, tired, disappointed men who have honestly failed, we feel that He has not only permitted but induced that failure; and that, after all, it is fraught with blessing and true success. So that we involuntarily repeat the time-honoured words that describe the lot of the righteous, "Whatsoever he doeth it shall prosper," even though it seem to fail.

The picture is meant for us as well as the Apostles. We are prone to worship "success," so-called. We look with a compassion akin to contempt on lives that are symbolised by the picture before us—lives that may be described as a night of long, weary failure. We see the hand of the Lord in visible success and outer prosperity; but we forget that it is the Lord who withholds as well as gives. We forget that He stands within the shadows looking with tenderness and appreciation upon every instance of honest failure; and that while "Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction and the clearer evidence of God's favour; yet even in the Old Testament, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols; and the pencil of the Holy Ghost hath laboured more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon."* We forget, too, that what was to human view the shame and defeat of Calvary, is the victory which overcometh the world.

Altogether, the Apostles present a pitiable instance of failure. For some three years they had been the friends and companions of the Lord Himself, but in spite of kind and reiterated teaching from His own lips, and from the lips of Moses and Elijah, the foremost Apostle did not know as much of Jesus Christ and His mission as many a little child knows to-day. Now, while this may be justly ascribed to their own slowness of heart, yet we can see that "it is the Lord" by whose power their eyes are holden. And why? That they (and we too) might learn the lesson that the true knowledge of Jesus Christ is due to the ministration of the Holy Spirit, and not to our sagacity, patience, or fidelity. Three years' teaching from the lips of Christ, corroborated by the ghostly voices of Moses and Elijah, failed to show even Peter that his Master was the Saviour. But one whisper of the Holy Ghost on the Day of Pentecost, and he saw and felt "the truth." Thus we may ascribe the night of Apostolic ignorance to the Lord, who withheld the full gift of the Spirit until the right moment had come.

And how forlorn is the condition of the Apostles as they come before us on the present occasion! Three years' following of the Lord seems to have ended in utter failure. And we can imagine the tones of Peter all the more sad because of his usual heartiness, as he says: "I go a-fishing," and the melancholy response, "We also go with thee." And even then, the honest and laborious endeavour at brotherhood and livelihood has no such reward as they craved and deserved. "That night they caught nothing."

How painful, too, at such a time, to be questioned as to how we are getting on! The stranger on the shore, though his question be ever so kindly, but aggravates the sense of failure.

We can see that these men, however mistaken as to their conception of Christ, were honest and sincere. They deserved success, but it was withheld from them for a time.

Let the Christian of to-day, who has committed himself unreservedly and simply to Christ, as did these Galileans, but who is mysteriously suffering all the sickening agonies of prolonged failure (so-called) either in the Church, or in the world, or both, let him take heart as the Holy Spirit whispers (more tenderly than John to Peter): "It is the Lord."

2. VISIBLE SUCCESS, BRIGHT AND CHEERING, should also repeat the same truth, "It is the Lord." The night is long, but the morning cometh. Our Lord appears, whether we recognise Him or not. His personality does not depend on our recognition. It is He, whether we recognise Him or not.

Then comes the cheery command, "Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes."

When such a change as this comes, we are in danger of forgetting the Lord. The lessons of the night and the discipline of failure are lost upon us sometimes. We are elated, carried away, forgetful of the Lord, forgetful that the incident is a kindly repetition.* We think of our energy. We congratulate ourselves upon our skill. We irreverently speak of a "lucky chance." Even Peter, so full of faith and love, sees nothing Divine in the incident; and we too in our exhilaration forget the meaning and significance of the present moment with its blessings and successes and memories, until we are recalled to our better self by some Divine whisper, "It is the Lord."

Without Him (with all reverence be it said) we never caught a single fish or achieved a single success.

* See St. Luke v.

Like Peter, may we be seized with a more reverential spirit when we are reminded that it is the Lord; like St. Peter and his associates, let us join together in bringing the tokens of our success, and laying them at the feet of the Lord, reverently and thankfully.

3. THE HOMELY DETAILS OF LIFE should repeat the same ascription—"It is the Lord." When the seven Apostles gathered round the Master, they found no mysterious environment, but although He was in His resurrection glory, they found Him occupied with common every-day affairs, and interested in such homely details as bread, fish, fire, and breakfast.

Common things become sacramental when He touches them, or if we touch thankfully and as in His presence. And such things may be invested with dignity and poetry.

We are accustomed to associate religion with stately edifices; with ponderous volumes; with phraseology that is sonorous, antiquated, and inflexible; with officials who are more decorous than natural and accessible; with rows of people adjusted to stiff-backed seats; and with rite, ceremony, and usage pertaining to Sunday rather than to Monday—to say nothing of an array of doctrines at which the very angels look with awe. And all these things have their place, not forgetting the officials whose imperfection is but equalled by the perfection of their message.

But we must not forget the homely, simple, every-day element. We must not forget that one of the last acts of our Lord was to provide a fish breakfast for His hungry "boys," as He called the Apostles. And it was holy ground, sacred as when He stood within the burning bush.

So, common objects—the loaf on our table, the fire on our hearth, the homely group on the sea-shore, are each associated with our blessed Lord. They speak of Him. To every responsive soul they whisper, "It is the Lord."

And the lowliest duties and engagements of life are sanctified by the example of our Lord and by their association with His person.

4. CHRISTIAN COMPANIONSHIP repeats the same truth. "It is the Lord" who gives us our friends. We do not "make" friends, as we sometimes vainly say: they are sent to us by the Lord.

The seven Apostles come before us as associates, comrades and friends, toiling and waiting side by side. They group themselves on the shore, friend with friend. But the central figure is the Lord. It is He who gives coherence to the group. It is He who has brought these men together. Take Him out of their life—and out of our life—and all true companionship is lost. The nearer we are to Him, the nearer we are to one another; the further we are from Him, the further from one another.

Peter, be thankful for John. John, be thankful for Peter. You are God's gift to each other. And Peter—energetic, impulsive, chief spokesman, foremost of the apostolic band—do not be too great a man to listen to John when he whispers, "It is the Lord." You might have missed this opportunity. Your superabundant energy may dull your perception. John can see further than you can. You are looking everywhere but where the Lord is; and when you look where He is you do not recognise Him.

And, John, you will not forget your mission. It is the Lord who bids you tell what you see; as He afterwards bids you "write" what you hear. Love, and you will see; love, and you will tell. Your quiet whisper to Peter is a sacred obligation. And Peter's dramatic energy will tell the whole company.

How we live for one another! It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous. How we are each greater than the other!—in some respect. Truly each may esteem the other better than himself. It is so. And "it is the Lord" who has made us so.

5. REBUKE AND ENCOURAGEMENT likewise repeat the same truth. "It is the Lord" who means to administer a rebuke—and an encouragement—to St. Peter that the Apostle will never forget. Having ministered to his bodily necessities, satisfying his mouth with good things and comforting his tired limbs with the warmth of a fire, the Lord favours His disciple with edification. "Breakfast" is followed by the means of grace.

First comes rebuke, and a very pointed rebuke. With a searching question, and with the honoured name of "Peter" suppressed, the Lord strikes home to the pride and cowardice of His servant. The Apostle feels it. And in answer to the probing question, "Dost thou honour Me with a supreme regard?" he falteringly says, "I love Thee."

Then comes restoration—for the Lord never means irritation when He reproves—"Feed My little lambs." This is the sentence passed on the man who denied his Master. "It is the Lord," and He alone who could have done it.

Again the searching question is asked. The same answer is given. The sentence is enlarged: "Shepherd My sheep." Yea, a third time the question is asked; but this time the Lord uses Peter's own words, and says, "Dost thou love Me? Hast thou any poor, weak affection for Me?" Peter, "grieved," but doubtless with a godly sorrow, says, "Thou canst see that I love Thee."—"Feed My sheep," replies the Lord. And the disciple who denied and fled is restored and commissioned afresh. We should have urged his excommunication. "It is the Lord" who rebukes and restores him.

6. THE SHADOW OF DEATH repeats St. John's whisper, "It is the Lord." That shadow rests upon the group. In the very moment of uplifting and exhilaration, when Peter is restored and commissioned afresh, comes the thought of death. It is the Lord who suggests it. And to this very day pensive thoughts of death at once take possession of us in our moments of joy, transfiguration, and uplifting. "It is the Lord."

"This spake He signifying by what death He should glorify God." Our death is not an accident. It is not a disaster. It is the Lord who graciously removes us for His glory. Whether we breathe our life out quietly on our own couch, or die what is deemed a grievous death, "It is the Lord" who calls us to Himself.

Let us not personify death: "It is the Lord." That dark figure standing on the shining shore, and whom Apostles fail to recognise, is not Death: it is the Lord.

Indeed, we have a lovely picture of death in the earlier incident, when Peter plunges into the waves to rush to his Lord. So shall we. Some loved companion—some sweet-voiced John; perhaps an angel; perhaps some dear departed child of our own, will whisper, just at the darkest moment, "It is the Lord;" and our face will beam with the light of recognition you have seen upon the dying, and we shall plunge into the cold, dark stream of death to find ourselves dying at the feet of the Lord; yea, rather, rising into the life of God.

So the night will end. No more sea. Toil and disappointment over. All the life that follows, with its mingled rest and service and communion, shall be summed up in St. John's thrilling, prophetic whisper, "IT IS THE LORD."

Meanwhile—

> "Thrice blest is he to whom is given
> The instinct that can tell
> That God is in the field when He > Is most invisible."

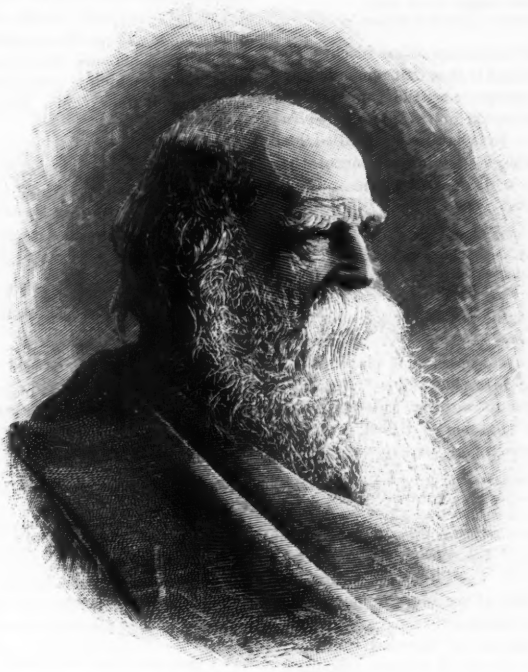
THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

NATURE still points with lifted hand
To God, and fain would teach
What simple hearts may understand
And lips of wisdom preach.



On branching boughs, the blooms that climb
From height to sunny height,
Through all the golden summer-time,
Aspire to gain the light.

Their fragrance, filling all the air,
Their glory of attire,
Their lovely colours, sweet and fair,
Are born of this desire!

Thus, striving upward to the light
That comes from God, we know
How gracious, beautiful, and bright
Our lives will surely grow!

BRYANT'S RELIGIOUS POETRY.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.
(From a Photograph by Sarony, New York.)

IN his "Fable for Critics," Mr. Russell Lowell classified Bryant's verse as quiet, cool, and dignified, and compared it to a "smooth, silent iceberg." Lowell doubted the accuracy of the comparison that had so often been made of Bryant and Wordsworth, and he suggested Thomson or Cowper as poets to whom the great American author bore resemblance; but whatever the doubt as to the exact parallel with English authors, there is none as to the high position that Bryant occupied on the American Parnassus.

William Cullen Bryant, born at Cummington, in the State of Massachusetts, on November 3rd, 1794, had a long, a laborious, and a happy life; and after his death, on June 12th, 1878, a leading American magazine described him as one who had, "by reason of his venerable age, his unquestioned genius, his pure and lofty character, his noble achievements in letters" become "the principal citizen of the great Republic."

His life was one of action as well as of thought. According to Emerson, he has written "some of the very best" American poetry. As early as when he was ten years old only, a school exercise of his was printed in a newspaper in his native State. His writing was continued while he was working as school-boy, as collegian—his college career cut short through the circumstances of his father; as lawyer—who engrossed as well as penned stanzas; then as a journalist of eminence, who had for half a century the responsibility of the conduct of a great daily newspaper. He bore as a journalist the brunt of conflicts as to protection, currency, and slavery; and had his share in the long warfare of above a dozen fiercely fought presidential elections. In the midst of this work his poems were written. As one of his friends has said, he was a journalist to the end of his days, but he never ceased to be a poet.

But it is with the religious poetry of Bryant that we have now to do. And whilst it may be added that throughout his poetry a healthy Christian spirit is generally breathed, yet there are also verses distinctly devotional in aim and character. That early and remarkable poem, "Thanatopsis," put into words much of the old teaching of the Puritans its author was descended from. Its moral is in its latest lines:—

> "So live, that when thy summons comes to join
> The innumerable caravan, which moves
> To that mysterious realm where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,

Thou go not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

From that poem down to the latest, his teaching is clear and unmistakable; and it is worth remembering that one of his latest poems was the Ode written for the birthday of Washington in 1878, published in a Sunday-school paper. In what may be called his general poetry, Bryant places his appreciation of the revealed truth. In his well-known poem, "To a Waterfowl," he urges that

"There is a Power whose care
Teaches thy way along that pathless coast,
The desert and illimitable air,
Lone wandering, but not lost."

And this is much the same teaching as in his last long poem, "The Flood of Years." He traces the effect of years on many peoples and classes, and shows how beyond "The Life that is," is "The Life to Come," and he shows how into immortality enter the good and sweet lives that here are lost to sight. Then he concludes by pointing out that in the place—

"Of this grief-shadowed Present there shall be
A Present in whose reign no grief shall gnaw
The heart, and never shall a tender tie
Be broken, in whose reign the eternal change
That waits on growth and action shall proceed
With everlasting concord hand-in-hand."

We shall not err much if we class amongst his religious verse that didactic poem "The Ages," which Bryant wrote for the students of Harvard College—"serious and thoughtful survey of history, tracing a general love of progress," as G. W. Curtis calls it. The stately Spenserian stanza declares that "Eternal Love doth keep in His complacent arms the earth, the air, the deep." And to the question whether the Merciful One who stamped our race with His own image—now that the swarming nations have spread far away—will forget His latest offspring? the poet replies—

"Oh, no! A thousand cheerful omens give Hope of yet happier days, whose dawn is nigh;
He who has tamed the elements shall not live
The slave of his own passions; he whose eye
Unwinds the eternal dances of the sky,
And in the abyss of the brightness dares to span
The sun's broad circle rising yet more high,
In God's magnificent works his works shall span,
And love and peace shall make their paradise with man."

Again in "A Forest Hymn" this is the moral. Having struck the keynote that "the groves were God's first temples," the solemnity of the forest is traced, and the hand of the Father is shown in the rearing of the "venerable columns," which are yet a fit shrine for the "humble worshipper to hold communion with his Maker." There is continual worship here, where man beside the mighty oak seems "almost annihilated;" and written on the mighty works, the worshipper reads "The lesson of Thy own eternity." And thus—

"Be it ours to meditate
In these calm shades Thy milder majesty,
And to the beautiful order of Thy works
Learn to conform the order of our lives."

It may, however, best illustrate the religious poetry of Bryant if we quote in full one of his hymns—one comparatively little known in England. The "Hymn of the City" is well worth quotation, but there are others that will perhaps appeal to more universal sympathy. There are two that attract—two hymns of trust, one of which is "The Cloud on the Way," and the other "Mors Janua Vitæ," and we quote the latter:—

"Beside a massive gateway, built up in years gone by,
Upon whose top the clouds in eternal shadow lie;
While streams the evening sunshine on quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

The tree-tops faintly rustle beneath the breeze's flight—
A soft and soothing sound, yet it whispers of the night;
I hear the wood-thrush piping one mellow descant more,
And scent the flowers that blow when the heat of day is o'er.

Behold the portals open, and o'er the threshold now
There steps a weary one with a pale and furrowed brow;
His count of years is full, his allotted task is wrought,
He passes to his rest from a place that knows him not.

In sadness then I ponder how quickly fleets the hour
Of human strength and action, man's courage and his power;
I muse while still the wood-thrush sings down the golden day,
And as I look and listen the sadness wears away.

Again the hinges turn, and a youth, departing, throws
A look of longing backward, and sorrowfully goes;
A blooming maid unbinding the roses from her hair,
Moves mournfully away from amongst the young and fair.

Oh, glory of our race, that so suddenly decays!
Oh, crimson flush of morning, that darkens as we gaze!
Oh, breath of summer blossoms, that on the restless air
Scatters a moment's sweetness, and flies we know not where!

I grieve for life's bright promise, just shown and then withdrawn;
But still the sun shines round me, the evening bird sings on;
And I again am soothed, and beside the ancient gate
In this soft evening twilight I calmly stand and wait.

Once more the gates are opened; an infant group go out,
The sweet smile quenched for ever, and stilled the sprightly shout.
Oh, frail, frail Tree of Life! that upon the greensward strews
Its fair young buds unopened, with every wind that blows.

So come from every region, so enter, side by side,
The strong and faint of spirit, the meek and men of pride;
Steps of earth's great and mighty, between those pillars gray,
And prints of little feet mark the dust upon the way.

And some approach the threshold whose looks are blank with fear,
And some whose temples brighten with joy in drawing near,
As if they saw dear faces, and caught the gracious eye
Of Him, the Sinless Teacher, who came for us to die.

I mark the joy, the terror; yet these, within my heart,
Can neither wake the dread nor the longing to depart;
And in the sunshine streaming on quiet wood and lea
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me."

The central idea in this poem is not very new nor very profound, but the verses are musical, the words are very choice, and the sentiment will commend it to most. The other hymn we have named—"The Cloud on the Way," has similar merit; "a mist upon the ground" blots the way for ever; we enter into the dark cloud, and are gathered to the past. But beneath the "sullen skirts" the rosy morning glimmers through, and

"One whose feet the thorns have wounded passed that barrier and came back,
With a glory on His footsteps lighting yet the dreary track.
Boldly enter where He entered; all that seems but darkness here,
When thou hast passed beyond it, haply shall be crystal clear."

And there is much more of teaching such as this—that there is a serener realm beyond earth's conflicts, and that to it the Light of the World illumines the "dreary track." In his "Centennial Hymn" Bryant does not attain the height of that contemporary American poet's beginning—

> "Our fathers' God, from out whose hand,
> The centuries fall like dropping sand;"

but the verses he wrote for the Philadelphia Exposition have vigour and yet repose, their chief thought being the truly national one of thanks to the guardian Power, "who kept our sacred league of States entire."

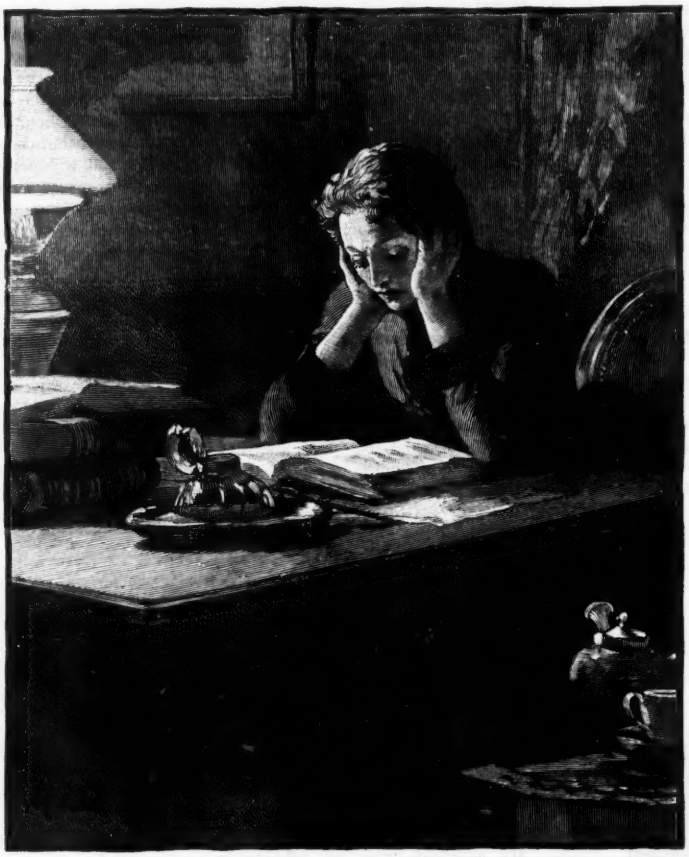
Another hymn merits quotation, the "Hymn of the Sea"—that mighty sea the restless billows of which are swayed by a Mightier. The Creator "moves o'er it evermore"; His friendly breeze bears the ships; His tempests wake the fury of the sea, and the fierce tornado descends on an armed fleet that carries war to smite some city, and the "vast hulks are whirled like chaff upon the waves." Again, the Creator is shown teaching the "coral-worm to lay his mighty reefs. So the valleys of creation praise their Creator in silent beauty, and the woods, "swept by the murmuring winds of ocean, join the murmuring shores in a perpetual hymn."

Bryant translated also some beautiful verses, one of which is called "The Life of the Blessed," and is from the "Spanish of Luis Ponce de Leon," and its companions have become favourites of some Spanish scholars. The first verse of the translation named may be quoted—

> "Region of life and light!
> Land of the good whose earthly toils are o'er;
> Nor frost nor heat may blight
> Thy vernal beauty, fertile shore,
> Yielding thy blessed fruits for evermore."

These, then, are examples of the religious poetry of William Cullen Bryant. In some respects his poems have been overshadowed by those of Longfellow, and in others by Whittier's productions. Bryant has not attached to his verse either the personal interest or the pathos that there are to be found in some of Longfellow's poems—as, for instance, in the lines written for the ordination of his brother; and that verse has not the spiritual depth of Whittier shown by the latter in poems such as "My Soul and I." But in the religious poetry of Bryant there is a calmness and a quiet meditativeness, and a lesson of trust that must make it acceptable to many minds. There is a lack of enthusiasm, it is true; there is less of beauty in detail, but the proportions are grand, and the main idea is not only well developed, but is insisted on again and again. The versification is good, the imagery chaste, but the method of treatment will more attract the cultivated than captivate the many. The poet attained early a high rank amongst the singers in his own country, and his latter efforts preserved the fame. It may be said somewhat similarly of his religious verse—that he has presented in melodious strains one or two phases of truth, rather than aimed at illustrating many, and hence there are some of the American poets whose efforts are perhaps less meritorious than Bryant's, who are yet better known in this country.

THE CATHEDRAL LESSON.



A SERMON STORY.

BY THE REV. JOHN M. BAMFORD, AUTHOR OF "MY JEALOUSY."

I HAD just completed a term of close study for "The Higher Local," and was making my final preparations on the eve of the exam. My ambition was to obtain a first-class in "The Women's Cambridge." Night and day I had studied hard. The morning light had frequently surprised me in the midst of some abstruse problem. "To-morrow," I ejaculated, "will come the trial of my strength." At that moment the wick of the lamp began to sputter, and the brightness of the flame to fade. The old clock on the stairs gave warning for one. "Dear me! is it so late? Why, to-morrow is here already; it is to-day before I knew it." I hastily put aside my papers, and shading the light with my hand, stole noiselessly to bed, but not to sleep. The strain of the work was beginning to tell upon my nervous system. For some time I had been conscious of a sensitiveness and irritability which I had not felt before. Little things vexed me. Sudden noises made me start. My temper was less patient, and my brain more imaginative. For all this, I esteemed the prize of scholarship as a grand compensation. After a restless night I appeared at the breakfast-table with a tint of redness round the eyes, and a flush of feverishness on the cheeks, which I could not hide from my loving mother. The fact is, mother and I were not quite agreed concerning my studies. She was a woman of practical mind, with force and energy of character. Her income was more than equal to our needs, and her daily care was so to use it that she might be the Christian helper of others She certainly remembered the words of the Lord Jesus: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Whatever she did receive was precious to her as a means of increasing her power to give. She did not actually oppose my studies. The question on which we differed was in the use of woman's influence. I contended for an intellectual view of life. Labour which was not distinguished by mental strength and culture had no charm for me. I despised feebleness —at least, I did not think it worth my while to hold fellowship with persons of commonplace gifts. If I could not command a kind of intellectual ascendency or discern the same in others, I stood aloof. My intellect was so strong in me, that I flattered myself on my superior understanding of scholastic training as a modern accomplishment.

As she lovingly saluted me on the morning of my examination, she noticed, with motherly anxiety, my excited look. "Honor, my dear," said mother, "I see Nature is putting in a plea for rest."

"I was making my final preparations."—p. 671.

mother's view of woman's work was very different from this, but as her methods would have interrupted my studies by placing me in personal contact with the weak and weary, I did not care to consider them. I was great on the theory of education, but upon its applied influence my ideas were very dim. My mother valued the improvement of the mind as a means to an end: the more directly she could keep the two things in touch, the better she was satisfied. In her own way she was always learning and teaching, but not after my fashion. I studied and stored —she studied and dispensed. But the pride of

"She shall have it," I replied, "when I am well through this exam.; but not before."

"You know," continued mother, "that I rejoice in your success. Honour to you is honour to me; but prudence will estimate the prize partly by the cost."

I retorted somewhat pettishly, "Surely, mother, you would not have me let go the prize when it is so near my grasp? What if I do sacrifice a little bodily strength: shall I not be repaid in the discipline of the mind?"

My mother kissed me, and said, "Yes, dear, if it minister to the discipline of the heart."

The remark did not please me. I put on my bonnet and hastened to the college, ruffled in spirit; but fiercely determined to succeed. Day after day, with aching head, I toiled through the examination. The last day proved almost too much for my endurance, and when I handed my final papers to the examiner, I was too nervous to look him in the face.

I think he noticed this, for he spoke to me so kindly that I ventured to look up. He was not an old man, yet life had wrought on him grave lines, which gave him the aspect of premature age. His countenance contained such a strange blending of work and rest, that it imprinted itself upon my memory. On my way home, I paused before the first shop mirror, and contrasted my own excited face with the calm expression of the examiner.

The shop stood in the shadow of the Cathedral, and the bells were ringing for evening service.

I sauntered mechanically into the Cathedral Close, not with any intention to enter, but to refresh my interest in architectural studies by tracing the lines of the beautiful fabric, and recalling the historic periods which it illustrated. The setting sun was shining full on the great western window, kindling its painted figures into life, and brightening its Gothic tracery with warm orange light.

As the last thin cloud passed from the sun's disc, the massive façade of the Cathedral rose before me like a grand illuminated picture of mediæval times.

Service had now commenced. The chanting of the choristers fell so sweetly on my ears, that it came like healing to my disordered nerves. The invitation to enter was too strong to be resisted. I passed the verger at the door, glided along the echoing nave, and sought refuge in a stall where the light was not too strong for me.

I was thoroughly tired out, fagged with brain-work and loss of sleep. If any stranger had spoken to me then, or cast a searching eye upon me, it would have disturbed my self-possession. I was haunted with a fear that I had done badly in the examination. Mathematical problems flitted through my mind like ghosts. Even my shaky figures mocked me, until I was ready for a good cry. The singing soothed me. I felt the nervous strain ease under the influence of worship. With the awe of the building upon my senses, and the harmonies of praise and prayer upon my spirit, I yielded to a rapt tranquillity of mind, and fell asleep. My busy brain, however, reproduced the Cathedral service, and cunningly contrived to mingle with it sundry events of the day, which caused my slumber to be anything but refreshing. The congregation resolved itself into a company of fellow-students poring over examination papers. I could see their brows contract in deep thought, and hear their pens working in solemn stillness, as if dealing with subjects of life and death. My papers lay untouched before me. I was painfully conscious how rapidly time was passing, yet something held me back. By a tremendous effort I got to work, but to my dismay the questions were of a class I had not anticipated. I could not answer them without making searching inquiry into my own inner life. I worked hard, but when, after intense application, I had left so many blanks, the task seemed to me utterly hopeless. What was I to do? I was desperate. I rolled up the papers, rose from my seat, and, preceded by a verger, walked down the choir to the Examiner who occupied the bishop's throne. So resolute was I that the sound of my own footfall did not frighten me. The Examiner received me with the same earnest, sympathetic look which had previously impressed me. "My Lord," I said, "there is a mistake here. I have studied languages—I am advanced in mathematics—I am well up in English subjects—but these questions are wide of the mark; I cannot succeed with them at all."

"Wide of thy mark, perhaps thou meanest," said the Examiner. He rose: "Sit here, my child."

I sank back under the canopy of the throne, and watched him as he ascended the pulpit, unrolled my papers, and read out my work aloud; but the contrast between the depth of the questions and the shallowness of my replies, was so remarkable, that in the humiliation of a great failure I covered my face. There was not a sound. I could have heard a pin drop. Oh! if the organ had pealed forth at that moment, what a relief! I dared to raise my head, and caught the kindly eye of the Examiner, as he broke the awful silence with the words:—"I propose to keep open this examination, that your fellow-student may try again. If she work these questions with her heart and intellect, she may yet obtain an honourable pass!" The suspense to me was so exciting, that under the strain of it I awoke.

I must have slept some time, for the bishop, who was the preacher for the evening, had already reached the application of his subject.

His closing sentences impressed me as the class of thoughts I might have expected from the examiner in my dream. "If," said he, "the great realm of the human heart be left out of the scheme of culture, the moral nature will not possess dignity. Intellectual power may be attained without intellectual refinement. Intellectual power may even minister to intellectual impurity. The cleverness of scholarship may promote the subtlety of sin. The only teaching to save the empire of intellect from becoming an empire of self and pride, is the teaching of the Divine Will. The only guarantee of a clean heart is the grace of God. The true interest of life, the real harmony of being, the satisfaction which is superior to outward circumstances, the influence which abides in the memories of men, is that which derives its teaching daily from the will of God. The lesson may come in the works of nature or in the lives of men. It may come in the discipline of Providence, or in the written Word, or in the direct voice of the Divine Spirit: or it may come in the appeal I now make to you; but until God gives the lesson, and we obey it, our education is incomplete."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

July 20. Taking up the Cross.

To read—St. Luke xiv. 25–33. Golden Text—ver. 27.

I. THE OCCASION. (Ver. 25.) Christ, now well known throughout all the land of Palestine, had preached in Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee.

What else had He done? Remind of wonderful miracles of feeding, healing, and casting out devils. No wonder great crowds followed Him wherever He went. Of whom did the crowd consist?

Poor and hungry who had been fed.

Tender women who had been healed.

Little children who had been blessed.

Strong men, leaving farm, or shop, or fishing-boats to listen to this wonderful preacher.

All these crowded round Him, wanting to become disciples.

II. THE TEACHING. (26—33.) What strange words! What are they told?

To give up dearest relations—to lay down life itself—to take up a daily cross—to forsake all (ver. 33) if they would be truly Christ's disciples.

What did Christ mean?

Notice—not now speaking of sin. Had already in Sermon on Mount shown that His religion reached to the very thoughts of the heart as well as outward actions. (See St. Matt. v. 22—34, etc.)

Christ speaking here of blessings God has given to us—the good things of life—these He claims as His, to be given up at His call. For example—

Money—renounced by Matthew the publican (St. Matt. ix. 9).

Health—Job afflicted with sickness (Job ii. 7).

Friends—Sons of Zebedee gave up father and all (St. Matt. iv. 22).

Life—St. Stephen stoned to death (Acts vii. 58).

Children—Abraham offered up Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2).

But besides giving up good things, what have disciples to do? Bear the cross. What is this?

(a) Doing disagreeable duties—e.g., Jonah sent to Nineveh (Jonah i. 3). Moses told to speak to the rock (Num. xx. 10).

(b) Suffering hardships in doing Christ's work—e.g., St. Paul. (See 2 Cor. xi. 25, 26.)

(c) Bearing persecutions—e.g., St. Peter imprisoned (Acts xii. 2).

What must children give up?

Anything that comes between their soul and God—e.g., a game which makes them out of temper—a friend whose influence is hurtful—books which unduly excite. Why must they be given up? Because Christ must be first in the heart—can have no rival—therefore must be ready to give up even things lawful for His sake. So Christ bids—"Count the cost."

Can a king run risk of being defeated by a larger army?—or a builder of making himself a laughing-stock by being unable to finish his house?

What shall we have instead? Present peace, joy, happiness; and future glory, honour, and immortality.

Are we willing to deny ourselves for Christ?

July 27. Lost and Found.

To read—St. Luke xv. 1—10. Golden Text—ver. 10.

I. THE OCCASION. Very different hearers from those in last lesson.

Those were friends of Christ—these are enemies.

Publicans—collectors of taxes, noted for their extortions (iii. 13).

Sinners—deep laden with sins, like the woman who washed His feet; others were there also who objected to His mixing with such as these (vii. 39).

Pharisees—who trusted in themselves that they were righteous. (xviii. 9.)

Scribes—copiers and expounders of the Law.

To all these Christ spake three parables, teaching of sinners lost, searched for, brought back to God.

II. THE LOST SHEEP. (4—7.) A picture of a lost sinner.

How is a sinner like a sheep?

(a) In his folly—choosing to leave the fold for what he thinks better pasture.

(b) In his proneness to wander—i.e., depart from God (Ps. cxix. 176).

But the sheep is not left to himself. The shepherd misses it, searches for it, leaves the ninety-nine to seek for this one, goes himself to find it, does not leave the search till it is found.

Remind of some who wandered thus and were brought back.

David, who committed murder and other sins, restored through Nathan the prophet.

Peter, who denied Christ, restored by Christ's look of love (xxii. 61).

What have sinners lost who wander from God?

Peace—for there is none to the wicked (Is. lvii. 61).

Hope—for they are without God in the world (Eph. ii. 12).

Heaven—into which no sin can enter (Rev. xxi. 27).

But what joy is there when the lost is found? Whose joy is it?

Christ's, for He sees the fruit of His labours.

The angels', who share in Christ's joy and glory.

The saints', who welcome a brother back to their communion.

LESSONS. 1. We must feel ourselves lost before we can be found.

2. Shall Christ's search for us be in vain?

III. THE LOST COIN. The sheep was lost by its own folly; the coin by its owner's carelessness.

What is a coin? A piece of metal—of some value—bearing the image of the reigning king. If lost, does no good. Thus man was made in the image of God (Gen. i. 26). But sometimes this image is so defaced by dirt of sin as to be scarcely recognised. Sometimes altogether lost—not fulfilling its end at all. Whose fault is this?

Shall we, whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high,
Shall we to men benighted
The lamp of life deny?

If we do, the fault is ours. What, then, can we do?

Light the candle of God's Word (Ps. cxix. 105).

Search diligently for lost souls.

Rejoice with the angels over one soul brought back to God.

LESSONS. 1. What are we doing to search for others?

2. Is God's image being daily renewed in us?

AUGUST 3. THE PRODIGAL SON.

To read—St. Luke xv. 11—24. Golden Text—ver. 18.

I. THE SON AT HOME. (11, 12.) Remind what a parable is—a story with a meaning or lesson. First have a scene of home-life. Two sons living with father: have all they want—good food, clothing, servants to wait on them, father's care, a good home. One becomes discontented—wants his own way—to go out into the world. The father lets him go, giving him his portion of goods.

Picture here of person brought up in a Christian land. Has God for his Father—all religious privileges, etc., but neither values nor loves them. Of his own free will turns aside from all.

II. THE SON A WANDERER. (13—19.) Picture the son leaving home—the farewells, the excitement. Must have felt some pangs. What did he do?

Gathered together all he could get.

Went as far from home as possible.

Became riotous in his life and conduct.

Rightly called "prodigal," or "wasteful." What did he waste?

(a) His time—might have been spent for his own profit and for God's glory.

(b) His money—of which he was only a steward.

(c) His education—all thrown away.

(d) His opportunities—of usefulness.

A change soon came. Money spent—famine in the land. Who would care for a stranger? Has to endure much suffering. At last begins to think. What has he done? Behaved Foolishly—servants well fed while the son starves.

Ungratefully—to a kind and loving father.

Sinfully—to God in heaven.

Let children see here a picture of themselves when they turn away from God. Notice—

1. The pleasures of sin are fleeting.

2. Sinful life brings misery. (Illustrate by a drunkard's home.)

3. The ingratitude of departing from God.

III. THE SON RETURNED. (20—24.) Came back without delay.

The father, looking out for him, sees far off, recognises, runs to meet, kisses, and forgives.

The son begins his confession—he must pour out his heart.

The father listens, accepts, stops him before he speaks of being a servant, gives him welcome and a feast, calls on all to rejoice with him.

See in the son picture of sinners returning to God.

Notice these points in his repentance—

Conversion, or turning away from sin to God.

Contrition, or godly sorrow for sin.

Confession of sin against God and man.

Change—the beginning of a new life.

While on the part of God, the Father, notice His—Watching him all the while.

Meeting him half way—seeking to bring him to repentance.

Forgiving the moment he sought forgiveness.

Giving the good things of His grace to the repentant sinner.

How is it with us?

AUGUST 10. THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

To read—St. Luke xvi. 19—31. Golden Text—St. Mark x. 24.

INTRODUCTION. Christ tried teaching men their duty. Parables in last Lesson specially for publicans and sinners. This one specially for the rich. Wanted to show two things—

(a) Money a stewardship for which must give account.

(b) Men cannot serve God and Mammon together.

The Pharisees—mostly rich men—derided this idea. Hence this parable.

I. THE TWO IN TIME. (19—22.) 1. The rich man. Notice about him—

Was well fed, dressed, and housed. No harm in all this.

Lived according to his position in life.

God gave riches to Abraham and Solomon as rewards.

What was wrong? Was living without God.

Used time, money, comforts, for himself alone.

Cared not for poor beggar at his very door.

Thought not of God, his neighbour, or eternity.

2. The beggar—laid daily at rich man's gate.

Wounds unwashed, save for the licking of dogs.

But evidently put trust in God—was rich in faith (James ii. 5).

Cried to God, and was heard (Ps. xxxiv. 6).

Time passed on—both alike died.

The rich man's riches could not keep off death. Buried with pomp in tomb of his fathers.

The beggar with angels near to carry his soul to Paradise (Ps. xxxiv. 7).

XUM

II. THE TWO IN ETERNITY. (23—31.) 1. The rich man. His state. What was it?

Bodily suffering, likened to burning fire.

Mental anguish for his brothers left behind.

What does he want Abraham to do? Why impossible?

Sin unforgiven a barrier between man and God.

Why cannot messenger be sent to warn brothers?

Because if will not hear God's Word, will not hear God's messenger.

One did rise from the dead, but men did not repent (Acts xvii. 32).

2. The beggar. What is his state?

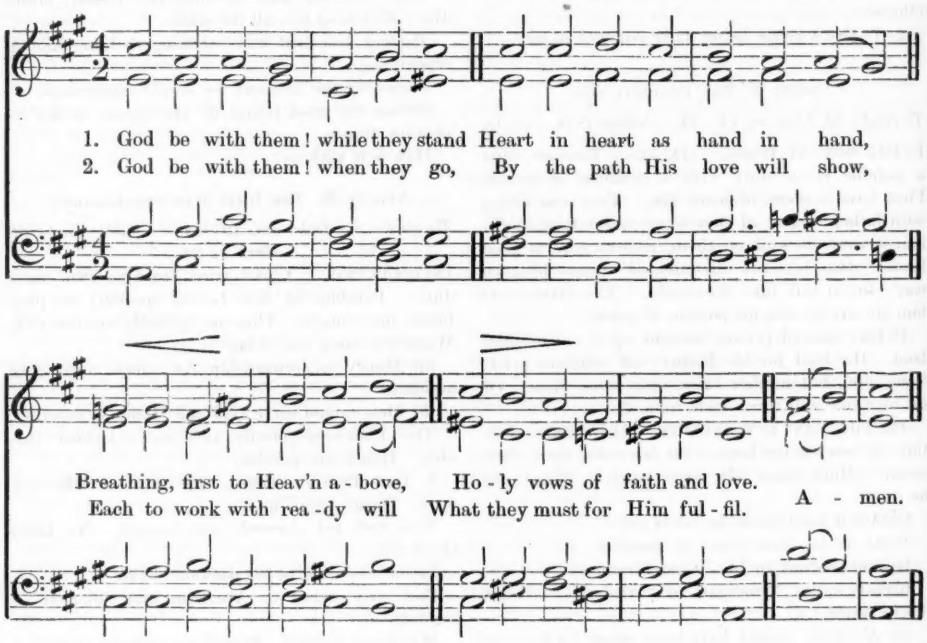
Bodily and mental happiness for ever.



III. LESSONS. 1. Now is the time to serve God. Delay dangerous. May be fatal.

2. Riches without religion a great snare. (Golden text.)

3. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for they shall see God."

Marriage Hymn.

Words by the REV. L. TUTTIETT, M.A. Music by W. B. ALCOCK, Mus.B., Oxon.

3.

God be with them! while they share
All He gives of toil and care;
Making glad whate'er they do,
With affection kind and true.

4.

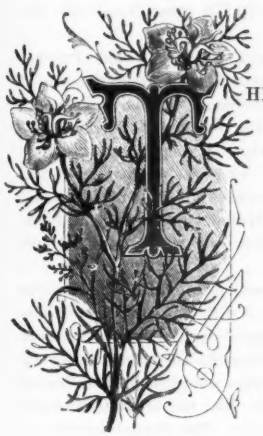
God be with them! while they sing,
'Mid the blessings time may bring;
Rising then, on wings of praise,
To the Light of all their days.

5.

God be with them! while they pray
Through a dark and troubled day,
Learning then, in pain and loss,
How to share their Master's cross.

6.

God be with them! when at last
Earthly joy for them is past;
Looking then for deathless love,
In a better home above. Amen.



ZECHARIAH'S GOLDEN CANDLESTICK.

A SERMON PREACHED IN BEHALF OF THE CITY MISSION. BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep,

"And said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof:

"And two olive-trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof," etc., etc.—ZECHARIAH iv.

THE Prophet Zechariah lived at the time of the return from the Babylonish captivity. He was specially raised up to be the comforter of his people during this great national crisis. A series of striking and significant visions were communicated to him in order to animate the zeal and quicken the hopes of the restored exiles. In the preceding chapter Joshua, the High Priest, personating the Jewish Church, is represented as standing before "the angel of the Lord" (the Angel—The Lord)—the angel of the Covenant; while Satan, the great adversary, is at his right hand to resist him, urging Jehovah to disregard the pleading of His chosen servant. God silences the accuser of the brethren. Joshua is stripped of his filthy garments, and clothed in fair raiment. A mitre is set upon his head; and the vision closes with a promise regarding the Man whose name is the Branch (the Branch from the decayed root of David's House), and a prediction of the vast honours and privileges awaiting the Church of God alike in earth and heaven.

After this magnificent revelation, the prophet, overpowered and overwhelmed, has sunk into a stupor or temporary bewilderment. The glory of it had been too much for him. The Lord awakes him (ver. 1). "The angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep." Then follows the beautiful vision, of which I purpose now, with God's blessing, to offer a simple exposition.

The subject naturally divides itself into two parts—the vision, and the design for which it was given.

I. First, we have the Vision. Let us take it clause by clause.

Verse 2: "The angel said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick." The candlestick, as it is familiarly known, is used to hold that which gives light in darkness, and as such, is a significant emblem of the Church of God. There was a time, preceding the Fall, when the world needed the intervention of no such means to obtain light. God's presence was enough. And of heaven, where the darkness of sin is never felt or feared, it is sublimely said, "They need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light." Astronomy tells us that the planets nearest the sun need no moons or satellites. They are bathed in the glory of the great central luminary. It is only the more distant ones which require this borrowed radiance. So it is in the spiritual world. It is only the Church on earth which requires these lesser lights to rule its night of ignorance and sin. The stars pale before the full-orbed glories of Deity. The Divine Sun of Righteousness, in the brightness of His heavenly rising, will quench the dim candles and tiny lamps which light up the earthly temple.

But the candlestick suggests, farther, the idea of the Church as a Dispenser of Light. It is set, not for ornament nor to retain its light for itself, but to diffuse it all around. A beautiful emblem we have here, also, of every true Church. It cannot appropriate or absorb its light. It is the illuminator of a dark world. Every Church, if it be a true light, must be also a Light-giver. As well speak of the sun, which brightens heaven with his radiance, imprisoning his beams, as the true Church of God selfishly appropriating her spiritual blessings, without an effort to share them with others. She is, or ought to be, the central beacon of hope and safety in the world's midnight sea, warning off the rocks of destruction, and pointing the way to the haven of peace.

But, farther (ver. 2), the Prophet beheld "a candlestick of gold." Gold is the most precious of metals. What can be comparable in preciousness to the Church purchased with the blood of Christ? Think how that emblematic candlestick was fashioned! The candlestick of the Temple of old was made of wrought gold. The clothing of the king's daughter (the Church of Christ) is a wrought tissue (Psalm xlv. 13). It was wrought in toil, and pain, and anguish. The sun which lights the material world (the glorious lamp in nature's temple) was kindled by an omnific word. "God said, Let light be," and the vault of heaven blazed with ten thousand altar-fires. But when the candlestick of the spiritual temple was moulded and fabricated, it required that its adorable High Priest should Himself become "perfect through suffering." "Oh, how great is Thy goodness which Thou hast laid up for them that fear Thee, which Thou hast wrought for them that trust in Thee, before the sons of men" (Psalm xxxi. 19).

Farther still: not only did the Prophet behold a candlestick of gold, but "all of gold." It was without alloy, consistent, of a piece throughout: no mixture or adulteration of any baser metal.

Brethren, how many there are content to be of gold, but not "all of gold!" The Church collectively, and believers individually, are too often content with meagre attainments. They are satisfied to act up to some conventional standard of spirituality, and there to stop. The old complaint of the Apostle can be preferred at this day: "They, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise." True it is that the purest Church and the loftiest type of believer can never, in one sense, be "all of gold." In this imperfect state they must rather be like the image of Nebuchadnezzar: partly of clay, and partly of iron. ONE only of the human race was all of gold. One pure and guiltless Being alone could make the challenge—"Which of you convinceth me of sin?" But though the holiest Church and holiest saint must come infinitely short of the peerless original, it is our duty to strive after the loftiest ideal—to aim, at least, at perfection. The young artist is well aware, despite of all care and scrupulous fidelity, how inferior his copy must be to the work of the great master—how far the glowing colour or the breathing marble before him transcends the highest efforts of his unpractised brush or chisel. But he aspires after as near an approach as possible to the originals: tint by tint, line by line, touch by touch, feature by feature, are lovingly translated. At best it will be but an approximation; but he strains every effort, assured that success will be in exact proportion to the earnest and conscientious labour bestowed. It was so with Paul in a nobler study. "I," says he, "am a follower" (an imitator) "of Christ." Again—"Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended"—I count not myself to be "all of gold"—"The good that I would, I do not: the evil that I would not, that do I." "Less than the least of all saints." "Not worthy to be called an Apostle." Yet this self-accusing, self-depreciating pessimist will be content with no meaner quest, no lowlier standard, than to be "all of gold"—"I follow after"; "This one thing I do"; "To me to live is Christ!"

My friends, is this our lofty aspiration? not content to be merely counterfeits—figures of the true. The grand end of the life of faith in the soul is that we be "conformed to the image of God's Son." Heaven itself consists in this: "We shall be like Him." Nor is it for us to doubt or question the wisdom and faithfulness of God in the way by which He sees meet at times to mould and fashion His candlesticks for the spiritual temple. Gold, to be purged of its dross and alloy, must be brought through furnace-heat. But the Heavenly Refiner is seated by, tempering the fury of the flames; and so soon as the refining process is complete the furnace-fires are quenched. "I have chosen thee," says He, "in the furnace of affliction." In His own good time He brings forth such, as vessels of grace and mercy to glorify His great Name—candlesticks "all of gold!"

To return to the Vision (verse 2). The Prophet saw this candlestick "with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon." The bowl (margin: "reservoir") represents the treasury of Divine Grace, containing all the doctrines, precepts, and promises which feed the Church; while the seven lamps symbolise the different branches, the different denominations, of the Church Universal, varying in form, separate from one another, yet all connected with the one Golden Stem.

God Himself, you perceive, in this Divine vision recognises the existence of different Churches. There are those in our days who, from the best of motives, long and sigh after a complete amalgamation of all the Churches of Christ, who would have them beaten and welded together; or, like the separate globules of mercury, to run into one. The Divine method, we believe, is not this. It is expressed figuratively in these seven lamps of the vision: unity, but not uniformity or identity. There is an important distinction between unity and union. It would appear to be after the former, not the latter, we are, as Churches and individuals, exhorted to aspire. It is not "till we all come in the union of the faith," but "in the unity of the faith." Unity, but not absorption; co-operation, certainly, but not necessarily incorporation. We see this law impressed on all God's other works: unity in diversity, and diversity in unity. Though the branches and leaves of a tree are connected with the same stem, no two branches nor two leaves are precisely of the same form. The seas which encircle our world, though parts of a great whole, are endlessly diversified. The stones in a building assume varied shapes; uniformity would mar the symmetry and beauty of the structure. The human voice is one, but its tones and languages are manifold. No two human countenances are precisely identical. There is the same diversity in mental and intellectual characteristics; and it is this very diversity which has contributed more than anything to enlarge the domains of science, and give to the earth its wisdom. If each man had been an intellectual copy of his neighbour, the world would have stood still.

So it would seem to be God's will in His Church: one in Christ, united to the one Golden Candlestick, yet different branches; or, as the Apostle expresses it, "diversities of gifts, but the same spirit." It humbly appears to me, therefore, to be the mind of God in this passage, for the direction of His people, not to attempt the impossibility of melting down the varied golden lamps and uniting them into one (this would cross and destroy the Divine ideal of a Church); not enforcing a uniformity, in non-essentials, of worship, or vestment, or rubric, or government, but to keep in mind that we are "all one in Christ Jesus"—members of His body; our only ambition and rivalry how to shine most brightly for Him. Various flocks, one Fold; various stones, one Temple; various members, one Head; various regiments, one Commander; various lamps, one Golden Candlestick.

Observe, farther, in Zechariah's vision (verse 2): "He beheld, and there were seven pipes to the seven lamps which are upon the top thereof." These pipes, or conductors, by a homely figure, represent to us the instrumentalities through which Divine Grace flows to the Church and to every believing member of it. God could have fed His Temple-lamps miraculously, without the aid or intervention of means. He could have nourished these with the needed oil by some occult process. Souls could have been saved and the world converted without any human instrumentality. But He has wisely ordered it otherwise. Sundays, preaching, prayer, communion seasons, are the pipes affixed to every lamp, and conveying to these the precious oil of grace and salvation. Not that the pipes are to be unduly prized and exalted; not that the feeding of the lamp, the salvation of a Church or the salvation of a soul, is dependent on preacher, or sacrament, or sanctuary. These are but the channels (mediums of conveyance). Paul may plant, Apollos may water. These pipes may be of the purest gold or of the commonest metal. They may be jewelled with precious stones or be of the merest earthen mould. It is "God which worketh in you, both to will and to do of His good pleasure."

This leads—we dare not omit it from this cursory exposition—to the next part of the Prophet's vision (verse 3): "And two olive-trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof." These two trees are represented as distilling oil and feeding the reservoir (verse 4). "So I answered and spake to the angel that talked with me, saying, What are these, my lord?" He repeats the question at verse 13; and the answer is given in the closing words of the chapter: "Then said he, These are the two anointed ones, that stand by the Lord of the whole earth."

May we not take this new and significant emblem to denote the co-equal, co-eternal Son and Holy Spirit, standing with the Almighty Father—"the Lord of the whole earth": three in one, in covenant for the Church's salvation?

This is the glory and climax of the sublime vision. All is of God. Magnificent and splendid as are the materials of that symbolised Church: its golden candlestick, its lustrous lamps, its pipes without number, its vast reservoir: yet, what would it all be had there been no oil to fill the reservoir, and feed the pipes, and plenish the lamps? Again, what though bowl and pipe and lamp were full of oil, were there no fire to kindle the latter, and fulfil the great purpose of the Church as a light in the world? Take an illustration from the invisible gas under our streets—the wondrous network of pipes underlying our pavements, and climbing from floor to floor in our dwellings. Lamps and lustres of diverse size and form and beauty might be constructed; pipes might be laid; gasometers of every dimension might be feeding the pipes with the subtle fluid; but all would be vain unless the torch be applied. Or, look to those vast appliances of war, the gigantic pieces of artillery that are filling our arsenals or bristling in the sides of our ships, and by recent experiments giving an idea of destructive power never before known or imagined. The gun may be pointed with unerring precision. Its hollow tube is filled with the iron missile; its muzzle is unmasked; its touch-hole is primed. But what of all this pomp of circumstance and preparation? As it is, it is a dumb, inert, sluggish, harmless thing. The timid bird can fold its pinions upon it, or the weary soldier can make it his pillow and sink into dreams of peace and home. But the signal is given, one brave hand applies the fuse to the tiny aperture. The living thunder leaps forth in its volleyed mission of death. So it is with the Church of Christ. The Gospel may be preached, sacraments may be administered, sanctuaries without number may crowd our land; as soldiers of the Cross we may be provided with every appliance of the Christian warfare, that will be mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. But all will be vain unless the Spirit from on high touch every Church and every heart with celestial fire. "He shall baptise you," said John, "with the Holy Ghost and with fire!" "Come, then, from the four winds, O Breath; breathe upon these slain that they may live. Come! O come with thy baptism of fire, thou Spirit of light and Spirit of burning!"

II. We can touch very briefly, under the second head of discourse, on the object or design of Zechariah's vision. He proceeds to state it in the latter portion of the chapter (ver. 6): "Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts."

Zerubbabel was the leader of the first colony of Jews who by the edict of Cyrus had returned to their own land. They had brought along with them the precious vessels of the Temple; and no sooner had they reached the dismantled city than he, with his handful of followers (assisted by Joshua), began to rebuild the ruined walls, and erect the altar of burnt offering in the desecrated sanctuary. They had much to discourage them. Zion had become a wilderness. The venerable, bearded exiles wept when they thought of their old Temple. How different was the building of this second one! No friendly Phœnician king to send them stones prepared, and Lebanon cedars carved and ready. They had to toil with unpromising materials. They fought their way in uprearing the walls with their trowel in the one hand and the sword in the other.

Add to all this the jealousies of the neighbouring tribes of Samaritans. These came pointing with the finger of scorn, dishonouring the work and disheartening the builders. "What!" was their language, "are these handful of Jews to dream of restoring that heap of ruins? Is their Temple again to crown the summits of Zion? Can they expect God to come as He did in days of old, and be their refuge and strength as He was their fathers'?" Need we wonder that the soul of the people was much discouraged? that their pious leader should sit amidst the dust and ashes of that desolation, and be tempted to abandon himself to despair?

And so may not we too, when we look around in the Church and in the world, and see confronting us so many gigantic discouragements? We build, but, alas! Christian is divided against Christian. The old Samaritan, in some modern guise, climbs up the wall with the finger of scorn, the taunt and innuendo; sect is divided against sect; and what we erect with one hand is cruelly mutilated and torn down by another. Sterner foes too are at times at hand to mock the work and lay it in ruins. Look at the distant parts of the earth, where our missionaries have been labouring: self-denying soldiers of the Cross, seeking to uprear on the ruins of heathendom those walls that are salvation, and those gates that are praise. Some sudden reverse overtakes them, and the labour of years seems to melt like the frost before the rising sun. Or, look at home—for it is this which claims our attention now, and which has led to the selection of this subject to-night in connection with that great City Mission work, which enlists the sympathy and co-operation of all denominations: a happy union in spirit of the various Evangelical Churches for the rescue of the ignorant and the lost. Look around us: what see we in our densely crowded haunts of home-heathen? Drunkenness, lewdness, debauchery, Sabbath-breaking; God, and Heaven, and Hell, words only used to swear by: selfishness, love of the world, and love of money among the rich: degradation, discontent, and widespread infidelity among the poor: not the speculative, systematic infidelity of a former age, but the no-creed of the neglected and ignorant and lost castaways drifting to the rocks because there is no kindly hand to help them! Oh! when we gaze on this sum of human misery and sin, mountain piled on mountain, the mass daily accumulating, we are led at times to think restoration hopeless, our work a mockery: that the Church may fold her hands and let the world go to ruin!

Nay, nay! "This is the word unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." Who art thou, O great mountain, before Zerubbabel? Thou shalt become a plain, and he shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, crying "Grace, grace unto it."

If the work were man's it would be hopeless; but "the Lord reigneth; let the earth be glad!" "Who," says the Prophet in the tenth verse of this chapter, "who hath despised the day of small things?" It is the day of small things which leads to the day of great things. It is the power of littles, agencies often in themselves lowly, unknown, unrecognised, working and content to work unheralded and unrecompensed, that will be found mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, and in reclaiming the waste places of our city and our land. Yes, and let us take comfort in the thought that however adverse and apparently hopeless are human efforts, when too often it would seem as if the main work of Churches consisted in mounting and firing the signal-guns of party, with the result that hearts are saddened and friendships broken, and the Holy Spirit grieved—let us take comfort in the thought that, reverting to the emblems of the chapter, while the lights are fitful, and the metal of the pipes sadly human, the oil in the reservoir is Divine. The upbuilding of the sacred Temple of the Church is in other hands than ours. As we see the axes, and hammers, and tools of iron, the cumbrous scaffoldings and piles of rubbish encumbering the work, there may appear to be no prospect of progress or completion. But "the hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house: His hands shall also finish it." Though undiscerned by us, that spiritual Sanctuary is gradually rising. Stone is adding to stone, rafter to rafter, and the cry of "Grace, grace!" will in due time resound over the consummated structure! Let us take as our closing motto and encouragement in the pleading of this cause: "The Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of His people shall trust in it." (Isaiah xiv. 2.)

LIGHTS FROM HEAVEN.

SUNLIGHT, moonlight, starlight—
Morn and night and even—
The near light and the far light,
All come down from heaven;
Shedding all about them
Glory everywhere—
What were life without them?—
Cheerless, dark and drear.

II.

There come lights from heaven,
Even than those more bright,
By God to man's soul given,
The God of Love and Light;
Cheering all our sadness,
Though deep that sadness be,
Turning grief to gladness—
FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY.

THROUGH A CHILD'S EYES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BEAUTY AND THE BEAST,"
"THE CHRIST-CHILD'S GIFT," ETC. ETC.

T was a dreary outlook, this dull Walworth street, with the utter absence of any summer freshness or summer beauty about it. There was the sunshine, it was true, but its almost savage intensity only served to bring out the more the naked ugliness of the place: its mean, squalid buildings, and the dirtiness of the half-clad children, who, too languid even for quarrelling, lolled dejectedly about the well-nigh deserted road. A coster's barrow, with its afternoon remnants of the morning's hawking, cast some yard or two of shadow upon the baking flags; an idiot lad, who was turned out of the house each day before his hard-working mother departed to her charing, lay cooing contentedly to himself in the grateful shade. From a window overhead an old woman's face peered wistfully through the green of some stunted geranium plants.

"It does one good to have a bit of green about the place," Anne Baker would say, when some officious but kindly neighbour insisted upon the trouble the tending of them must be to the rheumatic old fingers; and when her day's work was done (and it was neither very arduous nor very long, Anne being a solitary woman, with but few wants), she found an absolute pleasure in seating herself by the window-sill and feasting her eyes upon the rather sickly green of the leaves and the undoubtedly glorious red of the blossoms.

There she was this hot July day, a certain spruceness still in the arrangement of the clothes upon the bowed figure; certain little tricks, too, of manner and of speech which spoke emphatically of the having "seen better days" with which the neighbours credited her: a noticeable woman altogether, with a gentle, somewhat hopeless expression upon her wrinkled face, and a patient look in the quiet eyes which told the same story. It was an incomplete life; and wise and helpful as those around found her, resigned as she had grown to be to what, in her honest narrow old heart, she called "God's will" (and meant thereby the dreariness, sadness, and sin which she found in this world), it still ended in that. She was patient, but she was hopeless.

These plants in the window of which she was so fond, formed a link for her between the colourless present and the distant days of her youth. She was country-born and bred, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, and her winning ways and rosy cheeks had brought her many friendships in this far-away time,—friendships which in some cases had warmed into something more. She could recall it now as one does a dream which has passed very fleetly, but which is nevertheless very real and beautiful to think upon: the winding Kentish lanes; the sunlight glinting through the interlacing trees; the stalwart young fellow by her side, with his rough man's voice striving for softer tones as he offered her the "fairing" he had brought from the nearest town. Ah, well! it had passed soon enough, and died without leaving any hurt or sting behind; and when, a year or two after John Farnborough had gone off to make his fortune in "furrin parts," the news of his marriage travelled back to the quiet village, Anne heard the matter discussed as calmly as did his other friends. The only sign was an increased gentleness and wider sympathy; and yet, as I have said, as she grew older, with a certain dreariness of thought too, and a tired feeling of mind and body, which might have found vent in the old cry of "Cui bono?" had the solitary woman but known how to phrase it.

"Miss Baker, them there children is a cryin' agen in the next 'ouse. Don't yer think yer might go in to 'em to kinder see if yer can be of use?"

Anne's reminiscences were broken into by the abrupt entrance of the woman who lived on the lower floor. Her speech was shrill and voluble, her hands were wet from the wash-tub.

"Their father 's only buried a week come Monday. An' the parson he sez as 'ow it were downright good o' Eliza Smith to keep 'em a week or two longer out of the 'Ouse. Nice and 'good,' ain't it? to leave them mites of children to cry their 'earts out, and 'er out for the day!"

Anne's in-fallen, but still placid, lips parted in a smile.

"I don't suppose Eliza is worse than the rest of us," she answered. "You are too busy, and I have nowhere to go. But I thank you kindly for telling me. I 'll just step in to them, and see."

"An' yer tea? Yer hadn't had none yet," suggested her visitor. Anne's prompt acquiescence rendered her dimly conscious that she might just as well have gone next door herself.

"The tea can bide," said Anne cheerfully. She put on her bonnet, tied the strings in a methodical old-fashioned bow, and set out on her errand.

Two small children, a girl and a boy, were crouching in the corner of a dirty, ill-furnished room, when a brisk tap at the rickety door momentarily stopped the flow of tears from the two pairs of piteous blue eyes.

"It 's that nas'y woman! Let 's pretend we don't hear her," whispered the elder child. But the younger gave a joyous shout, and up he scrambled hastily.

"It is papa!" he cried, the little flying feet stumbling somewhat in his frantic haste to get to the door. "He knowed we wanted him. It is papa come back again! Papa! papa!"

Anne caught the excited words, and, in sheer nervousness, stood fumbling for the moment with the knob of the door. It is so pitiably hard to break a child's faith. Why was it not she, whom nobody wanted, who had died, instead of anyone who could bring such rapture into a baby voice? Ah! why, indeed? "The one shall be taken, and the other left."

She walked in, stiff, ill at ease; but the beauty of little children is their God-given instinct to touch straight at what is best in the medley of their surroundings; and even in the midst of the weary sobbing into which he broke afresh at the renewed disappointment, the four-year-old boy saw the kindliness and good intentions which underlay the worn, lined face.

"Did papa—did our father send 'oo?" he asked, suddenly finding his tongue; and Anne Baker caught gladly at his words.

"Yes, our Father sent me," she said reverently. "He knew you wanted me."

I suppose it was those words which took away all constraint from Anne, and sense of strangeness from the children. At all events, it was but a very few minutes after that that the tears were dried, and that the proposal had been agreed to that they should all return to Anne's own room for tea.

"But we must come back here to say our prayers at good-night time, mustn't we?" chattered the little girl, while Anne's unaccustomed fingers slowly fastened the shabby coats. "The bed is just as broad as I am long, so Jack an' me can measure just where we used to kneel down for 'Jesus, tender.' Papa liked us close, like that. We must come back, mustn't we?"

"Yes, dearie, yes," promised Anne, bewildered somewhat at the thought to which she held no clue; but days afterwards, when she had heard from Eliza Smith all she had to tell of her late lodger, his little daughter's words were made clearer to her. The dying man's bed had stood in that corner from which, as Daisy had tried to explain, they had been able to measure to the exact spot on which they had knelt down, and it was with the feeling of still being near "Papa" that she had begged to return in time for her evening prayer.

But, for all that, she and Jack did not go back that night, or indeed ever again, though Anne had had no thought of keeping them when first she took them into her home. For after the cheery meal she had promised them was over, news came that Eliza Smith had had another fall in the street, and had been carried to the "station;" and as it was no unaccustomed thing for her to finish a holiday in that fashion, Anne yielded to the inevitable, and kept her visitors for the night.

Next day Jack refused to leave her.

"I sink 'oo must be my granny, and I 'se 'oo 'ickle boy. An' 'oo mustn't send 'oo 'ickle boy away," he said to her, with that odd mixture of coaxing and defiance which made him irresistible. "Don't 'oo love Jack?"

It was early morning, and he was still in his little shift and sitting upon the bed, a sturdy, well-grown child with white rounded limbs, where one still seemed to trace his dead father's kisses in the form of dimples, and with truthful blue eyes which would have witched the love out of a harder heart than Anne's.

"Of course I love you when you are good," she answered in her staid way.

She stooped to kiss the pleading lips, and her glance fell upon the name which had been carefully traced on the hem of the tiny garment—J-o-h-n F-a-r-n-b-o-r-o-u-g-h. She straightened her bent back, and taking both Jack's soft hands in her own, she looked long and earnestly into his serious upturned face. John Farnborough? Another John? Her slow wits puzzled it out bit by bit. John—her John—he had been a lad of twenty when she saw him last, and the boyish image which had so faded from her memory woke into sudden life at the thought: he had married, he had one son, he had died. This much she knew. If this man, whose funeral had taken place the other day, had been this child, it followed that the silvery baby voice which had just called her "grannie" was owned by his grandson.

Anne snatched up the astonished child, and holding him closely in her arms, she broke into feeble weeping. She could have told no one why; but she was too old for sudden surprises or sudden joys, and perhaps both heart and brain had ground too deeply into certain grooves for any shock to be thoroughly realised all at once. So she just sat crying quietly to herself until the tears ceased to come, and then, having dressed Jack, she took up an old Bible in which to read her daily verses. Her favourite reading had been hitherto amongst the sterner of the prophets, but this morning she turned to St. John, and read instead the comforting promises of the Apostle of Love.

It was only instinct which had led to the conclusion that in the little waifs she was housing Anne had stumbled upon the grandchildren of the lover of her youth, but facts soon proved the instinct to be a true one. The dead man had left a few letters and trinkets (amongst them was the old-fashioned silver watch which she recognised as his father's), and from them the children's identity was fully proved. But that was all there was to be learned. There was no one to be found who had any relationship to the children. But what cared Anne? There are few of us who would pull a rose to pieces to fathom the secret of its perfume, and Anne was too content with the gift which had fallen to her to leave room for idle wonderment. It was enough for her to feel that these two dear mites had been sent to her as her very own: that the room would never again look scantily furnished while the delicious litter and homeliness, which are attendant upon a child's presence, would lurk in its every corner: that the oppressive silence which had driven her to her plants for sympathy had vanished for ever before the chatter of soft voices, and the delicate uneven trending of tiny footsteps. Most people would, I think, have prophesied a certain amount of jars between this oddly assorted trio—at all events, at the commencement. The incessant call upon her attention, the necessity of increasing her daily toil, the difference in hours and food which the lusty young life about her demanded—all this would have fretted the old woman, according to these theorists, and broken ruthlessly into the small, methodical selfishnesses which had grown into a second nature. But there is just one thing which upsets all theories which are merely human, because its own essence is divine—and that thing is Love. The nights may have been more disturbed when a smooth confiding arm would come slipping round her withered neck, and sleepy Daisy would cuddle yet closer; and the cherished geraniums may have lost some of their freshness when inquisitive Jack experimented upon them; but still, her sleep had never proved more restful, nor the red flowers brought her happier thoughts. For her life was complete at last, and in the completion the angles of her nature were rounded off. She had those to love who loved her, and she grew daily more and more hopeful and content by viewing both this world and the next through a child's eyes.

Daisy and Jack fairly revelled in the sunshine, moral and physical, which now flooded their baby lives, and learned to love the Christ through His gifts. Anne, through loving Him more, came to find more fully the beauty of His earth. And so from opposite standpoints they came close together, as the very young and the very old are apt to do. And if there be any moral to be gained from what the neighbours looked on as an ordinary commonplace household, it might perhaps lie in a certain text which an earnest young preacher took for his sermon after the working of his parish had brought him into contact first with the children and then with their "grannie." It was this: "Of such are the Kingdom of Heaven."

M. E. W.

A DARK VALLEY LIGHTED UP.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., CHAPLAIN TO HER MAJESTY'S FORCES.

WHEN Louis the Fourteenth lay a dying—"Why weep ye?" he asked those who surrounded his death-bed. "Did you think I should live for ever?" Then, after a pause, "I thought dying had been harder." Dr. Hunter was another who was agreeably surprised by his experience of dying. His last words were, "If I had strength to hold a pen, I would write down how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die." Dr. Solander was so delighted with the sensation of perishing by extreme cold in the snow, that he always resented his rescue. The late Archbishop of Canterbury, as his "agony" befell, quietly remarked, "It is really nothing much, after all."

Hundreds of other last or nearly last sayings of dying persons might be cited to prove the truth of Pliny's remark—"Ipse discessus animæ plerumque fit sine dolore, nonnunquam etiam cum ipsa voluptate." (The departure of the soul frequently takes place without pain, sometimes even with pleasure.)

> "Every moment dies a man;
> Every moment one is born."

The first operation, at least in the case of death by old age, is as natural as the second; why should we think that it must necessarily be more painful? Certainly, if some men died and others did not, death would indeed be a most mortifying evil; but being universal, it cannot be evil.

I never visited a dentist without feeling sorry on leaving his operating room that I had not gone to it sooner. Either the tooth which I feared would have to be extracted was found not too bad for stopping, or if it were taken out, the operation was so short and the relief from toothache so delightful that I wondered why I had been shy and timid of him who proved such a good friend. To compare great things with small, may not the same sort of agreeable surprise be in store for us when we come to die?—may we not find that dying is not as hard as we had anticipated?

> "He who hath bent him o'er the dead
> Ere the first day of death is fled,
> The first dark day of nothingness,
> The last of danger and distress,
> Before Decay's effacing fingers
> Have swept the lines where beauty lingers,

SOCRATES AND HIS JUDGES.—p. 685.

THE NEW ZEALAND CHIEF.

And marked the mild angelic air,
The rapture of repose that 's there"

—he who hath done this can hardly fail to see evidence that in the case of the majority of people (most dead persons, even those who perish by violence, as, for instance, in battle, have this expression of rest and peace) death is not painful, or at least not as painful as it is generally supposed to be. Perhaps, as there is said to be a sort of numbness which takes hold of an animal (Livingstone felt it when in the grip of a lion) falling into the clutches of a beast of prey, so, by the arrangement of a merciful Providence, the swoop of the last enemy may have a narcotic effect upon its victim. I am myself much of the opinion of the ancient thinker who said that "death, of all estimated evils, is the only one whose presence never incommoded anybody, and which only causes concern during its absence." It is worse to apprehend than to suffer. It is "the end of all, the remedy of many, the wish of divers men, deserving better of no men than of those to whom it came before it was called."

"Weep not for death!
'T is but a fever stilled,
A pain suppressed—a fear at rest,
A solemn hope fulfilled.
The moonshine on the slumbering deep
Is scarcely calmer. Wherefore weep?

Weep not for death!
The fount of tears is sealed.
Who knows how bright the inward light
To those closed eyes revealed?
Who knows what holy love may fill
The heart that seems so cold and still?"

Surely we who profess and call ourselves Christians ought not to be more afraid of death than was Socrates, who lived before the coming of Him who brought life and immortality to light through His Gospel. When his judges pronounced sentence of death upon him, he told them that they should be of good cheer about death, and know of a certainty that no evil can happen to a good man, whether he lives or dies.

A clever medical man once said to me, "You parsons do much harm by making people afraid to die. You should rather teach them to look upon death as their best friend." Of course I told him that it is not clergymen, but their own consciences, that make people afraid to die, and that it is our business to point to Him who came to deliver "them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." I happen to know from his medical attendants that this gentleman, who when in health talked so bravely about death being man's best friend, was himself in abject terror of it during a recent illness. This fact reminds me of a statement I read in a book about the Arabs, to the effect that although they are strict fatalists, yet when the plague visited Medina, many of the townspeople fled to the desert, alleging as an excuse that although the distemper was a messenger from Heaven sent to call them to a better world, yet being conscious of their own unworthiness, and that they did not merit this special mark of grace, they thought it more advisable to decline it for the present, and make their escape from the town with all expedition.

"Think not I dread to see my spirit fly
Through the dark gates of fell mortality;
Death has no terrors where the life is true;
'T is living ill that makes us fear to die."

"'T is living ill," and not parsons, that makes people fear to die.

"Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
No traveller returns—puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all."

The sting of death is sin. "What is it to die?" "How shall we die?" "When shall we die?" These are questions which we cannot answer. All we know is that through the grave and gate of death every one of us must sooner or later pass. And through that door each one must go alone. Yes, even the weakest, who could not be trusted out of sight for a moment, must leave this world of warm life and go over to the majority without any assistance from earthly friends. Well for those who can say as they enter the valley of the shadow of death—

"In death's dark vale I fear no ill,
With Thee, dear Lord, beside me.
Thy rod and staff my comfort still,
Thy cross before to guide me."

The little child running back in alarm from the entrance of a dark room, crying to its mother, "Dark! Dark!" illustrates how we grown-up children must shrink from the cold, relentless grasp of death, unless supported by a Heavenly Father's hand. I have seen a picture representing a churchyard through which ran a road. At one entrance of the road and churchyard a dying man is depicted leaning against the gate-post. He is looking on the tombstones, thinking of the hastily approaching time when he shall be numbered with the dead. A little girl approaches on her way through the churchyard. To relieve his thoughts, the melancholy invalid engages the child in conversation. "Do you not fear," he asks, "the churchyard path?"—"It is my way home," is the fearless answer. May not the same response be given by every Christian whose life has been spent in the realised presence of God? Such a one is not afraid of God. "Nearer, my God, to Thee," is his daily prayer, and if death comes to bring him home, the king is shorn of his terrors. To him death is nothing worse than "transition," this mortal putting on immortality. "For more than forty years," said Havelock, "I have so ruled my life that when death came I might face it without fear."

My readers, you and I will soon have to die, but it will not be a hard thing to do if we have faith like that of the old New Zealand chief, who, having been converted in middle life to the Christian religion, and having led a life of consistent goodness, thus acted when he found himself upon his death-bed. He gathered his friends and family round him—some Pagans, some Christians—and then he raised himself up, and began to sing one of the ancient songs of his country, which he had learned in his youth, before his conversion. It told of a maiden who had a lover—a faithful lover. She had not seen him for years; he had gone off into the distant seas, and now she was determined to seek him and join him. And so the New Zealand chief sang of her voyage, in words well known to those who stood around him, but with a meaning far deeper than they had ever put on the words, for they saw that under the figure of the forlorn maiden he meant his own soul going forth on its last long voyage, and under the figure of the lover he meant that blessed Saviour whom he hoped now to join in that unknown sea. He sang how the maiden in her frail canoe went down the dark river: how she dashed down the foaming rapids: how the steep rocks closed in on either side; how through the black pass the river opened into the wide sea: still she was not afraid, for she looked forward all the more to being with him whom she loved for ever. So singing, and so transfiguring the old Pagan song with the light of the Gospel, the Christian chieftain passed away.

SICK-ROOM COMFORTS.

BY A NURSE.

A CONVALESCENT.

TRIFLES are said to make the sum of earthly things, and as that is undeniably true in a general way, it is most assuredly still more so in times of sickness. Then, you have to remember that small things annoy the patient which in health he would perhaps not notice, and also very tiny acts of thoughtfulness and care about details may afford him a great amount of comfort.

It is worth while thinking how best you can avoid the one and do the other, for the sufferer has a right to expect our utmost consideration. Think, as you look at him, how very great a humiliation illness and suffering are. You cannot doubt that behind them is hidden a wise purpose known perhaps only to Him who permits them; but still though that thought may, as it should, console the sick person, and enable him to bend his will to the Supreme Will of God, it does not alter the fact that in his weakness, his pains, and his fears, he is feeling and suffering in many ways. Naturally strong and independent, he is perforce obliged to lie inactive and be waited upon in many little as well as big ways. He may be inclined to rule, and now he has to obey, and if of an active, restless nature, the enforced idleness is in itself a pain and grief.

So that one way in which you can in yourself add to his comfort is by letting him see that you are glad to be of service to him, and if you do things graciously and pleasantly you make it all the easier for your services to be welcome. Excepting in the case of ill-tempered and exacting people, who require to be otherwise managed, try and hide your weariness, and conceal that you find, as you often may, any duty unpleasant or trying.

But besides what you try to be in yourself—firm, watchful, patient, and kind—you must use your eyes and see what can be done to make everything easy for the patient and to alleviate his pain and assist him in his helplessness.

At night, it is a good thing to have a night-light burning; and be careful that you do not place this where it will exactly catch the patient's eye. You can obtain easily an arrangement which combines the light with the means of keeping food warm, and, especially in summer, this is most desirable, if the patient needs nourishment during the night.

Gas is always objectionable in a sick-room, as it exhausts the air, and in bedrooms generally it should not be used. Every person, by the very fact of breathing, gives out what makes the air impure, and a gas-burner spoils as much air as four persons, therefore it is obvious that little or no gas-light should be used in a sick-room.

Should you be sleeping in the sick-room, or an adjoining one, leave a small gong or bell close to him for the patient to touch, if his voice is weak and you are afraid of not hearing his call. Another plan which answers if you are in the same room, is to tie one end of a long piece of tape to your own hand, and let the other end be fastened with a safety pin to the sheet near the patient, if not tied round his own finger. A slight touch then on his part will serve to awaken you.

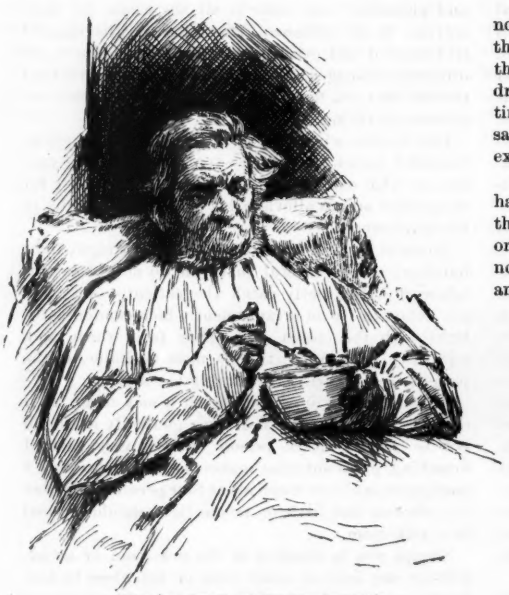
The less drapery that there is in the patient's room the better, and in infectious cases it is better dispensed with altogether. But it often happens, from the fact that ventilation from window and fireplace is absolutely necessary, that the patient is in a draught. This need never be, and you should most carefully use all precautions to avoid it. Cheap folding screens are easily obtainable at the large shops, and if you are in the country, and find it not easy to obtain one in your nearest town or village, you can easily have one made. A few laths nailed together by a carpenter, or by your own hands if you understand the use of the hammer, will make a framework over which you can stretch some thick paper or material of any kind. There is the advantage, in having a screen, of being able to use it for many purposes besides keeping out a draught. It shelters round the patient when the room is being dusted or cleaned, and when he is sitting up it is nice placed round his chair.

A bed-table is a useful thing to have, and very much more comfortable than to place a tray on the bed itself. These can often be bought ready made, but should you wish to have one made, it is very simple, and within the power of any ordinary carpenter to turn out easily. It is simply a light piece of wood as wide as you require it, and as long as to go well across the patient, allowing him room to move and not holding him in a vice. The side nearest the patient should be concave, and if you like a rim running round it, it will prevent things slipping off. It should have four short legs, and can be stained with oak staining if desired.

Whether you use a tray, bed-table, or both, great care should be taken, in bringing the patient his food, to make it look as nice as it possibly can. This is within reach of all, poor and rich; for cleanliness, neatness, and beauty can always be obtained, though some people think they are only the luxuries of the rich.



To begin with, the coarsest linen can be perfectly clean, and consequently look much nicer—fresh, and not creased—than a tumbled damask napkin, that has marks of coffee, or tea stains, and possibly wants mending.

Have everything perfectly clean—that is to say, let the glass be clear, and not blurred in any way, the china spotless, and the spoons and knives as brilliant as polishing can make them. Apropos of this, it may be well to say that, should you require to taste what is to be given to the patient, you should not do so before him, but do it outside the room, and do not use the spoon intended for him. If you can manage to put a few flowers on the tray, all the better; and let these be placed in a very small pot or vase—one unlikely to be easily sent over. All that goes upon the table should be as small as possible; it makes the tray or table less crowded, and it is more appetising to the patient. You can obtain very small salt-cellars for a few pence at any china-shop, and tiny muffineers, a small milk-jug, sugar-basin and slop-bowl are all much handier than large ones.

In giving the patient his food or drink, see that none of the latter is slopped into the saucer, as that is most objectionable, the result being that the liquid, whatever it is, drips over the night-dress or sheet, and is most uncomfortable. Sometimes the patient, to avoid this, carries up the saucer as well, and this, if he is weak, is a greater exertion than anyone in health can well imagine.

Do not ask a patient to choose what he will have, but bring him what is best for him, and then see if he will take it. This applies to an ordinary patient who, weak and suffering, does not care to be troubled; for in convalescence it is another matter, and with returning appetite is renewed interest in the meals which before were perhaps almost dreaded.

Have everything in the room as pretty as you can, for to leave a patient day after day in an ugly room, with nothing to look at but a blank wall or a paper on which he can count the recurring designs, is cruel. You must remember that he has nothing to vary the scene, and that to have beauty in his environment is a great matter. You can make a room look pretty at a very small cost if you hang pictures about, even unframed; some simply tacked on to the walls are more cheerful than the bare paper. If you do this, select bright and peaceful subjects; and if you have sacred pictures, let them be as good as they can be; some sacred pictures are simply caricatures, and should be removed off the face of the earth. Pictures are the books of the unlearned, and because they are in good taste, it does not follow that they are necessarily expensive.

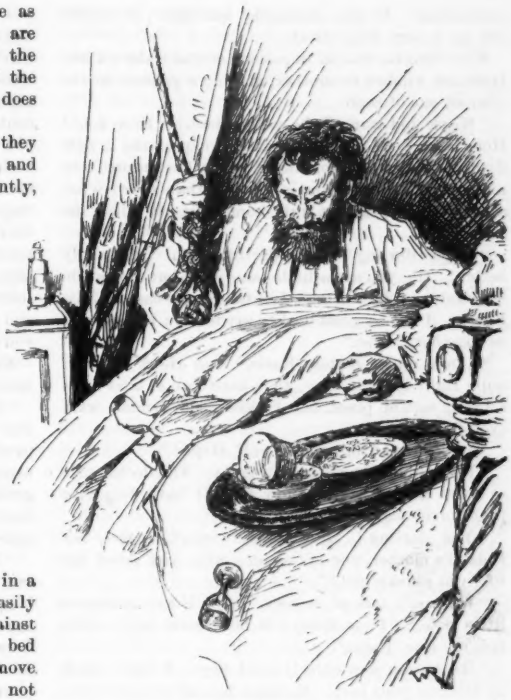
Flowers are always bright and cheering, but they should not always be left in a room at night, and care should be taken to change the water frequently, and not leave them there at all when faded.



A comfort in a sick-room is a wooden bed-rest, which, when placed behind the pillows, enables the patient to sit up easily. Another contrivance which I have seen answer admirably is a very long net, the ends of which were fastened to the bed-posts, and, being passed behind the patient and containing the pillows, formed a secure means of resting him when sitting up.

To change a patient's pillows adds much to his comfort, and to have a couple with which to do so is a very desirable thing. In lung-diseases the pillows should always be warmed; and if the patient has been sitting up this should be done, to take the chill off, ere he returns to bed.

Always nurse your patient when practicable in a small bed, as you can reach him much more easily in it; and the bedstead should never be driven against a wall. You should be able to go round the bed easily. To have a second bed, into which to move the patient for a change, is a good plan, but not always practicable.

If the patient wishes you to read out to him, he will generally ask for it, but do not do it unless you are sure that he wishes it. Weights—any coppers, covered with any material, will do—are convenient to lay on the leaves of the book and keep it open in the desired place.

One of the greatest of comforts, in conclusion, in a sick-room is an unselfish, patient nurse: one who can put herself in the sufferer's place and feel for him, and, by imagination, with him, and who remembers that each tiny act of self-denial, all patient endurance of what may be trying to her, will, if done for Christ's sake, not lose its reward. Let her see her Lord in the sick person, and cheer herself by the remembrance that the willing, loving service will be accepted as if done unto Him.

CHAPTER IX.

"WHERE'S Hope Karron? Is she in? I want to see her at once."

The speaker was very eager; it was winter-time, and she was dressed in becoming furs.

"This isn't the visiting hour, Miss Douglas."

"What a nuisance! can't she come down-stairs to see me? She's much better, isn't she?"

"Yes, miss, she's a great deal better. I'll inquire if she can see you in the dining-room, miss. Will you walk this way?"

"Thank you, Nurse; you are very kind. Now make her come—carry her, if necessary. Nurse, are you proof against half a crown?"

"Oh, Miss Douglas, it's strictly against the rules. Well then, well then, if you must—I'll certainly do my best for you, miss; thank you, miss."

The nurse, a tall, comely looking maiden, disappeared, and Miss Douglas, loosening her furs, and removing her hat, looked round the apartment in which she was waiting. It was a large room, wainscoted throughout. It was handsome but dull. It looked out on a very dull street.

Miss Douglas was an impatient mortal; she walked from one window to another, making a grimace as she glanced out of each.

"Worse and worse," she soliloquised. "How could Hope come here? Poor old girl! I expect she is half dead with ennui. No, though: she has entered the room; I behold her—she is brighter than ever; what a face—what a radiant light comes into it when she smiles!

"Hope darling—Hope darling, are you really better? Oh, you are a little lame still, but not much. —Thank you, kind Nurse, I'll take great care of Miss Karron. I have a great deal to say to her: please leave us together, Nurse."

"I am much better, Katie," said Hope. "I did quite right to come here; they have been so kind—it's a funny sort of place, but I have made friends with everybody."

"And is your foot getting well, Hope?"

"It is gradually getting all right. The doctor says in about a month from now I shall have forgotten that horrid accident."

"You darling! But Roland won't forget, nor Roland's mother, nor his sister; why, you saved his life, you plucky girl!"

"We won't talk of it now," said Hope, turning a little pale. "Poor Roley! is he a good boy? Give him my love, Katie."

"He's not a particularly good boy. I don't think he deserves your love. He has a horrid trick of blowing out paper bags and making them go bang off at the back of my head. He has done it ever since he discovered that the doctor considered my nerves a little weak. He's back at school now, that's a comfort. Well, Hope, how much longer are you to stay here?"

"I don't know. I really need not stay more than another week. I am allowed to walk a little again, and the pain is nearly gone."

"How delighted you'll be to get away!"

"Pretty well."

"Where are you going?"

"I suppose back to my lodgings in Bayswater."

"H'm, h'm! that's a lively prospect, particularly in this foggy weather."

"Don't discourage me, Katie; the lodgings are very well, and I'm not often in them."

"No, you dear industrious mortal. There are always little boys to coach, and you are always coaching them. Why, Roley would never have read decently if you had not taken him in hand; and then to save his life! Has your medal come yet from that society?"

"I believe so, but I have not looked at it. I don't like to think of that scene, Kate. I wish you would not refer to it."

'You darling, I won't. Give me a kiss. Now, Hope, for what reason do you think I inflicted myself on you to-day?"

"Kindness, I suppose," said Hope. "And perhaps because you are fond of me, Katie."

"Of course I am; but I came with news. Don't you suppose that mother and I felt awful when you had to go into this Home, and we could do nothing? Our little house is so wee, and our poor purses are wee-er still. Mother and I thought of you day and night, and Roland absolutely cried when he heard you could not come to us to be nursed. But now what do you think? I have had an invitation, and you are included. It's from the Chattertons, my rich cousins in Shropshire; they want us to go down on Monday; they are wild to see you. They always do have the very jolliest houseful of people. By the way, you know one of the guests who is staying there at the present moment: Cecil Grey—he is so handsome, and such a catch. We have been asked for a fortnight; and won't a fortnight set you up, darling, and won't you see real life at last!"

Katie was in keen excitement. Her rosy cheeks were flushed, and her honest eyes sparkling.

"I'll be very glad to go," said Hope. "I should like a change, and to see the country again. I'm particularly fond of the country in winter. Downton used to be so exquisite when the snow was on the ground. But one wants a lot of dress in a big country house, and I make it a rule to spend a very small amount in that quarter."

"I'll overhaul your wardrobe, and rig you up," said Katie. "I'm awfully skilful. Don't you see how I contrive for myself? This fur, which makes me look quite richly apparelled, has done duty for I can't tell how many years. Oh, I'll make you fit for any society. I promise I won't encroach on your modest income—you shall be charming without a heavy expenditure. No one with a face and figure like yours need spend much on outward adorning.—Is that you, Nurse? Yes, I'm going.—Good-bye, Hope. I'll call for you here on Monday, and we can go down to Shropshire together."

It was two years now since Hope and Jocelyn had said farewell. They had come up to London together on a certain snowy afternoon in February, and then the two girls had gone their several ways—Jocelyn to her life of luxury and enjoyment, Hope to her poverty.

The Seatons and Jocelyn had gone abroad almost immediately; and Lottie, finding Continental life more than enjoyable, now that she had a vigorous young companion to share it with, had positively refused to come back to dull, smoky London.

"Not even for the season," she declared. "No, we will go to Switzerland for the so-called season, and to America in the autumn."

Thus Hope and Jocelyn had not met for two years. They corresponded regularly, each telling the other the outward circumstances of their lives, neither touching upon experiences, feelings, desires, disappointments. They had drifted asunder in more than one sense; a much wider barrier than separation parted them.

Hope had fifty pounds a year. She was strong and brave, she had no idea of sitting down to subsist on this meagre portion. No, she would add to it, she would earn money for a rainy day, and have enough in her purse to indulge now and then in the luxury of helping other people.

XUM

Women have many vocations in these days. Perhaps Hope's was a somewhat singular one. She was clever, and for a country girl fairly well educated, but she was not up to the High School mark, and she had passed no certificate examinations. Like most inexperienced people, she first of all turned her attention to teaching as a profession. Here she found the doors of success almost entirely closed against her. A girl who had not gone in for the Cambridge examinations could scarcely expect to find an engagement in these days of higher progress. She might become a nursery governess, a lady who conducted an agency told her, but she was not even sure that so ignorant a young person would prove successful in this line.

It happened that on this very day the agent's little boy, a most refractory small personage, strayed, against his mother's permission, into the room where several candidates for employment were waiting to be interviewed. Hope called him to her side, talked to him, enchanted him, and before she went away taught him a short ballad.

The next day she went again to the agency office. The lady, a Mrs. Franklyn, greeted her with smiles.

"I don't know how to thank you," she said. "You have done me an inestimable service."

"How so?" asked Hope.

"You have taught his father to believe in Freddy."

"I am sorry I don't quite understand."

"His father has always declared that Freddy could never learn; he has harped on this string, and made my life a misery with it. Last night Freddy repeated 'The Miller of the Dee,' and said you taught him."

"Yes, he learnt it quickly enough—I don't think he is a stupid boy."

"How sweet of you to say so! Will you come to my house for an hour daily, and teach Freddy until I can get you something permanent to do?"

Hope complied, and Master Frederick Franklyn made gigantic strides under her tuition. Mrs. Franklyn in ecstasies proclaimed Hope's fame, and in this apparently trivial manner she obtained her vocation; she became coach to backward and stupid little boys. There are heaps of them in the world, and they are very often to be found in the houses of the wealthy.

Mrs. Franklyn counselled Hope to ask a fairly large figure for her services. It became rather the fashion in certain circles to get little boys coached up by Miss Karron for preparatory schools. She had an undoubted genius for making refractory boys good, for teaching stupid boys to read, and think, and inwardly digest. After a short time she found plenty of pupils, and the income she earned was more than sufficient for her modest wants.

She developed a good deal in person and character after the February day when she parted with Jocelyn. A great deal of purpose, of endurance, a strong look of courage, came into her face. These things brought to it gain, and in addition she never lost the expression of bright anticipation which she had worn from a child, and which made her name a sort of prophecy about her.

Most of her pupils were the sons of rich people, but one day when she was walking in Kensington Gardens, she was overtaken by a smart shower, and taking shelter under a large elm-tree, unwittingly heard a short conversation.

Two people, a small slender girl and a little boy, were also sheltering at the other side of the tree.

"You're a perfectly horrid little fellow," said the girl; "you're a disgrace to us."

"I'm not; I don't care."

"You'll break mother's heart; why won't you learn to read? There are nothing but complaints of you at school. Mother says her money is thrown away sending you there, and all your teachers have declared over and over that you can't make any real progress until you overcome your laziness about reading. Oh, I'm ashamed of you—eight years old, and to be such a dunce!"

"I like being a dunce. I don't ever mean to read—that is I won't unless I'm coached properly, like Fernie Fitzmaurice. He had a coach, and he can read first-rate. 'T was a girl, and she taught him by splendid stories of adventure. There were lions and four tigers in one, and fifty-eight wolves in another, and—and——"

Hope came forward from her side of the elm-tree. She looked swiftly at the pair in eager conversation. The girl's face was red; she was half crying. The boy had very bright eyes which danced with mischief. The girl's anxious face appealed to Hope.

"I overheard what you were saying," she said. "I am the girl who taught Ferdinand Fitzmaurice to read. If you like, if you don't mind, I will take this little boy—Roland you call him—for a pupil."

"How jolly of you!" said Roland, running up to her, hooking his arm comfortably within hers, and looking up into her face.

The small slight girl turned half away; her cheeks grew redder and redder.

"May I?" questioned Hope, squeezing the little boy's arm with a sense of comradeship.

"Oh, Roland!" said his sister.—"I'm so ashamed you should have heard us!" she continued. "Roland is a naughty boy—he won't take pains. I am so vexed you should have worried yourself about our small affairs."

"I can soon teach Roland to read."

"But you are—surely you must be Miss Karron? My mother has heard of you. Lady Fitzmaurice has told her how clever you were with Fernie."

"Yes, I am Miss Karron—Hope Karron is my name."

"Surely your terms are very high?"

Hope on the spot mentioned a sum so ridiculously small as the price she would expect for teaching Master Roland, that his sister almost gasped.

"You are not exorbitant," she remarked. "If you are not frightfully busy, will you come home with me to see mother? Oh, what a relief it would be to her to secure your services for Roland!"

In this way Hope did not secure a particularly lucrative pupil, but she made friends who were to bring a great deal of sunshine into her life, and indirectly to influence her whole future. Roland proved as docile as other boys when instructed in Hope's charming manner. "Hill Difficulties" vanished, the toughest obstacles melted, and in an incredibly short space of time he mastered the technical trials of reading. Mrs. Douglas and Katie were never tired of thanking Hope, who in their opinion had worked miracles. The fact was, the young teacher's method was simple enough; she pursued a plan which aroused keen interest—she never permitted that interest to flag; this accomplished, all else was easy.

On a certain day in the autumn of the year in which she had first made the Douglases' acquaintance, Hope and Roland were walking together. Roland had a wild fit on—not even Hope could keep this exuberant child's spirits always in check. A man whose horse was not in full control was riding along the park. Roland ran in his path. The horse knocked the boy down, and might have killed him but for Hope, who rushed forward, caught hold of the bridle, and forced the horse back a step. He trod on her foot, trampling it badly, and Roland scrambled to his feet, his life saved by a hair's breadth. The rider, a sheepish, ill-tempered groom, muttered something, and was glad to hurry away. Hope limped to the nearest seat, and Roland flew off for assistance.

She spoke of the whole thing as a trifle, but the pain in her foot was so exquisite, that when Katie Douglas appeared panting on the scene, and tried to move her, she fainted.

A few days after, being still in great suffering, she was moved into a hospital for invalid gentlewomen in Harriet Street West. She was kindly treated there, and had the best surgical advice, for a small weekly sum.

Hope was not a girl to despond: she systematically looked on the bright side, and soon became a great favourite in the hospital. It was impossible to grumble in Hope's presence. She had a way of looking directly at you when you spoke in a murmuring or discontented spirit, and a quick wonder would fill her bright grey eyes which instantly gave the grumbler a certain sense of shame. On one occasion a lady said to her—

"Come and sit near me for a little, you happy-faced child; I cannot help feeling curious about you Yours must be a peculiarly blessed lot."

"I always am so thankful to be alive," said Hope. "I do think there's a lot of sunshine just in living."

"Ah, my dear, may you long continue to feel so! You doubtless have a very bright home, dear—loving friends—a mother who adores you."

"I have lodgings in Bayswater; my mother is dead."

"And you live there alone?"

"Yes."

"Are you poor then, my love?"

"No, I am not very poor. I have fifty pounds a year of my own, and I earn the rest. Why do you ask me so many questions? Is it wrong of me to be happy?"

"No, my dear, no—God bless you, my dear!"

The lady sat for some time after this short interview thoughtful and puzzled. She was the greatest grumbler in the establishment, and she had a home, friends, and six times Hope's income.

In especial the young girls in the hospital—and there were several young girls—became attached to Hope, and they one and all broke into lamentation when they heard the day was fixed for her to leave them.

CHAPTER X.

"Now at last we are off!" said Katie Douglas. "Isn't it delicious? Aren't you glad to be out of prison, Hope? and have you no curious question to ask me?"

"Well, I don't know," said Hope. "I'm pleased to be going into the country, of course, and delighted to be with you, Katie, but I'm sorry for one or two of the girls in Harriet Street."

"Oh, then you're not going to enjoy yourself. You will be wrapped up in all kinds of charitable, good, unselfish thoughts while we are at Beeches. Oh, how horrid of you—I wish we were not going."

"I don't know what you mean, Katie. I intend to be as happy as the day is long. I feel bubbling over this minute. You don't know what the country means to me. Oh, is that snow on the distant hills? Lovely, delicious!"

Hope flung open the carriage window, and bent half out. The girls had a compartment to themselves.

"What am I to be curious about, Katie?" she said, suddenly returning to her seat, and looking into Miss Douglas's eyes with her own dancing.

"Only about your clothes, you wretched being. You have not been out of that horrid Harriet Street, and I assure you we are going to a house full of people."

"You said," began Hope, "I mean I gave you directions about packing my things, didn't I? Have you forgotten?"

"Oh, have I forgotten? You wait until you open your portmanteau, and that dress-basket which you never noticed, although I hoped you would, when it was being put into the luggage van. You don't suppose Katie Douglas ever for a single instant of her life forgets things of such paramount importance as a girl's dress? You wait and see."

"Katie, you know I told you very little money was to be spent."

"Have I troubled you about the bills, dear? Have I mentioned them? Do I look, too, as if I had run up enormous debts in your name?"

"You couldn't, Katie, that's one comfort. The shops wouldn't trust a girl who only occupied two small rooms in Bayswater. Oh, I say, the sun is shining on that field covered with snow. Look, Katie, here—here—isn't it rosy?—aren't you joyous even to look at it?"

"Very pretty. Don't keep that window open, Hope; I'm perished. Now if you had your choice, your choice out of all the wide world, what dress would you wear at dinner this evening?"

Hope looked thoughtful.

"I'd wear black net, for choice," she said, "without any ornaments. I might have a flower, if it wasn't artificial, and if the colour happened to suit me. Jocelyn and I always wore black net dresses when we went out at Downton—that is, in the winter; in the summer we dressed in white."

Katie's eyes grew rounder and brighter.

"You are not hard to please," she said. "I was so awfully afraid you were going to say that new shade of electric green, with white frosted flowers. Hope, you are the greatest comfort to me. I do so adore that new green, but I couldn't get it for you without running in debt. Now you shall just wait and see."

Hope laughed.

The train sped along swiftly; the girls talked at intervals, read at intervals, scrutinised their fellow travellers, when, by-and-bye, their compartment filled up, and at last, in the dusk of a winter's evening, arrived at a small wayside station where a comfortable carriage awaited them.

A drive of two miles followed, and then they found themselves in a rambling country house, built very much like hundreds of others, with large reception-rooms, wide square halls, long corridors, innumerable conservatories, a billiard-room, a picture gallery—in short, all those accessories which people who are rich, and who live in the country, are supposed not to be able to do without.

Katie and Hope were ushered into a hall where several people were already assembled, chatting round a great fire composed of logs of oak and firs, and drinking tea supplied to them by two or three pretty girls who knew Katie, and who ran up to her with eager words of welcome. They were introduced to Hope as Bee, Alice, and Maud Chatterton, and soon the party of three became a party of five, the elder ladies and one or two old gentlemen being very glad to be served by the gay young folk.

"Hope rushed forward, caught hold of the bridle, and forced the horse back a step."—p. 692.

"You need not be alarmed," whispered Bee Chatterton to Hope. "We don't only represent the fairer sex at Beeches. You'll see some excellent specimens of mankind at dinner-time. They are all in the hunting field at present."

"And excellent sport they are having, no doubt," said Mr. Newbolt, one of the oldest of the old gentlemen, as he returned his empty cup into Hope's hands.

Then there was a little more chat, and Hope and Katie found themselves in their bedrooms. The rooms opened one into the other, and the girls flitted backwards and forwards as they dressed.

"Katie! why, this is my old black net, only it looks new, perfectly new! And how nice that satin slip is to wear under it. I don't know that I particularly care about dress, but I certainly wish to look nice to-night. It is so long since I have been in a house of this kind; it reminds me of Grey's Park, and of the Ashfords', and of the other places where Jocelyn and I used to visit when we lived at dear old Downton."

"Don't reminisce, dear," said Katie, who was looking busy and important; "get into your dress, for I am not sure if the train is properly arranged at the back. Ah, yes, that will do; very nice, very nice indeed. Hope, what a beautiful figure you have, and what an upright carriage! I like, too, the way you arrange that hair of yours—but there, you know what I 've always thought of you; others will agree with me here. You are quite certain—positive—to get a lover while you are here, Hope."

Hope laughed.

"You really do talk like a goose sometimes, Katie," she said. "Now what about your apparel—that blue? It looks wonderfully soft and cloudy."

"There 's a pink like it in the basket trunk for you," answered Katie. "I knew pink would make you look sublime, so I had the thing tossed together. The colour is perfect—like the lining of a sea-shell; the material fivepence a yard. You shall not wear that dress until the lover has begun to show his attentions. Now come, are you ready? I am, quite, at last. Oh no—my fan and gloves. Now then, now then! Did I tell you, Hope, that you would probably meet Roland down-stairs?"

"No. I am so glad! I thought he was settled at school."

"He has had a cough, and so secured two days' holiday. He came down here with Phil Chatterton. To tell the truth, I expect he 'll be an awful bore. He 's so empressé, and so destitute of shyness, and he 's quite certain to say the sort of things one doesn't want him to say. I beseech you, Hope, fasten him to your train without delay, for he quite works on my nerves—he really does."

The drawing-room was nearly full when Hope and Katie entered. They seated themselves near the door, and Hope presently observed a pair of bright dancing eyes fixed on her. The glance of recognition was followed by a loud and decidedly unconventional "Hurrah! I say—it is—it is!" and then there was a raid across the room, during which one or two people were recklessly pushed aside, a small table was overturned, a vase filled with flowers broken, and then a pair of eager arms were flung round Hope's neck.

"I say, Miss Karron, I 'm awfully glad to see you! Is your foot quite well again? The brute didn't quite trample it to pieces, did he? Let me see, do let me see!"

Katie beat a hasty retreat, and Hope held out the toe of a small satin shoe for inspection.

"My foot is quite well, Roley; we need not talk about it any more."

"I don't know about that at all; you 're my champion deliverer. I was so excited when I heard you were coming. I told Chatterton all about you—Phil, you know, my friend; I 'll introduce him presently. And, do you know, there 's a grown-up chap here, no end of a swell, who says he knows you! His name is Grey. I told Grey about you, too, Miss Karron, and he said what you did was heroic, and just what he expected. But what do you think? The fellow who owns the horse—Rossiter is the name of the horse—is here, too. The fellow 's name is Markham; he 's a great friend of Grey's, and Grey said he 'd go straight off and tell him. Mr. Grey said he expected Markham would be awfully put out, and so he should be. I said I 'd give him my opinion about that horse of his. Oh, I say! there 's Grey—Mr. Grey, I mean. Don't tell him I call him Grey behind his back—I 'll go and fetch him. Miss Karron! I say! your cheeks are quite red! Are you glad to see Mr. Grey? Is he a great friend of yours?"

"Yes, a great friend; and I 'm very glad to see him," said Hope.

At that moment she almost wished Roland at the bottom of the sea. It agitated her to meet Cecil; his face brought back such a rush of memories. And here was this dreadful boy misunderstanding everything.

"Here she is," said Roland. "Her foot 's all right; you 'll be glad to hear that. I say, have you told Markham yet? Is he awfully put out? His horse very nearly killed me, and a lady. I wonder if he could be tried for manslaughter if his horse killed two people. I think I 'll ask Phil. Phil knows a lot of the law."

"Yes, go and ask him—he 's in that distant window," said Cecil, giving the boy a little push. "Go and find him, and when you have found him stay with him. Do you hear?"

"I hear," said Roland.

He began to make a slow peregrination across the room, whispering softly under his breath—

"A lover and a loveress—won't I watch 'em!"

The moment he was out of sight, Cecil, turned a beaming face to Hope.

"I am glad to see you," he said. "I 've a thousand things to say to you. And Mrs. Chatterton is so good-natured, she says I may take you in to dinner."

CHAPTER XI.

"Do you see that queer-looking fellow just opposite to us?" whispered Cecil to his neighbour, as the soup was being removed. "Don't pretend to look at him, but just take a glance when you can, and give me your opinion."

"He has been looking at me," said Hope, "if it is the man you mean. He has a very quick way of looking, and you can scarcely find out that he has done so, but I have caught his eyes once or twice. He is dark and sallow—I don't much care for the shape of his moustache, and his eyes have nothing very special to distinguish them; still; he has a good head, and a good forehead—there, he has looked at me again. Do let us talk of something else, Cecil."

"I will by-and-bye. I have not done with the present subject yet. That's Markham—that's the man who I once told you was in all the world alone worthy of Jocelyn."

"I don't think much of your taste," said Hope. "And I am sure Jocelyn would not be particularly obliged to you."

"Tell me about her, Hope. You know I have not in the least forgotten her."

"But you are not broken-hearted, Cecil."

"Of course not. I should not let any girl spoil my life to that extent. But I think I care just as much as ever for Jocelyn; so do tell me all you have heard."

The conversation then drifted into long accounts of the wanderings of the Seatons, of Jocelyn's opinion on this or that place of foreign interest. Hope spoke with animation, and her companion listened with unabated interest. They made a striking-looking couple, and more than one pair of eyes turned in their direction with an appreciative smile.

"Quite old friends," whispered Mrs. Chatterton to a neighbour. "That girl has such a bright face that she is absolutely handsome. Of course, as to Cecil, there are no two opinions on the point."

While they talked, Hope again noticed the quick sharp glance of her opposite neighbour. There are many ways in which a man may look at a girl. There is the admiring, the indifferent, the affectionate, the adoring glance. Markham's might have been interpreted as the puzzled gaze. He looked at Hope as if she both irritated him and gave him a sense of fascination.

"I wish it was allowable to turn one's back on people at dinner," she said at last to Grey. "I don't think your friend at all good-looking, Cecil; and he will go on favouring me with those queer flashes from his eyes."

"I can explain that," said Cecil; "it was Markham's horse Rossiter that trod on your foot. Markham is devoured with compunction terrible to witness."

"Oh dear! I hope he won't worry me on the subject. He was not in the least to blame. He cannot help his horse, and my foot is perfectly well."

He does not look upon the accident in that amiable light. He says it was his fault, for he should have had a more capable groom."

"Well, yes, the groom was awkward; but then, so was Roley. I do hope, Cecil, he won't worry me on the matter."

"Would you rather not be introduced to him?"

"Much rather. I need not know everybody at Beeches, need I?"

"Certainly not. Markham is sure to ask for an introduction, and I can tell him that you particularly wish to be excused. Then he'll be certain to stare more than ever. He's going to stay here all through your visit."

"Cecil, you quite tease me. Oh, introduce him, if you must, but give him a hint that I don't consider myself a heroine."

"Wisely spoken," said Cecil. "It won't be half so bad for you when he takes you in to dinner, and talks to you as he can talk. He won't have time to flash those glances then. Look here, Hope, I told you before what I thought of Markham. You say he is ugly now; but no woman can resist him. You hear him sing, for instance—I'm only glad Jocelyn is not in the house; that is, unless we were properly engaged and all that. Ah, there's the signal for your departure. What a pleasant chat we have had! I'll look you up again in the drawing-room."

Cecil had vastly improved in the two years which had intervened since Hope had last seen him. He was a handsome youth then—he was a striking-looking young man now. His features were good, his figure was very fine, and his expression most sweet and engaging. Such a youth, so endowed by nature, and so plentifully supplied by Dame Fortune with the good things of life, could not help being a universal favourite. Nobody guessed that Cecil had some time ago given his heart away, and wherever he went there were one or two anxious, if not designing, candidates for the lost treasure. Mothers were apt to be very polite to Cecil, and pretty girls smiled kindly upon him. His attentions, however, were so general, his affectionate speeches were so frank and above-board, so apt to be bestowed upon one pretty lass on a certain evening, and given to her sister to ponder over on the next, that Cecil could only be spoken of as the most harmless sort of flirt, as hearts did not break on his account.

Perhaps this, however, is scarcely true. One heart did certainly ache a little, and one pair of soft pretty eyes could have grown very bright and tender had Cecil given them the chance. The owner of these eyes was Bee Chatterton, who could not help looking enviously at Hope during dinner, and rather avoiding her afterwards. How horrid it was of Cecil to have old, old friends, girl-friends, too, with faces like Hope Karron's!

Notwithstanding this little cloud, however, which nobody noticed, as it was really only shadowy, the girls in the drawing-room made very merry, and Hope and Katie being fresh from London found themselves the centre of attraction. In the midst of an eager stream of talk, during which Maud had advanced to such intimacy with Hope that her hand lay affectionately on the black net dress, Cecil and Markham came up. The dreaded introduction was made, Cecil turned aside to chat with Bee and Maud Chatterton, and Markham, looking gravely at Hope, said—

"I understand that a certain subject is not to be touched on between us."

"My foot is quite well," replied Hope, turning crimson, and glancing angrily at Cecil.

"I am immensely relieved to hear it. Also that we need not dwell on the matter. I have dismissed the groom, and if you dislike seeing the horse about he shall be sold."

"Is he here?—what a beautiful face he had! I see his eyes, a little wild and——" Hope turned pale.

"I thought we were not to discuss the matter. Will you come and sit in this window? It is not so hot here. Is that seat comfortable? No; we won't talk of Rossiter. He was a fine creature, handled by a brute. Now I want to apologise to you, Miss Karron."

"'I like standing best,' she said."

"What for?" asked Hope.

"I stared at you unmercifully during dinner."

Hope coloured again. She glanced fully up at Cecil's friend, and made up her mind to dislike him. Then the expression of his face softened her, perhaps rather it subdued. Like a quick flash Cecil's words rushed through Hope's mind—"Markham can fascinate any girl he pleases." She resolved that she should not be a victim. She sprang to her feet.

"Won't you sit down?"

"I like standing best," she said. Then she coloured again, and was vexed with herself.

"Why can't we talk commonplaces?" she added. "I am not interested in the horse, nor in—in—what you did at dinner, Mr. Markham."

Markham's expression became intensely grave, even a little sad.

"I will fly to commonplaces as quickly as possible," he said. "I adore commonplaces. Still, I must just say a word in self-justification. I stared at you at dinner because—not because——"

"Oh, don't," said Hope.

"Not because I admired you."

"Of course not. What a lovely moonlight night this is."

"We'll go into the conservatory presently, and talk about the moon. I once made a sonnet about her. I'll repeat it to you. Nothing could be more commonplace. In the meantime I must tell you why I looked at you. You remind me of someone else. There is a face that haunts me, and you have a look of it. You are not very like, but you have a sufficient resemblance to give me a sense of unrest, of torment. I am sorry you came here."

"You are very polite," replied Hope angrily. "I won't at least trouble you with my presence. I knew from the first I should not like you."

"Thank you."

Markham made way a little, and Hope flew for refuge to an ottoman almost in the centre of the room. In this position she was under the full blaze of innumerable candles, her whole frame was quivering with indignation, her eyes sparkled. The faint colour which strong excitement gave her mantled her cheeks.

What a rude, ungentlemanly man! and Cecil's friend! What could Cecil mean by calling him fascinating? She knew better than to yield to his charm. Had anyone ever spoken to her so rudely before? He had absolutely said he was sorry she was there. Well—let him be sorry. For a whole fortnight Beeches was to be her home, and no Mr. Markham that ever breathed should turn her away but she would take care not to speak to him again—oh, no!

"Miss Karron," whispered Roley's troublesome voice in her ear, "that's him, the man in the window—that's Markham."

"I'm not interested in the man in the window, Roley, and I think little boys like you ought to be in bed ages ago."

"Oh, I say, you are disagreeable! You might take a poor fellow's part. Phil and I have been dodging round for the last hour. We are so awfully afraid of Phil's father seeing us and ordering us off. May I sit at your feet on this footstool? I'll be quite safe here."

"Sit anywhere, but be quiet, Roley."

"How queer you look! Your cheeks are pink, as if they were painted. And your eyes—don't they sparkle! You look awfully pretty, though. If I were a big fellow, wouldn't I just—wouldn't I—— Oh, I say, Markham's going to sing. Let me hide low down at your feet, Miss Karron. I wouldn't miss his song for the world. I heard him last night, and I nearly choked."

"With laughter?" asked Hope.

"Laughter! You wait and hear. I tell you he makes you all teary in a minute, and as if you had a cold in your head. Laughter! I hope you've got a good big pocket-handkerchief in your pocket. Now then! I don't know how he does it—even Phil rushed out of the room to keep from blubbering last night. Now listen—won't you turn your head this way?"

"No, I can hear as I am. Hush!" she said then, in a moment, for the boy was rustling and fidgeting. "Hush!" she repeated, and she laid her hand on his shoulder, compelling him to be still.

The man was forgotten in the singer. Hope absolutely ceased to remember her recent encounter with Markham. Her short-lived anger melted away like the early dew. She forgot Roley, she forgot what she had said about her present position being the best. She stood up, she faced right round. As Markham sang, Hope looked full at him with two grey eyes into which tears were springing. His voice was a tenor, not too powerful, but sweet and infinitely pathetic. It was flexible, and so delicately swayed by the soul of the singer that the emotions felt by him were instantly communicated to his listeners. The touching ballad of "Lochaber no more" was rendered in such a manner that Hope for the first time understood Burns' words when he said it was a tune for a broken heart:—

> "Farewell to Lochaber, farewell to my Jean,
> Where heartsome with her I have mony days been;
> For Lochaber no more—Lochaber no more,
> I'll maybe return to Lochaber no more."

The whole scene rose before the girl's eyes—the exile's farewell, the wild scene, the wail of the often repeated "no more." Markham sang right through the ballad, then with scarcely a pause he struck into another key. As he did so he gave Hope, across half the length of the long drawing-room, another lightning glance. She saw it, resented it, and would have sat down, but the voice arrested her like a spell:—

> "My love is like a red, red rose
> That's newly sprung in June;
> My love is like a melody,
> That's sweetly sung in tune.
> Sae fair art thou, my bonny lass,
> Sae deep in love am I;
> And I will love thee still, my dear,
> Till all the streams run dry;
> Till all the streams run dry, my dear,
> And the rocks melt with the sun;
> And I will love thee still, my dear,
> Till all the world is done."

"Didn't I tell you?" whispered Roley—"why, you're crying yourself. Won't I talk to Phil about this! I thought it was t'other one—Grey I call him behind his back—that could make you laugh or cry. Oh, I say, isn't Mr. Grey, though, going on with Bee Chatterton! And, mercy me, if that isn't Mr. Markham coming back! Good-night, Miss Karron—aren't your cheeks red, though!"

CHAPTER XII.

Markham did saunter down the long drawing-room, he even paused near Hope's ottoman to exchange a few words with a pale-faced, limp-looking girl. In doing this he stood so close to Hope that her black net dress must have touched him, but he did not speak to her, nor turn in her direction. Presently he strolled into the conservatory with the pale girl "to recite that odious sonnet of his about the moon," whispered Hope to herself. She felt decidedly cross, and she went to bed in a bad temper.

Katie could not make out what had happened to her friend. Katie's evening had been one long delight. Roley had most mercifully kept out of her path, and the possible lover seemed already to loom in the distance, in the person of Gus Chatterton, who was good-looking, empty-headed, but fairly amiable and fairly well off.

Katie dreamt golden dreams while Hope tossed from side to side of her pillow. What did that man mean? Why did his face worry her? Why did his stupid rude words stick in her brain? Never in the whole course of her life before had any man made even the most transient impression on her. She was accustomed to attentive ways and pretty speeches from the youths of Downton. Since she went to London she had been decidedly removed from the sphere of agreeable and chivalrous youth. Now she had returned to it. For a brief fortnight she was back in the old life, and she expected matters to go on as they had always done: the youths still to be chivalrous and agreeable, she receiving their attentions as a matter of course but always with well-bred indifference.

On the threshold, however, of her life at Beeches, a totally new experience came to her. An ugly man was specially commended to her notice. She was told that he was fascinating, that no woman could resist him. He began by being rude to her; he was rude in action, he was even ruder in speech. How could anybody tolerate him? And yet, how his voice thrilled, sending a sense of pain, while it angered her, as he spoke of the face that haunted him. She had not been nice about that face. A good deal of his talk was doubtless banter, but he was in earnest when he spoke of the face which hers resembled. He did not admire her, of course—who wanted him to admire her?—but she irritated him because of a resemblance.

Hope was not in the least vain. She was unaffected, unconscious of any personal charms; hers was a sweet, healthy, generous nature. Never before in her whole life had she been oppressed with this sense of irritation, which now almost increased to a morbid curiosity. She rose softly from her midnight couch, closed the door which had been standing open between her room and Katie's, lit the wax candles on the dressing-table, and gazed anxiously at her own pale reflection in the glass.

She was very pale now, and her light hair was dishevelled. Her eyes had dark shadows under them, her lips at the moment were more fretful than arched with expectancy and delight. The small face did not please its owner. She got into bed feeling crosser than ever.

"I'll think no more of that intolerable personage with his whims and hauntings," she said to herself. "Why, I really don't know myself—to lie awake over such a trifle. Am I Hope Karron, or another?"

At last she did fall asleep, but Markham's song, "Lochaber no more," came into her dreams. She was present at that passionate farewell; she was crying to the singer to stop, to rend her heart no more; and as she spoke to him and cried to him, and entreated him, he turned and looked at her, and his ugly face grew beautiful, and his voice melted away into the tenderest love-song—

> "And I will love thee still, my dear,
> Till all the streams run dry;
> Till all the streams run dry, my dear,
> And the rocks melt with the sun;
> And I will love thee still, my dear,
> Till all the world is done."

She awoke with a headache; her dream discomposed her even more than the sore indignant thoughts which preceded it.

The next day it was arranged that the ladies of the party should ride to a certain glen about ten miles away to meet the sportsmen and take them lunch.

The Chattertons all rode well, and Hope in her Downton days had learnt to ride on a shaggy pony, and had many times had a mount from her richer friends.

She was scarcely a practised, but she was a very intrepid horsewoman. Katie declared that she would not even mount a donkey; one or two other girls of the party were equally timid; they were accordingly distributed among the matrons, who drove off to the rendezvous in a couple of landaus, and Hope, Maud and Bee Chatterton were quickly mounted and prepared to follow.

"You are sure you are not afraid, Miss Karron?" said Maud. "For if you are," she added, "I don't in the least mind exchanging horses with you. Stately is such a gentle darling, that even a girl who was not much accustomed to horses might feel quite comfortable on his back."

"I'm quite comfortable as I am," replied Hope, laughing. Then seeing that the two girls smiled and exchanged glances—"What's the matter?" she added. "Is this horse particularly vicious, or do I sit him in such a manner that you conclude beforehand that I'm an arrant coward?"

"Not a bit of it," said Maud. "Anyone can see that you know how to ride, Miss Karron. But the fact is you are on Rossiter's back. He half-killed you once already.—I did not know," she added, turning to Bee, "that Rossiter was to be brought out to-day. He is not quite certain, particularly for a lady."

"I am not afraid," said Hope, colouring. "Not that I wish to ride the animal."

"Then do change, dear—do. Stately is a delicious horse, and I can ride anything. I'm half my time on horseback."

Hope was half inclined to comply; not that she was afraid, but she did not want to put herself under any compliment to Markham.

"We can exchange in a minute," said Maud.

But Bee, who since the night before had never felt thoroughly cordial with Hope, called out now in a somewhat spiteful voice—

"I think you are over-cautious, Maudie; Miss Karron looks perfectly comfortable on Rossiter, and I don't suppose, all things considered, she'd like to own she was afraid of him. Anyhow, we have no time to change now. The carriages are out of sight as it is."

"I'm all right," said Hope. She whipped up her splendid bay, and immediately found herself in the position of leader of the little party.

It was true she was not afraid, but she knew enough about horsemanship quickly to perceive that Rossiter was her master—that he would not absolutely respond to her touch, nor obey her light, firm curb. This knowledge was not reassuring; she was not frightened, but she was annoyed. The horse was cantering along gaily, a little too fast, for Hope began to grow breathless. Her companions called out to her to wait for them, but she knew she could not. The longer she rode on Rossiter's back, the more certain horse and rider were that the key of the position remained in the horse's keeping.

There was no particular danger, however. Hope had a good seat, and unless Rossiter was frightened or startled in any way, a catastrophe was scarcely to be feared.

A SERMON TO FIREMEN.

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10TH, 1889, BEFORE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH FIRE BRIGADES.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

"He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God."—DANIEL iii. 25.

THE events recorded in this chapter occurred, in all probability, in the eighteenth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. By that time the predictions of the prophet had been fulfilled, and the son of Nabopolassar had become indeed a king of kings. No foe, however powerful, had been found able to stand before him as he swept like a whirlwind over the face of the earth. And now, after a military progress through the countries between India and Ethiopia, he has just returned to his own capital, bringing with him in triumph the spoil of subjugated nations and captives without number. At this juncture Nebuchadnezzar seems inclined to make a pause. The work of conquest is over, and before him lies the task of consolidating the mighty empire which has been entrusted to him. The time has come, he thinks, for the inauguration of a new era; an era in which the arts of war shall give place to the arts of peace, and the resources of the kingdom shall be developed, and the happiness and prosperity of the multitudinous races shall be, as far as is possible, secured. First, however, he must make certain of the allegiance of these races. The foundation must be firmly laid before he proceeds to erect the superstructure upon it.

With such thoughts in his mind, the monarch decided upon a ceremonial which should take place on the vast plain of Dura, situated in the province of Babylon, at no great distance from the walls of the city itself. To this are to be summoned representatives of all the subject nations—satraps and generals, priests and laymen, the ministers of justice and the administrators of finance—all are to be there, and all are to render homage, in some way that shall be indicated, to their sovereign lord the king. Now, if the ceremonial had been of a simply political character, and the saluting the image of gold, of which we have heard so much, had been nothing more than an act of respect to Nebuchadnezzar—an expression of fealty—it is conceivable that there could have been little in the whole affair to startle the conscience of even the most scrupulous of scrupulous Jews. The occasion, however, had its religious as well as its political aspect. The golden figure on the lofty pedestal, which made it visible from all parts of the plain, was, indeed, we suppose, a likeness of the king himself; and not exactly what we should call an idol. But Nebuchadnezzar was known to be a devout man in his way; indeed, he was an enthusiastic worshipper of his god Merodach; to Merodach he attributed his successes; to Merodach he invariably addressed his prayer for the protection of his throne; and he meant it to be understood—and it was understood—by all who gathered together on the plains of Dura, that the king and the god were to be so coupled together that to bow down before the image of the one would be to offer to the other the adoration due to a being who was unquestionably divine.

I have said all this for the purpose of reminding you that the ceremony in the plain of Dura was no mere idle pageant prompted by the love of display and the vanity of a successful soldier, but a grave and earnest proceeding, resolved upon after careful deliberation, and for the purpose of introducing a new state of things for the empire; that it was regarded by Nebuchadnezzar, not only as a necessary part of his State policy, but also as an act of gratitude, due to the deity to whom he believed himself to owe his victories and his throne.

It is well to bear this in mind if we would enter into the real difficulties of both the monarch and his recalcitrant Jewish subjects, and if we would comprehend how it was that the line of conduct which the three Jews felt themselves compelled to take would be naturally looked upon by Nebuchadnezzar as open rebellion, and as an insult both to himself and his god.

But let us pursue the line of the narrative a little further. The carrying out of the imperial edict, involving, as it did, the summoning of officials from very great distances, must have occupied a period of several months, and during that time the three "children," as they are sometimes called—the three young men, who were really statesmen set over the affairs of the province of Babylon—had ample opportunity of considering the situation in which they were placed. It was a sufficiently formidable one. They would hardly expect to escape the observation of Nebuchadnezzar, for they had, as they knew, enemies in the court who would be sure, if they even seemed to fail in their duty, to report the matter at headquarters. And so soon as their resistance to royal authority came to be known, their destruction, under the circumstances, was of course absolutely certain. They had, then, a most painful and distressing alternative before them—either to act in opposition to their own deepest convictions and to dishonour the Lord their God, by worshipping an idol, or else to submit to a horrible death, by being cast into a furnace of fire. We can easily imagine how those anxious months were passed. There would be no slight mental struggle when the men were alone. There would be occasional conferences such as their very busy lives permitted them to hold. There would be encouragement of one another, and consultations with their friend Daniel; and above all there would be fervent and persistent prayer, that their courage might be sustained, and their faith kept from failing when the supreme day of trial came.

At length that day dawned upon them. Early in the morning, the crowd of dignitaries and high officials, each in his robes of state—and each bearing about him some token of his nationality—stream towards the plain, and group themselves in their appointed places, round the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. That object naturally attracts all eyes. But not less interest is excited by the ominous furnace standing not so very far off from the statue, and belching out ever and anon red and lurid flames from its circular summit. What does it mean, that furnace? Was it the customary accompaniment of such a scene as this? It may be so; but more probably, the monarch expected on this occasion some outbreak—or at least, some hesitation—on the part of the lately subjugated tribes, and took this method of overawing them and enforcing their submission. Anyhow, the grim engine of despotic authority, the terrible evidence of what Nebuchadnezzar could do if his wrath were provoked, is there, and all men draw their breath more thickly as they gaze upon it. Presently the king arrives, attended by his body-guard, and then, when the vast multitude has settled down into stillness, the voice of a herald is heard in the clear Oriental atmosphere proclaiming to all the assembled "peoples, and nations, and languages," what is the royal will and pleasure. A moment or two later (as we suppose) the beams of the rising sun strike on the bright metal of the statue, the blare of trumpets and horns is heard, and every head lies prostrate in the dust before the feet of the glittering idol!

I said "every head;" but there were, as you know, exceptions. The three young Jewish men stand upright in the midst of the general prostration, refusing to bow the knee in an act of such worship as that. Their attitude is of course noticed. Certain Chaldeans hurry at once to the king, and tell him what has happened; and by his command the men are brought and placed before him. Bending upon them from his seat one of his blackest scowls, Nebuchadnezzar calls them by name, and asks them what has induced them to act in such a way. Have they done this thing of set purpose? "Have you three deliberately made up your minds to defy my authority—to insult me in the presence of my subjects—and thus to set an example of insubordination in the kingdom? You, who have received such benefits at my hands, and who know so well (for you must know) how important this ceremonial is, and what grave issues are dependent upon it? Is this possible? But I am aware," continues the king, "that you will urge in self-defence some plea about your religion. You will speak of the Jehovah of Israel. Let me tell you that this Jehovah of yours, in whom you trust, is simply incompetent to help you. Have not I beaten down the walls of his city? Have not I—I myself—overthrown his Temple, and desolated his shrine, and carried his people off by thousands and tens of thousands into captivity in this very place? How, then, shall he deliver you out of my hands, when everything round you proclaims him to be a captive and a powerless God? Be wise, then, in time. Think over it. I will give you another chance. Once more the trumpets shall sound, and if, when ye hear them, ye prostrate yourselves before that image of your Sovereign it shall be well. If not, there is the furnace of fire, and into that you go, and perish in a moment."

It is no wonder, perhaps, that the monarch was infuriated. To be bearded by his own officials at such a moment, in presence of such a multitude, would have tried the patience of more patient men than he was. And Nebuchadnezzar had a passionate temper naturally, and long years of success, in which everything and everybody had been compelled to bow before him, had made him peculiarly intolerant of even the semblance of opposition to his will. But this was not all, as we have seen. His devotion to his God, and his sense of the extreme importance of the occasion, his belief that the measures he was taking were essential to the future well-being of his empire, added fuel to the flame, and the man was "full of fury," almost beside himself with rage.

We turn from the maddened monarch to the three young men, who stand quietly and respectfully, but yet firmly, before him. "It is not for us to bandy arguments with our Sovereign; we will not attempt it; but this we feel ourselves bound in conscience to say—that we are persuaded of the power of our God to deliver us. And we know He will deliver us, if not by saving us from the fire—about that we are not assured—at least by enabling us to encounter and to bear it; and then we say, O king, that whether we are delivered from the fire or not, our resolution is fixed not to serve thy gods, nor to worship the golden image which thou hast set up. Nothing on earth will induce us to do such a thing."

This is enough. Nebuchadnezzar immediately gives directions to his attendants, and they get the furnace ready by heating it seven times more than it is wont to be heated. What! is it not already hot enough to destroy three human beings, and to shrivel them up in a moment like a piece of parchment laid on the coals? Yes; but the king feels now that he is committed to a struggle with this God of the Hebrews, that he is contending not merely with these disobedient subjects of his, but with the Jehovah whom they represent, and he will see to it that Jehovah has no chance against him. When the orders about the heating of the furnace are carried out, some of the strongest and bravest soldiers in the Chaldean army take up the three young men, and prepare to cast them into the fire. This is a perilous task—most perilous—one that the soldiers (courageous as they are) shrink from; for the flames are now surging over the platform that runs round the top of the furnace, and are threatening to destroy everything within their reach. But the thing must be done. The king's command—he cares nothing for human life, not he; human life is cheap in Babylon—is urgent, and so, we suppose, the band of soldiers, grimly bending themselves to their deadly work, and taking advantage of an opportunity when the billows of flame have receded for a moment from the edge of the fiery volcano, fling their victims down, whilst an irrepressible sob, a deep hollow groan bursts from that vast assembly round them.

What has happened? We see, as soon as we can gaze steadily on the scene, that the flames have suddenly rushed back and licked up those executioners as the ox licketh up the grass of the field, and there they lie, charred and blackened corpses on the edge of the platform, bearing witness to the destructive fury of the fire; whilst the three young men are walking with a mysterious companion—one like unto the Son of God—by their side, walking calmly on the red-hot floor through that white core of flame, absolutely untouched and unharmed. The presence of the mysterious companion has encompassed and saved them.

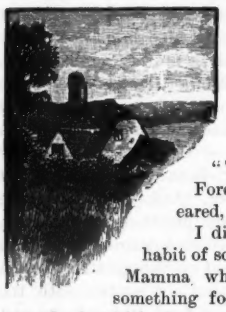
I must drop my description here, for I have little time enough left for the few simple remarks which the subject suggests to me, and which I wish to be allowed to offer to you before I close it.

I. Our first thought shall be for the three young men. We are inclined, no doubt, to praise their indomitable resolution. But if we wish really to understand their history aright, we must go behind the resolution to find the source of it, which was trust in the unseen Jehovah and in the promises of His word. This it was that made them manly, and enabled them to play the part which we have been watching with so intense an interest this morning. By faith (says the sacred writer) they quenched the violence of the fire. And it may be well for us to remember too that this faith of theirs was not by any means a sudden or extemporised affair. We have perhaps read or heard of a certain villain who "leant his arm against the chimney-piece in his drawing room," and in that easy position "repented of all the sins of his past life." But such things do not occur outside the covers of a novel; we find no instances of them in our actual experience. Spiritual graces are subject, like other things, to the laws of growth and increase; and although it is perfectly true that God gives faith, and that God by His Holy Spirit sustains in us the faith which He has graciously imparted, yet it is equally true that there must be a development of this confidence in the unseen God if we expect it to do great things for us. In other words, faith must be habitual, continuous, growing. And we cannot but suppose that it was through many a conflict and many a doubt; through many a bitter struggle with the suggestions of weak flesh and blood; through many temptations just to concede a little; that it was by earnest and continued prayer, by laying hold of God's strength, and by long wrestling for a blessing—that the three Jewish young men found their way into a spiritual position which enabled them to endure the wrath of the king, because they could see a greater although an invisible King behind him.

II. Our next thought shall be for the Church of God. This third chapter of the Book of Daniel contains the story of what perhaps we may venture to call a duel between the world-power and the Lord God Himself. We have in it the Church of God almost at its very lowest ebb—in captivity, shorn of its glory, cast down, very nearly destroyed. And on the other side we have the world in all the plenitude of its power, and in all the insolence of its authority, coming in like a flood, to overthrow and overwhelm it; and then we have the triumph ultimately resting with the right, God interposing to defend His servants and to crush His foes. Can we over-estimate the value of such a testimony as this to the faithfulness of God? Can we not imagine what an inspiration this narrative has been to all those who throughout the long past ages have contended for the truth against overwhelming odds—against the combined force of riches, and learning, and influence, and intellect, and power, but who have held fast throughout to the belief that God would never desert His cause, and the gates of Hell should not ultimately be found to prevail against it? Take away this story of the three children from the Bible, and how infinitely great would have been the Church's loss!

III. Our last thought shall be for ourselves. In some shape or other, we may all of us have to pass through the fire. The young man is terribly tempted, sometimes by the seductions of his senses, by the flattering solicitations of pleasure; the older man by the many snares of business life. Any one of us may be tried by bitter loss and disappointment, or by the keen edge of long-protracted bodily agony. Let us see to it that we have with us, as we may have, the presence of the personal Christ, of Jesus the great High Priest, the Angel of the Covenant. Then we shall pass through the flame and it will not gather upon nor burn us. Ay, and more than this. When Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego walked through the streets of Babylon, the bystanders cried out after them, "These are the men whom we saw with our own eyes cast into the furnace of fire! what a wonderful God is the God of the Hebrews! how He can save the people who put their trust in Him!"

And so shall you and I in our small way bring glory to God, and impart strength to other people, if we are known to have passed through the furnace of some fiery trial unscorched and unharmed by it because we have trusted in the name of the Lord our God.



"POOR DEAR MAMMA."

THE CONFESSIONS OF A DISCONTENTED GIRL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE AWAKENING OF MARY FENWICK," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"Expect nothing and you will not be disappointed."

I REMEMBER reading that axiom—or apothegm, or aphorism, I do not know which to call it—at the beginning of one of mamma's books. The book was a copy of "The Children of the New Forest," which was much dog-eared, and, indeed, read to pieces. I dislike that untidy and silly habit of scribbling remarks in books. Mamma, when she was a girl, wrote something foolish upon the fly-leaf of every book which she possessed.

Once upon a time I did write a few words upon the title-page of mamma's birthday-book. I wrote this line—

"With a little hoard of maxims preaching down a daughter's heart."

Mamma must have seen it, for she studies that book every day of her life, but she has not mentioned it in any way. I expect her conscience smote her, and she was ashamed to find that Tennyson himself knows what mothers are!

"Expect nothing and you will not be disappointed." Expect nothing! What a sentiment and what advice! Luckily no one thinks of taking advice—except when it is their own advice—so the advice does not signify much one way or the other. Expect nothing! How about Pandora's gift, our best friend Hope?

However, my sister Flo, who is married, and rather morbid, says that Hope is no blessing, but an eternal old nuisance. She speaks feelingly, for she is for ever expecting to reap (and for ever disappointed of reaping) a fortune from her husband's gamblings on the Stock Exchange: he is an inveterate but unfortunate speculator.

But it is not my morbid sister about whom I intend to write. She married three years ago, before I left school, and lives in London, while we vegetate in the country among cows and cabbages.

My mother married a country clergyman. I suppose I ought not to blame her for that, because she is very fond of him, and had she married anyone else (papa's ill-tempered cousin, the judge, for instance), I do not think she would have been happy.

No; I do not blame her for marrying a country clergyman; but I do think her conduct culpable in allowing him to stagnate during his whole life in a country rectory. [To be sure, poor papa's abilities are not anything very particular, for his sermons are dull, prosy, and full of repetition. Neither does he care for any of those pretty things and pretty ways that make the services at some churches pass quite quickly.] She may love her garden. I suppose, as a matter of fact, she does love it, for she freckles her face in the summer and reddens her hands in the winter with messing among the flowers. I feel sure that if she once made up her mind to have nothing more to do with gardening she would be far happier, for her flowers are an endless anxiety to her.

My black poodle, Mepho, is not at all a greedy dog, but he is thrifty: so if I give him a bone which he does not want, he buries it.

I know it is most unfortunate that he chooses the carnation bed for his cupboard; but who can blame him? The soil is light and easy to dig, and how is he to understand that carnation plants are brittle?

No wonder that I lost my temper when mamma, with the shears in her hand, ran after Mepho, calling him all sorts of names. I must allow that she did not catch him, for she was soon exhausted with the chase, and sadly out of breath.

Mepho is not her only enemy. The mice eat her bulbs, the slugs eat the seedlings, the caterpillars eat the roses, the aphids spoil everything, and then (terrible catastrophe!) the gardener overheats the flues in the conservatory and kills every plant there.

Mamma may love her garden, but, I assert, she would be happier without it. We are happier without things we like when those things give us cause for anxiety. If she had some nice little window-boxes, filled with white Marguerite daisies, scarlet geraniums, and blue lobelias (in a street, or terrace, or circus, or crescent, where there was someone to admire them besides herself), I am sure she ought to be satisfied. She could garden quite luxuriously then; neither breaking her back nor burning her face. Really, under those circumstances, I should not mind helping her occasionally myself.

You have no idea how short mamma was with me when I first suggested this excellent plan. I feel I am right when I say that to live in the country all the year round if you have a pretty daughter, who would adorn society, is the most selfish thing imaginable. To be sure, we have some neighbours, but they are old frumps, who do not know the latest from Paris from a home-made scientific—that will show you the sort of people they are. But mamma likes them; they satisfy her taste.

Of course I have read lovely poems and exquisite bits of prose all upon the subject of "mothers," or, rather, abstract motherhood. It seems a pity to exaggerate things so much, for I adore truth, and my eyes are wide open; it is not easy to deceive me. I say this without conceit; I am merely stating a fact. I have discovered, and the discovery cost me much pain (for those poems and bits of prose were very beautiful) that mothers are not perfect. My mother, although she is twenty-five years older than I, is not perfect. I have known her dogmatic and dictatorial. I have heard her exaggerate. I have seen her lose her temper during a discussion on some uninteresting political question with our Whig Squire. She is a redhot Tory, and, I believe, argues on subjects which she does not understand.

The name of our Whig Squire is Yorke. He has an only daughter, Puss, who is my bosom friend. We tell each other everything—all our troubles; so I know that she, too, has a great deal to put up with at home.

Mrs. Yorke is indolent and apathetic. She is content (as is mamma) with a country life. Pussy is full of energy and spirit, and when she tries to kindle an answering desire for life and gaiety in Mrs. Yorke, she yawns and goes out of the room.

The race of mothers has declined. Their reputed devotion, their self-sacrifice, live but in tradition. To be brief, they are self-opinionated. They may listen to what their daughters have to say upon different subjects—they may listen, I say, and they may hear, but they do not heed. They preserve their old-world notions, and the most convincing argument does not induce them to alter the daily routine of their life. I suppose it may not be altogether their fault; it is a misfortune to be narrow-minded and bigoted. I try to be tolerant, but mamma is very trying; she treats some of my most cherished ideas with a smiling superiority.

There are many, many girls who prefer to face the horrors of a hospital, or the disciplined life of a sister of charity, rather than endure the vexations of an unsympathetic home-life with a poor faulty parent. I should never do that. I would suffer anything rather than live with miserable sick persons, or wear a hideous nun's dress and no fringe; but I wish to marry: that must be happiness. A house of my own, my very own, where I may cover the walls with fans, or plates, or drapery; where I may sit all day long over the fire reading novels (if I wish to do so), with no one to send me out for a walk; where, in fact, I am sole mistress; and where I may do just what I like, just in my own way.

Mamma talks in the most calculating and worldly minded manner about marriage. She says that girls marry for the sake of change and a wedding-ring. We disagree sadly on this subject, but she is obstinate. You might as well argue with a certain quadruped (which must be nameless), once coerced by stratagem into journeying to Cork. On one occasion, I talked to her without a break from lunch till tea-time, and, although she never contradicted me at the time, yet, when I had finished speaking, I found that she was still unconvinced.

"You do not know when you are well off, Poppy," she said, looking up from her knitting; "you will never be so happy again as you are now. You have no responsibilities—no anxieties. Believe me that married life is not all trousseau and wedding presents."

"Surely, mamma, you do not wish me to be an old maid?"

"I do not wish you to marry the first young man you meet merely for the sake of being married. Florry says that 'old maid' is a nickname for a wise woman."

"Mamma," severely, "you are married."

"Exactly,' with a funny little laugh; "so I know where the shoe pinches. Do not look horrified, Poppy dear. Yes, yes, yes, I wish you to be married, but for the sake of love, not change. I want you to marry something nice—someone whom your father and I approve."

That was what she said to me some time ago, but I remember it, for I know she spoke with a motive.

In our village lives Miss Matthews; an ugly, uninteresting person—at least, she would be uninteresting did she not possess a nephew. Of course, if old ladies have male relations they cannot be totally uninteresting. Ernest is the name of Miss Matthews' nephew—Ernest Wilson. I have known him a long while—a very long while; nearly a year. He comes down from Oxford to spend his vacations with Miss Matthews. In the summer our neighbourhood indulges itself in constant garden parties, to all of which he went; so did we. I play tennis; so does he. We met frequently, and became attached.

I am very much attached to Ernest, though he has no money and no chin. When you are very much attached to a person, and there is no immediate prospect of marriage, want of money does not much interfere with the fun. Presents may be a pleasantish part of an engagement, but a ring is the one thing really requisite. I do not mind the no money half so much as I mind the no chin. Ernest and I walk to and fro the Dove Walk in the twilight side by side, and whenever I turn to look at him I miss something from his profile. There is a want of something; he seems all mouth and collar. It is Pussy's fault (of course I'd like to be married before Pussy; it is a triumph to beat your neighbour at any game, and the game of marry is no exception to the rule). She is spiteful about my engagement, and whenever I see her she always begins to talk of chins, of beautiful Grecian chins, of heavily moulded chins, of clean-cut jaws and determined physiognomy. She alludes to poor Ernest's chin as though I had lopped off that unfortunate feature with my own hands.

None of Pussy's lovers are the least atom desperate, and a desperate lover with no chin is better than the sort of lover who prefers a cricket-match to you. Bobby Brown, Pussy's third cousin, pretends to love her, but he plays cricket (whenever he gets the chance of doing so) in preference to spending the day with Pussy under the cedars at the Hall. Ernest told me this in confidence. He said he could not understand Bobby. I can, for Pussy is exceedingly stupid if you see much of her.

Cricket is a dangerous game. I am glad Ernest has such bad sight that it prevents him from attempting to play; but I am sorry that he is obliged to wear spectacles. Ernest plays nothing, and goes nowhere, now. He says he cannot tear himself from my side.

Ernest declared himself at our garden party, in the kitchen garden. We were eating green gooseberries together. I am extremely fond of gooseberries. He seemed so very, very nervous, that I was obliged to help him a little. He was hot and red, and his eyes were blinking away behind his glasses.

"Have you pricked yourself, Mr. Wilson?" I asked anxiously. I thought he looked miserable.

"No, I have not pricked myself," he stammered; "not myself. It is you—you have pricked me."

"Nonsense!" I said tartly, for I thought it was silly to make such a fuss over a prickle. "It is impossible."

"You misunderstand me," he cried. "You have not pricked my finger with a thorn; you have gone far deeper—you have pricked my heart with your adorable fascinations."

Wasn't that poetical? I was conquered, but mamma was not. She received my confession that evening with a horror which I feel sure was assumed merely to annoy me.

"Are you joking, Poppy? if so, it does not amuse me."

"It is no joke, mamma, to love Ernest."

"Oh, Poppy, Poppy! you are mad!"

Mamma was wringing her hands. She never kissed me, nor wished me joy. Are not mothers supposed to be sympathetic? and was that sympathetic? No, it was barbarously cruel. No wonder that I grew angry, and cried hotly, "Why shouldn't I love Ernest? You loved papa—you married him. I have loved Ernest for w-e-e-k-s and w-e-e-k-s."

That sounded well: I repeated it louder. Mamma is small and upright; she looks rather as though she had swallowed a poker—years ago, so that it has had ample time to get digested and permeate the system. I am hardly at all afraid of her. I am sorry for her if she loses her temper, for I can generally manage to keep mine in hand.

"My dear Poppy, I certainly both loved and married your papa; but your papa was a manly, agreeable, well-looking, intellectual man, in a position to maintain a wife in comfort. Mr. Wilson has no money, no brains, no prospects, and no—no——"

"Chin!" I broke in violently; "no chin! I know what you were going to say. But Ernest does not want to marry you; and I marry a man, not a chin. You are cruel! Yes, I am your daughter—I have the misfortune to be your daughter—but I am Ernest's promised wife. You have no right to stop my happiness. If I wish to be poor, let me be poor. I do not ask you to be poor."

"Poppy," said mamma, taking my hand in hers, "you are over-excited. Come, come, be reasonable."

"I am not excited—I am reasonable. Nothing shall separate me from Ernest. I shall marry him as soon—as soon—as soon as he has taken his degree."

"He will never take his degree," said mamma solemnly; "never, Poppy. Dear, dear, dear! don't you know a goose when you see one? I blame myself—I ought to have been on the look-out; but I should as soon have expected danger from a hairdresser's block as from that poor fellow."

"I will not stay here if you call my future husband such dreadful names!" I sobbed.

"Your future husband!" mamma groaned. "Oh! Poppy, you have seen so few people; you know so little; you will not be guided; you must learn by experience, because you are so wilful a child. Learning by experience is a painful process, I warn you."

"Don't talk like that, mamma. I would rather die than jilt Ernest. I value true affection from whatever source it proceeds."

Mamma bowed her head upon her hands.

"Heaven help you, you foolish child!" she said.

CHAPTER II.

ERNEST and I are engaged. We have been engaged a year. For some weeks my parents opposed our engagement, but eventually they gave way. I was firm—very firm. I thought it my duty to be firm. I am not naturally pliable, and in this case Ernest's happiness was at stake. Papa is weak—sadly weak. Mamma rules him (influences him, she calls it) on all subjects; so he, too, argued with me, and tried to convince me that he knew more about my feelings than I knew myself. But if papa is weak, I am not weak; and though parents are parents, they must bow to Love—Ernest always spells it with a capital L—and my engagement is now a recognised fact.

I think the University of Oxford is very badly managed: the young men's holidays are too long. How can they pass their examinations if they are always at home? Ernest seems to be staying with his aunt all the year round.

He came to stay with us in the winter for a week. It was the longest week I ever spent. It was a dreadful week, for Ernest is afraid of mamma. She makes him feel nervous; so, when he does speak, he says silly, inane things; or, if he cannot think of anything to say, he laughs: he laughs incessantly. I think mamma might have shown some consideration for me. She should have helped me to amuse Ernest, instead of going out every day and all day long.

I had a cold—a violent cold, in my head; so I had to stay indoors. Ernest sat with me in the drawing-room. He likes playing "draughts." I don't; I hate it. However, we did play, and when I beat him he said that he had allowed me to do so because he thought I should like to be conqueror. That was preposterous, so I refused to play again; and when mamma came in she said I was asleep. I was not asleep at all; I had only shut my eyes for a moment. She always jumps to conclusions.

When Ernest is away we write to each other every day. I forget to write sometimes, and when this occurs I send him a telegram. It costs more, but then it saves me a great deal of trouble. I have no imagination, and I find letter-writing a tax on the intellect.

Poor Ernest! he has missed his Smalls again: so unfortunate! I believe the examiners are prejudiced against men who wear spectacles; so Ernest tells me, and of course I believe him. Although Ernest has no faculty for spelling, and hard work makes him feel ill, yet, with so much practice, surely he ought to get through.

Pussy Yorke and I have quarrelled. We just speak to one another when we meet, but no more. She was rude to Ernest. He did not notice it; but I did, and it offended me. She is going to marry Bobby Brown almost immediately, and because Bobby is clever, and handsome, and rich, she thinks she may give herself airs. I wonder why she is so pleased at the thought of being married. When Ernest mentions such a thing, I shudder; for, as mamma says, it is a leap in the dark. Of course Ernest is quite sweet—as sweet as possible; but I do not care for "draughts;" and sometimes I think old maids look happy. Flo's husband has given up speculating, and has been working hard instead, and made a little money; so they have taken a house at Brighton for six weeks. I wrote to Flo last week this letter:—

"Darling Flo,—Do ask me to come and stay with you immediately; I don't feel very well, and I think a sea-blow would do me good. I have not told mamma I am writing this, so please ask me as though it was your own idea.—Your own "Poppy."

I have just received the answer. I am delighted.

"Darling Poppy,—Can you come and stay with me for a little while? Tom runs up to London every day on business, so I am rather lonely, and should love to have you. We have a good many friends here, and some gaiety in prospect. Fond love to mamma.—Your own "Flo."

When I took my invitation down-stairs and showed it to mamma, she said at once—

"But Ernest comes down to Miss Matthews for the long vacation next week, Poppy."

"'You do not know when you are well off, Poppy.'"—p. 703.

I blushed up to my eyes, and then said apologetically, "But it is such a long vacation, mammy dear!"

Mamma looked at me for a long moment.

"Ernest will be disappointed, Poppy."

"I don't think he will mind very much," I said positively. "One cannot keep it up for years."

"Keep it up?" repeated mamma in questioning astonishment; "keep what up?"

"Such devotion," I explained, unabashed. "A long engagement and a long vacation are two good things overdone."

"Poppy, you are talking recklessly."

"I am reckless. Why will you remind me I am engaged? You are always talking of Ernest. You never allow me to forget him for a day. You were the very person who first pointed out the disadvantage of my situation, and now you are for ever forcing my situation down my throat. May I not go to Brighton and enjoy myself—just for a month? When—when—when I am married I shall never enjoy myself again. Don't look so shocked. I don't believe you are shocked. I don't believe you are surprised. I believe you knew it from the first. How am I to marry somebody whom you despise?"

Mamma walked over to the window, and stood there staring out into the garden. Mepho was upon the lawn burying a marrow-bone in the carnation bed, but she did not see him.

"My dear Poppy! but you are—surely you are—dear me, how you puzzle me!"

"Ernest does not care for me, mamma; he really does not. We quarrel dreadfully, and now he does not even take the trouble to make it up. Let me go to Brighton. It will be a change—a pleasant change—for both of us. Perhaps, if you would be so very kind, you could play draughts with him a little sometimes."

"Poppy," said mamma sternly, "this will not do; you are treating a serious subject lightly. I cannot allow you to talk in this extraordinary way without demanding an explanation of your meaning."

"I don't know what I mean, mamma; but I wish I was dead."

"My dear Poppy, that is your favourite expression when anything goes in the least contrary to your wishes. You are so dreadfully impulsive."

"You are cruel, mamma. You have no pity for me, and, had it not been for you, I should never have done it. And now, when I want to go to Brighton, you tell me to stay at home for three long, long months with Ernest. It is dreadful to be engaged—dreadful. I could bear it better if—if—if he was in India."

Then I burst into tears, and mamma kissed me. She was quite kind, and she did not ask me any more questions, but she wrote a letter to Ernest. I did not know that she had done so until she brought me the answer, which Ernest had written her, to read:—

"MY DEAR MRS. PARROT,—Your letter was a surprise to me. I knew Poppy had been quiet and morose last time I saw her, but she said nothing more unkind than she had done once or twice previously. Our engagement was rot, of course; but at first she liked it. Aunt Tottie threw us together. However, 'all 's well that ends well;' so please give her my kind love, and say I shall go to Bath this vac., and I hope she will find some poor fellow with a perfect temper next time—for she 'll want it.—Yours sincerely,

"ERNEST WILSON."

For the composition of a goose, that was a nasty letter, and, when I had it, I threw my arms round mamma's neck. I was so grateful to her for what she had done.

I sent Ernest back his ring. Luckily I found it in my writing-table drawer under some old papers. It was a carbuncle ring. I had never worn it, because it burst my gloves and bruised my fingers. His letters I tore up and put into the paper-sack; and we made five shillings of them for the Orphanage.

Miss Matthews was very angry with us all. She withdrew her subscriptions from the village charities, and gave up coming to church for three months. However, you cannot keep up a grudge against a vacuum; so in time she attended the services once more, though she never renewed her subscriptions.

Pussy and I have made it up. She came to see me, and told me all about her annoyances. Bobby will not listen to her account of Mrs. Yorke's peculiarities; so she requires a confidante. Men do not understand things, nor interest themselves particularly in clothes. The trousseau is for Pussy; why should Mrs. Yorke have the choosing of it? Her antiquated mind cannot be expected to be alive to the latest fashion.

I did not mention any of my own affairs to Pussy; she was so engrossed in her gowns and squabbles that she listened to nothing I introduced upon other subjects.

When I met Mrs. Yorke, she was very, very kind and sympathetic. I daresay Pussy is tiresome sometimes. I have known her quite odious. Perhaps Mrs. Yorke (should she ever take to confiding her secrets to me) could find some extenuating circumstances to plead on her side. I fancy my mind enlarges as I grow older.

Neither papa nor mamma ever talks to me on the subject of Ernest. For this forbearance on their part I am grateful. I hope I may never see him again as long as I live, for I had grown so tired of him—of his face; of his voice; of his company; of his name. I did not know one could grow so tired of any young man.

Mr. Philip Manners has been staying at the Hall. I wonder if he plays "draughts?" I wonder if I should get tired of him if I saw too much of him? It is difficult to answer this last question, for, so far, I have never seen half enough of him. He is going away to-morrow, but he is coming again for Pussy's wedding, at which I am to act as bridesmaid. The dresses are white and yellow, with daffodil bouquets. I wish Pussy could have thought of something new.

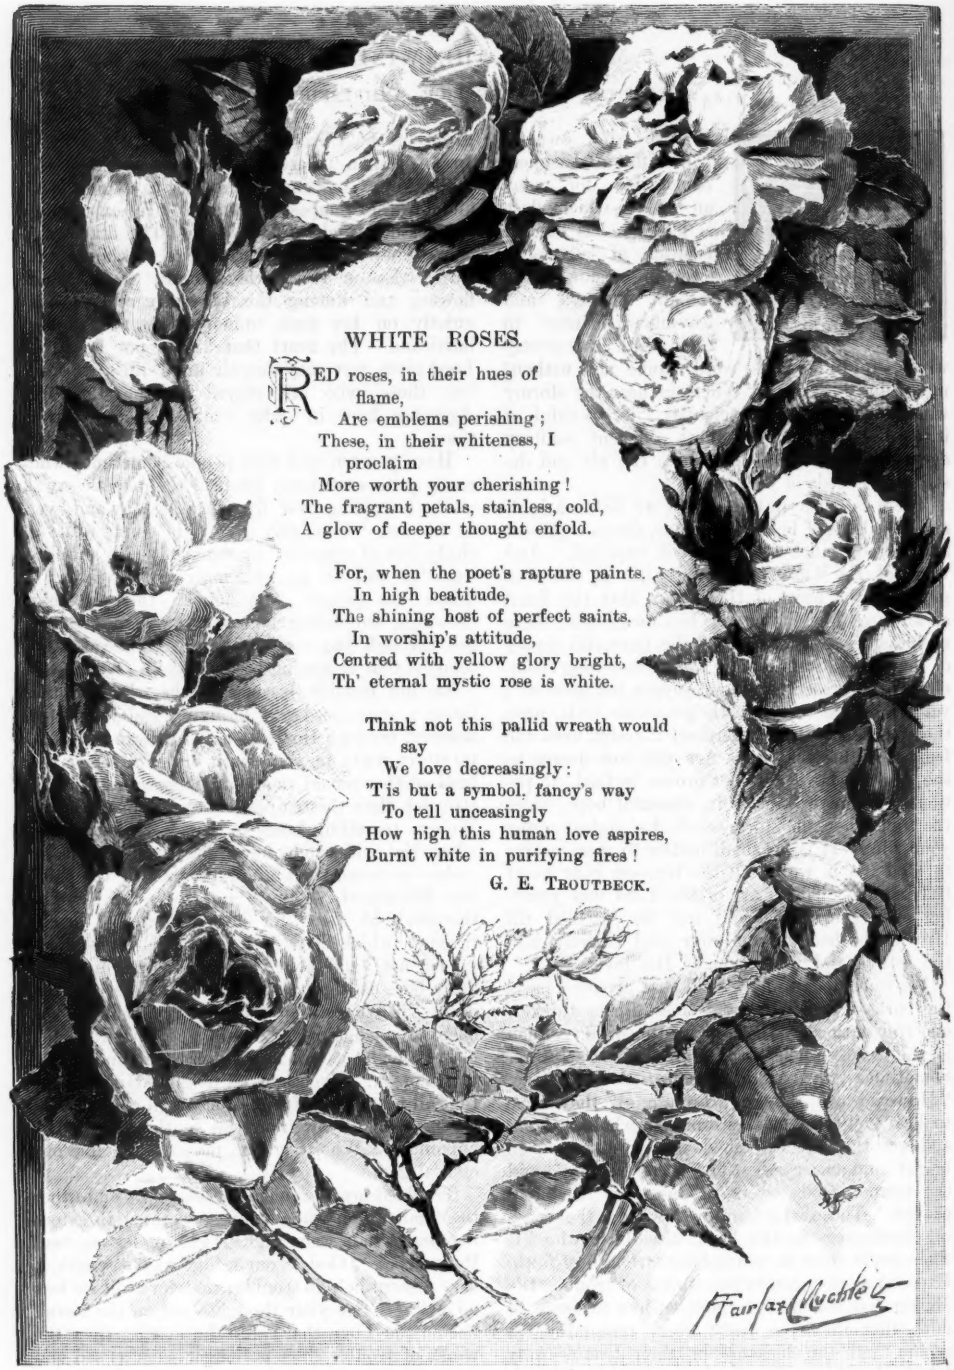
* * * * * *

I have been Mrs. Philip Manners for two years, and I have changed my mind on a variety of topics. I am happy—certainly happy—but I look back at my girlhood with regret. I won't tell you why: that is my secret. I still have my little secrets; and now the only ear to which I whisper them is the ear of my baby daughter, Nora. She is asleep in the cradle at my feet, and I feel relieved to think she was too young to hear the little difference of opinion Philip and I have just had about our trip to the sea-side. Philip and I love one another, but we are not perfect. What will Nora think of us some day? I wish—I wish—that I could tell mamma what I think of her, what I know of her, from the height of fuller knowledge and wider experience to which I have attained; but she died more than a year ago, and so it is too late

MUSIC IN THE WIND.

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

THE east wind owns a bad name, and is held responsible for many an ill to which flesh is heir; it has become typical of adversity, sweeping aside many radiant flowers, and leaving dreariness in their stead. But stormy winds, fulfilling His word, come not without mercy and blessing. "When we hear the stormy wind howling," says a scientist, "let us think of it as one of Nature's most efficient sanitary agents, by which she renovates the air and destroys the seeds of pestilence."



There is music in the blast if we listen aright, and it tells us of benefits to come, disease relieved and cured, much that is evil expelled. And what of the "uses of adversity?" Is there no music in the heart of the sorrow that the Lord of all love has chosen for His own? Are there no blessings left behind as the immortal dower of the winds of affliction? "All chastening seemeth for the present to be not joyous but grievous; yet afterward it yieldeth peaceable fruit unto them that have been exercised thereby, even the fruit of righteousness." Are you not nearer to the Master, have you not grown in faith, in patience, in prayerfulness, in thankful hope, since the time when the storm-winds first sighed across your life? It is no small matter to grow nearer to God; it is worth all the tempest your heart has known. The heart of the Lord was yearning over you, and could not be satisfied till His winds had driven your soul entirely into the refuge and protection of His love.

We remember to have read that in some parts the bark of much-exposed trees grows thicker, and resists thereby the force of the wind. Such is the wise provision of the God of Nature. Sometimes we say of much-tried Christians, "However can they go through all they have to bear? Storm after storm overwhelms them, and yet they are sustained, unmurmuring, even bright and cheery!" The secret is that amid the tempest God's sweet promises are tried and proved. Those who humbly bow, like the bending forest-trees in the blast, are those who lift their heads anew in triumphant strength of faith. Exposed as they are to the storms of trouble, the Master has vouchsafed them such a measure of faith that they can resist every temptation to repine, and the measure of their trouble only faintly betokens the glorious measure of God-given grace. A beautiful illustration has been given of the Christian's calm amid the storm. In an Italian palace two pictures are seen together, one showing a lurid sky, a raging sea, and in the tempest a human face expressing hopelessness and wild despair. The other picture shows a similar storm-scene, but amid the waves rises a rock, whereon are grasses and flowers, and among the blossoms a dove sits quietly on her nest, unmoved by the raging hurricane. The heart that knows not how the Lord gives rest may despair amid life's storms; but those who are stayed on the Rock of Ages are kept in quiet confidence, in trustful peace.

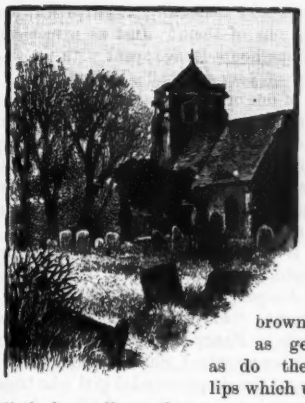
Have you not met with people sometimes who seem quite cast down because the papers say a storm is coming over from America by-and-bye, or because "somebody says it is going to be a chilly sort of summer," or somebody else prophesies "it will be an extremely bitter winter?" There are people who ignore their present blessings, wondering however they can possibly get through the trouble they see ahead—the tempest that is coming by-and-bye.

Do not tremble because of the winds of the future; your Lord will be living and loving to-morrow, even as He lives and loves to-day, and no storm waits in your path but shall leave behind another record that your Heavenly Father is stronger than the tempest, nearer than the grief. We are travelling home to that beauteous shore where the chill winds never sweep, the hurricane makes no moan; yet, amid the rest of the painless Homeland, shall we not love the Lord a thousandfold more for every storm of earth through which He drew near to us, saying, "Fear not," and held us by the hand, and tenderly bore us through the hour that seemed the darkest? We shall glorify Him then that He has been to us again and again a covert from the blast; but let us not wait to glorify Him till the blast is over. Even now let us give Him thanks that all the winds of life—the rough ones as well as those that blow from the south—are of His appointing, Whose every purpose is for our eternal gain.

Troubled heart! remember the words of Luther to Melanchthon when tempests seemed threatening and winds were high: "Philip, let us read Psalm xlvi.: 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will we fear no evil.'" Set your thoughts not on the storm, but on the Love that rules the storm; then the winds of trouble shall no longer seem as sad and restless voices, but as an Æolian harp attuned to peace, to hope, to everlasting victory. M. S. H.

WHITE ROSES.

RED roses, in their hues of flame,
Are emblems perishing;
These, in their whiteness, I proclaim
More worth your cherishing!
The fragrant petals, stainless, cold,
A glow of deeper thought enfold.



For, when the poet's rapture paints
In high beatitude,
The shining host of perfect saints
In worship's attitude,
Centred with yellow glory bright,
Th' eternal mystic rose is white.

Think not this pallid wreath would say
We love decreasingly:
'Tis but a symbol, fancy's way
To tell unceasingly
How high this human love aspires,
Burnt white in purifying fires!

G. E. TROUTBECK.

"FAITHFUL IN THE LEAST."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TUNE, 'ST. ELWYN'S.'"

"GOOD-BYE, dear Nancy! I do hope you will be happy and get on well."

Miss Dayrell's daintily gloved hand clasps the country girl's rough red fingers in hearty leave-taking, and her clear brown eyes smile with as genuine cordiality as do the sweet curving lips which utter that kindly little farewell speech.

"Thank you, miss!" replies Nancy, yet with a certain hesitancy in her voice, and pulling shut behind her the cottage door on the threshold of which they stand, that her grandfather, sitting at the fireside, may not feel the draught of the snow-chilled air.

"And you will try to be good, won't you, Nancy?" continues the young lady, truly solicitous for the welfare of this little village maid on the eve of quitting home for the first time, but herself not glib at the utterance of good advice. "In trifling things, you know, even more particularly than big ones, always try to be true, and honest, and conscientious, and reliable. Don't forget about 'Faithful in the least.' If you are careful about small duties, the greater ones will come easy to you."

"Yes, miss. Thank you, miss," responds Nancy dutifully, but rolling the hem of her blue-checked apron somewhat nervously as she speaks. A blush, commencing somewhere behind her ears, is slowly spreading over her plump cheeks, and threatens to immerse the many freckles round about her good-natured nose. "Please excuse my saying of it, miss!" she continues, in a desperate blurting fashion, as Miss Dayrell steps off on to the pebbled path; "but I know something as 'ud help me to remember!"

"What is it? Anything I can do?" asks Daisie Dayrell encouragingly.

"If you would be so kind, miss! And I ask your pardon if it ain't convenient. But it's—it's your likeness, miss!"

This great confession, this well-nigh unspeakable request fairly uttered, shy Nancy hangs her head, and zealously folds her apron-border into a bunch of tiny pleats.

"Do you really think that would be a help to you?"

"Oh, miss, I'm sure it would! I should hang it up in my little room, I should love it! And it would remind me so! Oh, miss, can you spare me one?"

"Yes, Nancy, you shall surely have it if you desire it so much. I never thought of it myself," returns Miss Dayrell, with frank readiness. "I will put one of my latest photos in an envelope and post it to you to-night, so that you shall have it to take away with you in the morning."

Nancy is too full of bliss at this prospect to be very eloquent in thanks—her attachment to the beautiful young lady of Larchwood Park is quite a romantic passion—but Daisie quite understands the glowing face and almost trembling lips with which Nancy follows her down the path.

"You won't forget, miss, will you?" pleads Nancy, as she opens the gate. "I know what lots of things you have to think about, but——"

"You may depend upon me to do as I said," Miss Dayrell assures her pleasantly. "Good-bye, Nancy; God bless you! You shall not be disappointed."

Long and radiant is Nancy's gaze after the graceful figure, whose pansy-purple mantle of rich silk plush limns it so clearly against the contrasting whiteness of the snow. It will live, embalmed in love, in her heart for many a future year.

At that very moment, the selfsame form of beauty is vividly present to the mental vision of a young man who briskly traverses the road to Larchwood Park from a different point. He is a tall, athletic, well-grown fellow, but his skin is boyishly fresh and clear, and the golden fringe upon his upper lip is in its tenderest youth. But, though barely yet "of age," Alan Paulet has been deeply in love for the space of half a year, and should you meet the glance of his grave dark-blue eyes, you would be disposed to judge that love, once awakened in the soul that lay behind, might never sleep again, or change, so steady is their light.

He is poor, she is rich. He has been occupying the position of temporary assistant to the busiest medical man in the neighbourhood, for his intellectual qualifications are in advance of his years; but she is the only child of one of the wealthiest magnates in the county. He does not dare to hope—such presumption is undreamed of by him—yet, so inconsistent is human nature, as he goes to-day to bid her in all probability a long farewell, and thank the family generally for the many kindnesses they have shown him during his sojourn in their vicinity, he is haunted by an intense desire to discover, if possible, the state of Miss Dayrell's feelings towards himself. He has almost fancied that there was sometimes a scarcely perceptible shade of something in her manner towards him, but he is afraid to think of it. If only he knew for certain, how he could live upon that knowledge, and work, and wait, and be cheerfully patient, until at some far distant time, crowned with well-won honour, he might venture into her presence once more and lay his laurels at her feet!

Daisie passes beneath the portico of Larchwood House ere ever Alan's footprints have dinted the smooth snow between the pines, that stand like sombre sentinels on both sides of the road by which he approaches the mansion. On entering the drawing-room, so anxious is she to remember and fulfil her promise to Nancy that, straightway unlocking the door of a cabinet, she searches for some recent photographs of herself there bestowed. Only one, however, remains—such souvenirs rapidly become distributed among numerous acquaintances—but this she willingly allots to her humble friend, standing it, for the nonce, on a shelf of the overmantel, to be placed in a wrapper and despatched at an early opportunity.

Ten minutes later, as she is occupied with the finishing touches of her simple toilette, a servant taps at the door to say that Mr. Paulet is below, and that Mrs. Dayrell requests her daughter to entertain him for a few minutes, until she has concluded a letter upon which she is engaged. Mrs. Dayrell has taken a great fancy, in a patronising kind of way, to this pleasant, well-bred youth, and always treats him with both courtesy and cordiality, resting assured that the difference in their position will prove an effectual safeguard against any undesirable result from this benevolence.

The maid retires, and almost eagerly Daisie advances to her chamber door, a radiance of which she is herself unaware illuminating her frank face. But she suddenly turns back to substitute the knot of ribbon at her throat for another of more becoming hue, fastening among its loops, moreover, a cluster of sweet-breathed early violets which she had meant to keep longer fresh in water. But they may be sacrificed now!

Alan is standing before the overmantel when she enters, gazing so earnestly upon the photograph that he is unaware of her presence until she speaks, when he turns towards her, blushing more deeply than herself.

"I have come to say 'good-bye,'" he confesses, after a few commonplaces have passed between them. "Duty, or rather, opportunity, which is sometimes the same thing, calls me to London; and, I regret to say, at once."

Daisie is conscious that the pleasant, fire-brightened room suddenly appears cold and grey, and taking up the poker, she beats and splinters the already blazing coals as though they were to blame for that curious change. But her voice betrays only polite concern as she replies, "Really! This seems rather sudden, but I hope it will prove to your advantage."

"So do I, indeed," returns Alan, "or I could never reconcile myself to going. It is a chance I feel I should do positively wrong to lose. But I have been so happy here!"

Daisie still punishes the flaming Wallsend, apparently determined that not one lump bigger than a hazel-nut shall be permitted to exist. Meanwhile, the sensation as of a tightening band of iron so compresses her throat that speech has become impossible.

The ensuing silence grows embarrassing to both. Alan breaks it by observing with an inward trepidation which the remark itself does not seem to warrant, "That is an extremely pleasing portrait of yourself, Miss Dayrell!"

This helps Daisie. She does not guess that it is but the pilot of something more agitating. "Most people like it," she simply replies.

Alan's heart is beating like a steam-engine; he can scarcely hear his own faltering accents as he proceeds: "May I—would it be asking too great a favour if I were to beg one of them? Just as a memento of the many happy hours I have spent with—with—beneath the roof of your estimable parents!"

The footsteps of one of those worthy personages are already on the stairs, but Alan is not at the present moment impatient for the pleasure of her company. He holds his breath, and his hair grows damp about his brow as he waits for Daisie's reply to this request, which he has made up his mind shall be the testing-point of the interview.

The suspense is brief, but the seconds seem hours, both to the palpitating youth and the maiden who, still as is her drooping face, is fighting so hard a battle for the right. "Faithful in the least!" Her own parting words to Nancy echo through her brain. Shall she hold to her promise? Shall she show herself faithful, reliable, to the simple-minded girl who trusts her, and looks up to her as a pattern of all goodness? Or shall she disappoint—shall she fail?

"I cannot!" she replies. "It is promised."

The very effort by which her brave decision is uttered makes the words sound stiff and cold, and Alan, with a smothered pang, takes them for a repulse.

Mrs. Dayrell, half patronising, half motherly, just then bustles in. She expresses voluble regret on hearing that Mr. Paulet is about to leave the neighbourhood, asks many questions, and in short takes the remaining conversation entirely upon herself. For this Daisie is thankful. Yet, if she could, in a perfectly modest and proper fashion, with just warmth enough and not too much, have let Alan know how sorry she was to be unable to grant his request! But no opportunity occurs. The young man's stay is short, and his final leave-taking so distant and dignified that she blushes to think that she ever imagined him attracted to Larchwood House by anything but the agreeable society of her estimable parents. "Alas! how easily things go wrong!"

CHAPTER II.

"BUT I did right—I did right!" sobs Daisie to herself over and over again as she tosses on her tear-wet pillow at night. "It would have been cruel to disappoint poor Nancy, and unfair after giving her my word. Surely the keeping of one's promise, even with a little cottage girl and about such a trifle, must be one of those 'least' things in which He would have us faithful; and there is no knowing how it might have caused her to stumble if I had failed—she believes in me so, poor child! But it is hard; I would have liked him to have just one little thing—the thing he cared for—to remember me by! But surely the Lord notices and knows, and will not let me lose anything precious for my trying to do His will!"

This thought is a real comfort to Daisie in the months that follow, and calms her often when, recalling many a look and word scarce noticed as they passed, she knows beyond a doubt that blue-eyed Alan was her lover, and that, though unwittingly, she met him with a sharp rebuff. She is sufficiently acquainted with the almost too great modesty and sensitiveness of his nature to feel assured that, even should they some day meet again, he will not, remembering the disparity of their station, make another advance towards her. She cannot, moreover, conceal from herself the fact that no other man can ever now be to her what Alan Paulet might have been. And yet, with it all, the Master whose voice speaking in her heart she had obeyed at such a cost is nearer and more real to her than ever before. Nothing draws us closer to Him than consciously suffering for His sake, which is a secret spring of purest joy in many a heart to whom happiness appears denied. It is a lovely experience that Daisie would not have chosen for any earthly bliss to be without.

The seasons circle round. The first year after Alan's departure seems terribly long; after that they grow more endurable. Towards the completion of the third twelve months from that vividly remembered farewell, another trouble comes to disturb the serenity of Daisie's life. A neighbouring baronet seeks to win her for his wife, and her parents strongly favour his suit.

"But I do not love him, mother!" Daisie pleads.

"You might, nevertheless, give him the chance of winning your love," returns Mrs. Dayrell. "Sir William is a most agreeable man, and a really good man, besides, or we should never wish to persuade you to encourage him. A more desirable match, from every point of view, you could not make."

"Except that I can never feel towards him as—as anyone he meant to make his wife ought."

"This is sheer nonsense, Daisie!" declares Mrs. Dayrell, not without vexation. "You cannot tell what your feelings might be if you came to know him better. Of course you do not love him now; no modest girl loves a man until she is wooed."

Daisie's white brow flushes deeply as she bends to inhale the fragrance of some hyacinths in the window.

"I know my own mind, mother," she answers firmly; for one who was "faithful in the least" can surely not prove unfaithful to the verities of her own heart and life. "It would not be kind of me to allow Sir William by deed or word to ask for what I am unable to give. It would not be right."

"I did not think you could be so unreasonably obstinate, Daisie!" is her mother's comment. "If you cared for someone else, I could sympathise with you; but this perversity is a totally different thing."

So for several weeks Daisie is argued with and coaxed, scolded and teased, remonstrated with and generally worried, with the most affectionate intentions in the world, till in desperation she is almost on the point of yielding, when deliverance appears in a most unlooked for, and in itself most unwelcome shape. And she is freed!

* * * * * *

It is more than five years since Alan Paulet passed out, with a heavy heart, from the hospitable door of Larchwood House, but since about eighteen months from that day, at which time his friend the doctor also left the neighbourhood, he has had no news of the Dayrells. But although the once-coveted portrait of sweet Daisie was denied him, her image stands an ever vivid picture in the most sacred chamber of his heart. Her innocent brown eyes often look out upon him with startling clearness in the brief pauses of his busy life; her frank, bright smile flashes when least he expects it, across his mental gaze. He is a successful man, prosperous, and rising in his profession, but as yet he has done nothing startling, nor seems likely to do so. The once dreamed of "laurels" he scarcely now desires; to honestly do his every-day duty is enough for him.

"I must ask you, Dr. Paulet, to step up-stairs and see my housemaid," a convalescent patient says to him one day. "She looked so ill this morning, and complained so of a pain at her side, that I sent her back to bed again."

Alan does as he is desired. The servant's room, furnished plainly enough, but neat and clean and cosy, as every maid's room should be, is sweet with the odour of spring violets—flowers that possess a strangely sad fascination for the young doctor; but not until he has carefully noted the sick girl's condition, and advised accordingly, will he turn his head to the spot whence the perfume comes.

They are standing, a bowl of fresh, deeply purple country violets, just in front of a little velvet portrait-frame. The likeness which it encloses seems somehow to have been evoked by their magical scent—those large, clear eyes, that tenderly curving mouth, that pretty gown, just a little old-fashioned now! For a few seconds Dr. Paulet's whole conscious being is in the past, and he stands once more with her in the dancing firelight glow. Then he comes to himself again.

"Is this a friend of yours?" he quietly asks, taking the frame in his hand.

"Ah, yes! A dear, dear friend," Nancy answers warmly. "'T was her as sent me those lovely flowers."

"From the country, I suppose? From her own garden?" A more direct question he cannot bring himself to utter.

"I don't know where they come from, sir, only that she sent them. Most likely a friend of hers sent them to her, for she lives in London herself, and ain't got a bit of garden of her own now, poor dear! But she always thinks of me when she gets anything like that, being both from the old home, as you may say."

That is all Alan hears on his first interview with Nancy, for he is almost as shy as of yore, and is afraid of betraying himself. But later on, when the girl visits his consulting-room, an intense desire to learn more of Daisie's story, during those hidden years, urges him, on more than one occasion, to set his patient talking on what is evidently to her a favourite theme.

Thus he draws from her the saddening tale of the Dayrells' misfortunes: how, some two years previously, Mr. Dayrell had embarked nearly all he possessed on a tempting speculation, which, proving a complete failure, brought the family to the verge of destitution. "And they had to leave Larchwood

"'I cannot. . . It is promised.'"—p. 710.

Park," the girl tells him, "and all their beautiful things, which was sold up, as it 's enough to make one cry to think of, and come to live in a little stuffy bit of a house in a little poky London street, which it's a wonder it didn't kill poor Mrs. Dayrell outright; and Miss Daisie she goes every day to teach at a school, as I'd sooner sweep mud in the streets than be plagued with a lot of unruly brats, but being that sweet in her manners no doubt tames them. For she is just as sweet as ever, and sweeter if she could be," concludes Nancy, with far more zeal than discretion, encouraged by the doctor's evident interest, "and I always will say that Sir What's-his-name showed his bad sense in throwing her over as he did."

Alan turns deadly pale. "Was—was Miss Dayrell engaged, then?" forces itself from his faltering lips.

"Not as anyone knew of for certain. Only he was backwards and forwards at the Park a deal. Some people do say that that was no fault of hers, and that she had gone so far as to declare she wouldn't have him was it ever so. But, la! you don't know what to believe. I only hope there wasn't anything between them, poor dear! that I do."

It is surely unnecessary to relate that before very long after becoming possessed of the foregoing information, Alan, with more confidence but not less delicacy than in the past, finds means of renewing his acquaintance with the Dayrells, and of ascertaining for himself whether Nancy reported truly concerning the inextinguishable sweetness of her adored Miss Daisie.

Humbled by adversity, the elder folks receive him as cordially, but far less condescendingly, than of yore, soothed and gratified to find the successful professional man as courteous and deferential in his manner towards them as had been the lonely protégé of the days of their prosperity.

And Daisie?

"Isn't it wonderful, Alan," she says, sitting one evening in the gloaming with her betrothed, "that the very thing which I fancied had made everything go wrong should be the means of bringing us together after all? But for seeing that likeness you would never, in all probability, have heard anything about me, nor ever come across us again. London is so large, and we have not a single mutual friend."

"It is wonderful, dearest," Alan earnestly agrees. "It has been marvellous all through. Had you granted my request that day we parted, I might have been tempted to go farther and declare my love. Knowing your father as I do now, I can see what opposition and misery and conflict such a step would then have brought about. It has all been for the best—beautifully for the best. For those who are faithful to conscience, my Daisie, nothing can really go wrong."

THE DAY OF REST.

WHEN all the labour of the week is done,
The weary heart
Rejoices, that once more the morrow's sun
Brings rest in part,
That the tired limbs may pause a little while
From painful strife,
And God's refreshment may have room to smile
On busy life.

So, when the day of life is near its close,
And shades are grey,
The weary pilgrim waits with calm repose
For God's own day.
Though shadows deepen, yet no coward fear
Disturbs his breast;
The night of gloom but serves to bring him near
The Day of Rest.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"YOU CANNOT DOUBLE NOTHING."

COLLECTORS of gifts or of promises of other aid for good causes have a difficult and delicate office. Theirs is not always pleasant and sunshiny work. They meet rebuffs and are chilled by icy negatives. But sometimes even an unwelcome visit may bring blessing in its train. A friend of missions on one occasion set out to enlist new subscribers, and a rich man was called upon. The pleas for the enterprise of carrying the Gospel far and wide through the nations of the earth were urged with a gentle force that seemed to compel attention. "I want to get you on my list, Mr. ——. Oh, if you would see your way to double what you have done for missions." The answer was a strange one, considering the signs of wealth on every side. "What you ask is not in my power." The riddle was too much for the applicant, and a brief silence ensued. It was broken by a humiliating explanation. "You are surprised. It sounds like a flimsy excuse. But it is nothing of the kind. The thing is impossible, for you cannot double nothing. I have been neglectful." And shame and regret were in the rich man's heart that he had received so much and returned so little. There should be a new departure. And the mission collector went away rejoicing that at last the sealed streams of liberality had begun to flow. Perhaps the contrite words, "You cannot double nothing," have a message. Many a beneficent institution is restrained in service by narrowness of means. It may one day be a joy to increase aid. Let not a beginning be delayed.

ARE WE CHRISTIANS?

A short while before he died (in 1524), Linacre, the first president of the College of Physicians, read the New Testament for the first time. So great was his astonishment at finding the rules of Christians widely at variance with their practice, that he threw the sacred volume from him in a passion, and exclaimed, "Either this is not the Gospel, or we are not Christians."

SANTA CLAUS IN SUMMER.

Some months since, we alluded in THE QUIVER to the beneficent winter work of Santa Claus in providing all kinds of comforts and delights for hospital patients, through the agency of Miss J. F. Charles. But it is reasonable that one so benevolent as "Santa Claus" would not be content to benefit people only when wintry winds are blowing. Miss Charles has been enabled to extend the good work carried on under his name into the days of summer. Many needy ones are thus sent to country and sea-side homes, and letters for convalescent institutions would be most welcome. "She is made a woman of," said a mother of her fragile little girl, to whom Santa Claus afforded change of air; and of a boy similarly helped we read, "He looks quite a different boy, has got a place, and goes to work." What is wanted now is a "Santa Claus Home:" a place near London to take in "ineligibles"—that is, cases needing a certain amount of surgical nursing, and children under three years old; these would usually find it difficult to obtain admission at ordinary convalescent homes. To everyone out of health, the convalescent time is a trial, and needs special and watchful care. The workers in this society are most anxious to supply this need as concerns the poor, in the bracing air of the north side of London, where there are woods and open spaces to be reached without much expense and difficulty. Flowers and fruit for the sick can be well and wisely used by "Santa Claus;" but Miss Charles would like to supply the kind givers with addresses to which they can go direct. Several readers of THE QUIVER have helped this society, and we are asked to thank them heartily for their interest and aid.

"THE EXPOSITOR'S BIBLE."

The three latest volumes of the "Expositor's Bible" are now before us. An old friend and contributor, Dean Chadwick of Armagh, contributes the volume on the Book of Exodus, which, it is almost needless to say, is at once brilliant and thorough. The chapters dealing with the liberation of the Israelites, the Ten Plagues, and the Tables of the Law, are perhaps the most useful in the volume. The important historical period covered by the books of Judges and Ruth is dealt with by the Rev. R. A. Watson, the author of "Gospels of Yesterday." The moral lessons to be drawn from the stories of Samuel and Ruth are very clearly and very cleverly pointed out, as is also the true significance of the less-understood portions indicated. Here is one of Mr. Watson's admirable comments on the story of Ruth. He is speaking of the compact between Naomi and Ruth:—"The training in resoluteness, therefore, finds highest value and significance in view of the religious life. Those who live by habit and dependence in other matters are not prepared for the strenuous calling of faith, and many a one is kept from the freedom and joy of Christianity not because they are undesired, not because the call of Christ is unheeded, but for want of the power of decision, strength to go forward on a personal quest. Thousands are in the way of saying, 'Will you go to an evangelistic meeting? Then I will go. Will you take the Sacrament? Then I will. Will you teach in the Sunday-school? Then I will.' So far something is gained: there is a half-decision. But the spiritual life is sure at some point to demand more than this. Even Naomi's advice must not deter Ruth from taking the way to Jerusalem." Mr. Ball, the chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, had, perhaps, a more difficult task than either of his colleagues whose volumes we have already noticed, when he took up the Prophecies of Jeremiah. The preliminary sketch of the life and times of the prophet was almost necessary to a proper appreciation of the chapters which follow. Mr. Ball sometimes allows himself to be carried beyond the limits of exposition pure and simple, as, for instance, in the following passage, which will be read with mingled approval and dissent, as the views of the reader may prompt. It is an extract from his chapter on popular and true religion:—"A Christian country: where human beings die, year after year, in the unspeakable, unimaginable agonies of canine madness, and dogs are kept by the thousand in crowded cities, that the sacrifice to the fiend of selfishness and the mocking devil of vanity may never lack its victims! There is a more than Egyptian worship of Anubis in the silly infatuation which lavishes tenderness upon an unclean brute, and credulously invests instinct with the highest attributes of reason; and there is a worse than heathenish besottedness in the heart that can pamper a dog, and be utterly indifferent to the helplessness and the sufferings of the children of the poor. And people will go to church and hear what the preacher has to say, and 'think he said what he ought to have said,' or not, as the case may be, and return to their own settled habits of worldly living as a matter of course. Oh, yes! it is a Christian country—the name of Christ has been named in it for fifteen centuries past; and for that reason Christ will judge it." These three handy volumes do credit alike to their authors and to the splendid series of which they are the latest members.

A RESCUE THAT WAS A REWARD.

The really bright spots in war annals are not those that reflect the glory of a great victory, but the simple episodes that show the bond of human brotherhood recognised even in a time of strife. In the days of the war with France—when that country aided the revolted American Colonies—certain English sailors and soldiers were captured and interned in Normandy. These unfortunates found a friend. A French exile lately returned from America, M. Crevecœur by name, pitied their forlorn and miserable state, and set himself to alleviate it by every means in his power. They were his country's foes, but the fact did not make an end of the tie of kinship. With large-hearted love he helped them, and looked for no return. But God's providence girdles the globe, and Crevecœur was to reap as he had sown. It is a beautiful sequel. M. Crevecœur was a farmer, an author, and something of a diplomat. He knew Washington, and was esteemed by him. So when his visit to Normandy ended, he went back to New York accredited as French Consul. Bad news was awaiting him. His homestead had been burnt by Indians, and his young children were missing. Who can picture the new consul's despair? But a ray of light shot across the clouds, and its source was his own kindness. To his intense joy and surprise, the bairns were safely returned to his care. The story of his goodness to the British prisoners had kindled gratitude in an English merchant's heart, and at great risk, and with no little hardship, he had, as a recompense, rescued M. Crevecœur's children. How often is there a totally unlooked-for return—full measure, heaped up—for the kind word and the generous deed!

sion surely lifelong. Some of the little invalids come from such poor homes, that a visit to the country entails clothing them afresh entirely. A lady much interested in this work of love records the case of a feeble little girl for whom the doctor said there could be no recovery without change of air. The mother believed the remedy impossible, but Mrs. Kerwin came to the rescue: the child was brought away from the crowded, smoky atmosphere of town, and bright eyes and rosy cheeks were the

CITY CHILDREN IN EPPING FOREST.

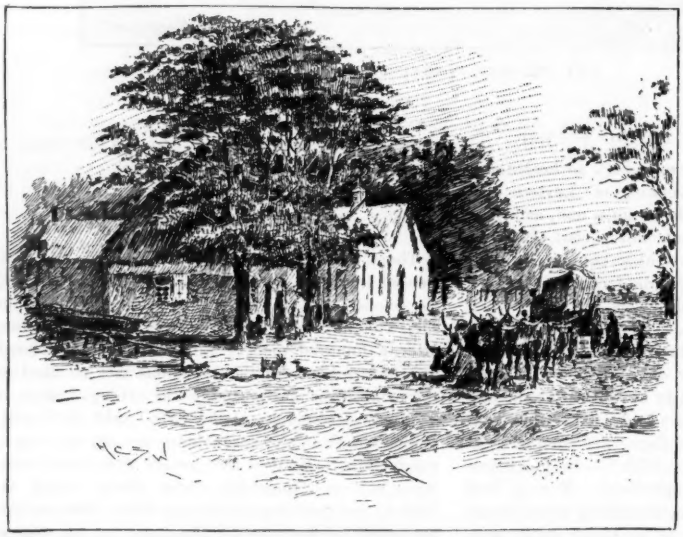
"Can't we help the little ones back to health and happiness?" asks Mrs. Kerwin, of Leytonstone. Already she has proved this possible, and, as far as the kindly aid of sympathisers will permit, she continues to arrange for poor, weakly London children to come out for a never-to-be-forgotten holiday among soft grasses and wild flowers, waving leaves, and the music of the birds. Her first charge had been under treatment at the London Hospital, and was growing thinner every day. The doctors prescribed good food and country air, and after she had been two weeks with a kind Christian woman in fresh health-giving surroundings, her mother exclaimed, "Is it really you, Alice?"—so great was the change in the little one's looks. The children spend the summer days almost entirely out of doors, and every morning there is a simple Bible talk, which, with family prayers, must leave an impression surely lifelong. Some of the little invalids come from such poor homes, that a visit to the country entails clothing them afresh entirely. A lady much interested in this work of love records the case of a feeble little girl for whom the doctor said there could be no recovery without change of air. The mother believed the remedy impossible, but Mrs. Kerwin came to the rescue: the child was brought away from the crowded, smoky atmosphere of town, and bright eyes and rosy cheeks were the result. Milk and pudding and the doctoring of Nature had saved the little life.

RECAPTURE YOUR COLOURS!

There was once a regiment in India—the 64th Bengal Infantry—which had mutinied, and of which the colonel had, in consequence, been cashiered, and their colours had been taken from them. Not long after, a hundred men of this regiment volunteered, as a forlorn hope, for the dangerous task of climbing the wild hills and storming the strong fortress of Trukkee. "Soldiers of the 64th," said Sir Charles Napier to them, "your colours are on the top of yonder hill." So it is that we are permitted by the grace of God, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, to press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

IN DISTANT LANDS.



How far are Christian missions really successful? The question has often been asked, and as often answered contemptuously by prejudiced people. Let any who are anxious to see the true state of the case turn to Mr. Robert Young's book on "The Success of Christian Missions," just issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. The testimonies he has gathered as to the value and influence of the mission works all over the heathen world ought to be sufficient to convince the most sceptical and re-assure the most despondent. One great method of arousing interest in foreign missions is foreign travel, and, failing that, reading the reports of travellers. So we turn next with special interest to the Rev. Andrew Russell's "Glimpses of Eastern Cities" (Nisbet and Co.), in which he gives us pleasant reminiscences of Jerusalem, Damascus, Egypt, Palestine, and Ephesus, in a style that ought to make the book valuable to teachers. From the same publishers we have received the latest volume of the "Men of the Bible" series, in which "the Lives and Times of the Minor Prophets" are dealt with by Archdeacon Farrar. It is hardly necessary to say the work is thoroughly as well as popularly done. Are we not too apt to pass over the writings of these prophets whom we are taught to call "minor?" And yet there are some much-needed lessons to be learned from their books, and it will be easier to learn them with Archdeacon Farrar's book to show us the circumstances under which the prophecies were uttered. Two stories are before us at the same time—each appealing largely to young readers. First comes Mrs. Hugh Bell's "Will o' the Wisp" (Longmans), an admirably told story whose hero is indeed well described by the title. And the other story is Mrs. Molesworth's charming "Little Mother Bunch" (Cassell), a beautiful study of child-life that ought to please both children and their older friends.

FOR BUSY MEN.

At the battle of Edgehill, brave Lord Lindsay, with his son Lord Willoughby, headed the Royal foot-guards. Immediately before charging, he prayed in these words: "O Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me." Prayer has been defined as "thinking to God," and this can be done in all places and in our busiest moments.

DELAY WAS NOT DEFEAT.

A touching instance of woman's faith winning the quality of prescience is found in the story of the first meeting of missionaries and converts round the Table of the Lord at Kuruman. All had seemed dark for so many years. Not a single Bechuana came into the Christian fold. Even the true-hearted Moffat began to question if indeed he was sent of God to South Africa. But his wife was sure that delay was not defeat. A friend in England wrote to ask if there was any special gift that would be welcomed. If so, it should go out. Ten years of seed-sowing and no hint of harvest! yet Mary Moffat saw afar off the fulfilling of the promise, "Ye shall reap if ye faint not," and she returned the answer, "Send us a communion-service; we shall want it some day." There is a dramatic unity in the little tale of triumphant faith. By-and-bye dead souls were quickened. The day of ingathering had dawned. Six selected candidates received baptism, and in due course assembled with their friends and teachers to remember Christ in the breaking of bread. A few hours before, an overdue box had reached the station. Its contents were a communion-service. They had arrived not a week too early, and on the other hand not a day too late. And there was living proof now that zeal in God's service cannot go unrewarded. The age of miracles is past. Perhaps. But not the years in which a sunny confidence may pierce the prevailing gloom of disappointment, and in all humility — pleading but the Word — challenge Heaven for the blessing, and in that meek faith receive it.

MORE VALUABLE THAN MONEY.

It is often said that "time is money," but there are many things far more valuable than money. "Some years ago," says Sir John Lubbock, "I paid a visit to the principal lake-villages of Switzerland in company with a distinguished archæologist, M. Morlot. To my surprise, I found that his whole income was £100 a year, part of which, moreover, he spent in making a small museum. I asked him whether he contemplated accepting any post or office, but he said certainly not. He valued his leisure and opportunities as priceless possessions far more than silver or gold, and would not waste any of his time in making money."

MAKING A RAMBLE USEFUL.

AN HISTORICAL APPLICATION.

I think that the following historical application of Fuller's is most apt:—"The English ambassador, some years since, prevailed so far with the Turkish Emperor as to persuade him to hear some of our English music, from which (as from other liberal sciences) both he and his nation were naturally averse. But it happened that the musicians were so long in tuning their instruments, that the great Turk, distasting their tediousness, went away in discontent, before their music began. I am afraid that the differences and dissensions betwixt Christian Churches (being so long in reconciling their discords) will breed in pagans such a disrelish of our religion, as they will not be invited to attend thereunto."

HELP FOR YOUNG WORKWOMEN.

In connection with the "Old Welcome," Cross Key Square, and also the "New Welcome," Jewin Street, dinner and tea-hour services are held weekly in many workrooms. Christian ladies and City missionaries carry the message of salvation again and again to City workrooms, and frequently, through the kindness of country friends, such visits are accompanied by gifts of flowers. The texts which are linked with the bouquets are seen again on the walls, the gas-branches, and the lines which hold the work. Some of the young lives toiling in the City are greatly cheered at this time of the year by invitations to pleasant country gardens, where the wants of soul and body have been lovingly and wisely helped. Girls' classes and Y.W.C.A. gatherings in country places frequently arrange picnics and rambles during the finer weather. Very often such rambles, resulting in beautiful leaves, flowers, blackberries, etc., might minister pleasure to their less favoured sisters. Many are the ways in which cheer and gladness can be devised for London's work-girls; one dear old lady, an invalid and bedridden, sent them on her seventy-ninth birthday seventy-nine pincushions with texts attached.

THE INCREASING INTERCOURSE BETWEEN HINDUS AND EUROPEANS.

Every year seems to increase the number of cold-weather visitors to our great Indian dependency. We English are learning to take more and more interest in our Hindu brothers, and they, on their part, seem to be increasingly bent on familiarising themselves with our manners and methods. Caste remains a mighty power still, but even caste rules have to be modified when they are found to conflict with the wishes of any large section of the better-circumstanced people. The crossing of "the black water," which had to be so seriously discussed and prepared for when undertaken by Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, is becoming a matter of course, and the rajah's precaution in bringing with him a Brahman cook to save his caste has now been conveniently discovered to be unnecessary. Where there's a will it has been found that there is a way, even in the matter of caste. Doubtless the fathers of the Hindus of to-day would have been shocked had they had prophetic insight to see what their sons were going to do. But had they been in their sons' places they would probably have done the very same. All things considered, we may hope that the movements in the social condition of India are for good. That there should be no evil admixture with the good is of course far too much to expect. The British methods of government, which some of the Indians wish to adopt, and the British customs into which others desire to be initiated, are far from being perfect in themselves, still further from being perfectly suitable for those not to the manner born. A petty rajah of one of the Indian States, some time ago, wishing to become acquainted with the home life of the Westerns, and to free himself from the thraldom of the social shackles of Hinduism, appealed to a well-known American missionary for help. The American at once offered to do what he could, and it was arranged that the rajah and rani should become for awhile the missionary's guests. While staying at this gentleman's house, the rajah was of course invited to various dinners in the station, many of which were given, indeed, in his honour. One day the sister of the missionary, who, like almost all American clergymen, was an abstainer, was shocked to find the rani hopelessly intoxicated. The rajah explained that his wife, hearing his accounts of the wines he had tasted when out visiting among the British residents, had expressed a strong desire to taste them, and, since their host's teetotal table did not furnish the opportunity, he had quietly introduced it into their own apartments, with this sad result.

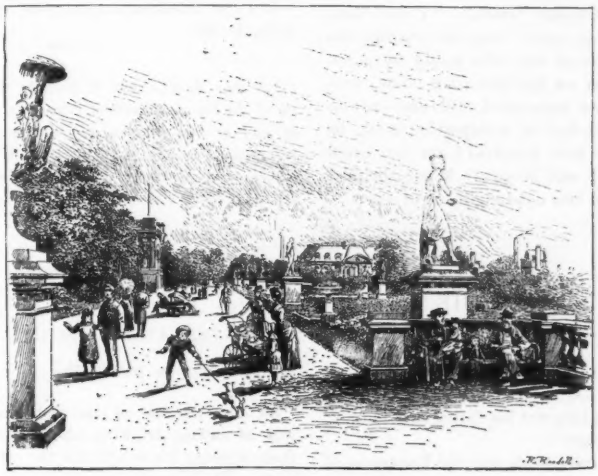
A SWEET SINGER.

When Dr. Horatius Bonar died, it was well known that there were not a few hymns and poems of his scattered about different hymn-books and other publications which had never been included in any one of his volumes of verse. His son has now collected them under the pleasing title, "Until the Day Break, and Other Hymns and Poems Left Behind." We dare not begin quoting from the volume, for it would be difficult to select any specimen that would fall within the limits of our space; but the verses are characterised by all the fervour and intensity of the earlier writings of the author of "I heard the voice of Jesus say." Doubtless not a few of our readers will be glad to welcome these last songs from their old friend.

Dr. Bonar was not the only Scottish teacher whom death took from us during last year. He, indeed, fell asleep in a ripe old age; but Professor Elmslie was cut down at what seemed to be the beginning of a great career. The Memoir and Sermons which Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton (who are also the publishers of "Until the Day Break") have sent us, include an admirable sketch of Dr. Elmslie's brief career, together with a very representative selection from his sermons and other writings, which only tend to deepen in our minds the sense of the loss we have suffered in the removal of this able young thinker and teacher. Yet another memorial volume; this time the subject is a lady. "Life and its Author: an Essay in Verse," by Ella Haggard, is the volume before us, in which is represented the poem from which the volume takes its title, together with a very feeling little memoir by the author's distinguished son, Mr. H. Rider Haggard. Dr. Pakenham Walsh, Bishop of Ossory (a former contributor to our own pages), has gathered into a volume entitled "Voices of the Psalms" (Hodder and Stoughton) a series of papers originally prepared for use in a Bible-class. They are admirably calculated to aid leaders of such classes elsewhere by their suggestive and helpful thoughts, and we heartily commend the volume to the attention of all preachers and class-leaders. From the same publishers comes "Veni Creator," in which the Rev. H. C. G. Moule gives us his thoughts on the person and work of the Holy Spirit of Promise. No word of ours is needed to emphasise the importance of his subject; we can only draw the attention of our readers to his work, which seems to us admirably fitted to impress the great lessons surrounding this marvellous subject.

"HE THAT TOUCHETH PITCH SHALL BE DEFILED THEREWITH" (Ecclus. xii. 1).

Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, tells us of a Christian convert who was persuaded by his friends to go to a gladiatorial spectacle. He went, but would not open his eyes, till a shout from the multitude caused him to do so involuntarily, and "so soon as he saw the blood, he drank down savageness; nor turned away, but fixed his eyes, drinking in phrensy and madness, and was delighted with that guilty fighting and intoxicated with the bloody pastime. Nor was he the man he came, but one of the throng he came unto; yea, a true associate of them that brought him thither." "Be not deceived: evil company doth corrupt good manners" (1 Cor. xv. 33, Revised Version).



RELIABLE PEOPLE.

A man said, "I have a very reliable clock, for when it points at two, it always strikes twelve, and then I know it's half-past seven o'clock." There are people equally reliable. What a relief to turn from them to Him "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

"I AM GLAD TO BE ALIVE."

Not long ago, when returning from a short but very rough voyage, as we were getting into harbour I heard two ladies grumbling at the accommodation afforded by the hotel in the town we had just left. Never having been more comfortable anywhere, it astonished me to hear these fastidious persons saying that the cooking was bad, the attendance not good, and that the charges were excessive. I moved away to another part of the deck, where two old gentlemen were talking about the rough night we had passed. One, a Frenchman, observed to the other in broken English, "Truly, monsieur, I am much thankful to be alive." Was not this old gentleman more philosophical, not to say religious, than the ladies who were thankless for their preservation while they only thought of the few rose-leaves in their couches that had got crumpled?

THE PEOPLE'S PARK, HALIFAX.

(From a Photograph by Messrs. Frith & Co., Reigate.)

"FOR THE LORD'S BENEFITS."

It is a pleasant and comely thing to see in subscription lists the significant words, "A Thank-offering," or "A mite of acknowledgment for mercies received." Would that such lines occurred more frequently! It was this spirit of gratitude that gave Halifax its public park. Sir Francis Crossley, the first baronet, has himself related how it came about. On a glorious September day he stood in the midst of the magnificent scenery of the White Mountains, in America. Companions were with him, and they turned into the hotel for a cup of tea. Sir Francis felt the spell of the rare beauty of the spot laid with almost painful power upon his soul. He did not go into the crowded public-room with his friends. Instead he went on a few paces alone. And the question came, "What shall I render to my Lord for all His benefits to me?" Swiftly, as if some voice replied, his mind had the answer. Away in Yorkshire were thousands of pale-faced toilers to whom the loveliness of nature was an idle phrase, and freedom to stroll in green glades a strange thing. Some of them were helping to increase his wealth. They should reap advantage from the well-spring of gratitude that was leaping into happy life in his heart. He went home and prayed about it, and rose up resolved, and henceforth had a plain project before him. And the working people of Halifax had soon to thank Sir Francis Crossley for a large, beautiful, and well-arranged park—a lung to their great city. If in their own station and degree other holiday-makers, enjoying earth's beauty-spots, would shape thankfulness to a pattern of help for the less fortunate, how often singing would replace sighing in our midst!

"YE SHALL REAP IF YE FAINT NOT."

It is said by some that people nowadays have a taste for the exciting and adventurous. Those with inclinations in this direction will find plenty of interest and romantic-seeming truth in the annals of the London City Mission, which possesses heroes worthy to stand by the side of many exalted in narrative and song. It wants nerve, courage, and faith to stand up for the Gospel in the face of ridicule, opposition, and threats; it wants more, perhaps, to go in and out of homes where the air is heavy with impurities, and the absence of cleanliness brings much that is revolting in its train. Yet if precious souls be led to the Redeemer, the disciple of Jesus counts not the cost, but ascribes to Him the glory, and goes patiently forward bearing light into dark places in His name. A missionary told lately of much difficulty and discouragement when he first began his labours, a couple of bulldogs on one occasion being brought into his mission-hall, causing him some natural disquiet as he continued the service. But one day one of the roughest men in the neighbourhood called to ask him to take his pledge, and though the man's own wife said, "He 's fooling you, sir," it turned out that the man's change of character was sincere, and much blessing was experienced by him whom many would have considered a hopeless wreck. "I will kick you out if you come in here!" was the greeting the missionary received from one who would have nothing to do with him on his first visit. But, with kindly tact, the visitor persevered, till one day, as he stood by the sick-bed of a departing soul, he heard the cry, "Oh! how thankful I am you cared for me through all I said to you! What should I have done now if you had not taught me of Jesus?"

(A NEW SERIES OF QUESTIONS, BASED UPON THE INTERNATIONAL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.)

QUESTIONS.

97. In what way are we to understand Christ's words that "if a man hate not his father and mother, he cannot be My disciple"?

98. What example have we in the Old Testament of such a sacrifice for God?

99. What particular warning does Christ give to those who would be His disciples?

100. In what words does Jesus set forth the great blessing of true repentance?

101. Quote a passage from the Old Testament in which the sinner is likened to a lost sheep.

102. In what way does a sheep illustrate the sinner?

103. What is the special characteristic of the life of the Prodigal Son?

104. What words of the Prodigal show that we must look upon sin against our fellow-men as also sin against God?

105. In the Parable of the Lost Piece of Silver, of what are we reminded?

106. What words of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus tell us of the way in which sin separates us from God?

107. In what way are riches a hindrance to the spiritual life?

108. What lesson ought we to learn from the Parables of the Unjust Steward and the Rich Man and Lazarus?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 640.

85. "Take heed and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." (St. Luke xii. 15, and iv. 4.)

86. The parable of the rich fool, whose thought was of eating, drinking, and taking his ease, rather than of using his wealth for the benefit of his fellow-man. (St. Luke xii. 16—22.)

87. Treasure in Heaven — peace with God. (St. Luke xii. 21—33.)

88. "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." (St. Luke xii. 32; see also St. Matt. xiii. 43.)

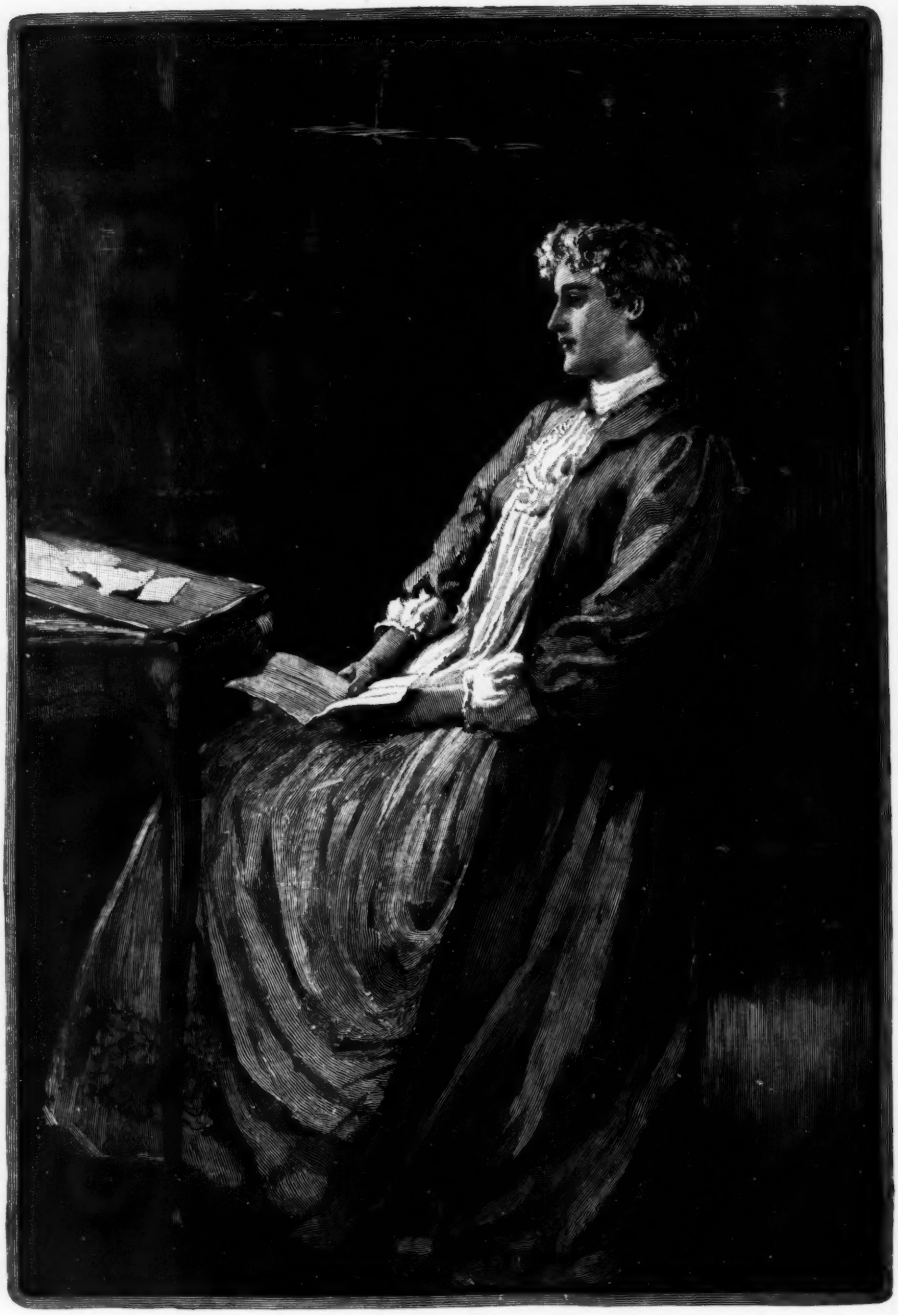
89. "Seek not ye what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind." (St. Luke xii. 29; St. James i. 6.)

90. That they gave up all for Christ's sake. (Acts ii. 45.)

91. By seeing the miracles which He performed. (St. John iii. 2.)

92. Healing woman with spirit of infirmity—healing man with the dropsy — healing man with withered hand. (St. Luke xiii. 11—13; xiv. 2—4; St. Matt. xii. 10—13.)

93. That works of charity and necessity are lawful and right on the Sabbath. (St. Matt. xii. 1—12; St. Luke xiii. 15—16, and xiv. 5.)



94. That while men acknowledge the blessedness of Heaven, they are too ready to make any excuse for not listening to God's call. (St. Luke xiv. 15, 16—20.)

95. "Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me." (Prov. i. 28; St. Luke xiv. 24.)

96. That we should seek the Lord while He may be found. (Is. lv. 6; St. Luke xiii. 25—27.)

THEIR BRIGHT EXAMPLE; OR, HALF-HOURS WITH THE WORTHIES OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY TH REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S. EDIN., ETC. ETC.

II.—JONATHAN EDWARDS.

"Three times a day he resorts to secret prayer."—p. 725.

THERE are few men to whom bigger adjectives have been applied than Jonathan Edwards. Robert Hall, in the glow of his enthusiasm, called him "the greatest of the sons of men." Sir James Mackintosh said of him that "his power of subtle argument was perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed among men, and was joined, as in some of the ancient mystics, with a character which raised his piety to fervour." Coleridge's copy of the "Freedom of the Will" showed his appreciation in his usual way, by the number and quality of his manuscript comments written on the margin. Dr. Chalmers recommended this book to his students "more strenuously than any other book of human composition."

But Edwards was not only a philosopher, he was an evangelist and a saint. The combination was very remarkable. How few philosophers are evangelists; how few evangelists are philosophers! Never man sought more earnestly to win souls than Edwards. And as he sought, so he succeeded. The two great revivals in the American Northampton under his ministry were times when the great Reaper seemed to swing his sickle to its utmost compass, and leave hardly a stalk unreaped. As to his saintliness, it was written on his very countenance. It was written, moreover, in the seventy "resolutions" which he framed for himself from time to time for the guidance of his life. And it was written on a more enduring tablet—written on his life; written on full fifty years of holy diligence and blameless devotion to the service of God and the service of man; a half-century that left a memory the fragrance of which seems eternal. His soul was penetrated through and through by the faith of Christ and kindred graces. No man was ever enabled to discipline his spirit more thoroughly after the Christian standard, or to bring every thought more effectually into captivity to Christ.

The power of Edwards in the region of abstract thinking is the more remarkable if we consider the condition of the colony during his life. His great-grandfather had emigrated to New England in 1640, just twenty years after the earliest of the Puritan settlers. When he himself was born, it was but eighty-three years since the Pilgrim Fathers had landed at Plymouth, and it was a much shorter time since any part of the colony had begun to assume the aspect of a settled country. There were men living on the banks of the Connecticut whose childhood had been haunted by the vision of the Red Indian and his tomahawk, and who had shuddered as, with his fierce war-cry, he swooped from the woods and dashed at the white man's settlement. The first hard struggle of emigrants in a new country for the bare necessaries of life was, indeed, past; but that second stage of civilisation had hardly begun when the choicer spirits of a community can be set free from daily toil, either to explore the depths of philosophy, or to cultivate the graces of art, or to bring to light the secrets of science.

The college at which he studied was in its infancy, and in very untoward and unpromising circumstances, for a controversy was raging among four neighbouring towns as to which of them it was to be placed in. When Edwards entered, fourteen students were at one place, thirteen at another, and four at a third. There was little indeed to smile on the birth of the celebrated Yale College, which has thrown so much lustre on the town of Newhaven, the State of Connecticut, and New England generally. Of literary and philosophical society there was scarcely a trace in the country; libraries were hardly known, and Edwards was indebted to Dr. John Erskine, of Edinburgh, and others, for such books as served to show what men were thinking at home. The only opportunity he ever had of contact with a Christian philosopher of the first order was during the time (1728 to 1731) when Bishop Berkeley was residing in Rhode Island, in furtherance of his scheme for the erection of a colonial college in Bermuda. But in 1728 Edwards was only twenty-five; he had but recently entered on his ministerial charge, and there is no evidence that he and Berkeley ever met. As pastor of a considerable congregation in a country town, and as father of a large family, his hands and his heart were full of work. Sometimes he was in great difficulty and anxiety; even the glorious awakenings among his people brought anxieties and troubles. His views on the sacredness of the Holy Communion brought him into collision with his people, and the collision ended in his being dismissed from his charge at Northampton in 1750, and in his spending the last few years of his life at Stockbridge as a missionary among the Indians. Finally, when at last, through the premature death of his son-in-law, Mr. Burr, he obtained a position of learned leisure, as president of what is now known as Princeton College, New Jersey, a single month ended his incumbency; he fell a victim to small-pox. There seemed little scope here for a man attaining eminence as a philosopher, least of all during the years spent among the barbarians; and yet it was at this very time that his greatest work, "On the Freedom of the Will," was written. It was wonderful how the philosopher and the missionary contrived to get on so well together.

On the other hand, certain providential circumstances in his lot were much in his favour. His great-great-grandfather, and earliest known ancestor, a native of Wales, was a clergyman in London in the days of Queen Elizabeth. His great-grandfather and his grandfather were successful merchants in Hartford, New England, and were both men of high character. His father, Timothy Edwards, was minister at Windsor, on the banks of the Connecticut, for sixty years; while his mother, Esther Stoddart, a woman of queenly mien, was the daughter of a celebrated minister, Solomon Stoddart, of Northampton. It thus happened that there mingled in his veins Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, and New England blood.

But what was of more significance, all his more immediate relatives were singularly like-minded in matters of religion. Their character was of the same type: the grand old Puritan creed at its base, and resting on this the intense convictions of Puritanism—its all-conquering faith, its omnipotent discipline, its sublime subjection of the flesh to the spirit. Everything conspired to the production of that calm, orderly, devout character which was so conspicuous in Edwards. There was so little of original sin apparent in him, that what was pleasantly said of Dr. Marsh, of Beckenham, might have been said of him—he must have been born before the Fall. Rather, we should say, that when the breath of the Spirit entered, bone had so gathered to bone and sinew to sinew, that nothing was needed but the vivifying power.

And when the decisive change took place, the leading view which dominated everything was THE EXCELLENCY OF GOD. A blessed experience, truly! In his very boyhood he tells of his seeing "the majesty and grace of God wonderfully combined; majesty and meekness joined together; a sweet, gentle majesty, and also a majestic sweetness; an awful sweetness, a high, and great, and awful gentleness." He tells us how at such times the appearance of everything was altered: God's excellency, His purity and love, seemed to appear in everything—in the sun, moon, and stars; in the clouds and blue sky; in the grass, flowers, trees; in the water and all nature. "I often used to sit and view the moon for a long time, and in the day spent much time in viewing the clouds and sky, to behold the sweet glory of God in these things; in the meantime singing forth with a low voice my contemplations of the Creator and the Redeemer. And scarce anything among all the works of nature was so sweet to me as thunder and lightning; formerly nothing had been so terrible to me."

This delight in the contemplation of the Father extended to the person of the Word made flesh. "Pure and humble, holy and heavenly, Christ appeared exceedingly amiable to me. I felt a burning desire to be in everything a complete Christian, and conformed to the blessed image of Christ; and that I might live in all things according to the sweet, pure, and blessed rules of the Gospel. I had an eager thirsting after progress in these things, which put me upon pursuing and pressing after them. It was my continual strife, day and night, and constant inquiry how I should be more holy, and live more holily, and more becoming a child of God and follower of Christ."

With this view he began at about the age of eighteen (1722) to draw out that memorable series of resolutions to which we have already referred. The first of these is the keynote of the whole seventy. "Resolved, that I will do whatsoever I think to be most to the glory of God and my own good profit and pleasure, in the whole of my duration, without any consideration of the time, whether now, or never so many myriads of ages hence. Resolved, to do whatever I think to be my duty, and most for the good and advantage of mankind in general. Resolved, so to do, whatsoever difficulties I meet with, how many soever, and how great soever."

Surely a right noble resolution for a young man beginning life, with all the siren sisters calling him to their islands of seeming bliss.

And the second is like unto the first. "Resolved, to be continually endeavouring to find out some new contrivance and invention to promote the fore-mentioned things."

Wise as well as good! Not everyone that desires the first sees the need of the second. Yet how can we reach the first without the second? How can we constantly do our duty—our irksome, painful, almost impossible duty as it often appears—unless we are in the frame and under the living influences that dispose us to it? The science of godly living is, in point of fact, the science that shows us how to be as much as possible under the full influence of all that disposes and encourages us to do the will of God.

"Resolved, to live with all my might, while I do live." Well done, good and faithful servant! There shall be none of thy life spent in aimless dreaming, or halting between two opinions, or see-sawing between the flesh and the spirit. When thou hast settled what to live for, the whole machinery of soul and body shall be set to work to realise it. There shall be no discharge in that war!

Let us add a few more, without note or comment.

"Resolved, never to do anything which I should be afraid to do if it were the last hour of my life."

"Resolved, to endeavour to the utmost to deny whatever is not most agreeable to a good and universally sweet and benevolent, quiet, peaceable, contented and easy, compassionate and generous, humble and meek, submissive and obliging, diligent and industrious, charitable, patient, moderate, forgiving and sincere temper, and to do at all times what such a temper would lead me to do; and to examine strictly at the end of every week whether I have so done."

"Resolved, when I am most conscious of provocation to ill-nature and anger, that I will strive most to feel and act good-naturedly, yea, at such times to manifest good-nature, though I think that in other respects it would be disadvantageous, and so as would be imprudent at other times."

"Resolved, whenever my feelings begin to appear in the least out of order, when I am conscious of the least uneasiness within, or the least irregularity without, I will then subject myself to the strictest examination."

"Resolved, that I will endeavour always to keep a benign aspect and air of acting and speaking in all places and in all companies, except it should so happen that duty requires otherwise."

"Let there be something of benevolence in all that I speak."

Can there be any doubt what this man was aiming at? His burning desire was that every faculty and force of his soul should be in order, in constant order, controlled by the highest of them, reason and conscience, enlightened by the Word and directed by the Spirit of God. Duty has ever a sublime sacredness in his eyes, and it is not only a burning sin and shame to come short of it, it is a sin and a shame to neglect anything that disposes one to it. Every avenue to the heart is guarded, and every help to goodness is applied. Three times a day he resorts to secret prayer. On the Lord's Day he is specially careful to repel every thought that will withdraw his soul from Heaven, or cool its spiritual ardour. His continual thought is, "Thou God seest me."

Edwards began his ministry at the age of twenty-three, as colleague to his grandfather at Northampton in Massachusetts. It is to this day but a small town of one considerable street, with straggling villas and cottages dotting the roads in the neighbourhood. It is a place of great beauty; the fine river Connecticut, at the distance of little more than a mile, brightens a meadow of remarkable fertility; on the opposite bank the wooded heights of Mount Holyoke close in the view with a noble sky-line; while Northampton, on the right bank, nestles among the gentler rising grounds that form the western ramparts of the valley.

Respect for the memory of Edwards carried the present writer some years ago to Northampton, and as he strolled along the pleasant lanes that traverse the woods and fields, he found it not difficult to fancy the tall slender figure, six feet one, with the thin pale face, moving silently along, pausing here and there to note in his little book some train of thought that had occurred to him, to be amplified in the house into the head of a sermon, or into a section of one of those treatises which posterity will not readily let die.

Of the two memorable awakenings that occurred under his ministry, Edwards has himself given the history in his "Narrative of Surprising Conversions." The first of the two followed the delivery of some powerful sermons on the way of salvation, among others one on "Justification by Faith Alone." A few marked cases of conversion were the first-fruit. By-and-bye, the interest of the people in religion became universal. There was scarcely an individual in the town, whether young or old, who remained unconcerned. This was true alike of the gayest, the most licentious, the most ungodly. Northampton seemed full of the presence of God. The interest spread to neighbouring places; in no fewer than twenty-seven there was something similar. The number of persons in Northampton who appeared to undergo a great change was three hundred.

With the commencement of the second revival Mr. Whitefield had much to do. In this case, the movement was limited chiefly to the young, and the results, though striking, were not so remarkable. Mr. Edwards deemed it a singularly pure movement in its first stages, but it degenerated towards the end, chiefly by the rushing in of strangers who disturbed the movement, and brought in not a few elements of mischief.

The controversy that arose between Edwards and his people, and finally drove him from Northampton, was caused by his coming to see that his grandfather's (Stoddart's) view of the Lord's Supper was erroneous. Mr. Stoddart had taught that it was or might be a converting ordinance; but Edwards came to a clear conviction that only converted persons ought to be communicants; and this the congregation did not like. And the result was, that they came to the pastor who had been the means of bringing such transcendent blessing to the place, and besought him to depart out of their coasts. And no other flock seemed to care to have him. It is one of the most humbling chapters of Christian history. For six years he laboured among the Indians at Stockbridge, preaching to them through an interpreter—with what result we hardly know. The leisure he enjoyed was spent (as Luther spent his in the castle of Wartburg, translating the Bible) in writing books. At last, in February, 1758, he was appointed president of what was then called Nassau Hall, in New Jersey, afterwards Princeton College. As it was a literary college and not a theological institution, he was very unwilling to accept the office, but at last he yielded. Hardly had he been inducted, when, having been inoculated with small-pox (then raging in the district), in accordance with the medical practice then prevalent, he fell a victim to the endeavour to save him. He died on the 22nd of March, 1758. It is remarkable that his aged father: his son-in-law, Aaron Burr: his daughter, Mrs. Burr: he himself, and his much-loved wife, all died in the course of the year, between September, 1757, and October, 1758.

The body of Edwards was laid in the cemetery at Princeton, in the most honoured and frequented of a row of tombs where the remains of the successive presidents of the college have been deposited. In the burial-ground of Northampton you come on the tombs of some of his people. His daughter Jerusha was to have been married to holy David Brainerd, but death came between them. On one slab of marble you read, "Sacred to the memory of the Rev. David Brainerd, the faithful and laborious missionary to the Stockbridge, Delaware, and Susquehannah tribes of Indians, who died in this town Oct. 10, 1747, ætat. thirty-two." Contiguous is a slab that bears that "Jerusha, daughter of Jonathan and Sarah Edwards, was born April 26, 1730, died Feb. 14, 1747. [N.S., 1748.] 'I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness.'"

A HAPPY MEMORY.

I HAD not hoped for this. He writes,
In words whose charm through life shall last,
A grateful letter that unites
The present with a vanished past!
An act of kindness long ago
I did for him, and straight forgot,
Had strength and grace from God to grow
To cheer the darkness of his lot—
And this dear letter thanking me
Recalls a happy memory!

O precious is the task we take,
Though but in feeble human hands,
For simple love and mercy's sake!
Upon the seas, in distant lands,
Or by the hearth, glad hearts may yearn
With gratitude for word or deed!
And to the sower may return
Some flower of beauty for the seed
Dropped and forgotten—as to me
Comes back this happy memory!

I sit and muse upon the past
While twilight shadows gather round—
The bread upon the waters cast,
After these many days is found!
In joy and thankfulness to-night
My prayer would rise to Heaven above:
O God, may other lives be bright;
I ask alone Thy grace of love—
That, looking back, my life may be Henceforth a happy memory!

IN THE SECOND PLACE.

BY L. T. MEADE, AUTHOR OF "SCAMP AND I," "THE BEAUFORTS OF BEATRICE GARDENS," "ENGAGED TO BE MARRIED," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE carriages had gone by another road, and Hope and Rossiter were after all the first of the party from Beeches to arrive at the rendezvous. The sportsmen were all standing about when Rossiter galloped lightly into their midst, went straight up to Markham, and thrust his nose into his hand.

"Good gracious, Miss Karron!"

Hope was quite pale, and for a moment she felt too breathless to articulate.

"I did not know Rossiter was to be brought out to-day—he's much too fresh for a lady to ride. What a gallop you have had! May I help you to dismount?"

Scarcely touching the hand which he proffered to her, Hope sprang lightly to the ground. At another time she would have owned the truth. She was a perfectly frank girl, and not a particle of shame would have occurred to her in owning that Rossiter was beyond her control. Now, however, her tongue was tied. It was odious of the horse to walk up to Markham just as if she led him there! But no, the man could not be conceited enough to imagine that.

Rossiter was still rubbing his nose against his master's hand and shoulder.

"I trust you did not find him too much for you," he said, looking anxiously at the still breathless girl.

"Not at all. Well, perhaps he was a little fresh."

"But you weren't afraid?"

"Afraid! No, I don't fear horses. There's Mr. Grey; I'll go and speak to him."

She moved away, managing her habit gracefully. In such a dress she looked to the best advantage. The colour in her cheeks, and a certain wilful light in her eyes, added a new piquancy to her always piquant face.

The other girls came up, eager and laughing; the landaus with their loads arrived.

"Come and help me to get the lunch out of the hampers," said Cecil to Hope.

As they unpacked a savoury pie together, Cecil said suddenly—

"I am surprised and amazed—Markham accuses you of want of sympathy."

Hope nearly flung her delicate pie on the grass.

"Oh, Cecil! I don't care what he thinks of me. Do you know, he doesn't suit me a bit."

"I'm surprised! A right good fellow doesn't suit you then, Hope! Why, he's the most honourable, the most generous—— Oh! good gracious, what have I said?"

"Only, that if he's the model man, he's not agreeable to me," said Hope.

"Well, I repeat, I'm sorry. You are prejudiced. I praised him too much. He likes you; he told me so last night. He said you had the courage of your opinions—that you were no milk-and-water miss."

"I should think not, indeed. I'm awfully obliged to him! Cecil, I had a letter this morning from Jo."

Cecil raised his face eagerly. Hope had effectually and intentionally turned the subject.

"They all talk of coming back in May," she said. "Jocelyn is in the highest spirits. She says that Mrs. Seaton will get her presented. She evidently thinks a great deal of Jocelyn, and Jocelyn seems thoroughly happy with her."

"You will be a good deal with them when they come back?" said Grey.

"I? No, that I certainly won't. Of course I shall see Jo, darling pet, but I'm not going to Mrs. Seaton's house. She knows that."

"Why do you call her Mrs. Seaton, Hope? Is not she your aunt?"

"She is Jocelyn's aunt, but not mine. She is nothing to me. I can't enter into this story to-day, Cecil. It distresses me."

"You don't look well," said Cecil tenderly. "I am sure that ride was too much for you. Come and sit here, in this sheltered corner, on the rugs. What a wonderful day it is for the end of January! Quite a spring air, quite warm. I'll bring you something to eat, and then you'll feel better. You know I never want to worry you, Hope."

"You never do worry me, Cecil. At least, scarcely ever," she added with a smile. "Perhaps I'm not quite well to-day. I had a bad night. It is very nice to see an old friend again like you, Cecil."

Grey supplied Hope with dainty morsels, stood by her while she ate, and chatted of his own desires, which had once more risen high at the prospect of Jocelyn's return.

"I certainly mean to try for her again," he said. "I am amazed she is not married before this. Perhaps she did care for me a little bit."

After lunch, as there was to be no more sport that day, the girls and young men started off for rambles together. They went in different directions, Cecil and Hope still keeping side by side. Presently Hope complained of fatigue, and asked to be allowed to rest on a sunny bank by the wayside.

"You must not wait with me, Cecil," she said. "There are the Chatterton girls up yonder without any gentleman. I won't have you stay—you shan't. I shall just rest for five minutes, and then go back to Mrs. Chatterton and the other ladies until we are ready to start home."

"Come on, you two," called out Maud Chatterton from the top of a picturesque ascent a short distance away.

"Do go, Cecil—I really wish it," said Hope.

And seeing that she did so, and that she was in perfectly safe quarters within sight of the matrons of the party, he left her somewhat unwillingly.

A moment later a gay shrill voice sounded in her ear as Roley, very red in the face, and somewhat dirty in appearance owing to several falls, rushed to her side.

"This is luck! I've got you all to myself. Won't Phil be in a state! Phil thinks you are Queen of Beauty—he told me so last night."

"Roley," said Hope, "I don't think you are at all improved. I had not the most remote idea, when we were in London together, that you could talk such absolute nonsense."

"Oh, bosh!" said Roley; "a fellow must be carried away now and then. Phil's in a great state about you, Hope. He's nearly as bad as Grey and Markham."

"Roley, if you say another word of that kind to me, I shall walk away and leave you."

"Well, I won't, then. Is it true that you were awfully frightened?"

"How? When?"

"Markham said so. Phil heard him. He said you were all shaking from head to foot, so that it was the greatest wonder you were not killed, riding Rossiter. He said you were too much of a coward to ride such a horse, and he'd take care you didn't have him coming back. He means to have Rossiter himself, and you are to mount old Jenny. She's safe enough, anyhow. How white you look, Miss Karron!"

"I'm a little tired," said Hope, speaking in a still, constrained kind of voice. "I'm a little tired, and I don't want to talk to anyone just now. Go away, Roley—go away, and join your friend Philip. Go at once, please."

"Oh, I say!"

"I mean it: I am tired. Go, please, Roley. We were always good friends."

The tender inflection in her last words melted Roley's very affectionate heart.

"If you put it in that way," he said, "I'll be off in a twinkling. I see Phil up the path; I'll join him. No one shall come near you."

He darted away, and was soon lost to view. The moment he was quite out of sight, Hope rose, looked quickly to right and left, saw that she was quite unobserved, and then walked off in the direction of the farm, where she knew the horses were stabled.

A groom came out to meet her, who, recognising her as one of the young ladies from Beeches, respectfully touched his hat.

"I want the horse Rossiter," she said. "I am obliged to ride back to Beeches at once. Will you bring him to me here, and help me to mount him?"

The man stared, and hesitated.

"Why don't you go?" said Hope, who felt inclined to stamp her foot. "It is necessary I should get back to Beeches directly. I rode Rossiter coming."

"Yes, miss. But Mr. Markham, he said as Rossiter was a bit fresh, and you was to ride one of the grooms' horses back."

"I understand. I will explain to Mr. Markham," said Hope haughtily. "I wish to ride Rossiter; bring him round at once."

Still hesitating, the man obeyed.

Rossiter, clean of limb, bright of eye, and curvetting playfully, was brought up. With the groom's assistance, Hope sprang lightly on his back.

"You'll let me come with you, miss—they're bringing round Jenny. You'd better, miss; the critter is a bit fresh."

"No, thank you, I prefer going alone. You can mention I was obliged to hurry on to Beeches."

Again she gave Rossiter a sharp little touch of her riding-whip, and, with a bound, the animal flew down the road and was out of sight.

"Now, I call that a gal with spirit," exclaimed the groom Harvey to his companion. "But ef she hasn't a firm seat, and a firm hand too, it's my belief as Rossiter will be too much for her."

Meanwhile, Hope, with tingling ears, flushed cheeks, and smarting eyes, was enjoying the delights of a swift passage through the air. She had naturally high courage. Roley's words repeated to her as Markham's had stung her beyond endurance. She a coward—she to submit to the indignity of riding home on a spiritless, broken-down animal! She quite concluded, in her anger, that Jenny was of this description. No, she would show this odious, this officious personage that she, Hope Karron, was made of different mettle. What fun it would be to walk coolly into the drawing-room before dinner, and expatiate on her pleasant ride on Rossiter's back—not that she wanted to ride him again. She would take care not to put herself under a compliment to that model—but oh, how intolerable!—Mr. Markham. But for the present she must uphold her dignity. Yes, it would be very nice to talk about her delightful ride.

But was it delightful? Had a horse ever before taken any girl so quickly over the ground? Now he had broken into a canter. It hurt her to ride like this. She gasped. Rossiter must obey her. He should; she would show him that she was his mistress. Not a bit of it; Rossiter took not the smallest notice of her silken touch. He was just as anxious as she was to get back to Beeches, but he intended to get there his "ain gait." He knew a short cut which led down a steep uneven road, very different from the smooth, well-kept king's highway.

Hope felt really frightened when she found herself flying down this steep incline. She had to acknowledge that she could make nothing of Rossiter; that she must trust herself altogether to his tender mercies. She had to confess that her ride was not pleasant, that she had done a rash, a mad thing.

The uneven road was very steep, and Rossiter rushed quickly along. Still, up to the present he was not actually running away; he was simply enjoying himself in his own fashion, thinking nothing at all of the light weight on his back.

But just then, just at the most dangerous curve of the steep downward path, an ill-starred half-fed donkey put his head out of the hedge and brayed.

It was all up with Rossiter then. His gallop increased in velocity—it seemed to Hope he no longer ran, he flew. She shut her eyes; the end must come, she said to herself. "How silly, how ridiculous I have been! Poor Jo! will she miss me a little? There is no one else. After all, it is quite right I should be punished, for I was in a bad temper and conceited. Oh, to be off this horrid animal's back! I won't stay; I'll let go." She prepared to slip her leg off the crutch. A gate stood open into a ploughed field; Rossiter dashed in. Now was Hope's time. The ground would be soft here. She shut her eyes again, uttered a prayer, and sprang. She came with a great bump to the ground; there was a flashing blue light before her eyes, a whirr of something whizzing through the air. It was the horse flying faster than ever now that he was delivered of his burden.

For a moment or two Hope felt stunned. She could neither move nor speak. Then she began gently feeling herself to ascertain if she was much hurt.

A sharp pain went through the foot which had been already injured. She had come down on it with great force. She could not attempt to stand on it, nor to move from her ignominious position in the middle of the ploughed field.

"'I want the horse Rossiter,' she said."—p. 728.

CHAPTER XIV.

Markham was feeling rather dull. He was a sociable fellow as a rule, always ready to forget himself and to make matters agreeable to others. Notwithstanding his ugliness, he was a very popular person, and Gray was quite right when he said that girls found him fascinating. He was a clever man, a don at Oxford, and when he chose to exert his powers he could exhibit very brilliant qualities.

He was a man without any home ties—he had no near relations. From his earliest days he had lived among strangers, and this fact perhaps gave him a kind of outward coldness, and a manner which could at times be sarcastic and almost disagreeable. In reality Markham had a great deal of passion and tenderness in his nature, and he had an ideal hope which was more to him than to most. Some day he should meet a girl who would bring to him the sacredness of home and the warmth of love. This hope he buried deep in his heart, for though he fascinated most girls, no one could accuse him of falling in love with any.

Girls there were in plenty who thought Dick Markham the most delightful of mortals, who adored his ugly face, his divine voice, and his big, rather ungainly figure. But none of all these girls, in appearance at least, had touched even the surface of his heart.

"What's the matter, Markham?" said Grey, on this particular afternoon. "You look quite moped, old man. Why aren't you with the Hiltons? Those girls are perfectly wild to hear your explanation of the Hindoo puzzle."

"They must grow still wilder," said Markham. "I'm not in the humour to gratify them."

"Look here," said Grey, "we ought to be starting home soon; it will be dark directly. Mrs. Chatterton wants me to help her to collect a number of her party. Do you mind looking after Hope Karron? I left her sitting on a bank up that road. She said she would join the Chattertons, after she was rested, but I don't see her with them. Look her up, Dick, will you?"

"She won't be obliged to you for sending me to her aid," said Markham, smiling. "She has taken a prejudice against me. Oh, of course I'll go. Up that road, did you say?"

He sauntered away, not so unwillingly as his slow steps seemed to indicate. It was true that Hope both interested and irritated him. She reminded him of a certain face, a certain voice. No one could have accused Markham's rugged features of assuming a pathetic, even a sentimental expression, but as he thought, not of Hope, but of another, his deeply set brown eyes wore an expression both of longing and tenderness, his whole face softened with a light which even his nearest and dearest friends had never seen on it.

As he walked up the road he met the groom who had helped to mount Hope on Rossiter.

"Ef you please, sir," he said, "you have heard about the 'oss? The young lady said as she'd explain."

"What?" said Markham. "I don't understand. I gave you directions that Miss Karron should ride Jenny home, and I would take Rossiter myself."

"The young lady said as she'd explain, sir. She come up all in a hurry like, and said she must have Rossiter at once. She wouldn't look at the other 'oss, sir. She said she wanted to get back to Beeches all in a hurry, and she's off on Rossiter half an hour ago. I offered to ride behind her on Jenny, sir, but she wouldn't listen to me."

"Is it possible!" said Markham.

All the pleased look left his face. It grew hard and grim.

"Saddle the fleetest horse you have," he said. "Bring him to me this minute. I'll wait here. Don't waste time staring. Go, bring the horse."

"Black Bess, sir?"

"Black anything that has got four legs, and knows how to canter. Go."

The groom disappeared.

"Mr. Markham's real gone on that young lady," he said to himself. But a dim idea of the rashness of his own act in yielding to Hope entered his mind, and put wings to his feet. Black Bess was saddled, and a moment later Markham was tearing along the road. What possessed that headstrong girl? If Rossiter were dangerous coming out, he would be worse returning. Even then Hope could scarcely hold him in. What chance had she when his stable, his oats, his warm mash, awaited him? Markham felt inclined to blame everybody and everything. What a fool he was not to have sold the horse when he parted with the groom!

"Just for a sentiment, too," he muttered to himself, as he let Black Bess feel a touch of his whip; "just because the creature's eyes overcame me, and he only showed his submissive and gentle side to me. Already the brute has nearly killed that girl. Now of course he has made an end of her. That girl, too, with eyes like—like—and a voice which reminds me—ah, what a wretch I feel!"

Black Bess was a fleet, good-tempered little horse, but she was a little small for Markham's weight, and she did not like the pressure which he brought to bear on her. Suddenly he pulled her up so short that she reared in affright and almost fell backwards. His practised eye saw the freshly dug-up turf where Rossiter had turned aside to pursue the by-path home.

"God help the girl, if the brute took her down here," muttered Markham. "Yes, of course; down here they have gone. Come, Black Bess, down this path you too must follow."

He loosened the reins, bade the horse go forward, and then gave her her way. Now he ceased to have any consecutive thoughts, but with each step he was haunted by a direr and direr vision. Such a slim young thing, so graceful, so sprightly and upright in movement, with so spirited an eye, so arched and proud a lip. What was she like now? God help the girl, and God help him, for if any real harm had happened to her he could never be the same man again.

The spiteful donkey was still poking his head about, and casting inquisitive glances up and down the narrow lane. Could he have spoken, he might have told a story which might not have been to his own credit. It was his present humour to be quiet; as Markham passed he uttered no aggressive bray.

Two or three moments later the man pulled up short, uttered a cry of thanksgiving, sprang from Black Bess's back, rushed across the ploughed field, and was kneeling by Hope's side.

Thank God! what a mercy!

XUM

"Are you very much hurt?"

"My foot hurts badly, and I cannot stir," answered Hope, turning her head away, for tears of weakness and nervousness were springing to her eyes.

"Don't try to speak; I know all about it. The brute threw you."

"He didn't. I jumped from his back. I am not a coward, Mr. Markham."

"I should think not—about the bravest girl I have ever known. Now I 'm going to see to my horse—I won't be away a moment. I just want to tie her up until I can find someone to fetch her. I 'll be back directly."

Hope had almost to press her lips together to keep back the wild desire which prompted her to say—

"Oh, don't leave me—I am a coward—I 'm awfully frightened. Oh, don't leave me!"

She did keep back the words, but to save her life she could not have uttered any others.

"I 'll be back in a moment," he repeated; and ran across the field to tie Black Bess by her bridle to the nearest post.

When he returned the tears were raining down Hope's cheeks.

Whatever Markham was destitute of, he had, when he chose to exercise it, abundance of tact. He looked at Hope now in as a matter-of-fact a way as if it were quite the ordinary thing, in fact the usual thing, for a girl to sit helpless in the middle of a ploughed field, and look up with eyes drowned in tears to a man's face.

"I am glad you are so far recovered," he said. "As to your poor foot—it is your foot, isn't it?—we shall soon make that comfortable when we get to the Beeches. Now, the thing is to get there. We are not more than a mile away. If I stoop down so, do you think you could manage to put your arm round my shoulder?"

Hope felt herself shuddering all over.

"I really can't," she managed to mutter.

"That is silly."

Markham intentionally adopted a matter-of-fact, wooden tone. "You can't stay in this field all night, nor can you be left while I go to fetch some people to carry you. You are very light, and I am very strong. Try and think of me as your horse for the time being. I assure you I shall be a much safer one than Rossiter."

"The pain," muttered Hope; "I can't move an inch without screaming."

"You must try not to give way to that feeling. Each moment you sit in this damp field increases the chance of inflammation setting up in the injured joint. Now, one more flash of the courage which you so really possess. Nonsense, I will have it—put your arm so—tighter, please. That is right."

In a moment Markham was walking across the field, managing his light burden skilfully. The injured foot suffered agony, but Hope did not utter a sound. Not once did she groan, nor even once try to alter her position. Markham felt his heart stirred to its depths with compassion; he could form some idea of the fortitude and pain and humiliation which were animating the breast of his slight burden. Both he and Hope thought that walk would never come to an end. At last the avenue was reached, at last the lights from the cheerful and hospitable house streamed into view.

"The worst is over," said Markham, in a cheerful voice. "What? did you speak?"

He slackened his steps.

"It was only to say 'thank you,'" said Hope.

"You have nothing to thank me for. That brute of a horse was the cause. I shall part with him as soon as possible. Here we are—courage—the haven is won!—Yes, Mrs. Chatterton, I have brought you back this young lady in a sorry plight. Rossiter ran away with her, and she jumped off his back to save herself. She has been very plucky. I will lay her down here, if you will allow me. Give her some tea while I fetch a doctor."

CHAPTER XV.

THE dreaded inflammation did set in, and for some days Hope was a close prisoner to her room. She was sufficiently ill, and there was a sufficiently remote chance even of amputation of the injured member, to make her case of great interest in the house. It was the fashion at each gathering of the assembled guests to ask how Miss Karron was now; to discuss the chances of her recovery; the kindness of her host and hostess; the foolhardiness of her own deed. The kind people pitied Hope, the less good-natured showed sympathy for Mr. and Mrs. Chatterton. It was so unpleasant to have a confirmed invalid in the house—the very look of a trained nurse about the place was gloomy.

Then the kind and the unkind alike tried to put together what pieces they could of Hope's history. She was a penniless lass, rather low-born, with no expectations. No—not at all—her birth was excellent, her connections irreproachable; she had a little money of her own, and made more, and some day she would receive a large fortune through the medium of an enormously wealthy aunt, who had already adopted her sister.

These kind of remarks flew lightly all over the place, not affecting Hope, for they never reached her where she lay and suffered, in the pretty bedroom which joined Katie Douglas's.

After a week of great pain, the inflammation subsided—the fear and the interest alike abated downstairs and up-stairs. Hope began to smile, to have long intervals of delicious peace and ease, and returning strength.

At last the doctor gave permission that she might leave her room, and be very carefully carried into Mrs. Chatterton's boudoir, which was on the same floor.

"You don't know how deliciously pretty we have made the room for you, darling," said Katie Douglas, kissing her friend's pale face with enthusiasm. "The gardener has been up and down all the morning, putting in fresh hot-house flowers; and Mr. Grey himself has arranged the sofa for you, so that you can see out over the lawns and the distant trees. It will be a change from your bed and this dull sofa, dear; for of course you will be able to see people. Not that there are many in the house who were here at the time of your accident. Poor Gus Chatterton went off yesterday" — here Katie blushed, and looked intensely melancholy—"and of course Roley and Phil have been back at school for days. That's the worst of country houses," concluded Katie; "when you do meet a nice fellow who quite suits you, he's certain to have to run away on account of some horrid profession or business of some sort."

"Two or three moments later he was kneeling by Hope's side."—p. 730.

"Is," said Hope, colouring faintly, and bringing out her words with more effort than Katie had any idea of, "is Cecil—is Cecil still here?"

"Yes; he's here still, and so is Mr. Markham. I'm not fascinated by Mr. Markham. Maud Chatterton does rave so about his singing. I suppose it is very fine, and that I have no soul for music. Bee is just as bad about Mr. Grey. I never saw such girls: they certainly wear their hearts on their sleeves. What's the matter, Hope? You look quite white. Have some of your tonic, darling. Yes, your dear Cecil and his charming friend are still here, but that's all that can be said of them, for they go this afternoon. Rossiter is to be sold; did you know it? He was sent off yesterday, and they are both going to Tattersall's about him. He is a thoroughbred, you know, though he is so vicious."

"He's not a bit vicious," said Hope, colouring again, and sitting upright on her sofa. "Katie, I should like to see Cecil before he goes. Can't you manage it for me, Katie?"

"Of course I can. You shall be moved into the boudoir at once. It's quite ready. Do you know, Hope, although your face is whiter and thinner than it ought to be, you look wonderfully nice. I can't make out what is so nice about you: I suppose it's the colour of your eyes, and the way they are set, and the arch of your brows; I can't make it out—is it your expression, I wonder? For you have not got handsome features. No, critically, you have not."

"Oh, don't dissect me now, please, Katie; here is nurse quite ready, and I want a change of room and scene so badly.—Now, nurse, please help to wheel me out of gloom into sunshine.'

Katie had gone to look for Cecil Grey. Hope lay back on her new sofa, and enjoyed the lovely surroundings of her new room. Flowers made it look like a bower; a faint perfume, not too strong, pervaded it; the view from the window, the distant view as well as the near, was of great beauty, and refreshed Hope's tired eyes and brain. A little colour from excitement had come into her cheeks. Her heart was beating faster than was quite consistent with returning health.

"I hope Cecil will come to say good-bye," she said to herself. "I do trust Katie will be in time; they may have gone off for a long walk, and then there will be lunch, and then only just the necessary half-hour to catch the train. I must see Cecil. He cannot be allowed to sell Rossiter—he must not sell him; it would make me wretched to think of it. He would always then associate my name with a loss in his life. I don't think I could quite bear it. How weak of me to cry—I suppose I am weak; it's just physical—but it's provoking all the same. Oh, I wish Cecil would come! Yes—there he is—that's his tap at the door. Come in, Cecil, come in."

"Cecil will see you afterwards," said Markham's quite cheerful, matter-of-fact tone. "I am so glad you have been moved here before we went away. I wanted to assure myself that you were really better by getting a good peep at you before I went away. Now, tell me how you are. You don't mind my having a little chat with you, do you?"

The tears were still wet on Hope's cheeks. She felt provoked. Was Markham always to see her in this condition?

"I'm a little weak," she said, somewhat lamely, for she was not feeling at all composed.

"I see—I am greatly concerned; but you will be better soon now, and Mrs. Chatterton takes so much interest in you. She says she is going to take you to Bournemouth next week; the sea-air will soon set you up."

"Mrs. Chatterton is more than kind. Of course I shall soon be all right again. Nobody need worry about me. Mr. Markham, I wanted to ask you something. I sent Katie to find Cecil, for I didn't think perhaps I'd see you."

"Yes? Did you really suppose me to be such a heartless being as not to make an effort to come to see you? You want to ask me something—what is it? My dear Miss Karron, you won't get well at this rate. Your hands are quite shaking. Now, rest assured I shall accede to your modest request beforehand. Ask—command—I obey."

"But it isn't a modest request. I want you not to sell Rossiter."

Markham, who hitherto had preserved a very cool, every-day expression, and whose words were carefully modulated to denote only common courtesy and friendliness, started now, the colour rushed into his sallow face, and he gave Hope one of those lightning glances which had so displeased her on the first evening of their acquaintance.

"Why do you ask me not to sell my own horse? Why do you interfere?"

"I—because——" Hope hated to find herself stammering. Then she looked full up at Markham, and spoke bravely.

"You are selling Rossiter because of me. You love him, and he loves you. Don't sell him for my sake."

"My dear child!"—Markham's tone was tender enough now. "It is good of you speak like this," he continued; "still, I have made up my mind to sell Rossiter. He gave me the ugliest half-hour of my life, and I can't forgive him."

"But he is not vicious; oh, not really—it was my fault. I was hurt, and I took hold of some words the wrong way. It is very hard on Rossiter and on you, that he should be sold because I had a whim—just a freak, no more. Girls are always having freaks."

"In this instance the freak or whim nearly cost you your life."

"Nearly, but not quite. Please don't sell Rossiter."

"You remind me——" said Markham. He closed his lips before any more words came out; and moving a step or two, stared fixedly out of the window.

There was a rustle of drapery outside the door—it was opened wide, and Mrs. Chatterton, Bee, Katie Douglas, and Cecil Grey, all appeared on the scene.

"Here we are," said Katie's gay voice. "I found Cecil and Bee hunting for mosses. I brought them both up together to see you. How do you think she is looking, Mrs. Chatterton?"

"Very pale," said Mrs. Chatterton, stooping down and kissing Hope. "But you'll soon be better, dear, now. The doctor speaks so cheerfully of you; and I have heard from Bournemouth; my sister can take us both in next week."

"I'm going too," said Bee. "I'm not going to lose the fun, and I want to smell the pines once more.—Mr. Grey, did you ever try to catch a squirrel in the Bournemouth pine-woods?"

"I'll come next week and try how I can succeed in your company, Miss Chatterton," laughed back Grey.—"What do you say, Markham, old man? Shall we both run down to Bournemouth for a day or two? The sea-breezes won't do us any harm, either. What do you say?"

There was a babel of eager voices, in which Markham's reply, if he made one, was quite inaudible. In the midst of the gay laughter and merry sounds Mrs. Chatterton looked at Hope, and saw that the pink flush was too bright on her cheeks. At the same time she also remarked that Markham was looking at the girl with a rather peculiar gaze.

"You can arrange all future meetings down-stairs," she said. "Now, gentlemen, please say good-bye to Miss Karron. She is very weak still, and must not be over-excited. Of course we shall meet at Bournemouth. No one need look lugubrious. Bee, my dear, please take your friends down-stairs."

"Good-bye," said Markham to Hope.

He took her slim fingers in his, and gave them almost a crush.

"And he never told me what he had made up his mind to do about Rossiter," thought the girl. "He never told me. He did hurt my hand when he said good-bye."

No one was there to look, not even Mrs. Chatterton, who was poking the fire and arranging curtains. Hope raised her slightly reddened fingers to her lips and kissed them.

CHAPTER XVI.

MARKHAM and Grey had a compartment to themselves when they travelled back that afternoon to London. It was a bitterly cold day towards the latter end of February. Markham, when not roused or excited or specially interested in things, was a very silent man. He was silent now, looking straight before him. The window was open; he was sitting by it, facing the engine.

"You 'll catch a sore throat or something," said Grey, who, wrapped up in a thick ulster, was leaning back luxuriously in the opposite seat.

Markham continued to gaze out at the wintry landscape without replying. It began to snow afresh, and a few flakes came in and rested on his shoulder.

"Do you specially want rheumatic fever?" pursued Grey, raising his voice once more.

Markham stared at him, gave a slight shake to his big frame, seemed to wake up, and answered cheerily—

"Not at all. I 'll sit at this side by you, Grey. I want to have a talk with you."

"By all means. But might we shut the window?"

"Of course."

Markham pulled it up with a bang.

"Grey," he said suddenly. "I wish you would tell me what you know about Miss Karron."

"About Hope, or her sister?"

"Don't be provoking. I have only the pleasure of Miss Hope Karron's acquaintance. Tell me what you know about her, Grey—I 'm in earnest."

Cecil dropped his bantering tone.

"I see you are," he said. "I thought you were interested in her when you were so keen about selling Rossiter."

"I don't want your thoughts about me, but about Miss Karron, at the present moment," retorted Markham shortly.

"Oh, I have nothing but good to tell you. Good? The best. I have known Hope all my life. She is not as beautiful as Jocelyn. Jocelyn has a way about her—she quite comes over a fellow—you can't withstand her anyhow. Hope has not got that way, but I could understand some people thinking her finer, nobler. You don't love a girl for being fine and noble, do you, Markham?"

"My dear Grey, I never asked you to compare Miss Hope with her sister. I can see pretty well for myself what sort of girl she is. I only wanted to know something of her history. You need not tell me that she is a lady—anyone can see that. I don't care really either about her birth; her father may have been anything, it makes no difference to me. Only I should like to know why she is so poor and lonely; why she has absolutely to work for her living, and the other sister appears to be wealthy—at least, she is able to use the wealth of others?"

Grey coloured slightly.

"That 's just it," he said. "That 's why some people would say that Hope was nobler than Jocelyn. It isn't that, really. The two girls saw things from different standpoints. The aunt who adopted Jocelyn wanted to take Hope too, but Hope was offended about something or other. She thought this aunt had been unkind to her mother. Anyhow, she took a whim against her, and wouldn't live with her or have anything to say to her. So poor Jocelyn had to go off alone. It must have been a great trial to her, for she was so fond of Hope."

"And what did Miss Hope do?"

"They lived at Downton, then, close to our place. That 's how I got to know them both so well. Hope came to town. There was forty or sixty pounds a year, or some such pittance, saved out of the wreck. Their mother had been extravagant, poor soul—a charming woman. Hope came to town and began to teach little dunces to read. She has a faculty in that direction, and she makes a living out of it. Little Douglas, whom you saw at Beeches, is one of the dunces."

"Thank you," said Markham.

He leant back again in his seat.

"Why do you ask me so many questions?" said Grey suddenly.

"It is fair you should have an answer, Cecil. I am going to ask Miss Karron to marry me."

"Dick, old fellow! Really! I am glad! What a splendid husband you will make for Hope!"

"I don't know that I shall," he said. "I am anything but sure on that point. It is very unlikely, too, that she will have me, for I have a story to tell her which would certainly make many a girl say no. Besides, I have not the least reason to suppose that she cares for me."

"She scarcely knows you, certainly," said Grey. "But I'm awfully delighted that you 've fallen in love with her. I always said that Hope should get a splendid husband, for she 's such a really jolly girl—so plucky, and with such a nice distinguished sort of offhand air. I never did think, however, that she would be lucky enough to take your fancy. I am delighted! Oh, she 's certain to say yes; you may be as spooney as you like down at Bournemouth. You 'll soon win her round."

"I have thought over it a good deal lately," said Markham, whose manner was provokingly quiet, without a trace of Grey's enthusiasm. "I have thought over it and made up my mind. If, after hearing my story, Miss Karron is content to marry me, I shall be glad. We are both lonely people—we have neither of us near ties—I expect we shall pull together very well."

"Hope has got her sister."

"Oh, pooh! a sister she never sees. I shall be glad if she says yes. I think I can make her happy, and I know she will bring a great deal into my life. At first, for a certain reason, her face tortured and distressed me. Now it gives me a feeling of rest. I like to think of it, and look at it. What 's the matter, Grey?"

"Only you always were a queer fellow, Dick; and—forgive me for saying it—I never thought you queerer than at this moment. You talk a great deal of a story you have got to tell, and you have never once said you loved Hope. Certainly, if you do love, you have not the ordinary way of expressing your feelings. Good gracious! a man who is in love—in love, mind you—does not talk of it being a 'suitable arrangement,' that 'two lonely people should keep house together.' I know better than that," continued Grey, taking out his handkerchief, and mopping his forehead.

"You are very much excited," said Markham. Then he sighed, and that queer tender light came into his face, which, while it lasted, had the power of transforming it, and making it beautiful. "You 're a lucky fellow, Grey," he continued. "You love some girl with your whole heart, and she loves you."

"I 'm abominably unlucky, Markham. I love Jocelyn Karron, and she won't look at me."

Markham sat grave and silent.

"This is no particular news to me," he said, after a pause. "I have guessed it, or something like it, with regard to you for some time. Very likely it will come right, Grey. You have my best wishes."

"Thanks. I mean to try my chance again when she comes back to England. But now, about Hope. You will understand, after what I have told you, that I look upon her as a sort of sister."

"I am glad to hear it, Grey. You are an excellent brother for any girl to have."

"Look here, Dick, I 'm going to exercise a brother's privilege. Are you in love with Hope?"

"I am not."

"Then, good gracious—why ever—I say, Dick, old fellow—do you call this right or fair?"

"I said I had a story to tell. When she has heard it, it is for her to decide."

"This is very mysterious—will you trust me with the story?"

"I intend to take you into my confidence this minute. The story is short. You may even ridicule it. But things that can be shortly told, and that may even provoke a smile, will sometimes revolutionise a life."

"You certainly are mysterious," continued Cecil. "You know what a friend you have always been to me, Dick, old fellow. You may be certain I 'll respect your confidence; and now for pity's sake give it me. For those quiet words of yours, and your whole manner since we got into this beastly railway carriage, have made me feel positively uncomfortable."

"It's a short story," said Markham. He changed his seat again, turned his face a little towards the window, and began.

"Two years ago I was in Rome—I dare say you remember. I had just recovered from that touch of fever—I sometimes laid part of the blame of what followed on that—I mean on the fact that my brain was weaker, more impressionable. I may be wrong; of course it might have happened in any case."

"But what did happen, Dick? All this moralising is positively tiresome."

"Well," said Markham, shooting back a direct glance full into Grey's face, "after all, in one sense of the word, nothing happened. Briefly, what occurred was this. I saw a girl one day in St. Peter's—I fell in love with her. That is nearly two years ago. I have loved her madly ever since."

"And you—you dared to ask Hope to be your wife? You shan't have her. Why don't you marry the girl you are in love with?"

"I should have married her long since if she would have had me and I could have found her. She is lost."

"Dick, are you quite right in the head? Really, now?"

"Perhaps not, Grey. I can only say I have had a miserable two years. I have resigned myself now to my fate. I shall never find the girl I love best. Hope Karron reminds me of her. She is like her—very different, but still like. If she will have me, knowing my story, I will consider myself a lucky man."

"The girl you were in love with was like Hope—like with a difference? What was her name? You saw her in Rome? When did you see her?"

"The Easter of two years back. I never heard her name. What is the matter, Grey? You look quite white—are you faint?"

No. This carriage is abominably stuffy. I 'll open the window again, if you don't mind."

"I, my dear fellow? It was at your request it was shut. No," continued Markham, in a meditative fashion, "I never did hear the girl's name. I 'll just tell you absolutely what occurred. You will judge for yourself how much and how little it meant. I was in St. Peter's, wandering about; there was service going on, as there always is; the priests were chanting in the distance; and there was that sickly smell of incense. I was walking down one of the many aisles, when I saw a girl standing with her profile slightly turned towards me, gazing up at an exquisite bit of painted glass. It was a treacherous day—the sun hot, the wind cold. She held a fur wrap loosely on her arm. Her hat was pushed back. I was attracted by the delicacy of her profile, and the easy grace of her attitude. She started when she heard my step, and turned towards me. 'I am so glad,' she said, in a low voice. 'You are an Englishman, are you not?'—'And you are an English lady,' I replied.—'Yes; I have lost my party, and this big place frightens me so dreadfully.'—'You will doubtless find your party again very quickly,' I answered. Then I made a commonplace remark—I think about the bit of painted glass she had been studying. 'I am too nervous to admire it,' she answered. 'Will you walk down with me as far as the nearest entrance? Perhaps I shall see my people coming up.' I bowed again. She was a very beautiful girl; it was a pleasure to walk with her even a few steps. She had a certain manner—I don't know how to describe it—which prevented my thinking it strange that she should ask me to do this trifling service for her. We met her party at the entrance. I bowed—she thanked me with a smile. That's all, Grey. I fell in love with her. Thinking of it calmly, I am inclined to attribute such a sudden fancy to the fever from which I had just recovered."

"What was she like, Dick? The girl, I mean."

"I can't quite describe her. She had a look of Hope Karron, but her face was more delicate, and altogether more beautiful. Her voice, too, was like—— I don't think I could take her features to pieces, even to oblige you, Grey."

"Oh, never mind, Dick. It's a queer story—I mean your falling in love like that. There, I believe I've caught cold. That window is chilling me again. I say, Markham, why didn't you follow her up, when you were so—so far gone?"

"That's just what I did do, and it was just in that particular that I absolutely failed. Remember, I had not the smallest clue—I could not identify one of her party—I could not even tell you now what dress the girl herself wore. I remembered the soft white fur she carried on her arm; I remembered the colour of her hair, her face, her voice. I dare say I did not remember that face as it appeared to others. I have no doubt I idealised it. Perhaps the girl I have dreamt of does not exist at all. At any rate, I have not seen her since, although I have looked for her, and morning after morning waked up with the vague hope that I might find her. She flashed into my life and went away. She took something—the best of me, with her. I have not been the same man since."

The train was fast nearing its destination, the daylight had long departed. Markham's voice died away into silence, and Grey did not articulate a single word. As they approached Paddington, the younger man roused himself with an effort.

"About Rossiter," he began: "shall I meet you to-morrow at Tattersall's?"

"I forgot; did I not tell you? I am not going to sell the horse."

"No? What do you mean?"

"What I say. I have changed my mind; or rather Miss Karron has for me."

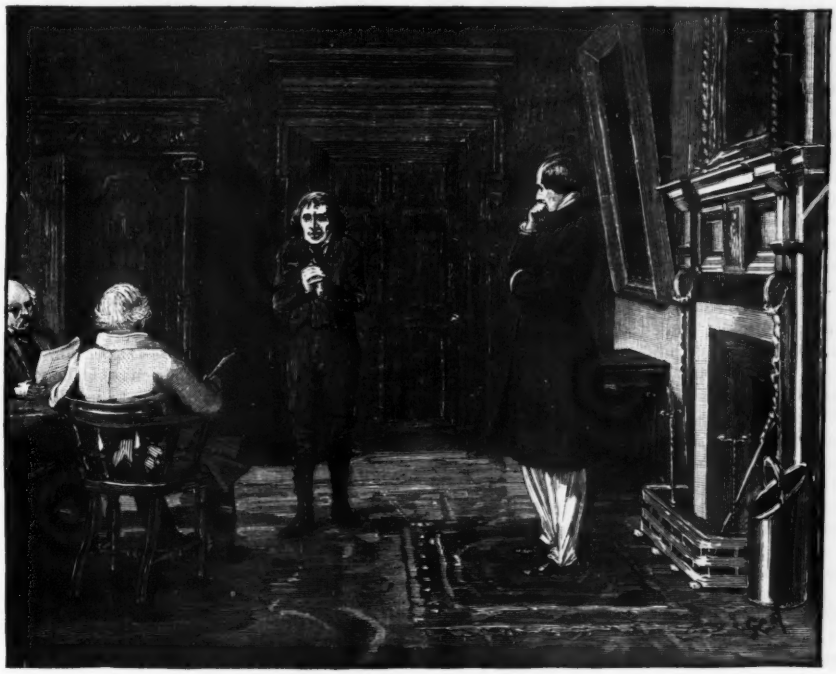
WORK AND REST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED," "FAINT, YET PURSUING," ETC. ETC.

IT is easy to imagine new arrangements of society, and the great improvements that would result from their adoption. On the principle, however, that it is not safe to prophesy unless one knows, we can never be sure that these imagined advantages would follow, or that greater evils might not be involved in the proposed changes. Of course this good old-fashioned argument, if pushed too far, would paralyse every effort at reform; but we only allude to it to show that in advocating a more equal distribution of work we are not insensible to the fact that even perfect equality of labour, if it could be realised, would not bring about the millennium. Fancy the whole of society turned into a huge workhouse, regulated by hard-and-fast labour laws! Where would there be room for taste, refinement, elegance? But though it may be well to have a leisured class to hold up a standard in these matters, few will deny that some people work too little and others work too much. There must be something wrong when the bodies and minds of thousands of people called well-to-do, but who are really doing very badly, become weak and diseased for want of healthy exercise, while thousands of others have to work twelve, sixteen, and even eighteen hours out of the twenty-four to get the barest subsistence. Is not the great need of the first class work, and of the second rest? and would it not be better for both if they could divide the labour and the leisure between them? An Emperor of China once said that if anyone throughout his wide dominions lived a perfectly idle life someone must suffer hunger in consequence. There is a certain amount of truth in this statement in reference to every country. No one can consume much of the limited supply of food that is at the disposal of all, and produce little, without greatly injuring others.



And if there ought to be a more equal distribution of labour and leisure amongst all the members of the body politic, so there is a balance between work and rest that should be properly adjusted in our individual lives. Employer: "You are so awfully slow about everything." Clerk: 'One exception: nobody can get tired as quickly as I can." This class of man works too little; but there are others, like Sir Walter Raleigh, of whom it was said that he "toiled terribly," who do not allow themselves enough rest. Employment is a "perennial fire-proof joy," and one of the best remedies for the maladies of men, especially of young men. Many kinds of evil are like the nightmare, which goes away when we bestir ourselves. The devil tempts men, but the idle man tempts the devil. Carlyle used to say that the latest gospel in this world is, "Know thy work and do it. Know thyself: long enough has that poor 'self' of thine tormented thee; thou wilt never get to 'know' it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself! thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at, and work at it like a Hercules! That will be thy better plan. Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. . . .

"The only happiness a brave man ever troubled himself with asking much about was happiness enough to get his work done; not. 'I can't eat!' but 'I can't work!' that was the burden of all wise complaining among men. It is, after all, the one unhappiness of a man that he cannot work: that he cannot get his destiny as a man fulfilled. Behold, the day is passing swiftly over, our life is passing swiftly over, and the night cometh, wherein no man can work."

At the time of the Crimean war, when England was

> "All service ranks the same with God;
> If now, as formerly, He trod
> Paradise, His presence fills
> Our earth; each only as God wills
> Can work."

It is wonderful how much work a man can get through who works with system and method, and who has acquired the invaluable habit of putting odd moments to a good account. As a good packer gets more things into a portmanteau than a slovenly going through a difficult crisis, Dean Stanley, then a canon of Canterbury, asked the writer just quoted what he thought was the particular duty to his country of a canon of Canterbury at that trying time. The philosopher of Chelsea answered: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." Is not this the secret of success and usefulness in every sphere of life? If we take for our motto, "With both hands earnestly," and act upon it, then the work which was felt to be so irksome when done in a half-hearted, perfunctory spirit will become a pleasure and a joy.

Nor ought our work to be undervalued because it seems humble and unimportant. The fact is that we are all very bad judges of what is or is not important. So complicated are the relations between things that great events often depend upon what are called only trifles. We are in this world where God has placed us, and the work which we do is not ours, but His.

one, so this sort of man packs as it were more time than another into the twenty-four hours. He is never idle, but as little is he in a fuss or hurry; and if you ask him to do anything for you, he will find time for it far more readily than another who has nothing to do but kill time.

Let us remember that one day we shall all value time, or the stuff of which our lives are made, as much as Queen Elizabeth did, when on her deathbed she exclaimed—"My kingdom for a moment!" We should have a book at hand to take up in the spare quarters of an hour that so many people waste, or something to think about—some plan of becoming more useful: an article, a speech, a sermon, anything that will put to a good account what may be called the threads, patches, and remnants of time. Even knitting a sock in spare moments is better than doing nothing.

Two men have arrived at a railway station some time before the train. One will do nothing, or only fret and fume; the other will employ the interval in studying human nature, enter into a profitable conversation, or try to learn something from the contents of the bookstall. In the same number of years the second class of man will live twice as long as the first, because he will do twice as much with his time.

How much more energy would we have for good work if we wasted less of it in foolish anger, useless repining, envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness! Then many of us would work with far more spirit if greater variety could be introduced into our work. Change of work is as good as rest. Pity that the manual and intellectual work of the world should be confined to separate classes of people, instead of being divided amongst all. Why should some have their bodies worn out by over-work, and others their minds, when, if the work were divided, there would be just enough for the healthy and pleasurable exercise of all the faculties of both parties? Every boy, however high his social position may be, should be taught a handicraft. It is all very well for him to "manipulate his feet" well, as an Irish reporter wrote, at football, but would it not be better for him to learn to do useful work with his hands? Five or six hours' reading or other intellectual work is as much as most men can do with profit in the day, and this leaves them plenty of time for using their hands.

Many are discontented with the name of idler who are nevertheless content to do worse than nothing. Of course, when it is said that every man should work, we mean that he should do good and useful work. If he be one who will do mischief, the more energetic he is the worse it is for society. He will have to be shut up in prison to check his energy. It would be as safe to allow an energetic tiger to go at large as him. Strange that so many are willing to work hard for Satan who will do nothing for a loving Heavenly Father, although they must soon find out that "Satan as a master is bad, his work much worse, and his wages worst of all."

One of the best means of saving power is to rest just before getting tired. A man may work up to the point of fatigue without injury, but the moment exhaustion supervenes, that moment a debilitated state sets in, which cannot be recovered from readily. Many energetic men do not know when and how to rest. They allow themselves to become mere machines, and leave all parts of their nature, except those employed in business, to grow weak and die out for want of use. When forced to give up active work, they are as miserable as the retired chandler, who could not stay away from his old place of business upon "melting days." They have not provided themselves with a hobby; they take no pleasure in philanthropical or religious work; they are so accustomed to work for money that they do not care to fill those positions in a parish the duties of which someone must do, but for which there is no pay in pounds, shillings, and pence. Thus they have laid up for themselves a miserable old age, because they did not learn how to rest or to appreciate the luxury of doing good unselfishly.

Nothing is more praiseworthy than for a man to patiently and conscientiously do work which is uncongenial to him, but which it is his duty to do. Charles Lamb disliked being a clerk in the India House, but he stuck to the work and did it faithfully for thirty years. He sat like a nightingale with his breast against a thorn—the desk. "Thirty years," said he, "have I served the Philistines, and my neck is not subdued to the yoke." Then came his deliverance. One day, as he was pining in that leaden East India House, with fear and trembling he received an intimation that he was wanted by the directors in the parlour. Had he done anything wrong, and were they going to dismiss him? No; they were very gracious, and after a long preamble, he was told that the Board were most grateful for his patient services, and that he would receive a pension of £441 per annum, or two-thirds of his salary. Oh, the delight of Lamb at being thus set free! He "stammered out a bow," and left the office for ever. "It was like passing from time into eternity." "If I had a little son," he said, "I would christen him 'Nothing-to-do.'" He gaily and quaintly wrote to a friend, "Would I could sell you some of my leisure! Positively the best thing a man can have to do is nothing, and the next to that, perhaps, good works." But the enchantment was short-lived. Lamb was not old enough nor stupid enough to do nothing. It takes a peculiar man to do nothing well. Most of us have a fine talent for it by fits and starts, but Lamb got tired of too much of it, and sighed like the chandler for his melting days.

> "Calm Soul of all things! make it mine
> To feel, amid the city's jar,
> That there abides a peace of Thine
> Man did not make, and cannot mar."

This is a prayer which we who live in a high-pressure, unresting age have much need of praying. Rest in the Lord! The soul of man turneth hither and thither, on this side and on that, but findeth no rest till it rest in Him who hath made it for Himself.

Great Creator, who this day.

Saviour, who this day didst break
The dark prison of the tomb,
Bid my slumbering soul awake,
Shine through all its sin and gloom;
Let me, from my bonds set free,
Rest from sin and live to Thee.

3.

Blessed Spirit, Comforter,
Sent this day from Christ on high;
Lord, on me Thy gifts confer—
Cleanse, illumine, sanctify;
All Thine influence shed abroad,
Lead me to the truth of God.

THE CHERUBIMS ON THE VAIL.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D.

"With cherubims shall it be made."—EXODUS xxvi. 31.

THE Tabernacle in the wilderness was divided into two compartments—the holy place and the Holy of Holies—by a vail. That vail was stretched upon four pillars of wood overlaid with gold. It consisted of one huge screen of fine-twined linen, reaching from the roof to the floor, and from one side to the other. On the groundwork of linen were spread, in various ornamental patterns, the simple colours known to the ancients—blue, purple, and scarlet. The Holy of Holies was shut in by this vail from every human eye. No worship was carried on there. No human voice or step was heard within its sacred precincts. The priests worshipped in the holy place outside, but they were never allowed to pass within the vail; and only once a year was the High Priest himself permitted to enter—on the Great Day of Atonement, with the blood of the sacrifice—to make propitiation for the sins of the people. This awful solitude was the dwelling-place of God alone. The most conspicuous objects in it were the ark and the mercy-seat, towards which all the ritual of the tabernacle converged as its centre and crown. On the top of the mercy-seat were two cherubims, formed out of its two ends—of the same mass of gold with it—wrought by hammering, not cast. Their faces were turned towards each other, and with their outstretched wings they covered the sacred shrine. Between them the Shechinah cloud, the token of God's presence, rested.

These cherubims were symbolic forms, composed of four representative creatures, the highest of their kind: with the face of a man, of a lion, of an ox, and of an eagle, and with the human figure as the prominent and pervading part of the composite structure. They were meant to sum up and shadow forth the creation of God, with man at its head—the whole living world associated with man, not only as possessed of his own superior physical and spiritual nature, but also as endowed with the qualities of all the other animals, and so contributing to his ideal perfection. When first seen on earth, the cherubims were placed at the gate of the Garden of Eden, to keep the way of the tree of life. The flaming sword with which they were associated, which turned in every direction, was the symbol of God's judgment, the witness of the terrible majesty of God's holiness which had been insulted by man's sin, telling our fallen first parents that so long as their sin continued, the flaming sword would shut up every avenue against their return to their original happy state. The cherubims, on the contrary, were placed there as an image of mercy and hope, to signify that for the creation that had become alienated from God was destined a happy reconciliation. In the very place where man, and with him creation, had sinned and suffered, man and creation stood in a symbolical form by God's gracious appointment, to keep their privileges and to represent their restoration. The same great truth was signified by the golden cherubims that covered the mercy-seat with their wings, and between which God met and communed with the High Priest. The cloud of glory was the awful manifestation of the justice and holiness of God, like the flaming sword of Eden; but the cherubims indicated the interest of man, and with him of creation, in the work of redemption—represented not what men and creation actually are, but what they are destined to become when the purpose of God in regard to them is accomplished.

Now, what I want to draw particular attention to is the fact that, secluded as was the Holy of Holies of the Tabernacle, and guarded by the most solemn prohibitions, its mystery was not left altogether unknown. The most conspicuous feature of the vail—that which at once arrested every eye—was the cherubims embroidered over its whole surface, in such a way that it seemed to have been fashioned of nothing else. Thus on the vail that concealed the awful shrine of Jehovah from mortal eye was revealed one of the most characteristic and significant objects of that shrine. In this way the priests, who were not permitted to enter the Holy of Holies, could have some conception of what was within it. Never once in all their lives could the priests behold the cherubims, between which, above the mercy-seat, was the symbol of God's presence. They would live and die without seeing those glorious realities; and yet, by God's merciful provision, every day that they ministered in the holy place they could see on the vail a picture of what was behind it. Nay more, the worshippers who were not allowed to come into the holy place with the priests, but had to perform their worship outside in the court of the Tabernacle, even they could get a glimpse of what was within the vail; for in the cunning work of the curtains that hung over the roof and fell down over the back and sides of the Tabernacle, the cherubims of glory were embroidered with their expanded wings. The cherubims pourtrayed on the vail and on the curtains were no doubt faint and inadequate pictures of the originals on the mercy-seat. They could not have been otherwise. They were a flat representation of objects that stood out in the sacred shrine in the clearest and fullest relief. They were an embroidery in perishing materials, at comparatively slight cost of labour, of a work of the highest art, beaten out in the purest gold, with the most unwearied industry and the most consummate skill. But with all these necessary imperfections, the needlework of the vail and of the curtains gave a fair idea of the cherubims which stood in the most holy place, in their invisible and unapproachable glory. The Jewish priests and worshippers were not left in complete ignorance. There were witnesses to picture to them that which they could not see. They had shadows of the realities behind the vail. Their faith had elements of sight to support it. As Mrs. Browning says in "Casa Guidi Windows:"—

> "The selfsame cherub faces which emboss
> The vail, lean inward to the mercy-seat."

I wish to make use of this most interesting fact as a graphic illustration of the great truth, which is true throughout the universe, that things concealed from us have their shadows manifested in the things we see. The universe is a great tabernacle divided by a vail and curtains into an outer and inner compartment, as it were. From the inner we are shut out, and we cannot see with our bodily eyes the things that are contained in it. And yet we have representations of these hidden mysteries before our eyes every day, which give us a more or less satisfactory idea of them. Here we see in part, and prophesy in part. Here we see through a glass darkly; and yet there are revelations given to us in our common experiences, and in the things amid which we have our daily being, of what is complete, and full-orbed and transparently clear elsewhere, which are sufficient to sustain our energy and feed our hope.

The horizon, for instance, is a vail that comes down to conceal from us what is beyond. Many of us will never be able to visit foreign countries, and ascertain with our own eyes what the nature of these countries and the mode of life in them may be; and yet, within the horizon in which we spend our life we have shadowy intimations of the most distant regions of the earth. Ships come to us with their produce; our houses are full of objects brought from them; books describe them to us; and letters from friends make us partakers of their larger experience. Even the scenery around our homes is not so dissimilar to that of foreign lands as we might suppose. Travellers tell us that in foreign countries, what strikes one most at first sight is not the strange, but the familiar, look of the general landscape. Indeed, the more extensive our acquaintance becomes with other countries, the more numerous do we find the features which they possess in common with our own, the more numerous do we find the representative forms of life and dead matter which they possess in common with each other.

Between us and the lofty summits of a great mountain range there is a vail often woven of cloud and mist. Elevated far above the busy common-place haunts of man, these sublime peaks seem to dwell apart, to retire into a more awful solitude than exists on the surface of the earth. We long for the wings of the eagle, to surmount in a moment all intervening obstacles, and reach the shores of that upper world, that we may know what new forms of life occur in a region so near to and so favoured of the skies. To many destitute of the requisite strength of limb or lung to climb these peaks, or chained hopelessly to the daily task, this must ever be an unattainable enjoyment—in sight, and yet unknown. And yet the lofty summit of the mountain sends down into the valley by the streams that channel its flanks waifs of brilliant Alpine flowers, which take root and grow among the common lowland plants: and thus the dweller at the foot of the mountain knows what kind of vegetation abounds in the upper regions as truly as if he had actually scaled the heights.

Many who live far inland have a vail of mountain ranges between them and the great ocean. They may never be able to stand on its shore, gaze on its foaming billows, or listen to the beating of its mighty pulse. And yet, up the reaches of the quiet inland river, into the heart of the mountains, into the midst of shady woods, the ocean sends its tidal waters, its fresh invigorating breezes, and its white-winged sea-birds, so that the inland inhabitants may have some idea of the vast world of waters that extends far beyond their horizon. The vail of daylight hides from us the other worlds in space; and the darkness of night which brings out the stars only increases their mystery. But the vail which conceals also reveals. Spectrum analysis has made known to us the chemistry of the sun and stars, the physical constitution of the most distant worlds; and this knowledge is given not by the brightness of light, but by the black spaces which cross the spectrum, and are as significant as the shadows of the dial.

This wonderful science shows to us that the substances of the stars are identical with those of our own earth. Not a single new or unknown element has been discovered in the remotest stellar ray subjected to its scrutiny. The meteors that fall from the inter-planetary spaces to our earth are made up of the same metals with which we are familiar, and hold shut up in their cavities the same gases which form our common air and water. And thus the sunbeams, moonbeams, and starbeams bind with chains of gold and silver our world to the worlds of space; and our feelings take possession of the silent fields of the sky, include them within the sacred precincts of home, and people them with our human sympathies. Upon the very vails that separate us from the inmost and remotest sanctuaries of nature we see impressed the images of the objects which they hide from our view.

But it is not only natural things that thus reveal themselves by that which conceals them; the realities of the spiritual world are also manifested to us on the vail of earthly things. The things that are unseen and eternal are illustrated by the things that are seen and temporal. We have numberless analogies in nature which make plain to our understandings the mysteries of grace. Every object around us may be used to shadow forth spiritual truth. Our Lord revealed to His disciples and to the multitude what the Kingdom of Heaven was like by showing to them its shadows on the vail of common objects and common processes, in His parables. The Kingdom of Heaven is like everything we see and deal with. Things visible answer to things spiritual, as in the calm mirror of the lake below we see the reflection of the sky above. The beautiful landscape we see touches within us a secret sense of still more beautiful and perfect scenery—the original within the vail of which the earthly landscape is only the rough draft and copy. To us it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, if we not only see and admire the fair colours of the vail, but also comprehend the meaning of the cherubims embroidered upon it—if we have eyes to see, and ears to hear, and hearts to understand the revelation which God is giving to us in the common things that are around us. God has never left Himself without natural witnesses of His spiritual things. His invisible things from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made.

The mysteries of grace are the common heritage of all. Whatever differences of education and intellectual ability may divide human beings from each other, on the ground of moral feelings and religious truths, they all stand on the same level. In every human being there is a foundation for the fabric of Christian character; and the Gospel is built upon the sense of sin, and the longing for forgiveness which is in the nature of everyone. Even the profoundest mysteries of God's infinity and personality are not unsuitable to the humblest capacity. His incomprehensibility, by the very teaching of natural religion itself, is felt to be His glory; and man has a sense of sacred joy in this shadow of the Divine falling upon him. It harmonises with the immeasurableness of the things he sees—the sky, and the ocean, and the boundlessness of space, and with that infinite craving for the marvellous and stupendous which is a part of every man's nature. The little child is enabled to understand the mystery of the Divine love from what it learns of the patience and self-sacrifice of human love at a mother's knee. The youngest person can see the meaning of the great truths of salvation in some degree and measure by the help of the figure of them which his own experience presents to him. The doctrine of the Atonement is in remarkable keeping with the sympathetic nature which God has imparted to children, by which they feel for others, and can therefore understand how one person may carry his loving-kindness to such an extent as to give up his life for his friend. The forgiveness of God has a shadow of it in the sorrow which all truly sensitive minds feel when they have offended one dear to them, and in the joy which the sense of being reconciled and accepted by the one from whom their faults had estranged them imparts. There is thus not a mystery of the Holy of Holies of Divine truth but may be seen in dim yet true shape, embroidered as it were upon the vail of natural objects around us, and of our own common instincts and experiences.

But I go on further to show that the realities of the eternal world are manifested to us by the things of time. The vail of death, which no human hand can lift, hides the scenes beyond from our view. Death is a solitary experience. Each human being has to die alone; and no one has come back from the other side of the grave to tell us what it is to die, to disclose to us what there is to know; and there are moods in which we are tempted to think that there is nothing to know, that the heaven which our fond imagination pictures, is only like the stained glass window with which the builder contrives to hide the darkness of a blank wall outside. But such sceptical and despondent moods are evanescent. They vanish, and we come back to the faith of our childhood in the Happy Land. The Bible speaks to us of the existence of that Happy Land, and discloses its glory in forms which far transcend our earthly imagination. It calls our future Home a new heaven and a new earth: not new in the sense of being before unknown, but new in the sense of restoration; the very terms implying that it will correspond to and exhibit in brighter manifestation all that is pure and lovely in the heaven and earth which now appear.

The ascension of our Lord to heaven, with all the attributes of perfect man, the resurrection of man in a body strictly identical with his present body, prove beyond doubt that the scene of our translation, with all its circumstances, must be accommodated to the nature of man. The blessed of the Father are to inherit the Kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world; and that Kingdom is often spoken of in Scripture as an inheritance. The very idea of an inheritance implies previous acquaintance and familiarity. An heir grows up gradually from infancy in the midst of what is to be his own property when he reaches his majority. With the scenes of his future state are connected all the tender associations of his childhood and youth. He passes insensibly, without any abrupt or startling transition, from the condition of an heir to that of a proprietor. Now, so will it be with us in regard to the future state. From the very constitution of our nature, we form our anticipations of the future from our past experiences. The objects and experiences of earth are preparations for those which await us above. On the vail that hides our future home from us, we see pictured the cherubims of glory. The cherubims of the shrine are the same as those on the vail. Earthly forms hold possession of the heavenly places. The future revelation will be but the full unveiling of the present; the new creation will be but the old creation breaking forth, after its dreary winter of sin and death, into brilliant bloom and fruitage when the eternal summer of Christ's advent is come.

Yes: the cherubims of heaven are seen on the vail of earth. Heaven is filled with objects long endeared to us, and with pleasure which we have already enjoyed in part, and learned from the foretaste to long for the full fruition. We have now the earnest of the purchased possession—the first-fruits of the great harvest. Fore-shinings of the heavenly land appear to us, as Canaan shone to Moses from the crest of Pisgah. In our higher moments it seems not as if we saw the cherubims vividly displayed on the vail, but as if the vail itself had become transparent, or a corner of it had been lifted to show to us the glories that shall one day be ours, when every vail shall be removed, and the whole universe shall be in sight.

Now, what is the practical outcome of thoughts like these? What lessons for the conduct of life do we learn from the fact that the cherubims of the spiritual and eternal worlds are revealed to us on the vails of earthly things and earthly experiences? Does it not teach us that we have no excuse for sinful ignorance, seeing that God has brought within the range of our touch and vision in earthly images His perfect heavenly things, and placed us so that we can understand the things that belong to our spiritual life by the things that belong to our daily life? Do not these glimpses and foreshadowings of unseen and eternal things also inspire us with a deeper interest in them? Instead of having a sense of vagueness and unreality connected with heavenly things, offering nothing upon which the heart and the mind can fix, we learn to love them—to set our affections upon them, and live under their transforming power, because they are already partially ours. And more than all, does not the fact of the cherubims upon the vail being the same as those in the shrine show to us that our life is continuous here and hereafter—that it is one history and one development? It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we have in our own bodies and souls premonitions of our future state.

It is a common idea that death will make a great change. You lie down in the sleep of death with a selfish, grovelling spirit, and a pampered and corrupted body, and you imagine that you are to wake up with a spirit perfect in every attribute, and a body pure and immortal. You imagine that somehow, through God's mercy, you will pass into a state of blessedness of which you have no foretaste or anticipation here, and of which your own experience can bear no testimony to the fact that heaven commences in this world. You have some vague idea that your happiness will consist in exercises and enjoyments for which you have no relish here, and in perfect communion with that God with whose nature your hearts are at enmity now. What would you think of the conduct of an apprentice who was destined for a particular trade, and yet confined his training to the learning of another altogether different? What can you think of a man who expects to go to heaven at last, and yet lives here in a way that is entirely different from what he believes heaven to be? Surely the whole analogy of Scripture teaches you that just as the circumstances in which Providence has placed you here must have some affinity to that more advanced state of being to which you aspire, so equally must your moral character correspond with its moral conditions. If this world be but a school of education for the world to come, then manifestly the lessons which you are taught now must have reference to the things to be practised and enjoyed hereafter. How, then, can you expect to be fit for heaven if you have served no apprenticeship to holiness on earth: if you have not been taught in the school of this world the very rudiments of heavenly learning?

The Apostle speaks of hoping to the end for the grace that is to be brought to us at the revelation of Jesus Christ. You may expect or desire what you please; but you can only hope for that which you have a right to believe will come. You can only hope and wait for the full revelation of the Lord Jesus, if you have Christ formed in you now, the hope of glory—if you have already in your quickened heart the bud of which that revelation is the expanded blossom and fruit. If you are to behold and enjoy the glorious cherubims of the heavenly world, you must have them represented as it were on the vail of your earthly tabernacle. Your hearts must be tuned now to the heavenly harmonies. Your souls must now be restored by Divine grace to the Divine image; your bodies must have all their powers and senses trained to purity and righteousness. You must exercise yourself unto that godliness which hath the promise of the life to come, as well as of the life that now is. And in proportion as you exercise yourself unto godliness, so will that promise be fulfilled, so will you see and have communion with God, so will you realise your own immortality, and so will you anticipate the full fruition of heaven.

When certain conditions of light are present, if you look through a window at a particular angle into the street, you see a flame apparently outside, flickering strangely in the air. It is only the reflection of the fire in the room on the window-pane. Is not the heaven you see beyond the window of this life, the projected reflection of your present experience? What you are now determines your future; and the heaven of each man is just what he himself makes it, according as the fire of love and holiness burns more or less brightly on the hearth of his heart.

ANOTHER MARY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A LONG ENGAGEMENT," ETC. ETC.

"I REALLY should have given Mary North credit for more common sense. It seems too ridiculous. But just look at them, Dr. Everton. Wouldn't one be tempted now to believe that those two were a recognised pair of lovers? It is excusable, of course, for such a mere boy as Walter; calf-love, like the measles, is best had early and done with; but for Mary to listen seriously to all that rubbish—she must be two-and-thirty at the least—absurd woman!"

Dr. Everton, who had obediently glanced in the direction pointed out by Miss Bustridge's eye-glass, gave a guilty start as the object of her rather scornful criticism rose, turned, nodded brightly to them both, and walked away with her companion.

"Thirty-two, Miss Bustridge?" he said, a flush on his thin face. "Ah, when one finds oneself so dangerously near fifty——"

"Oh, Dr. Everton, for a man, that is youthful—just in the very prime of ripened manhood," interrupted Miss Bustridge, toying with the knot of ribbons on her sunshade. "No, I won't say a word against your favourite pupil," she continued, "scarcely over twenty, poor boy; Mary has always been such a friend of his mother's, naturally they would feel like sisters, and Mary used to help Walter with his exercises and scold him about his French verbs, like—well, just like an aunt. And now there is quite a report in the town, and no wonder. Mrs. Smith told me she had heard for a fact that Walter starts for the Hague as Miss North's fiancé, to come back and claim her at the end of a year. I have felt so anxious ever since, poor thing, thinking of the wreck of her happiness, and her extraordinary delusion, when she has her widowed sister and those two children to devote her life usefully and honourably to—for, I mean. Ah, the trust of little ones is a very sweet responsibility, I often say, as I look at your dear little Ethel, Dr. Everton, left motherless so early. You must find it so difficult to watch over her health and all the little things a woman can do; you remember those exquisite lines of Mrs. Browning's—something about tying sashes. I know——"

"Please excuse me," said Dr. Everton, quite alarmed. "I want particularly to speak to Mr. Brown about his boy—good afternoon," and he was gone.

Miss Bustridge bit her lip, but recovered herself in a moment as she heard the rustle of a silk dress on the August scorched lawn and turned with a conscious smile to her friend and gossip, Mrs. Smith, who said, meaningly—

"I am afraid I have frightened the doctor away, Miss Bustridge; and you seemed to be having such an interesting conversation."

"Oh, well, a talk with Dr. Everton is sure to have something interesting about it," said Miss Bustridge, with girlish confusion. "Just as you came up, I was repeating something of Mrs. Browning's——"

"What, my dear, the Brownings who have just come to the Manor?—taken it for four months, I hear; Now, can she be related to the Mr. Browning who used to be so attentive to Mrs. Murray when——"

"My dear Mrs. Smith, no," returned Lavinia, with the slightest curl of her thin lips. "I mean the great poetess."

"Indeed," replied Mrs. Smith. "I never pretend to be up in all the new-fangled poetry and novels that girls waste their time over; as my dear father used to say, it was better to bring us up useful than ornamental, and my late poor husband often told Mr. Smith—'Let me bring a friend in when I will, Rebecca has always a good dinner for us, and not a bit of fuss about it.' Joseph often repeats his words; and how could I have managed it, what with the flightiness of the maids, if I had dawdled about with a book in my hands all the morning?"

"Ah well, Mrs. Smith," said Lavinia, "we unmarried ladies have the advantage of a little more leisure, of course. But really, we must join the others; what delightful garden-parties Mrs. Temple gives—invites the whole town, kind creature! Now, the vicar's, last Tuesday, was much more exclusive—not more than a dozen of us invited. Ah, you were not there, I think, Mrs. Smith?"

We will leave Miss Bustridge to her description. Mrs. Smith had several questions to ask, and particularly wished to ascertain some little details—whether this or that was or was not flavoured with the other, and if the Jones girls wore their new dresses from London, etc., and we will see why the young host, Mr. Walter Temple, instead of helping his mother in the entertainment of her large party, is devoting himself so exclusively to Miss Mary North, who scarcely ever plays tennis, and is already called Aunt Mary by half the children of her acquaintance. We shall find them in the rustic yew arbour, where, in the school-days so many years ago, Mary discovered Walter in one of his many boyish freaks. She has a teasing habit of reminding him of such little incidents at inconvenient and sentimental moments, and he is uncomfortably certain, by the naughty twinkle in her brown eyes, that she is thinking now of that long-past time.

"Mary," he says, with boyish petulance, "you might be serious for five minutes, I should think, when I shan't bother you again for a whole year. But I really believe you don't care a bit what becomes of me."

"I care very much indeed," said Mary penitently, "and I shall miss you dreadfully."

"Ah! but you can't think how I feel, Mary—just as if I had a lump of lead here, instead of a heart. I've never been like other fellows—Dick Clement, for instance. He falls in love with every fresh girl he sees."

"But you don't see any new faces, my dear boy," remarked Mary. "No, I don't do you injustice. I know you care for me more than for anyone you have ever seen; but that is the point. Your fate waits for you somewhere—in the school-room, perhaps—and when you do meet her, I shall be what you ought to think me now—your dear Aunt Mary, who has scolded and petted you all your life. She is a Rosalind, or some other lovely name, I dare say, instead of plain Mary."

"It is the dearest name in the world to me," said the young man, looking at her steadily, with honest blue eyes. "At least you will tell me—have I a rival?"

"Yes, two," replied Mary. "Little Rose and Millie."

"Oh well, Mrs. Murray will be jealous of you some day, and fly off with the children," said Walter, brightening up. "I shan't despair, Mary. This time next August, you will see me back again, to claim my wife—yes, I will say it. You try to seem so horribly decided, but it's no use; you are Mrs. Murray's sister, and no one ever knew her in the same mind two minutes together."

Mary laughed, but shook her head.

"I shall take great care of your mother when you are gone, Walter. We shall read your letters together, and knit your socks, whilst you are fraternising with the Dutchmen. Mind you send me some tulip bulbs in the autumn."

"It is the dearest name in the world to me."

"And you will write to me, Mary?"

"Of course I will! You shall have all the news of Ashtown fresh and crisp from Miss Bustridge's manufactory."

"I wonder if she will get round old Toffee?" said Walter. "I should think the boys would strike if she came peering and prying about the place. No more hot sausages in the dormitory then, Mary. What stunning big cakes you used to make for us!"—with a deep sigh.

"I believe you were only fourteen yesterday," laughed Mary. "People will be going away; I won't stay here another minute. Good-bye. I hope you will be very happy, and—and I shall be very glad to see you back again—with a moustache!"

* * * * * *

Mary North and her widowed sister lived in the aristocratic part of Ashtown. Their house, of substantial red brick, stood in the midst of a walled-in garden. It had once overflowed with the life and merriment of a large family party, but one after another the young people had left the old roof, until Mary alone remained to nurse her aged parents. Just before their death the youngest daughter, Lilias, lost her husband, and came home again with her two little girls. Mary was now really, as well as nominally, the mistress of the "Firs," and being passionately fond of children, found in her nieces the great pleasure of her life.

The sisters are sitting in the cool drawing-room the day after Mrs. Temple's garden party. Rose and Millie are busy with their dolls; their aunt has a pile of account-books before her, and Lilias, sitting at the window, is yawning over the latest volume from the library.

"I begin to miss Walter Temple already," she says. "Ashtown gets duller and stupider every day. How can you pretend to like it? I suppose it must be because you have never known anything better; but I should have thought you would hate to turn into a cabbage, when we might just as well let this prison of a house, and enjoy ourselves in town for a year or two. I don't believe you ever were a girl, Mary; and you can't realise how hard it is for me to have my life over and done with at five-and-twenty."

"But, Lilias," said Mary, looking up from her grocer's bills, "they say London air would be the worst thing possible for you and the children."

"Well, I don't think it would be worse than dying of dulness.—Don't worry me, Rosie."

"What is it, dear?" asked Aunt Mary, as the child was going back to her corner.

"Oh, auntie, my dolly is an 'imbelid' to-day," said Rosie confidentially.

"I'm the doctor, then," said Mary promptly. "Take Ethelinda for an airing in her Bath chair, ma'am—that little stool turned upside down, Rosie," she added, in a stage whisper; and Ethelinda, with her weak back propped up by a cookery-book, was pushed round the room in solemn state.

"Mind! you've put one foot in the sea, Rosie!" Millie called out. "I'm playing Yarmouth, Aunt Mary. This is the pier, and the family is digging in the sand.—Mother, when shall we go to the seaside again?"

"There, Mary!" exclaimed Mrs. Murray reproachfully; "you see even that child is pining for a breath of sea air. Why not go to Scarborough?"

"If we do we will take little Ethel Everton with us," said Mary meditatively; "and, Lilias, it will be more pleasant for you to be away for a time. Have you heard that Arthur Browning has taken the Manor for the shooting season?"

"Arthur Browning coming!"—and a lovely flush spread over Lilias's delicate face. "Oh, how it will bring back the memory of those happy days!"

Then, after a pause, and pouting—

"It is just like you, Mary, to hurry me off directly you see the chance of a little brightness and happiness in my life! And I'm sure poor dear Fred would be the last person to grudge me any pleasure!"

"We will go to Scarborough for a month, at least!" said Mary, with a decided air of annoyance. "Now, children, run and have your hats put on, and we will go and ask Dr. Everton if we may take Ethel with us next Monday! I confess to wanting a change, too, Lilias!"

Her sister lifted her pretty eyebrows incredulously.

"I shall really believe that horrid Miss Bustridge is right, Mary, and that you do care for Walter Temple! But it is too ridiculous!" with a little musical laugh. "You seem almost old enough to be his mother—certainly his maiden aunt! Now, Dr. Everton would be more suitable. You could get the poor man's muddled accounts into order, go to all the school cricket-matches—how I detest boys!—and"—but Mary here left the room in a tiff, and Mrs. Murray's sketch was never finished. She placidly leant back on her cushions, and murmured, "I wonder if Arthur will think me very much altered!"

* * * * * *

A year has passed away, bringing many changes with it, and a few silver threads in Mary North's brown hair. She is standing before the long oak-framed mirror in her drawing-room now, and looks at them with a little sigh.

"Poor Walter!" she is thinking. "Am I selfish, I wonder? But his mother tells me it is the dearest wish of her heart, and his letters are so affectionate and manly, and everyone says he is so steady and earnest. I do love him very dearly, and miss him more every day. I cannot bear this house now the children have gone. I believe Lilias would have let me keep them, but Arthur Browning would not hear of it! Of course, it is quite proper that he should be so fond of them! And what was the use of asking me to come and see them in Edinburgh whenever I liked!" Another deep sigh. "Well, the letter is written now, and his mother will give it to him. Perhaps he is reading it this very minute! I will make him happy, dear fellow! He shall have as many tarts and sweet things as he likes! If he were not such a boy, I dare say I shouldn't love him half so much. I hope he will like this muslin—but I'm afraid Lilias is right, and I am rather too plump for the æsthetic style! Oh dear, how silly I am! I'll make myself read some of these 'Short Studies.' Dr. Everton is sure to ask what I think of them! I might be a girl of nineteen, my heart beats so ridiculously! Ah me, I wish I were!"

At that moment there was a well-known step on the gravel, a tap at the French window, and Walter Temple came in, looking eagerly round.

"My dear Mary!" he exclaimed, seizing both her hands in his, "how glad I am to see you; and you look so well! Nicer than ever, I declare! It is jolly to be back again! And so Lilias is married and gone; how dull you must feel without the children! My dear, weddings seem the fashion, don't they?"

"Did your mother give you my letter, Walter?"

"Letter? no! What should I want with a letter when we can have a good talk; and I've a thousand things to tell you! Why, how you are trembling, Mary! Did I startle you, coming in so suddenly? I'm awfully rough and thoughtless!"

"No, no, Walter! I was longing to see you; and you have a moustache, after all!" she went on, with a rather unsteady laugh.

Walter blushed like a girl.

"I hurried away from mother, and came on here to you, Mary, because—well, because I wanted to tell you that you are the cleverest woman in the world—really and truly!"

"And you have only just discovered that!" laughed Mary, her brown eyes sparkling.

"How pretty you look to-night!" said Walter, with a natural, boyish admiration which was the sweetest flattery to our poor Mary.

"Now talk sensibly, silly boy!" she said. "You have only told me one of the thousand things, and that I knew before! I mean about my cleverness, of course. The other little fact you have the credit of first finding out!"

"I'm going to talk about myself, Mary."

"It is a big subject," said Mary demurely. "I'm sure you have grown an inch or two since you have been away."

"Mary, you must and shall come and live at the Hague when we are settled; you have nothing to keep you in Ashtown now. You are so jolly! I really like a talk with you better than with anybody else in the world—well, at least, second perhaps, though she is not so clever exactly as you," in great confusion. "There, it is coming out, but I know you will say you guessed it long ago, when I wrote about that Scotch family who were so good to me when I was ill. I had a narrow squeak! Why, how pale you are, Mary! I am all right again, and better than ever. Where was I? Oh yes! I really don't know when it began—my falling in love with her, I mean—but she is the loveliest, sweetest girl—very fair, with eyes like violets, and golden hair that ripples down to her waist. She is Mary, too. Do you remember how I told you that it was the dearest name on earth to me? And"—he went on, speaking in a low, steady voice, and grasping Mary's hand firmly—"I must thank you for what seemed to me then very cruel and cutting words. But they were very true, after all. I did not love you as a man loves his 'fate,' though I did and do love you as a man loves his dear elder sister, and all my life I hope to show you, Mary, what that means. I never knew what true affection I felt for you, and never realised all I owed to your influence, until I knew and loved her."

Then there was a dead silence, and at last Mary North rose, and, with lips as cold as ice, gave a last farewell kiss to her boy-lover. "God bless you both," she said, very quietly. "I shall prize my brother's affection, Walter, as one of the few treasures left to me."

Then Walter, feeling as though further words were impossible to them both just now, pressed her hand, and went away again through the open window, with the last rays of the sunset, and Mary was left alone in the gathering darkness: she covered her face, and moaned aloud.

* * * * * *

Yes, my dear Constance, with your eighteen years, and parties and flirtations, women do long for, and sometimes even expect, happiness after thirty! Very foolish and absurd of them, of course; and let us hope that Mary North, like a reasonable person, will some day be of your opinion. But though I know your sympathies are entirely with that pretty young creature—the other Mary, tripping across the prim Dutch parlour, and humming snatches of Scotch ballads to herself—the very apple of her parents' eyes—still, I must say a word for my poor friend. This was her first love, even though her hair is getting grey! She somehow had missed her girlhood at its proper season, with pressing family cares and responsibilities on her young shoulders; and, strangely enough, those golden dreams, which you believe, Constance, to be the sole property of happy youth, had come thus late to her. The awaking was sharp and cruel. But courage, Mary! Life is not over for you yet; there are many desolate hearts wanting comfort which you can cheer; and a child's clinging arms will solace you, even though you never receive the sacred name of mother.

Why have I written these prosy lines, knowing that any "Constance" who happens to read the story will be sure to skip them? I should have done it myself, at your age, my dear!

* * * * * *

And now I must ask you to come with me to the Hague, without any of the annoyances of the voyage! I shall not let you linger to admire the glowing beds of begonias, or to exclaim over the fearful and wonderful tidiness of the thrifty Dutch housewives, but we will come at once into this cosy room, where you can breathe the native air of—dare I say?—a little comfortable disorder; or shall I offend our pretty young hostess, who would instantly say, "It is all Walter's fault!" (which it is!)

Just now she is softly playing one of the "Songs without Words," whilst her husband, sitting by the window, seems quite absorbed in a closely written letter.

At last she glances round, and, a little piqued at this absorption, says—

"Really, Walter, Ashtown must be a wonderful place! What can your mother find to write to you about?—four sheets covered! You never have letters now from that delightful Miss North! Do you remember showing me some of hers when you were ill, with such ridiculous stories of a Miss Bustridge? What has beco[illegible] of her?"

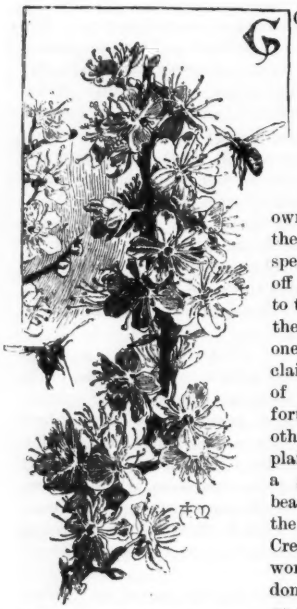
"Mother mentions her here. You can see what she says, if you like, Mary," replied Walter.

And leaning over his shoulder, his wife read, in Mrs. Temple's flowing old-fashioned handwriting:—

"Mary North is looking very bright and well, and is fully occupied. She has taken two of your Cousin William's six boys, and has undertaken to provide for their education for a year, at least; so they live at the 'Firs,' and go backwards and forwards to Dr. Everton's school. I went in to see her last evening, and it seemed like the old times over again. Johnny—he is a steady, hard-working boy—was very busy with his Latin grammar; whilst Mary was pretending to be dreadfully angry with Dick, who had covered the page of his exercise with sketches of 'old Toffee,' as the boys still persist in calling Dr. Everton. (How pleased you used to be, my dear Walter, when I brought you back those packets of 'Everton toffee' after my visits to Brighton!) I think Mary ought to be a little firmer with Dick, I must say. However, the Doctor tells me he has wonderfully improved since he has been under her care. Little Ethel is constantly running in to see 'Aunt Mary,' as they all call her."



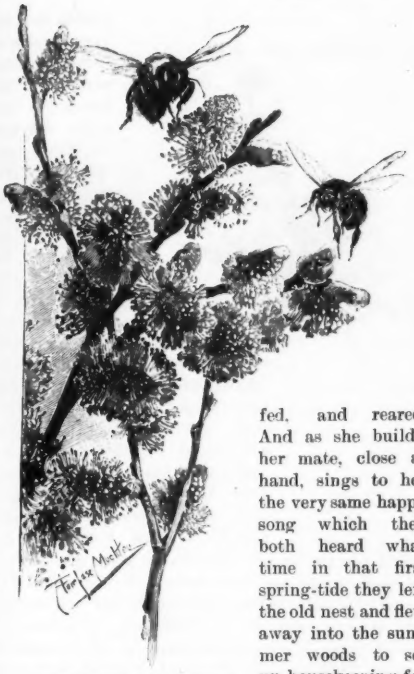
"By the way, Walter, how old is this wonderful Miss North?" asked Mary Temple, looking up from the letter, a slight cloud on her sunny face.

Walter shifted the point of his wife's elbow, which was a trifle sharp, then took one little hand and kissed it.

"How old is Mary North, darling?" he said. "Oh, about thirty-four, I should think."

"Thirty-four, Walter!—nearly forty! Why, quite old, poor thing!" said the other Mary, with unaffected pity. "Now leave your letter, like a good boy, and come out in the garden with me."

GOD IN THE BOOK OF NATURE.—I.



DOMESTIC BEE AND PLUM BLOSSOM.

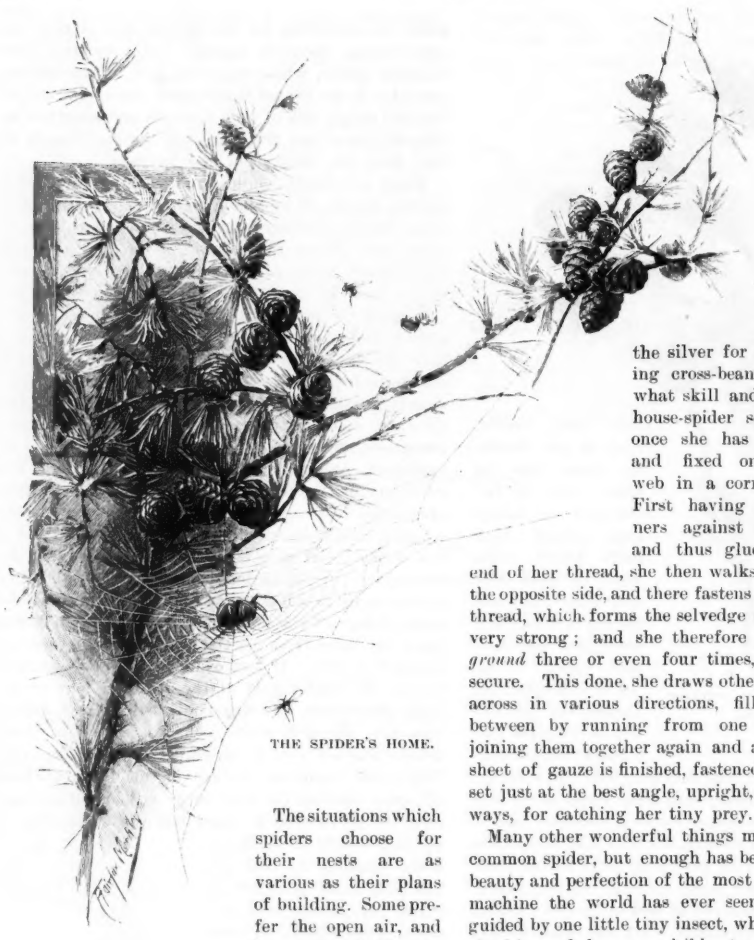
GOD has given us two great books of truth; that of His written Word, speaking to us from past ages by the voices of His saints and servants, and, above all, of His own Son; and that of the world of nature, speaking from the far-off days of the Creation to this very hour. What the written Word of the one teaches and proclaims as His own gift of truth for our comfort, hope, and life, the other illustrates, and explains, and proves with a grand and simple beauty that echoes back the happy words of the Creator when the great work of Creation was done: "And God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good." "Good," that is, in its completeness and perfection for the purposes for which it was created, the place it was to fill, the work which it had to do; perfect, in the sense that nothing could be added to it, nothing taken away, without loss or injury to some one of its varied powers, uses, grace, beauty, or life. It is so with man himself, the highest and greatest of God's creatures; and so also with all others, down to the very lowest and least. Nor is it less so in what we call the Book of Nature, spread out before us in the great world of natural things—i.e., the things about us which spring, and grow, and perish, and yet continue to spring, and grow, and revive, day by day, and month after month, and season by season, year by year, age after age, with unbroken regularity, in exact order and unchanging fitness.

Great or small, mean or mighty, each creature has its own instinct, intelligence, capacity, hidden sense, enough to guide, control, and fit it for the life it has to lead, the work it has to do, the food it has to seek, the young it has to rear, the enemies it has to fear, the dangers to be avoided, the future (in some cases) to be provided for. This hidden sense is born in and with it, as it has been age after age from the very beginning of time.

Thus it happens, to our wonder and delight, that the bee builds her tiny cell of wax of the very same, exact material, size, and shape as when she first built it among the groves of Paradise. There has been no change, no need of possible improvement. Each single bird builds her nest by a like hidden law, in her own way, her own fashion, unlike that of any other bird. The robin never builds hers like the swallow, nor the wren like the lark. The tiny tit-mouse may build in the hollow of an old stump, or in a crevice or hole in a ruined wall, but never the swift or the nightingale. Each has her own favourite, known haunt; each chooses her own sort of material—feathers or grass, mud or thistle-down, twigs or moss. These she gathers and uses after the secret influence of her own instinct, and little by little builds up, and at last completes, a nest exactly like that in which she was herself once born, brought up.

WILD BEES AND WILLOW BLOOM.

fed, and reared. And as she builds, her mate, close at hand, sings to her the very same happy song which they both heard what time in that first spring-tide they left the old nest and flew away into the summer woods to set up housekeeping for themselves. The linnet never pipes like a blackbird, nor does a nightingale chatter like that busybody the starling. One and all, every family and tribe keeps to its own song and times of singing, its own fashions, habits, and ways, and, oddly enough, its own language. The ringdove never talks to her young folks as the partridge whispers to her mate, or calls to her callow brood as she leads them out to feed in the dewy fields; neither, perhaps, understands what the other is saying; though if a hawk suddenly sweeps along over the hedgerow, there is a cry of alarm which every bird within hearing understands in a moment, and is ready to join in.



No wild bee ever builds her nest like a wasp, or manufactures paper out of grassy fibres, withered leaves, decayed wood, or scrapings of bark. No wasp ever lived in a hive with a family of his own kin, though, thief as he is, he often tries to pass the sentries at the door of the beehive, and feast on the honey which he knows to be there stored up. The wasp (vespa), indeed, builds a six-sided cell, like that of her relation the honey-bee, and lays up a store of honey for the use of her future brood, but for the most part underground, or perchance in a bush or hedgerow—in a nest of her own contriving, and with paper of her own making; the internal domestic arrangements of all the species of paper-makers (wasps and hornets) being always the same. But, however wonderful the paper nest of the wasp or the hornet may be, and however curious and clever the way in which she builds it, and however wise all her plans for providing for her family and getting her own living, there is another little creature, the common spider, whose ways are just as remarkable, and who, if she cannot make paper, can spin a web of fine and dainty silk of such strength and beauty as no human weaver can rival, or even imitate, though he may have the finest loom ever invented.

There are nearly eight hundred kinds of British spiders, nearly all of whom weave webs, and almost every variety working after a fashion and pattern of their own. From the palace* of the king down to the poorest hovel of the peasant, the house-spider finds a home in some quiet nook or other. Among the rafters of the roof, along the smooth surface of the ceiling, and in the corners of the window, wherever there are flies, there, sooner or later, Madame Spider is sure to be found. And there she spins her fairy-like cunning web, every line drawn as truly as the cleverest mathematician could draw it with scale, compasses, and ruler. Yet the tiny spider has had no teaching. At once, as soon as she left the nest and crept out into the world, she began to spin; choosing always the best corner for her work, knowing exactly where it should be strong and where it needed but a few threads, and able, if it were swept away by the housemaid's broom, to build another web, still better and stronger, in a few hours. Or, supposing that she needs change of place among the rafters, or to transplant her house from one tree or bush to another—in a trice it is done. If you examine a spider, you will find at the hinder part of the abdomen four or six little projections, like tiny teats, each pierced with a tiny hole through which comes a thread of such infinite fineness that it is scarcely visible to the eye. This is her "spinneret" or weaving machine, by which she spins together the four or six strands into a fairy rope, strong enough to build her web, or to support her own weight as she hangs down floating in the air. The silk itself is stored up inside her, in the form of a sticky gum, which, in some wondrous fashion, on being exposed to the air instantly dries up into a thread of fine, hard silk. Taking, then, a drop of this gum, she gently draws out of it a long thread, and having fastened one end of it to the rafter, or twig, lets herself slowly down, spinning as she goes, stopping where she will, or swinging to and fro like the pendulum of a clock. By-and-bye she touches the edge of some other beam, or bush, or wall, or goes down to the ground, but always ready to spin a fresh thread or mount nimbly back by the old one.

SPINNERET OF SPIDER FROM WHICH THE WEB IS SPUN (MAGNIFIED).

* So said Agur the son of Jakeh, 3,000 years ago, and so it is now. "She taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces."—Prov. xxx. 28.

THE SPIDER'S HOME.

The situations which spiders choose for their nests are as various as their plans of building. Some prefer the open air, and hang the fatal network up among shrubs or plants, where flies and small insects abound; others choose the warmer, darker corners inside the house, old stable, or barn; but whichever is chosen, there she spins the same wonderful thread of silk, so fine that it cannot be wound off alone, yet so tough and strong as to stand both rain and wind, and bear the weight of the cunning weaver and a score of flies. One hundred and fifty yards of it—all that can be drawn from a single insect—weigh about one-twentieth of a grain; and it is said that a rope of it an inch thick (if it could be made) would bear a weight of seventy tons, and so exceed in strength a bar of steel of equal thickness. The silk is of two colours, golden and silver-grey, drawn from separate parts of the spinneret, and quite different in kind and texture: the yellow, the stronger and more elastic, being for the strong, straight, outer edges of the web, and the silver for the swaying, bending cross-beams. See, now, with what skill and wisdom the little house-spider sets to work when once she has chosen the place and fixed on the size of her web in a corner of the ceiling. First having pressed her spinners against one of the walls, and thus glued fast to it one end of her thread, she then walks along the wall to the opposite side, and there fastens the other end. This thread, which forms the selvedge of her net, must be very strong; and she therefore goes over the same ground three or even four times, so as to make all secure. This done, she draws other threads across and across in various directions, filling up the spaces between by running from one to the other, and joining them together again and again until the tiny sheet of gauze is finished, fastened into its place, and set just at the best angle, upright, horizontal, or sideways, for catching her tiny prey.

Many other wonderful things might be told of the common spider, but enough has been said to show the beauty and perfection of the most wondrous spinning machine the world has ever seen, all managed and guided by one little tiny insect, who serves no apprenticeship and has no visible teacher, and yet the very moment she has to get her own living is as absolute a master of the craft as if she had been at work for a hundred years. She spins her own silk, twists it into threads, and weaves them into such fairy lace-work as the science and art of man can never match.

Whence, then, comes the wisdom and the skill? From Him only, our own Father in Heaven, who created us in body and in soul; who gave us eyes to search for and to see these wonders of His Almighty hand; minds to consider their beauty and perfection; hearts to feel His goodness in providing for all creatures; souls to magnify and bless Him, as we read but a page in the wondrous Book of Nature.

"COMFORT YE MY PEOPLE."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

THOSE whom God has anointed with the consecrating oil of sorrow have a ministry to accomplish for Him. Some of His servants can go forth to preach and teach, to defend His truth, to uplift His banner and oppose the wrong; you, perhaps, are kept indoors, and your work is given up as concerns teaching the young, visiting the sick, standing in the forefront of the battle, the heat of the busy vineyard. Yet the Lord has not set you free from His happy service; yours is a mission as holy and blessed as that of the most active and energetic Christian worker.

> "To tend the vines, the grapes to store,
> Thou dost appoint for some;
> Thou hast Thy young men at the war—
> Thy little ones at home."

The anointing of sorrow, whether it has come to you in the form of sickness, infirmity, pain, or need, has brought with it a glorious dowry of heavenly comfort. God's afflicted children are His witnesses how He compensates, cheers, and comforts; and those who, being cast down, prove the fulness of Divine consolation, have the ministry laid upon them to bear the grail of love and strength and cheer to other people's lives. "Comfort ye, comfort ye My people," saith your God. This is His bidding to your soul; there is much weariness, much heart-sickness, much despondency, many a secret burden that the life comforted by God can help. Let it not be in vain that you have a strong consolation, who, amid every outside storm, can steal to Jesus, the Hope of His people, the Harbour of the drifting, the Covert from the blast.

If you are in need of comfort to-day, if depression is clouding your horizon just now, the message for you is—try how the Lord can comfort. Not with vain and mocking promises that will never be fulfilled, not with cold platitudes, not with loving goodwill that lacks power to perform, will the Lord God comfort you if you cast yourself and your every trouble upon His heart. "As one whom his mother comforteth," saith the Lord, "so will I comfort you." Let the sweetness of this promise be tried and proved in your own experience. A little child can go through a great deal with the tender face of the mother bent watchfully above, with those tireless, patient arms clasping the little sufferer loved unspeakably. So the Lord takes this sweet thought of tireless eyes, of helpful arms, of fadeless love, and makes the comfort a mother brings near, a faint, fair blossom of promise of the full, rich, radiant flower of His own comforting.

"To strengthen by company—that is comfort," the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse reminds us—"co, together with, and fort, meaning strength." Since you have God's strength for company, since "His love is as great as His power," and His weakest saint can draw every moment upon the eternal springs of His comfort, will you not be of good cheer, and take your rest with thanksgiving, and praise the Lord that He anoints and prepares you to strengthen the faint-hearted that pass your way? "Comfort ye My people," saith your God.

Forget your own special cross for awhile—the Lord is thinking about it and you—let that suffice. Let Christian love make you quick to read the shadow on your neighbour's brow, the wistful look in the eyes, the tokens that confess the life as weary and heavy-laden. You little know how that life may be needing a message concerning God the Comforter: speak a word concerning the Merciful One, the Mighty, the Pitiful, the prayer-hearing Lord—it will come like sweet music to the tired and troubled breast, it will come like an inspiring psalm. Beecher said once that when he listened to "the Chimes of old Trinity," one bell came to him across the water clearer and sweeter than all the rest; so, in all the Bible-music, there were words he held precious with exceeding sweetness—"The God of all comfort."

If you are too weak to speak, then strengthen the sinking heart, the troubled face that watches you, by a glorious, patient, triumphant witness that the God of comfort sustains you, supports you, keeps you from repining, floods the shadows with such light that your own face catches the glow. By lip, by life, by tender word, by victorious faith and patience, take up the blessing that was breathed by one in the past who knew many comforts, yet counted religion the chief:—"He who, in answer to my prayer, has helped me when every prospect of help vanished—that God who has safely conducted me, not merely through flowery paths, but likewise across precipices and over burning sands—may this God be thy God, thy refuge, thy comfort, as He has been mine!"

AT A CHRISTIAN CHINESE WEDDING.

"We heard the sound of pretty hymn-singing."—p. 753.

THOSE of our readers who may remember the young Chinese couple—Lee-fok-tsoo and Yung-tsü-ting—whose betrothal was described in our pages in June, 1889, will be interested in a brief account of the wedding with which, a few days ago, that initial ceremony was consummated.

According to the invitation sent us—the now familiar large crimson envelope with cross-bands of a lighter red inscribed with our Chinese names—we presented ourselves at 10 a.m. at the Mission Boarding School, where the bride-elect has dwelt from early childhood, first as a pupil, latterly as a teacher. The ladies in charge, who received us, had added to their foreign dress some pretty touches of Chinese fashion: ornaments of yellow everlastings were fastened in their hair, and their black silk gowns were brightened with silk-embroidered native scarfs.

But we had to learn afresh the oft-repeated lesson that in this country punctuality is its own and only reward. Nearly two hours we waited for the bridegroom's coming; there was a difficulty, we were told, in his procuring a sedan-chair, as many marriages were taking place in the native city, the day being considered a "lucky" one for the purpose: and for a bridegroom to walk to his wedding, however humble his rank or adjacent his abode, was impossible.

At length we were admitted to inspect the bride, whose four hours' toilette was just completed: and a marvellous spectacle, truly, was the figure seated motionless in the centre of a room adjoining the mission-hall. Gorgeously elaborate was her array from head to foot: the former crowned with a helmet-like erection of a material resembling turquoise enamel, wrought into the finest filigree work, from which projected glittering artificial beetles and butterflies, and other quaint, rich ornaments, the whole surmounted by three large round tufts of crimson silk, arranged tiara-wise. From the brim of this head-gear fell all around strings, about half a yard in length, of pearl and ruby beads. Just visible through these at the back, were broad loops of jet-black hair, stiff and solid-looking as polished ebony, and decorated with artificial pink roses. Her principal vestment was a long tunic, whose foundation fabric of crimson satin was scarcely discernible amidst its embroidery of gold: a corner turned back, lined with emerald satin, disclosed an under-skirt panelled in brilliant red and blue silk, this also profusely trimmed with gold embroidery. A belt of scarlet satin, studded with tablets of white cornelian, crossed the waist behind. From the front edge of her head-dress a red silk veil fell almost to the ground, adding much to her præter-human aspect. The whole costume was, I learned, hired for the day.

Into some aperture of head-gear, coiffure, and veil, I contrived to insert the sympathising inquiry, "Are you very tired?" and caught a faintly whispered reply, "Veh sadoo" (Not tired), as I was called off with the admonition that the damsel must neither speak nor be spoken to.

A CHRISTIAN CHINESE WEDDING.

And now, mingled with the discordant piping of native professionals on the verandah, we heard the sound of pretty hymn-singing, and found that the waiting company in the adjoining hall, consisting of about forty Chinese school-girls and as many friends of the bride and bridegroom, were thus relieving the weariness of the long delay. A bright and pleasing scene was presented by the interior of the little mission church, still gay with Christmas trappings, evergreen stars and festoons, many-coloured paper flags and flowers, inscriptions in Chinese characters, some on gilded cardboard, some most ingeniously formed in foliage of fir.

At one end was a platform, where a native teacher was playing the harmonium, and where now the officiating missionary and the nearest relatives of bride and bridegroom took their stand. For the wedding pair was spread the inevitable red carpet, in this case consisting of a foreign scarlet blanket. Strange to say, I had last seen this custom of a bridal carpet in far-off Finland, where, sometimes of costliest texture, it invariably figures among the wedding gifts.

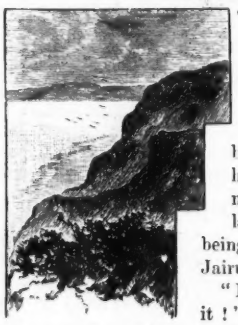
Suddenly, on some signal of the bridegroom's approach, the singing ceased, and the young man entered, attended by his friends, he and they alike dressed in gowns of deep purple satin, and hats of velvet or fur, the crowns covered with scarlet fringe, and surmounted by a crystal and gilt ball. Then appeared his brilliant, if not graceful, bride, half led and half supported by two motherly Chinese women in every-day dress, save for a broad bordering of gold-garnished azure satin on their large hanging sleeves.

A simple marriage service, partly from a Chinese version of the English Prayer Book, was performed by one who had befriended the bridegroom from his childhood, and trained him as a helper in his mission work. No ring was used, but Lee-sien-sang (Mr. Lee) made deep obeisance to the new-made Lee-niang-niang (Mrs. Lee) in native fashion, and then a joyously sung hymn concluded the ceremony.

Afterwards the bridegroom, with his native friends, partook of dinner, the women in a separate room, while the heroine of the day was conveyed to some retreat where the foreign lady visitors were privileged to see her enjoy some refreshment, the red veil now lifted from a very calm and contented countenance. Thankful she must have been for this merciful violation of Chinese etiquette, which would have prohibited her tasting food till the end of the day.

Finally the bridal pair, closely encased in sedan-chairs, adjourned to the home prepared by the husband hard by in the native city, where, as we have good reason to believe, a very happy and useful life awaits them.

ALICE JANE MUIRHEAD.



STEPHEN FLEMING'S PICTURE.

A STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

"Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit."

CHAPTER I.

"WELL, Laurie, what do you think of it?"

Laurence Fleming had been standing for a long time in silence before the big easel in his father's studio. A nearly finished painting lay thereon, the subject being "The Raising of Jairus's Daughter."

"I like it, dad! I do like it!" said nine-year-old Laurie, not removing his gaze from the two principal figures in the picture: the Saviour, who stood by the bedside, holding the girl's hand in His own with what one felt was a clasp both strong and tender; the child, her white face lifted, her eyes, newly opened from their death-sleep, fixed on His with answering love. "Tell me what it means! Who is that Man? and what is He doing?"

"His name is Jesus; and the girl is supposed to be the daughter of a great man called Jairus, whom Jesus, as the story goes, raised to life again after her death. It 's as good as a fairy tale, isn't it?"

"It doesn't exactly sound like a fairy tale," said Laurence, considering; "isn't it true?"

"Not more so than the fairy tales, Laurie. It is true that there once lived a Man called Jesus, a poor Man who lived in a poor town in an out-of-the-way part of the world; but it is not true that He ever raised the dead to life, or did any other of the wonderful things they have put down to His credit."

"Why have they put them down to His credit if He never did them?"

Stephen Fleming shrugged his shoulders and laughed.

"Human nature loves the marvellous," he said, forgetting the tender years of his interlocutor; "and the Man lived in a superstitious age. They believed in this kind of thing then, and afterwards even more blindly. But people are growing wiser now."

"Oh, I wish it was true!" exclaimed Laurence, whom the picture fascinated greatly; "for He looks so beautiful, father, so kind, as if He was so glad to make the little girl better!"

"I hope all my critics will be as easy to please as you are, my boy!" and Mr. Fleming laughed again.

"What have you put a gold ring round His head for?" Laurie asked next.

"Well, you see, Jesus—this poor Man (a carpenter He was)—fancied that He was God, or else others fancied it. The old masters always painted Him with a halo round His head, so, somehow, one falls into the absurd habit."

"Did the old masters believe Jesus was God?"

"Yes, for the most part."

"Does anybody believe it now?"

"Oh, yes! every superstition has its votaries."

"You don't, dad?"

"No, my boy."

Laurie heaved a deep sigh.

"I wish you did," he said simply, turning a pair of large, thoughtful blue eyes up to his father's face.

"Why, dear?"

"Because He looks so sweet and kind, and I love Him. I'd like to think He was God, and could make dead people alive again. I wish it was true! Don't you think, dad, that maybe—just maybe, you know—it is true?"

"I think everything is one great Maybe! But I don't want my dear little boy to grow up credulous and superstitious. Fairy tales are all very well for the age of ignorance, but afterwards only that which can be proved should be credible."

Mr. Fleming had a way of talking, half to himself, in language of which Laurie only caught the drift. Laurie was quite used to it.

"It makes people bad to believe in Jesus, does it?" he asked now. "Do you think that man that was hanged yesterday—I heard nurse telling cook about it—believed in Him?"

"It makes them no better, as a rule," said Mr. Fleming, ignoring the question of the criminal.

"Well, no; it couldn't, you know, if it isn't true! But, dad, you've made Him look so good! When you are out, and I wake in the dark—so frightened—I should like Him to hold my hand and look at me like that. And if I died, dad, you could have asked Him to come and make me alive again. But still," after a thoughtful pause, "there 's God. Nurse says He can do anything He wants; and if Jesus isn't God, still there is God, father."

"Listen to me, Laurie. There may, or there may not, be a God. If there is, we know nothing of Him. Nurse is both ignorant and disobedient, for I have forbidden her to talk to you on these subjects. Be content with this: that your own loving father is here, as I am content to know my darling little son's love and trust are mine. We shall always have each other. Now, go and play with your soldiers, laddie, and don't trouble your wee head with crazy old superstitions that ere long the world will have forgotten."

When the child had gone, Mr. Fleming took his brush and began to paint. He painted industriously for a little while, then stepped back a few paces to contemplate the effect.

"Strange the attraction that still remains about this single historical Figure," he mused; "that it should have such power to move hearts in this nineteenth century! I suppose there will ever be something attractive about genuine enthusiasm, however deceiving and deceived."

Again he worked a little in silence, and again lowered his brush, some new emotion breaking up the cynicism of his face.

"Oh, Laurie! Laurie! you hit your father very hard once!" he murmured aloud. "You have brought me back the memory of forgotten days—days when I too was a child, when I was taught—not to doubt, as your father is teaching you, but to believe."

As he spoke, the artist threw himself back in a chair and covered his eyes with his hands. Before him rose another picture: a pale, sweet-faced woman with a child seated on her knee—his mother and himself. The child had been listening in rapt attention to the "sweet story of old," and in the ears of the man his mother's long-silent voice seemed sounding just as it sounded then—

"'Yet still to His footstool in prayer I may go.'"

"Stephen, my own dear son, never forget those words," she said; "never forget that this same Jesus loves and blesses you now. Never forget to pray!"

No, it did not "make people bad to believe in Jesus!" For his mother had so believed with fullest, purest faith, and her life had been as nearly perfect as a human being's life can be.

His own life—the life of one far advanced beyond the age of ignorance and superstition—how black it showed against the whiteness of hers!

Stephen Fleming's heart softened involuntarily as he recalled the past. He heaved a deep sigh.

"It is impossible, of course! It is past belief; but, somehow, little Laurie has made me ready to echo his childish longing—'Oh, I wish it was true!'"

CHAPTER II.

STEPHEN FLEMING'S gentler mood did not last long. Indeed, he fought against it, and did his best to return to his old habit of contented unbelief. A man of sense cannot be taken in by fables, however pretty they may be. The cultivated intellect cannot feed on the food which is all-sufficient for women and children. Besides, what ridicule would be heaped on him by the sceptical circle of which he was no obscure member, if he should be found kneeling, or even wishing to kneel, at the feet of the poor Carpenter whom ignorance had made into a God!

Such were some of the thoughts by means of which he hardened his heart afresh.

He resolved that his son should never pass through the struggle between faith and unfaith that he himself had experienced.

"Laurence shall grow up into a man, not a fool!" said Stephen to one of his friends, who applauded the sentiment.

He spoke with proud assurance, thinking not at all of the history of one who disposed of the future in the same positive manner, and to whom it was said —"Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

Yet Stephen Fleming, the gifted artist, the logical thinker, was also to be proved a fool; was also to have his wise plans overthrown, his helplessness made apparent.

Though little Laurence was not robust, he was a healthy child, and had never known an ailment serious enough to cause anxiety. So that Stephen was not alarmed when nurse informed him, one day, that "Master Laurie was sickening for something." But when that "something" was pronounced to be scarlet fever, when the small, flushed face ceased to wear a smile in answer to his greeting, when the blue eyes looked on him as if he were a stranger, when the childish voice babbled deliriously or only moaned in pain—then the father's heart was like to break with an anguish of terror and despair—utterly helpless terror and despair! To himself it seemed an impossibility that, as he phrased it, "anything should happen" to his child—his one darling, the idol for whom he thought and toiled, and even existed. It seemed as if the very power of his love, the very passion of his anguish, must keep his treasure alive. But, alas! no love, no anguish, can do this.

"Love is strong as death—and death is strong!"

There is but one weapon that can be used against this enemy, and that Stephen could not use.

Day by day, and finally hour by hour, Laurie grew worse. The servants stole about their work with red eyes and bated breath. The doctor shook his head.

"It's all up with the poor little lad!" he said to the weeping nurse; "he won't last long now."

And the distracted father overheard the words.

"What—what do you mean?" he asked, seizing the doctor by the shoulders with unconscious fierceness. "He is not—dying?"

"He is dying," was the brief, sad answer.

Stephen staggered back with a groan that made nurse begin to weep afresh, while the doctor's own eyes grew dim.

The father tottered to the bedside. There, on its white pillows, lay the little white face, no longer moving restlessly to and fro, but deathly still, with half-closed eyelids and parched, parted lips. Not a word, not a glance for him who would have died to save that ebbing life!

For a moment Stephen gazed in silence, then he rushed wildly from the room.

"I can't bear it! I shall go mad!" he cried beneath his breath. "Oh! is there no help—no hope?"

Up and down the house he wandered, unable to rest anywhere; into the sick-room and out of it again, well-nigh frantic with the anguish that none could comfort.

The celebrated physician, who had been summoned in hot haste, came and went. He could do nothing; there was nothing to be done—but to wait for the end.

At last Stephen wandered into his studio, and there, facing him, lit up by the sunset, stood his finished picture. Almost it seemed an actual scene at which he gazed with dry, despairing eyes: the child's face bright with love and trust, even though still pale with death; the incredulous rapture of the father and mother; the calm, quiet Figure "with the glory-crownèd hair," so gentle, so human, so almighty to help, smiling tenderly at the young girl whom His voice had called back to earth and earthly ties. "One only daughter, and she lay a-dying;" and the artist had one only son who lay dying too. But there was nobody who could restore him to life!

There was a strange, passionate bitterness in Stephen's thoughts as he gazed at his picture—the picture Laurie had loved so much. Distinctly he seemed to hear a little, earnest voice saying, "He looks so sweet and kind, and I love Him. I 'd like to think He was God, and could make dead people alive again. I wish it was true! Don't you think, dad, that maybe—just maybe, you know—it is true?"

A child's words only, only a child's unquestioning love and innocent groundless faith; and yet, maybe, the pure, unworldly instinct could apprehend that which worldly-wise logic had no power to grasp.

"Whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

Maybe—just maybe—it was true.

Stephen's heart began to beat wildly.

"Oh! if all that was written of this Man were true, surely He would come now to the help of a father more desolate than the ruler of old! No help but the help of One who could control life and death could avail now. And yet—Stephen could not believe; the long habit of incredulity bound him still. No, no; it was a beautiful tale, but wholly impossible!

Once more that little voice seemed to plead: "Don't you think, dad, that maybe—just maybe—it is true?"

With a short, suppressed cry, Stephen fell on his knees and hid his face in his hands.

"Oh! I can't, I can't believe! but if Thou canst help—if Thou hearest me—pity me! Help my unbelief! Give me back my child! give me back my child!"

A moment longer he knelt speechlessly there; then he rose feebly, and tried to smile at his own agony. He felt curiously weak and shaken, but calmer, and almost ashamed of the momentary impulse which had broken down the philosophical reasoning, the mature decision, of years, and shown him that after all, in spite of himself, he really believed in the existence of Him whom he had denied.

He went heavily back to Laurie's room. At the door he was met by Dr. Grey in a state of unusual excitement.

Then once again the sceptic fell on his knees, but this time to cry, with tears, from the depths of a broken and contrite heart, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief!"

* * * * * *

Stephen Fleming neither exhibited nor sold his picture. With Laurie's glad consent, he presented it to a large public hospital, where it remains to this

"'Tell me what it means! Who is that man?'"—p. 754.

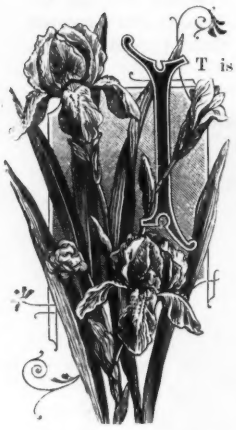
"I was coming to look for you, Fleming," exclaimed he, speaking below his breath, but hurriedly; "your little son has taken a turn, and, please God, he will be spared to you now. It's almost a miracle, but——"

Putting the good man aside, Stephen hastened to the bed. There lay the small, wan face, faintly smiling. The sunken eyes met his haggard gaze with all their old intelligent love, and, "Dad!" breathed a weak voice, "dad! I'm better!"

day, teaching its silent lesson to rich and poor, to young and old. Beneath the painting, on the lower part of the frame, these words are printed:—

"Be Thou our great Deliverer still,
Thou Lord of life and death;
Restore and quicken, soothe and bless,
With Thine almighty breath;

"To hands that work, and eyes that see,
Give wisdom's heavenly lore,
That whole and sick, and weak and strong,
May praise Thee evermore."



S. W.

THE HYMNS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

IV.—THE HYMN OF THE VICTORS.

(Revelation xv.)

It is ever to be lamented that good men and ingenious have spent more time in discussing the chronology and the historical allusions of the Apocalypse than in trying to discover its perennial lessons for the spiritual life. One idea is continuously forced upon those who read it, not for the purpose of predicting the destiny of the Russian Empire, but for elevating and purifying their own existence; and the idea is this, that the scenes described from chapter to chapter are being always enacted in some portion of the Church, and that similar visions may be witnessed, likewise, in the struggles and triumphs of individual souls. Whatever may be the full relation of the book to the nations of the earth, there can be no doubt of its relation to every Christian by himself. And while this thought intensifies its interest, it ennobles its study by withdrawing the mind from questions which agitate to facts which deepen faith, and nerve and gladden the strength and courage of the soul. It is chiefly in this light that we are considering the Hymns of Heaven.

After the magnificent chorus of the angels, saints, and elders, there passes a remarkable series of pictures. The Loud Voice breaks out with a clearness of articulation which none can mistake, and tells the triumph of Christ and the saints. The calumniator of the brethren was cast out from heaven, and the contest—decided in the celestial battle—is transferred to the earth. Forthwith there comes a vision, no longer of the dragon, but of an earthly power—a Beast bearing a combined resemblance to the grace of the leopard, the strength of the lion, and the brutality and coarseness of the bear. It may well represent to us the difference between refined sin, physical passion, and base sensuality; while, at the same time, it proves these to be absolutely one in the sight of God. They are the worship of the Beast or of his image: they are each deadly sin.

And just so soon as this vision is witnessed, behold there is another; for the Lamb stands on Mount Zion to assert the rights and sustain the cause of the saints. It is the visible fulfilment of the old promise, that He will be always and everywhere with His Church; and it is the old prophetic promise which has poured its peace into many a dying soul, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee." Then arises—whether as a distant sound of the battle we are not told—the surge of multitudinous waters as when the mighty deeps of huge Atlantic are whelmed together, and the roar and peal of thunder as though the firmament were enveloped in fatal strife. But above them all—heard as it has been ever heard by the ears which God has attuned—swells the clear melody of a divine song, and the pulsations of music from divine harps.* Indefinite as is the noise of the waters, more indefinite still is the hymn. It has never come to mortal ears. No mortal memory could carry its accents or learn its words. It has been sung, and is I, suppose, a-singing now, and yet man knows it not. For there are heights of spiritual attainment, and knowledge and perception, when the foot, heavy with the plodding toil of the impure under-world, grows faint; and the head, filled only with bills and profits of earth, grows dizzy and reels. It is the pure alone who can learn and sing that song; they that are claimed early for God and bear His impress from youth to age, and feel in the desire for holiness the dominating passion of life. It is they who, through grace, have attained, and who have learnt to sing the unknown song.

The vision broadens yet. Event follows upon the heel of event.† Three angels appear in the midst of heaven. The first is the minister of the Gospel, addressed to every man, in every place, of every kind. The second declares the ruin of sin even when it is upheld by empire and enriched with prosperity and splendour. The third denounces the certainty of judgment which, unmixed, untempered, and unassuaged, will be poured upon all who bend in service or in fear before the world, and before its fascinating influences and seductive shapes. First of God's messengers is the Gospel, last of them is wrath. The Gospel is His own, the wrath lies within the changeless nature of God's law of perfect justice. It is a law as natural and vigorous as the laws which keep the planets in their course. But all this would need a supplement, did not a voice—that is unattached to any person, and seems to issue from the very centre of heaven—declare the eternal blessedness of the saintly dead. Quiet they are, and at rest in Paradise, where cold winds sweep not, nor tempests break; where no sun beats with torrid rays, nor drenching showers fall; where the passions of sin are never heard, the anxieties of earth never touch; but in peace and blessedness they all await the final triumph of the Great Day, the Harvest Day of Christ. For instantly another angel addressed Him whose throne was the sunlit cloud, and bade Him reap the whole of the autumn fields of earth. This is the eternal security of God's children. Every work—every grape, and every standing ear—is gathered in; the weak ones and the strong, the slow-ripening fields and the hillsides that drank the colour of the golden sun; the scattered stalks under the shadowing trees, and the rich full shocks of the central plain. Oh, never did they reap so gladly the wheat in the fields of Esdraelon; and never did a Joshua or Caleb bear from any earthly Eshcol such clusters of luscious grapes as the angels gathered then.

Is it not to be expected that the plagues of earth are nearing their close; and that while the sad-faced angels which bear them stand in the background, the whole front of the next vision is filled with those who are thus taken home?* They stand not as the Israelite victors stood, upon the verge of a Red Sea that would soon cast upon its beach the dead of horses and men, but in the very midst of a lustrous sea of glass. It was, as now and then is seen upon our English coasts, when every wind is at rest, and the spring tide has borne its burden to the height, while all the time the noon of July pours full upon it, and the light is gleaming, not from dimpled waves, but the wide unbroken sweep of expanded waters, and all their depth is shot with kindly flame: when there is > "Such a tide as moving seems asleep,

> Too full for sound and foam,
> When that which drew from out the boundless deep > Turns again home."

So full and deep is the tide upon that other shore; and full and deep is the mighty voice of triumph which bursts from tongue and stricken harp amongst the conquerors.

I. Who were they that sang? It is a question of moment for men still. That sea of glory, shall we stand upon it? Can we be uplifted above the worry, the shocks, and the struggles of earth to join the saints? Shall we hold in resurrection hand a harp like theirs, and sing with their gladness and joy? On their very front they bear their history; for like ourselves they were once mingled with the temptations and battles of the world. They have come fresh from them. Could we behold their history in God's Book, we should see the account of their sorrows and resistance, their hopes clouded or crushed, and their steadfastness and faith quailing and all but quenched. Man is man the world through, and no temptation or trial has touched us with its polluting finger which did not touch them. The image of the Beast and the varied semblances of sins, had presented themselves to their minds. The stamp of indulged desire, of unrestrained passion, of selfishness and mean thoughts, of untruth and cowardice, of unmanliness and impurity, was heated ready for their brows and backs as it is for ours. The relation of the forms of sin and low spiritual life to the unprotesting or applauding world was a matter to be settled in the arithmetic of their lives too. The number of the Beast† is sometimes a swelling magnitude, always a perfected and enticing product in the computation of earth. Public opinion, now elevated into a moral law as high in authority and terrible in sanction as that of Horeb, had to be counted with and opposed by them as by us. The morals of their age had to be avoided as a test or guide, and they, as we, had to rise higher than material interests, and explode, with the stout breath of earnestness and sincerity, the bubbles which, though hollow and worthless, were radiant under the worldly sun. They had come victorious from the Beast and from his image, and from his mark and from the number of his name.*

The essence of their triumph lay in this—that they had educated themselves to look upon the permanent relation of things. The tendency that always tempts us is to see only the confined and narrow relations that are close about us. Hence there are some who never behold the shape of a cloud, or the glory of a sunset. They think only upon the daily occupation of hand and head, and their converse with their friends embraces no greater theme. But the true mind, disciplined by a sanctified will, grows accustomed to think in a wider range, and to conjure to his imagination nobler shapes of life. Beyond the glare of the present, he sees the brightness of another life, and the reality of another world. He feels that this existence is but a fraction of the future—a little pulsation in the long existence of immortality. He is continually applying the standard of eternal life to the fragmentary portions of existence on earth. His soul travails no doubt, but he has a noble reward. For the fool, sated with selfishness and sensuality, grows a heartless, grumbling pessimist—a plague to friends and to himself: but the cultured saint, lofty in ideal, honest and true in thought and action and aim, is one > "Of those that eye to eye shall look

> On knowledge, under whose command
> Is earth and earth's; and in their hand
> Is nature like an open book."

Such is the aspiration of material science and research; and such the prospect and assurance of the saint of God.

II. See, too, the subject and the value of their Song. Like nearly every hymn in this Book, it tells of the works of God. It is not silent upon the judgments that are seen, nor upon the sorrows and failures of men; but it looks to the One Hand that is powerful, and it asserts that all the works which are done by God are just works and true.

There is a sense in which we can clearly see this ourselves, for we can distinguish between the operation and the result. There is a solvent with God for the issues of human deeds. Man works while God overrules. God's methods or ways are just. However much of unevenness there be amongst us, and apparent injustice—the wicked reaping good, and the good recompensed only with mishap—yet the long sum of no life is yet made up. We cannot judge our own existence by a single day; and we are absolutely helpless when we attempt to judge the existence of others. Centuries of investigation have been heaped upon centuries; books beyond counting have been written: but, notwithstanding, we are still like children gazing curiously at a great machine, and our conclusions and theories are like heaps of shifting sand upon a forsaken shore.

* Rev. xiv. 13.

† Rev. xiii. 18: "His number is six hundred threescore and six."

* Rev. xv. 2.

III. Behold the prospect they hold out. (1) It is a prospect of advancing holiness to themselves. "Thou only art holy," they cry. Let it be assumed that absolute holiness is the goal of sainthood, and that the saints will surely reach it, then it follows from this ascription that there are huge stages of advancement for the saint in paradise to climb even yet. Though enwrapt within eternal blessedness, there are long distances, we will not say of purity, but of attainments, which they may yet tread. Is this an echo of the "many mansions"* of the Gospel of St. John? Is immortality, then, a range and region of perpetual progress? Are we not to lie down in it and sleep, and let the great worlds of a renewed universe wheel round unthought of and unobserved? The whole of the Book says, No. It speaks of endless activity; of mightier attempts and more glorious achievements than we dared to conceive on the earth: of ceaseless efforts towards a glad success. (2) As to the progress of earth. "All nations," they say, "shall come and worship before Thee." Looking back upon many centuries since, and seeing the course of nations that have lived and died, and of those that still survive, we cannot but feel that these words gave a rude shock to those who looked for an immediate return of our Lord; and rebuke our modern readiness to declare that the end of the present order of things is certainly near. Better is it, however, not to speculate upon the unknown, but to turn to that which is indicated here of actual and possible. Out of the present actual world there is constantly springing, hour by hour, another world, which in its turn begets a fresh condition of things; for nothing sleeps, and events are never still. The prophecy in this light is inspired with force and fruit. There is a progress of the nations, and therefore of those who compose the nations, distinctly foretold. For worship is the condition of progress, development, and advancement. The nation, as the man, which has ceased to worship, has ceased to grow. Ideals then are lost or dissolved. The higher is unattained because there is no vision of the Highest. Energy and strength became puerile and decrepit because we lose faith in the Everlasting Strong. But where worship is real, unflagging, and unabused, where nations can see the Eternal One that sits upon His throne, and hear the hymns that swell from lips of brothers who have fought the good fight of faith, and by the might of Christ have won, there is the guarantee of national principles that will not be cheaply sold, of national stability that challenges and defies assault, and of national progress that expands and strengthens because it has learnt that there is a rhythm and sweetness in the life which has shaped itself to the changeless law, and an articulate gladness and glory which issues from the cross of self-denial and sacrifice. Such, it seems to us, is the burden of the hymn which they sang—the Song of Moses, the servant of God, and the Song of the Lamb.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

AUGUST 17TH. THE TEN LEPERS.

To read—St. Luke xvii. 11—19. Golden Text—Verse 17.

THE LEPERS' NEED. (11—13.) Remind how St. Luke in this Gospel shows our Lord's human nature, especially in showing sympathy with cases of sickness and suffering. Also of His dealings with those not Jews. So now mentions His blessing to a Samaritan. Who were the Samaritans?

Brought originally from Babylon by the Assyrian kings (2 Kings xvii. 24), intermingled with survivors of Israelites after dispersion of the Ten Tribes. Not allowed to assist Jews in rebuilding the Temple, became their bitter adversaries. (Ezra iv. 1—5.) Enmity kept up to time of Christ. (St. John iv. 9.) Visited by Him, which gained Him the scornful name of Samaritan. (St. John viii. 48.)

Now one of them, a leper, with nine Jewish lepers, meets Christ. Question on leprosy.

It was infectious. Lepers must live apart.

It was progressive—spread over whole body.

It was incurable by ordinary means.

Notice their appeal to Christ. It showed—

Urgency—cried aloud, lest He pass unheeding.

Sense of need—"have mercy on us."

Faith in Christ's power to heal—"Jesus" (Saviour).

Point out how typical all this of a sinner's state.

Sin is infectious—"All have sinned." (Rom. iii. 23.)

Sin is progressive—"the whole head sick and the whole heart faint." (Is. i. 5.)

Sin is incurable—"thou hast destroyed thyself." (Hos. xiii. 9.)

And the sinner's prayer must simply be, "Lord, save me, or I perish."

II. THE LEPERS' CURE. (14.) Told to use the appointed means. (Lev. xiii. 2.) They believed, obeyed, and were cured.

"The lifeboat was slowly making her way through the surf to the shore."

"WHAT DAVID LOCKETT DARED."—p. 791.

Remind of Naaman told to wash in Jordan. (2 Kings v. 14.)

In both cases cure at once as reward of faith.

How does this apply to the sinner's need?

What means of grace can he use?

By faith must believe on Him. (Rom. v. 1.)

By prayer must go to Him. (St. Matt. vii. 7.)

By God's ministers hear of Him. (Acts xvi. 30.)

By God's Word may read of Him. (Ch. xvi. 31.)

Thus hearing, coming, believing, may be saved.

III. THE LEPER'S GRATITUDE. (15—19.) All cured—one returned thanks. Notice about him—

A Samaritan—imperfectly taught about God.

Showed fullest faith by his worship, humility by his action, gratitude by his words.

Received special blessing from Christ.

Came for bodily cure, received also spiritual.

So Christ gives to believing soul more than he asks.

He healeth all diseases and forgiveth all sins. (Ps. ciii. 3.)

What shall we render unto the Lord for all His benefits?

Present bodies a living sacrifice. (Rom. xii. 1.)

AUGUST 24TH. PREVAILING PRAYER.

To read—St. Luke xviii. 1—14. Golden Text—ver. 14.

I. UNCEASING PRAYER. (1—8.) All Christ's parables taught some special lesson.

Prodigal son taught how prayer for pardon brings forgiveness.

Rich man and Lazarus—that now is the time to seek for mercy.

This parable—not to grow tired of praying.

Two persons to notice—

1. The widow—poor, friendless, wronged.

Meets with difficulties, delays, disappointments.

But is patient, persevering, persistent.

2. The judge—is unrighteous towards God—not fearing Him.

Unjust towards men—not doing his duty.

Perhaps like Samuel's sons taking bribes.

At last hears the case to save himself from being troubled so often.

What does this parable teach about God?

(a) He is the Judge of the world.

Sometimes in this life punishes wrong-doing; e.g., Destruction of Sodom. (Gen. xix.)

Sometimes also rewards righteous; e.g., blessings to Abraham. (Gen. xvii. 8.)

Will at last judge all by Christ. (Acts xvii. 31.)

(b) The nature of God's judgment.

It is certain. Delights to hear. (Ps. xxxiv. 15.)

It is just. Must always do right. (Gen. xviii. 25.)

It is helpful. Will defend cause of His people.

What do we learn for ourselves?

1. Pray always. Answer will come though delayed.

2. Pray earnestly, as St. Peter's friends did for him in prison. (Acts xii. 5.)

II. HUMBLE PRAYER. (9—14.) 1. Resemblance between the Pharisee and Publican.

Both Jews—God's favoured people.

Both used to Temple worship, daily sacrifices.

Both wished to pray—thought were so doing.

Both went away satisfied—one from himself, the other from God.

2. Contrast the two.

(a) Notice their manner—

The Pharisee—proud in spirit, loud in voice, public in position, prominent before people.

The Publican, humble in mind, lowly in voice, retiring in position.

(b) Notice the prayers—

The Pharisee—no prayer at all; simply a boast; a contrast between himself and the publican.

The Publican. All the elements of true prayer. Confession of sin, faith in God, prayer for pardon.

What was the result?

Pharisee came as a sinner—returned the same.

Publican confessed his sin—was pardoned.

LESSONS. 1. Must feel sins, or prayer useless.

2. Must confess sins, or prayer worthless.

3. Our God will abundantly pardon.

AUG. 31ST. ENTERING THE KINGDOM.

To read—St. Luke xviii. 15—30. Golden Text—verse 17.

I. CHILDREN BLESSED. (15—17.) A touching scene. Infants brought to Christ by parents. Why?

That He might pray for them. (St. Matt. xix. 13.)

That He might touch them; i.e., put His hands on them in blessing.

Remind of Jacob's blessing his sons. (Gen. xlix.)

Who wanted to keep them back from Christ? Why? Perhaps disciples thought—

Christ too great to be troubled by children—or

Did not like others to come too near their Master.

But what did Christ do?

Stooped to take the children from their parents.

Took them up in His arms of love.

Put His hands upon them in blessing.

Spake loving words of welcome.

Told how such as they shall enter His Kingdom.

Warned those who would keep them from Him.

LESSONS. 1. The blessing of bringing to Christ.

2. The blessing of being brought to Christ.

3. The danger of keeping any back, by bad example or influence.

4. The blessing of a childlike nature—meek, trustful, gentle.

II. A RULER UNBLESSED. (18—30.) Ruler (or lawyer) asks very proper question. Asks question of Christ as Teacher only—calls Him "good." Christ tells him that God alone is good—meaning that he must look to Him as God.

Notice Christ's answer. God's law must be kept.

But he declares he has always done right. What then was wanting?

Has been leading selfish life—living for self—spending his money only for self. What does Christ require him to do?

Sell all his property and give to the poor.

Follow Christ in His poverty and self-denial.

Then should find his treasure reserved in heaven.

Alas! the test too severe—he went away sorrowful and unblessed.

See the lesson which Christ draws—

Riches a snare. He that trusts in his riches shall fall. (Prov. xi. 28.)

Abraham was rich, but remained faithful.

But Judas out of love of money betrayed Christ.

So it is hard but not impossible for rich to be saved.

What makes it possible? Two things—

(a) God's grace in the present. Examples—

St. Matthew—rich publican—left all to follow Christ. (Ch. v. 28.)

Early Christians sold possessions. (Acts iv. 34.)

Apostles gave up all for Christ.

(b) Hope of glory in the future. What does Christ promise?

More in this life—as Job, who received double. (Job xlii. 10.)

Everlasting life in the world to come.

LESSONS. 1. Nothing must be allowed to keep back from Christ.

2. Bear the cross, wear the crown.

SEPT. 7TH. JESUS AND ZACCHÆUS THE PUBLICAN.

To read—St. Luke xix. 1—10. Golden Text—verse 10.

LAST lesson told of a ruler who could not give up his money to follow Christ. This tells of a publican who could.

I. THE PUBLICAN'S WISH. (1—4.) (a) The place—Jericho, first city taken by Israelites. Curse pronounced on anyone who should rebuild it. (Josh. vi. 26.) Fulfilled in time of King Ahab. (1 Kings xvi. 34.) Noted for its flourishing palm-trees. Many publicans (or tax-collectors) there under Zacchæus the superintendent of taxes.

(b) The occasion—Christ just healed blind beggar Bartimæus. Vast crowd had assembled—accompanied Christ through the city.

(c) The man—a publican, hated and despised by the Jews because in the pay of the Romans, their conquerors, and also because of their extortions. Gained their riches by grinding the poor.

Zacchæus—short in stature—climbed up a tree (Egyptian fig-tree, with broad, spreading branches). Why did he do so? Perhaps out of curiosity to see this wonderful Man.

II. THE PUBLICAN'S VOW. (5—10.) What happened?

Christ drew near and unexpectedly stopped.

Christ saw him, and called to him to come down.

Christ proposed a visit to his house.

How did Zacchæus take the proposal?

Eagerly—made haste to come down and receive Him.

Joyfully—he gave Him a hearty welcome.

Openly—so that all knew what he was doing.

Hospitably—gave Him the best he could.

But others were present—what did they think? Murmured against Christ. Why? Because He who professed to be so holy went as guest to a man notorious for wrong-doing. Did not understand Christ's mission to sinners.

The feast went on—Christ taught as usual.

Now a strange and unexpected thing happens.

Zacchæus stands and makes confession. Notice—

It is public—because his sin has been notorious.

It is thorough—tells of his sins of commission—injustice, and of omission of duty to the poor.

It is practical—he will restore fourfold for what he has done wrong.

It is sincere—accepted by Christ, who knew secrets of all hearts. What is the result?

Zacchæus the publican is converted.

Salvation has come to him and his house.

Christ is shown to all as a Saviour of the lost.

LESSONS. 1. The manliness of true repentance. A changed life should be seen and known by all.

2. True faith is shown by its works.

SEPT. 14TH. PARABLE OF THE POUNDS.

To read—St. Luke xix. 11—27. Golden Text—verse 26.

I. THE OCCASION. (Verse 11.) Christ on His way to Jerusalem. Number of His followers increasing. Rich publican just joined His service. Many mistakes as to nature of His Kingdom. Some thought He would now at once show Himself openly as a King—rescue Jerusalem from the Romans—restore the kingdom to Israel. (Acts i. 6.)

Therefore this parable spoken to show that—

1. His Kingdom was a heavenly and not an earthly one.

2. His Kingdom would not be manifested at present.

3. Much to be done first by His subjects.

II. THE PARABLE. (12—24). A nobleman with many servants.

Leaves servants while goes to receive a kingdom.

Promises to return at future but uncertain time.

Gives servants money to trade with during his absence.

Notice about this trading—

(a) All received equal amount.

(b) All expected to make profit of what they had.

(c) All knew that an account would be required.

For some reason his fellow-citizens hated him.

Refused to submit to him when he should return.

At last came back—having received the kingdom.

The reckoning-day comes—each has to give account.

(a) One has gained ten pounds—shall be ruler over ten cities.

(b) One has gained five—shall rule five.

(c) A third has done nothing—made no effort—gained nothing.

What is his excuse? The King demands what is not his. Any gain they may choose to win is theirs, not his.

What is the King's answer? The money is his—ought to have been placed out at profit. Must now be forfeited altogether, and given to the faithful one.

No honour to this wicked and slothful servant.

His enemies also to be utterly destroyed.

III. THE MEANING. The nobleman is Christ.

He gives gifts to His servants to use.

Some gifts given to all equally. What are they?

Hands to work for Christ.

Time to use, and influence to exert for Christ.

These to be used, improved upon, during His absence.

He has gone to be crowned with many crowns.

His return certain, but time of it uncertain.

Each must then give account of his own works.

What shall we have to show?

A life spent, like St. Paul's, in His service?

Or time, money, influence, all wasted?

No doubt as to what the end must be. Either—Joy, happiness, honour and glory for ever: or—"Depart from me; I never knew you."

Which shall it be for us?

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

RIPE for the harvest, fair and still
Beneath the brooding light,
Far over valley, plain, and hill,
The fields lie broad and white.

Lord, for the seed Thy love has sown,
What harvest ready stands!
We would not offer Thee alone
Our empty hearts and hands!

Hands filled with happy toil for Thee—
Hearts where sweet graces bloom,
With inward purity to see
Thy face, and make Thee room—

This living harvest we would bring,
For all Thy mercies given,
Fit for the holy gathering
And harvest-home of Heaven!

CHAPTER V.

A DAY AT RAYLINGTON.

"May is come, and in her hand
All the blossoms of the land!"—S. BROOKE.

WHEN the whole land was gay with cowslips and buttercups, and laburnums and lilacs overhung all the sweet country paths, away to the very heart of the summer beauty Mr. Dobson carried in his great roomy wagonette the whole Ansley brigade, with Theodora. Of course, the boys were off to the river the first thing after dinner, and Alice with them. Maggie and Polly indulged their romantic propensities by stealing away to gaze afar off at the Castle glories. The entrances were closed and the windows shut, but their vivid imaginations were more than equal to the task of peopling the silent terraces, where the peacocks strutted in the empty sunshine, with noble lords and ladies gay. Maud went on her rounds with a willing dairymaid. And Theodora, having left Beth quite comfortably settled under the charge of a kindly farm-maiden, strayed away alone, feeling an almost rapturous delight in every leaf and flower, and the wealth of long lush grass which foretold the meadow and the hayfield. She came to a small plantation where the path wound in amongst the trees amidst tangled ivy trails. The wee blue speedwell peeped up gaily amongst the dark shining ivy leaves, great clumps of the brilliant nightshade made vivid spots of colour in the undergrowth, and presently she came upon a stretch of wood-anemones in full blossom—belated flowers these, with their lovely frond-like foliage green upon the sturdy pink stems. Then a belt of blue-bells reaching to the very bank where the plantation ended, and Theodora came out above a narrow valley, where a tiny brook ran purling over the stones below. Little arrow-like white clouds went drifting across the radiant blue of the sky, and the gorse upon the hillside beneath her was one glowing mass of scent and colour, bracken ferns pushing up their pale green curled fronds underneath its sheltering thorns. A wild apple-tree down by the brookside was pink with blossom, showing out richly against the dull foliage of a belt of pines. To the right the vivid green of beeches mingled with the yet bare stems of an oak plantation. Everywhere the birds sang with the full rapture of the early summer in their song: a lark overhead, lost in the blue; a thrush swaying upon the topmost branches of the crab-tree half-way down the slope; a wood-pigeon away in the cool depths of the wood; a willow-wren out of sight in the bushes by the brook. Theodora sank down in restful happiness upon a mossy trunk. Presently she took a letter from her pocket and read it. It was long and closely written:—

"'Why are you here alone, Theodora?'"—p. 767.

"My Dear Theodora.—

"It just occurred to me to-day that your birthday comes some time in April or May. I was not sure which; but upon reference to your father's letters I was shocked to realise that you are now twenty-five. You left me and my home in the most self-willed way when you were only eighteen. I never supposed your obstinacy would have lasted all these years. May I ask what you are doing? How have you wasted these, the very best years of a woman's life? My affection and entreaties availed nothing, because when a child you had made some ridiculous promise to your father. Your mother knows as well as any woman I ever met how to take care of herself. However, into that subject I shall not enter, as it is, and has always been, to me a thoroughly distasteful one."

The letter fell from the girl's hands while she remembered just how that promise had been made. A Sunday evening in drear, dark November, when the bells were ringing for evening service, and the straight cold rain kept falling, falling into the street. She was at the window looking out; there was nothing to see save the cabs rolling past beyond the glimmering pavement, and the people hurrying by under the dim glare of the gas-lamps, when someone came, and led her to her father. She remembered—it was one of the life-pictures which she never could forget—the wan white face upon the pillow, and the worn hands stretched to her, and the low tender voice that whispered, "You will always be mamma's own brave little daughter, and help her, and love her. And you will take care of Harold, too: he is such a little fellow, Theo." He knew—child as she was—that he could trust her, and that she would keep the charge he gave her. The next day a low damp fog had shrouded all the city, and they told the child that her father was dead. Even now she remembered the choking anguish which she could tell to none. Had he indeed gone so far away that her sorrow might not reach him?

"Have you had enough of your present existence in your stepfather's tumble-down towers? I cannot imagine it a very congenial life to one brought up as you have been. If so, my house is open, as it always has been, to my brother's child. I am a proud woman, as perhaps you know, and it costs me a good deal to ask you to return when at your own desire you chose to leave me. I am fond of you, Theodora, and I am lonelier and older than when you left me. It is a downright sin for you to bury yourself as you are doing in that village. If you like, I shall engage the services of some competent woman to attend upon the little crippled girl you tell me of. You know that I can do nothing for you after my death, as my money reverts to my husband's family, and anything I possess I intend to bequeath to Harold to make up to him for the losses he has sustained during his unprotected minority, poor lad! But a home I will give you, and all that you can possibly desire. I purpose passing the summer in Germany, and the winter in Algiers. If you will accompany me, please come to town at once, and let us see about your outfit.—Your affectionate aunt, "FLORENCE D'ALBERT."

Some years before, Mrs. Ansley had been seriously ill, and then it had been that Theodora had decided to come home to live. Her mother was long in recovering, and then, when the sad discovery about little Beth's helpless state was made, Theodora felt that here and now was the time to fulfil her promise to her father—one of the baby twins always crowing and laughing and stretching its rosy limbs, and the other always white and silent and motionless. Out of the girl's great pity for the small helpless life had grown a great love, and she could not leave the child to certain misery and neglect. The struggle had been sore, and Mrs. D'Albert angered beyond the power of words to soothe, while no one but Theodora knew the long days of heartsick revolt against her own decision she had come through. She looked round her now; the visible world before her seemed thrilling and pulsing with hope. How blue the sky, and how faint and far-off the silvery fleet of clouds, how golden the gorse, how sweet the song of the streamlet! Should she stay, or should she go? Having put her hand to the plough, should she look back? Her aunt's letter had roused again the old strife between self and duty.

The lark had gone far out of sight into the blue, a soft breeze clustered all the gorse together into a cloud of gold; on a distant road a heavy cart rolled, the sound of its wheels mingling with the wood-pigeon's contented murmur. No—she could not leave the child. No earthly scene would be bright if between her and it came the memory of Beth's suffering, questioning eyes. "Did you then leave me, Theodora, just to go away and be happy yourself, when you knew I had nothing but you in all this world?"

Far down the valley by the brookside her eyes fell upon a moving figure. At first she supposed it was Mr. Dobson, then saw it was a much younger man. As he came into sight from under the trees, she perceived that this was no farm-labourer or country yokel—a tall, athletic figure, dressed in a light summer suit. A tourist, perhaps, only tourists never came here. Not a visitor at the Castle, for it was closed. Presently he crossed the stream, and began to climb up the slanting path worn by the cattle in the soft earth of the hillside as they went down to the water in the evening.

Theodora's colour began to come and go strangely, as she watched him come up the hill. She should know him among a thousand, as he came on with free and steady stride. Had the hands of the dial gone back? Was this an Alpine slope, where forget-me-nots and oxlips blossomed thickly? Would he know her? Had he long since forgotten her very existence? Was she so changed that, looking on her, he should not recognise her? He was near enough now to see her. "Theodora!" he said, and sprang to her with outstretched hands.

Theodora rose and silently put her hands in his. Neither of them spoke one word.

How is it the world can hold such happiness and still roll on? How could the lark sing so rapturous a song, and not grow faint and fall to earth? The soft wind kissed the pink apple-bloom, the wide sweet wings of the summer had opened, and upon them had come this perfect joy.

"Theodora," he said, and held her hands as if never could he let them go again. The girl's face flushed and paled, and presently her brown eyes drooped beneath his gaze, and she drew away her hands from the close clasp in which he held them.

"You have not forgotten me, Theodora?" he said softly. "I remember the day I saw you last. It was a day just like to-day. I remember how blue the lake was as I went up the hill to say good-bye to you. It seems now as if I had died, and that this is the new world where I have found you. Oh, Theodora! how happy I am to look upon your face again! . . .

"Have you been happy in the years since then?" he asked her, after they had stood lost in a long silence which spoke more than many words. "You have suffered, I can see; has the world been hard to you? I used to dream that nothing hard or sad could ever come near you. Are you married?" he asked, with an abrupt change of manner, turning towards her.

"No," she said quietly, seating herself again upon the mossy tree-trunk.

"And your aunt—is she dead?"

"No."

He came and sat down near her. "Then why are you here alone, Theodora? and why do your eyes look so sad? and why is your dress like this?" and he touched the coarse homespun gown that she wore.

"Nothing is as it used to be," she said gently. "I live at Drueling, with my mother."

"At Drueling!" he repeated in evident amazement. You live at Drueling! Why, Theodora, is it possible?"

"Yes," she said, smiling. "What is so strange in that, Mr. Sarsfeld?"

Before he could reply the voices and laughter of the children came to them. They were calling Theodora. Sarsfeld jumped to his feet.

"Who are these?" he asked hastily.

"My sisters, looking for me. We are spending the day at the Home Farm. Will you not join us at tea? Mr. Dobson will be delighted to see any friend of mine."

"Dobson! The duke's steward!"

"Yes."

"They must none of them see me. Please do not say to anyone you met me," he exclaimed hurriedly. "Where shall I see you again?"

"Our house is in the village. Anyone will show it you: it is directly opposite Dr. Harden's, and everyone knows where he lives."

He stared at her an instant; then, without a word, he turned and ran lightly down the hill-side, and gained the shelter of the plantation before the girls caught sight of Theodora's grey gown, and bore down upon her. Alice flung her arms round Theodora's neck, and kissed her as if they had been parted for years.

"Tea is ready," said Maggie, "and we've been looking for you this long time. What a pity you hadn't sweet William to keep you company in this romantic spot."

"It's all nonsense," said Alice, who loved to constitute herself her sister's defender, "to go on at Theo about that William man. I asked him the other day did he really want to marry her, and he only sniffed and looked silly, so I am sure he doesn't, so now!"

A diversion was created by Maud's sharp eyes discovering a pocket-book lying in the grass. Maud was the member of the family who always did see everything, and prided herself on the faculty.

"Give me that at once!" cried Theodora, seizing it from her without any more dignity than if she were a school-girl like themselves.

"Do come along. Tea will be cold. And Vincent fell into the river, and Alfred had to fish him out, and they 're both as wet as wet," cried Polly, breathlessly. "I expect they 'll die."

"Oh, I do not think they will," said Theodora, laughing.

CHAPTER VI.

OTHER DAYS.

"When on the sunlight fell a sudden gloom,
As when a cloud arises full of rain."—CAVAZZA.

ALMOST at dawn the next morning Theodora rose, and dressed noiselessly. When she drew back the blind from the little casement, the garden lay before her, wan in the early light; the fruit-trees, thick with blossom, looked cold and pale. There was absolute silence within the house. Beth lay sleeping peacefully in her small bed, the dark lashes lying heavily upon the waxen pallor of her face. The awakening birds under the eaves were making a feeble little chirping outside.

Was it not then a dream? Had she indeed met him again after these long years? He was hardly changed. Somewhat graver and more manly he looked, but on the whole the years had touched him lightly. Still the same frank fearless bearing, the radiant laughter-loving eyes. He had spoken to her, and held her hands in his strong true clasp. It had been like an hour snatched from out of the old life, when she had known him long ago. She had been only seventeen when first she met him in Germany. Mrs. D'Albert had been taken by his pleasant ways and bright handsome presence, and it pleased her to have the tall, good-looking young Englishman in constant attendance upon her. The long, happy days of that summer had passed in the Black Forest, and then Mrs. D'Albert went to Switzerland. She and her niece had not been very long at Montreux when Mr. Sarsfeld appeared there also, a visitor at the same pension. Mrs. D'Albert was wont laughingly to declare that she had come to that age when life upon the level suited her best, and so nothing could tempt her to a greater effort than to sit by the lake-side, listening to the bands which played there in the sunny afternoons. But she was quite willing that Theodora should go about and see all there was to see. Excursions on the lake, and up the hills and valleys close by, were of frequent occurrence in the pension life. Mrs. D'Albert would stand at the pension doors and see the party off, apparently unobservant of the fact that wherever Theodora came, Mr. Sarsfeld was pretty sure to appear in close attendance. But happy days must end, and life is not entirely made up of moonlit sails upon placid lakes, or long talks in the drowsy sweetness of sunshiny pension gardens, where the flowers straggle about as they will—blue lupins, flaming marigolds, all in wild sweet disorder; and with the close of autumn Theodora's happy days ended. Mrs. D'Albert fell seriously ill. Then it was that Mr. Sarsfeld proved himself a friend in need. Day and night he devoted himself to their service, until Theodora often wondered what she should have done without him and his many acts of chivalrous kindness, and of thoughtful provision for their comfort and help. Spring found them still at Montreux, although they had hoped to winter in Italy.

In May there was an excursion to Chillon made by some of the visitors at the pension. Mrs. D'Albert insisted upon Theodora leaving her, and taking the afternoon's holiday and recreation. She appealed to Mr Sarsfeld to enforce obedience to her wishes, telling him to look at the girl's white face, and decide if she did not require a little change from her constant attendance in the sick-room. Theodora went, and as they walked along by the wide expanse of fair blue water, the colour came back to her cheek, and the elasticity to her step.

"You don't want," said Sarsfeld, as they followed the party over the Castle bridge: "you don't want to 'do' Chillon, surely? You know as much about the oubliettes as if you had lived down there. And you know more about the dungeons than did poor old Bonnivard. Come, let us go up-stairs to the Chamber of the Duchess, and look at the lake and the Dent-du-Midi."

Theodora laughingly consented, and they went up the stairs together. She went straight across the dusty floor to the narrow aperture in the deep stone wall which had served the Duchess for a window in those good old days, when air and sunshine were nothing accounted of. The rippling waters of the lake sent little arcs of golden light quivering upward over her white gown and fair face, and the feathery gold of her hair. She took off the wide black hat she wore, and held it in her hand, leaning against the wall, with her eyes seeking the farther shore, where Meillerie's white houses shone out against the dark wooded background, above which the hill outlines melted softly against the vague brightness of the yellow sky.

"Is it not peaceful and lovely?" she said presently, unconscious of Sarsfeld's intent gaze, as he stayed within the shadowy chamber. "I wonder, used the Duchess to look out here often? It must have made up to her for much, this lovely lake, and that calm silver mountain there."

"I am sure she was as happy as possible. She had no more serious troubles probably than the proper shading of her maidens' tapestry," he said, smiling at the sudden gravity which had descended upon her.

"Happy! with those dungeons and that torture chamber so near. How could she ever be happy?"

"She did not trouble herself with these matters. They were in the Duke's province, not hers."

"If I had been the Duchess——" she began dreamily; then stopped to watch a noisy little lake-boat go puffing past, breaking the calm waters into tiny wavelets, that rose and rolled towards the castle walls.

"If you had been the Duchess?" he said questioningly, as she was still silent. But she still leaned from the window, looking out. "If you had been the Duchess," he said, coming a step forward, "then I should wish that I had been the Duke."

Theodora glanced at him, then looked down. She grew a little pale as she toyed nervously with a slender silver bracelet upon her wrist. The sunshine enveloped her in a flood of light, streaming past her in narrow dusty bars into the sombre emptiness of the room. The young man's eyes were very bright and tender, and a happy smile parted his lips.

"If I had been the Duke," he went on softly, "and disgrace befallen me, what would the Duchess have done?"

"I do not know," she said, as he paused.

"What do you think she would have done?"

"I suppose," the girl replied, still with down-bent gaze: "I suppose, being the Duchess, she must have borne the disgrace."

Sarsfeld looked at her keenly; the colour rose to his face.

"'Being the Duchess,'" he said. "Yes, I see what you mean. Having cast in her lot with the Duke, she would have to accept whatever came, weal or woe. But if she had known before she became the Duchess that there was disgrace attaching to the Duke's name, what would she have done?"

He leaned towards her, resting one elbow on the whitened wall, half-shielding his face with his hand, but with a very eager, intent light in his blue eyes.

"She would never have become the Duchess in that case," said Theodora proudly.

The light faded rapidly from his young face.

"Be it so," he said listlessly; and then the rest of the party joined them.

The next afternoon Theodora went out alone. She was restless, and not happy. She wanted to get far away, deep into the wood silences, where the fragrant valley-lilies grew. She went up the white dusty road, pausing on the bridge to look over at the noisy little mountain torrent underneath, whirling and surging about its boulders. The sky was radiantly blue and high, the trees wore still the vivid green of spring. Three children in blue blouses, with close-cropped hair and sunburnt faces, passed on their way home from school, and stolidly stared at the young English lady in her fresh pretty gown. They responded with nothing more genial than a vacant frown to her smile and greeting, like true sons of Helvetia. By the forge a gush of hot air rushed out into the dusty warmth of the road; then she turned aside into a narrow strip of pasture, and so on into the filtered sunshine of the woods overhanging the lake. The path she took soon brought her out high up upon the hill-side, and she found a mossy bank whereon to rest. She gathered all the forget-me-nots within reach, and with them loosely spread upon her lap, began to think, what she had never ceased to think since yesterday, what she could have said to offend Mr. Sarsfeld. Then she raised her eyes and saw him coming up the hillside towards her.

"I came to look for you, Miss Holbrook," he said, without any sort of preamble whatever. He looked pale and resolute. "I did not like to leave Montreux without saying good-bye."

Theodora grew very white, but when she spoke her voice was cool and clear as a bell.

"That is very kind of you. We shall miss you. I am sorry you are leaving. Do you go soon?"

"Now—immediately—to-day," he said. He folded his arms, and looked down at her, as with down-cast eyes she toyed with her blue flowers.

"Have you nothing to say?" he asked wistfully.

What could she say to him, if he said nought to her? Being a woman, she must needs hold her peace. It is man's inalienable prerogative to ask for what he has a mind to have. A woman must fold her hands, and smile, and say something cool, and well-bred, and graceful, and indifferent. The very sunshine grew dim to Theodora as she sat, with throbbing pulses, and knew that he had come to say farewell.

"Are you going to England?" she asked politely, feeling that the silence must be broken somehow.

"Was this, then, how he thought of her?"—p. 770.

"Yes," he said. There was an expression of utter wretchedness upon his young, handsome face. "I must go. It is best that I should go. But I could not go without saying good-bye."

He put out his hand.

"Will you give me those little flowers?" he said. She handed them to him in silence. She did not dare to look up.

"Good-bye," he said. An instant he held her hand—the next he was gone. From that moment Theodora had never seen his face until she met him upon the hill-slope at Raylington. But in the years that followed she had never doubted him. She felt in her inmost heart that he loved her, and loved her truly, with a love which neither time nor absence nor silence could alter.

She left her room, and went down-stairs. In the dining-room, bottles and glasses, cards, and a strong odour of stale tobacco, told how Mr. Ansley and a "few friends" had spent the previous evening. Theodora threw open the window to let the fresh air in. The Hardens' house looked so delightfully prim and neat and fast asleep all the muslin blinds with their blue belts in an orderly line. In the village street not even a dog was stirring. Then she heard a footstep, and looking out, she saw the strong, straight, graceful figure she knew so well: the proudly carried head, the loose, vigorous walk, the bronzed hands hanging so ready to do anything that need might arise to do. The morning light fell full upon his face, but he was not looking towards her tumble-down, disreputable abode. He stood in the roadway, and gazed at the doctor's house, then pulled his straw hat forward over his face, and passed from sight out into the open country. It seemed to Theodora that all her life she stood and watched him going away from her—going in unexplained silence—out into space, for all she knew, but always going, and always leaving her behind.

Presently the family woke up, and the daily disorder began. Mrs. Ansley sent down word that she had a headache, and would have breakfast in her room. Mr. Ansley appeared, looking so savage that no one dared to address him. Vincent fell down-stairs and cut his forehead open. Alice shrieked when she saw the wound, and Maudie slapped her soundly for doing so. Alfred scolded Gerald vigorously for losing the penknife he had lent him at Raylington.

After breakfast, when she had set the children their tasks, and dressed Beth, and interviewed Mary upon the burning question of dinner, her mother sent for Theodora.

"Just think," said Mrs. Ansley, as she entered the room: "these stupid shop people have sent the wrong plush; it does not match my silk the least bit in the world. Mine is a warm golden brown; theirs is cold and hard; and look at these circulars about summer dresses. I never saw such cheap sprigged muslins, and quite pretty."

"Yes," said Theodora.

"Why do you say 'Yes' in that senseless, stupid way? Can you really take no interest in anything, Theodora?"

"Yes, mother, certainly. I like pretty dresses as well as anyone, but I do not see much use in looking at them and wishing for them when we cannot afford to buy them."

"But we must buy them if we have them at all. A London house will not give us credit."

"But the baker has done so, mother, and the butcher; and the coal-bill is not paid. And what else we owe I am afraid to inquire, when I cannot follow up such inquiries by a prompt payment."

"Really, Theodora, you are very inconsiderate. Why you cannot manage things a little better than you do, I cannot imagine; I really cannot be worried by all these money details, and my heart in the nervous state it is. Can't you settle with these people? There is nothing vulgarer than to have tradespeople clamouring for money. Pay them, and let them go."

"I have no money, mother."

"Well, in that case let them wait; but now about this plush. Plush is positively the only thing one can trim silk with, and you know my brown silk won't do another season as it is. Such a good silk too: it would be a thousand pities, for the sake of a few shillings, to do it up with anything mean. I want plush enough for a panel and revers, but this man's plush is a fright; I will not have it. I want you to go over to Hinkley and get some that will do; Meade and Younge have in a new stock of plushes and brocades. Take a piece of the silk with you; you are always very clever at matching things."

"Have you any money, mamma?"

"How you do tease, Theodora! Don't you know I have an account at Meade and Younge's?"

That settled the matter, apparently, and Theodora, hoping that some day Meade and Younge's account would likewise be settled, left the room.

"There is a letter for you, Miss Holbrook," cried the postmistress, who was sunning herself at the door as Theodora went down the village street on her way to Hinkley. After some searching in pigeon-holes the letter was produced, and Theodora put it in her pocket.

As she passed the rectory, laughter and merry voices and the tap-tap of tennis-balls floated out over the high wall to her ears. She knew very well her letter was from Sarsfeld, although she had never seen his writing in her life.

"DEAR MISS HOLBROOK,—I cannot call to see you; but if you would do me an inestimable favour, dare I hope to see you this afternoon near the Ivy Bridge? I shall wait till seven.—Yours very faithfully,

"J. SARSFELD."

Was this, then, how he thought of her? Did he esteem her so lightly? Why could he not come openly to her mother's house if he desired to see and speak with her? There was a rather angry light in Theodora's brown eyes as she went on her way to shop in Hinkley. On her homeward way she remembered suddenly that his pocket-book was in her possession. Glancing at her watch, she saw it was nearly half-past six. The Ivy Bridge was twenty minutes the other side of the village. She must go; and he would understand that nothing less than having his property in her possession, and not knowing his address, had brought her. She hastened on with a certain eager gladness in her heart. The road at the Ivy Bridge rose gradually to span the sluggish waters of the canal, and a few fir-trees crowned the summit. The crimson of the eastern sky was melting into rosy grey, and the twilight had already begun to gather over the fields, when she saw him coming down the road from the bridge. He was walking slowly, with his head down-bent, and his hands thrust deep in his pockets.

Evidently he had waited until seven, and then given up all hope of seeing her.

She stepped into the roadway as he passed.

"Here I am," she said simply.

His face lit up.

"Were you indeed coming to me, Theodora?" he asked.

"This is the reason that I came, Mr. Sarsfeld," she said, rather stiffly, proffering him the pocket-book.

"You are angry with me?" he said, with a wistful look in his eyes.

"Why, if you wanted to see me, could you not come to my home?" she asked, with simple directness, her brown eyes somewhat troubled.

"Where is your home?" he asked her, looking down at her with sad haggard eyes, as she still stood with his pocket-book in her hand.

"With my stepfather, Mr. Ansley."

"Ansley!" he cried, "your stepfather?"

"Yes," she said, wondering at the strangeness of his manner. Then smiling faintly, she added, "You seem to like mysteries, Mr. Sarsfeld. I don't."

"Neither do I," he said bitterly.

"Then why make them?" she asked.

"I meant to tell you all to-day," he said: "everything right away from the beginning. But this makes it quite impossible."

"Still mysteries," she said, trying to speak lightly. "Why not tell me?"

"Because I cannot, Miss Holbrook."

"What do you know of my stepfather?" she asked, looking up earnestly at him.

"Much," he said curtly: "too much—and yet, alas! not quite enough."

"I do not understand," she said wearily. "Will you not take your pocket-book, Mr. Sarsfeld? One of my sisters found it yesterday at Raylington Park."

"Thank you," he said, accepting it. "I spent the morning at the Home Farm looking for it. You are angry with me, I fear. You think I have failed in respect to you by asking you to meet me at the bridge yonder. Could you not grant me even half an hour? There is much I want to say to you, although I cannot tell you all."

"You will not come to the house?" she said.

"I cannot."

She was silent.

"If I meet you in your walk to-morrow, will you permit me to accompany you?" he said, after a few moments' reflection.

"I cannot," said Theodora in her turn.

And her voice was to the full as decided as his own.

CHAPTER VII.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

"What profits life without the simple faith
Of souls made one in perfect sympathy?"
W. HENDERSON.

THE plush did not match the silk. Very happily Theodora had had doubts upon the subject, and only brought home a pattern with her from Hinkley. So Mrs. Ansley decided that she must send over to Raylington, and see what the shops there could do. To get to Raylington, it was necessary to go to Hinkley first, and from thence take train to the little market town across the plain.

Theodora went over after breakfast to ask for a seat in the doctor's gig, if perchance he was going to Hinkley. She found it a great and solemn day in the Harden household; for, by a rule as of the Medes and Persians, summer began there upon the 15th of May. There might be a biting easterly wind, or even snow on the ground—though this latter was certainly unusual—but the fires disappeared, and wonderful flowing crimped arrangements of green and pink curled papers protruded from every grate in the house. After the customary morning occupations had been performed upon this great day, there was a solemn procession up the stairs, of Mrs. Harden, and Anne, and Peter the boy. Johnson and his hand-ladder were requisitioned; every woollen curtain was taken down, shaken, and brushed, and folded up in tissue-papers, with camphor laid between the folds to keep away moths. Stiff clean muslin draperies with frills were put up in the stead of these. Slippery grey covers were laid down over the stairs; fresh muslin half-blinds were let into the windows, and tied about with pink ribbons for variety's sake. Then from tall oaken presses, sweetly smelling, Anne and her mistress drew forth summer raiment for the household, and into the wardrobes went the warm winter things, not to reappear till the 15th of October, when forth they would surely come, though the weather were absolutely tropical.

Theodora could hardly gain Mrs. Harden's attention, calling as she did in the very midst of this tremendous function. But Peter, who, as usual, was in full possession of all his various and varied wits, informed Miss Holbrook that master had ordered the gig for half-past ten, and that his destination was Hinkley. Would Miss Holbrook wait in the dining-room? and should he, Peter, fetch Mr. William from the waiting-room? Theodora decidedly negatived this thoughtful suggestion, and sat down to wait for the doctor.

As she sat and listened to the duet between the water-clock and the canary, she wondered if Dr. Harden had ever said anything about the removal of the curtain from his son's picture. The little lad stood by his mother, smiling gaily. She was looking intently at the painting, when the doctor came bustling into the room.

"A worthless fellow!" he said, with a frown.

"He does not look worthless," said Theodora dreamily, as she stood looking up into the boy's radiant face, with her hands loosely clasped before her.

"What do you know about it?" said the old man, rather testily.

"Nothing; and less than nothing. But he was your son."

"Was? Is he dead?" he asked sharply.

"I don't know," she replied, in utter surprise.

"Come," he said abruptly, "we shall not do more than catch your train at Hinkley."

He hardly spoke again until he put her down at the station.

"There will be showers this afternoon," he said then, as he drove away.

Raylington was not very much of a place, although it thought pretty well of itself. There was one narrow street where the shops were gathered together, and a little square where a jubilee drinking-fountain had been put up with much civic flourishing and trumpeting; a provincial bank at one side of the square, a club at the other, and in one corner a picturesque archway which led to the post-office. The gloomy old church, which had once been a cathedral, was away down by the banks of the sluggish river.

After considerable waste of time and exercise of patience, Theodora matched the plush. Then she went to a modest restaurant in a back street and had some tea; came back to the High Street, and gazed in at a print- and bookseller's window. She had a couple of hours to wait before she could get a train back to Hinkley. She wandered on and into the market place to buy some trifles for the children—sweets and apples, and a few cheap toys. As she came out from the market she stood an instant at the entrance, looking along the street, wet and shining after one of the showers which the doctor had prognosticated. A heavy grey cloud hung like a curtain across the vista of the street, the edges glowing bright silver. As she stood on the wet cold pavement, a vision of Italy came to her. It had been some gala day at Florence. She remembered how in the morning she had wandered about the streets looking at the flowers, and flowers, and yet again flowers—heaped and piled everywhere, masses of colour and perfume—scarlet arum lilies; irises—white, and yellow, and purple; tulips—scarlet, and gold, and striped; and roses—roses in baskets, roses in heaps on the ground, roses in mountains and avalanches — every hue, every shape, every scent — roses everywhere — and heavy-headed carnations, with the dew upon them, and timid valley-lilies, and flaming azaleas; and she from all had chosen and carried home a great bunch of white lilac, because, forsooth, it reminded her of English lanes. And over all the sky had been so blue, and the day and its delights so long and fair; and in the evening they had gone out to see the illuminations. She saw again the Palazzo Vecchio, with its campanile outlined with flickering lights against the soft warmth of the rapidly darkening sky. The grim prison of Savonarola had looked like a fairy palace built up of gems, with a transient glow which seemed as though it might melt and vanish while one looked.

She raised her umbrella, and walked down the street, wondering what in this damp little country town had struck the chord of memory which brought back beautiful flower-filled Florence to her mind. It had been May then, and she was young. Now it was May again, but she felt old and sad. She turned in at the church gate—for she had still an hour—and sat down in the gloomy porch. From a stone-yard across the river came the metallic clinking of a mason's hammer—a train to London rushed shrieking along the line in the distance—a group of children played quietly in a corner of the churchyard. Presently she wandered down to the low wall overlooking the river. The water crawled along sullenly, banked by coarse wild grasses; and all the fields were vacant and dull and bare. As she leaned upon the wall, Sarsfeld's tall figure came swinging down the river-path. When he saw her he ran lightly up the slope, and leaped the little wall. He came to her with an eager smile on his face and with outstretched hand.

"I may speak to you now?" he asked; "this is purely accidental."

She smiled, and held out her hand.

"Are you aware that it is raining?" he asked, taking her umbrella and opening it. "Why do you not take better care of yourself?" he asked reproachfully. "I don't like how you are looking at all; you are much paler and thinner than you used to be."

"You forget that I am eight years older," she said.

"No, I do not forget," he said quietly. "I forget nothing about you."

She was not pale now, but he was not looking at her. There was a puzzled frown upon his face, as though he had much to say, and did not quite know how to begin.

"May I ask you a few questions?" he said, after a short silence. "And will you promise not to think them impertinent? I know I have no right to question you, but I do want to know a little of what your life is, and if you are happy."

"Is anyone happy?" she asked. "I think not."

"You used to be. I remember how I used to think you had the very brightest and happiest face I ever saw."

"But I was young then," she said; "and life teaches us many hard lessons as we grow old."

"Is your life, then, hard?" he asked tenderly.

"Does it matter what our life is?" she asked, looking up at him wistfully. "Hard or not, we must live it the best way we can. You are not happy yourself," she said, boldly carrying the war into the enemy's camp after a fleeting glance into his sunburnt face.

"Is it of any consequence whether I am or not?" he said sharply. "I am thinking about you. It surprised me very much the other day to learn that you have a number of sisters and brothers, and that your mother is living. I always thought you were an orphan, and that Mrs. D'Albert had adopted you."

"Since that time my mother has lost her health, and I am needed at home with the children."

"And your aunt?"

"Is very angry with me, and hurt. Only this week she wrote asking me to go back to her."

"And you refused?"

"I refused."

"You had a brother you used to talk to me about. Where is he—Harold?"

"Poor Harold! he is still in Australia. I often fear he is only wasting his time there. I wish he would come home."

"So do I, if he would take care of you. To live in the house with Mr. Ansley can be no fit life for you."

"What do you know of my stepfather?" she asked. "Will you not tell me?"

"I cannot tell you," he said wearily. "I want—I want to tell you, but somehow I cannot see that it would be the right thing to do. Perhaps, too, it is best for us all that I should keep silence."

"I wish you would not speak in riddles," she said; "it wearies me so. Things are quite bad enough without the knowledge that there are all sorts of pitfalls about one's path."

"I wish you were back with your aunt. Do you never get a holiday?"

"I do not want one."

"Theodora, are you poor?" His voice was very low.

"Yes."

He glanced at her plain worn gown and mended gloves, and sighed perplexedly.

"It used to be all so different," he said. "If you had money, would you go away?"

"No." And she looked him frankly in the face. She was nearly as tall as he was, and he knew what the look in her brown eyes meant; he knew, as indeed he had known all along, that it was impossible that she should take money from him. "I will never leave little Beth. She is one of my little sisters; she is a cripple: always has been since her birth, and she has no one but me, you understand."

"I understand," he said; and his eyes rested on her face with a very tender light in them. "Has anything been done for the child?"

"Dr. Harden has done all he can, and he says there is no hope she will ever grow better; and William Harden, his son, has made me a little chair on wheels, in which I can take her out every fine day."

"I am a doctor, you know," he said musingly. "I wish I could see her. Perhaps I could do something for her."

"I do not think anyone can help little Beth," she said sorrowfully.

"And so this is the life you live now, Theodora?" he said gently. "So widely, strangely different from what I pictured. I remember so well the first evening I ever saw you: it was at Wurtzfeld; do you remember? We were all waiting for the carriages to take us back from a picnic in the Black Forest to our respective hotels and inns, and I had only just joined the party; and you came from under the trees towards where we waited, with your hat in your hand; your face was toward the sunset, and in your hands you carried long trails of scarlet vine. I have many pictures of you, Theodora, in my mind-gallery. Another evening I called to take you to a concert, and I remember you slowly coming down the stairs, running one hand along the balustrades, with a very thoughtful look upon your face. You were dressed in some filmy grey stuff that floated about you like a cloud, and you had purple passion-flowers at your throat. Then again I see you at Chillon, in the Duchess's room, leaning by the window, with the sunlight on your white gown and golden hair. And the day I went up the hill to say good-bye: that was a hard day for me, Theodora, and a bitter one. Life can hold no worse. I thought in how small a space would you forget the man who loved you better than his life. I have those forget-me-nots still, Theodora: those you gave me that day." And opening his pocket-book, he showed the little faded blossoms inside. Theodora stood motionless, her hands resting on the cold grey stone. Would he not speak again? It was not for her to tell him that she loved him when he did not ask. The mason across the river was still energetically chiselling away. Someone was playing the organ in the church, and the deep tones came faintly rolling out to them where they stood. The children had gone home, and the churchyard was as silent as though only the dead were there.

Theodora knew that she had only to turn to him, and lift her eyes to his face, and put her hand into his. He was waiting for her. She felt his eager gaze fixed upon her—and then she thought of little Beth.

"I must not miss the train," she said.

The light faded swiftly from Sarsfeld's face. She turned to go, and he followed her in silence.

"Let me carry these," he said, taking the sundry little packages from her. "Let me at least do for you what I can while I can!"

At the gate she paused, and said to him, with downcast eyes, and very brokenly, "Do not think worse of me than you can help."

But he made no answer.

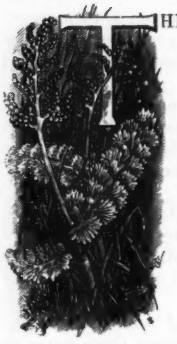
In silence they went along the narrow lane leading to the station. He walked with moody, downcast face; she with her gaze fixed straight before her, seeing nothing.

On the platform the collector stopped Theodora roughly as she was passing the barrier forgetful of her ticket. Sarsfeld's face flushed when he saw that it was for the third class. He strode away to the office, and came back with a first-class ticket. It was only a matter of a few pence, and yet it was all he could do, or dared to do, for the woman he loved. Theodora did not mind how she travelled, but his care of her touched her—she was so unused now to anyone taking care of her. She little dreamed that never would he part with that tiny morsel of green pasteboard, just because she had carried it about with her all that long afternoon.

"Good-bye," he said, taking her hand in farewell, as the train rolled into the station. "But I may be your friend? You will let me help you in any way I can?"

"Yes," she said, forcing herself to smile. "You are very good to me—but you understand?"

"Yes; I understand," he said gravely.



Then she was gone; and he stood looking after the train as long as the least vestige of it was in sight.

WHY THE PEAR-TREE FRUITED.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

THERE is a certain corner plot of ground on a road which I have occasionally to pass. That piece of ground I describe by the adjective "uncanny." True, no love-lorn cats, wearied of existence, have selected it as the spot on which to breathe out in sighs the last remnants of disappointed life; no antagonistic dogs have there laid down their animosity, and stretched themselves beside their feline enemies in peace, acting up to the principle that there should be no hatreds in death. But, all the same, it is an uncanny corner plot, and will continue to be so, I expect, until some enterprising builder takes it in hand, and erects on it "most desirable property" of some kind. As it stands at the present moment, it is "ripe for development" of this kind; and I must say that the sooner it is developed, the better.

The present tenants of this uncanny spot are pieces of brickbat, small heaps of sand, and pieces of rubbish of various kinds. There is no wall about it, so that it looks like "nobody's land;" for which, indeed, it might pass unless one were prompted either by curiosity or business to ask "how much it was per foot?" He would then come away thoroughly satisfied in his own mind that somebody owned it, and valued it too.

But that piece of ground, with all the miserablenesses on it, has one object of attraction to me. This is a pear-tree—a pear-tree that no one cares to prune, but that stands there, living, blossoming, fruiting, in spite of its uncongenial and melancholy surroundings.

That bit of ground is a remnant of a market-garden; in other enclosed plots its sister trees are to be seen here and there, made much of in the little gardens in which they stand; but in this outcast spot no one cares for this outcast tree.

But though I am only a passer-by from time to time, this tree has a certain interest for me; it suggests to me a question and answer which, running into daily life, does me some good. I say to myself, "Why does this tree fruit amid these dismal surroundings, and under these unfavourable circumstances?"

The answer is, "Because it has a principle of life within it—and not only of life, but of pear-life; and because of this, despite brickbats and rubbish, it brings forth pears. Cut down that tree, and it would soon be a piece of mere rotting wood—an addition to the other pieces of rubbish around; but as it is, life differentiates it from them, and enables it to go on leafing, blossoming, fruiting, as the season for each of these functions comes on it."

"Pear-tree," I say to myself, "why is it thus with you?"

Then it says, "I live; and my life is independent of all these things which disfigure the surface of the ground on which I grow. I am continually performing life functions; my business is to put forth the life that is in myself, and not to give heed to the death that there is in them.

"All these lie on the surface of the ground; they have nought to do with what is beneath it, or what is overhead. I draw my sustenance from both. I could not live on the surface; I am made with roots, and roots must go below. I am made with leaves and branches; and they have to do with what is above. I must assimilate. I must make my own the nourishment in earth-juices, which my roots can assimilate—and that in oxygen, and dews, and sunlight, on which my leaves feed. In me there is the law of life—of growth, of flower, of fruit; by that law I am enabled to be what I am. Development is a necessity of my being; my life craves it, my life compels it; what I shall produce is a pear, for my life is pear-life. I have life in common with all vegetation, but pear-life is my particular life; and I live it, to work it out, no matter what are my surroundings. My roots go under all this rubbish—it stands in no relation to me; if there were a thousand times as much, I should pursue the even tenor of my life—my one idea is to fruit."

I don't know which to praise most—the courage, or the endurance, or the good principle and conscientiousness—if I might so speak, or the philosophy of my roadside friend. They are all conspicuous so far as they may be credited to a tree.

I cannot but think that there are many persons who are placed in very much the same circumstances as this tree. They get into a region of isolation—brickbats—some place or sphere in which everything is uncongenial to them—foreign to them—in which they have to live the life that is in them, and to bring forth the fruit that belongs to them, without any help from surroundings.

My pear-tree says to me, "Be yourself in spite of what is around you. With that you have nothing to do. You cannot help the rubbish being near—you cannot help a great deal more coming; for all you know, something equivalent to the dead cat or dog may come next; if you heed the external—that with which you, with your own individual life, have nothing to do—you will never perform your own functions, work out your own destiny."

We have to try to live the beautiful amid the ugly—the Christian amid the ungodly—the sensitive amid the irresponsive; we have to be living amid what is dead—and that, alone, without affinity with, or sympathy from, surroundings; the life that is in us must do it; and by God's blessing and help I hope it will.

I have observed that my friend the pear-tree was not now standing in garden ground; but it had not always been thus with it. The spot on which it stood had once been part of a garden; and now standing in smaller gardens (left in their places when the ground was cut up into building plots) were many of its former companion trees.

Its lot was very different from theirs. They belonged to someone—they were cared for, talked about; they formed almost as it were parts of the family who dwelt in the house to which their garden belonged; and if pear-trees have any memories, mine must have often thought of former days of happiness and privilege; and some might have thought it would have been warranted in saying, "As I am not in garden ground, no one can expect anything of me now."

We too are in like case. Circumstances cut some people off from former associates, former helps, former positions of privilege; the Christian lives no longer amongst Christian friends, nor perhaps even in a Christian community; the refined person who had a home replete with taste, the rich person who dwelt amid all the ease of wealth, are now obliged to have near them the rude and vulgar; are straitened and have a tendency to be strangled in all generous impulse, by the narrowness of poverty; but if, like my friend the pear-tree, we have our own life within us, we shall fruit according to our opportunity all the same. We cannot alter our position; we cannot hedge ourselves round again with garden wall; we cannot tell what is going to become of us; but we can say, "I am myself, my living self; as that pear-tree is as much a pear-tree as it was before its position was changed, so am I my living self as much now as ever; and I will bring forth my own proper fruit. I draw my sustenance from what is below—this rubbish is above it; I cannot turn bricks and stones into pears, but they shall not turn me into them."

That pear-tree, with those uncongenial and incongruous surroundings, might have said if it had a voice: "There are none here to understand me—none to sympathise with me—none bent on the same end as I am." All that would have been quite true. But unless my friend committed suicide, and got rid of its pear-life, it must by the very law of its being go on leafing, budding, fruiting, in spite of this.

There are plenty who are circumstanced like the pear-tree in the corner plot. In churches, in families, they seem to stand alone. Many a young man in a warehouse, or counting-house, or shop, has to live a true Christian life which is unappreciated, not understood. They find none like-minded with themselves; they must fruit alone, or not at all. Where they make a mistake is, in expecting from brick and stone what brick and stone or anything else out of affinity with them cannot give. They must be content to be, as the Scotch say, "self-contained." But they need not be in the least discouraged—the roots of the pear-tree were in sympathy with the earth-juices to which they had access; and the leaves were in sympathy with what I may call the heaven-juices to which they had access; and so the tree was fed. No one saw any of these, though everyone could see the brickbats and the rubbish—and if the suicide cat had been there they could have seen him grim or sentimental-looking, as the case might have been, in death; and none can see the life-food of many a solitary one—but they do feed and live.

Remember how it is that many a disadvantageously placed one still lives and fruits. He does not draw his sustenance from his surroundings. He does draw from beneath, and from above, from what is invisible. He has the principle of life in himself, and that life is one of which fruiting is the natural end.

It may be that someone more acute than I have been, as I have rambled along about my tree, may say: "Ah, but, my friend, you have forgotten——"

"What!"

"Why, that your tree stands in a corner plot, and is to be bought any day by a builder; when, as sure as ever it has a leaf above, or a root below, down it must come, and nobody can tell how soon."

"Thank you, my friend, for reminding me; for I will tell you something that may do you a great deal of good about that.

There is no fixity of tenure for any of us in this world. We are here to-day, and we may be gone to-morrow. We must live by the day, and do the day's work in the day; otherwise, while we are waiting for the impossible certainty, nothing will be done. We may not have an autumn-time in which to fruit; enough for us if, during the spring-time which we have had, we budded—that was life's proper output for that time—and should autumn come, what would it avail if there had been no life output in spring?

My pear-tree lives by the day; and if it have to give place to a house before its fruit ripens, the history of its life—not, indeed, of a 'life,' but of its life—will have been complete.

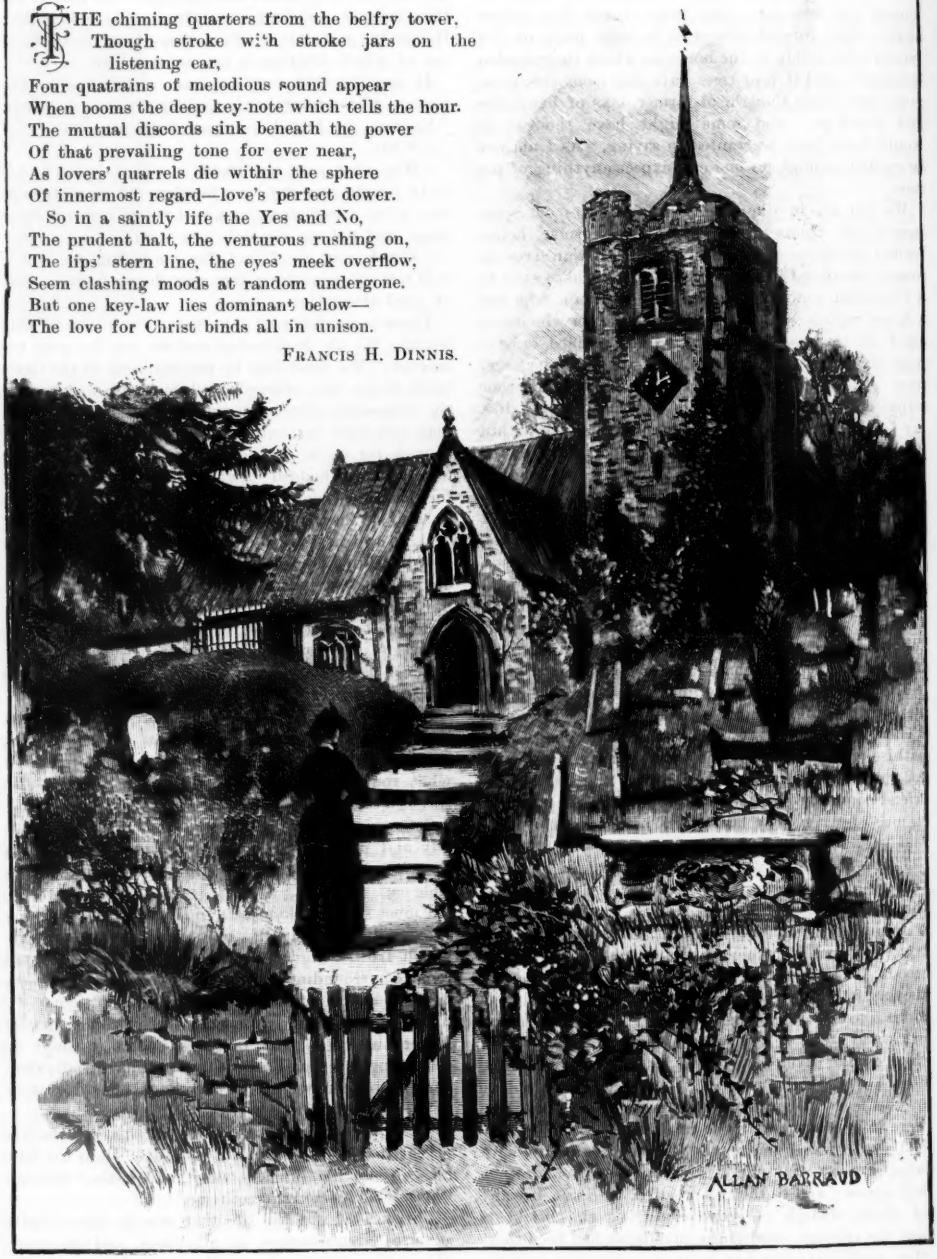
Remember, you are not, perhaps, destined to be the model of a fruiting life, but you are required, in order to fulfil your true destiny, to put forth season-tokens of the reality of your life.

And now, my worthy tree, I thank you for all you have taught me. I shall often pass you again, and, as I look at you, try and put in practice some of what you have taught me, and, I hope, others also through me.

Sometimes I have unpleasant surroundings, mentally and physically; but I shall try to bring forth some good fruit, despite the brickbats and that possible cat.

I must not trouble myself in life so much about my surroundings as myself. Let me but have the life which fruits to good here, and hereafter. I cannot remove surroundings, but I can live and perform my mission and functions in life, in spite of them.

I must not spend my energies in thinking that if I were in some more favoured sphere I could do something, whereas I can do nothing now. Individual life, independent of all surroundings, should ever be going onwards towards fruit.



Reader, not thine own life for all this, but the life of Christ that is in thee. He is the life, He is thy life. "I can do all things," said the Apostle, "through Christ which strengtheneth me."

Christ lived out the life that was in Him, despite adverse circumstances, at all times, and in every place; that life in thee will enable thee to do the same.

A SONNET.

THE chiming quarters from the belfry tower.
Though stroke with stroke jars on the listening ear,
Four quatrains of melodious sound appear
When booms the deep key-note which tells the hour.
The mutual discords sink beneath the power
Of that prevailing tone for ever near,
As lovers' quarrels die within the sphere
Of innermost regard—love's perfect dower.
So in a saintly life the Yes and No,
The prudent halt, the venturous rushing on,
The lips' stern line, the eyes' meek overflow,
Seem clashing moods at random undergone.
But one key-law lies dominant below—
The love for Christ binds all in unison.

FRANCIS H. DINNIS.

"COMING HOME TO ROOST."

"KATE, are you really thinking seriously of that John Hally? This makes the third time he has been here within ten days."

Kate stood at the window, watching the said John Hally trudging down the street. His face was not visible at that distance, but his back was—short and thick-set, with an overcoat that had assuredly never emanated from any artist in the craft. She looked round with a faint shrug.

"I couldn't help thinking seriously of any man in a coat like that, Aunt Greig. One must have something to pass the time; he's better than nothing."

"You might find something less dangerous, I'm thinking, Kate. Attend to your work, and leave the man alone till you want one in earnest. I don't hold with trifling about things of that kind."

There were many other things beside lovers that Aunt Greig did not "hold with," thought Kate, taking up her work rather scornfully; but if Miss Greig had to sit at a machine all day, and had twenty years deducted from her calendar and the wrinkles from her face—well, possibly she might look at things from a different standpoint.

Kate stitched on at her binding. Her professional calling was in the upholstering line, and very stiff stitching it often was. Miss Greig toasted two chops before the fire, transferred them to a small dish—"ashet" in the household dialect—and carried them away into another room. She had apparently forgotten all about Kate's delinquencies when she returned; a more important subject was looming on the horizon.

"Kate, I wonder if Mrs. McCallum has got any person in her rooms yet. Mr. Ford says he expects a nephew from London next week. He's an engineer, and got something to do on this new railway, and he's able to pay well. I wish I could have taken him in myself."

"You can't turn Mr. Ford off," remarked Kate doubtfully.

"Of course I can't. He's a permanency, if he's no a very big one, and the other's but for a few months at outside. Still, it's a pity I've no another room."

"Is the nephew's name Ford too?" asked Kate, by way of diversion.

"No; Holt—Philip Holt. Mr. Ford showed me his name in the newspaper. He seems to think a lot of him, for he's no one to say much."

Miss Greig put on her bonnet forthwith, and went off to interview Mrs. McCallum about the expected arrival. Kate half-enviously wished that she were a man, and able to go about the country whenever she thought fit. Then her thoughts travelled back to John Hally. He was not handsome nor rich; still, he was a man, and he liked her. She glanced down at the tiny bunch of violets at her breast with a thrill of satisfaction. "Better be married to ony thing than no to be married at all;" and it counted for something to know that she had the choice in her own hands.

"I must have something to help me through the time," she said to herself, with a wrathful tug at an obstinate piece of binding; "and if—if anyone better should turn up—though there's little chance of it—well, I could easily tell him I had changed my mind. I know he means to ask me the first chance."

Kate's countenance cleared up considerably after she had arrived at that decision. She was not naturally an ill-tempered person, and took her work and small worries philosophically, on the whole. But one of her companions in the work-room had lately attained to the dignity of an engagement—with a student at the University too!—and Kate had been feeling strongly since that it behoved her also to achieve something in that line; and, alas! for John Hally's peace of mind, he was the only eligible person of her acquaintance.

He did ask her the very next evening. It was Saturday, and they were sauntering round the base of the Crags, watching the soldiers practising at the targets up the hillside.

Kate cast down her eyes after the orthodox manner, and tried conscientiously to feel the rapture due to the occasion.

"You see, I have not much to offer you," he wound up. "There's too many clerks in the field for any of us to have much chance to get rich, but it's steady; and I think we might be very comfortable if you would only try; and—and I love you, Kate."

Kate rather neglected this last remark. She was deep in a calculation of how far the income he referred to, would go in a joint concern. It would be a little better than the upholstery, but very little; and, with all her efforts, she could not call up any enthusiasm to make up for the inevitable deficiencies. It was exceedingly discouraging.

"I'll tell you what we might do, John," she said presently, when he begged anxiously for some answer. This silent deliberation was hardly a hopeful sign. "There's no need to think of getting married for long enough. I don't want to be hurried over it, but you can come and take me out when you like, and bring me flowers, and that will do just as well."

"But what is the good of being engaged if we are not to think of getting married?" objected John, not viewing the arrangement in quite the same light.

"I didn't say we were never to think of it, only there's no hurry; but if you don't like it that way, we needn't say any more about it."

"But surely you like me a little, Kate?" pleaded the unfortunate lover.

"Like you! of course I like you!"

A sudden misgiving that her captive might take flight and leave her all forlorn made Kate smile up in his face and press the ill-fitting coat-sleeve, till John—small blame to him—took her hesitation for maidenly shyness, and humbled himself still lower in the dust to think that she was willing even to tolerate him: Kate, with her bonnie face that would grace any position in the land: it was a crying shame that she should be earning her daily bread at that coarse machine work.

"Yes, I quite meant to be a governess," agreed Kate composedly, when he expressed something of his indignation on this head, "and I advertised once for weeks, but there was only one answer, and the lady wanted such a lot of things I had never heard about, that I was afraid to try any more. Governesses are expected to teach everything nowadays."

"You could have taught quite as much as she had any right to expect," was Mr. Hally's response; and he thoroughly believed it.

And so Kate went home an hour later, vested with all the honours of an engaged person. She told her aunt about it across the small supper-table.

"Well, he 's no much to look at," was that lady's candid expression of opinion; "and I doubt he 's no much siller to keep it up, but it 's your ain look-out, and I hope you 've made up your mind to bide by it. A promise is a promise, to my thinking."

Kate was perfectly conscious of those two very serious defects in her betrothed—had been from the first—but she reflected upon them with a curious sinking of heart that night. If this was the beginning of the blissful height that poets write about, it seemed to her the flattest plain she had travelled yet.

A week went by. Kate settled down to make the most of her new position—a daily penny bunch of spring violets, that gave quite an air to her trim black gown; a pair or two of gloves, a small volume of poetry, which she never opened—the poets were out of favour at present—and someone to take her into the park or round the links on fine evenings, and explain the mysteries of golf, which was a game that did not interest her in the slightest degree.

Sometimes they would encounter some of her workroom acquaintances during these promenades, and Kate would hold up her head, and wish fervently that John was a few inches taller, and more impressive in appearance. However, that couldn't be helped now, and he was certainly useful in many ways, if only he would be a little more amusing, and less tragic and sentimental in his conversation.

She dismissed him abruptly at the end of her own street one evening in the very middle of a dissertation on the rapture of "two hearts with but a single thought, two souls that beat as one." She had borne it for a full hour, and felt as if she had heard enough of "twin souls" for the rest of her days. Why couldn't he talk of sensible things, like other people? she wondered, as she marched up the stairs to the second "flat," and there came into violent collision with some person standing in the obscurity of the landing at her aunt's door.

"I beg your pardon," said someone in a quick, clear voice. "I have knocked twice, and can't make anyone hear. I want to see Mr. Ford."

"I have a key in my pocket," said Kate, rather out of breath with the stairs and the surprise; "perhaps Aunt Greig has gone on some message."

She produced it as she spoke. It was quietly taken out of her hand, and the door promptly opened. The stranger drew back with a bow to allow her to enter. Kate led the way into Mr. Ford's sitting-room. The fire burnt cheerfully on the hearth, a loaf and a fragment of cheese, preparations for the day's final feast, stood on the table, but the big leather chair and slippers were empty.

"He will not be very long, if you don't mind waiting," said Kate, lighting the lamp on the mantelpiece. "He always goes out for an hour in the evening; he says it is good for digestion."

"Thank you, I will wait," said the visitor, taking possession of Mr. Ford's own chair.

Kate decamped to the kitchen, where her first proceeding was to survey the state of her hair in the hanging-glass. "That must be the nephew, Mr. Philip Holt," she decided. "I should not have thought Mr. Ford had anyone so grand belonging to him. I hope he did not take me for the servant."

Kate might have been quite at ease. Mr. Holt had not taken her for anything at all. By the time the door had closed behind her, he was deep in his newspaper. The lamp was not particularly brilliant, and he moved it impatiently to the table, close to his elbow, where he paid no more attention to it until a hasty movement of his chair capsized it entirely, and a sudden sheet of blazing liquid came streaming down his garments.

The crash brought Kate upon the scene of action in an instant; it was the first time in her whole career she had had any chance of distinguishing herself, and she was proud to remember after that she had risen to the occasion.

Miss Greig's best Paisley shawl was lying on the lobby-table; she caught it up without a thought of the owner's feelings, and smothered it over the flaming oil, following up with the hearthrug. Two minutes, and all danger was over, and she and Mr. Holt stood in the midst of the wreckage, by no means as calm and composed as they ought to have been, according to all the annals of heroism.

"I 've done it now, and no mistake!" groaned the young man. "Are you much damaged?"

"No; Aunt Greig's shawl is the worst," returned Kate ruefully; "and that is her oldest lamp."

"So I should imagine. Is there any doctor about here?"

"Doctor?" echoed Kate; "are you badly burnt?"

"I don't know about the badness: my leg feels as if that horrible oil were blazing inside it still. There 's my uncle at last."

Mr. Ford's countenance, when he understood what had taken place, expressed the strongest amazement and disapprobation of the whole proceeding. He was a man who liked to pursue an even, unbroken track from January to December; and to find his sitting-room partly wrecked, and in possession of an almost unknown nephew and his landlady's niece, was upsetting, to say the least. Kate slipped away in the midst of his ejaculations to the nearest doctor: he was just setting out somewhere, and came back with her at once. Miss Greig had also arrived by this time, and was rapidly reducing the establishment to order again.

As far as was practicable; for it was speedily made known that whether that extra room were forthcoming or not, Mr. Philip Holt would have to be a lodger at Miss Greig's for some time to come. The doctor peremptorily forbade him to even think of moving for a fortnight, and it might be more; an impromptu bedstead had to be erected in Mr. Ford's sitting-room, which further interfered with its symmetry, and the visitor very unwillingly took up his quarters therein.

"My Paisley shawl!" moaned Miss Greig over the remains that night. "My Paisley shawl! Nine years I've had it this very month, and as good as the day it was bought. I'm not saying you did wrong, Kate, when it was maybe the life of a fellow-creature at stake; but if you could have taken the ironing blanket instead, I'd have been better pleased. It was close at hand, and no an expensive one."

The doctor was not far wrong in his premisses: it was a full fortnight before his patient limped down the stairs and went back to that new railway—a fortnight of ill-concealed discomfort for Mr. Ford, of active service for Miss Greig, the shortest, happiest fortnight for Kate that she had ever known. She had found a hero at last: it did not matter in the least that he was swathed in bandages, and hard to please in the matter of attention; she did not speculate about his income, or the impression he would make upon her acquaintances; she did not even ask if he were likely to give her one kindly thought in return; she only knew that something had changed the whole round world, and that the days were all sunshine.

Mr. Hally derived little outward and visible consolation from his betrothed in these days; he only saw her once, and then she was far too busy to talk to him. Walks! how could he suggest such a thing when there was so much to be done, with sickness in the house? Come to see her! he must not think of it. Aunt Greig and she had not a moment to spare for visitors.

"But it's not Aunt Greig I want to see," pleaded the luckless lover. "Kate, if the days were half as long to you, I think you would contrive to slip out for a minute or two now and again. I walked up and down your street for hours last night, for the chance of seeing you at the window."

"Then I hope you won't do so any more," returned his lady-love, with some asperity. "What on earth would people think if they caught sight of you? If I were a man, I'd find something better to do than go dancing after anyone in that fashion."

"Very well, Kate; I'll not come again; but it's rather hard on me. I had some flowers for you too—will you take them now?"

Kate took them—a limp bunch of narcissus. Naturally they were not as fresh as they would have been the night before, but she picked out the best, and took them into Mr. Ford's sitting-room when that gentleman had gone out for his evening constitutional.

Mr. Holt was lying on the sofa in a Turkish wrapper; his face cleared wonderfully at Kate's entrance.

"I was wondering what had become of you," he said, holding out his left hand; his right was still in a sling. "I hope you are not going to run off again now that you have come."

"No, there is nothing very special to be done to-night," returned Kate, sitting down in Mr. Ford's big chair. "I didn't know you wanted me."

"No, you thought I preferred my uncle's society. Oh, Miss Kate!"

Kate blushed scarlet. "It's a lovely evening," she remarked, with great appropriateness; "quite like summer."

"Really! Well, less than a week, and I shall be able to trot about again, and ascertain that fact for myself. You ought to feel rejoiced to be so nearly quit of me, Miss Kate."

Kate turned a little towards the window; she made no response.

"Don't you?" persisted the invalid.

Kate faced round upon him indignantly. "You know better, Mr. Holt. I wish you could have been months getting well, instead of going away and forgetting all about it."

"How do you know that I shall go away and forget all about it?" demanded Mr. Philip, leaning forward to get a nearer view of Kate's face. "If I come back at the end of the three months, will you be glad to see me, Kate?"

Kate sat perfectly still. Philip put out his hand, and held hers tightly for a brief moment, and then a silence fell upon the room. Kate could not have spoken; all her hopes and girlish visions were widening out into something deeper, stronger; her shallow, ignorant theories withering up at the first breath of real feeling. Whether she ever entered into this new Paradise or not, she would be none the worse for the grand possibilities that came surging up in that hushed silence.

"Now, Miss Kate, I'll trouble you for my chair, if you please," broke in Mr. Ford's gruff voice; "and if you will ask your aunt to make me a little gruel, I'll take it instead of the cheese to-night."

Kate delivered the message verbatim, and slipped away to her own room in a state of rapt exaltation. "Are ye no for any supper the night?" called Miss Greig to her, half an hour later.

Supper! Kate had forgotten there was such a meal. She sat opposite her aunt with such an absent face, that it caught even that lady's attention at last.

"What ails ye the night? you're no like yoursel' at all!"

"Nothing, Aunt. I am perfectly well."

"Have you been falling out with John Hally, then?"

Kate laughed. "It wouldn't be hard to put that right, if I had."

"More 's the pity. You 'd think better of him if he treated you more after your own fashion."

Kate pushed back her chair. She did not want to think of John Hally: there was no room for outsiders in her thoughts to-night. It was Philip, Philip,

"Sometimes they would encounter some of her workroom acquaintances."– p. 778.

Philip—the very name was music. She said it over and over again to herself. What did it matter about money now? She neither knew nor cared if he were rich or poor—better to go on stitching to the end of her days, if needs be, than share a palace with any other man.

After a storm, a calm; a day or two more, and Mr. Philip Holt had gone back to his own quarters at Mrs. McCallum's, and peace and order reigned in Mr. Ford's sitting-room. A handsome new shawl lay shrouded in silver paper in Miss Greig's drawer, ready to enter upon a long career of unworn, unspotted respectability; and a shawl will stand a good many years of such reposeful service, provided always that moths do not creep in and corrupt its integrity.

The same messenger who brought the shawl brought also a note that the postman had given him at the foot of the stairs for Kate—a loving, rather despondent note from her betrothed.

"I hope you will not think I am neglecting you," he wrote. "You know well I will never do that; but I shall not be able to come and see you for a few weeks. Our chief has got something to do with the plans for this new railway, and I have to go and assist. You may be certain I shall come back to you the first moment I can. Don't forget me, dear; nobody will ever love you half as well."

Kate put it in the fire as unconcernedly as if it had been a business circular. She would have to tell him there must be an end of the agreement, but it could stand over till he came back. She would not write to him. It was curious he should be mixed up in this railway too. Kate went about for the next few weeks with a feeling of great relief that he was not likely to appear at any of the street turnings; she was astonished at herself, now, that she had ever borne his presence for an hour.

Spring days deepened into full summer, violet and narcissus faded out of the shop windows, and sheaves of spicy pinks and moon-faced pansies took their place. None of them came Kate's way; in truth, she hardly saw them. She went through her work in a kind of waking dream. The only item of news that interested her in the papers was the course of the new railway, and she could have passed a stiff examination with credit upon any of the details connected with it.

Short-sighted Kate! She was brought down abruptly to the ordinary level of mankind again on one of those bright June Sundays. She and Miss Greig were coming home from afternoon church, and turning into their own street, they came upon Mr. Philip Holt. He shook hands with them—rather coldly, it seemed to Kate, whose whole face had lighted up as John Hally had never once seen it.

"I am glad to have met you," he said, turning to Miss Greig. "I have been knocking at your door this last five minutes. I am going back to London to-morrow, and wanted to finally thank you for your kindness in my catastrophe."

"It 's a good thing it ended no worse," returned Miss Greig. "Have you done with the railway now?"

"Almost. By the way, Miss Kate, I made acquaintance with a friend of yours out there—Mr. John Hally. Allow me to congratulate you."

The colour died out of Kate's face as suddenly as it had come. For the first time it dawned upon her, the meaning that arrangement might bear to Philip Holt.

It had been such an unimportant, easily set aside detail to her, but how was she to explain that? She could only look up at him in dumb consternation. Her aunt filled up the pause.

"Aye, he's a decent like lad enough, though he's maybe no much to look at. Any way, Kate was set on having him, and it's no the best-looking men that make the best husbands."

"So they say," remarked Mr. Holt, looking at his watch. "Well, I have to thank you also, Miss Kate, for your attentions in my tribulation. There is nothing better than a pleasant companion for helping to pass the time."

What could Kate say? Had she not encouraged John Hally for precisely the same reason? Truly her chickens had come home to roost, and she must take them in with what welcome she might.

It was all ended and done with now. She stood at her room window, looking down into the sunny street and slant shadows. There was nothing to look forward to, nothing to wait for; that good-bye shut out light and hope like a dense curtain.

"I wonder if John Hally will feel like that about me!" she said to herself, half aloud. "I hope not, for I did not understand what I was doing. Oh! why, why did I ever let him think of it for one minute?"

"Kate, Kate, are you gone to sleep in there?" cried her aunt sharply at the door. "Come here at once; there's a visitor for you."

Kate sprang up, a wild hope flashing into her mind. Could he have come back? She did not wait to look in the glass or to consider the probabilities of the case. She went straight into the kitchen, to find a big bunch of pansies on the table, and John Hally standing by the hearth, talking to Miss Greig and watching the door.

He was not endowed with keen perceptive powers, but he could hardly fail to see how her face fell at the sight of him.

"Why, Kate, you don't look as though you were particularly glad to see me," he said, in a rather hurt tone.

"I—I wasn't expecting you yet," she stammered; she was feeling quite faint and sick with the disappointment. "When did you come?"

"Late last night. I meant to have been up this morning, but I had to go off with some papers to the other side of the town."

Kate had got through the ceremony of shaking hands by this, and retreated behind the square table again. Her aunt looked at her in some surprise. Kate was not usually troubled with shyness. However, there was no accounting for the ways of young folk, and she had no desire to be ill-natured to them, so she took a small tray from the drawer, and signified her intention of going to see after Mr. Ford's tea.

"Kate, have you nothing to say to me?" asked her lover, coming round to the corner where she had entrenched herself.

"'I am glad to have met you,' he said."—p. 780.

Kate got up then, and plunged into it.

"Yes, I had something, John, that I ought to have said long ago, but I didn't rightly think what I was doing. I made a great mistake when I said I would be engaged. You must not think of me any more."

John fell back a step.

"What have I been doing wrong, Kate?" he asked, huskily.

"Nothing; it's nothing of that kind. Can't you understand? It was my fault all through for letting it ever begin. Don't think worse of me than you can help. I am so sorry."

John Hally walked away to the window, and stood looking down into the sunny street much as Kate had done a little before.

"How is it you have contrived to find this out now?" he asked presently, without looking round. "You promised you would try to like me."

"And I meant to, then, but that sort of thing doesn't come with trying, I think It's no use: I should just end in hating you," she said, half under her breath.

The young man turned back from the window. It seemed to Kate that he had suddenly grown taller, more manly-looking; certainly the awkward diffidence had vanished from his manner.

"In that case there is nothing more to be said. I am very sorry I have been so much trouble to you."

He took up his hat as he spoke. Kate went and stood before him very humbly.

"Will you forgive me, John? I was not half good enough for you. There are lots of girls I know who would be only——"

"That will do," he interrupted, with some dignity. "It was not other girls I wanted."

"And you'll try to forgive me, John?"

"I would forgive you more than that. Kate, I loved you."

Kate asked no more questions. He went away without another word, letting himself out at the front door. Mrs. Greig put her head out of Mr. Ford's room at the sound.

"Why, Kate, is he off already? You've very soon said all your say. I thought you would have asked him to tea, at least."

"He's not coming any more, Aunt," said Kate, in a choked voice. "It's all been a mistake from first to last, and now it's over."

Miss Greig set down her tray beside the forgotten flowers on the table, and looked keenly at Kate's woe-begone face.

"Well, it's your ain affair, Kate, but it seems to me you've made a bonnie mess of it both for him and yoursel'," she observed, sweeping up the pansies, and packing them solidly into a tumbler of water.

Poor flowers, they were the last that came Kate's way for many a day—indeed, for a time she felt as if she never wished to see another. They had been the one bit of sentiment connected with her first love tale, and something of the reproach of it seemed to cling about them ever afterwards.

That was not a cheerful summer or autumn with her. The blue bright days went by, but the blueness and brightness were not for her. She was almost glad when the winter rains and frosts set in, and the last chrysanthemums showed their pure pale faces in the flower-shops. Those flower-shops kept equal step with the march of the seasons. When she was a child, Kate had been wont to wonder how the unfortunate people who lived in the country knew anything about flowers. They might have to search far enough to find one, whereas in town they were in abundance, ready to hand whenever they were wanted.

"Kate, I'm no given to compliments, but it strikes me you've grown a deal more of a woman of late," remarked Miss Greig one night as the year was closing in.

Kate was constructing a Sunday cap for that lady, and carefully pinned a bow in position before she spoke.

"I am growing older, you see, Aunt Greig."

"Aye, but it's no the oldest ones that are aye the most thoughtful. You're no so flighty and excitable as you used to be. Mr. Ford was saying as much the other day, too. That nephew of his is coming back next week. I hope he'll no set fire to the place this time."

"Did Mr. Ford say he was coming?" asked Kate, stooping to hunt for something on the carpet. Not excitable! why, her heart was beating till she thought her aunt must hear it.

"Aye, but he's no going to make any stay. Mrs. McCallum won't be any the richer by him, just for one day and awa."

"Just for one day." Kate counted the hours to it through every one of the week between; but when the time really came, she felt more like hiding herself away out of sight. She lingered over the walk home that evening in quite a new fashion. She knew he had come as she came down the street—knew it by the brilliant light in Mr. Ford's window, by the fluttering at her throat. She slipped into the house as silently as a ghost, and into the kitchen. Miss Greig was there, in specially good spirits.

"You're late the night, Kate," she said, looking up from the pan she was stirring; "and I wanted you to order some things for me. Mr. Holt's here."

"Is he?"

"Yes; I had a famous crack with him before Mr. Ford came in. He was surprised you were not married. I told him you were no a giddy lass now, ready to tak' up with anyone that offered. You ought to go in and speak to him."

"Oh, no," said Kate, shrinking back. "I could not walk into Mr. Ford's room like that!"

"It wadna be the first time. Well, I must take this gruel in; he thinks he's got a chill again."

"He has had two chills every week on an average since he came," observed Kate. "I believe it's just an excuse for getting gruel instead of bread and cheese."

Miss Greig disappeared with the basin. Kate sat perfectly still, looking at the fire. She heard the voices in the next room distinctly, the rattle of the gruel basin, and then she heard a quick step across the lobby that was neither her aunt's nor Mr. Ford's, and Philip Holt came into the kitchen.

Kate looked up at him, but she did not stir from her seat,

"So you are Kate still?" he said, standing right facing her.

"Yes," very briefly.

"I never meant to see your face again when I went away," he said; "but your aunt said something about you an hour or two since that has made me think perhaps I was too hasty. Kate, I have come back. Are you sorry to see me?"

And then somehow Kate took courage, and sobbed out the whole dismal story.

A good deal of the newly acquired sobriety had vanished from her face by the time Miss Greig came back with the empty basin, and Mr. Holt was looking much more at home in the kitchen than in his uncle's orderly room.

"Kate has been telling me about her difficulties, Miss Greig," he said, as she came up beside them, "and I shall make it my particular business henceforth to see that she gets into no more, either by way of passing the time or for any other reason."

SARAH PITT.

THE STONE BEFORE JOSHUA.

(PREACHED IN BEHALF OF THE JEWISH MISSION.)

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone shall be seven eyes: behold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day."—ZECH. iii. 9.

THIS whole chapter is full of delightful truth. It is one of those rich pictures hung up in the Old Testament gallery under which we love to linger, and discover each time we gaze on it some fresh inner beauty. Rather, like the whole prophecy of Zechariah, it forms a gorgeous Gospel diorama; scene following scene in rapid succession: Christ, the great central figure, reproduced in them all. In one discourse, we can only take a very cursory survey.

The opening representation is striking. We are transported in thought to Jerusalem. Not Jerusalem as it was in the magnificent days of Solomon, when a gorgeous Temple crowned the summits of Zion. Nor in the days of Herod, when that Temple was rebuilt in more than pristine splendour. But it is in times of darkness and humiliation, when old Jews are seen moving amid the ruins with burning tears. Joshua the High Priest, and Zerubbabel, had just returned with a feeble band from Babylon to undertake the restoration of these dismantled walls. It is into the midst of the scene of busy workmen this vision ushers us. Amid the dust and rubbish of Zion's desolation, that handful of patriots are rearing their Temple afresh. Not only the people, but priests and High Priest too, "have a mind to work." See that man of dignified mien and serene look, wearing the remnants of sacred attire, moving from place to place amid the ring of hammers and iron tools, directing the removal of the débris of the old Temple to prepare for a new foundation. How humiliating the sight to those among whom he worked and laboured! We can form little idea how humiliating. The law of God had imposed the most stringent injunctions with regard to the personal purity (the purity of the very garments) of the High Priest. To have a spot or stain upon them rendered him, for the time, ceremonially unclean. What must have been their feelings, then, in seeing Joshua moving from place to place, with dress torn, bespattered with mud, his hands rough with labour, his face bronzed with the glow of an Oriental sun? It must have proved to them a sore discouragement at the very moment they most needed Divine strength and succour, through the appointed medium of an Intercessor. As they saw him pass and repass, we may imagine them saying one to another in plaintive sorrow—"Woe are we! Zion is shorn of her glory. He cannot appear in the presence of God for us!"

But let us proceed to the next picture in the succession of visions. The busy, bustling Temple-scene has changed. We see three figures standing before us. We have Joshua, still with his begrimed robes, his defiled, torn garments. We have an angel called "the Angel of the Lord" (or, rather, the Angel, the Lord—the Lord Jesus Christ) standing by him, as if his protector, defender, guardian. At his other side is one of dark and looming visage—Satan, or "the Adversary," perhaps in the first instance referring to Sanballat, the Moabitish chief who headed the hostile Samaritans. These, we know, at this moment, impelled by the old national hatred, were doing all they could to arrest the work of rebuilding, and to insult the captive remnant. In the background of the picture there is a group of common priests ready to obey any commands that might be addressed to them. This Almighty Angel—Jehovah—gazing on His servant, gives the direction to these attendants—"Take the filthy garments from him!" In a moment he is stripped. The vile raiment is cast aside. They clothe him in a new and shining priestly suit, from the purple robe up to the fair mitre set on his head, on which glitter afresh the words, "Holiness to the Lord!" Behold him standing robed in new hierarchal beauty! every remnant of ceremonial defilement swept away. The same Jehovah-Angel further utters the cheering word, "Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee."

What a glorious Gospel reality was under this typical framework! Joshua! Satan! Christ! The panel at the bar; the public prosecutor; the great Advocate and Defender. Satan standing to condemn; the Angel-Jehovah stripping the sinner of his vile raiment, and attiring him in robes of spotless purity!

Once more the diorama moves on. The scene of turmoil and confusion has passed; the picture of the three figures and the solemn reattiring of the priest—that has passed too. It is a farther scene in the historic drama. A crowd are seen gathered around the site of the new Temple. The old rubbish is removed; the new foundation is levelled and prepared. The great foundation-stone is about to be laid, and there stands Joshua in his fresh garments, with the crowds of workmen gathered round him, awaiting the august ceremony. Amid a hush of solemn silence, the God of the Temple speaks, as the carved block of hewn masonry is laid in its socket: "Behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone shall be seven eyes: behold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day."

Brethren, we need not inquire who that Stone was. Peter's exposition, in presence of Jewish rulers, of the striking parallel passage in Isaiah (xxviii. 16) settles the point: "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation-stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste." That Stone was Christ. When we think of the surpassing greatness of the theme, need we wonder that the Divine Speaker should arrest the attention of a world to this announcement: "Behold, behold THE STONE"!

Let us take the several clauses of this verse in succession.

I. "Behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua." "Every house is builded by some man, but He that built all things is God." He built the Temple of Nature. He laid the beams of its chambers in the waters; He reared the everlasting mountains as its pillars, and spangled its roof with stars. But more august and glorious far is the Temple spoken of here. Its foundation-stone was laid by God Himself in Zion. He laid it in the heavenly Zion before He had formed the earth or given the sea its decree. He laid it in the earthly Zion by types and significant prefigurations. He laid it when the great Antitype Himself came and gave His life a ransom for many. He laid it anew, in the Zion above, when Christ was exalted on His mediatorial and priestly throne, a name given Him that is above every name. He shall finally consecrate and glorify it as the "Head Stone of the corner," on the Great Day, in presence of the Church triumphant; when the elect are gathered in from the four quarters of the earth; when the whole building, fitly framed together, stands forth in perfect symmetry and beauty "a holy Temple in the Lord;" when angels, archangels, and the ingathered Church of the Redeemed, bring forth the top stone with shouting, and the cry shall be, "Grace, grace unto it!"

II. "Upon one stone shall be seven eyes." Observe, it is "one stone." There is "one Mediator." "By one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Not as some Churches would have it, with their crowds of canonised saints and intercessors and angels, detracting from the glory of the one all-sufficient work and sacrifice.

Come, see that "one stone laid by the Divine Builder!" "Neither is there salvation in any other." The sun needs no glimmering taper to add to its light; the ocean needs no tiny drop to add to its volume. Let the giant deed of Christ's doing and dying stand forth in all its peerless, solitary grandeur. On this true Eliakim, this one "nail fastened in a sure place," this one golden support in the Heavenly Temple, "they shall hang upon HIM all the glory of His Father's House" (Isaiah xxii. 23, 24).

But, "Upon one stone there shall be seven eyes." What means this? The number seven is arbitrary. It was a sacred number among the Jews, probably from being first associated with the seven days of Creation. Hence we have frequent reference to the same in Scripture: seven altars, seven trumpets, seven weeks, seven churches, seven spirits, seven stars, seven lamps, seven seals, seven angels, seven vials.

It would seem intended to denote (1) Christ's fulness or perfection. In this sense how applicable to Him "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily"! The Platonists and Gnostics, in their philosophy, groped in the dark for this "PLEROMA," this ideal perfection. But it was never discovered, and never would be discovered, till mankind were permitted to behold His glory, "the glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." On that one stone there were seven eyes: the eye of omnipotence, the eye of wisdom, the eye of omniscience, the eye of unchangeableness, the eye of holiness, the eye of sympathy, the eye of love. "He of God was made unto each of us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." "Out of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace."

The "seven eyes" point (2) to Christ's providential government of the Church and the world. The Apostle John, in the opening vision of the redeemed in Patmos, beheld "His eyes as a flame of fire." "They run to and fro through the whole earth." What a blessed truth is this universal, constant sovereignty of Jesus! that the roll in which are inscribed the world's destinies is in His hands: that when the nations are fretted with fury, mad as ever on the arbitrament of the sword—the grievousness of war, "the sea and the waves roaring and men's hearts failing them for fear"—there is One who holds the stars in His right hand, who can rock these waves to rest and say, "Peace, be still"! More comforting still is it to think of Christ's individual providence, the care He takes of each separate member of His Church. This stone, with its seven eyes, has an eye for each. Penitent sinner, smitten with the pangs of conviction, mourning with anguished heart over thy guilty departures, He has an eye for thee! Sick one, in thy secluded chamber, in thy days of tossing and nights of weariness, He has an eye for thee! Solitary one, friends forsaken, thy family scattered, the grave closed over others, He has an eye for thee! Bereaved one, thy heart-strings broken with sorrows too deep for utterance, He has an eye for thee! Dying one, thy foot on the threshold of the grave, the gloom of the valley around thee, thine own eye dimmed with the haze of death, He has an eye for thee! Behold, the eyes of this Saviour-God "are on them that fear Him, on them that hope in His mercy."

"Old Jews are seen moving amid the ruins."—p. 783.

But these words, "seven eyes," may admit of the rendering "seven fountains." The "eye" among Orientals, as you know, is often the metaphor for the well-spring. The Arabs call the fountain to this day "the eye of the desert." Shall we render it, then, thus?—"Upon one stone shall be seven fountains"? This one stone, this Rock of Ages, was smitten by the rod of Justice, and lo! seven fountain-streams flow from its cleft side. There is the fountain of pardon, the fountain of righteousness, the fountain of peace, the fountain of sanctification, the fountain of comfort, the fountain of grace here, the fountain of life and glory hereafter. Mark, however, all these streams, all these fountains, are from one source. "There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God." Oh! the infinite fulness treasured up in Jesus! It is "grace for grace." Grace for a living, grace for a dying hour; grace suited for all the diversities of human circumstances, and want, and trial, and sorrow; for young and old, for rich and poor, for learned and unlearned. He who has unlocked these welling fountains of mercy in Zion is Himself this hour calling with a loud voice and saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink."

III. Let us pass to the next clause, "Behold, I will engrave the engraving thereof, saith the Lord of Hosts." Engravings or carvings on stone were frequent in ancient times. We know, from the excavations in Nineveh, Babylon, Egypt, and elsewhere, that engraving was the old method of inscribing a nation's annals. Their iron graving tools took the place of our types and printing-presses; aye, and while their other records, written on papyrus and similar fragile textures, have perished in the lapse of ages, these "stone libraries" are dug up fresh as they were chiselled and entombed many thousand years ago. Or, to take one other example, let me refer to the "written rocks" in the Mekkateb valley of the Arabian desert. Though we may reject the theory of an Israelite origin, there they are, of undoubted ancient date, uninjured by atmospheric influences, and uneffaced by the hand of man.

In connection with this same Sinai desert, there are two engravings on stone of sacred association, which will naturally suggest themselves. On the top of that mountain, curtained in flame and cloud, Moses receives two monoliths, fashioned with no tool of man, fresh from the mint and mould of Heaven, carved by the Being who was shrouded in mysterious and unrevealed splendour on its summits.

"He built the Temple of Nature. . . . He reared the everlasting mountains as its pillars, and spangled its roof with stars."—p. 784.

Again, on the breast of the High Priest, the predecessor of the Joshua in our text, there were set twelve precious stones. Each separate stone is engraved. There is carved on it the name of a tribe of Israel: twelve in all on the breastplate and shoulders of the Ephod. These two engravings, the stone tables and the High Priest's breastplate, are significant. We may take them as symbolic of the Law and the Gospel: the old covenant and the new: God, by the carved stones of the law-giving, saying, "Do this and live;" but which stones were broken. God, by His blood-sprinkling and blood-besprinkled Priest—God, by the Intercessor of His Israel, telling of the imperishable engraving of His Church and people on a Heart from which they never could be effaced.

Believers! what an honour to be thus set in enduring memorial in the breastplate of our great High Priest! Aaron's oracular breastplate, with the Urim and the Thummim, has long ago perished. When the eagles of Assyria or of Rome swept over the devoted Temple, they laid their talons on it—tore in sacrilegious rage the gems from their sockets. But not so these deathless brilliants, set beyond the reach of corroding time and human vengeance. Once engraven on that Heart of love, you are on His heart for ever. You will be able, amid flaming worlds, to utter the challenge, "Who shall separate me from the heart and from the love of Christ?"

But as we have given an alternative figurative meaning to the former clause, "Upon one stone shall be Seven Fountains," so (to carry out the metaphor) the present clause also may be similarly rendered, "I will open the openings thereof." "I," says God, "will unlock the fountains in that sealed stone, that the waters of salvation may gush forth." He opens the fountains every time His glorious Gospel is proclaimed. He is opening them to-day, as His ambassadors are privileged in their Master's name anew to proclaim, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." He opens the fountains as He sends forth His servants with the rod of power to heathen nations. He has done so amid the effeminate tribes of Asia, the dreary wastes of Africa. The murmur of the living stream is heard amid Australasian pastures and the woods and prairies of the far West. Degraded hordes, bloodthirsty no more, gather around, and with joy draw water out of the Wells of Salvation. And He will go on unlocking these glorious wells and reservoirs until the lofty poetry of Isaiah takes vivid shape and fulfilment: "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water!"

IV. We have one other clause: "And I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day."

This doubtless points onwards to the Day of Days, for which patriarchs and prophets in Old Testament times longed, when the Messiah (in accordance with the predicted words of Daniel) would "finish transgression." In the Mosaic and ceremonial dispensation of the Jews, iniquity was typically removed. Year after year, by a touching and significant rite, the iniquities of the land were laid on the head of the scapegoat, and carried away into the wilds above the Dead Sea—a desert of oblivion. But all was a shadow till the true Antitypical Surety and Scapegoat Himself came to remove iniquity "in one day" by having the sins of His people laid on His guiltless head. It was a momentous "one day," the day waited for by all time. All the sacrifices of previous ages, the streaming blood of ten thousand victims that had crimsoned the Temple courts, would have been utterly unavailing but for the One Offering. The stone was smitten, the fountain was unsealed. He cried, "It is finished"—the iniquity of a guilty land and guilty thousands was on that one day of Crucifixion on Calvary removed for ever! Zechariah, as in other parts of his glowing prophecies, is pointing to the Jewish future. It is of the land to which the captives from Babylon have returned; it is of the land of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob he now specially speaks: the restoration of the Jews in the latter ages, their penitence, their faith, their embracing of the Messiah their fathers crucified.

"The sea and the waves roaring, and men's hearts failing them for fear."—p. 785.

Shall we go a few chapters onwards in this same prophecy for an interpretation of the "one day" spoken of in our text? "And it shall come to pass in that day that I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplication, and they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced; they shall mourn for Him as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for Him as one that is in bitterness for a firstborn." "In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon." And then it is immediately added: "In THAT day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness."

Is that day near? Is it far off? Are there any symptoms of these supplications of Israel, these anguished repentings, these bitter mournings? "O Lord God, thou knowest." To man there is not. The curse of unbelief seems still on the wandering people. Few tears are yet seen in these dull eyes. The Christian Church has awoke indeed to a sense of her debt towards the Jew; but still do her efforts seem spurned and her missionaries duped. "Behold, they are very many and very dry." Shall we despond? Shall we lock our missionary treasury, disband our dispirited agents, pronounce the Mission of all missions hopeless, and consign Zion to the dust and ashes of perpetual desolation? No, no. Never (despite of all discouraging symptoms), never was promise fuller or fulfilment surer than that Jerusalem shall awake from her slumber, put on her beautiful garments, and hail on her mountains the feet of Him that bringeth Gospel tidings.

At the close of the sublime figurations in the Book of Revelation, after God's judgments have been poured out on the Gentile nations, a new word, a new note of praise, strikes on the ear. What is it? It is a Hebrew word, a keynote borrowed from the old language of Israel. The Gentile "Hosannah" gives place to the old Hebrew "Alleluia." It is a Jewish anthem chanted by Jewish voices, and repeated five times in the six opening verses of the same chapter. "After these things," says John, "I heard a great voice of much people in heaven saying, Alleluia. I heard the voice of a great multitude, and the sound of many waters, and the noise of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia."

Few bones in that prophet's valley of vision we have spoken of may be stirring, few skeletons moving; but there is, too, a trembling fretfulness among the Jewish people, as if the tuning of the instruments before the full burst of this "Hallelujah Chorus." The Jews! they may be despised still, as they have been despised for eighteen hundred years; extortion, perjury, deceit, circumvention, may still brand not a few of them with obloquy; yet "All Israel shall be saved:" the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. The Gentile Church will have its part in the Millennial song, and its share in the Millennial glory; but the leaders in that mighty orchestra, the "precentors" to the holy priesthood of a renovated earth, are to be the nation of Israel, the nation "born in a day." It is the children of Zion who are to be joyful in their King.

"The murmur of the living streams is heard amid Australian pastures."—p. 786.

There is a familiar tradition of Joshua and his fellow-builders, in completing the second Temple on Zion, that when they were looking around amid the collected blocks for a suitable corner-stone, they could find none. At last, amid the débris and fragments, they espied one that had been tossed aside as worthless and unshapely. They tried it. It was just what they required. That top stone was brought forth with shoutings, and set in the place of honour on the Temple summit. So shall it be with the Jewish nation. Their predicted song of Christian Jubilee is found in one of their own Psalms: "I will praise Thee, for Thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation. The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner." Church of the living God! rise to your solemn responsibilities in hastening the time when the curse and scorn of centuries is to terminate, and the world's aristocracy are to resume their disinherited coronets and their ancestral land. What is your duty as you muse on this glorious future? Let the prophet reply. It is the call to a solemn mingling of importunate prayer with indefatigable missionary effort: "Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence and give Him no rest till He establish and till He make Jerusalem a praise on the earth."

WHAT DAVID LOCKETT DARED.

"FATHER! here's Davie Lockett, and he has brought us some anemones!" It was an eager voice that proclaimed the wonderful news; for those were the days of Gosse and Kingsley, and "Things on the Sea-shore," when in every family there was at least one ardent naturalist, with a glass globe full of slimy interest and moribund marine zoology; and Rychurch beach was a terribly disappointing place for such. Its ever-grinding shingle and smooth sands yielded scanty harvest.

"And who is the obliging Davie?" I asked. "Whom have you been beguiling from his proper calling this time?"

"Oh father!" reprovingly, "you know the sailor-boy that always goes with us in the boat;" and there was introduced a shambling lad of twelve or thirteen, with smooth red hair, and a pudding face powdered with freckles, whom I recognised as the apprentice of the fisherman whose boat was the children's paradise. His eyebrows were bleached with sun and wind, and as he blinked furtively, with overwhelming shyness, his looks were none of the pleasantest. He wore a pair of fisher's boots, several sizes too large, at which he glanced now and then with conscious pride, but apart from them he did not seem at all satisfied with himself. We extracted, with some difficulty, the information that the boat had run down that night towards Folkestone, where are shelving rocks running under water, and other proper features of the seaside that Lucy sighed after in vain at Rychurch, and hence he had brought for the young lady the treasures that she had described to him. He yielded them up as if unwillingly; received with much apparent misery an outpouring of thanks, and went off down the street, one hand in pocket, and the other striking carefully at every shutter and gatepost, whistling for courage, but dreadfully conscious of his back. The little girls, however, did not look afer him, being lost in rapture, and elbow-deep in sea-water.

Rychurch is not at all romantic or picturesque. It straggles along three or four lanes behind the great sea-wall which is said to date from the Roman times. There are few trees, and they flourish only in the shelter of the houses. The east wind bites them off sharply if they try to rise. Landward there stretches the long level of the Marsh, dotted with farms, each marked by a small cluster of trees. Here and there are the great churches, with grey towers and moss-grown tiles, that bear witness to the crowded population that flourished here in the great days of the Cinque Ports. Long lines of ditches—sewers they call them—intersect the level, from which you may rouse a heron, or where you may see the moor-fowl hurrying into shelter. On a clear day the blue line of hills may be seen where Winchelsea stands, and the nearer cliffs of Folkestone are always in sight. Long-sighted people stand on the sea-wall and point with superior airs to the shore of France. There is not much that is attractive. Someone has lately discovered that the sand-hills stretching towards Romney afford some admirable difficulties for golf, and troops of enthusiasts gather to the links; but five-and-twenty years ago golf was a mystery to the Southron. We came there first because there were broad sands for the children and absolute rest for jaded nerves. We returned again and again for the same reason, and because our old friends the Henshaws were settled there. It happened thus that I saw Davie of the anemones grow up into a stalwart lad. He lost no part of his shyness. Once in his boat, he was alert and skilful to the last degree. There was not a current of tide nor a trick of the wind that he did not know. His master, old William Harper, left everything to him, and the Rosemary, cared for mainly by a boy of fifteen, was the smartest boat along the Rychurch beach. But away from his boat the brightness all died out of him. He would wander about the village alone; he would spend hours on the sea-wall, leaning on the guard-rail, looking out half wistfully, half sullenly, over the sea. Our children for a time were always clamouring for him. There was no more demand, indeed, for anemones, the aquarium having yielded to new interests, but there were sand-castles to defend or invest, lines to prepare, yachts to be carved and rigged, wonderful and impossible voyages to plan. He was always ready to help, but with an ungracious, clumsy shyness, that gradually alienated the children. He went back to his lonely walks and watching of the sea. I found him once looking down wistfully on our children playing in the sand. I tried to talk to him, but he shut himself up in a grim silence, and awkwardly drew himself away.

It was a fine thing for Henshaw, after fighting disease, and almost succumbing to it, in steaming courts and alleys, to move into this keen air and wide open sky. He soon lost the irritability that is born of noisy streets, recovered the burly form and exuberant manners that I had known in bygone years, drove or rode miles every day on the winding Marsh roads to see his scattered patients, was thrown from his dog-cart at frequent intervals and boasted of his bruises, talked of turnips and fish-lines, lambs and mackerel, with equal positiveness, and brought health into a sick-chamber by his very aspect. He was not exactly a sympathetic man, but he was full of a good-humoured curiosity that made him interested in everyone's affairs, and thus the troubles and hopes of the whole neighbourhood passed into his ears and over his tongue. In a short time I seemed to know the place as well as if I had lived there myself. To a close observer who is able to take an interest in men and women, the quietest of country villages is full of incident. No people are altogether commonplace when they are really known.

I found out something of David Lockett's history. He lived with his mother in a two-room cottage, standing apart in a wind-swept field about half a mile beyond the eastern end of the village. The footpath to the Longstone coastguard station passed by it, but there was no other traffic. The isolation of their dwelling answered curiously to the loneliness of their lives. They held neither with the fisher-folk nor with the farm-folk—the two great groups into which Rychurch society was perpendicularly divided. David's costume marked him off sufficiently from the farm-folk, and a sort of mutual avoidance kept him apart from the fisher-folk to whom he belonged. His mother seldom left her own door. There was something wrong about his father. Rychurch, and especially Rychurch beach, was always conscious of this, but not too ready to speak of it.

David was a good, steady lad, and would make a first-rate boatman; there was some respect felt for him. His mother was a quiet woman who minded her own business, and there was no call to cast up anything at her. Such was the general feeling, and it was some time before Henshaw's persistent curiosity found that Lockett was a convict, transported for life for an offence which filled seafaring folk with a peculiar horror. He had been concerned in the wrecking of some ship which was lost by foul play; and this was not the worst, for some of the crew had perished, and the black crime of scuttling a ship was dashed with a darker stain of murder.

The rage of the men of Deal, when the truth came out, had nearly sent him to join his victims in Mid-Channel; but the law had rescued him, and sparing his life on some technical count, had sent him to wear out his days among the ruffians of Norfolk Island. Scoundrel in purpose, and murderer in fact, the man had, by a not unfamiliar contradiction, been tender and kind at home; and his wife, a broken-hearted woman, when she had seen him for the last time on board the convict-ship, came with her baby, barely a month old, to settle in that lonely cottage facing the bleak sea-wall of Rychurch. She might have gone far from the hateful sea, moaning as if for its dead; but some fascination perhaps held her to it.

No one knew how she lived; it was supposed to be on the bounty of the villains whom her husband had served, and who escaped all punishment. All along the Kentish coast the crime was known, and the seafaring men, and still more their wives, shrunk with a sort of horror from the wife of the man who had sent sailors to their death. Still she held by the sea, and persistently brought up her boy to regard it as his element, persuading old Will Harper, who was very silent about the matter, to take him as apprentice. He grew up, as the lads of the Marsh do, tall and strong, but moody, shy, and almost sullen. The shadow of his father's shame lay darkly on him. No one could guess how much he knew of it himself, but it was commonly supposed that his mother had no secrets from him; and had she kept silence, there were bitter tongues enough in Rychurch to wag at the poor boy, in moments of anger, and reveal to him the secrets of his mother's sorrow.

Rychurch is bright in the hot summer months, and bright on a clear winter's day. In autumn the ague creeps over the Marsh, and in spring the withering east wind sweeps under a bright sky, where the sun mocks you with rays that seem to be nipped off before they reach the earth. Nevertheless, in this fierce spring weather there is tonic for nerves and brain, and I was glad one March to go and rest awhile with Henshaw. It was cruel work driving about with him, every bone of one's head aching under the blows of the wind; but this was what I had come for. One day as we were dashing, in the teeth of the wind, along the hills towards Hythe (whither some business or other took us), the wind suddenly shifted from a little north to a little south of east, and in a few moments a dark mist began to spread over the distant sea, and the long level of the Marsh that lay below us.

There was a squall coming, said Henshaw. It was a squall, and something more. Before we reached the level, a blinding snow was driving along horizontally before a gale that almost swept the dog-cart from the road. As we drew near to the village we came into a comparative lull. It was, I suppose, about the centre of the storm; but here, too, the snow was falling fast. Henshaw pulled up at a gate, and told me that he must go across the field to see Mrs. Lockett, who was ailing badly. He would not keep the horse standing on such a day, but the groom should drive me straight home, and he would walk on afterwards. I thought I would like to accompany him and see the mother and son, in whom I had learnt to feel a strong interest. He saw no objection, and we tramped together through the wet snow to the lonely cottage.

We entered the house-place, roomy and tidy, with a small bed in one corner. David sat by the window in a listless attitude, wearing his oilskins and fisher-boots, as if he had just come from the beach. He gazed out through the falling snow, as if closely attentive for something, but without eagerness, with a look of sad, almost hopeless, expectation. He had the build of a man, but he was only about sixteen years old, and his face was the same shapeless field of freckles that I had known so long, and the old yearning look had been gradually becoming fixed.

It was no wonder he was sad, for his mother, by Henshaw's account, was failing fast, and he knew it. Always lonely, he would soon be lost in a gulf of loneliness beyond all that he had known.

Henshaw passed into the little inner chamber, and I began to talk to David; but he was impregnable in his silence, or answered only with a scarcely articulate "Ay" or "No." I spoke of my children away in their Yorkshire home, and a flicker of interest crossed his face, but no more. I spoke of the storm, and he only gazed into it more intently. The wind began moaning again, shifted slightly, and presently burst upon the house with renewed violence, driving the sleet furiously before it. The look of expectation on his face grew more intent. Henshaw was a long time with his patient, and we in the outer room lapsed into absolute silence, listening to the storm.

Presently there came a hasty step past the cottage. I have said that the path to the Longstone coastguard station passed the door. Someone was hurrying that way. David rose and went to the door, through which the wind burst fiercely as he opened it. A moment later there came other steps, and there were loud cries, which I could not distinguish, as a small group of men, with several women, ran past the window. David returned from the door with his weak boy's face set like steel, and passed without a word into his mother's room. I heard eager voices, and Henshaw came out with his jolly face pursed up inscrutably. As he opened the door I heard the woman say, "You must go, my boy; and the Lord go with you. Maybe the time is come; He knows." Then David came out and left the cottage without a word to us.

"There 's a wreck," said Henshaw, "and he 's going down to the coastguard to see if he can be of any use in getting the lifeboat out. I think I shall go too; there 's no telling whether I mayn't be wanted. Will you go home?" And the doctor, who had had no lunch (it being now past three o'clock), went down to wait perhaps two or three hours on the beach on the chance of being useful.

A light seemed to break in on me as I heard those words from the sick-bed and remembered the woman's story. Curiosity or sympathy—I hardly know which—impelled me to go in to her. She started very much as I entered, and I blundered out some explanation of my being there as Mr. Henshaw's friend. "Oh, ay, sir," she said; "you 're the gentleman as was kind to David, and your little girls, sir—I know you. Sit down, sir; you 're welcome. It isn't many——" and then she lapsed into a silence as like as possible to her son's. But she kept muttering to herself; and as I began to speak again, she interrupted me. "You 're a minister, sir, aren't you? Would you say a prayer for them as is in danger at sea? I think too much o' one when I try myself." I knelt down in great awe, and spoke a few stammering words. My mind was full of what I knew and what I guessed. My thoughts, like hers, went out rather with the rescuers than to the rescued. I asked for help in the sacred work of saving life. My words must have struck full on the chords of her life, for she roused herself, her eyes flashing, and cried, "Ay, Lord! that 's what I want. I want my David to bring back a life from the deep. I brought him into the world for that, and I 've bred him up for that, and I want to see it with my own eyes." She spoke wildly, and I knew from Henshaw that she had a good deal of fever; so I tried to calm and at the same time to encourage her. As was natural, perhaps, I stumbled again upon the story of her life, and she turned on me sharply, saying, "Ay! you know all about it! Of course you know; they all know, and they all talk." And she shut her lips hard. The wind shrieked round the house, and we both kept silence. Presently she began again more quietly: "I 've hardly spoken to a minister, sir, these sixteen years, but I 've read it in the Book, over and over again, 'The sins of the father upon the children.' And Davy was born to it. I wished he might never come into the world, for I knew how it would lay on him. But he was born, and his father saw him once, just afore he went away, and he was proud of him like, though he knew he should never see him again. And then I didn't want him to die any more; and while I was wondering how it would be, it came to me as the boy might some day bring back some lives from the sea—do you see, sir?"—I nodded—"and that 's why I brought him up to it."

I suppose she had never said so much to anyone in all those years, and she said it now to me, perhaps, only because my children had found their way into David's lonely heart. I made some sort of reply, and then, after another spell of silence, she said, "Thank you, sir, for speaking so kindly"—I had said hardly a word—"but now, if you don't mind, I 'd rather be left by myself till my boy comes back."

I left the cottage, and walked on to Longstone. The snow had ceased; the wind had worked round to the south-west, driving the black mass of cloud before it, and it was already brightening over Dungeness. The tide was high on the beach, and just below the huts of the coastguard was the small crowd clustering on one of the groynes. The lifeboat was slowly making her way through the surf to shore. Henshaw was there ready for work. The wreck was so near that practised eyes had made out through the glass what the rescuers had done. Someone on the ship was badly hurt, for they had got him down with great difficulty, and one of the lifeboat's crew had scrambled on board to help. For some reason or other, which I could not follow, this man was supposed to have shown remarkable daring, and singular disregard of danger, and there were many speculations as to which of the crew it was. Jem Hardcastle, it was thought, was the only one equal to it, and Jem's wife was standing on the groyne, her hair blowing about her dark handsome face, straining her eyes proudly to greet the man who, she knew, would flinch from no peril. It had been a terrible moment on the beach when the boat had parted from the wreck, leaving this man standing there alone. It seemed to be done purposely, for the coxswain signalled to him, and he then leaped into the sea, and old Sam Taylor, whose steady glass had never left his eye, declared that he was hauled safely into the boat.

I got hold of Henshaw and asked him where was David. He was in the boat. The call was a hurried one; the regular crew were not all at hand, and volunteers were wanted. Boy as he was, the coxswain knew his worth in a boat, and David was allowed to go out for his first piece of lifeboat work. I thought I could see his hard-set face, as he gripped the oar—the face with which he had come from his mother's room.

The boat ran on to the beach; there was the usual struggle to secure it; and they handed out first a man with a frightfully broken limb, whom Henshaw promptly took charge of. Two more were landed. Jem Hardcastle jumped over the gunwale, and kissed his wife, who was waist-deep in the water alongside. Where was David Lockett? Gently and slowly they raised him from the floor of the boat, bore him to the beach, and laid him down on the shingle under the shelter of the groyne.

It was he who had gone up to the wreck, who had dared what Jem Hardcastle modestly said he wouldn't have tried, who had cast loose the lifeboat from her dangerous entanglement with the wreck, and had then leaped for a bare chance of life. A piece of wreck had struck him full on the chest, just above the cork jacket, and it was his scarcely breathing form that old Taylor had seen hauled into the boat.

We gathered round him. One woman—a rough, coarse creature—stooped and kissed his forehead. Henshaw, who was improvising a splint for the fractured leg, came and looked at him, gave some hurried directions, and went back to his more hopeful case.

Who was to tell the mother? After what had passed, I could have no doubt. They were glad to let me go, and promised to bear him slowly to the house after me. I found Mrs. Lockett fully dressed, and in the house-place. She met me with a keen feverish glance; but her face was set like marble. I went to her and took one of her hot hands. "Your son," I said, "has brought back three lives from the sea." She moved not a muscle, but stood waiting to hear more. I spoke of his daring, his skill, his venturing his life for others, his doing what none else would have tried. She stood still waiting, and I stopped. "And himself?" she said, in a low voice. "He will soon be here," I replied, with a miserable attempt at hopefulness. "I know, I know," she cried, her voice rising into a wail; "I knew it must be so." She tottered, and I put out a hand to hold her, crying, "No, no, it is not so;" and hope seemed to gather in me at the sight of her agony, and I went on, "You shall nurse him back to life; you shall see him brave and strong again, and you'll know that you haven't lived all these years in vain——" I do not know what reckless promises I should have gone on to make, but she steadied herself under my hand, and turning to me, said gravely, "Is my son alive, sir?"—"Yes," I said, wondering to myself if at the moment it was true; "but he is very badly hurt."—"They are bringing him here?"—"Yes."—"Then I must get things ready for him!"—She went into the inner room, and methodically set about her preparations, while I marvelled at her calmness.

They bore him into the cottage, and laid him on the bed that she had so lately left. A new strength of motherhood seemed to have come over her. I could see that she wanted to have him to herself; she seemed jealous of every hand that touched him. "The young 'un has a rare pluck; he'll pull through all right," cried careless Jem Hardcastle; but she took no heed of him. The men went out rather sulkily. I could hardly persuade her to allow one of the women to stay with her. Henshaw soon came and did his part, and we went home together to get the food and rest that we greatly needed.

It was more than two years before I was again at Rychurch. The children, of course, tore down to the beach at once, and their first greetings were for a red-haired fisher-lad, strong and hearty, in whose boat they claimed immediate rights. He was just as shy as ever, and almost as silent; but there was no furtive or sullen look clouding his broad, honest face. Old Harper now enjoyed his well-earned leisure, and the Rosemary was practically David's. He moved among the fisher-folk in simple manliness, neither shunning nor shunned. I soon made my way to the cottage in the wind-swept field. I reminded the feeble but cheerful woman whom I found there, how I had promised she should nurse her boy back to life and strength. "I nursed him all the time he was a baby, sir," she said, "just to have him ready when the time came; and then it was like nursing him over again for the beginning of a new life."

107. They tempt us to be wasteful and proud. (St. Luke xvi. 1; Prov. xxx. 9.)

108. The duty of using our wealth while we live in this world so as to help us the better to serve God. (St. Luke xvi. 9, 25.)

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

GRATITUDE DOES NOT EASILY FORGET.

IT is related of Mr. Lindsay, who rose from a cabin-boy to the position of a merchant prince and M.P., that he signally repaid a debt of assistance after long years. He had been ten years at sea, and had gained the rank of midshipman; but he returned home with a broken leg. The owner of young Lindsay's ship came to inspect the vessel, and discovered the lad and his plight. Moved by kindness, he carried Lindsay off in his own carriage to the great surgeon, Sir Astley Cooper, brought him back in the same style, and made the youth a present in addition of a five-pound note. Time went on, and brought its usual strange chances and changes. The great merchant became a comparatively poor man, through the decadence of the West Indian trade. Mr. Lindsay had reached fortune and position. It was twenty-five years after the incident of the broken leg. One day Mr. Lindsay received a visit from the old shipowner, and he knew him at once. He had come to ask that he might have possession of the cargo of a ship previous to the payment of dock dues, so that by a sale he might discharge these liabilities. He had not the money to release his vessel first. Mr. Lindsay, as representing the authorities, refused. But he astonished his visitor by the offer to lend him privately the sum he required. Soon the key to this mysterious generosity was forthcoming. It was gratitude that could not easily forget. The merchant got his cargo, by this timely aid turned the corner, and once more became wealthy. A story like this is as full of instruction as of interest. It pays to do kindly deeds; and not the mere words, "I thank you," are the proof of genuine thankfulness, but the memory that can hold fast the favour until there is a chance to return it in kind.

ONLY A QUARTER OF AN HOUR.

"At the battle of Montebello," said Napoleon, "I ordered Kellermann to attack with 800 horse, and with these he separated the very eyes of the Austrian cavalry. The body of 6,000 Hungarian grenadiers before the cavalry, was half a league off, and required a quarter of an hour to arrive on the field of action; and I have observed that it is always these quarters of an hour that decide the fate of a battle." Was the Emperor thinking of this event when, visiting his old school, he thus spoke: "Boys, remember that every hour wasted at school means a chance of misfortune in future life"?

A SCHOOL FOR SERVANTS.

One sometimes hears the lament that good servants belong to the past, though the "QUIVER Order of Honourable Service" has entirely disproved that idea. A good servant is without doubt a household jewel, to be thankfully prized and held in high esteem. St. John's School, Westbourne Park, seems likely to polish many such domestic treasures, to make the family circle well content in future years. A moderate yearly payment provides the scholars with a careful education and training in domestic work, too often omitted from the curriculum of growing girls whose parents speak proudly of their "book-learning," and whose mothers do all the family work themselves. Swedish drill is taught, and great attention is paid to the children's health. The inspector speaks highly of the tone and discipline of this school, of which the late Lord Kinnaird was treasurer for more than forty years. The girls hold meetings to work for missionary and charitable objects, dressing dolls, etc., for prizes for little scholars in India. When we mention that the young folks make their own clothes, knit their stockings, and prepare their outfits, it will be seen they are not growing up to join the "Army of Do-Nothings," but bid fair to prove of real help in the home where their lot will be cast.

ALWAYS READY TO RESCUE.

Johnson has a saying that "he who wants to do a great deal of good at once will never do any." The converse of this is just as true. He who uses every chance to help and uplift others will bless more souls than he can dare to hope. An illustration occurs in the case of Bishop Asbury, one of the first organisers of the Methodist Church in America. Riding out one day, he saw a negro of bad character sitting on the bank of a creek, fishing. The man was quite alone. It was just possible that he might be willing to talk, and that precious seed might be dropped. The good old minister stopped his horse, tied it to a tree, and sat down beside the negro. At first sheer surprise sealed the poor slave's lips; but as his new friend spoke, the kindness of the tone and the brotherliness, free from any mark of conscious condescension, melted the man's heart. He listened as if the story of the love of Jesus at last seemed real. Tears came to his eyes as Asbury besought him to forsake his evil life and seek God's forgiveness. But whether there was any resolve underneath the emotion, Asbury could not soon discover. He left the district, and did not see the negro again for twenty years. But he was ultimately sought out by an old coloured Christian, who had journeyed seventy miles to have an interview, and to tell of harvest following seed-time. The visitor was the negro found once with his rod by the stream, and by earnest appeals won for the Saviour. This man had since been the instrument of leading many others into the light. Greater is the worker's reward than all his expectations, if, in season and out of season, he is ready to rescue.

FLOWER GIRLS AT WORK.

WATERCRESS GIRLS.

The society for befriending watercress and flower girls has many a record of encouragement, as it patiently endeavours to help and uplift those whose burdens of beauty adorn our streets, and whose lives are so often hard and struggling. A club-room at Covent Garden, a loan fund, the loving efforts of the missionary and Biblewomen—all these unite for the benefit of the girls, while those who would do better if removed from the streets altogether are offered the help of a thorough industrial education. Religious services are held in connection with this movement, and we read: "The adult Bible-classes prove that the Word has lost none of its power or attractivenesss for the people generally, if proper means are taken to press its truths upon their acceptance."

WIDENING CHANNELS.

"It is better to trust in the Lord than to wear one's self out with anxiety." Such is the glad witness of a Christian worker, rejoiced by help dispensed by Miss Mason, of the House of Rest. Our readers will be interested in hearing that the channels of Miss Mason's care are widening, an "Aged Workers' Home" being her new project, for the benefit of such as have borne the burden and heat of the day, and now need a happy and peaceful haven of rest. The Home at Eastbourne has enabled many a faithful labourer to gather new stores of health and strength while drinking in the breezes of ocean, and here, as at Kilburn, spiritual good has been linked with physical; and residents have gone forth to pass on the help they have received in heart-communion. Such will doubtless be the case when the aged ones, who have given their strength and youth to the Master, meet in their own special Home: the place will be a means of blessing, a help by the way to those still in the noontide heat of the vineyard. God has a work for each and all of His white-haired pilgrims yet, while He leaves them in our midst. Many a storm have they weathered, triumphant through Christ, and they can draw on many rich stores of experience. While strengthened by their "Ebenezers," let us deal very gently with those becoming bowed down by reason of years, knowing that ere very long they will "see the King in His beauty."

MISS MASON.
(From a Photograph by Messrs. Elliott & Fry.)

THE BOOK OF NATURE.

No reader of THE QUIVER can fail to understand this phrase. We hear much of the march of science, and of its conquest of the natural world and secrets formerly supposed to be for ever sealed to man. And we are sometimes told that this increase of our scientific knowledge should carry with it a decrease of our faith, and a weakening of our trust in the Father, who gave alike the world, and the intellect wherewith to understand its mysterious processes. But there is a higher science that seeks to lay its laurels of research at the feet of the Great Creator, and point us back through nature up to nature's God. Here, for instance, is a new work by our contributor the Rev. W. J. Spiers, whose papers on "The Flowers of the Bible" must be fresh in the memory of all our readers. His volume is entitled "Rambles and Reveries of a Naturalist," and is published at the Wesleyan Methodist Book Room. Mr. Spiers seems to take us in his rambles over almost every field of nature—seaweeds, snake-stones, pond-marvels, and stars, all coming in turn under observation. And while each is described with the full knowledge of a keen scientific student, and advantage is taken of all that science can teach such a trained student as Mr. Spiers, the lesson he conveys to his readers is still the old one—

> "I hear it in the rushing breeze;
> The hills that have for ages stood,
> The echoing sky and roaring seas,
> All swell the chorus, 'God is Good.'"

HOUSE OF REST, EASTBOURNE.

All honour to the men who thus consecrate their learning to God's service. A few more such works as this useful and interesting volume of Mr. Spiers', and we shall hear no more of the fancied antagonism between science and Christianity, that has been so long and loudly proclaimed. Turning to another book, we are reminded that of all God's works in creation, man is the highest and noblest; so while we speak of the reverent study of God's works, let us not overlook the help and encouragement to be derived from the history of a rightly spent life. The British Women's Temperance Association sends us a tastefully got up little memorial of their late President, Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas, a sister of the distinguished Christian statesman, John Bright. It is a simple record of earnest, honest, unassuming labour in a good cause, and should act as a stimulus to all lady workers. From Messrs. Nisbet we have received the first volume of "The Regent Square Pulpit," containing a series of the eloquent sermons preached by the Rev. J. McNeill from the pulpit of the Regent Square church. The volume is issued in so handy and readable a form, and at so moderate a price, that we hope it will be eagerly welcomed by pastors and evangelists; especially to those who wish to reach "the masses" should it be helpful. Canon George Rawlinson is the author of the latest volume in Messrs. Nisbet's "Men of the Bible" series, bringing his great historical knowledge to bear on the story of "Isaac and Jacob, their Lives and Times." There is much to be said for this plan of taking more than a single life in a volume, as the contrast serves to throw up the distinguishing characteristics of the Bible heroes. Certainly this is the case in the present work, which is one that might well serve as a guide for a series of attractive Bible-class lessons; though, like all the volumes of this series, it should be most useful also to preachers. Mr. Herbert Cloudesley's new book, published by Mr. Elliot Stock, is well named "Passing Thoughts of a Working Man." Some of the thoughts are not very deep, perhaps, but all are good, and they are distinguished by a practical common sense and directness that alone would entitle them to a hearing in this day of "fancies" and "fads." From the same publisher we have received "Songs of Siluria," issued anonymously. We are glad to see these poem-pictures of a charming country-side, and if all are as true as those we can ourselves recognise, they are sure to be popular among those who love the "Marches of Wales." "Nunnery Life in the Church of England" (Hodder and Stoughton) is the record of a misguided attempt to find spiritual peace in the "cloister" on the part of one who happily realised her mistake, and has placed her experiences before the public as a warning to others. This is a most interesting and useful book; and its circulation should be widely promoted at the present time.

SOLVING THE "EASTERN QUESTION."

The Turkish Missions Aid Society, which is entirely undenominational in its character and aims, has for more than thirty years been solving "the Eastern Question" by earnest Gospel work in a widening field. It now carries on evangelistic labours in Greece, European Turkey, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Persia, Eastern Turkey, Syria, and Egypt; it commenced from the circumstance of an English minister coming into contact, while travelling, with American missionaries labouring among Armenians, and thus feeling inspired towards supporting Christian efforts on behalf of races long sitting in shadow. In the Society's organ, the Star in the East, we read of great blessing attending the "Smyrna Rest," which has proved the means of many a bright conversion and many a change of life. "Many ships have left us," say the friends at Smyrna, "with quite a little band of those evidencing the new life within." "I came to Smyrna thinking I was all right," said an engineer who was there influenced for good, "but I saw I was all wrong. I'm glad I've got the light now—I know I'm saved and on the road for heaven." A man who had run away from home fifteen years before was pleaded with at Smyrna; it seemed in vain, but while praying in his cabin he passed from death unto life, and immediately he got to England he went home to see his old mother. As to his former mates, their past ringleader in sin wrote to Smyrna, "What pleasure it would be now to be their ringleader for Christ!" From Ordoo, on the northern coast of Asia Minor, comes a letter recording great spiritual progress, united religious meetings of Greeks and Armenians, and the outpouring of the Divine Spirit upon young and old. Some of the converts are under great persecution, "but He is strong," says the pastor, and those who have consecrated themselves to the Master will never be left friendless and forsaken. From St. Paul's Institute at Tarsus, which includes a Y.M.C.A, and Sunday-school, come tidings of eager listening to Gospel truth, two converts who were leaders in the Catholic Church, and a children's service at which twenty-two, between ten and fourteen years old, rose to their feet in token of decision and desiring prayer on their behalf. May such raindrops be tokens of showers of grace and blessing yet in store!

"THE MIND IS ITS OWN PLACE."

When Hamlet says the world is "a goodly prison; in which there are many confines, wards, and dungeons; Denmark being one of the worst," and Rosencrantz differs from him, he rejoins wisely, "Why, then, 'tis none to you: for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so." St. Paul, when a prisoner at Rome, was perhaps the happiest man in the world at the time when Nero on his throne was the most miserable.

"THE NAME THAT IS ABOVE EVERY NAME."

A good minister told once of an aged saint of his acquaintance whose faculties were failing fast. She could not remember her pastor's name, but at the mention of Jesus, the Rock on which she built, her Comfort and her Hope, there seemed light across those dim mental powers. The old Christian woman was able to say--

"Jesus, my Lord, I know His name;
His name is all my trust."

We asked a young invalid concerning her pain, her weakness, the medical report, and there was not much of cheer to tell; but at the name of Jesus her face grew bright and glad as morn, as she tried to tell how she had never been happier than while laid aside, seeing He was her Strength and her ever-present Friend. The Name that is above every name held miraculous power of old; not less is its power in these latter days to dispel the shadow, breathe hope to the hopeless, and heal the broken-hearted. A wounded soldier of Buonaparte's said to the surgeon probing for the bullet, "Go deeper, deeper, and you will find the Emperor." Buonaparte was shrined, that soldier felt, within his heart. Are we less fervent in our loyalty to the Leader Whose name is Love? Are we so lukewarm that there may be some doubt lingering in the minds of others concerning our discipleship, our highest, most precious choice? Written deeply within our hearts does the Master see Mammon, the love of money, the worship of self, or His own holy name? If Christian souls were as devoted in their zeal for the Lord as was that poor wounded Frenchman for the Emperor, the strongholds of evil would fall as before invincible warriors, and the Name that is above every name would be more manifestly exalted, adored, and glorified.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS.

In a spirit of love, and not of controversy, the "Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland" is gathering a bright and glorious harvest for the heavenly Reaping Day. Christian men well versed in the Scriptures go about the country, visiting, and reading the Bible, and, when required, Irish-speaking readers are sent to Irish-speaking neighbourhoods. In this verdant "isle of the ocean," where hearts are warm and sympathies ardent, there is an open door to the Scripture reader, and he is looked upon as a welcome guest. Testimonies from many a parish show that the agents of the Society are valued and earnest helpers, attending to the sick and aged, opposing infidelity by word and life, and faithfully sowing around the seed of God's own Word. Two of the readers, who travelled on a mission tour, tell of kind receptions, opportunities for declaring the Gospel, and hearers listening with delight. A clergyman working in Ireland testifies that the sister isle could well do with three times the number of readers at present engaged. Itinerant labours have been carried on in the far west, and this branch of the Society's work grows in importance year by year. Cheering accounts are given of visits to coastguards and boatmen, and families in outlying districts. Homely incidents are often used to illustrate eternal truth, as was the case when a poor woman offered food to the reader, saying, "We will not charge you anything for all the potatoes in the skillen, if you can eat them!" She and her neighbours were badly off, but her generosity opened the way for speaking of His love Who delights to give largely, and for an explanation of the fulness and freeness of Divine salvation.

LOGICAL!

When we wish to do a thing, we can generally get someone (especially if we give a handsome fee) to persuade us that it is what we ought to do. A physician said to a man, "You ought to take a little champagne."—"Why?" he asked.—"Well, you are very tall, and you are very bald, and the top of your head is necessarily cold, and you need some stimulus to send the blood to the top of your head!"

THE RIGHT HAND FOR THE RIGHT KING.

There is a suggestive legend of a man who, when travellers were few, wandered from one petty principality to another. He was received with courtesy and kindness, but came to be considered a churl who repaid these things indifferently. It was in this wise:—His hosts had a monarch whom they highly esteemed and reverenced, and who was often in and out amongst his people. The stranger encountered him again and again, and it was noticed that while the men of the land invariably saluted the royal cortège with the right hand, the visitor as constantly made his obeisance with the left. Wonder was succeeded by resentment. It seemed a wanton slight to king and subjects; and at last the daring one was challenged to account for his conduct. He made a simple defence. "You forget that I have a king," he said; "and my first duty is to him. I can admit no rivalry if I would remain my own monarch's man; and though I honour your king, and am willing to show it, there must be no chance of error. The left hand for any other lord; the right hand for the right king." The interrogators withdrew and consulted, and resolved that it was a good and sufficient answer. Their guest was absolved from blame. What of the subjects of the thorn-crowned One? Many claims are made on their regard. Fashion, finance, learning, politics, are the world's princes who pass on the crowded highway. Wisdom, and propriety, and even duty, may bid that we salute one or more of these; but the Christian worker has his own Lord, and will not fail to make the fact plain. The right King must have the best service.

REGRETS.

Ragged Urchin (weeping): "Oh, oh—oh, dear!"—Benevolent Gentleman: "What is the matter, my boy?"—"I 've lost [sob] my penny! Oh!" (Howl.)—"Never mind! here is another."—Urchin sets up another howl as he pockets the coin.—"What is the matter now?"—"Oh, sir, if I hadn't lost the other one, I 'd have two now." Are there not children of a larger growth who resemble this boy? They have allowed the habit of regretting to take such hold upon them, that they may be said not to live in the present, but only in the past. They draw pictures of what their lives would be now if only they had done or left undone this or that thing. And yet they never can be sure that the consequences which they think would have followed from a different course of action would have followed. Indeed, the things that they think were mistakes may have been blessings in disguise, and the indirect causes of what was best and happiest in their lives. If the boy in the incident related had not lost the first penny, he would not have been given a second. If we had taken a different line of action, while avoiding the mistakes we made, might we not have made at least as great mistakes of a different kind? When, on a particular occasion, we did what seemed to be best, we should not blame ourselves afterwards, when we come to know more, for not having acted differently. Had we known then as much as now, no doubt we should have acted differently; but we did not. Let us put away from us this sort of unhealthy introspective egotism. We should take one good look at our mistakes, so as to learn from them what to do or not to do for the future, and then cease altogether to think about them; "write them off," as tradesmen do a bad debt. Our mistakes give us experience; and the proverb, "If a man never has been a fool, he never will be wise," is as true as it is comforting.

THE LATE DR. NEESIMA OF KIOTO.

When the secretary of the American Y.M.C.A. Central Committee visited Japan, as noticed among the "Short Arrows" in our March number, he was much struck with the missionary spirit of the Christian youths at the Doshisha College in Kioto. Dr. Neesima, the founder and principal of this College, has since then been called to his rest. He was in many respects a notable man. Born in the year 1844 within a hundred miles of Tokio, he was brought up in the ordinary beliefs of his people. But, without being unsettled by intercourse with Christian people or Christian literature, he seems to have had a restless dissatisfaction with his Pagan creed, and an indefinable longing for something it could not afford him. A friend becoming possessed of a book written by a missionary in China, showed it to him as a curiosity. He read it, and found a knowledge of the God he had been seeking. Soon after, he read an account of America, and determined (though at that time either to profess Christianity or to leave the country was a capital offence in Japan) to visit the great Western Republic. After some trouble, he managed to get to Shanghai, whence he shipped himself as a seaman on board a vessel bound for Boston. His story, as told by his captain, exciting the interest of an American citizen, he was enabled to enter one of the colleges. At the completion of his course, he passed through that of a theological seminary, and was ordained to the Christian ministry in the year 1874. The Japanese attitude in regard to foreigners had in the meantime been greatly changed, and Mr. Neesima, instead of being threatened with the extreme penalty of the law, was now invited to join a Japanese deputation appointed to visit and report upon the educational systems of the United States and the various European kingdoms. The experience gained while on this mission determined him to devote himself to the cause of Christian education in Japan. As he now stood in favour with his own Government, and had also many friends among American men of influence, he enjoyed exceptional advantages for the initiating of his scheme. In 1876 a training-school was opened at Kioto, with sixty-five pupils; but so steadily did the undertaking prosper, that at the time of Dr. Neesima's death the Doshisha College seemed ready for final development into a completely furnished university. It already included a preparatory course, a course in English, a theological course, a girls' school, hospital, and nurses' school. There were in it about three dozen teachers, with two dozen assistants, close upon a thousand pupils, while its list of graduates had already exceeded three hundred. Great hopes centred in the Christian scholar who had achieved so much, and his death is mourned as a national loss.

"BEHOLD THE FOWLS OF THE AIR"

It has been said by an old writer, "He that feeds His ravens will never starve His saints;" there is comfort for us in the myriad notes that fill the woods with music and flow from poet-hearts endowed with wings. The thrush and linnet and skylark, the nightingale heard in the twilight quietude, the humblest brown birds that twitter a song of praise, have for us a message of help and cheer—we are in God's hands, and He is able to provide for His children by ways and means beyond our human thought. Why is it that the far-off cry of the cuckoo, the lark's hymn echoed from the blue, fill our hearts with such gladness, vague indeed, but potent enough to be medicine for weariness, despair, and doubt? Is it not that the Christian, listening to the birds of heaven, is assured of the goodness of their Creator and their Guide, who protects and directs those tiny wings, and at last "is by the sparrow's dying bed"? for no little helper's life drops to the ground forgotten by the King. Shall He not much more care for His people, His redeemed, His Israel? When we know not whether to turn to the right hand or the left, let us cast ourself upon His guidance Who shows the swallows the track to their desired haven; when our best energies seem spent in vain, and barn and storehouse no longer smile with plenty, let us remember that the Giver of every good gift is He who heareth the cry of the young ravens and He who never sent away a supplicant unfriended, unaided. The busy little tenants of the tree-tops search industriously for food, as well we know who sow seeds and cultivate orchards! and we must unite work with prayer and faithfully labour in the calling appointed by God. But through no fault of his own, the Christian is face to face with difficulty sometimes; his only rest must then be on His providence who feeds the birds, Who sent the manna, Who provided a table for the multitude in the desert when the day was far spent. Many a child of God has found that in the sense of providential help, Divine remembrance, Fatherly bounty, the age of miracles is with us yet.

"THE FOWLS OF THE AIR."

YOUTH AND AGE.

(See p. 871.)

MEN WHO HAVE STUCK TO THEIR POSTS.

A CONGREGATION OF ONE.

MANY chapters in the uncompleted history of heroism tell the stories of men whom neither persuasion nor menace, derision nor even threat of death, could cause to relinquish their duty. It is good to read the records. The heart beats the faster, and the eye is moist, and some faint reflection from these shining souls rests upon our own commonplace lives. Such bright examples as the soldiers, of the doomed Birkenhead who perished obeying orders to the last, of Gordon at Khartoum, or of Chatham coming to his last debate on a day when England's fortunes seemed to him in sad eclipse, and falling in the act of addressing his peers: these are precious to the people, amongst whom they quicken the virtues of fidelity, fortitude, and high patriotism.

But sticking to one's post is an affair of choice or obligation to those who never win the praise of the press, and who have no notion of anything heroic in what they do. It is a part of the presentment of every day. There is a sense in which it is essential to the world's progress, and even to the preservation of the fabric of society. While any person selected at haphazard may at pleasure be a truant from his place in "the sounding labour-house vast," without apparently stopping more than a single insignificant wheel, no conspicuous group can escape; or if they do, there is difficulty and disorganisation in equal degree. We cannot help having a real, if despised, interest in forwarding the general business of our age. A neighbour's deserted duty puts a heavier load on our shoulders, and tasks that we neglect are injuries to our fellows which have a trick of ultimate recoil.

Perhaps there is not only stimulus, but consolation, in the thought. Many an obscure worker is oppressed by a terrible sense of isolation. He is lonely in a crowd. The thunder of the endless procession is in his ears, and it suggests the nothingness of the unit. He is hemmed in by a noisy indifference, and in a spirit of revolt he determines to become a fugitive from his post, to resign the situation, to try a new departure. Yes, but the world's truest benefactors are the unknown, unpraised men of routine. They are absolutely necessary. The monarch on the throne, the politician at St. Stephen's, the leader of fashion, the director of finance, are all debtors of the men who repeat to-day the work of yesterday, and will plod the same round to-morrow.

The counsel to a grave contentment sounds humdrum. The question may be a subtle snare, but it will come—"Are we in the right place? Is there not a possibility of better things?" It is hard to see the philanthropy of toiling on year after year at the old bench in the old workshop, or at the familiar desk in the familiar counting-house. To serve our race is certainly a grand aim, and it should be ours if the fates were propitious, if our feet found the broad thoroughfare of recognised endeavour, if only we had the opportunity of "doing something"—this last phrase standing, of course, for labour on high levels and of striking sort. But a well-known writer says well, "The only way to regenerate the world is to do the duty which lies nearest, and not to hunt after grand far-fetched ones." Or, in other words, we aid and better the times when, in the absence of a clear leading therefrom, we stick to our post, fulfil every obligation faithfully, and wear withal the ornament of a tranquil spirit. Over-restless ambition is an enemy to usefulness as well as to happiness. Men and women are blessings to the circles in which they move when they elect to regard life as—

> "A simple art
> Of duties to be done."

The choice brings no private loss, no foregoing of lofty aspirations. The meek inherit the earth. To these willing servants "great thoughts, great feelings," often come—

> "Like instincts unawares:
> Blending their souls' sublimest needs
> With tasks of every day."

There is a time in many a career which especially tries soul-serenity. It is when the dreams of youth finally fade, when the rose-tints of promise die from the horizon, when it can no longer be disguised from the consciousness that unless there happens some wonderful and unlikely turn of Fortune's wheel the present will become perpetual, and that nothing be left but filling the old office in the old way. Here is the hard-working country minister who has hoped year after year for preferment—and not from any selfish motive, but because a wider sphere must surely mean wider influence for good. And the decades have gone on, and he has been forgotten, until he feels that remembrance now would come too late. He is rooted in his remote corner of the great vineyard, and change would perplex him; but the resignation of the dear wish is none the less a grief.

Here is a painter who has a limited range of success, and, by methodical industry, can even hold his own under the fierce stress of competition, and make a tolerable income. He has had his fancy, and has been slow to write it down impossible on the tablets of his thought. Over and over again he has exhibited, with strong expectation of achieving fame and fortune at a blow. But although the critics grant that he paints conscientiously and well, they deny him the touch of genius. Others are voted in as members and associates of the Academy; he is left outside. With the sun at high noon he sees the truth. His powers are at their best, and they do not entitle him to higher honours than he has earned already. With this knowledge it is hard still to handle the brush cheerily, still to face the dealers, still to send in canvases to the picture shows.

Once more. Here is the barrister who welcomed his first brief—long ago—with a joy at the heart of which was a secret assurance of gaining by-and-bye the judge's bench, if not positively the woolsack; and the hope of a great position has been persistently harboured in spite of tardy progress and repeated disappointments. Now, a certain standing is secure while health and keenness stay. But the golden dream of the young adventurer vanishes, never to return, one dull day in a stuffy court, when he, the elder—with threads of silver in his hair—is actually called as junior in a big case, and is led by a stripling (as he says, with a queer half-angry sigh) whose father was in the same form with himself at Eton.

In each and every such case there is a touch of inevitable pathos about the decision to stick to one's post to the very end. When there is no more chance of the advancement that first fired the eye, and gave zest to labour, it is doubly hard to be reconciled to monotony. Yet the patent of a better greatness may be won precisely at this point by a brave and magnanimous accepting of duties that have lost their gilding, by a steadfast refusal to be envious of more fortunate rivals, and by disdaining to be made morose or irritable through disappointment.

On the mission field, in the slums of great cities, in lonely hamlets where men are few and their ambitions mean, it is no small test of sincerity and fortitude to work on year after year, and have no gathered sheaves to prove to the common eye that harvest follows seed-time. When the clouds of ignorance, vice, and misery seem to lighten not at all, it is hard to remain a volunteer. Nevertheless, the history of Christian and philanthropic enterprise in all lands shows that perseverance conquers. Many times deserts deemed the most barren have blossomed like the rose, and a glad recompense has been made for weary waiting. Consider such an example as that of the Teloogoo Mission in India, where the most zealous and indefatigable labours seemed hopelessly wasted, and the cry was, "We are spending our strength for nought." After long trial and no result, it was almost determined to give it up. But one missionary pleaded to be allowed to stick to his post. His sphere of apparently thankless toil was named the "Lone Star Mission," but he was permitted to stay and preach and teach still; and the heroic endurance and high faith reaped a signal reward. The heathen left their idols, and to-day the converts of Teloogoo number many thousands. It was worth while to refuse to despair.

There are times when the test of entire faithfulness takes a different shape. In the Life of Dr. Lyman Beecher it is related that one wild winter's day the good doctor was promised to preach at a little out-of-the-way country church in America. Not wishing to fail in an engagement, he cheerfully faced the situation, and, after a disagreeable journey, got to his destination. But it seemed that he was given up. Instead of a thronged building, there was a congregation of one. Lyman Beecher preached to the one, and being forced to be personal, wished to shake hands and speak a word on his hearer's own level afterwards. Of this, however, there was no chance, for the man was gone. Many years went by, and in a great city a stranger touched one day the doctor's arm, and introduced himself as the single listener in the tiny church long ago—an impressed listener, who had thought over what he had heard, and acted thereupon. He was now himself a preacher of the Gospel, with a church gathered around him numbering a thousand adherents. Lyman Beecher had resisted the temptation to let the service go by default, and sticking to his post, had been instrumental in bringing about these wonderful results.

Home is a place where fidelity and devotion obtain many opportunities of rising into heroism. Here are often shown the courage and love that win their way to an alienated heart by persistent service. How many wives, mothers, sisters have by a disinterested adherence to duty in a dark and evil hour saved a dear one from despair, death, or shame! To keep husband or brother in the path of honour and rectitude is a task that scores of women wrestle with, hoping, fearing, sighing, praying, through the days that should be their best and brightest, and one which they only resign with life.

Loyal sympathy at home has been a mainstay of many an eminent worker. Francis Huber, the clever and persevering naturalist of Geneva, author of "New Observations upon Bees"—a work full of interest and novelty in its day—met with a terrible disaster. Losing his way on a winter's night, the intense cold of the Swiss mountain-side cost him his eyesight. He became totally blind. Was he henceforth a waif of circumstance? By no means; a brave and loving woman became eyes to him. With his wife as amanuensis, unremitting in solace and obedient attention, Huber was still able to carry on his researches and to communicate his discoveries and theories to the world. Happiness came back to him through these patient ministrations, and he lived and laboured a quarter of a century after his great loss.

It is a touching story, illustrating love clinging to its post to the very end, which is related of the last days of the wife of the great German historian, Barthold Georg Niebuhr. This devoted woman lived for her husband and her husband's work. Niebuhr was warned that he would shortly lose her, and holding her tenderly in his arms, he inquired if there was no pleasure he could give her, nothing that he could do or attempt for her sake. The answer came with a look of intense affection: "You shall finish your History whether I live or die."

It cannot be doubted that in home life also there is rich repayment for an intrepid and a faithful sticking to one's post. In the pitiful instance where a prodigal drifts upon the breakers in spite of utmost solicitude, it is some solace to know that the last effort at rescue was made. And in happier and more frequent cases, where the loving tendance has availed in ultimate turnings of desperate corners, or in the quiet ministries which have helped a dear one upward and onward, it is a deep joy to watch the development of events. There is no spring of earthly happiness so pure and deep as that of witnessing a rise or reformation which willing self-sacrifice has bought.

FELIX FERRY.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

LORD, for the bounties of Thy hand,
For harvests safely stored,
In sweet thanksgivings through the land
Thy praises are outpoured.

Not simply in the anthem's sound,
Where music bears its part,
The tribute of our praise is found,
But in each grateful heart.

For all Thy boundless mercy shown
Shall we not thankful be,
And bow before Thy gracious throne,
Who owe our all to Thee?

We throng Thy courts with hearts sincere
The harvest song to raise,
Assured Thou art well pleased to hear
The children's hymn of praise.

CHAPTER VIII.

HAROLD'S HOME-COMING.

"O! bliss to cross once more the foaming brine."
JEAN INGELOW.

THEODORA sat under the great old chestnut in the garden behind the house. Beth was sleeping close by, sheltered from the June sunshine which fell with such warm light on Theodora's feathery golden hair. There was a piled-up work-basket on the bench beside the girl, but she was not sewing. She was bending over a letter in her hand, with an amused smile upon her face. Within its pages Mr. William Harden made, in stiff and pompous language, the offer of his hand and heart to Miss Theodora Holbrook. Theodora did not feel herself blameworthy; she had never given the young man the least encouragement, and she was quite unaware that her brethren had given him a good deal. They were wont to waylay him as he took his walks abroad; for in the abundant good-nature of his heart, he often bestowed upon them pennies for peppermints, and then, by way of reward, they would tell him many very astonishing facts about Theodora: such as how she said one day he had a beautiful heart, and that she liked him very much. William generally went home from these interviews harassed, but happy.

Theodora smiled as she drew a mental little picture of herself becoming a member of the "Clockwork Family" by the acceptance of William's heart and hand. He would call, dressed in his best, and Mrs. Ansley would put on her prettiest cap, and smile bewitchingly upon her prospective son-in-law. He would take her out for a daily walk, Theodora supposed; just a measured length along one of the roads, then back again. And the wedding breakfast and the trousseau, where would they come from? She thought of the Ansley ménage and the cracked plates and dishes, and nothing ever used for its original purpose—of her own coarse worn gown, and her one good best black frock. Then she thought of Julia Morley, and how patently she adored the very ground under William's large feet. Why did he not turn his attentions thither, where they would be so welcome? She thought of the "Clockwork" honeymoon. William and she would go to some commonplace haunt of brides and bridegrooms, and do everything at precisely the same hour every day—breakfast at eight, lunch at one, dine at seven, spend the evening on the pier saying "Oh!" when hideous glaring fireworks went off, hissing and spoiling the calmness of the summer twilight. They would return at a precise, fixed date to Drueling; they would live with his parents, presumably, until William had some visible means of support. On entering the house, she would be requested to remember the mat, as though it were an object of charity; and she felt sure that, as William's wife, Anne would reprove her at table with the same asperity she displayed towards poor William, who took it all so meekly.

But from outside the garden came the sudden sound of a mighty uproar—screams, and shouts re-echoed, of a kind unprecedented even in that clamorous household. Some great event must be even now and here taking place. She held her breath to listen, then knew that joy predominated in the outcry. The garden gate was flung open, and the children poured in—a tall figure in their midst. One glance at the new-comer's face, and Theodora was in his arms, clinging about his neck, kissing him, laughing, crying, breathless, speechless, while he held her to him as if he could never let her go again.

"Harold! Harold!" the children cried, dancing round him, seizing his hands and coat, and demanding his attention separately and collectively. And Harold it was, bronzed by Australian suns, and healthy, and strong, and handsome. He was very like Theodora, only that his laughing eyes were blue as was the sky above their heads.

"When did you come? How did you come?" she cried, as soon as she could find words. Harold laughed, hunted the children from his immediate vicinity with a wild war-whoop, and sat down upon the rustic bench with Theodora.

Meanwhile Maud—of course it was Maud—had discovered William Harden's "hand and heart" lying forgotten on the garden path. She read the letter through, then screamed in an ecstasy of rapture, danced about wildly, and finally, choking with laughter, read it aloud to the assembled multitude, perfectly regardless of Theodora's imploring protests. It seemed to her a shame to mock him, and a desecration to have the inmost feelings of his heart thus proclaimed to the world. But Maud would not stop, and the others jeered and laughed, and even Harold joined in, until at last Theodora began to cry. She could not help it; she was thoroughly overwrought, and she wept all the more because she felt that her tears were completely misunderstood. She knew that they were looking at each other in marvelling silence, thinking that this emotion could mean nothing more nor less than that she loved William. Harold kissed her, and put his arm about her, and drew her to his side, and told her not to cry, and that she was the best old girl in the world, and then he peremptorily drove the children away, and at length he and Theodora were left alone, except for the still presence of little Beth, whose dark eyes watched them languidly.

"Have you seen mother?" Theodora asked him.

"Yes, in the house. She has changed very little. Where is Mr. Ansley?"

"I think he is at Hinkley to-day."

"Is he as nice as ever—as gentlemanly?"

"He is not changed," said Theodora gently.

The young man shrugged his shoulders.

"That is a mild way of putting it," he said. "But it speaks volumes, for any change must have been for the better. What does he do all day?"

"Oh, I don't know. Let us not talk about him," replied Theodora. "Tell me instead about yourself. How and why have you come home? Oh, Harold, I am so glad!"

"Aunt Florence has been urging me to come back; she has never forgiven you for leaving her; and I must say, Theo, if you will excuse me, I think it was a most remarkably silly thing of you to do. You must be simply wretched here. Aunt Florence said I must come home; that if I staid out there longer, my manners would become colonial, and she could never recover the grief that such a calamity would cause her. And she has got me a post in London—in a Government office, I believe, so I shan't die of hard work, that's one good thing. So I came right along here, thinking what a joke to pounce in on you."

"Have you seen Aunt Florence yet?"

"No; came here straight. How the children have grown! Alice is a rare little beauty, and Polly is pretty in that small piquant way of hers. They are a small race, though, compared with you and me, Theo. And is that the little sick one?" he asked, nodding in the direction of Beth's chair.

"Come over and speak to her, Harold," the girl said, rising.

"She will be frightened; she does not know me," he said.

"This is brother Harold, Beth," said Theodora, raising the little sufferer on her pillows. The great sombre eyes looked at him very listlessly, then closed in weariness. Theodora sighed.

"Is there no one but you to look after her?" he asked her presently, as Theodora's dress brushed him, walking to and fro, with little Beth in her arms.

"No one else," the girl replied. "And I could not give her to anyone else, Harold, for she knows me, and loves me."

Harold was silent. He sat and looked at his sister as she walked.

"You are an angel, Theo," he said presently.

"Oh no, I am not," she said, laughing: "I am not in the least angelic, Harold, so do not think that, or you will suffer a frightful disappointment."

"But to stay here," he said musingly—"to give up all the bright and pleasant life you might have with Aunt Florence, to do as you are doing now. Yes, you are an angel, Theodora. I repeat it."

"I am glad you think so," she said, putting Beth back in her chair. "It pleases me that you think so, for I am very vain; but all the same, you make a grave mistake, Mr. Holbrook."

"What about this man who wants to marry you?" he asked, pointing to the letter he had captured from Maudie.

"Nothing," she said, and coloured.

"Could not be much less. Then you do not want to marry him?"

"No. Very decidedly I don't."

"What sort is the chap—a country yokel?"

"He is very good and nice, and has been very kind to me, but I am not going to marry him. I shall never marry, Harold." And she laid her cheek against his shoulder.

"Stuff and nonsense! Whenever I hear a girl say that I instantly prepare to attend her wedding. By the way," he added in the airiest way, "I asked a girl on the ship coming home to marry me."

"You did!" cried Theodora. "Oh, Harold! how could you?"

"Oh, Theodora! how couldn't I?" he rejoined mockingly, laughing at her startled face.

"But you've no money. You've nothing to marry on."

"But she has plenty."

"But you could not marry on her money."

"Couldn't I?"

"But, Harold dear, are you serious?"

"As serious as possible, my dear child."

"And she accepted you?"

"She did me that honour."

"And did she know your circumstances?"

"I don't know. I never took any trouble to conceal the true facts of the case from her. Neither did I parade my poverty: you don't do that on shipboard. You get up little concerts and sprees, and ship-croquet and fun crossing the line, and that kind of thing. Everyone with a first-class passage is as good as anyone else; perhaps she knew my brilliant prospects in the Government office. Perhaps she did not. You perceive I state the case with the utmost fairness and impartiality."

"And she likes you?"

"She was good enough to say she did, anyhow. And really, I don't see why she shouldn't. I'm not a bad sort of a chap by any means; now, am I?"

"Not a bad sort of a chap by any means," repeated Theodora, laughing—"but a sort of chap without any means."

"You forget the Government office, Theodora."

"And how much has she?"

"Thousands!" said Harold vaguely, with a comprehensive sweep of the hands—"quite enough to keep me—my wants are few, and my tastes inexpensive."

"I don't like to hear you talk like that even in jest," said his sister gravely.

"Would you refuse a man you cared for simply because he was rich?"

"No, certainly not."

"Then why should I refuse a girl for that reason? I can't help that Nora has money, can I? I didn't give it to her."

"Nora—what a pretty name! What is she like?"

"She is a dear little mite, with the most wonderful dark eyes you ever saw, and curly black hair, and one of those delicious creamy smooth complexions. And she sings like a seraph. And she is very fond of me, and I adore her." And Harold stroked his moustache with a contemplative air.

"Oh well, if you do, it is all right."

"Of course it is all right.'

"Does Aunt Florence know?" she asked.

"I proposed between the Cape and Southampton, Theo, and then I came straight away here; so I don't see how Aunt Florence can know, except she's a thought-reader, and subject to brain-waves, and that kind of thing."

"And Nora, where is she now?"

"Gone to her own people. They live in Yorkshire. Nora was travelling with her brother."

"What is her other name?"

"Craydon. Aren't you relieved I have not brought you home a bush-lady for a sister-in-law? What shall we do about calling Nora on a visit? We couldn't ask her here, and I wouldn't if we could. Do you suppose Aunt Florence will invite her?"

"I am sure she will."

"And you will have to come up to town to receive her. I shall be proud of my pretty sister." Theodora smiled.

"I shall be sure to love Nora for your sake," she said.

"And for her own," said Harold, with a happy smile. "You can't help it."

CHAPTER IX.

MRS. HARDEN'S TEA-PARTY.

"Instead of Yes, I gave him No."—ANON.

HANDSOME Harold Holbrook caused quite a sensation in stupid little Drueling. Miss Brown declared it did her heart good to see such a fine young man walk down the village street, looking for all the world as if it belonged to him, every cobble-stone. Miss Oldham said it was quite a pleasure to hand him his daily newspaper across the counter. He had a gay word and a brilliant smile for everyone, rich and poor, handsome and ugly, who crossed his path. The children followed him about in an adoring horde, so much so that Theodora had perforce to give them holidays in honour of his arrival. The young ladies of the village got up all sorts of tennis-parties, and expeditions, and gipsy-teas in the Raylington Woods for his delectation. And Harold accepted all attention and admiration in a calm, lofty way, as merely his due.

Even Mrs. Harden caught the infection, and gave a tea-party. Such an event had not been known in the annals of Drueling, and no one was more surprised and excited than Mrs. Harden herself. The real truth was that she had decided in solemn conclave with the doctor, that in the event of Theodora accepting William's offer of his hand and heart, there must be a party to announce the affair to the outer world. Theodora had refused William, but the idea of the party had gotten so firmly into Mrs. Harden's head, that she issued the invitations all the same, and regardless of what had occurred, actually sent Theodora a note the morning of her party, asking her to come and "put her tasteful hand over the drawing-room." Theodora, greatly marvelling, and inwardly wondering had William not confided his affairs of the heart to his parents, went as requested.

Anne, with a peculiar smile which conveyed the information that she at least knew the exact state of affairs, let her in, and ushered her into the room where Mrs. Harden was busily engaged unwrapping forks and spoons from the retirement of years.

"So good of you to come, dear," she said anxiously, as Theodora kissed her. "I half feared you would not, and I never could get through all that there is to be done without you. You are so clever and prompt, and you know so well just what ought to be done. I have lived so long out of the world, that I forget how to prepare for society."

"I am only too glad to help you in any possible way I can, Mrs. Harden," said Theodora, taking off her hat and gloves. "You need not have feared that I should not come."

"You have not been here of late, my dear," said the old lady, counting a row of forks for the twentieth time.

"I did not like to come," the girl said, colouring, seeing that a reply was expected.

"Is it because of William?" asked Mrs. Harden sharply. "Oh, William must learn to bear disappointment. We cannot have everything we set our heart upon in this world, Theodora.

"He wrote to you, my dear," said Mrs. Harden, nervously sweeping all the forks and spoons into a heap, so that long and careful counting would be needed to get them straight again—"and with our consent, our full consent, and, I may add, our complete approbation. I love you as if you were my own child, and my husband has the very highest opinion of you; and we hoped you would have come to us, and have been our daughter."

"Do not think I do not value your good opinion—that I am not grateful for your love," said Theodora, taking the old lady's trembling hand in her own slender strong one. "I could not marry your son. He is very good and true, and I am grieved that he cares for me. Still, I do not love him. The greatest inducement I could have had would be that I should become your daughter; and to marry him caring only as little as that about him would be to wrong him very deeply."

"My dear, you are right," said the old lady, fondly passing her other hand over Theodora's hair. "I do not like to think what poor William must be feeling just now. But, after all, it is better he should suffer now than marry one who does not care for him. Unless you felt that William was first and last in all the world to you, it would be wronging him to marry him, and wronging yourself too. If only it had been Jack, now——" and she sighed. "Any girl might have been proud of Jack; he was so handsome, and such a manly fellow! And a dear good boy too, though they said such bad things of him. You would not have found it hard to love Jack, my dear."

It became more and more evident to Theodora, as the morning wore on, that the real object of this festive gathering had been to announce her engagement to William. She was to have said "Yes," and fallen with delight into William's open arms; and then, at the party, William was to have bloomed forth as an engaged man in the eyes of the inhabitants of Drueling. How shorn of its glories would the occasion be! She hoped William would hide his woes as nobly as the Spartan boy concealed the fox.

She went about her mission gaily enough, with the devoted Peter in attendance. Peter admired Miss Holbrook very much; but he was not of much practical assistance in the artistic arrangement of Mrs. Harden's drawing-room. Indeed, it would have taken a more heroic soul than Peter's to cope with that drawing-room. An "elegant walnut drawing-room suite" of chairs and sofas stood round by the walls, hopelessly green and glaring. A large round table occupied the centre of the room, with a bouquet of wax flowers under a glass shade in the centre, and a few never-read and unreadable books were placed in a circle round the edge.

Theodora pushed the table into a corner, drew the sofa across another, made the chairs stand about less formally; but the effect was only one degree less hopeless than the original arrangement had been. Who could do anything with those dreadful green chairs, and those red curtains, and those impossible objects called ornaments? While she was trying one plan after another, Mrs. Harden came in and sent Peter away; then called Theodora to the window.

"'Harold! Harold!' the children cried, dancing round him."—p. 806.

"This is Jack's," she whispered—there were tears trembling in her eyes as she spoke. "I found it just now in my jewel-box, where I was looking for some keys I have put astray." Theodora reverently opened the little leather case which the old lady placed within her hands. It held one of those little pictures on glass, with a thin gold-foil setting—an object which no one but a mother would keep—a small boy of about three, with his hands on his knees, sitting and frowning with all his serious baby might. Within the picture-case was a folded, much-faded paper, and inside the paper a silky golden curl. "Jack's hair when he was two years old," said Jack's mother. Jack's hair curled itself round Theodora's finger as she took it from its hiding-place. She stooped and kissed the curl of yellow hair before she folded it within the paper again.

"I thought you would like to see it, dear," said Mrs. Harden wistfully, creeping away as softly as she had come.

That was a great party. Everyone who was anyone in all Drueling and the neighbourhood round about was there—even the three Ansley girls were asked; and Harold had got them new frocks from London, in which they felt more magnificent than they had ever done in all their lives. Polly looked specially pretty; but Maggie and Maudie did not appear quite so much at ease. Little Alice had been left at home, indignant beyond the power of words to describe with Mrs. Harden and the "William man," that the invitation had not included her. Mrs. Ansley was resplendent in the brown silk. Harold was his own brilliant self, and no one could have dreamed that he was inwardly consumed with keenest amusement over the whole affair. Mrs. Harden kissed Theodora kindly. Dr. Harden greeted her very stiffly, and William not at all, and she subsided into retirement as quickly as she could, between Miss Marks and Miss Casson, on the sofa. Mrs. Casson and Mrs. Morley were talking energetically in the centre of the room upon the shortcomings of their respective servants, and how different everything had been in their youth before this democratic age set in, when the tendency is to overturn everything. The vicar conversed with the rector, standing in front of the paper waterfall in the grate. The three Miss Darleys fanned themselves with languid grace. William stood in a distant window, and conversed about the weather and the state of the crops with Julia Morley. Harold went about and made himself fascinatingly agreeable, paying the wildest compliments to every lady present, his laughing good looks carrying off the effrontery of his remarks. Theodora simply marvelled at him as he flitted from "flower to flower," not sipping honey, but carrying a stock of it with him.

"It is quite a case with William Harden and Julia Morley, don't you think?" asked Selina Marks, in a confidential whisper of Theodora. "He is quite devoted."

"Is he?" said Theodora indifferently.

"Poor Julia—she is so plain. Imagine her putting on that red dress this evening. The very colour of all others she should not attempt to wear. So odd, don't you think, how people never do know what becomes them? You always wear grey, and I think it such a pity—it makes you look quite sallow. You don't mind my telling you, do you?"

"Oh, not in the least," said Theodora smiling.

She wondered did Selina Marks suppose that a robe of terra-cotta colour set off her own face and form, or if Belle Casson really thought sky-blue became her rather muddy complexion.

"I never was one of those girls who objected to other people looking their best," said Selina loftily. "But I would not advise Julia Morley about her dress, not for untold worlds. She is so touchy, you can't think."

"Really! I should never have supposed it. I like Miss Morley very much," said Theodora. "There is something so nice and straightforward about her. You always feel that you can trust her, and that she means just what she says."

"So do all of us," replied Miss Selina tartly. "At our last tennis party, he—William, I mean—played all the time with Julia. It was really quite marked," she continued.

"I daresay he likes her as much as I do," said Theodora calmly.

"Have you quite given up society?" asked Selina, abruptly changing the subject. "You never go anywhere now."

"I have been rather busy," said Theodora.

She and the girls had been working womanfully to get the new frocks made, but she did not feel disposed to confide this fact to Miss Marks.

"Busy! Why, whatever can you have to do? I am sure I never know what to do with myself. But do you know, it is a bad plan to stop going out. People will talk, you know, and they are sure to say you have had a disappointment."

"Well, so I have. A good many, in fact. One keeps on getting so many disappointments that at last one gets used to them. It always rains if you specially want to go anywhere, or you can't get the book you particularly want at the library, or your dearest friends are out when you've come quite a distance to visit them."

Miss Selina glanced at Theodora's innocent-seeming face out of the corners of her narrow eyes.

"I did not mean that kind of disappointment," she said loftily.

"Oh, didn't you?" asked Theodora.

Just at this moment Peter the boy created an agreeable diversion by entering the room, with a deeply solemn face, bearing a tray of steaming tea-cups. Johnson, looking red and wretched, followed with another tray, laden with cups of coffee. He was very far indeed removed from Peter's inviolable calm. William hurled himself nobly into the thick of the fray, and handed cake and bread-and-butter, and asked everyone present did they take sugar. After ascertaining their views upon which important point, he relapsed to the window and silence. Not even Julia's glances had power to win a smile to his impassive countenance.

"Major Morley was asking me your age the other day," went on Selina, in her feline purring way. "I was so glad to be able to say truthfully that I did not know. I told him you were not more than eight and twenty."

"Did you?" said Theodora serenely.

"Do you know, you really ought to keep those girls back a little. It makes you seem so old to have your step-sister coming out," was Miss Marks' next pleasant little speech.

"We don't count taking tea in a friendly way with Mrs. Harden coming out," said Theodora, turning towards her with a smile.

"No, of course not," said Selina smoothly. "But it is all of society they are ever likely to see, isn't it, poor girls? By the way, Miss Holbrook, a little bird tells me you were seen at Raylington lately, walking with the new doctor there."

'I?" said Theodora. "The new doctor?"

"Yes, Mr. Sarsfeld. He has just bought old Dr. Thornley's practice, we hear. And people say he is a very charming young man. You know him, so you can tell us all about him."

"Yes," said her father, who happened, in a pause of the conversation, to overhear Selina's last remark. "You know the young fellow, Dr. Harden, probably. Sarsfeld, just settled at Raylington."

"No, I have heard nothing of him," replied his host. "Rising place, Raylington. A clever young fellow, up to the new ways, might do well there. Thornley, poor old man, rather let things go down."

Selina was returning to the attack, when, fortunately, the two younger Miss Darleys proceeded to the piano to play a duet. It was something stylish and crashing—the "Battle of Prague," probably, with groans of the wounded in the bass. Harold next volunteered to sing, and poured forth a lackadaisical ditty, in a melodious tenor voice, that fluttered the ladies in the audience amazingly, each one fancying herself the object of those impassioned strains. He was begged to sing again, and he did. In fact, he was the star of the evening, and the cynosure of all eyes, at the very party which had been designed to do honour to his sister, who sat unnoticed in her corner.

She made her escape from Selina as soon as she politely could, and took refuge with Julia, whom William had forsaken long since. By-and-bye William, perceiving Theodora, came deliberately across the room, and sat down beside her.

"I got your letter, Miss Holbrook," he said dejectedly, as Julia rose to play a piano accompaniment to her brother's flute. "Will you not reconsider your decision?"

"I am very sorry, Mr. Harden," she said, looking at him with frank, earnest eyes. "I am very sorry, but I cannot say anything else."

William sighed heavily. William's next proceeding was to make the great speech of his life.

"I have not much to offer," he said humbly. "And I know I'm not much of a fellow. You are as much above me as the stars. But I know your life is not a very good one, and so I thought, if you would let me I could make you a little more comfortable. And Beth, she should have come too. You need not have feared about that. She should have been my little sister as well as yours, and we should both have taken care of her. But since you have said No, I must even take it. You always say what you mean."

Theodora's eyes were very grave and sweet as she answered—

"I hope we shall always be friends. I can never forget all your goodness to both me and Beth, Mr. Harden. Will you not try and forget all this?"

"What an awful noise that man is making with that instrument," quoth William, looking round wearily in Major Morley's direction. "I wonder could anyone induce him to stop."

It was here and now that Harold really proved himself the star of Mrs. Harden's evening party. Harold proposed round games—a thing unheard of in decorous Drueling—pooh-poohed all opposition in that lofty, masterful way of his, and presently had the room a whirlwind of lace skirts, floating ribbons, and swirling fans, with everybody laughing, talking, gesticulating, nay, shouting, at the same moment, and nobody listening to anybody else. Mrs. Harden looked mildly surprised, the vicar mildly alarmed, and Dr. Harden mildly amused; but everyone else, even the blighted young man William, joined in with eager zest, and very specially the Ansley girls and the two young men, Major Morley and the blue-eyed instigator of the riot. And then supper was another brilliant success, specially the table decorations by Theodora, which consisted of flaming masses of scarlet geraniums and yellow daisies. But as Theodora plainly overheard Harold tell Belle Casson during supper that if he lived in the house with the water-clock it would drive him mad in a week, she did not wonder that the doctor's farewell was distinctly cold. She had refused his son, and Harold had derided that beloved object—"his own invention"—the water-clock.

CHAPTER X.

SUNDAY EVENING.

"The perfect victory is, to triumph over ourselves."—À Kempis.

The next event which shook Drueling to its centre was the arrival of Mrs. D'Albert. She actually took Miss Brown's rooms for herself and maid, while the man put up at the inn.

Everyone came pressing to call after she had appeared in church for the first time, and then Mrs. D'Albert graciously returned these calls, generally with Harold in attendance. Harold had taken rooms at the "Dew-Drop"—so he was quite near his aunt's lodgings, and was much petted and adored by her whenever he appeared there. To Theodora she was icily cold and reserved. Her presence in Drueling was really due to the fact that she hoped by personal persuasion to induce Theodora to return to her, but she did not intend her niece should suppose she even cared for her society in the most passing way. So Harold was petted and Theodora snubbed. It was sharp pain to the girl, for she truly loved Mrs. D'Albert, the only mother she had known, but forsake Beth she would not and she could not. She hid her feelings well, refusing all invitations that she possibly could; but altogether her life at this period was not very delectable. Harold seemed quite as happy without her as with her; her aunt was frigid; and as the long hot days went by slowly, she saw plainly with each one that passed how little Beth grew weaker and nearer the end of her weary life. She longed with a passionate, painful longing for a little money to take her away to the sea-side, and let the cool breezes fan that wan, small, meagre face. She did not like to ask Harold for money, for he always declared he hadn't "a sixpence," and yet, in that inscrutable way incident to penniless young men, he always had money loose in his pockets. She could not ask Mrs. D'Albert. It was useless to ask her mother. There was nothing for it but for Beth to suffer on as she had always done. None of them knew of the long nights Theodora spent walking to and fro in her tiny attic room with the child in her arms; for it seemed as if she could rest in no other way.

One Sunday evening, the first for a long time that she had left Beth, Theodora went to church. A glory of light poured in at the western windows, and stole up to the distant dim chancel, touching arch and pillar and carving with a transient yellow gleam as it passed. Theodora sat just inside the door, and drank in eagerly the tender pathos of the beautiful evening service, resting her spirit from the cares of the week upon the quiet, comprehensive words of prayer and exhortation. Earth and its woes seem to fade into utter insignificance so long as our darkness may be lightened and our souls and bodies kept from the perils of this and every night. As she rose from her knees to join in the closing hymn, she caught sight of Mr. Ansley sitting on a bench not far in front of her. In all her knowledge of him she had never seen him in church before. He was sitting in an attitude of utter dejection, with bent head and hidden face.

"And some have found the world is vain,
Yet from the world they break not free;
And some have friends who give them pain,
Yet have not sought a friend in Thee."

Tears rose in the girl's eyes. Was not the world a fleeting show, in truth, and are not the sorest wounds those which are dealt us by our friends?

"Thy touch has still its ancient power,
No word from Thee can fruitless fall;
Hear in this solemn evening hour,
And in Thy mercy heal us all," sang the choir softly. But Mr. Ansley did not raise his head. The benediction was given, and the congregation filed out into the churchyard. Theodora went on, hesitated, stopped, went on again, and finally stopped by the hawthorn tree, and waited for her stepfather. She was often glad afterwards to remember that she had done so.

He came along the path slowly, his hands buried in his pockets, and a look of astonishment came over his handsome florid face when Theodora stepped forward and joined him.

"You are surely not going to walk through the village with me, Theodora?" he asked. "I don't think you have ever done so in your life. And I, for one, don't blame you."

"I am sorry," she said simply; "there are many things I am sorry for in the past."

"Why!" he exclaimed, "you at least have nothing to blame yourself with. If you want to know what I think of you, though I don't suppose you care, I think you have been like an angel in that wretched house. You remind me of my mother, and she was the best woman who ever walked this earth." Theodora walked beside him in silence.

"There is no reason that you should feel sorry, Theodora," he went on. "Your past is a white one enough!"

"I have been impatient often—and proud——" she began, but he stopped her with a sweep of the hand.

"There has been enough to make you impatient," he said, with an angry undertone in his voice. "I might have been a better man had things been different. But now, what am I? Your fine-lady aunt looks through me, and does not see me when I cross her path. Harold never addresses a syllable to me. And my wife takes up with these people, and associates with them, and pays them court. I am weary of it all—the home and the life here altogether. If I had the means I would go to Australia; Harold seems to have done well enough out there, and it would be a chance for the children. What is there for any of them to do growing up here? Your mother could come too, if she would. She would not need so much finery out there. They are fine children too, and it is a pity to have their lives wasted as mine has been. Only for you, Theodora, they'd be perfect savages. What would you think about Australia? Harold might know of something I could get to do—if you asked him."

"I daresay it might be the best thing for the children," said Theodora absently.

"I am sure you were surprised to see me in church," he continued. "Not much in my line. Don't know how I wandered in there, but it made me think of my mother. I used to go to church with her when I was a boy, and her face used to look so happy and peaceful. And then I thought for her sake I'd like to give the children a chance, and make a fresh start. Would you cast in your lot with us?"

"Yes," said Theodora. Drueling or Australia, all places were alike to her now. "But the money, Mr. Ansley—where would that come from?"

"I don't know," he said dejectedly. "Your mother has some capital she could realise, but I don't suppose she would do it. I have nothing."

At this moment Alice came dancing along the street to meet them. She took Theodora's hand, then slipped her other inside her father's roughened palm and walked demurely between them.

"Well, my pet, what have you been doing?" he asked, looking down with fond pride at the child.

"Harold and the girls have gone for a walk, and Major Morley has gone too. Wouldn't that old Selina be mad if she knew! And I met Mr. Dobson, and he showed me his canaries, and gave me cake—I've a piece for Beth, Theodora, in my pocket. And I met the William man, and I told him you were gone to church, and he didn't look a bit pleased, or anything, so I'm afraid he doesn't like you as much as he used."

Theodora smiled into the little eager face, and, kissing her, sent her indoors. Then she turned to Mr. Ansley.

"I want to speak to you about Beth," she said—"I am anxious and unhappy about her."

"Death would be a happy release for her," he said grimly.

"Do not say that," she pleaded. "She is your child as much as Alice is, and would you give up Alice so easily?"

He put out his hands as if to sweep away the very idea of losing Alice.

"The cases are very different," he said.

"Yes, for Alice is strong and healthy and wants for nothing, while Beth is fading fast from life just for want of care and change. I have no money: I cannot buy her even the food and necessaries which a sickly child should have. Now I think perhaps it might save her life if I could take her to the seaside."

"The child is no worse than she has always been," he said, in a hard and dogged voice. "You are fanciful. In any case, what can I do? You know I have not a penny."

"Can you not give me even a little?" she pleaded.

"How can I get it?" he said, but not so harshly as before. "You know I have not sixpence in the world."

"The child is dying," said Theodora.

He walked on in moody silence, a heavy frown gathering on his face. Suddenly he drew out his watch, and showed it to her.

"This has gone before now," he said, "and it shall go again, and whatever it fetches I will let you have, Theodora."

"Thank you," said Theodora gratefully.

CHAPTER XI.

HOW A PERFECT DAY ENDED.

"No echo seems to wake again
My heart to anything but pain."—A. A. PROCTER.

THE next day great were the noise, laughter, and delight in the Ansley household. Even Harold stayed at home to join in, and, indeed, aid and abet and augment, the fun. Mr. Ansley had gone to Raylington in the early morning, Mrs. D'Albert was with Mrs. Ansley in the latter lady's room. Little as these ladies liked each other, still they appeared to have a vast amount to say to each other. And Theodora took Beth out. The child was deathly pale, and had lain gasping for breath all the long hot night in the little low-ceiled attic room. Theodora was not sorry to escape to the quietness of the leafy country by-ways, for the Ansley children's delight was uproarious. It was caused by the departure of the Clockwork Family to the sea-side. The Hardens always went, and always had gone, upon the exact same day of the year—except when it fell on Sunday—to the exact same lodgings in the exact same watering-place upon the Yorkshire coast. The blinds were all drawn down, the shutters closed, the knocker was laid to rest in a chamois bag. Johnson remained in charge, while Anne and Peter the boy accompanied the family in their outing.

When Theodora returned to the house, she found it empty, and an unwonted silence filling all the chambers thereof. They had all, down to Alice, departed upon a pic-nic expedition to the hanging woods at Raylington. Theodora felt a little lonely, but she tried bravely not to think of the wood solitudes and its cool green ways—she could not have left Beth. She wondered if her fears for the child were fanciful, as they all assured her with such vigorous assertion. Even Mrs. Ansley said there was no change in Beth; that she had always been just as white and languid and weak. It was a very quiet afternoon, and fiercely, mercilessly hot. Vivid sunshine poured uninterruptedly from a cloudless sky. No smallest leaf stirred, and no bird sang. It was impossible to remain in the narrow, stifling house, so she carried Beth out to the garden to the deep shade under the old chestnut. Presently Johnson came across the street with a great basket of strawberries and a bunch of roses, with Mrs. Harden's love for Miss Holbrook.

Little Beth slept peacefully, with waxen, pallid face, and tiny drooping hands—so thin, so blue-veined, that the tears came to her sister's eyes as she looked at them. Then she set to work at that basket, which, no matter how much she stitched, seemed never to grow less full of boys' stockings gone at the knees and heels, and every place where a boy's stocking can be gone.

She worked until the sun went westward, dropping lower in the blue heavens, and long light lines of clouds began to gather about his path. She wondered why her stepfather had not returned. Had his good resolutions failed him, and had he remained in Raylington to spend the money after the various evil styles of spending money which he knew so fatally well? The train was due long since at Hinkley, and the walk over to Drueling was not much for a strong man like him. Another half-hour passed; the sun-rays now came slantwise over the high walls of the garden, and long shadows began to steal along the ground. The burden and heat of the summer day were passing, and the birds began a faint thankful chirping here and there. Theodora wished vainly that someone would come and talk to her—the day had seemed so silent and so long. There was not a sound; and Beth lay sleeping very stilly in her chair. But the afternoon wore on to evening, and the evening to twilight, and still no one came and the silence was unbroken.

After she put Beth to bed, she stood at the attic window watching the sunset. The sky was serene and high; the faint lines of shadowy clouds had grouped themselves, some into arches of gold, and some were floating in the pale, tremulous green reaches of light, like burning ships, flaming and thrilling through with vivid rosy light. And then the sun went under, and the grey turned to purple, and the crimson to faint orange, and the white to dove-colour; while a wide band of glowing crimson belted all the western horizon. But still no one came and the silence was unbroken. She went down-stairs through the dim silent house, and set the hall door open, for she fancied that made her seem less lonely. She listened for a few moments, but there was no sound of returning wheels.

Then she went up-stairs again. Presently she heard the sound of feet, a confused trampling in the hall, and she ran hastily down. As she descended the stairs, she saw out through the open door a group of children, and a few men and women in the roadway, beyond the railings, all staring in. Within the house there were voices, indeed, but no laughter, no merriment. She paused an instant on the lowest step, with a sudden fear catching at her heart. The door of the school-room opened, and Sarsfeld came out into the hall.

"I was coming to look for you," he said, walking straight to where she stood, and taking her by the hand, without any other preamble or explanation. Theodora gazed into his face with wide questioning eyes. He felt her hands trembling within his.

"What has happened?" she asked, her face whitening when she saw how grave he looked, and how smileless were his eyes. "Who is hurt?—what is it?"

"You have heard of the accident, then?" he said questioningly, looking up at her.

"I have heard nothing," she said. "Oh! do tell me!—do not keep me in suspense! Is it Harold?" And she clasped her hands.

"Harold!" he cried, surprised. "Is Harold here? No; it is your stepfather. We have brought him home."

He went to the hall door, and down the little garden path, said a few words to the people lingering there, and then came in and shut the door. Theodora watched his every movement dreamily, with a stunned look upon her face. He came back to her, and taking her hand, felt that she was trembling from head to foot.

"Come in here," he said, leading her into the drawing-room. "Sit down, and I will tell you all."

She sat down obediently.

"Is he dead?" she whispered.

"No; he is just living, but that is all. There is no hope. Will you send for your own doctor, now, before I go?"

"Oh, you are not going!" she cried, putting her hand upon his arm. "You will not leave us, surely. Besides, Dr. Harden went away to-day. We have no one to help us, if you will not."

"I will, with all my heart," he said.

"Where is your mother?" he asked her presently.

"She is out. They are all out," she cried, starting to her feet. "They must not come in suddenly, unprepared. Shall I go to him?" she asked, looking into the young man's face and shrinking visibly as she spoke. "What is being done for him?"

"I don't think anything can be done for him. There are a couple of men in the room. We were all telegraphed for to come when the accident happened. Just beyond Hinkley the train got off the rails and fell over the embankment. All you can do, Theodora, is to show me to what room we can take him, if indeed he can be moved. I have sent to Raylington for a hospital nurse. She will arrive presently, I hope."

"I will nurse him," she said.

Sarsfeld shook his head.

"It will not be for very long," he said.

"How long?"

"Perhaps the hours of this night," was the grave reply. Theodora's lips grew white.

When she had got the room ready they carried the poor sufferer there. Theodora did not see them bear the burden up the stairs, for Sarsfeld sent her to the window to watch for her mother. At last the carriage drove to the door. Mrs. Ansley waved her hand to Theodora, when she caught sight of her, and called out that they had had a perfect day, and it was a thousand pities she had not come. Theodora went down the walk to the gate.

"You look like a ghost," said Mrs. D'Albert brusquely. Her very love for Theodora made her anger against her so sharp, that she could not speak gently to her. Then, with a good-night which included them all, she drove on to the village.

Harold and Polly, who had walked home, arriving half an hour later, found wee Alice in a tumbled heap in the hall, asleep. There was the atmosphere of an accident, of something terribly wrong, in the house. They gazed at each other wonderingly. Then the sound of loud crying came to them from an up-stairs room, and Theodora's gentle, soothing voice. Alice, in Harold's arms, woke up, and began to weep. And then Theodora came softly down the stairs, and told them.

Polly took Alice from Harold, and went away with her in silence. Maggie sat down on the lowest step of the stairs and hid her face in her hands. Harold's laughing handsome face was very awestruck.

The brother and sister looked at each other in silence. He who had wronged and ill-used them all their lives was dying, a helpless shattered mass, his life fast ebbing away into the silence of death. And they were young and strong, with their lives before them.

Theodora took Harold's hand.

"I forgive him," she said, in a low and thrilling voice, and pleadingly she looked at her brother. But Harold shook his head, and freeing his hand from her clasp, went out of the house.

The nurse from Raylington did not arrive, so Theodora prepared to pass the night beside the dying man. She went to all the rooms first. Her mother was at rest, though not sleeping, and Harold, repentant, had come back and was sitting with her. The little boys lay with wide eyes, breathless because of the tragedy in the house. Maudie was asleep, her tangle of golden hair about a flushed face wet with tears; and Maggie was lying beside her pale and anxious. Alice slept peacefully, with the bunch of woodbine she had carried home for Theodora scenting all the room, the creamy blossoms thrust into a pitcher of water near the child's bed. Polly, dressed in her every-day dress, was sitting in the attic, close beside Beth, with a very resolute look upon her young white face.

The sick-room had been arranged by Sarsfeld's deft hands. A light burned low behind a screen, the windows were set wide open so that the least breath of cool air which might stir outside should come in. In the distant depths of summer sky the calm stars shone, and a warm wind just rustled the leaves now and again.

Theodora did not shrink, though she was sick at heart, and pale as any lily in the garden outside; she walked straight to the bedside, and looked at her stepfather. He lay there a prone, helpless figure, his features distorted in strong agony. As she looked at him, Sarsfeld came noiselessly forward from the farther window.

"You here!" she cried, gratefully putting out her hands to him.

"Yes," he said in a low voice. "Have you then forgotten that you asked me to stay? And do you think—if you never asked—that I would leave you thus—and here—and alone?"

The long hours of the night wore on. The silence was unbroken save by a moan of anguish now and again, and the young doctor's gentle footfalls about the room. He did everything for the sufferer. Theodora only sat and watched. There were deep purple shadows about his mouth and eyes, and the dews of death were already damp upon his brow. Towards dawn she rose and walked to the window. A bar of grey, low down in the eastern sky, told that the white light of another day was about to glimmer over the edge of the world. The stars were sweeping their marshalled hosts westward, and all the earth was dark and fragrant and dewy. She leaned her burning brow against the window-sash, and drew in a spray of roses to moisten her dry lips with the dew which lay heavy on their leaves. Sarsfeld came and stood by her, his eyes fixed on the brightening east.

"Dawn," he murmured. "It cannot be long now, Theodora."

Even as he spoke, the dying man's voice called her. Theodora was at his side in an instant, her hand on his.

"What has happened?" he gasped. "Why am I here?"

He tried to turn his head to look around him, then groaned in agony.

"I remember," he moaned, "the crash, the shock, the pain. Oh, was not that death? Have I to die again?"

She moistened his lips with water, as she had seen Sarsfeld do, and tenderly put back the masses of his hair.

"I am dying now, I suppose?" he asked her, opening his eyes again, and fixing them upon her face, panting with death even as he spoke. He smiled with a touch of his old hardness. "Well, I am no loss to anyone, that's one good thing."

He lay back with closed eyes for a long time, his breath coming in long, labouring sighs.

"I want to tell you something," he whispered presently, motioning for her to come nearer. "I must tell you something: I can't die with it on my conscience. Stoop down and listen—I am weak. You must go to Dr. Harden when I am dead, and tell him I took the money. It was there facing me in the open drawer in the waiting-room. No one knew I was in the house except Jack. It was only fifty pounds, I found after I got home. I had ruined the boy for fifty pounds, and lost the last shred of honour I possessed."

Again the haggard eyes closed, and the weak voice ceased.

"It was a moment's madness—but for shame I could not speak. The old man suspected Jack, who had been betting pretty freely that week. I taught him that. He was a good lad, and all the bad he knew I taught him. I never dreamt the old man would have been so hard—so unforgiving."

His lips could no longer form the words; an ashy pallor came upon his face.

"And—Jack—is—not—dead——" he gasped, with the last flickering up of the lamp of life.

Sarsfeld put Theodora aside. He raised the dying man, and laid his head against his own broad breast. Theodora sank upon her knees, and wept.

When she looked up, he was dead.

(To be concluded.)

WITH THE HALT AND THE MAIMED.

SEDAN CHAIR, USED FORMERLY TO CARRY PATIENTS TO THE WATERS.

"AH! Alfred, life has gone very hardly with me since I saw you last," exclaimed George Burton, "and it seems to me I may as well give up hoping to get well again."

"But why?" asked his friend, Alfred Harvey. "Does the doctor say there's no chance of your getting better?"

"Not in so many words; but I asked him this afternoon when I should be fit for work, and he only said, 'Well, you won't be able to do anything heavy for a good bit;' and you know pretty well what that means."

"But why not try to get into a convalescent home?"

George gave a bitter laugh, and replied, "The fact is, you haven't heard the story of my illness, or you'd know why I've no faith in that sort of thing—at least, not for me."

"I wish you'd tell me about it," said Alfred. "You used to be a bit rheumatic, but I don't think you missed a day when we worked together."

"No; it never got really bad till about two years ago, and then I had a sharp attack that lasted long enough to lose me a good place. But I seemed to throw it quite off, and got into work again in a couple of months; only I had to be out of doors just as the first spell of cold weather began, and in less than a week they had to take me off to the nearest hospital, and there I lay for ten weeks as helpless as a baby."

"Was it rheumatic fever?" inquired Alfred.

"Oh yes, and I heard them say it was about the worst kind; but I pulled through, and they sent me to a convalescent home at the sea for a month. I came back quite hopeful, and was able to keep at work all through the summer, but as soon as the damp weather began I knew it was all up with me, and before Christmas I was in hospital again with another attack of the fever, and worse than ever. How I lived through the awful pain I don't know; but very slowly I crawled back into life again, and then I came across a gentleman I used to work for, and he sent me down into the country for several weeks. Well, I came up to London on a Saturday, and got a job on Monday; and you'll hardly believe it, but by the next Saturday I was in the hospital again."

"And were you as bad as before?"

"Not as far as pain goes, but I can't throw it off anything like I did before, and I don't believe I shall ever be myself again."

Certainly, the prospect was dismal enough, and Alfred sat silent for a while, trying in vain to think of some cheering suggestion. At last a thought struck him, and he exclaimed, "Why, I believe there's a hospital at Bath where they treat just such cases as yours."

THE MEN'S WARD.

But George only shook his head, and answered wearily, "No, old fellow; it's very good of you, but I really have no heart to try anything fresh."

But Alfred was not to be so easily repulsed, and having obtained particulars of the hospital, he succeeded in coaxing his desponding friend into giving the new chance a fair trial.

"What did your doctor say about it?" he inquired, as George showed him the filled-in certificate.

"Oh! he said it was the only thing that might do me real good; his medicines wouldn't. And he said, too, that he'd forgotten there was a hospital, or he would have told me the Bath waters were my best chance."

"Well, you may be sure I shall want to know the result when I come back," was Alfred's farewell. And nine months later, on his return from America, he called at the house where he had said good-bye to his invalid friend. The door was opened by a tall young man, erect and active, with a face so bright that Alfred exclaimed at once, "Cured, I declare!"

"Yes, cured," responded George heartily; "and I never can thank you enough for making me try. But come in and hear a more lively yarn than my last."

"Was it a painful process?" inquired Alfred, after hearing of the method in which the mineral waters are administered.

"No; I can't say that. It felt very queer, at first, to be in a hot bath, up to your neck, for twenty minutes, and it used to find out my weak heart and feeble joints in a minute; but it isn't bad when you get accustomed to it."

"And you didn't take cold after being so long in hot water?"

"Oh! as soon as you come out you are wrapped in a flannel dressing-gown and a new blanket, and put to bed for half an hour. By that time you've pretty well got down to your usual heat; but they don't allow you to go out of doors on bath-days, and they are always very particular that there shall be no draughts in the rooms and passages."

"And you really got quite free of the rheumatism?"

"Oh yes, free as I had never felt since my illness first began; but I must confess I was dreadfully low in myself most of the time. They said Bath was not the place to suit my general health; and when I came away, after ten weeks, I didn't feel a bit stronger than when you saw me. But in a very few days I began to feel the old energy coming back, and I've been at work now over four months without even a twinge of my old enemy."

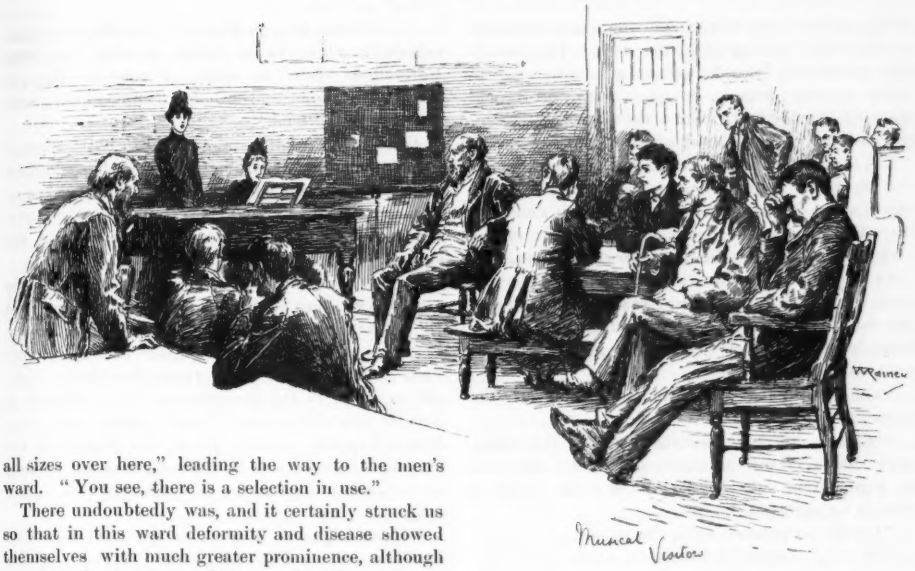
This story of George Burton's cure—true in its facts—came to my knowledge some two years after the above conversation, and being in Bath recently with a friend, we called at the Royal Mineral Hospital where such wonders had been wrought. We were courteously received by the secretary, whose title of "Registrar" has a pleasant suggestion of olden days. Indeed, the hospital can boast of a somewhat ancient history, dating back to the laying of the first foundation stone in 1737 ; and it is interesting to note that whilst in the first five years the total number of patients admitted was only 635, during the last five years no less than 5,394 have been under treatment. Not only so, but the average of benefit received "has shown an equally steady increase," having risen from 62 per cent. "cured or greatly relieved," to the really astonishing figure of 95 per cent. And it is not surprising to hear that the waiting-list continues also to become longer and longer, although "nearly two hundred eligible cases passed by committee" has a terribly mournful sound.

These facts we have learnt in the office of the Registrar, who now proceeds to take us over the building. Passing through a wide hall—out of which opens a spacious board-room—a patients' waiting-room, and the quarters reserved for resident officers, we mount a fine staircase leading to the patients' day-rooms in the new wing, added as recently as 1857. The first we enter is the women's, where over 60 patients are more or less busily employed. Reading, writing, and all sorts of needlework, are the principal occupations. And although some of the more crippled are reclining on couches, and a great number show traces of gouty or rheumatic affections, the general aspect by no means suggests hopeless invalidism.

The walls are adorned with old-fashioned pictures of a somewhat sober type, relieved by one or two modern additions in a brighter style. A grand piano occupies one corner, and it is pleasant to hear that various ladies are in the habit of enlivening the patients with much-appreciated music and singing. The long tables down the middle of the room are used for meals, and women, being of a less quarrelsome turn of mind than men, enjoy the privilege of joints of meat served whole, for which privilege they are well content to forego grumbling over a slice that may possibly be the eighth of an ounce below the regulation allowance!

As we turn to leave the ward, my friend's eye is caught by a selection of odd-looking machines with which the far end is furnished.



"Oh!" says our guide, "those are our go-carts;" and he proceeds to show us how crippled patients learn to walk by their aid, precisely in the same way that a child learns to propel itself, whilst support under the arms prevents overbalancing.

"And is this the preliminary to crutches?" we inquire.

"Yes, as a rule ; and we keep a reserve stock of all sizes over here," leading the way to the men's ward. "You see, there is a selection in use."

THE WOMEN'S WARD.

There undoubtedly was, and it certainly struck us so that in this ward deformity and disease showed themselves with much greater prominence, although as a fact the sexes are about equal in the matter of suffering.

One young fellow we noticed, with a particularly thin, worn face, and a crippled right hand, busy with a frame-work woollen cloud. "An order," he explains, which he is anxious to finish; but he is not too busy to be pleased with our hearty admiration of his left-handed production. The wool-wrap industry is encouraged as having possibilities of something more than merely passing the time; but a good deal of material is needed, and many patients are afraid to risk their capital on the chance of a sale. For such there remains fancy bead-work; and some of the mats, little baskets, etc., are really pretty, and supply occupation at an infinitesimal cost. Games of all sorts are also in fashion, and although few of the patients are troubled with superfluous energy, they do need a good bit of varied amusement to ward off idle-handed mischief. Both day-rooms are lofty, well lighted, and cheered by open fireplaces—in addition to the general warming apparatus—and each has a balcony on the sheltered side, overlooking a capital exercise-ground, nicely laid out with gravel walks, trees, and shrubs.

Our next visit is to the chapel, providing accommodation for one hundred and fifty worshippers, and made beautiful at an outlay of £500. Here service is conducted by the chaplain, twice on Sunday, and two or three times in the week; and with so much heartiness it is not surprising to hear that there is a good voluntary attendance. Having duly admired the chapel, we proceed to inspect the dormitories.

"What is the matter there?" we inquire, as we pass a bed where laboured breathing speaks of chest affection.

"It is really a case of rheumatic gout, but the being in bed means a bad cold, caught by loitering about in the streets instead of taking a brisk walk."

"How often do they go for walks?"

"Three times a week—that is, on non-bathing days; but I am sorry to say they do not always make the best of the hour, and it is surprising how little notion many of them have of avoiding draughts, or of taking reasonable care of themselves."

In the whole of the women's dormitories we find only one patient, and she not confined to bed. Her face lights up as she catches sight of the Registrar, and she eagerly exclaims, "Oh! sir, I've walked to-day; the first time for three years and a half."

And she is delighted to tell how a month ago, after five weeks' treatment, her terribly contracted knees began to "give," and they are now so far straightened that, with the help of a go-cart, she has actually accomplished the feat of walking half the length of the ward. Her joy is a thing to remember; and scarcely less is that of a patient we meet later on, walking by the help of crutches, and gleefully announcing, "I'm going to be a cure yet."

"We certainly did not think he would be," remarks the Registrar; "he came in so absolutely stiff, and it was a long time before he could move a limb, even in the water."

"But I do not understand. Why 'in the water'?"

"Oh! many of the patients, quite stiff out of it, can move their limbs freely when they get in there," pointing to the bath-room we are approaching.

In spite of George Burton's description, we exclaim in surprise at sight of the bath. Indeed, it might well be called a water-room, entered by a flight of descending steps. Fourteen patients, we are told, can bathe at one time, the majority promenading up and down, and the more helpless moving about by means of brass rails running along the sides. The bath is also fitted with hose, by means of which a jet of water can be brought to play with force upon specially affected parts, whilst the patient is getting the benefit of the general application.

"Is the temperature the same for all?" we inquire.

"Oh no. There are several stages—from the ninety-eight degrees of the tepid bath, with which the majority begin, to the one hundred and six of the 'full,' to which only a limited proportion attain."

In addition to the water-room, there is a shallow bath, in which specially bad cases can be laid in the water; and new rooms are being built for the fuller development of wet-massage and extraordinary treatment.

"Can you have an unlimited supply of the waters?" we asked.

"Oh no; the town council regulate the quantities for us in various quarters, but they allow us to pump from 5.30 a.m. to 10.30 a.m., which is enough for our needs."

"Do all the patients drink the water?"

"Oh yes. Generally a tumbler night and morning, as hot as they will take it."

"And do any patients object to the water-cure?"

"Sometimes they go through a troublesome stage, especially where to be better involves the being worse first. But," he adds, "I must say they are sensible as a rule, and can be reasoned into giving the thing a fair trial."

Time presses, and we are obliged to hurry through the basement, only pausing to admire a fine specimen of tesselated pavement, discovered, amongst many Roman relics, in digging the new building's foundations, and retained in situ for the benefit of the curious.

Passing the laundry, where the whole of the patients' washing is undertaken by the hospital, and the kitchen, where wholesale preparations for tea are in progress, we come round again to the entrance hall. Here we find a tall young Scotchman waiting to speak to the Registrar, and it is difficult to believe that this erect "Saul" could ever have been a crippled patient. He is very pleased at the surprise he elicits, and is evidently looking forward to exhibiting himself as a wonder in his native country.

"I couldn't move hand or foot when I came in," he assures us; adding with a laugh, "and, you see, I'm too tall to lie in a cab, so they had to bring me on the outside!"

A. R. NEUMAN.

LUMINOUS BODIES.

(PREACHED, BY APPOINTMENT OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, IN ST. GILES', EDINBURGH.)

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"Ye are the light of the world."—ST. MATT. v. 14.

IT is a trite and familiar observation that our Blessed Lord, in His discourses, often employs the world of Nature as a parable or expositor of the world of Grace. Among other emblems, the sun of heaven, the noblest object in the visible universe, He takes to symbolise His own Person and Mission:—"I am the Light of the world." What the material luminary is to our globe, He, the great Fountain of life and light and happiness, is to His intelligent creation.

But He makes that sun a type of His Church and people, as well as of Himself. Those who receive their light from Him become themselves light-giving and light-imparting. Being transformed into His image, every individual believer becomes a luminous centre to others. He expands the figure in the verses immediately following:—"No man lighteth a candle and putteth it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

And what is the great lesson which, under this well-known image, our Divine Redeemer would convey? It is the influential power of living and vital Christianity: that, just as at His omnipotent word, of old, the globe was bathed in its new element of glory, so when He says to the soul in the chaos of moral and spiritual death, "Let there be light," that awakened soul, baptised in the new-born spiritual element, must "arise and shine!" Let us, in a dependence on the Divine blessing, direct your attention to the great truth which, under a simple yet expressive symbol, Christ brings home to individual Christians; or, as an inspired Apostle, carrying out the type suggested by his Lord, expresses it, "Among whom ye shine, as lights in the world."

I. The Christian is a light of the world. His influence may be compared to light in this: that it is diffusive. There is a beautiful system of mutual influence and dependence all through the material universe. However deeply selfishness may have become embedded in the ruined and fallen soul of man, it has no place in the great world of God. Nothing in creation seems to stand alone, nothing to be isolated. The mightiest agencies act and re-act on one another. The little flower that blooms unseen in the desert cannot keep its fragrance to itself—it must scatter it all around. Every planet, by the law of gravitation, is both influenced itself and influences others. So it is with the moral creation. God never intended man, far less the Christian, to be a selfish being: that his light should be that of the miner's lamp, which is intended only for his own direction, not for others; but rather that of the beacon, cheering the tempest-tossed in the dark sea and starless sky, and guiding them to their desired haven. The light of a holy, Christian, consistent life is seen of all men; and as little can the sun appropriate and retain his own beams, or the moon make a monopoly of her borrowed radiance, as a Christian man or woman absorb their light, and exercise no influence on their fellow-beings around them. The simplest definition of the Christian's character and duty is the best one: not only to be good, but to do good. Each, too, whatever be their sphere or position, must exercise some influence, stir some ripple, however little, on life's waters. As it is the property of the tiniest taper that glimmers in the sick-chamber or in the poor man's cottage, as well as of the blazing meteor, to diffuse light (though in vastly different degrees), so the humblest and poorest and lowliest, as well as the loftiest saint, may do something to show forth the praises of Him who hath called him out of darkness into marvellous light. Oh, what a solemn thought, that each of us, whatever be our lot, or history, or circumstances, or status in the world, is either like the upas-tree, casting a deadly shade all around, or like that of the Psalmist, "planted by the rivers of water, and bringing forth fruit in its season"; either deceived and in darkness ourselves, and deceiving and darkening others, or, if God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined into our hearts, not only do we receive light for ourselves, but we are also lamps hung out to guide the feet of other travellers into the way of peace.

II. The Christian is a light in the world; his influence may be compared to light, in this: that it is steady and consistent. There are many things in Nature which seem calm and unchanging, which are nevertheless fitful and deceptive. What repose more intense than that of the breathless summer air, unstirred and unruffled by a passing breeze? But see that same air at another time, lending wings to the storm and giving voice to the thunder! What more tranquil than the calm of the ocean, the mirror of a cloudless sky, unfretted by one rippling wave? but see it again, swept with storms and strewn with wrecks. Who could have believed that in that quiet bosom there could have slumbered elements so dreadful? Not so is it with the light of heaven. Unlike the fitful flashings in the northern sky are these pure unflickering beams issuing from the fountain of light. Passing at times, it may be, through a dense medium that may partially obscure, the light itself is unchanged. It is stainless, unpolluted, glorious, as when it was first emitted from its great source.

Here is a picture of the Christian: a light in the world by the influence of a stainless, pure, consistent example, proof against the vicissitudes of life, in prosperity as well as in adversity a shining witness for his God—all the brightness of the meteor, with all the steady lustre of the true constellation! If change there be, it is only the progressive change of advancing holiness. His Sun not, like Joshua's, standing still, but like that same unwearied dispenser of blessings in his daily course through the firmament, his path is "as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." What a mystic power there is in high-toned consistency! It is easy for us to act the good soldier of Jesus Christ on a show-day: it is easy for us to wear the livery of godliness at set times and seasons. It is easy for us to appear to be Christians—the thing is to be Christians; to go forth to the world like Moses as he descended the mountain, with our countenances shining with the beauties of holiness: in the bustle of every-day life, in the marts of commerce, in the resorts of industry, as well as in the house and the family, to be proclaiming by elevated motive and consecrated purpose, by faith and love, and meekness and gentleness, and unselfishness—"I am a servant of the Lord Jesus." Aye, and even when the shadows of sorrow are gathering around us, to let our light, the light of patience, and resignation, and humble unmurmuring submission to the Divine will:—to let these shine forth in the midst of the darkness as the stars shine brightest in a midnight sky, or as the dank leaves of the withered rose exude the sweetest fragrance in decay.

III. Light is silent in its agency, and as such, it is descriptive of the silent, noiseless character of Christian influence. We say, in the silent, quiet, unobtrusive character of Christian influence, believers may be said to be the light of the world.

Silent agencies are often the most powerful. The tempest which bows the forest under its sweep is potent, but not so powerful as the secret, subtle electricity which, unnoticed and unheard, lurks in the air we breathe and the water we drink. The avalanche coming sweeping down, bearing terror and destruction in its course, uprooting primeval forests, is a terrific power, but it is local, casual, temporary. What is it in comparison with those silent but mighty agencies which, unobserved themselves, are only manifested by their results? Take that of heat, the agency of heat, e.g., in the bowels of the earth. We see it not; it lurks unnoticed in these mysterious caverns; it only indicates its tremendous force by a few craters on the surface of the globe, as if safety-valves to prevent or to foretell the destruction of a world. Look at the wondrous power of vegetation. Look at the ancestral oak, how silently and noiselessly it has grown to perfection, sending its roots downwards and its branches upwards till, from the little acorn, it has become the defier of storms, and for long the defence of nations! Or look at the silent miracle of each returning spring. Not long ago, a world laid in the sepulchre of winter; every tree bared of its leaves and stripped of its glories; no trace of life or animation throughout the cheerless solitude; creation seemed to have gone to her grave, and the snow was her winding-sheet. But at the resurrection time of spring, how silently and stealthily all again effloresces into life and loveliness and beauty! The leafless forest is clothed with living green, the mountain side with verdure, and amid a song-burst of praise the valleys wave with exuberance and joy.

The same is the case with light. Its agency and influence are silent, noiseless, unobtrusive. The gates of the morning are opened; we hear them not. The gates of the evening are closed; we hear them not; silently they revolve on their hinges. All unconsciously the soft radiance streams into our morning chamber all silently it merges and melts into the evening twilight. It is a type of the Christian and of true Christian influence. It is not the life of bustle and loud profession which is the influential one. True godliness is too deep and real to be noisy; it is known more by its deeds than by its words. The building of the Temple of Jerusalem of old was a beautiful exponent of the silent and unobtrusive character of the religious life. It rose in silence! "Neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron, was heard in the house while it was building."

Be it ours to aim after the noiseless eloquence of a holy character, our pathway in the world marked by quiet devotedness in God's service. It is not the outward parade of boastful profession He values, but the undemonstrative—yet, in spite of itself, the demonstrative—evidences of the fruits of the Spirit, made manifest in a life and conversation becoming the Gospel. The cup of cold water unostentatiously given, or the patient forgiveness of an injury, will, on the Great Day, receive the acknowledgment denied to many a brilliant deed that drew down the plaudits of thousands. The Psalmist speaks of the most eloquent witnesses in the material world as silent ones: "The heavens declare the glory of God, the firmament showeth forth His handiwork." "They have no speech nor language," he adds; "their voice is not heard." But day hands on the unspoken message to day, and night transmits it to night. In silent power the dumb witnesses are hourly proclaiming His eternal power and Godhead.

And what these lights are to the material world the Christian is to the moral world. A life given to God never can be silent. A Christian may, from lowly and poor and humble circumstances, be little conscious of exercising any influence for good. But remember, it is with unconscious influences and agencies as we have said of silent ones: they are often the most important. The light of a ship, hung out for its own use, has proved the security and safety of the castaway. The sweet aroma wafted from the spicy islands is said to give the first tidings to the mariner that land is near, while he descries nothing but a wilderness of waters around him. So, many a believer may be, like that solitary isle, conscious of emitting no influence; and yet, all unknown, the sweet fragrance of grace and consistent piety may be wafted abroad, and many a hopeless and hapless voyager on the sea of life may be lured and guided into the quiet of the Gospel haven. Be it ours to hold on the even, unobtrusive tenor of our way, commending as we may the religion of the Lord we serve. I repeat it once more: silent and unconscious agencies are frequently the mightiest. Often has the infidel who has rejected the message of God contained in the inspired Word been awed into conviction from the study of the living Epistle, as page after page of a heavenly life passed under review. The tree in the forest which has defied ruder influences has at last had to yield under the falling of the snowflake. The axe had not marked it, the breath of the tempest had passed over it unscathed, but flake by flake of virgin snow softly and gently loaded its branches—it succumbed and fell.

IV. Once more, I observe that light often survives when the source of light is gone. This, too, is characteristic and descriptive of the nature of Christian influence. It survives the subject of it; a man's character lives after death. You may have often observed the rays lingering on the mountain tops when the sun had itself set. When the glens are in deep shadow, the summits which enclose them are ruddied over with light, rendered all the more lustrous by contrast with the sombre twilight tone around.

So it is with the Christian. He dies; but when the sun of his earthly existence goes down, the subdued and softened light of character lingers on the world's mountain tops, so that, in one sublime sense, it cannot be said, "The place that once knew him knows him no more!" Like the sun in the western horizon, he vanishes from sight, only to shine in another and brighter hemisphere. But he leaves a radiance behind him. The memory of holy looks and holy words and holy deeds: of high-minded Christian integrity and faith and love: a consistent walk with God: these are the lingering rays which even the shadow of death cannot obscure or extinguish. Let not the Christian mother, as she is laid on her death-bed, abandon all hopes of her prodigal. She may see the prayers and counsels of a lifetime apparently mocked and scorned. These prayers and that example will not perish along with her. The unheeded voice may yet be heard, though it seems to be hushed for ever in the silence of the grave, the land of forgetfulness. John Newton's mother was laid somewhere far off in her grave in England; but the hand that had oft smoothed his infant pillow was knocking at his heart that dark night when, standing at the prow of his vessel, he remembered the hymn which his mother taught him! Brethren, it is a solemn thing, this death-surviving influence. Influence during life is a vast and sacred responsibility; that we must either be like the living stream, fertilising as it flows, or like the stagnant pool, which the sun shines on, breeding or diffusing corruption. But still more solemn is the thought: No man has ever left this world without exercising, after death, for good or for evil, some influence on his fellows. Surviving influence! It is like the bell in one of our northern lighthouses, which, when the lonely watcher of the rock suddenly died, was said still to continue tolling, swung by the dash of the waves!

My friends, which will it be with us? The doleful toll, a dirge over forfeited opportunities, neglected trusts, wasted hours, guilty memories? Or shall we be among the happy number "with whom the melodies abide of the everlasting chime?"

If all we have said has a solemn significance with regard to individual believers, so, also we may appropriately recall, has it to the Church, and every branch of the Church in its collective and corporate capacity. No Church can absorb its light, no Church can shine alone and for itself. As the world's spiritual Pharos, it must diffuse its radiance all around. No Church can have a true claim to be evangelical, which fails to be evangelistic. It ought to be, it must be, the centre of holy living influences, which know no circumference but the world. And surely if it be the bounden duty of a Church always to be thus giving forth light, especially should it be so in seasons of trouble and darkness and perplexity. If the wakeful Levite in the Temple of old was at all times tremblingly alive to his charge as the guardian and custodian of the House of God, much more would he be so in times of danger, when the enemy was at the gates. How carefully would he then trim his lamps and feed their flame! Let the alarm-bell which is now tolling over the nations, as well as the Churches of apostate Christendom, serve as a call for quickening our faith, deepening and energising the sense of our responsibilities. The old ever-refluent tidal-wave of unbelief is leaving its devastating mark on our own shores as well as on others. Be it ours to look with greater simplicity of trust to Him who rules the raging sea. Or, returning to the figure of the text: amid the darkening shadows of materialism and rationalistic error, to seek for light and direction from the true "Light-Giver," who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks and holdeth the stars in His right hand, feeding each candlestick with the oil of His grace, and keeping every star in its sphere in the firmament. Brethren, as a Church, a halo of transmitted privilege is ours. A sacred torch has been handed down to us from other generations. Let us re-kindle it at the Divine altar-fires, and keep its flame undimmed for those who are to follow. If our quest, the quest of many an earnest soul in these times, be: "Wilt thou not revive us, O Lord?" as a Church, may we be prepared to give a ready response to the approving voice and summons of the Master: "Arise, shine, for thy Light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee!"

JOYCE HALLIDAY'S MISTAKE.

"JANET, Miss Peggy is talking to that old fisherman again. You ought not to let her go about those boats so much."

"I can't stop her, Miss Joyce," retorted Janet feebly. "I've told her lots of times you'd be angry, but it's no use; and he's a decent kind of man."

"I don't doubt that, but she is not likely to get much good from a fisherman. Go and bring her away at once."

Miss Joyce shut up her book with a snap, and then as suddenly opened it again, and smoothed her knitted brows. Someone was coming along the jetty, someone was coming to her: and Janet, and Peggy, and the fisherman, dwindled into very secondary items. Life was altogether too brief to be given up to minor worries.

The "someone" came leisurely down the rough planks—a tall, good-looking man in a velvet coat, that stamped his profession at once. No one but an artist, also a refined and fashionable artist, could have arrayed himself in such soft rich browns and greys; every detail, from his collar-stud to his shoes, was perfection in its own department. Joyce looked up at him with ill-concealed admiration shining in her honest eyes.

"I thought I should find you down here," he said, balancing himself lightly on the low parapet; "what is Miss Peggy in disgrace about? Janet looked like a thunder-cloud as she passed me."

"And I felt like one," laughed Joyce. "The child has such a ridiculous fancy for some old fisherman down yonder. She would spend all her time among the boats if she could. I don't quite like it."

Mr. Salterne put up his glass and surveyed the brown nets spread out on the cliff side, and the owners busily shaking them down. It made a fair picture in the slant evening sunshine, but pictures don't always bear too close inspection into details.

"I should scarcely fancy you would," he remarked. "That kind of thing is very well in print—in every-day life it is best to keep up a respectful distance. I speak from experience. I have had something to do with subjects of that class."

"I saw something of yours once in the Northgate collection—a fisherman's hut," said Joyce, her face flushing with enthusiasm, "and I liked it greatly, though I didn't think, then, I should ever come to know you."

"I owe a good deal to that picture," returned the artist, lowering his voice a little. The waves crept in and out under the girders, the sun sank lower behind the cliff; one or two of the fisher-girls paused half enviously to glance at the two sitting so quietly on the jetty, rehearsing the first sweet notes of the old, old story. If Mr. Arnold Salterne could but have transferred it all to his canvas without one disturbing shade of his own personality, he might thenceforth have taken higher rank in his profession.

Into the midst burst Peggy, hot and indignant, scattering all the peaceful effects into thin air. "Aunt Joyce, it 's too bad. I wasn't doing a bit of harm. I was just helping old Piers to dig sand-eels, and now——"

"Sand-eels!" echoed Joyce. "Oh, Peggy, how can you touch such nasty things? Look at your hands—and your frock!"

"Miss Peggy ought to have been born a fisher-girl, and then no one could have interfered between her and those nice slimy eels," remarked Mr. Salterne with a little shrug. He was not particularly attached to the young lady. Peggy never harmonised with the surroundings. One of Joyce's worst drawbacks in his eyes, was the way she allowed the child to monopolise her time and attention, though he was careful not to express that opinion.

"It 's more than half your fault," protested the intruder, turning upon him. "Aunt Joyce never made half so much fuss till you came to stay here. Mr. Angus never says things like that, and I wish——"

Peggy's remarks rarely reached their natural termination. Joyce interrupted them again, very decidedly this time. "That will do, Peggy; we are going home now. I am sure Mr. Salterne has no wish for any more of our domestic difficulties."

Joyce marched away her troublesome charge with an austere countenance. It was a very mortifying incident to her. Mr. Salterne was so refined—almost fastidious in his tastes; if it had been Will Angus, who was little better than a fisherman himself, it would have been a different matter. One thing was certain—she would have no repetition of it. Joyce had been undisputed mistress in her father's house since almost her babyhood, and did not approve of opposition. Peggy had come from India two years ago to Aunt Joyce's care, and was the person who oftenest transgressed, and was oftenest forgiven. Joyce made allowance for her that she made for no other person, young or old; but now it was a case of the proprieties and Mr. Salterne's opinion combined, and Peggy must go to the wall.

Joyce told her father something of her intentions as she poured out his tea the next morning at breakfast, but he scarcely seemed to realise the enormity of the offence.

"I don't think the old fellow will do the child any harm, Joyce," he said, without lifting his eyes from his newspaper. "I 've seen him about his boats the last twenty years, to my certain knowledge; and Will Angus thinks a lot of him. They often go out together."

"Still, it does not at all follow that he is a fit and proper person for Peggy to associate with, papa. If you had seen the state she came home in yesterday afternoon—Mr. Salterne looked quite disgusted."

"It doesn't take much to disgust that gentleman," said Mr. Halliday rather grimly. "There is more grit in Will Angus's little finger than in his whole body. However, do as you please, Joyce; it 's your affair, not mine."

Joyce generally did as she pleased. She saw her father off to his train for town, and then she sallied forth to interview the objectionable fisherman herself. She found him at the sheds, busy with a pile of tarred rope that smelt of anything but Araby. Indeed, a powerful odour of fish pervaded the whole atmosphere. Joyce gathered up her skirts carefully and opened the campaign—

"Good morning, Mr. Piers."

"Morning, miss."

"I have come down to speak to you about my little niece. She has got into the habit of running about these sheds far too much, and we do not like it: will you be good enough not to encourage her?"

Old Piers put down his rope and faced her gravely. "Nay, miss, it 's for you to forbid it if you dinna like it. I 've had bairns of my own, and it 's no in me to be uncivil to a wee lassie. The beach is free to all, and it 's no my place to forbid her to come or go, as long as she 's no in harm's way."

"I have forbidden it; but, of course, as long as you provide amusement for her, it is a temptation to disobey," said Miss Halliday stiffly. "I am sorry you cannot see it in the proper light; but we must watch her more closely ourselves. Good morning!"

Going home up the drive, Joyce came upon Peggy setting off for a walk with Janet, and straightway issued instructions to that effect.

"You are not to take her anywhere near the beach, Janet; there are plenty of other walks to be found.—And you are not to go beyond the garden by yourself, Peggy—remember that."

Miss Halliday went on her way, blind and deaf to the angry tears in Peggy's dark eyes and her energetic protest against this sweeping edict. There was a clatter of horses' feet behind her a minute or two later, and Will Angus himself came dashing by. He reined up when he saw her, with a sudden light breaking over his plain, square face, that said more than any words; only Joyce—short-sighted Joyce—could see nothing but the contrast between it and the handsome head that had so often bent over hers through those blue summer days.

"'I am going to ask Piers to be my friend as well as yours.'"—p. 828.

"What is wrong with Peggy?" he asked, walking on beside her on the soft turf. "She began some mournful story about old Piers; but he will do her no harm. Joyce. Piers was one of my best friends when I was a lad."

"Do you suppose I think he is going to kidnap her?" demanded Joyce impatiently (she was remembering how instinctively Mr. Salterne had understood the same subject). "The beginning and end of it is this: I will not have her associating with any of those fishermen. That you went there is no reason whatever for Peggy; indeed, rather the contrary."

Will looked down at her in some surprise. "What has come over you of late, Joyce? You never used to speak like this. It's my belief that some of Salterne's nonsense is at the bottom of it all."

"It might be better for you if you had a little more of his 'nonsense,' said Joyce severely. "Mr. Salterne is at least a gentleman."

Will Angus flushed scarlet; he vaulted on his horse again before he spoke. "One gentleman of that kind is sufficient in the field at one time. I'll not interfere with him."

Joyce looked after him with a touch of compunction. Will had been her steadfast friend and squire for so many years; nevertheless, that gave him no right to dictate to her. Mr. Salterne never thought of questioning anything that she said or did. She told him about her encounter with Piers as they sauntered along the cliffs that afternoon to meet Mr.

Halliday on his return from town, and was assured of his approval and commendation.

"It is best to take a decided stand with that kind of people; you are sure to be taken advantage of otherwise. Of course it was an unpleasant thing to have to do; but it 's not likely to be necessary a second time. How did Miss Peggy take it?"

"Poor little Peggy! she is very faithful to her friends. Naturally she resents it deeply; but impressions soon wear away at her age."

"And how is it at your age?"

Some meaning in the tone brought the warm colour to Joyce's face. "I—I don't quite know," she said hesitatingly; "but I think I could be as faithful as Peggy."

They had come to a pause by the gate into the station lane; in the distance the crown of Mr. Halliday's hat was merging slowly into sight. The artist stooped down and left a kiss on Joyce's hand as it rested on the top bar of the gate. "I think so too," he said softly, and then they stood in perfect silence till the hat and owner came up to them.

"So this was the farthest you could manage?" said Mr. Halliday, wiping his brow with a brilliant silk handkerchief as he passed through the gate Mr. Salterne held ajar. "Well, I don't wonder; it 's uncommonly sultry to-night: we shall have a storm before morning. You had better come on and dine with us, Mr. Salterne," he added, seeing that gentleman preparing to branch off at the cross roads.

"You are very kind, Mr. Halliday; but you see, I am hardly in trim for dining out."

Mr. Halliday scanned him from head to foot. "I see nothing amiss with your trim," he said drily. "For myself, I don't find the cut of my coat affects my appetite in any way; indeed, time was——"

"We shall be very pleased to see you, Mr. Salterne," broke in Joyce hastily; "we are not exacting people in the way of dress."

Truly it is not easy to cultivate æsthetic views when one's family tendency sets rather in the opposite direction. Joyce sat—a fair châtelaine—at the head of her father's table, trying, with but indifferent success, to elevate the tone of the conversation, and conscious, through all, of the eloquent eyes that followed her lightest movement, of the handsome head that bent towards her with courtly grace each time she spoke. A small thing to have such influence, and yet on the nameless charm of it Joyce was building up stately castles—too stately by half for every-day habitation.

"Where is Peggy?" she asked, looking round the empty drawing-room, when they went in after dinner was ended. The child was generally coiled up with a fairy tale in a big chair by the window. The fairy tale was lying there face-downwards now, but there was no sign of its owner. Joyce rang the bell before Mr. Salterne could interpose.

"You are very anxious for Peggy's company this evening," he said, half reproachfully.

"It 's not that exactly," returned Joyce; "only she thinks so much of the privilege of sitting in this room, it is curious she should miss a moment.—Where is Peggy, Janet?" turning to the maid, who was standing at the door.

"She was here half an hour ago, ma'am; she must have slipped out by the window."

"Go and find her at once, then; there will be a storm before long."

Joyce crossed over to the piano, and began to play softly. Mr. Halliday sat down in Peggy's chair, and closed his eyes to listen. Mr. Salterne folded his arms on the top of the piano, and studied Joyce's expressive face.

He meant to ask her to be his wife—had made up his mind to it—not rashly (he was a man who knew his own value in the matrimonial world, and would on principle have avoided falling in love in undesirable quarters), but Joyce was pretty and teachable—just the kind of girl to take in hand and train up to the high standard befitting his wife. Moreover, she would be an heiress to no mean extent. Mr. Halliday was well known in commercial circles, and that item was beyond dispute. And then—these practical considerations being satisfactorily disposed of—he loved her: after a fashion of his own, perhaps, but to the best of that fashion. And Joyce's implicit belief in his greatness was stirring in him a longing for higher work, broader aims; he was a better man already for knowing her—nearer high-water mark.

How high that mark might have been was never to be known. Janet opened the door abruptly, and the music died out in sudden discord.

"I can't find Miss Peggy anywhere, ma'am; I 'm afraid she 's run down to the beach again."

"Then she must just run back again," said Mr. Halliday, waking up and looking round the room defiantly.

"That she must," said Joyce, with some curtness; "I will go down for her myself. Janet, bring me a shawl."

Mr. Salterne went down with her; it was not a hundred yards beyond the gates, down the steep cliff path. The sheds were closed and deserted, and they went on to the jetty, where the boats were often moored. A big rough lad was punting about in one, and staring out to sea with a perplexed face.

Mr. Salterne beckoned to him.

"Have you seen anything of a little girl about the beach to-night?"

"Ay," was the response, "she wor here a bit ago. She wanted after Piers to the fishing; he 's just awa'."

"But where is she now?"

"I canna tell ye, unless she 's awa' after him. There 's a boat missing; it wor tied here when I went back with the baskets."

Joyce gave a startled cry. "Surely she has not gone off alone in it?"

There was a dull haze creeping over the water; the twilight was darkening fast. They stood on the steps of the primitive lighthouse at the end, and stared out over the waves, that broke sullenly against the girders. A whole fishing fleet might have been close at hand, and they would have distinguished nothing.

Joyce turned to the lad in terror. "Why didn't you look for her before? How could you leave a child alone in such a place?"

The lad looked back at her. "I didna ken she wor missing till ye came speiring after her; I 'd my work to attend to."

"Will you take me out to look for her?"

"Ay; step in."

"Is that the best boat you have?" demanded Mr. Salterne, holding Joyce back.

"It 's the one with the sail; it 'll go fastest."

"What does the boat matter? Let us go," cried Joyce; "every minute counts."

The tide was going out; they drifted with it, tacking now and then out of the way of the salmon-nets, peering with strained eyes into the darkness. The waves crested and broke under the bows; the wind was rising; the storm Mr. Halliday had predicted was upon them. Joyce scarcely heeded it; every nerve was at full tension, watching, listening for any sound of a cry.

Mr. Salterne did heed it; nothing in the shape of hardship or personal endurance had ever come his way before. To be suddenly, without any preparation, launched out in an open battered boat on a dangerous coast, in the midst of a storm of wind, and rain, and thunder, was something that no mortal man was called upon to bear. He grew fairly sick with terror. Every minute lengthened into ten. What was Peggy—what would Joyce herself be to him if he were to be drowned out here in this blind, reckless chase? Self-preservation is the first law of nature. Drenched and shivering, he crawled over to where Joyce sat.

"I will not go another yard," he said authoritatively. "We must go back at once, or we shall all be drowned together out here."

Joyce looked at him incredulously: "And leave a little child to drown alone?"

"We cannot help it. You have no right to sacrifice your own life and mine in this manner."

"Is there any danger?" cried Joyce to the lad who was wrestling with the tiller ropes.

"It 's a gey dirty night," he answered cautiously.

"I insist upon your putting in as quick as you can do it," ordered Mr. Salterne in a shrill, hoarse voice.

Alas for the artist's hopes, they withered up then and there, past all resurrection, in the unutterable scorn that swept over his lady's face. Why, Will—rough, commonplace Will Angus—would have held on the quest as long as two planks were left together! Oh, if she but had his strong hands and clear head beside her now!

The lad looked at Joyce for confirmation.

"Yes, put back," she agreed in cold, clear tones. "We have no right to take this—gentleman out against his will."

The putting back was a long process; the waves dashed over the boat—wind and tide were against them. The lad Reuben had the work to himself; of his passengers one lay limp and useless in the stern, one was unconscious of all but the watch she was keeping through the blinding rain.

As they turned the lighthouse corner and drifted into smoother waters, they caught a glimpse of another boat also fighting its way in. Reuben stood up to signal it.

"It 's Piers," he cried to Joyce in great excitement. "The storm has brought him back, too, for it 's no his time for getting in."

The boats came in almost side by side. Mr. Salterne felt that he had come out of the very jaws of death as he clambered out on the dripping jetty. He held out his hand to assist Joyce, but she did not stir.

"You had better go home and take care of yourself, Mr. Salterne," she said icily. "I am going back to look for Peggy."

"You dinna need to, my woman: the bairnie 's here, safe and sound," said old Piers solemnly from behind.

He had the child in his arms wrapped in a pilot jacket; he had heard the pitiful cry as the runaway drifted helplessly past, but in storm and darkness it had been no easy work for him and his lad to rescue and bring her home.

Joyce, shaken out of all her theories, knelt down on the wet stones and kissed his horny hands in a great rush of relief and gladness. "Oh, Peggy, my girlie—my girlie! I thought you were under those cruel waves. I will remember old Piers for this all the days of my life."

The storm went down as suddenly as it had risen. For long afterwards, Mr. Salterne cherished a belief that it had come purposely for his undoing. He found his way up to the house early the next morning to see if it were possible to efface last night's impression. The clear morning sunshine flashed over a tranquil sea and fair earth, as if no wind or tempest had ever beaten on either. Surely human nature ought not to be less forgiving.

Joyce's pony-carriage was at the door, and she and her father stood on the steps. She was going to drive him to the station, and the visitor felt instinctively that he had come at the wrong time. Joyce's face looked as tranquil as the morning, but the night's storm had had its counterpart in her own reflections—her idol had fallen from his pedestal for ever.

At her age it was hardly likely to be a lifelong sorrow, and the tides might ripple in and ripple out again, the sun might shine and the stars glimmer as brightly as heretofore. Still, for a time there would be something missing out of them for her, for a time the wheels would work a little heavily.

"How do you do?" Mr. Halliday nodded complacently to the visitor: was it all fancy that there was a gleam of triumph in his keen eyes? "I hear you didn't altogether enjoy your sail last night. Never mind: 'He that fights and runs away,' etc. There 's a good deal of worldly wisdom shut up in the old adage."

"I am sorry I cannot ask you to stay," said Joyce very gravely. "I am going out with my father."

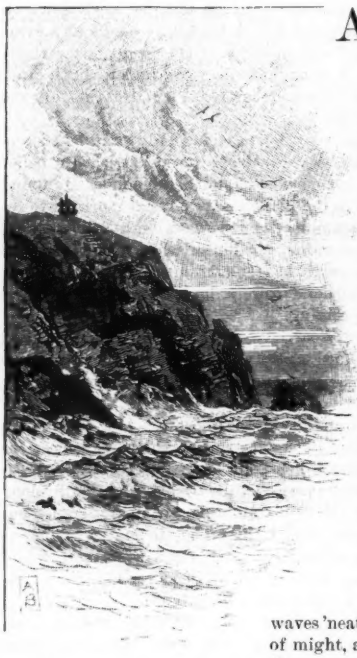
"So I see," returned the artist, standing bare-headed in the sunshine. "But perhaps after you return I may be more fortunate."

"I am afraid that will be too late. I am going round by the sheds afterwards, to cultivate the fisher-folk. Peggy and I have good reason to respect them henceforth."

And then the pony trotted cheerfully away, leaving

Mr. Salterne standing alone, and feeling more solitary and more insignificant than he was at all accustomed to feel.

He saw Joyce once, only once, again. He was on his way to the station to go back to town himself—he would try no more sea pieces at present—and passed her basket carriage drawn up before a little group at the roadside. Peggy sat on the wall, old Piers' arm about her, listening to the conversation with great contentment. "Peggy" (Joyce was speaking very earnestly), "I am going to ask Piers to be my friend as well as yours. I have been finding out that it takes something more than finery to make a man."



And seeing that when Will Angus was married, that next spring, the first person who received an invitation to be present was old Piers, it may be concluded that so far Miss Halliday has proved as faithful as her little niece.

SARAH PITT.

THE VOYAGE OF LIFE.

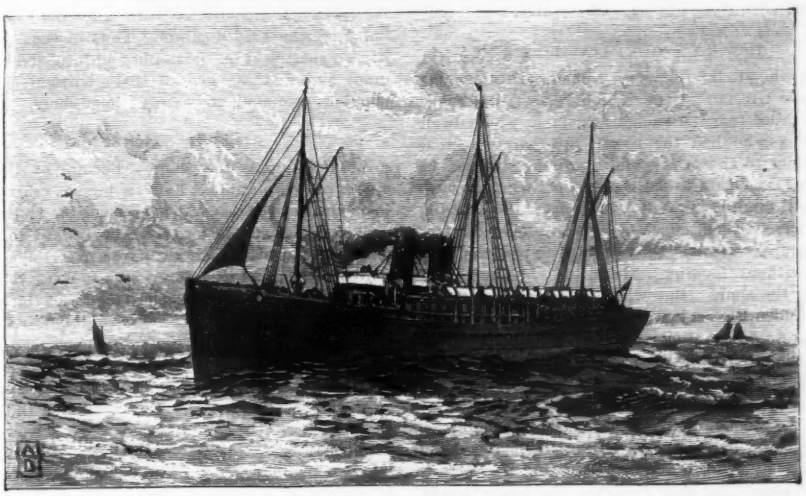
THOUGHTS ON SPIRITUAL NAVIGATION.

BY THE REV. ARTHUR FINLAYSON, AUTHOR OF "THREEFOLD SALVATION," "EVANESCENT PHILOSOPHIES," "THE ETHICS OF ATHLETICS," ETC.

A MAGNIFICENT ship was homeward bound from New York. Her great engines had been working at full speed for several days, and as her swiftly revolving propeller cleft its passage through the aqueous masses of the Atlantic, crumbling the anger-swollen waves 'neath its stroke of might, and leaving the waters lashing and writhing in its wake, the huge vessel ploughed her way through the waves triumphantly. Homeward she sped; now rising, now falling, and daring, with full-nerved arm, the rage of all in her ambitious attempt to reach the haven where she would be, and to land her precious freight of human life safe, sound, and speedily. The hearts of the passengers and crew beat high at the prospect of standing on terra firma once more. Then hand would join hand, heart would meet heart, and joy too deep for words would find expression in the bond of reunion. That night a number of the passengers stood about on the decks looking at the phosphorescent sea. They watched the brilliant flashing of the waves cleft asunder by the vessel's prow; and admired the tremulous radiance playing around as wave after wave appeared, crested with light, and, crashing against the sides of the great ship, irradiated the dark and surging waters, giving them here and there the appearance of broken masses of liquid fire. Others stood at the ship's stern, and, gazing at the long stream of light that followed in her wake, marvelled at the thousand inexplicable coruscations which glanced and gleamed over the ruffled waters. Presently the convulsive throbbing of the great engines is perceptibly lessened; and as the vessel creeps from what at first seems a mere haze into a heavy sea fog, the engine indicator is altered from "half speed" to "dead slow." The prevailing gloom is infectious, and a depressing influence creeps over passengers and crew. And, as the great ship slowly makes her way up Channel, the forebodings of some are, alas! realised, and the noble vessel, almost at the end of her voyage, is stranded upon a rocky shore. The passengers are rescued, but the vessel becomes a total wreck. When, some time afterwards, an official inquiry into the cause of the disaster is held, the result is made plain in the pregnant words, "The master was hugging the shore." Ah! many a noble vessel, having successfully braved the perils of the ocean, comes to grief at the close of her voyage through hugging a foreign shore. And many a craft laden with precious freight, and setting sail in placid waters, and amid fair winds, is stranded at the commencement of her voyage through hugging the shore.

Now I want the foregoing to point a parable in the life of the reader. There is a voyage we must all take. Life is an ocean for us all. And I want to say a word to you, my brother and sister, which, with your kindness to welcome it, and with God's grace behind it, may prove helpful to you in the voyage of life. As Wordsworth says:—

> "We sail the sea of life; a calm one finds,
> And one a tempest; and, the voyage o'er,
> Death is the quiet haven of us all."



As we launch our vessels and spread sail on the ocean of life, it is well to be prepared for all that may lie before us. No mariner will take an ocean voyage without a compass: yet many who bear the name of Christ embark on the voyage of life, and carelessly sail amongst sunken reefs, shifting sands, and treacherous under-currents, without regularly contemplating the chart God has given to direct them, or without ceaselessly looking to Christ as their Pilot amid the seas and storms of life.

"Oh, that way madness lies. Let me shun that."

A Lord Chancellor of England, Thomas Erskine, truly said, "The best advice which any one friend can give to another is to advise him to consult God; and the best turn that any book can do its reader is to refer him to the Bible." Here is our chart for the voyage of life. Yet many a fair craft, in setting sail over the sea of life, is given to "hug the shore" instead of launching out into the deep in humble reliance on the Divinely appointed chart. If, in your voyage through life, your soul draws its chief nourishment from public meetings, emotional hymns, mission or evangelistic sermons, narratives of personal experience, and all that is merely exciting in religious gatherings, the inevitable result will follow—leanness of soul. You have been hugging the shore. You will have a poor, fitful, emotional, sickly, and sentimental piety. Your Christianity will be stunted and dwarfed; your spiritual growth will be retarded, because you have been feeding on "weak and beggarly elements" instead of the pure Word of God. Be not bewitched; we need a stronger religion than this; we want a manly, vigorous piety, a religion of fixed, definite principles. And when the soul draws its chief strength from Scripture, it will be healthy and vigorous; it will not only derive more good from public privileges, but it will be kept sound and steadfast in the faith, preserved from erroneous opinions, enriched with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, and made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.

A man must either be the slave of circumstances or he must make circumstances his slave. The latter is the only manly position. A log may float with the current, but to swim against the tide requires power. In the Gospel, God makes a full provision for our voyage of life. By nature we need conviction of sin, conversion of heart, restoration to God's favour, and grace to live a life of holiness and self-denial in the midst of many temptations. There are many strong adverse currents on the sea of life. God does not promise to deliver us from every under-current of trial or temptation; but He does promise support in every temptation, and grace for every hour of need and every wave of trouble. The secret of our failures is just this—that we lean on self instead of leaning on God: or, like Peter, we look at the waves instead of looking at Him who walketh upon the waves; we look at circumstances instead of fixing our eye upon Him who is above all circumstances. What is that but hugging the shore? Before us all there may lie strong seas and adverse winds. As Quarles forcibly says:—

'Homeward bound."—p. 823.

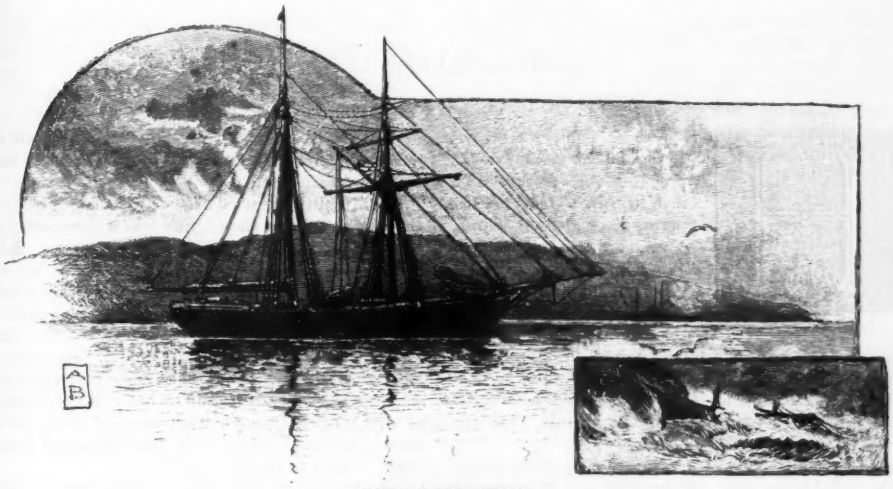
"Earth is an island posted round with fears;
Thy way to heaven is through the sea of tears;
It is a stormy passage, where is found
The wreck of many a ship, but no man drowned."

Courage, faint heart! Stand out to sea. No storm can drive Christ from us. No sea will be rough if He be our Pilot; and no wind wholly adverse when He is near, Who can at any moment secure a great calm by simply saying, "Peace! be still!" There is a wonderful truth in the beautiful lines of Bishop Ken—

"The merchant who towards spicy regions sails,
Smells their perfume far off, in adverse gales;
With blasts which thus against the faithful blow,
Fresh odorous breathings of God's goodness flow."

If, then, we are to look upon life as a wide ocean where many are shipwrecked and irrecoverably lost, where more are tossed and fluctuating, and where none can secure to themselves a future undisturbed calm, yet so long as the ship is under sail, obeying her helm, and steered according to the chart, whether the weather be fair or foul, she is every day approaching nearer to and must shortly make land. And if the Pilot be aboard we shall reach the haven where we would be. Thus, as we voyage along the ocean of life, the things of earth vanish into insignificance when compared with those of time and eternity.

HOW TO AVOID FATALITIES.



Those who are familiar with Homer, will remember the subtle Grecian legend which relates that when Ulysses sailed past the enchanted island, where dwelt the sirens who had the power by their sorcerous symphonies to charm all who heard their music, he took the precaution to fill the ears of his crew with wax, and, binding himself to the mast, the alluring strains were without effect, and his barque held safely on her course. He was thus enabled to pass the fatal island without landing. He knew the danger of hugging the shore. But when Orpheus, on his way to the Golden Fleece, had to pass the dangerous shore, he, being a good musician, set up better music than that of the sea-nymphs, and enchanted his crew, who were therefore insensible to the alluring melodies of the sirens. Thus, without resorting to the devices of Ulysses, he was able to pass the treacherous shore, not only safely, but with disdain. To be insensible to the voice of temptation is good; to out-sing it is better. We want something more positive. The lesson taught by Orpheus is the one we most need for the voyage of life. Let us have no ears for the siren voice of temptation; let us out-sing it by a better melody. Thus every mariner embarking on the voyage of life does well not only to close his ears to the siren voices on the fatal shore, but to learn the melody of a better music from One who lovingly says, "My son, give Me thine heart." He it is who tenderly pleads, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." His voice of peace is no illusion amid the mirage of life's ocean. His tender tones can still our terrors when, amid the darkness of life, while the ocean seems so great and our little boats so small, there comes, through the storm that terrifies, His thrilling, soothing whisper, "It is I, be not afraid." None who listen to the voice of Christ have ever regretted it. He lures none to their destruction. His voice brings salvation. He puts a new song into our mouths. He stablishes our goings. And when our spiritual navigation is surrendered to Him, then the voyage of life is indubitably most fascinating.

A little girl seeing the letters "T. C. M." on a flag flying from a steam launch belonging to that invaluable Society, the Thames Church Mission, inquired what they meant. The reply that the letters might stand for Trust Christ More, the motto of the Society, conveys a message that we do well to adopt as our keynote in the voyage of life. If you wish to elevate character, to purify conduct, to promote goodness, to cultivate self-subjection, let the eye of your soul "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Calvary is the source of power. Let the eye of faith ceaselessly contemplate the Lord Jesus Christ, and then our constant endeavour will be to deny our wills, to rule our tongues, to soften our tempers, to mortify our evil passions, to learn patience, humility, meekness, forgiveness, forbearance, charity, courtesy, and steady continuance in well-doing. And the endeavour will not be in vain, for the Holy Spirit will give the needed power. Thus in the voyage of life we shall float on the mighty unfathomable sea of grace, and find the love of God a bottomless deep, a populous profound, an ocean without shore.

HINTS IN NAVIGATION.

Avoid hugging the shore. Beware of the siren voices of temptation. Many a human craft sailing joyously over the seas of life becomes the victim of its own rashness and temerity. Now I want to stretch out the hand of help, if I can, to some reader on the voyage of life, and therefore I seek to warn you of the perils of the shore, and some dangers of the voyage.

There is the shore of Scepticism. Beware of this coast. Many a human craft in the voyage of life anchors in this bay, and remains as though she were a surveying vessel, or a stationary lightship appointed to warn others of the danger. Some hug this bay as though it were the end of their voyage. Now honest doubt may be tested by the questions, "Is it painful?" "Is it temporary?" He who is honest is not content to remain in a state of doubt. He will manfully navigate his way through difficulties until he arrives at the glorious simplicity of the truth. He learns that the law of light for the inner life is, "If any man willeth to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." Doubts and indecision are marks of weakness rather than strength. "There is but one chance of life," says Mr. Ruskin: "in admitting so far the possibility of the Christian verity as to try it on its own terms. There is not the slightest possibility of finding whether it be true or not first. 'Show me a sign first, and I will come,' you say. 'No,' answers God; 'come first, and then you shall see a sign.'" A child who has not learned simple addition cannot understand the mysteries of algebra. Seed-time first, then harvest. Obedience is the organ of spiritual knowledge. It is in a life of action rather than in study that most minds find the truth which makes men free. Christian life is, at least, as undeniable as physical life. As the notes of the siren song of scepticism are wafted from the shore, we seem to hear the refrain of the scientific Pascal out-singing them like Orpheus, and we catch up the words "Les incrédules sont les plus crédules." (The incredulous are the most credulous.) Thus we put to sea, for the faith of the Christian has nothing in common with credulity. Brother, if you have anchored in the Bay of

CALM AFTER STORM.

Scepticism, slip your cable and stand out to sea. On the ocean of life avoid this shore. Starboard your helm and launch out into the deep, with the cry, "Lord, increase our faith."

There is the shore of Procrastination. In the voyage of life there are treacherous undercurrents which lure the soul towards the shore of indecision. There is a terrible significance in this word. To stop our ears, close our eyes, or harden our hearts to the warning it conveys is an act of insanity. My brother, how is it with you in your spiritual navigation? The question is put in all tenderness. You live in a Christian land, you may be an occasional worshipper in the house of God, you may be a communicant, and yet, after all, you may be undecided in your spiritual life, while your vessel is carried by the undercurrents of formality and indecision towards the fatal shore on which many a human craft is wrecked. Every experienced pastor of souls can tell of cases where, after a long period of continued and wilful resistance to the grace of God, the soul seemed morally incapable of yielding to, or receiving, the truth, although outwardly appearing anxious to do so.

Brother voyager, beware how you despise the claims of the Lord Jesus on your heart and life! Only in so far as you yield yourself to Christ can you navigate your way successfully on the voyage of life.

"The world, the flesh, and the devil" play a regular sonata on the voyage of life. Ah! listen not to the sorcerous symphonies of these siren voices. Out-sing them by better music. There are undercurrents in the sea into which many a mariner unknowingly steers his ship. Everything seems to go forward with success until, by miserable experience, the mariners find that, instead of going forward, they have been all the time receding. Many an experienced master of a vessel has been obliged to confess, "I've lost my reckoning." So also is it with the soul in the voyage of life. Where is the child of God that has not backslidden? There are times when every Christian mariner must confess with shame and sorrow, "I've lost my reckoning." We may never, indeed, have fallen into sins which even men of the world repudiate. We may never have had any such temptation. But in God's sight we may be guilty of more heinous sin than those who commit grosser forms of sin.—"Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required." The only remedy for the child of God is to return as a penitent sinner to the Lord Jesus, Who says, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." There was a time when all the disciples forsook Christ and fled. Even the impetuous and fervent Peter denied his Master. And we, without Peter's excuse, have too often denied our Redeemer. The Lord's tender glance of love, as He "turned and looked upon Peter," melted Peter's heart, and won him back to the Saviour's fold; and so it may be even with us, for He is "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

> "Oh, Oft Forsaken, Oft Denied,
> Forgive our shame, wash out our sin;
> Look on us from Thy Father's side,
> And let that sweet look win."

As we proceed on the voyage of life, let us never again for a moment attempt to sail under two pilots. Nothing more surely will destroy our peace and leave us stranded on the shore. Expediency is a rock on which many Christian mariners split. Let us have nothing to do with any course of conduct of which our conscience disapproves. With God's grace, let us go to no place where we cannot ask God to go with us, let us engage in no work on which we cannot ask God's blessing, and let us indulge in no pleasure for which we cannot return to God thanks. Traversing the ocean of life in this spirit, we shall find an abundant entrance into that glorious haven where storms cannot beat, "Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

LITTLE SALLIE LUNN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TERRIE'S TWO COATS," "BANDY," ETC. ETC.

HER father's name was James Lunn, and her mother's—the pretty young mother who died within a year of her marriage—had been Sarah. Nothing would satisfy poor James Lunn in his bereavement but that the wee thing his dear dead wife had left for him to cherish should, like her, be named "Sarah," never thinking, manlike, of what the result would be. Even if he had thought of it, I don't fancy that would have made any difference; for, to his mind, "Sallie" was the sweetest name on the whole earth.

And a right bonny little maid was tiny Sallie Lunn. The neighbours said whimsically, yet with tender smiles, that no name could have suited her better, so sweet and brown and soft was she; and not seldom did the big girls, who helped to "mother" the motherless little one, assure her, with many kisses, that she was "so good," they could "eat her all up!"

So round, and velvety, and dimpled a baby was surely never seen before, nor such big clear hazel eyes as those that shone beneath Sallie's long dark lashes, and spoke love to those around her ere the rosebud lips had learned to frame a word. The first syllable that little Sallie Lunn ever uttered was, "Tiss-tiss!" She wanted to "tiss" everybody; and her earliest attempt at consecutive speech was the silvery assurance, "Me love 'oo!" with which a kind word, or a smile, or the most trifling gift, was almost always rewarded.

As she grew a little older, her great idea—the natural expression of her loving nature—was to help. "Me help 'oo up!" she would say, standing at the top of the stairs, and reaching out two chubby hands to the tired father, who, with his basket of carpenter's tools on his back, came heavily toiling from below. And his step grew lighter and his face brighter in a moment. How could he be sullen or surly, still less loiter at the tavern bar on his way home from work, when that sweet sunny smile and those dear dimpled hands were waiting to give him welcome? His little maiden "helped him up" indeed! While scarcely more than a baby, she learned to put "dada's 'lippers" ready for him on the fender, and was never happier than when he would let her patiently tug with soft pink fingers at the laces of his great rough boots, and tumble backwards amid rippling laughter as, by a mighty effort, she pulled them off.

Every creature that knew Sallie loved her, whether on two legs or four. The people who lived on the ground-floor kept chickens, and to go out in the yard with a pinafore full of grain, and gather the "cheeping" balls of fluff about her feet, was one of the crowning delights of Sallie's life, its sole drawback being that it conflicted somewhat with her benevolent desire to be on affectionate terms with all the pussy-cats in the neighbourhood and the sharp little terrier over the wall.

One of Sallie's greatest friends was Mrs. Prescott, at the corner baker's shop. She was a stout, comfortable person, with sad eyes, but a kind smile. Sallie always blew a kiss to her as she passed on her way to school, and Mrs. Prescott always put by a little currant roll for Sallie's tea. Sensitively alive to trouble in every form, the little one saw the silent sorrow in her friend's pleasant face. She did not know that she saw it; she only knew that sometimes she felt that she must run to her and cry, clasping as much of the ample white-aproned form as her short arms could enfold, "Oh, Mrs. P'escott, I do love you! I want to kiss you a lot."

One day, when Mrs. Prescott was turning out a lumber-box, she came across an old picture-book. It was very old; the baker's wife herself had not seen it for many long years, and she could scarcely look at it even now for the mist that came between. But after a few minutes' hesitation, she said to herself, "I may as well give this to little Sallie Lunn. It's doing no good here, and it will please her; bless her!"

And so it did. Sallie thought those pictures the most gorgeous in the world; for they were coloured, not like the toy-books nowadays, with richly blended oleographic tints, but in two or three decided hues, which, with their combinations, did for everything. Cinderella was there in a red skirt and blue jacket, sweeping the floor with a purple broom; and Jack the Giant-Killer, who, being under the necessity of climbing a green bean-stalk, was compelled to perform the feat in yellow trousers and a blue cap; while the complexions of Jack and Jill showed decided symptoms of biliousness, traceable to the influence of a field of ripened corn hard by their cottage door. But, at the same time, the minuteness of detail was charming. You could almost count the bristles in Cinderella's broom; the pat of butter and pot of honey in Red Riding Hood's basket were not for a moment to be confused with the cakes lying at their side; nor was it possible to mistake the contents of the cruet-bottles on the giant's supper-table.

Sallie Lunn sat upon the shop door-step poring over this work of art, and hugging her little knees with delight. Suddenly she looked up, some childish query on her lips, and saw Mrs. Prescott looking down at her with eyes swimming in tears.

The book was forgotten in a moment; Sallie's open arms were invitingly held out, and her lips pursed up with a waiting kiss. The baker's wife folded the little creature to her heart, and choked down a sob.

"I do love you!" said Sallie; "I love you 'leventy million pounds. You got a headache, Mrs. P'escott?"

"I've got a heartache, dearie."

"Is that badder? Poor Mrs. P'escott! Dada had a toofache one day, and I loved him, an' it got better."

"Only God can make a heartache better, dearie. And I think—I believe He will; but it's long—long to wait!"

"I 'll ask Him to make haste, shall I?" said Sallie, with wide, wistful brown eyes. "He knows dada 'n' me, 'cause we talk to Him in the mornin' an' every night. I will ask Him, Mrs. P'escott, to make your heartache well."

"It 'minds me o' the time," said old "Y-e ye"—"ah, it must be nigh upon twenty year ago, now!—when her own little gal was a-playin' in an' out and round about the shop much as that little one do now. A sweet little gal were little miss, and her mother kep' her like a pictur'. I think I see her now, a-runnin' across the road to me for a orange or a ha'p'orth o' cresses, all in her nice white pinny and her pretty

"'Have it—please have it.'"—p. 835.

After that the simple petition, "Please, God, make Mrs. P'escott's heartache better," was regularly added to Sallie's prayers; and the little loving creature became dearer to the baker's wife, if possible, than before.

Most of her playtime, except when her father was at home, was spent by Sallie in that pleasant shop. In addition to her natural clinging to kindly Mrs. Prescott, the child liked the place—it was so clean and cheerful, with its milk-white boards and polished brasses, and rows of comfortable-looking brown loaves, and the nice smell of hot bread and buns.

blue bows, and her yellow hair a-curlin' all over her head. Well-a-day! Mrs. Prescott wor a fine young woman in them days, and I worn't the doubled-up old crittur I am now." And "Y-e ye" gave a sort of grunt that was meant for a sigh.

"Y-e ye" was a name which the children had given the old hawker because of his queer cry. It was his way of pronouncing "Wor-ter*cerre*-ses!" And in the winter when he sang "Or-an-gees" it was very much the same. "Y-e ye," I need scarcely remark, was on the most friendly terms with little Sallie Lunn. When not more than six years old she knitted him a pair of warm scarlet cuffs, and he always picked out for her those oranges whose marks of brownish film on their golden skins were the outward and visible sign of sweetness within.

One autumn afternoon—a half-holiday it was—Sallie Lunn was standing in the sunshine at the baker's shop door cuddling the baker's tabby cat, when "Y-e ye" came shuffling along the other side of the way. In his basket were some of the very first oranges of the season. Somewhat pale and sour-looking, certainly, but the first, and "little missy," as the old man proudly called the carpenter's pretty child, must have one.

A lovely picture she unconsciously made, standing there with the setting sunlight touching her peach-like cheek and bronzing her chestnut hair, and making amber gleams in her dark-fringed eyes, while pussy's whiskered nose was pressed caressingly against her face, and the soft paws hung in willing helplessness over her round brown arm.

I fancy "Y-e ye" must have been thinking more about this picture than the guidance of his own hobbling feet, for just as he stepped off the kerbstone to come over to her, his heel slipped, and the next moment he was lying in the gutter, while the yellow oranges went rolling in all directions.

Sallie sprang forward with a little cry, the cat dropped, and her hands instinctively stretched out to help. But she never reached the old man's side. It was all the work of a few seconds. A pair-horse van came clattering suddenly round the corner: a shout, a childish wail, a woman's shriek, and violently pulling up the struggling horses, they lifted Sallie out from between the wheels, and bore her, senseless and bleeding, into the baker's shop.

She was not dead.

"Take her to the hospital," the doctor said. "It is by far the best way. The best surgical care and nursing are her only chance, and she will have it all there."

Mrs. Prescott's heart yearned over the wounded, motherless lamb, but she knew that with the shop to mind it would be impossible for her to give that amount of attention which the little sufferer would need; the hard-working father could not neglect his employment, even were his hands as skilful in nursing as his heart was good; and the neighbours, kind and willing as they were, all had families or businesses of their own which absorbed nearly all their time and strength. So to the children's ward of St. Mercy Hospital little Sallie Lunn was carried.

"I'm glad we let her go," Mrs. Prescott told "Y-e ye" a few days later. For, strange to say, the old man had sustained but slight ill effects from his fall, and came to the baker's regularly every morning to learn how "little missy" did.

"I'm glad we let her go. La, it's a beautiful place: all so light, and bright, and airy, with the pretty white cots, and the little ones looking so clean and neat in their little red flannel jackets, and so happy with their toys on the tables in front of them. And the nurse who has got our Sallie in her charge is one of the sweetest-faced young ladies I ever saw."

"And do they say as she 'll be all right again?"

"Well, they don't say much, one way nor the other," returned Mrs. Prescott doubtfully. "It's hard to get out of them what they do think. But we must hope for the best, you know."

She spoke with the steady cheerfulness acquired by long practice, but the old man detected pain in her tone.

"If any harm—lastin' harm, I mean—have come to that pretty lamb," he said, with quavering voice, "I should wish the Lord had 'a' took me first, or let me 'a' gone down somewheres out o' sight, sooner than me bin the cause of it, so to speak. What had she done, now, I should like to know, that sech sufferin' sh'd ha' come on her?"

"It is one of the things we can't understand," answered the baker's wife; "and there 's many of them in this life, God knows. But He does know, you see: that 's the only comfort in it. And He would not be God if He would let sorrow come to an innocent babe like that without some good purpose, some real blessing, being at the back of it. God knows and God loves; we must hold on to that, or we 're lost!"

Mrs. Prescott had been conning this lesson since before Sallie Lunn was born, and she often felt afraid that she did not properly know it yet. Ah! the lessons grown-up people have to learn are sometimes hard indeed!

Sallie was kept in the hospital several weeks. She grew very white and thin, and her eyes seemed larger and darker every day. But she was always as bright as sunshine.

"I do love everybody!" she enthusiastically confided to Mrs. Prescott on one of the latter's many visits to her. "Peoples is so kind! And I love Nurse Annie. Nurse Annie is so good: she lets me have the big dolly with the pink shoes. Mrs. P'escott, I do think Nurse Annie knows what will make a heart-ache well!"

The baker's wife smiled as she tenderly stroked the wee, transparent hands that caressed her own, but shook her head.

"Well," continued Sallie, "I do keep on asking God, I do! I 'se never missed once. Ain't the ache a little tiny bit better, Mrs. P'escott?"

"You make haste and get better yourself, dearie," said her friend: "that will do it no end of good."

About this time a kind gentleman sent to the hospital a large parcel of illuminated text-cards for distribution among the little patients. He ought to have been there to see the sparkling eyes and hear the long-drawn "O-o-oh's!" of rapture with which his presents were greeted! The one which fell to Sallie's share was among the prettiest of all. The picture represented a sweet-looking lady, with a face full of the tenderest love, bending pitifully over a little child who nestled in her arms, and clung, as if in grief or fear, about her neck. It was a lovely picture in every sense. The tints were rich and soft, the shading was delicate. Sallie could not but know, young though she was, how greatly superior, both in sentiment and style, this was to the old fairy-tale book at home. The baby's curling hair and the lace upon its night-dress were a source of great delight to her, almost as much as the pattern in shining gold that bordered the card all round, and which her tiny finger traced out with such a reverent touch. But the lady's face was the best of all. The words, in pretty letters of crimson and blue, were a little beyond Sallie's scholarship; but Nurse Annie told her that they said, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you," and that they were spoken by God Himself. Sallie Lunn had never known what it was to have a mother, but, lying in her cot poring over that picture and verse, the idea of mother and of God became somehow fused together in her imagination with a sweet, compassionate face and the thought of comforting. Had this been the only work of blessing which the donor's thoughtful kindness wrought, he had been well repaid indeed.

In course of time Sallie recovered from her injuries—grew well enough, that is, to be taken home, and make room in the hospital for some other little sufferer in greater need than herself. But so fragile and snowdrop-like she looked, so different from the dimpled, rosy-brown girlie of a few short weeks before! A strange pain wrung her father's soul as he looked at her, several people shook their heads, and old "Y-e ye" rubbed his red cotton handkerchief hard into his twinkling grey eyes. "It 's allus the way! it 's allus the way!" he said. "Them as seems the fittest to live—— But, as the baker's lady says, God knows!"

As soon as the spring days came again, James Lunn gladly arranged to pay a trifle a week for Sallie's admission into a seaside home for convalescent children, and thus our little maid made her first acquaintance with the big ocean.

Wild and cruel as it has been to some, it proved a good friend to her, chasing and sprinkling her playfully with its silvery spray till she could not but laugh, and clap her hands, and join in the fun; making her hungry—oh! so hungry!—for even the plainest food; and kissing her creamy cheeks till they grew pink.

Sallie and her companions from the Home were playing one morning at "Touch!" They were racing and romping on the parade, which so early in the year was almost deserted. In one of her pauses to take breath, Sallie noticed a poor-looking young woman sitting in a corner of one of the seats. Her elbow rested on the wooden arm, and her face leaned on her hand; she was very pale, and seemed weak and tired. It was with kindly gaze, however, that she watched the children's game; and meeting Sallie's lovely brown eyes, she smiled.

Instantly—she did not know why—Sallie thought of her old friend Mrs. Prescott. "I wonder if this lady's got a heartache too?" she said to herself, and smiled back, edging a little nearer to the seat.

The woman held out her hand, and, without an instant's hesitation, Sallie put hers confidingly within it.

"You ill?" asked the child, full of sympathy.

"I have been ill; I 'm better now."

"So 'm I! I 'se glad you 're better too." Then, after a slight pause, Sallie wistfully added, "You got a heartache?"

The stranger started at this unexpected query, and her white cheeks flushed. "I 'm poor, and lonely, and miserable!" she said, and her eyes filled with tears.

"Poor, and lonely, and mis 'able!" Sallie's rosebud mouth drooped into a pitiful curve, and her little brown hand softly stroked the thin fingers of her new friend. The woman did look poor: her shawl was thin and darned: and she did indeed look miserable. Sallie wondered what she could do to comfort her.

With the thought of comfort came the remembrance of that precious text-card she had had given her at the hospital. She had brought it to Southbeach with her—it was too valuable to leave behind—and had taken care of it in her little pocket ever since. Soiled and bent and creased as it was, that card was Sallie's most cherished possession still. Therefore it was the best thing she had to give away.

Filled, baby as she was, with the true spirit of loving sacrifice, the treasure, with much difficulty, was extracted from its hiding-place and pressed into the stranger's hand.

"Have it—please do have it!" pleaded Sallie, earnestly. "See if it ain't a pretty one. Look at that lady cuddling the little boy! Ain't she a dear? She 's his own mother, and she 's loving him up 'cause he 's frightened of the dark. Look at the nice work on his ni'gown. Nurse Annie said he 's frightened of the dark, but Nurse Ruth said p'raps he 'd been a naughty boy and was sorry, and he 's saying he 'll never do it again, so his dear mother 's glad and she 's forgiven him. Nurse Ruth says that 's how God forgives, and that 's what the words mean—you read 'em."

But the stranger's tears were falling hot and fast, and blinding her eyes both to the card which Sallie held up and to the child's sweet wistful face.

"Oh, please don't cry!" begged Sallie. "You shall have the picture, really—truly! I do mean it. Is your heartache very bad?"

* * * * * *

It was a bright, rosy little maiden, radiant with health and gladness, who, the month's holiday being over, sprang into James Lunn's arms at Cannon Street station. The change of air had come just at the right time to save the child, giving a fresh start on the road to complete recovery. Old "Y-e ye," who knew when she was expected, and was waiting outside the station with "the biggest orange he had ever set eyes on," exclaimed when he saw her—"Well, if ever! Well, I never! If she ain't done brown at last!" Then he laughed at his own facetiousness until the red pocket-handkerchief was once more in request, and he rubbed his eyes harder than ever.

"I must go 'n' see Mrs. P'escott after tea," said Sallie. "Pussy will be glad to see me back. I wonder who 's had my little roll all the time I been away! P'raps she 's given it to some poor little boy. If she has I won't have it no more. 'cause he 'd be so sorry. I wonder how Mrs. P'escott's heartache is?"

So hand-in-hand father and child went round to the corner baker's shop. A strange woman was standing behind the counter, and the moment she turned, Sallie recognised her as the one on whom, at Southbeach, she had bestowed her precious card. The recognition was mutual.

"Mother! Here, mother!" cried the young woman; "this is the little girl I told you of—the very same. Oh, you darling that ever was!—to think that I should find you again!"

Then Mrs. Prescott came out into the shop and asked them all to go inside, and Sallie found herself kissed by everybody. It was not long before her sharp eyes detected her picture-card, mounted and framed, and standing on the mantel-piece.

"Oh, look!" she cried. "Look, dada! Ain't it nice!"

"I'm going to hang it up in my own room," said Mrs. Prescott, in a queer, shaky voice—the young woman had slipped away in the bustle and disappeared. "If it hadn't been for that card and the blessed words it spoke to her when she was anigh despairing, my poor girl might never have come back. She says it was just like a voice from heaven when she needed it most, telling of forgiveness and love. Your Sallie was a ministering angel that day, Mr. Lunn!"

"Dada, who is that lady?" questioned Sallie, as her father took her back to their lodgings. "Did she once be Mrs. P'escott's little girl?"

"Yes, lovey, and she's her big girl now."

"And did she be naughty one day?"

"She was naughty a good many days, I'm afraid, and ran away from her nice home," answered James Lunn. "But she is sorry now, and has asked God to forgive her, and asked her mother and father to forgive her. And she is going to stay with them now, and be good."

"Oh, I am glad!" cried Sallie, with an ecstatic skip. "P'raps Mrs. P'escott's heartache might get better now, eh?"

"I think," said the carpenter, "that very likely it will soon be quite well."

"Oh, ain't that nice!" said the little girl. "You and me 'll say 'Thank you' to God to-night, won't we, dada?"

"Yes, lovey, yes!" answered James Lunn, in accents deep with feeling.

"'We 'll praise Him for all that is past,
And trust Him for all that 's to come.'"

THEIR BRIGHT EXAMPLE; OR, HALF-HOURS WITH THE WORTHIES OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

III.—MRS. AUGUSTUS HARE.

IT is now well on to twenty years since the "Memorials of a Quiet Life" was added to the store of English biography. The subject of the memoir was the widow of one of the brothers Hare (Augustus and Julius), whose joint "Guesses at Truth" first awoke in them the interest of the English mind. Julius lived to acquire fame and honour among the notable theologians of his day, but Augustus, who became the husband of Maria Leycester, died very young, leaving little other literary memorial than a volume of sermons preached in a small country church, but very valuable as showing what such sermons ought to be. His wife was a member of an old English family, who had held the same lands for centuries; they were connected with many branches of the aristocracy and nobility, but retained that charm of simplicity and humanity which makes the alliance with culture and refinement so interesting and beautiful.

After five years of wedded life, Augustus Hare died somewhat suddenly at Rome, and a union of intense affection and sympathy on both sides came to an end. Though he had been an earnest believer and faithful pastor, Mr. Hare's death-bed was not without shadows. For two months he lay, looking full into "the moral eye of God's justice," and feeling that it was too much for him, till the clear apprehension of Christ's redeeming grace and finished work brought to him the peace that passeth all understanding.

The heart of his young widow was fearfully shattered, but her trust in the love of her Heavenly Father sustained her. Having no child of her own, she adopted a nephew, Augustus Julius Charles Hare (the well-known writer), whose love to her, like her love to him, could not have been more tender had they been really mother and son. The love bestowed on him in the helplessness of childhood was beautifully repaid by his filial care for her, especially under the infirmities of sickness and age. Mr. Hare is the biographer of her whom he called his mother, and the book is pervaded by a fine spirit of tender affection. It is indeed the memorials of a quiet life, and in this respect it differs from most female biographies of the day. Most of our Christian women whose biographies are written were remarkable for their activity, their zealous devotion to labours of love, and the chief interest of their lives lies in the harvests they were permitted to reap, the good they were enabled to do. The interest of Mrs. Hare's life is of another kind. Not that she wanted the spirit of active beneficence. After her husband's death, while she lived in England (first at Hurstmonceux, and afterwards at Holmhurst, near Hastings), she was full of consideration for the poor. "Each morning," says her "son," "as soon as breakfast was over, would see my mother cross her high field with its wide view over level and sea, and then follow the oak-fringed lane to the girls' school, where she taught the children —always gladly welcomed by them, from the interest she contrived to throw into the most ordinary lesson, often enlivening her instructions with stories of things she had seen or heard of, or simple facts of natural history. When any were sick or sorry, it was their 'lady' they wished to see; if any prosperity befel them, they hastened to tell her of it; and at their little festivals, especially that of the 1st of May, nothing was considered complete unless their dear lady was there, sitting under the laburnum trees in the little school court, enjoying all with them."

"Were any sick, it was their 'lady' they wished to see."

Still, Mrs. Hare's life was characteristically quiet. The good she did was mainly done through the graciousness of her own spirit and the emanations of love and goodness that fell on all who came in contact with her, and pre-eminently on those who enjoyed her intimacy. In this point of view she is one of those worthies with whom a half-hour may be spent with eminent advantage. For in this rushing age, when activity ranks so high, and a Christian woman, if she is not carrying some public burden, is liable to be thought of as a cumberer of the ground, there is some risk of forgetting that the Marys as well as the Marthas may render eminent service both to God and man. The character that shows a beautiful purity, like the white lily, and that exhales the fragrance of roses and violets, makes a precious contribution to the Christian atmosphere, and if it were only more common would turn the visible Church into a garden of "spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices."

There were many persons of beautiful character among the connections and friends of Maria Leycester's family. There were the Stanleys of Alderley (one of whom, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, was married to her sister), Reginald Heber, rector of Hodnet, and afterwards Bishop of Calcutta, and others of devout conversation and blameless character. But the foundations of their religious life were somewhat vague; perhaps they were like those with whom Mr. Wilberforce classed his mother in her early years—Christians of the Tillotson stamp. Maria Leycester thirsted for something more definite. It is probable that the death of her mother, which happened in her childhood, led to her first serious impressions, and made her desire to lead a devout and useful life. Afterwards her impressions were greatly strengthened by correspondence with her sister-in-law, Lucy Anne Stanley. Her first efforts were in the direction of a purer heart and a better life. The line she took was that of the Thomas à Kempis school; she sought after the holiness of Christ without a definite idea of how pardon of sin was to be obtained, or, as theologians call it, justification before God.

But this did not satisfy her. By-and-bye, Divine truth seems to have cleared out to her mind; her ideas of justification and sanctification became very definite. The result was, that while her feet rested firmly on Christ's finished work, the longings of her heart for conformity to the will of God, and for the enlargement of her faith, hope, and charity, were ardent and unceasing. To be near God and filled with His grace; to make manifest the life of Jesus in her mortal body, and to show the working of that life in acts of loving consideration for all around her, was her lifelong aim. She was insensibly drawn to prefer books of Evangelical and Calvinist theology, and when, becoming a widow, she settled beside her brother-in-law Julius, her preference for this school was the only point on which they differed.

It is strange that some religious teachers in our day of no little mark are trying to lead us away from this ground to that earlier experience which she and her husband found unsatisfactory. It seems to be thought enough if young people just have the desire to follow Christ. Questions of guilt and pardon need not trouble them. If they wish to be holy, all is right. Without here questioning the sincerity of the religion which rests on this foundation, undoubtedly Maria Leycester, like thousands more, found the atoning work of Jesus the main foundation-stone of her religion, and an indispensable help towards that imitation of Christ which is so apt to elude the grasp of those who do not fully realise His atoning love.

The simplicity and beauty of Mrs. Hare's spirit were shown in the delight and enthusiasm with which, when married, she settled down at Alton Priors, a primitive little hamlet in Wiltshire, of which Mr. Hare's college was the patron. Seventy souls were the whole population; of refined society, of beautiful scenery or objects of interest of any kind, there was literally none. She was so content with the place, so pleased with the old rectory and its little low-roofed rooms, so willing to pardon the want of a garden—defects, by the way, which her brother-in-law Julius could not pardon—so interested in the people, so refreshed with any instance, however insignificant, of good done, and so ready to help her husband, that the years flew like the wind, and the place looked to her like Paradise. When the family living of Hurstmonceux fell vacant, and Augustus was pressed to avail himself of his rights, he would not stir, but left the prize for his younger brother Julius. When their relative, the widow of Sir William Jones, was found to have accidentally destroyed the will that was to give a large part of her property to the Hares, there was no apparent disturbance of the mental serenity that knew how to be abased and how to abound. The connection with Alton was brought to an end only by the illness and death of Mr. Hare. When he became sickly, his wife and he went to Italy for his health; but what had been expected to be a benefit proved the reverse: a blood-vessel burst, and after oscillating for a time between life and death, he passed away at Rome in great peace in February, 1834.

The blow was a very crushing one, and had Mrs. Hare been a selfish woman, she would have been overwhelmed. The sympathy between her and her husband had been so tender, and their companionship so close, that to lose him was to lose all that brightened her earthly life. But she derived happiness from thinking of all that had supported and cheered him in his last illness, and had given peace and calmness to his death-bed experience. She felt new obligations to the Saviour because He had been such a Saviour to him, and to the Bible that had given him such consolation and joy. And the Saviour Who had been near to him was near to her. Nor did her interest in others pass away. Her old friends awakened in her a more tender love now that her experience of the vanity of life had scattered the dreams of an earthly paradise. They, too, would have to pass through the cloud one way or other; it was her earnest desire to contribute to their life any brightness that she could.

On returning to England she made her first home, as we have said, beside Julius Hare at Hurstmonceux. Her time seemed to be spent between cultivating the garden of her heart and scattering fragrance all round. There was a green alley at her house which used to be called her "Prayer Walk," where she used to pace up and down in prayerful meditation and aspiration. She could say of her great sorrow—"In the wealth of God's love to me His poor servant, He has given anew all that it is possible for me rightly to enjoy, and made the earnest desire of my heart to long after that which would be to the praise of His glory. . . . 'Lord, teach me right judgment and knowledge'—that is my constant prayer. I know not how to guide my household aright, how to train up my child in the way he should go, how to draw my dearest Julius nearer in fellowship to his God and mine. Let this threefold duty be made plain to me, so plain that I may not err in it; and whatever may be the cost, O may the Spirit of Jesus reign in me till every selfish aim and purpose is rooted out, every unkind and severe judgment, and perfect love and perfect purity are wrought in my heart."

Her devotion to the Bible was very great. "When, from outward circumstances or inward temperament, the Bible is the main food of my mind during the day, and all other intellectual nourishment is only the garnish as it were to this chief dish; or, to borrow an image from music, when God's Word is the air and man's word only the accompaniment, my soul is kept in perfect peace; it feels as if all were in its right place and fitting proportion. When, on the contrary, this is not so, and the wisdom of man is most prominently before me, and that of God thrown into the distance, I feel ill at ease, and my mind seems tossed to and fro without stay or peace."

The grace in which above all others she aspired to excel was love to her God and Saviour. Meditating on the words, "They seemed to Him but a few days for the love He bore to her," she prays, "O that such a love as this might fill my heart to Him who has so loved me that the years of my earthly pilgrimage might, like those of Jacob's servitude, seem but a few days for the love I bear to Jesus, my Lord and my God! And so they would if the soul could ever be kept at that height of spiritual joy and peace to which it pleases God occasionally to raise it; but alas! it so cleaves to the earth, and earth so encompasses it about, that without a life of abstraction from the world and man, it is hard to preserve the freshness of an ever-flowing fountain of love, able to swallow up the polluted streams that are constantly pouring into it."

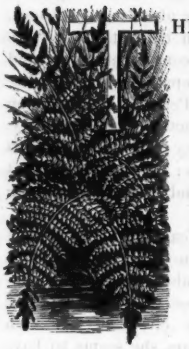
The latter years of Mrs. Hare's life were afflicted with serious illness. She always found benefit from the air and scenes of Italy, and she liked the opportunity to revisit her husband's tomb at the Pyramid of Caius Cestius, and renew her acquaintance with the scenes she had visited in his company. The illness to which she was subject was a singular one. Fainting-fits came on, during which she would lie for many hours in a state of syncope so complete and deathlike that her friends were afraid lest the authorities, hearing of her condition, should insist on her being buried. At Pau, in 1865, she remained in that state for sixty hours; then, after a brief recovery, she relapsed into a second trance of a hundred and twelve hours; this was succeeded by a third trance of twenty-six hours "of absolute rigidity, icy coldness, neither the pulse nor the heart beating, or any breath; an entire appearance of death." "A serene peace overshadowed her; a heavenly sweetness filled her face, and never varied except to dimple into smiles of angelic beauty, as if she were already in the company of the angels; and indeed, perhaps she was; for 'I have not been alone' were her first words on awaking; 'your Uncle Penrhyn and Aunt K. have been with me.'"

But even from these gates of death she returned. She had several journeys to and from the Continent even after this strange experience. In 1868 she was so ill at Rome that all hope of her recovery was abandoned. Yet even then she rallied and came home; and it was not till the end of 1870, and in her own house at Holmhurst, that her spirit finally departed for her heavenly home.



Mrs. Hare had a wonderful catholicity and charity of heart. She thought it the right course in general society to endeavour to treat all and speak of all who professed themselves Christians as our brethren in hope; to strive against the natural shrinking from the manifestation of a spirit that would be uncongenial; and in meekness and love to maintain in one's own conduct and language the importance of heavenly above earthly things, the value of the substance above the shadow. Especially ought we to abstain from harsh judgments of others, who might appear to act from other motives. She thought that all who belonged to the visible Church should be looked on and spoken to as fellow-heirs of its privileges, except when an opening occurred of speaking to any-one personally and practically. Some may think her rule a lax one, and tending to evil; but it is to be observed that what it was intended to regulate was public and somewhat general intercourse. And surely it is a better rule than that of harsh and bitter judging, and assumption of the power of summarily determining whether one is a true Christian or not. The question deserves more attention than it often gets: how are we to treat those whom we believe to be unconverted, and whom we often meet, without, on the one hand, making them think that they are Christians, or, on the other, becoming offensive, and exposing ourselves to the reproach of deeming ourselves holier than they? Perhaps the question is answered more easily in practice than in theory. The spirit of love and humility will solve many a problem where logic is helpless; only let us see that it is really the spirit of love and humility by which we are inspired.

We may just glance at one feature of Mrs. Hare's character that seems to us an imperfection. She seems to have held too much aloof from the ordinary fellowship and from the social activities of the Christian world. Beyond the circle of her own relatives, friends, and neighbours, she seems to have had little association with anyone. We never hear of a public movement or a Christian society with which she became identified. She travels a good deal on the Continent, but does not speak of the spiritual condition of the people, nor does she seem to help any society that aims at their good. We do not remember even a passing notice of the Church Missionary or any other missionary society. Of course she sought after a "quiet life." But the quiet life might still have been combined with a wider outlook from her watch-tower, and a more active concern for the world's good. The attitude of separation from the Christian world generally which she maintained seems to have hindered the outflow of her heart in loving desires and fervent aspirations for the whole family of mankind.

We claim Mrs. Hare as one of those eminently saintly women whose transformed lives and purity of heart bear an indefeasible testimony to the truth of Christianity. If ever woman lived upon Christ, it was she; if ever woman showed how really Christ rears and nourishes the life of God in the soul of man, it was she. We may give up to the world the hordes of inconsistent men and women who call Christ "Lord, Lord," but do not the things which He says. We may let the world say, if it pleases, "If these be what you call Christians, we are better as we are." But we will not let the world say that the Christian Church has nothing better or more genuine. We go to its innermost sanctuary and find its true jewels, resplendent in the work of faith, the labour of love, and the patience of hope. We find one of these in Mrs. Hare; and pointing to her and many like-minded men and women, we say, "Behold the proof that the Spirit of God is still working in this world, and take heed to yourselves lest peradventure, in your disbelief, you be found to be fighting against God."

FOREWARNED, FOREARMED.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "ECCE VERITAS," "THE YOUNG MEN OF SCRIPTURE," ETC. ETC.

THERE is a family crest belonging to those who own the name of "Horn," in which there is the representation of a bugle, with the motto "Monitus, munitus," "warned, armed," or, freely rendered, "Forewarned, forearmed." The motto refers to the use of the bugle or horn in giving friendly or hostile intimation of what is impending. The horn is still so used. Our huntsmen make the valleys resound with the blast of the horn. Our coachmen intimate their approach by the same means. At Llanberis and elsewhere, when slate or stone is being removed by explosives, the sound of the horn cautions all who are near to find some refuge; whilst on the Continent, instead of a shrill whistle, the more mellow horn is used on the railways. In each instance the intention is to forewarn. Whether the result in every case is that the hearer is forearmed is very doubtful.

Now, God has ever adopted the principle of forewarning. He has prepared men for the results of their deeds. He has never permitted mortals to sow the seeds of misfortune and sorrow without some intimation of the nature of the fruits which such seed will produce. When he introduced Adam to Eden, He said, "Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat; for the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." When the wickedness of the antediluvians had so increased that the Lord resolved to sweep the inhabited parts of the earth clear by a deluge, He first sent Noah, "a preacher of righteousness," to forewarn men. When the doom of Sodom and Gomorrah was fixed, two angels were sent to Lot to prepare him, and Lot was sent to his sons-in-law to forewarn them. Before Pharaoh and his host were overthrown, he had warning upon warning. Each of the ten plagues told him what was the Will of Heaven, and what would be the penalty of opposing that supreme Will. Before Jericho was seized and destroyed, there were six days' notice of the coming tribulation; the shrill sound of the ram's horn was heard repeatedly. The two destructions of Jerusalem, by the Chaldeans and the Romans, were foretold by the prophets and by Christ. Thus God has ever dealt with man.

There are physical forewarnings. Oppressive exhaustion tells us we are making excessive demands upon nature, and that we are exposing ourselves to some severe illness. Aches and pains caution us against repeating certain acts of folly, or say to us, "Oh, do not this abominable thing, which the Lord hates." If such warnings be not heeded, paralysis smites us down, or consumption steals over us, "the banner-rose of health" passes from the cheek, the eye forgets its "summer light and warmth," the step becomes languid, the hands thin and pale, and "at length the glassy eye" is for ever closed "in dread mortality."

There are the forewarnings of conscience. That "oracle of God," that "pulse of reason," that "sense of right," that "tremendous power" inhabiting us "without our leave," that "sole monarchy in man," that "vicegerent of God in the human heart," will speak to us. Amid the din of the most discordant sounds it will make its voice heard. We may try now and then to repress it and stifle its utterances, but it will be heard. It will flash its light upon our pathway, and show us whither our career is tending. It will write before our mental vision the word "Beware!" in startling capitals. It will "light a torch to distant deeds, make the past present, and the future frown," and thus "awake the soul, as with a peal of thunder, to strange horrors." He that is forearmed by such forewarning is secure and happy, and can say, with Shakespeare—

> "I feel within me
> A peace above all earthly dignities,
> A still and quiet conscience."

There are the forewarnings which come to men by the dealings of God with our fellow-men. Many of the calamities which befall those around us are designed and adapted to break up our thoughtlessness and check our evils. Not infrequently have men taken heed to such warnings, and become decided followers of Christ and useful servants of the Church. Thus Waldus, a rich merchant of Lyons, passing along the street one day, saw a man fall dead on the pathway. The sight profoundly impressed him. It suggested to him the necessity for preparation for death. The impression ripened into consecration to the Saviour. He became a preacher of the truths of Scripture, and ultimately founder of the Waldenses.

There are forewarnings which come to us in dreams, and which undoubtedly come from God. Of old the Lord spoke to men by dreams and visions of the night. He does so still. Ever and anon most striking instances occur in proof of this statement. Take, for example, the following. A clergyman of New Jersey, America, states that he had in his congregation a young man who yielded to the temptation to drink ardent spirits. From being a respectable and respected artisan, he fell into habits of vice and became the associate of evil-doers. One night he dreamed that returning home from a drunken revel, and ascending the stairs to his bed-chamber, he fell backward to the bottom of the stairs, broke his neck, and opened his eyes in hell. The terrific character of what he saw and heard so horrified him that the effort to escape awoke the sleeper. The dream made a profound impression upon the young man's mind. He visited his clergyman, narrated all to him, and promised in future to live a different life. His minister assured him that his dream was a solemn warning from God, and that the only security was to abandon his evil companions and habits. For a time all went well. His wife and family were once more cared for and happy. His place in church was once again filled. His godless acquaintances were forsaken. He became respected and prosperous. Returning home from his daily employment one evening, he was taunted by his old friends, who called him a Methodist, reproached him with not being able now to enjoy himself, and as being too weak to take a glass of ale. To prove himself possessed of self-control, he yielded to persuasion, and joined his companions to drink. The old desire revived. He went from one glass to another, and from that to a third. He sank again into his former habits, and sad to relate, he returned home one night in a fearful state of intoxication. Going up-stairs, he tumbled to the foot, and was found dead. Alas! that, being forewarned, he had not kept forearmed. The dream was intended to work his reformation, and secure his eternal safety. But the warning being neglected, his end was death, physical and spiritual.

There are forewarnings which are given by Heaven's representatives—the ministers of Christ. The Apostle Paul, writing to the Thessalonian Christians, says, "We have forewarned you." So every faithful preacher of the Gospel can say to the people of his charge. It is his duty and privilege to caution his hearers against the spiritual dangers which beset life's pilgrimage — to point out the Slough of Despond, Arbour of Sloth, Bye-path Meadows, and Doubting Castle—to put the pilgrim on his guard against such characters as Pliable, Obstinate, Formalist, Hypocrisy, Talkative, By-ends, Money-love, Hold-the-world, Ignorance, Turn-away, who are as certainly encountered now as when John Bunyan penned his immortal dream. The Word of God is as applicable to the minister of the Gospel to-day as it was to the prophet of old—"Thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me;" and very solemn, but deserving of attention, are the declarations, "If thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it: if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul."

And then there are warnings given us by the Divine Spirit. The Holy Ghost strives with us, maketh intercession within us, places guilt in a clear light, that we may see its enormity, tells of judgment to come, that we may prepare for it, broods over the heart to win it from the world and woo it to God. But, alas! the many warnings too often are despised. It is possible to "quench" the Spirit, to "resist" the Spirit, to "grieve" the Spirit, and even to "blaspheme" the Spirit of God.

Let all who desire to be forearmed for temptation, tribulation, vicissitude, loss, bereavement, and death take heed to the warnings God has given. Whether those warnings come through the physical organism, by conscience, by providential dealings, by dreams, by the voice of the minister, or by the work of the Spirit within, let them be regarded as from the Infinite One. To be forewarned, let it be to be forearmed.

"O DARLING LITTLE BROTHER."

O DARLING little brother, you lie on mother's knee,
Soft hand reached at my cheek, with pat of wonderment and glee:
She loves you well, does sister Nell, and baby, too, loves me!

2.

O darling little brother, all day you laugh and crow,
All night in sleep serene and deep you draw your breath so low,
That, sure, you seem of joys to dream which only angels know!

3.

O darling little brother, beyond the salt sea foam,
In foreign scene to serve the Queen dear father now must roam;
How great his joy to clasp his boy when he comes safely home!

4.

O darling little brother, as night's deep shadows fall,
Mother and Nell, their wants to tell, to Christ the Saviour call;
We pray for you, for father too, and God will keep us all!

CHAPTER XVII.

"YES," said Hope. "Yes"—she continued very slowly—"and that is all? You never saw the other girl again?"

"Never."

"And you think I should make you a good wife?"

"Honestly, I do. Honestly, I also believe that you will be happier with me than living alone in Bayswater."

"I was not unhappy there; I had a full and busy life—the boys interested me. I was independent."

"Practically you shall be so still. I will never coerce you."

"Oh, it isn't that," Hope frowned.

They were walking up and down in the shelter of one of the pine woods at Bournemouth. The aromatic sweet smell came pleasantly on the air. Hope walked slowly; she was still weak, and her face had only a faint colour.

"Suppose," she said at length—"Suppose I say yes, and you marry me, and then—then—afterwards you see the other girl."

"Is it likely?" said Markham. "What is one face? There are millions in the world. I have spent two years looking for it, and never caught a glimpse or got a clue. The face may have gone away into the infinite—the girl may be dead. In any case, the chances are a thousand to one that I may never see her again."

"You ask me to be your wife. And you love this other girl. You don't say anything at all about loving me. Don't you think you are very unkind to me?"

Markham looked full into Hope's eyes. She raised them frankly to meet his—they were full of pain. Then she lowered them as if something had struck her, and a crimson wave of colour caused by some deep emotion swept over her face.

"Give me your hand," said Markham.

She gave it without a word.

"Listen," he said slowly. "Listen: I am a very earnest and a very honest man. I won't say a word that I don't fully mean. Even to help my own suit—even to bring sunshine into my shadowed life—I could not say now one word that I do not mean with my whole heart. I don't love you as I love the face that flashed across me and went away. I don't love you with the unreasoning passion which I feel when I think of it. But I do love you, Hope, in a way that I never thought to love a woman; I love you in the best way because I honour and respect you, because to look into your eyes comforts me, and to take your hand in mine gives me a sense of peace. You are the best thing in all the world—a pure-hearted, noble-minded English girl. To think of you in my home makes me happy. Will you come, or will you say no because of a shadow?"

"I will come," said Hope. "Yes, I will come. You have spoken very good words to me, and I thank you; but remember—don't ever forget—that where you give little, I give all. Don't forget that. God help me, if the shadow grows into life."

"It shan't—it won't—it melts already," said Markham with enthusiasm. He folded his arms round Hope and kissed her.

"What a delightful arrangement!" said Katie Douglas, when she was told. "And you began by disliking him so much, you know, dear. Anyone could see that. You could not bear even to have his name mentioned; and Bee and Maud Chatterton even now talk of how cross you looked when you found yourself on Rossiter's back."

"I am so delighted about it all, dear," said Mrs. Chatterton; "don't mind that silly girl and her ridiculous nonsense. It is sometimes true—is it not?—that we conceal our real feelings by pretending to dislike."

Hope smiled and blushed.

"I don't think I ever did dislike him really," she said in a low voice. "At least, not since he sang 'Farewell to Lochaber.'"

"And you are very happy now, darling?" said Katie.

"Yes, Katie, I am certainly very happy."

"You have made an excellent and wise choice," said Mrs. Chatterton, drawing up her chair luxuriously to the fire and gazing at the flames with a pleased smile. "I may as well say, Hope, now that all chance of such a thing is at an end, that you are not at all the sort of girl to run about London alone. It's all very well for some, but you are not the kind."

"I took very good care of myself, I assure you, Mrs. Chatterton."

"I dare say, my dear. But it was a pity, a thousand pities. Now, as Mr. Markham's wife—he holds an excellent position at Oxford, you know, dear, a distinguished man in himself: very—as his wife, the air which was so unsuitable in an omnibus will be really becoming."

"Mrs. Chatterton means that you have such a proud way of walking," explained Katie.

"And of looking, my love," added the good lady.

"It's no matter," said Hope, suddenly facing round upon them both. "I am not marrying for position. I am marrying because I love Dick more than all the rest of the world. I am proud of that, if you like. But as to position, I think a girl may keep up her dignity even if she does ride in omnibuses. I was very happy in London, and very independent, and I had no idea of going about in a poor-spirited sort of a way."

"You couldn't, darling—it wouldn't be in you," explained the adoring Katie.

But Mrs. Chatterton looked at the girl as if she would read her through.

"She's a fine young thing," she said to herself. "It would take a good deal to break her spirit. I cannot help admiring her. I wonder if she will be happy with that rather queer professor. He has a temper—I am sure he has a temper. How will Hope get on with a man who possesses a temper?"

CHAPTER XVIII.

WHEN Cecil Grey heard of Hope's engagement, he did not say a word. A friend broke the news to him at his club, a friend who knew Markham, and who was much interested in the fact that he was about to incur the risk of matrimony. This friend, Clavering by name, plied Grey with questions, to which he received such short and unsatisfactory replies that he left him, under the impression that he (Grey) was "soft" on the girl himself.

When Grey got home to his neat little flat in Curzon Street, he found a letter from Markham, a very brief epistle, also announcing the fact:—

"Wish me joy, Grey; it is all right. Forget our conversation coming up to town last week. Hope knows, and is satisfied. Forget it, and come down to Bournemouth; we all want you.—Yours,

"DICK MARKHAM."

"Forget it!" muttered Grey; "I'm so likely to, of course! Wasn't it always the sort of thing I dreaded? Didn't I long ago say to Hope that if she —she met Markham it would be all up with me? Doesn't instinct tell me who the girl is that has bewitched him?—the girl with a look of Hope, only more beautiful; with Hope's voice, only sweeter. And she was in Rome then; and wouldn't it be just the sort of thing she'd do—to appeal to a stranger to help her? He wouldn't take a liberty—he wouldn't dare; and she—she would have her own way with any fellow. Forget it! Yes, that's so likely!"

Cecil did, however, "come down to Bournemouth"; and there he made himself exceedingly agreeable: congratulated Hope warmly, cut a number of stale but time-honoured jokes, delighted Katie Douglas, to say nothing of Bee Chatterton, and was altogether the life of the party.

Markham wanted Hope to become his wife with as little delay as possible.

"You have nothing to wait for," he said; "you can rig yourself out afterwards. What do a lot of clothes signify? We want one another. Come to me at once, Hope."

"It is not the clothes," said Hope. "You don't suppose I care about them? But I should like to hear from Jocelyn before I quite fix the day. No, I have not seen her for two years; but she is my only sister, and I love her dearly. I want to hear from her before I change my name. I have written; I may hear in a day or two. After that, I don't mind how soon you take me, Dick."

Hope was looking very radiant just now. If the shadow troubled her, she certainly never let it flit across her bright face. Markham found new charms in her day by day; and once or twice it even occurred to him to wonder how he ever could have preferred an unknown face and the echoes of a voice to this tangible, vigorous-minded, and fascinating girl.

"After all, I should not be afraid to see the other face," he said once to himself. He was standing by Hope, who was dressed in white, and whose slight hand rested on his arm as the thought came to him. He felt glad. "I can give my whole heart to the girl I am going to marry," he murmured, with inward rejoicing. "I love you, Hope, better every day," he said aloud, and he printed a kiss on the girl's broad white brow.

"Have you fixed the day?" asked Cecil of him that same evening.

"Well, not exactly," replied Markham. "Hope is waiting to hear from Miss Jocelyn. She's wonderfully attached to her sister. You sympathise with her in that, eh, Grey?"

"Stuff!" said Grey. "I wouldn't wait, if I were Hope. I'll speak to her to-morrow."

"My dear fellow, forgive me; you and Hope have always been excellent friends, but as regards her marriage with me, I think I am the right person to talk with her—I mean that she is not likely to yield a strongly expressed wish to anyone else."

"It's all rubbish!" said Grey again, in a very ill-tempered tone. "Hope is a goose—you'll forgive my saying so, Markham; but what does it matter, in a case of this kind, whether she gets a letter from Jocelyn or not?"

"For my own part, I agree with you, Grey. I am most anxious to be married, for, independent of any sentiment in the matter, it is extremely inconvenient trotting backwards and forwards from Oxford. I am absolutely neglecting my necessary work. I do trust Hope won't mind our having a very short honeymoon."

The next day Jocelyn's eagerly looked-for letter arrived. It contained all the usual congratulations, and ended with an almost passionate request:—"Don't get married until I get back to you, my own dear, sweet, pet Virtue. I shall break my heart if you do; and Aunt Margaret, I am sure, will allow me to come back to England a little before herself and Lottie. Telegraph, when you get this, what is the very latest date to which you can defer your marriage, and I will be with you in time. I will, I must, I shall! Do grant me this one little petition, my own Hope, for the sake of old times, and because—because—well, because, in spite of everything, your Jo is not the happiest of mortals."

There were pages more in this voluminous letter, but the sum and substance of all was the same: Hope must not give herself away until Jocelyn stood by her side.

"And I won't," said the girl, tears filling her big bright eyes. "You won't ask me, Dick. Jo has set her heart on this, and it is not much to grant. I should like her to stand by my side when I give myself to you, Dick. She is the only one very, very near to me—and quite absolutely belonging to me. She is not only my sister, but we are twins. Do you know, we never had a quarrel in our lives! Of course I differed from her:

"Hope was still glancing over her letter."

I differed from her awfully once, but we never said unkind things to each other as other girls do—never. She only asks us to give her time to come. We will give her time, won't we?"

"Certainly," said Markham. His face was grave; he did not know why he suddenly felt quite depressed. At that moment Cecil sauntered into the room.

"You have heard!" he exclaimed. "Foreign paper!—you have heard then at last, Hope! How—how is Jocelyn?"

"All right," answered Hope. "She wants to come to the wedding, and Dick—Dick is kind. He says she may. You'll be glad, won't you, Cecil?"

Hope was still glancing over her letter. She looked up with an arch, gay smile now, full into Cecil's face.

"You'll be very glad!" she exclaimed, a note of sympathy in her voice.

Glad! No man ever yet looked less glad.

"You're not going to be such a fool?" said Cecil, turning white to his very lips, and glancing at Markham. "Jocelyn's at the other side of the world; and to put off a wedding—you'll repent this, Markham. I say, but you're not going to do it, you two, you are only joking!"

"I don't understand you, Cecil," said Hope in astonishment.

But Markham's tone showed real annoyance.

"I would do anything to please my future wife," he said sternly. "And in this matter I shall most certainly yield to her very natural wish.—Hope dear, did you not once tell me that Mrs. Seaton and your sister and cousin were coming to town in May? This is the first week in March. We will be married in May. Write and tell your sister so."

This arrangement was finally made. Cecil did not interfere by another word. The only thing he did do was to ask for Jocelyn's address, which Hope gave him, wondering why he looked so pale and careworn.

"Are you going to try your luck again?" she asked. "Oh, I hope, I trust you will succeed!"

"I shall never succeed!" he answered almost brutally.

And he hurried out of the room, banging the door noisily after him.

Markham was obliged to go back to Oxford, and an arrangement was made that Hope should live with the Douglases during the short time that would elapse before her marriage. Mrs. Seaton, Lottie, and Jocelyn were spending the winter and spring in Algeria, and Jocelyn wrote enthusiastically about Hope's goodness and Mr. Markham's kindness in putting off the wedding-day. It was finally arranged that it was to take place on the first Saturday in May, and even for this Jocelyn must travel back a day or two before her companions.

Mrs. Seaton wrote a long letter to Hope, begging of her to overlook the past, and offering her house and her own chaperonage for the wedding ceremony. But Hope's answer was a decided one.

"I don't want to think any unkind thoughts of you, Aunt Margaret. I am even grateful to you for being good to Jocelyn; but I cannot be married from your house: it would pain me. I cannot possibly do it. Besides, we have decided not to have any so-called wedding. We are going to church one morning early, and we shall be very glad to have Jocelyn with us—very glad for that, but there is not to be any wedding in the sense of requiring a grand house or having numbers of strange people, who don t care for one, looking on."

"Your sister must be a very odd young person," said Mrs. Seaton after she had read this letter aloud for the benefit of the two girls.

"Delightful and original, I should call her," exclaimed Lottie.

"Well, my dear, it always was your way to admire rudeness and unconventionality. Of course, I shall send Hope a wedding present; but beyond that I don't suppose anything further is expected of me."

"Not even that, if I understand Hope aright," replied Jocelyn, turning away her face and suppressing a very slight sigh. "Dear Hope! I shall like to see her again."

"I wish you could manage to take me with you, Jocelyn," said Lottie. "Hope cannot possibly have any enmity against me.—Might I go, mother? It would be refreshing to see a girl with a strongly marked antipathy for anyone. Besides, I suppose she is marrying a wonderful oddity.—Did you ever see an Oxford don fit to look at, Jocelyn? There, mother has gone out of the room. She is quite huffed about Hope, I can see that. Jocelyn, have you made up your mind about the Count? Forgive me, dearest, but I am dying of curiosity."

"Which I trust won't quite finish you, Lotty, as I mean to tell you nothing until I please myself."

CHAPTER XIX.

DAYS pass quickly when one is busy, slowly when one is anxious. Cecil Grey thought the two months which intervened between Hope's engagement and her wedding the longest he had ever gone through. Hope, on the contrary, full of energy and work, her heart dancing with joy, her whole nature basking in the sunshine of a great love, found these same days marvellously fleet-footed.

Hope was not a girl to do anything by halves. When she fell in love, she was not likely to do so in a half-and-half way: there was no one like Dick Markham; there was no girl so altogether blessed as Hope Karron. For a time the queer story Markham had told her produced a certain effect—a certain uneasiness when her joy seemed most near to perfection; but every day, as she thought more of the man himself, the less did she trouble herself about an unknown, indistinct, shadowy rival.

Hope's wedding-day was arranged for the sixth of the month, and, for various reasons, Jocelyn's arrival could not take place until the day before. On the morning of that day Cecil called rather early at the Douglases' house. His face looked careworn, his eyes had an excited gleam in them, the boyish expression had almost totally left his somewhat thin but handsome face. The little house was in that state of confusion which will precede even the quietest wedding. Cecil was shown into the drawing-room, which was littered all over with wedding presents and odds and ends of half-finished finery. In a moment Hope opened the folding doors which divided the tiny room from the dining apartment behind. She came in hastily, holding out both her hands to Cecil, and looking so radiant, so expectant, so like her name, that the young fellow recoiled with a half-smothered exclamation.

"Good gracious, Hope, don't look so happy!" he said.

"Cecil!"

Hope's expression changed to one of concern and pity.

"Dear Cecil, you are not well. Why do you speak to me like that? Why should I not look happy? Jocelyn is coming to-day, and to-morrow I am to be Dick's wife. Dick! fancy Dick falling in love with me, Cecil. You used to say he was so good, even good enough for Jocelyn. Do you remember? Fancy my getting him! How can I help being happy, dear Cecil?"

"Yes, but you looked so—so—like the thing itself—like Hope itself in the room. Don't, it isn't lucky."

"Cecil, you really can't be well. Do you know you are talking the greatest nonsense?"

"Perhaps so. I have had a sensation of being rather hipped lately. Don't bother about me. I called to-day to know if I could be of any help to you, Hope."

"In what way?"

"Well, you see, Markham won't be up from Oxford in time. I thought perhaps I could go to Victoria with you to meet Jocelyn. There 'll be sure to be a fuss, getting her things through the Customs, and all that. I thought perhaps I could be a help."

"Dear Cecil, of course you can be a help—it will be just the very thing. One always wants a man on these sort of occasions, and Jocelyn won't be my dear old Jo if she has not heaps of luggage. But you 're sure you don't mind, Cecil?"

"Why should I?"

This was said a little roughly. Hope coloured.

"I mean—you see, Cecil, I don't forget you even though I am so happy—I thought it might hurt you to meet Jocelyn like that."

"Not a bit of it—I 'm long past that stage."

Again he spoke roughly, and a warm colour flooded his face.

"Then I 'm delighted to have you," said Hope, not noticing, or not appearing to notice, his queer manner. "Do you know, I rather strategised about Dick. Of course he wanted to come with me to meet Jo, but I did not want him to see her looking tossed from travelling, and tired, and altogether not like her beautiful self. So I managed to get him to choose a train from Oxford which would come in too late to bring him in time to Victoria. He is to dine here to-night, and then Jocelyn will be quite rested, and he 'll see her at her very best. It is nice, therefore, to have you, Cecil. And, dear Cecil, I should like to take this opportunity to thank you."

"What for, Hope? For goodness' sake don't begin loading me with thanks."

"But I must. You have always been a sort of brother to me. Perhaps, Cecil, perhaps what you most wish for will come right after all. Then you and I will be the two happiest people in the world."

"I 'm past wishing or hoping," muttered Cecil. "All the same, I 'll do what I can for you, Hope—I mean, up to the end. I 'll bring a hansom here at three to take you to Victoria."

Hope could not help wondering a little when Cecil at last took himself off. Was he ill? How changed he looked—not at all as if he was glad to see Jocelyn once more. Then she recalled with a vague, half uneasy wonder that the change in Cecil had really begun about the date of her own engagement to Markham.

"It is odd, and I can't account for it, poor dear fellow," she murmured.

But she was too busy and too happy to dwell long on any disturbing thoughts that day.

The Continental train was due at Victoria between three and four. It was nearly half an hour late, but that is a common occurrence, and would not have greatly mattered to anybody on this particular occasion had not a certain train from Oxford been very sharp to time, and had not a certain individual who intended to come by a later one travelled by it.

"Good!" said Markham, as he sprang on to the platform at Paddington. "They are sure to be delayed a little at the Customs. I 'll risk it—I 'll go to Victoria. It will be a surprise to Hope, and I can but miss her and that sister of hers at the worst. I've a chance, however, of being in time if I get a fleet horse and a good hansom. Yes, I 'll certainly risk it."

The cab bowled off merrily, and Markham, leaning forward a trifle in his seat, gazed before him with an abstracted but pleased expression. He was pleasant to look at, at that moment—an ugly man, doubtless, but with a face marked not only by many indications of power, but of kindliness, of steadfastness, of truth and honour.

As the hansom carried him swiftly to Victoria, he was looking at a picture—a very happy picture to gaze at for a man who had hitherto all his life felt himself more or less of a waif and stray. He was looking at a peaceful English home, at a bright English girl its presiding genius, at himself as the centre of her affections, the owner of her and the house she lived in. It was all bright, and the picture was about to become a reality. He quite forgot the shadowy face, and the voice which had haunted him for two years had become almost indistinct. Had he remembered the face and voice at that moment he would have laughed.

"Thank God I am cleared of that folly!" would have been his exclamation.

The cabman drew up at Victoria. Markham paid him his fare and walked into the station. A porter told him that the Continental train was just coming in. He was in time, therefore. He walked leisurely towards the platform indicated. He would not hurry himself. Hope should kiss her sister with no one there to look on. When her first great joy had subsided, he would touch her arm and get her to introduce him.

He reached the platform; it was full of people, bustling, rushing about, gesticulating, embracing. The scene was noise and confusion. Markham stood a little in the background. He was so big that he could look over the heads of most present. There was no hurry. He smiled to himself at the people who made so much fuss and got so excited. Suddenly his gaze lit upon Cecil's slight figure. He was glad to see him there; it was good-natured of Grey to go and help Hope at this crisis. Then he remembered what Grey had told him about his own feelings for Jocelyn, and he stepped a little further out of sight, and almost reconsidered his project of surprising Hope at this juncture.

Hope was standing close to Cecil's side. She wore a grey dress, and a black lace hat partly shaded her face. She, too, was tall and slim. Her very upright carriage gave her always a distinguished appearance, and Markham owned to a sense of pride as he reflected that she belonged to him.

Both Cecil and Hope were standing close to a first-class carriage. Cecil was loading a porter with all sorts of rugs and wraps, and the next moment a girl stepped out, put her hand on Hope's shoulder, looked up into her face and kissed her. She was not so tall as Hope, but the moment she came up to her and touched her, she gave to Hope a peculiar appearance. The whole scene set itself at once in a sort of picture in Markham's brain, and Hope, to borrow an old simile, looked like the moon beside the sun. The strange girl's face was set in a frame of the softest golden hair, her eyes looked big and dark, her colouring was brilliant, her smile radiant. She said something to Hope, and Markham fancied that he could hear her voice, lower, richer than Hope's. Hope was graceful, lovely in her way—but beside this girl! Markham felt himself turning faint, cold, and sick. He had not forgotten, then! The shadow had come to life. He stumbled rather than walked away. Neither Jocelyn nor Hope had seen him, but as he reached the end of the platform a hand was laid on his shoulder. He turned. Cecil Grey linked his arm within his.

"It's all up, old man, isn't it?" said Grey. "Oh, yes, I always guessed this—always—since you told me you met her in Rome. Come away; don't let the girls see you at present. Bear up, if you can, Markham, I'll come home with you, and we can talk the matter out."

"'If there is bad news, tell it to me quickly.'"—p. 849.

CHAPTER XX.

"AND so you are really and absolutely over head and ears in love, Hope?—Hope the wise, Hope the cautious! Who'd have thought it? Who ever would have thought it? But tell me about him, my own pet Virtue. How did he catch and imprison that grave, steadfast heart of yours? How was it done, Hope?"

Jocelyn and Hope were together in the little bedroom which they were to share that night. Jocelyn was lying back in the one easy-chair; Hope was standing by the window. Both girls were in white; but Hope's dress was plain, made simply, and high to her throat. Jocelyn's was a mass of ruffles and laces, and revealed the exquisite shape of rounded throat and rounded arms.

"How did you do it, Hope?" repeated Jocelyn; and now her big eyes looked up wistfully at where her sister stood erect, clasping and unclasping her long fingers.

"Jocelyn, I am so happy to see you again!" said Hope, and she bent down and kissed Jocelyn on her forehead. "Jocelyn, try not to joke, for once in your life. I am a very happy girl—a very, very happy girl."

"Dearest, that goes without saying. But describe your hero. Is he beautiful? Is he artistic? Is he rich? Is he clever?"

Hope put her hands to her ears.

"You shall see him for yourself in a minute," she said. "I won't answer any questions about his appearance. You will see him for yourself in a minute. He is coming to dinner, and he ought to be here directly. Had we not better go into the drawing-room?"

"Yes, love, certainly. Is Cecil Grey coming to dinner too, Hope?"

"Yes, Jocelyn." Hope looked full into her sister's eyes. "Are you going to be kind to poor Cecil?"

"I can't tell you, Hope. Is my dress all right?—and my hair? Do you like this new way I have of arranging it? Hope, I must tell you something. Cecil wrote to me when I was in Algiers—such a letter. Poor boy! I did not think he could have cared for me for so long. He did write such rubbish, too. It isn't me he cares for; it's an ideal he looks at through my eyes. I am wonderfully commonplace. Poor Cecil! he is something of a boy still, but he has grown wonderfully handsome."

"What did you say in answer to his letter, Jo?"

"What did I say? I am not going to tell you all my secrets, miss, even though you are to be a bride to-morrow! So you won't describe your wonderful Dick to me? Well, as you say, I can soon judge for myself; but answer me one thing at least—is he well off?"

"I really don't know, Jocelyn."

"Oh, what an unworldly Virtue! No wonder she retains her bright face! But seriously, Hope dearest, did not two years of poverty make you sick of it?"

"No," said Hope; "I have had a very happy two years."

Jocelyn looked full into her face. The strained expression was once more apparent in her eyes; she looked two or three years older than Hope at this moment.

"And riches can become monotonous," she said, in a dreary, low tone.

Then she linked her arm in Hope's, and they went into the drawing-room.

"The gentlemen are late," said Mrs. Douglas. "Hope dear, how well you look!—not a bit tired or overdone.—Jocelyn—I really must call you Jocelyn for your sister's sake—will you sit by me? Here, on this sofa, my dear."

"I will, if you will tell me all you know about Hope's wonderful Dick," replied Jocelyn Karron lightly.

Hope moved away to the other end of the tiny drawing-room; a very slight sensation of restlessness came over her. It was five minutes past the hour appointed for dinner.

"How late these tiresome men are!" pouted Katie. "We have such oceans to do to-night.—Yes—what is it, Jane?—what do you want?"

Jane was the housemaid, a neat-handed girl, who had taken a fancy to Hope, and Hope to her. To-morrow she was to change mistresses, and go away with Hope on her honeymoon.

"What is it, Jane?" repeated Katie.

"Can I speak to Miss Karron, please, Miss Douglas?—Will you step out for a moment on the landing, please, Miss Karron?"

The girl's face was grave, important, but not in the least alarmed.

"It's a message from that tiresome dressmaker!" said Katie to herself. She was dying to follow, but did not like to.

"What is it Jane?" said Hope, as the two stood on the landing; "is anything the matter?"

"Mr. Grey is in the library, miss. He wants to know if he can speak to you in private for a minute."

"Mr. Grey? But he is coming to dinner with Mr. Markham! What can be the matter, Jane?"

"I don't know, miss. What he said was, 'Ask Miss Hope Karron if I can see her for a moment by herself, and don't let the others know.' Mr. Grey is not in his evening dress, miss."

Hope felt as if a cold hand were laid on her warm beating heart. She did not change colour, however, nor allow the maid to see a trace of uneasiness in her face.

"It's a message from Mr. Markham, of course," she said. "Don't say anything until I know, though, Jane. I'm sure it's only to say that Mr. Markham can't come to dinner. But don't say anything until I give you leave."

She ran down-stairs, opened the library door quickly, came in, and shut it behind her.

"Now, Cecil, if there is bad news, tell it to me quickly!" she panted.

"My dear Hope—my—dear Hope——" said Cecil.

He came up to her, took her hands, wrung them in his own, then put a letter between them.

"There," he said; "I couldn't say it, nor could he. It's in the letter—what's of it, that is—it's bad enough, but not hopeless—no, not quite hopeless."

Hope did not utter a word. She clasped the letter tightly; her lips parted as if she wanted to say something very badly, but Cecil did not wait; he took up his hat and rushed out of the house.

When he was gone Hope went to the door and called Jane.

"Tell them to go to dinner, Jane," she said. "Make them go—invent any excuse you like; I am busy—I can't be disturbed for a little. Come back to me at the end of ten minutes, Jane—I may want you."

Hope shut the door and turned the key. The cold weight still rested against her heart, but it was slightly numb now, and although her intellect never felt keener or brighter, her capacity for extreme suffering was slightly blunted. She opened the letter, and was amazed to find that it was in Cecil's writing:—

"Dear Hope,—Markham can't manage it, so I am doing it for him. He has had a sudden blow; he is ill—yes, that is it, Markham is ill—he can't be married to-morrow, and I've been to the church and put the thing off. I am also writing to Mrs. Douglas; she will get her letter through the post. Don't you bother to tell her. God bless you, Hope. Cecil Grey.

"P.S.—Markham says he may be all right soon. It's a sudden attack—he says he may get quite over it."

Hope clenched her fingers as she read. She read the letter twice, then she slipped it into its envelope and put it back into her pocket. Jane's tap came softly at the other side of the door. Hope sprang to it and opened it.

"Good gracious, Miss Hope! has anything gone wrong? You look—you look—oh, Miss Karron, forgive me, you look dreadful bad."

"I'm tired, Jane," said Hope, forcing a faint smile. "Don't worry about my looks just now. Are the others at dinner?"

"Yes, miss—so surprised and questioning-like: but I didn't let out a thing. Susan's waiting on them, and they're at the fish now—spring salmon—and it was an elegant dinner, Miss Hope, fit, so to speak, for a bridal. You couldn't fancy a small bit of fish if I brought it here, miss?"

"No, I shall be sick if you mention food. Jane, I want you to come out with me; I want you to come at once—before they leave the dining-room: run up-stairs and bring down my hat and cloak. We can walk down the street a little way and get into the first hansom we meet. I want you to be very quick, Jane; and, Jane, I'm in great trouble. Will you be brave and faithful, and willing to do just what I tell you to-night?"

"Yes, miss—oh, indeed, with all my heart, miss."

Jane's honest eyes began to overflow.

"You'll have plenty of time to cry afterwards," said Hope, in her quiet tone. "Fetch me my hat and cloak, and let us go at once."

A moment afterwards the two girls were walking quickly down the street. Ten minutes later Hope was standing on the steps of a large mansion occupied by the Chattertons, who were spending the season in town. She knew that both Markham and Cecil were their guests for the time being.

"No, I don't want to see Mrs. Chatterton," she said to the footman, who knew her and asked her to enter. "Will you please tell Mr. Markham that I am here, and must see him at once?"

"Mr. Markham is in his room, miss; I don't think he is well. The others are at dinner, and—— Oh, here is Mr. Grey."

Cecil came hastily forward; he had not changed his morning dress; his whole appearance was untidy; his face looked thinner and more worn than ever.

"The doctor has just left," he said. "Markham has had a shock. Did you not read my letter, Hope?"

"Yes, I read it, and I have come here. I must see Dick at once."

"Come into this room."

Cecil took her hand and almost pulled her in, slamming the door behind him.

"Don't you know it is very imprudent for you to come here?" he said with irritation. "We are trying our best to hush up the thing and not have a talk, and of course how can it be prevented if you come here looking as you do? How can you see Dick when he is in his room? He's ill. I told you he was ill, in my letter."

"By this time to-morrow," replied Hope, "but for the shock which you talk about, I should have been Dick's wife. Then you could not have kept me away from him. I will see him now—I won't leave the house until I see him. He is not so ill but that he can see me. Go up and tell him that I am here. Ask him to come down and see me. He can be as ill as he likes afterwards. I won't leave the house until I see him."

"You are very unwise, Hope—this may be most injurious. Am not I doing my best for you? It is madness your seeing Dick to-night. Besides, he is ill—ill enough to see a doctor; it is hard of you to want to disturb a man who is very ill."

"Call me any names you like, Cecil. I am not going to leave the house until I see Dick. I am almost his wife, and he is almost my husband. I am not asking too much."

"It's on your own head, then," said Cecil. "I would have saved you the blow."

And he left the room.

REVELATIONS OF CHARACTER.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM.

II.—CHARACTER AND CONVERSATION.

I HAVE endeavoured to show in my first article how character reveals itself in the countenance, and now we have to study its manifestations in conversation. Speech is the great outlet of our thoughts and feelings; and the great power of personal influence for life and death, the Holy Book says, is in the tongue. The life that is within us cannot long be repressed, and the readiest channel which the inner fountains can find is speech. As the power of conversation belongs in God's creation only to man, as it is his high prerogative, so the measure of this great gift is the measure of our responsibility.

Think of all the daily happiness which comes to us through the medium of speech: how we can interest and instruct, cheer and comfort, guide and warn, by speech. A great writer told me once that he judged of men and women by the questions that they asked; so true is it that our tastes, and estimates, and solicitudes do come out through our manifold inquiries.

But it is not alone in the questions they ask that men and women reveal themselves, I think, but in their less conscious speech. Surely, also, the kind of language people use tells us whether they are reverent or irreverent, delicate or indelicate, hasty or patient. It will be readily admitted that slang language is bad, and is in itself a liberty taken with that which ought to have a dignity in itself as the divine method of communication between beings who are made in the image of God. Slang speech reveals a vulgarity of heart which finds a sensational sort of pleasure in degrading certain noble words, and making them serve as a little electric battery of amusement and surprise. If a young lady tells you that a certain performance was "awfully funny," you begin to think that nothing is really very awful to her at all. If it be replied that there are certain slang words which ultimately take their places in our lexicons, I quite admit the fact. They are often deemed pungent, and especially expressive. I venture to suggest, even then, that they are not always appropriate for educated conversation simply because they are to be found in dictionaries.

Language, like dress—and it is the garb of thought—ought to be a becoming adornment, not in any sense what is commonly called fast on the one hand, nor negligée on the other hand. And as dress is generally admitted to be, in a considerable degree, expressive of character, so is language. And, then, if words in and of themselves are expressive of character, so is the thought expressed in the words. There is, for instance, mere idle conversation, which, if it was ever printed off, would appear supremely ridiculous. And there is that worse than idle—viz., gossiping conversation, which delights to talk of the faults and failings, the weaknesses and wickednesses, of neighbours and friends. When people talk much of these things, you judge, and rightly judge, that they are not likely to be tender, or kind, or considerate people; nay, more, you come to the conclusion that they are conceited people, not only condemning sins to which they are not personally prone, but implying that there is a sort of pleasant moral contrast between themselves and those whom they condemn. I have heard it said that people are generally very severe on sins which they are naturally inclined to themselves; and that intensely selfish people and miserably covetous people are the first to discern and to denounce these faults in others; in fact, that the listener might make a tu quoque application of their criticisms as possibly very appropriate to themselves.

How inwardly you admire a man whose speech is free from guile and envy, who praises some competitor, who is generous in his estimate of an absent friend, and who risks the disapproval and disappointment of his companions by venturing to bless one whom they have cursed! We are always giving inward verdicts upon those who satirise and slander others, whose conversational powers seem to run away with them, and who finish their poor little diatribes on some neighbour or friend with the goody-goody praise that he is "not such a bad fellow after all." I am afraid our unspoken verdicts of this sort of people often hinder any real friendship with them or affection for them. We do not necessarily write a man down a good scholar because he finds fault with the accent or pronunciation of another, though probably he intends that we should do so; nay, more, we think of him as a poor, priggish little pedant, who does not mind letting down the honours of another thereby to increase his own reputation.

Once upon a time, it is said, one of this class of critics, having given it as his emphatic judgment that in words of four syllables the accent should always be placed on the second syllable, found himself in a most unpleasant fix. Being engaged in describing some results of a railway accident, he had to say that "one lady was suf-foc-a-ted, and the other had her arm dis-loc-a-ted." Conversation does sometimes reveal this tendency to depreciate others that so self may be exalted; and could the speaker see into the minds of his auditors, he would experience a magneto-electric shock of surprise at reading something akin to the words, "Thou that sayest a man should not steal, dost thou steal!"

What contrasts in character we see sometimes in one day, after little groups of visitors have called. Some appreciate everything, see what is to be admired and approved in every little picture, in every trifling household alteration, and in every added touch of grace and beauty in house and garden; making the memory of their visit a quiet little benediction, and helping onward the endeavours of some in rather unpretending homes to make the best of things. But others seem afraid lest their powers of criticism and the individuality of their opinions and judgments should not have free play and be made properly manifest. "Yes, very pretty," they say; "but wasn't the place more comfortable before?" "Yes, nice little sketch enough; but doesn't the sky spoil it, do you think?" "Yes, I fancy it is an improvement to the place; but do you think you will ever see your money for it again?" Poor souls! they do not seem to know it, but their conversation is full of "ifs" and "buts!" Having interlarded their entire talk with them, they leave you in an unpleasant mood, unless you have great firmness of judgment as to what is right and good yourself.

I remember a young lady of my acquaintance who was out on horseback, and who met on her way one of this class. She received, as she thought at first, a pretty compliment: "You look nice on horseback, my dear," an old friend said to her; "but, then, all ladies look nice on horseback." Thus it is we find strange mysteries in life. There are some people who seem to think it not good for you to be too comfortable in mind, and who evidently believe that a mosquito or two—small ones—can do no harm to anyone, but only help to keep alive your mental activities, and to preserve you from too great contentment and quite unnecessary pleasure.

From all which I learn that character reveals itself in conversation. Thus it is you read off the character of the crotchety, the querulous, the irritable, and the "take-it-out-of-you" kind of people, who think it their mission in life to set you right! people who often treat you as if you had a pachydermatous sort of skin in a mental sense! Exceedingly sensitive, perhaps, in themselves, they never in the least mind hurting you.

All these manifestations of character reveal the qualities of our hearts in conversation. It is amusing to note the surprise with which they hear any counsel given to, or any criticism upon, themselves. They cannot understand it. The entire system of things in the universe of talk seems to them moving in the wrong way, and for hours afterwards you gather, by little scraps of conversation, that they felt your impertinence in counselling them, and that they did not succeed in breaking the shock on the buffers of their vanity.

On the other hand, there are words that do good like a medicine; not prepared draughts at all—in the sense of any set discourse—but occasional and intermittent speech which softens the asperities of daily life; which calls you off to a thoughtful view of God's mercies; which makes you feel on better terms with every living creature; which tempers justice with mercy, and the blame of a fault with the praise of a virtue; which makes the morning bright with gratitude, the noonday as merrily busy as a mill-wheel with duty, and the evening cheerful and serene. This is the true elixir of social life; and God endowed us with speech that we might be ministers of grace, and kindness, and goodness to each other in a world where there is so much of weariness, anxiety, and woe. We must indeed "keep our hearts with all diligence" before we can "order our conversation aright."

What we are precedes what we say. When the spring of repression is removed, as every child knows, the "jack-in-the-box" comes out; and it is beyond our skill to keep an ever-watchful hand on any spring. Would it not be well sometimes to recall at eventide the sayings of the day, and to think, "That is I. Let me study the likeness and see if I like myself"? Selfishness, of course, reveals itself in conversation in a remarkable way: think of the long time people will talk about themselves, their accidents, their projects, their ailments, their families, and their belongings; and then think of others, whose great aim has been to interest you; to take you out of your sadness of heart; to create a kindly atmosphere of thought for you to breathe in; and whose words have eloquently told of their endeavour to cheer and comfort you. I am not pleading in this paper for a minute sort of microscopic examination of our own or of other people's conversation; this would inevitably destroy all naturalness, ease, and happiness: nor do I wish to destroy the enthusiasm which sometimes overdoes praise, any more than I would crush the instinct which leads to faithful criticism; but with regard to the latter be it remembered that it is not enough simply to speak the truth—we are enjoined on sacred authority to speak the truth in love.

Character is, after all, the highest of our endowments in the sight of God; it is greater than skill, or invention, or genius, for these are merely mental bestowments; and in His sight our varieties of intellectual gifts are but different lengths of little blades of grass lying at His feet; but moral and spiritual elements enter into character—and it is in these that we find our greatest glory and honour, for through them we wear within our hearts the very image of God.

There can be little doubt that conversation is, in one sense, an art, and as such, essays have been written upon it; but my aim has been to treat of it as the natural expression of our ordinary thoughts and feelings. I am quite aware that the word conversation itself has now a sense restricted to speech; and that in New Testament times, "Let your conversation be as becometh the Gospel of Christ," meant this, "Let your course of life" be so; or as some prefer to translate it, "Act the citizen as becometh the Gospel of Christ." In modern days, however, conversation means what we call "talk," and as such it is an ever-flowing stream, having its fontal springs in the thoughts of the heart. We may learn much, I think, from a consciousness of the irrepressibility of our real selves, and learn to avoid those dangerous sallies of sarcastic humour which imperil our friendships. An old divine has said, "Some people prefer to lose their friend rather than their joke;" surely a most dangerous conceit of cleverness this, to prefer the amused applause of the multitude to the respect and honour of a friend. Well may we pray God "to set a watch upon the door of our lips," for the escaped bird cannot be recalled. The spoken word is our property no more: "Of thine unspoken word thou art master, thy spoken word is master of thee."

It seems to me unworthy of great natures to prefer a kind of don't-care-ism as to what people think of their characters. The impression left by one hour's conversation often lasts for years—it sometimes strengthens virtue, and weakens the attractions of vice, it often keeps alive sacred reverences for the sanctities of the hearth and home; it often inspires endeavours after a nobler life; and it often directs the helm of the vessel of another's life, which, imperilled by sand-banks of scepticism, maëlstroms of folly, and under-currents of temptation, feels the hand of a pilot friend guiding it safely into the heavenly course. Above all other considerations connected with conversation, there is the great one of pleasing our Blessed Lord and Saviour Himself; and the prayer of Holy Scripture, beautifully linking together, as it does, the heart and the lips, is a most appropriate one for us all: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be alway acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my Strength and my Redeemer."

THE ELDER SUNDAY SCHOLARS.

SOME ELDER SCHOLARS.

WE have been told in the "Ingoldsby Legends" how the world is divided by the best geographers into Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Romney Marsh; and doubtless, even since the days of the Rev. R. H. Barham, there have been not a few who have believed the Marsh to be by far the most important of these divisions. Europe and Asia, Africa and America have been but names to them; Romney Marsh has been a reality of rich pastures on which grazed the sheep that bore their own ear-mark. The Marsh graziers were ready to admit the possible existence of lands and waters beyond their ken, but, for their own part, were content to confine their thought to the limits of their vision as they looked around to the horizon that bounded the wide stretch of green on which they raised their wool and their mutton.

But even their world, narrow as it was, was larger than that of some others. It is currently reported that in a village lying snug and somnolent in one of the many hollows in the North Downs near to where they break off abruptly in the white cliffs of Dover, there lived not long ago a man who had reached old age without ever having stirred from his native place, or seen beyond the crown of the rolling slopes that encompassed it. One day he was brought to the face of these downs where they breast the south-west wind that sweeps up the Channel. He stood in wonder and amazement as his eye travelled over the open country lying before him, and at the sea stretching beyond. "Lor! I never knowed the world wor half so big!" was the exclamation that broke meditatively and solemnly from his lips, when he had sufficiently recovered his senses to find utterance.

This type has passed, or is fast passing away. We have found how large the world is—and how small. Railways, steamships, and telegraphs have destroyed distance. All parts are within touch of each other, and the antipodes are nearer to us than the next county to that they lived in was to our fathers. Intercourse between the east and the west, between the north and the south, is a matter of every-day occurrence. Yet, notwithstanding all this, provincial and local customs survive and distinguish—even within the bounds of our own small island—one part from another. The northern resident goes south, and the southern goes north. Each has a chance of seeing, understanding, and adopting all that is best in the different manners and customs which he meets with away from home, and of explaining and introducing all that is best in the methods he has been accustomed to, and now misses. Some such interchange of ideas and practice is doubtless taking place, but slowly. The distinctions remain. The ignorance may be gone; we know that the world is larger than our own native village. But, if each has learned of all, each has not learned from all. The best customs of every locality have not yet become the common heritage of the whole. Possibly, notwithstanding constant intercourse and intermarriage, blood and tribal distinctions—to say nothing of geographical and industrial—are still, and will long continue to be, sufficient to render such a result impossible. What is best for one is not necessarily best for another. We shall plainly see more than we may borrow profitably. But we may see, even then, with appreciative eyes and interested minds.

MIND AND MATTER.

These thoughts and facts have been suggested to one accustomed to the life of the home counties on becoming a resident in Lancashire. In many parts of the south he has been familiar with the question—constantly asked, seldom answered—"How shall we keep our elder scholars in our Sunday-schools?" It is a serious question, to which an answer is sadly needed. And it should be a matter of no little interest to those who ask it to know that, at least in some parts of the north of England, no such question can arise. The elder scholars are kept. Children enter the Sunday-school through the Infant Class; pass their childhood in association with the school; pass through the "awkward age," and are still scholars; become young men and women, fall in love, get married, and yet come to the Sunday-school classes. And if, later on, in the case of the wives, home cares and duties preclude anything like regularity of attendance, the husbands—now fathers perhaps of half a dozen children—continue their regular attendance, and join Sunday after Sunday in the class-study of the Word of God. In some cases a system of joint service is in vogue, two sets of teachers taking the classes alternately; and in these cases those off duty do not find it derogatory to their dignity as teachers to sit in the classes as scholars. This is clearly as it should be. Religious knowledge is not a matter of years. Insight into the mysteries of God's Kingdom is not to be acquired like the subjects of a Board-school curriculum. Spiritual power is not to be marked off into "Standards," is not a subject for examination and subsequent oblivion like the area of countries and the length of rivers. Never has a man more need to study and remember the Word of God than when family cares are coming on him; never has he more ability to feel the force of the application of that Word than when life's burdens begin to press, and when the interests of others depend on the ordering of his steps. The class, therefore, where men listen to a teacher's explanation of the words of the Master, to his illustration of those words in the Master's own life, to his application of the Divine law and of the Gospel principles to a man's every-day calling, and to his appeals founded on personal experience, may well include as great a diversity in age as do the pews where a congregation listens to similar exposition and entreaty from the preacher's pulpit or platform.

At the same time, it need not be supposed that the ideal has been reached in these northern schools because the problem of keeping the lads and lassies in the classes, even after they had ceased to be mere lads and lassies, has been practically solved. The writer of this is too recently acquainted with these schools to do more than state the facts; judgment or explanation would be premature. But as far as he can see, neither the character of the scholars nor the standard of the teaching possesses sufficient superiority over that in the south to explain the difference. And if in the south there be the regretful confession, "We lose our scholars between the school and the church," there may possibly be found a corresponding lament in the north. For out of the Sunday-school vigour comes a special temptation. That the school should fail to be "a nursery of the church" may happen under one set of conditions as well as under another. The very success of the school, and the persistent loyalty of its scholars after they have become mature men and women, tend to create an organisation outside, and independent, of the church—it may even be, overshadowing it, so that those who sympathise with and help to support both, become more accustomed to the phrase, "School and Church," than to "Church and School," and the phrase—common enough in the south—"He attends such and such a church," finds a substitute in, "He attends such and such a school."

Clearly, however, this is but one of the drawbacks of that which is good, the possibility of which ought to render no one blind to the hopefulness of the work wrought under such favourable conditions.

A. J. B.

A WHOLESOME LESSON.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS. BY ANNIE S. SWAN, AUTHOR OF "AN AMICABLE ARRANGEMENT," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

JOHN PRESCOTT rang the bell impatiently. It was a quarter past eight, and his breakfast not on the table. Perhaps because it was such an unusual occurrence he felt unusually irritated.

"It's that Patty, Mr. Prescott," said Mrs. Binks, bustling into the room with the coffee-pot in her hand. "She's never come in with the rolls; she's been gone a good twenty-five minutes. If I don't give it her when she comes in!"

"Never mind the rolls, Mrs. Binks; let me have the bacon, please. Has the paper come?"

"No, sir. Patty brings it too, you know, when she goes for the rolls," said Mrs. Binks apologetically; and moving up to the head of the table, she managed to get a peep out of the window. "There she is now, runnin' fit to break her neck. But, I say, what a lot o' people in the street! What can be up?"

Mr. Prescott sat down at the table and put the sugar in his cup. He felt cross and out of sorts—a circumstance so unusual with him that his landlady gave him rather a concerned glance as she retired to swoop down upon the offending Patty. In about two seconds she was back, with the rolls in her hand.

"Sir, an awful thing's happened, if it's true what Patty says. The bank's broke!"

"Nonsense!"

"That's what all the people are doin' standin' about. Dear, dear! it'll bring a heap o' trouble on many a one in Wimberley."

Mr. Prescott was very much astonished; but not wishing to encourage the voluble Mrs. Binks, he merely remarked that if it were true it would be a bad business, and opened out his paper. Mrs. Binks felt herself dismissed, and retired to put Patty through her catechism. Her lodger did not waste much time over his breakfast that morning, and before nine o'clock was striding down the village street.

Not many yards from Mrs. Binks's door he met Mr. Britton, the surgeon, on his cob.

"Good morning, Prescott. Heard the news? Bad look-out for Wimberley this morning!"

"Is it true?" John Prescott asked, looking incredulously into the surgeon's round, good-natured face.

"True as Gospel. I wish it wasn't; I'll be three hundred pounds the poorer for it, and that Braithewaite so much the richer. He's off, the scoundrel!—off by the mail on Saturday, at two o'clock, and not a soul the wiser,"

"I can't believe it," said John Prescott. "Is Braithewaite the defaulter?"

"Why, yes. I'm not surprised, either—nobody is, when they think of the extravagance that's been going on up yonder," replied the surgeon, pointing to an imposing red-brick mansion on the face of a little hill overlooking the town. "I'm going there now; Madame has sent for me. Do you think I'll get credit for my magnanimity in obeying the summons? I'm keeping myself under, and no mistake, this morning! I feel as mad as can be."

"Is Madame ill?"

"I suppose so—prostrated by the shock. She wrote me herself, poor thing! and said she knew nothing of it, and that he left home without saying where he was going. He'll be in Spain by this time, laughing at us for a lot of simpletons. That comes of passing over the folks we know, and giving positions of trust to strangers."

"It's abominable! If it's true, it'll bring a lot of distress to the folks in Wimberley."

"True? I wish it wasn't. But I'll tell you who it is I'm sorry for above the most: poor Mrs. Furnival. She trusted Braithewaite with everything, and I believe that she won't have a penny left—not a penny."

"It won't affect them much, I should think, if Miss Furnival's marriage is to take place in the summer."

"If it is!" nodded the surgeon significantly. "I have my doubts. The squire was willing to swallow the pill because it was gilded; but we'll see."

A curious expression crossed John Prescott's face—an expression noted by the shrewd eyes of the surgeon. He was not surprised. He had long known of the solicitor's hopeless love for the beautiful Miss Furnival, and in his own mind had marvelled that she could have passed by this grave, handsome, honourable gentleman for a rival so inferior as the squire's empty-headed son.

"I'll tell you what: sometimes these reverses are blessings in disguise. My wife will have to forego her winter at the Riviera, and I'll need to walk instead of ride when Dobbin goes to grass!" laughed the surgeon. "But if we can content ourselves without these things, we've learned a lesson. I shouldn't wonder if Miss Lucy Furnival learned something worth keeping, out of it all. Well, well, we'll see."

So saying, with a nod and a smile, cheery as usual, the surgeon rode away.

John Prescott walked slowly down the street, with his hat over his brows, and entered his office without speaking a word with any. From his window he could see the closed doors of the bank, with the group of disconsolate folk gathered on the pavement discussing the calamity which one man's ill-doing had brought upon them all. The solicitor sat down to his letters, but his attention was distracted. The surgeon had given him food for reflection, and he found it difficult to tear his thoughts from one subject. But "'Have you a button-hole for me to-day?'"—p. 587.

shortly people began to flock in, eager to ask his advice, and to hear what he had to say about the treachery of the banker, Abel Braithewaite, who up till Saturday had been the uncrowned king of Wimberley —whose word was law. But John Prescott had very little to say; he was a man of few words at all times, and he did not audibly join in the general condemnation of the runaway agent. He had a busy morning, but at lunch-time he left the office, and said he would not be back till four o'clock.

Wimberley was a quaint, quiet little town, clustered on the right bank of a sleepy river, while on the left the ground rose in a hilly slope, and was dotted here and there with fine houses, the residences of the richer section of Wimberley society. Across one of the picturesque foot-bridges and up the hill John Prescott took his way that summer afternoon, and after sundry wanderings through leafy lanes, entered a large and pleasant garden surrounding a pretty, rambling house, built after the fashion of an Indian bungalow. From the wide terrace there was a fine view of the river and the town in the distance; altogether, it was a charming and winsome abode—one of the most desirable on the hill.

John Prescott looked about the trim, well-kept garden as he walked towards the house, wondering in his mind whether the calamity of the morning would end in the inmates of the Bungalow having to leave their pretty home. In answer to his ring and his question for Mrs. Furnival, the maid ushered him into the drawing-room which was so familiar to him, and which he thought one of the most beautiful rooms he had ever seen. He was not surprised that afternoon to find it empty. "I'll see, sir, if Mrs. Furnival can see you, but she has not been out of her room since morning," she said, as she turned to leave him.

"Is Miss Furnival at home?"

"Yes, sir; I think she is in the garden somewhere. She went out in the boat after lunch, but I saw her come back."

Before many minutes, the door of the drawing-room opened quietly, and a lady entered—a widow with a slight figure and a refined, delicate-looking face. She was paler that day than John Prescott had ever before seen her, but appeared to be quite self-possessed.

"Dear Mrs. Furnival, forgive me if I intrude," he said, in his earnest, manly way. "I came off in the impulse of the moment."

"I am glad you did. I should not have come down to anyone to-day, John, but you," she said, with a faint smile, as she returned his warm clasp and took the chair he placed for her. His face flushed slightly; it was the first time she had called him by his Christian name.

"This is a sad business for Lucy and me," she said quietly, before he had time to speak. "It will take us a little time to realise it: it has come upon us so suddenly."

"It is of that I came to speak, Mrs. Furnival," John answered at once. "Surely it cannot be possible, as Mr. Britton told me this morning, that you are seriously involved with Braithewaite?"

"Seriously indeed!" re-echoed the widow, with her slight smile. "We are ruined—positively ruined. I trusted that man to the uttermost. He has been investing money for me since ever he came to Wimberley."

John Prescott looked profoundly surprised.

"It was scarcely like your usual prudence to trust such a stranger as Mr. Braithewaite."

"No; it was in a measure Lucy's doing—Lucy's and Madame's together. She has not been a good companion for my daughter, John. It is she who has put all the foolish ideas into her head."

"I confess I have regretted to see such a close intimacy between Miss Furnival and Mrs. Braithewaite," John admitted slowly; "but it will be broken now. How has Miss Furnival accepted the news of the disaster?"

"It does not appear to be vexing her. I hope—I hope she has not built her house on a frail foundation. It was at Madame's she first met Philip Saye, and there the whole mischief was done. Yes, I call it a mischief, because I had other views for her."

The lawyer did not ask what these views were. Perhaps he guessed.

"I am going to speak out quite plainly to you, John, because you are a true friend, as your father was to me and mine. I do not believe Philip Saye will fulfil his promise of marriage to Lucy now."

"He must, Mrs. Furnival. The young fellow has his faults, but surely he is a man of honour."

"I doubt it. I am positive that it was the belief that Lucy would be well dowered that won the squire's consent to his son's engagement."

"It's impossible that you should be right, Mrs. Furnival," exclaimed John Prescott fervently, out of the unselfishness of his heart. "That would be the hardest of all."

"At first it would, but I am perfectly sincere when I say I should not greatly regret it. I have never entirely approved of it, and the attentions of the squire's family have been too condescending to be agreeable. I am amazed that Lucy has not resented it."

"I hope, I hope, for both your sakes, that the Sayes will prove themselves friends at this trying time," said John sincerely. "Is there anything I can do for you, Mrs. Furnival?"

"Not to-day. Soon, perhaps, when things begin to arrange themselves, I shall be asking you for advice. You will help me to dispose of the Bungalow—that is, if it is not already sacrificed."

Her lips trembled as she looked round the familiar room, and John Prescott rose hastily to his feet.

"Dear Mrs. Furnival, I hope it will not be necessary for you to leave the town in which you have lived so long. Rest assured that everything I can do will be done most gladly."

"I can—I do trust you with all my heart, John," she said, with emotion. "Ah! there is Lucy. She has watched all day long for Philip; I think he might have come, unless he is away from home."

"He is not. I saw him ride past my office windows about eleven o'clock this forenoon," John said sternly. "Well, good-bye, Mrs. Furnival; God bless you. I shall see Miss Lucy as I go out."

As Mrs. Furnival watched the fine manly figure step across the lawn to the flower-bed where Lucy was listlessly picking some dead leaves from a favourite plant, a quick impatient sigh passed her lips.

To see John Prescott and Lucy husband and wife had once been the dream of her life. Her daughter's womanhood had disappointed her; she had not fulfilled the promise of her childhood, except in physical beauty, which was of a very rare and winning kind. Lucy gave a quick start, and her lovely colour rose when she heard the heavy feet on the gravel; but her face grew listless again when she saw that it was only John Prescott. He read that expression as easily and correctly as if it had been a printed page, and his heart bled for her.

"Good afternoon, Miss Furnival," he said, pausing in the path before her, and raising his hat. "I have been spending half an hour with your mother. Have you a button-hole for me to-day?"

He smiled as he proffered the request. Not so long ago they had been John and Lucy to each other—before the new lover had parted them.

"Don't be absurd, John," she exclaimed, her colour rising again. "You can have the whole gardenful of button-holes if you like. Isn't this an awful thing which has happened to poor mamma?"

Her manner had all the old-time freedom, but it pained him to hear her speak as if the calamity could not possibly affect her. In his own mind he greatly feared that Mrs. Furnival was correct in her estimate of the relations which existed between Aston Hall and the Bungalow.

"I trust it may not be so bad as it looks just now, Miss Lucy," he said cheerfully. "Your mother is wonderfully composed."

"Oh yes, I daresay she knows it won't make a great deal of difference," she said carelessly. "But what a wretch Mr. Braithewaite must be! Do you know, I never liked him much, and I was always sorry for poor Madame. What will become of her now?"

"I don't know. Everyone is sorry for her. In spite of her faults, she is a likeable person. Will you go and see her, Lucy?"

"I? Oh no: at least, I must see what the squire says. Of course it would not do to go and see a person whose husband has acted so wickedly. One has to draw the line somewhere."

John Prescott looked graver than his wont. Although it was the world's opinion, he did not like to hear it fall from Lucy Furnival's lips. A year ago she would not so have spoken.

She intuitively felt that her old friend disapproved of something in her rather heartless speech.

"Of course you are so dreadfully good, John Prescott: you would think it quite proper for me to go and see Madame, even if her husband were in gaol. Of course I am very sorry for her, but there is a great deal to be considered besides one's own feelings."

"Yes, you are quite right. Why on earth has Mr. Philip Saye not been here to-day? I'm your brother now, you know, and I have a right to ask the question. Has he sent you any message?"

"No; why should he?" Lucy's flaming cheeks warned John that he had injudiciously presumed. "You have no right to ask me anything about Mr. Saye, John Prescott; and you are not my brother at all. They don't approve at Aston Hall of your presuming so much on an old friendship. Philip has complained of it several times, and I do think he is right."

"Very well, Lucy," replied John Prescott quietly, as he turned to go. "I shall take care in future how I offend you and Mr. Philip Saye."

CHAPTER II.

IN the gloomy sitting-room of a small house in the vicinity of Bedford Square sat the beautiful Miss Furnival, towards the close of a dark winter day.

The table was littered with gay sewing silks and other paraphernalia indispensable to "fancy work," but it was very real work to Lucy Furnival as she plied her tired fingers over the gay piece of satin in her hand: it was daily bread for her mother and herself. She sat very near to the window in the fading light, with her golden head bent low over her work, and an expression of anxious care on her face.

A lovely face it was still, although the bloom had left it, for there had come in its place a sweet seriousness, a grave tenderness, ten thousand times more beautiful than the old coquettish smiles, because they revealed something of a woman's tender heart awakened to all the responsibility of life.

"Lucy!"

A weak, weary voice came from the inner room, and Lucy sprang up with evident relief; for the last stitch had been put in, and the work in her hand was now a finished and perfect thing.

"Coming, motherie; it is done, and well done too; is it not, now?"

She went into the other room, holding the dainty morsel in her hands, and the invalid on the old couch before the fire smiled upon her with a loving pride.

"My darling, it is exquisite; it is a work of art. I do not think that they pay you fairly for your work."

"No, they don't; but we can't afford in the meantime to quarrel with our bread and butter," Lucy answered soberly. "Now I am going to give you a cosy cup of tea, and leave you to your reflections while I take my work to Bond Street. And if they are less stingy with me than usual, I'll treat you to some fruit and a new magazine. Won't that be fine?"

"You mustn't go to any extravagance for me, my Lucy," said the mother fondly, as her hand touched the bright head bent over her. "See if they have anything easy I could do this time, dear; I am much better. I should be easier in my mind if I were helping you again."

"Yes, but I shouldn't; and I'm the chief person to be considered, as I heard of a bridegroom saying on his marriage-day," said Lucy, with a touch of her old gaiety. "Don't look so doleful, mamma dear. If I regret the Bungalow, it is only for its dear old mistress."

"My child, I am amazed at God's dealings with us. What appeared so black and hopeless has been most precious in its uses. The new daughter I have found is far dearer than the old, though she was very dear. Before I was laid aside I believe I was contented enough even to look back upon the Bungalow without regret."

"I have a dream, motherie," said the girl quietly, but with a dawning smile on her lips—"a dream I shall not tell even to you. But I have a great ambition—an ambition which would astonish even you; and perhaps I may reach it some day."

"God grant you may, my darling, if it is a worthy one, and will make you happier or reward you for your unselfish devotion to me," said the mother in faltering tones.

"Mother, look at me quite straight till I tell you something," said Lucy, dropping on one knee beside her mother's couch. "I want to tell you that I am quite cured and heart-whole; there is not even one tiny little bit of heartache left for Philip Saye.

There is only a little touch of wounded self-respect, and perhaps my great ambition may have something to do with that."

"You have made me happier, dear, than I have been for many a long day," was the mother's answer.

"And, mother, I can truly say I am not sorry, except for your dear sake, that we have got away from it all. I was a selfish, wilful girl, and I believe God sent it to me as a lesson; only it is hard that you, who have always been so good, should have to suffer too."

"Hush, my Lucy; hush! As long as I have you, I cannot suffer very much."

"Now," cried Lucy, springing up, "we'll have tea, and then I'll run up-stairs for Madame to come and sit with you. Poor dear Madame! I am so sorry for her. After her gowns from Paris and her smart jackets, it is hard to come down to teaching French in a school. Isn't it terrible, mother, to think she has never even heard of Mr. Braithewaite? But she is very cool over it."

"It was not a marriage of affection, and I believe myself that Madame is happier here than she was at Wimberley. She, too, is a better woman. I love you for your tender consideration towards her, Lucy."

"That costs nothing, and we have a bond between us in our opinion of our friends at Aston Hall, mother," said Lucy, with a light laugh.

Mrs. Furnival had never seen her daughter so bright since they had left the old life behind, and she thanked God for it in her heart.

"I think, Lucy, there is one thing I regret: we have not acted fairly to John Prescott," she said suddenly. "He earned the right to know something about our circumstances."

"Mother, we can't agree about John Prescott, and I don't think we ever shall. He thought so meanly of me at one time, and told me so with such unblushing candour, that I mean to punish him," said Lucy, with a heightened colour. "And I believe if he had been very anxious he could have found us out."

Mrs. Furnival sighed. John Prescott was indeed a vexed subject on which they could never hope to agree. She mourned in secret over Lucy's lack of appreciation of that fine character—not discerning that underneath that somewhat bitter indifference lay a sore, sore feeling of disappointment that John Prescott had not found them out long ago.

The lively little Frenchwoman who for the brief period of her married life had led the fashion in Wimberley had indeed accommodated herself with all the grace of her nationality to her changed circumstances, and was perfectly happy in the "two-pair back" in Eardley Place. She had made quite a little circle of friends in the neighbourhood, and when Lucy ran up to her room that evening she found she had gone out to drink tea with a neighbour. Mrs. Furnival, however, insisted on being left alone, and Lucy set out upon her errand to Bond Street, delightfully conscious of a buoyancy of spirits to which she had long been a stranger. They had had a hard struggle at first, as those who are unknown and unfriended in a great city must have; but Lucy's perseverance and artistic skill had won recognition at last, and she was constantly employed at one of the most exclusive and expensive of the art-needlework stores.

They lived very quietly and plainly in their lodgings, seeing no one but Madame and a young music-teacher who boarded in the house; therefore it was somewhat of a surprise to Mrs. Furnival to be disturbed, about an hour after Lucy left that night, by the announcement that a gentleman wished to see her.

"Ask his name, Phœbe, and tell him I am not able to leave my sofa," she said to the little maid; then she raised herself on her elbow, and listened with strained ears for the result. She knew the footstep which presently came striding through the outer room, and next moment her hands were in John Prescott's firm, fervent grasp, and his true eyes, with something of reproach in their depths, were looking into hers.

"At last, dear Mrs. Furnival! Was it fair to me that my search should have been hopeless so long?"

"Scold as you like, John. I don't mind—I am so very glad to see you," she said tremulously. "Your very footfall has music in it. My dear boy, I am glad to see you!"

"Oh yes; but why have I been kept in the dark so long?" he asked restlessly. "What had I done that I should be considered so unworthy of confidence? Why, if I had not happened to see Madame the other day at Paddington station, I might never have found you."

"Sit down, John, and I'll tell you all about it," she said, smiling through her tears.

He looked with compassion on her worn face, and then round the poor little room.

"Don't pity us too much; we are very well off, and I am fast recovering from an illness—the first I have had since we came to London," she said quickly. "And Lucy—Lucy is a heroine, John."

"So Madame told me. Where is she?"

"Gone out with the work she has been busy with all day."

"What kind of work?"

"Art-needlework. Lucy is making quite a little fortune by it, her taste is so exquisite."

"And has she to carry this work, wherever it is, to and fro?" John Prescott asked; and his voice sounded very stern.

"Yes; but don't look so grieved. She rather enjoys her independence. We have a great many blessings, John, and we were telling each other only this very night that we did not in the least regret the old life. Tell me about the Bungalow. Who lives in the dear old place? We heard that a client of yours had bought it."

"Yes; but he doesn't care to live in it, in the meantime."

"Why? He must be very difficult to please if he has any fault to find with it," said the widow; and it went to John's honest heart to see the look in her eyes.

"He hasn't got any womenfolk, in the meantime, and I suppose he thinks he would be dull in it."

"Well, he would, of course. The Bungalow was built for a family house. But can't he marry?"

"Yes. He intends to do so soon," John replied briefly. "But you have not told me yet why you took French leave of Wimberley and of me as you did."

"It was Lucy's doing, John," answered Mrs. Furnival, with a smile, the brightest which had touched her lips for long. It was like the strong shining of the sun to see before her once more the man who had always been to her like a son.

"Well, am I to wait till Lucy comes home for further explanation?" he asked, as he sat down beside her. "Do you think, now, that it was fair to your boy to steal away from the place when business called him out of it, and then to live here like this, when you knew that that boy was a rich man, and would have thought his money honoured by your use of it?"

Mrs. Furnival's eyes filled.

"I knew all that, but I had my daughter to consider, John; and she needed tender consideration just at that time. We have not regretted it, but I promise you I should not have suffered myself or allowed her to suffer too hardly. I knew where you were to be found."

"Humph!"

It was not a common exclamation with John Prescott, but he was difficult to appease.

"Is she fretting after that mean scoundrel Saye yet?"

"No; the cure, if sharp, has been very effectual. She is heart-whole, John; she told me so herself."

"Just as well, seeing I'm going to marry her so soon," said John bluntly. "Do you think it could be done the day after to-morrow?"

"Oh! John Prescott, you headstrong boy! you don't know anything about Lucy. She may not even speak to you when she comes in. You were rather hard on her, you know."

"Not half so hard on her as she was on me; and don't you suppose I want some recompense for all this?"

He waved his arm rather vaguely round the room, and Mrs. Furnival understood him.

"Lucy has had her own way too long, Mrs. Furnival—that's a fact: and it's going to be my way now," said John, with an assurance he was far from feeling.

They were still talking of the past and all its memories, when Lucy's voice disturbed them. John sprang up, stepped hastily into the outer room, and shut the door between. Mrs. Furnival hid her face in her pillows and prayed.

"Mother, I'm perfectly rich!" the sweet voice rang out, and then came to a sudden stop at sight of the tall figure, which seemed to fill up the little sitting-room, and make it appear narrower and meaner to Lucy than it had ever appeared before.

There was a moment's silence, a moment's irresolution on the part of honest John, during which he kept his eyes fixed on the sweet face of the only woman he had ever loved. Then Lucy spoke.

"So you have found us out, John Prescott!" she said saucily; but there was the loveliest light in her eyes, and the colour flushed in her pale cheek like the blush of the sea-shell.

"Yes; and a pretty dance you have led me, my lady! But it will be the last, I promise you," he said quite quietly; and when she held out her hand to him, he calmly put it aside, and laid both his on her shoulders. "Lucy, what was the use of running away?" he asked, with a kind of passionate tenderness. "Don't you remember how faithfully the rose-leaves at the Bungalow told us every year that we had to marry each other, my own wife?"

And Lucy was so surprised that she forgot all the sarcastic speeches she had privately made up to pour forth on him at the earliest opportunity, and, without any ado whatever, laid her head down on his breast, saying only once, "Oh, John!" in a breathless kind of way; but it appeared to convey a great deal to the mind of honest John.

And so he won his wife.

* * * * * *

"Well, now that the owner of the Bungalow has got some womenkind," he said, in that queer quiet way of his, when he got up reluctantly, quite late, to take his leave, "I suppose he may set his house in order. I don't think you'll find anything out of its place. I'm a very methodical sort of person, so I told Anne she might fill the glasses with Christmas-roses for you: there's a perfect wealth of them. We'll do it, Lucy, on Friday morning, then; and mother can go down to the Bungalow in the afternoon, and be ready against Christmas Day, when we shall be back. Are you surprised? Well, you know, I made up my mind long ago that I liked the Bungalow better than any other house in Wimberley. It was the only point on which Lucy and I agreed; wasn't it, Lucy? Well, well, good-night, mother. Yes, Lucy is going to the door with me; she promised, and she has a new character to uphold."

But all his pleasant banter died away the moment they were alone, and he took her to his passionate heart and blessed God for His good gift, which had come to him at last.

That brief sharp discipline was not lost on Lucy Furnival; it had its rich uses, which bore fruit in the happy after-life these tried hearts shared together.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

September 21. Jesus entering Jerusalem.

To read—St. Luke xix. 37—48. Golden Text—verse 38.

I. JOY. (37—40.) Christ now at the end of His work on earth. Beginning last week of His life. Comes near Jerusalem. Trace the course of events.

Had given sight to blind man at Jericho.

Been seen and entertained by Zacchæus the publican.

Reached Bethany—raised Lazarus from the dead. (St. John xi.)

Entertained at supper by Simon. (St. John xii. 2.)

Starts for Jerusalem—reaches Mount of Olives.

Sends for an ass—to ride in triumph. (Judg. v. 10.)

Comes in view of the sacred and beloved city.

Multitudes come out to meet and welcome Him.

Song of praise ascends for what they had seen.

Words of welcome also to long-looked-for King.

What did they say that Christ was come to bring?

Peace in heaven—between man and God.

Glory in the highest, angels' songs, as at His birth.

Pharisees alone silent—envious and complaining.

Christ rebukes them. This is indeed a day of joy.

What was all this designed to teach the Jews?

(a) Their Saviour was with them—did they only believe it.

(b) This was their day of grace—did they only know it.

II. Sadness. (41—44.) Christ the only mourner.

Why? Did He weep for Himself or them?

What lay before Him? Desertion by all the apostles, treachery of one, denial by another—pain, suffering, torture, death.

But also—the world saved—man pardoned—heaven won—God and man at one. Would this cause joy or grief? (Heb. xii. 2.)

Why then did Christ weep?

Because He saw the suffering coming on the Jews.

Enemies around—city destroyed—nation dispersed.

More than that—He saw their great sin.

The Jews now shout "Hosanna!"—in five days would shout "Crucify!"

Now welcome as King—would then reject Him.

Now day of mercy—soon would come their day of judgment.

No wonder Christ wept.

III. Reverence. A second time the Temple cleansed by Christ. (St. John ii. 14.)

Profaned by sellers—hallowed by His presence.

Appointed for prayer—used for unholy objects.

There Christ taught daily—with what result?

Chief priests and rulers sought to kill Him.

Common people heard Him gladly.

IV. Lessons. 1. To Christ as King every knee must bow.

2. What think ye of Christ?

3. A day of grace comes to all. Shall we use it?

4. "Ye shall reverence My sanctuary."

September 28. Review of the Quarter's Lessons.

Golden Text—St. Matt. vii. 29

Taking the Golden Text, see how the Lessons this quarter have verified it.

Christ taught with authority. What has He taught us in these twelve lessons?

There have been six parables, one miracle, three discourses, two incidents.

I. Six Parables. Try and recall them and their teachings.

1. The great Supper. God's loving invitation, despised by some, accepted by others. In which class are we?

2. Lost and found. Three parables teaching the work of the Three Persons in the Godhead:

God the Father—meeting the penitent prodigal.

God the Son—seeking the lost sinner.

God the Spirit—lighting up the conscience.

Also show the sinner in three aspects:

The sheep strayed in ignorance.

The coin lost by others' neglect.

The son sinned of his own wilfulness.

In all three restoration, joy, happiness.

3. Dives and Lazarus. The folly and sin of living only for self.

The insufficiency of riches for lasting happiness.

The blessedness of the poor in spirit.

4. Prevailing prayer. Prayer must be earnest, incessant, and humble.

Praise must follow, not precede, prayer.

5. The pounds. Christ's servants all have work to do for Him.

A future day of reckoning is certain.

II. Miracle of ten lepers. Christ's pity reaches the most degraded.

The duty of thankfulness for mercies received.

Christ's best blessings for those who love Him most.

III. Three discourses. 1. The Sabbath. Made for man's benefit.

Works of mercy on this day lawful.

2. Taking up the cross. All entering Christ's service must first count the cost. On the one side self-denial, cross-bearing, opposition. On the other side blessings present and future.

3. Entering the Kingdom. What does Christ require?

The docility, love, and gentleness of children.

Parting from all likely to come between the soul and Him.

IV. TWO INCIDENTS. 1. Zacchæus. A rich publican converted.

Shows kindness and hospitality to Christ.

Receives special blessing from Christ.

Exhibits marks of true conversion by public confession of wrong, and restoration.

By their fruits ye shall know them.

2. Christ entering Jerusalem. The Teacher and King come to His own.

Honoured and welcomed by the fickle crowd.

His heart torn with grief for their future.

V. From all these may learn the character of Christ.

1. Merciful to all who need and seek His help.
2. Yearning over the lost—leading to repentance.
3. Teaching the ignorant the truths of His Kingdom
4. Loving those who come to Him.
5. Warning to use the present day of grace.

OCTOBER 5. PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD.

To read—St. Luke xx. 9—19. Golden Text—Isa. liii. 3.

I. CIRCUMSTANCES. Christ now at very end of His ministry.

Had been going about teaching more than three years.

Been received fairly well in Galilee, especially by the common people. But in Judæa, head-quarters of learned and upper classes, always been rejected.

Now plots against His life increasing.

Jesus knew all, yet did not hesitate to denounce those who refused to receive Him. Hence this parable.

The place—one of the Courts of the Temple.

The audience—scribes, chief priests, and people.

The time—Tuesday before the Crucifixion.

The subject—Christ despised and rejected of men. (Golden Text.)

II. THE PARABLE. (9—16.) A common custom in the East.

A vineyard planted by owner—let out to husbandmen, who must send the owner a certain share of the produce.

A servant sent to fetch the owner's part is beaten and sent away empty.

Many servants in succession treated in like manner.

At last sends his Son—hoping he will be treated differently.

He is treated worse than all—is cast out and killed.

How does the owner treat the husbandmen?

Destroys those wicked men and gives inheritance to others.

III. THE MEANING. (17, 18.) So plain that they understood at once.

The owner is God—King of all the world.

The vineyard is His Church—designed for His honour.

The husbandmen are the Jews—God's special, chosen people.

The servants are the prophets sent in God's name.

Elijah was persecuted by King Ahab. (1 Kings xix. 14.)

Jeremiah was imprisoned. (Jer. xxxvii. 21.)

Others were sawn asunder, etc. (Heb. xi. 37.)

The Son is Jesus Christ sent into the world.

His own people received Him not. (St. John i. 11.)

He was despised and rejected of men.

He was scourged, mocked, crucified.

But were His enemies not punished?

Jerusalem, over which He wept, was destroyed.

A million Jews died by the sword or famine.

The nation was dispersed in all lands, and became a bye-word to all people.

Thus Christ's words were fulfilled. He was the stone refused at first by the builders, afterwards the head-stone joining together all nations. (Eph. ii. 21.)

Will crush sooner or later all opponents. (1 Cor. xv. 25.)

LESSONS. 1. Shall we accept or reject Christ?

2. Kiss the Son, lest He be angry and so ye perish.

3. What fruits are we rendering?

OCTOBER 12. THE LORD'S SUPPER.

To read—St. Luke xxii. 7—20. Golden Text—1 Cor. xi. 26.

I. THE OLD FEAST. (7—18.) Christ, as a Jew, kept all the Jewish feasts, viz., Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles.

First kept Passover when a boy aged twelve. (ii. 42.)

Now keeps it with disciples for last time.

Passover lamb to be killed on 14th day of first month at even. All leavened bread to be put away—hence other name of the feast. (Ex. xii. 6, 18.) Two disciples sent to prepare the feast.

Would meet a man carrying pitcher of water—unusual sight, that being women's work—were to follow him and prepare the meal.

So the "Upper Room" is made ready.

Christ and other ten disciples come in from Bethany in the evening.

They say the appointed prayers—sing the "Proper Psalms" (cxiv.—cxviii.), called the "Great Hallel"—eat the roasted lamb.

Christ tells them how He had looked forward to this "Last Supper." This night was all the Type to be fulfilled in Him. How?

(a) He the Lamb was to be taken by His enemies.

(b) He was without blemish or spot of sin. (1 Pet. i. 19.)

(c) At even the same day (3.0 p.m., Jewish day counting from sunset to sunset) He died.

(d) His bones were not broken. (St. John xix. 36.)

(e) He put away sin by His sacrifice (Heb. ix. 26), as all leaven was put out of the houses.

So He blessed this Jewish feast, telling them it was His last on earth, and thus ended all the Jewish rites.

II. THE NEW FEAST. (19, 20.) Now Christ appoints a new feast, called by Christians "The Lord's Supper." How does it differ from the Passover?

	THE PASSOVER.	THE LORD'S SUPPER.
(a)	Looked forward to Christ's death.	Looks back to it.
(b)	Was confined to the Jews.	Is for all.
(c)	A lamb was killed.	Bread is broken.

But they have some things in common, viz.—

(a) Both commemorate a deliverance—the Passover, from Egyptian bondage; the Lord's Supper, from bondage of sin.

(b) Both were feasts of thanksgiving.

(c) Both were to be observed in all generations.

And so the Lord's Supper is celebrated by all Christians. Why? (Golden Text.)

1. It shows forth in outward sign the Lord's death till He come again.

2. It is a means of receiving grace. (1 Cor. x. 16.)

3. It is not to be partaken of unworthily, i.e., carelessly. (1 Cor. xi. 27.)

4. It is to be preceded by self-examination. (1 Cor. xi. 28.)

III. LESSONS. 1. Gratitude to Christ, who not only has died, but also provided for nourishment of our souls.

2. Self-devotion. What can I render to the Lord? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS. BY THE AUTHOR OF "GIVE HIM ANOTHER CHANCE."

CHAPTER I.

"REALLY," said Mrs. Beckford, "it is very curious!"

She had been sitting so silent for two or three minutes, gazing across the valley from her seat on the verandah of the Swiss hotel, that the young man who was occupying the chair beside her gave a little start of surprise at the unexpected remark. He was tall and well built, with a brickdust complexion that Nature had evidently intended to be fair, and a pair of frank blue eyes that gave attractiveness to a face not otherwise remarkable. His companion was perhaps twenty years his senior; a fine-looking, grey-haired woman, with a clever, humorous face.

"What is curious?" he asked her, smiling.

"Why, that you should turn out to know all these Dönisfield people: the Fenwicks, and Thoresbys, and Greys, and the rest. Why, ages ago, when I was a little girl, I remember seeing Mr. Fenwick driving down to the town in his high dog-cart, with his little son Tom perched up beside him. He had only been married a few years then, and now he's dead, you tell me, and she's dead, and Tom's children are all growing up. Dear, dear!"

"I have not had much news of them myself for a long time," said Leslie Rutherford; "I have been away five years this spring."

"How glad you must be to think that you are going to-morrow," continued the lady. "No, don't deny it! Why shouldn't you be? I don't know how you can forgive us for letting you stay on here, waiting on Mr. Beckford hand and foot."

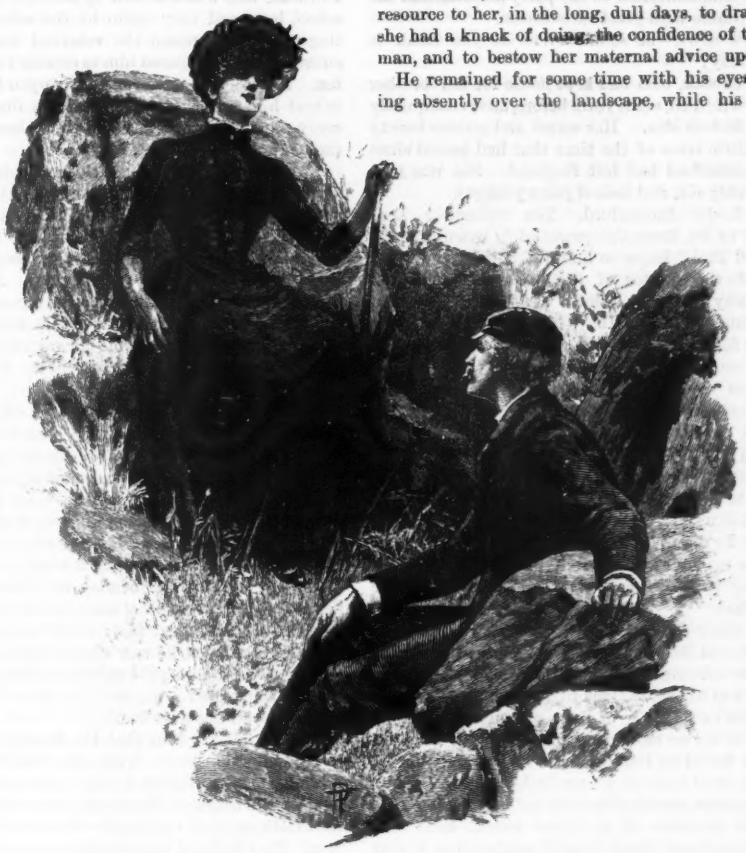
"Don't, please," Leslie put in. "It is a privilege to do anything for Mr. Beckford, and if he wants me in the least——"

"He doesn't want you!" Mrs. Beckford cut him short in her turn, with an emphatic nod of her handsome elderly head; "and if he did, I hope we are not so unconscionable as to let you stay any longer. I know just how you are feeling. You are dying to get home and see how the land lies."

Mr. Rutherford meekly owned the soft impeachment.

"Well, now, let me give you one parting caution. Don't hold yourself too cheap; don't be afraid of asserting yourself. It always tempts people to tyrannise over you. If it hadn't been that you are far too amiable, we should never have taken advantage of you in such a base way, and kept you three weeks in this tomb of a place waiting on two old people. That was what did the mischief in the beginning, I have no doubt. A little more confidence in yourself is what you want. Good-bye! You will be off early, of course. And I wish you every success."

Mrs. Beckford went up to her own apartments, whither her invalid husband had already retired, and left Leslie Rutherford to enjoy the Alpine prospect by himself.



In spite of the confidential terms on which he was with both of them, their acquaintance was not of very long standing. Returning from an exploring expedition into Eastern Africa, he had met them at Cairo, and afterwards at Alexandria. Mr. Beckford was a veteran R.A., and an accomplished man of the world; Mrs. Beckford, a bright, conversable woman, who wore her years lightly. Less interesting companions would have fascinated him after his long exile from civilisation; while they, on their part, took a strong liking to the intelligent, modest young fellow. They agreed to travel home together, taking Switzerland in their way; and all went well till Mr. Beckford was seized with sudden illness at a miserable little Swiss inn.

He lay for some days in a precarious state, and then began slowly to recover. During all the time, Leslie felt bound to remain, and be of what service he could—which was not a little—and in their common isolation and anxiety so thorough a confidence had grown up between Mrs. Beckford and himself, that there was little of his history that she did not know. She knew that he was a scientist and of independent means; she had heard how he had been to school in Donisfield, and lived there up to young manhood; how he had lost his heart to his old playfellow, May Fenwick; how some foolish misunderstanding had prevented him from declaring himself; how he had joined the African expedition, half in pique and half in despair; and, finally, how, hearing by chance from a Donisfield man that Miss Fenwick was still free, he was returning home, determined to "put his fortune to the touch, and win or lose it all." It was quite a resource to her, in the long, dull days, to draw out, as she had a knack of doing, the confidence of the young man, and to bestow her maternal advice upon him.

He remained for some time with his eyes wandering absently over the landscape, while his thoughts were hovering about that smoky seat of industry (on the borders of one of the most picturesque counties of England) in which resided the object of his affection.

"I wonder," he said to himself, "if she is right." (He meant Mrs. Beckford.) "I wonder, if I had made up my mind to have it out with her before I left, what would have come of it." (This time the perspicacious reader will divine that it was not Mrs. Beckford to whom he alluded.) This question absorbed him to such an extent that he continued to sit on the verandah until the night air had positively chilled him through. At last it occurred to him that, as he was leaving at a very early hour in the morning, it would hardly do to sit up all night; whereupon he sought his couch, and dreamed of pursuing a blonde-headed figure, that fled as fast as he approached it, through miles and miles of equatorial forest.

"'Can't you be an individual for a moment?'"—p. 867.

A day or two after this, Tom Fenwick, the brother of Leslie's inamorata, received a letter, whose contents he communicated to the party assembled at the breakfast-table with great satisfaction.

"Here's news," he said. "Who do you think is coming, May?"

May Fenwick, who had kept house for her brother since his wife died, eight years before, answered quietly that she had no idea. Her sweet and serious beauty showed little trace of the time that had passed since Leslie Rutherford had left England. She was now about twenty-six, and looked years younger.

"It's Leslie Rutherford. You remember Les? 'Coming to Dr. Burnet's—promised to lecture for the "Lit. and Phil." hopes to find old friends all well,'" continued the master of the house, quoting in a random way from the letter. "Well, I'm very glad he's coming. We must have him here, and get some scientific fellows to meet him. Eh, May?"

Miss Fenwick assented so very calmly that Tom was more than ever confirmed in his impression that women were difficult to understand. An old friend, who had come through such strange perils—quite a hero in his way—and May took it as coolly as if it did not interest her in the least. However, it mattered the less, as all the rest of the family, not excepting his eldest daughter, who was eighteen, and just "out"—a fact he never could realise—were enthusiastic about the explorer; whom some of them remembered as having been intimate at their house before he went abroad.

A few more days went by. It was a warm April afternoon, and Miss Fenwick's eldest niece was practising in the drawing-room, or ought to have been doing so. She was a conscientious little person, and kept up her studies as a matter of duty, although the school-room knew her no more; but this afternoon Chopin's nocturnes failed to interest her. She was sitting on the music-stool with her plump little hands in her lap, and a dreamy, speculative look in her brown eyes, when the entrance of a visitor roused her. She turned round and found herself confronting a very sunburnt gentleman, who was deferentially hoping that he had not interrupted her. There was not much changed about him except his complexion. She knew him almost at once.

"I am afraid you don't remember me," she said, with a touch of pretty shyness.

"I don't think I had the pleasure——" he began, and then caught himself up, and exclaimed, "Why, it isn't—yet it must be—I suppose I mustn't say Bobbie now!"

"Well, it is time people stopped, I think," she assented; "but you see, my proper name is the same as auntie's, and that makes it so difficult. I know I'm too old for it."

"Oh! it's nice to find something that isn't changed," he said. "And now I look at you, I see the old Bobbie, though she is so young-ladified."

"I knew you directly," she answered. "We are all so glad you have come back safe."

"Thanks," he said cordially. "I am glad enough to be back, I can tell you."

And then he launched into inquiries about the various members of the family and their doings, which were soon interrupted by the arrival of Mr. Fenwick, who was followed by a couple of grammar-school boys, and they again by the school-room contingent. They greeted the returned wanderer with enthusiasm, and engaged him to remain for five-o'clock tea. Leslie's eyes were constantly upon the door, and it cost him an effort to conceal his disappointment every time it opened and closed without admitting the figure he was looking for.

"By-the-bye," Mr. Fenwick suddenly exclaimed, "where's May? Hasn't she come in? Bobbie, child, run and see if you can find your aunt anywhere."

In her own room at this moment Miss Fenwick was struggling with a disinclination to present herself, that she felt to be quite preposterous. At last, after Bobbie had knocked at her door and announced that it was nearly tea-time, and that Leslie Rutherford had come (a fact she was well aware of), she gave a hurried finishing touch to her pretty hair, and resolutely descended.

Leslie was beginning to feel as if the world had moved on five years while he had been sleeping. The change he found in his old friends in spite of their hearty welcome; the new surroundings in which he found them; the children who were children no longer; all gave him something of a saddened and bewildered feeling, as if he had come back to find himself unchanged in a changed world. Suddenly he looked up, and saw her coming in. She at least had not altered; it was the same sweet face. For a moment his heart beat fast; there was a mist before his eyes; and then he saw clearly again. She came up and spoke to him quite calmly—coldly, he thought.

"She is not glad to see me," he said to himself. "I might as well not have come."

It was well for him that the family party was a large and lively one. When they were not asking him about his adventures, they were giving him the news of the neighbourhood; and as soon as one stopped for breath, another took up the thread of the conversation. They induced him to relate some of his "hair-breadth 'scapes," which he did very modestly and well. And once, when in the midst of a particularly thrilling account of his danger at the hands of a hostile tribe, he saw by the flush on Miss Fenwick's cheek, and the light in her blue-grey eyes, that she was not so indifferent as he had supposed her.

After tea Mr. Fenwick proposed to show Leslie the hot-houses; and accordingly they set out, and made the grand tour of them, accompanied by the family in procession. Leslie watched his chance for a word with May, and found it at last when she lingered behind the others for a moment to look at a favourite plant.

"You can't think," he said, "how strange I feel it, not to find you in the old house."

"Yes," she said; "this will never be like it to me, though of course it is better in many ways. So you thought of the old place while you were away?"

Her first embarrassment had passed off; she looked at him very frankly and kindly.

"I seem to have been always thinking of it, and of you all. It seemed such a haven, out there, May—I can't call you anything else."

"Why should you, Les?" she said brightly; and added in a graver tone, "I never realised what you must have been through till I heard you to-night. I am glad I didn't know."

"You would have cared then, a little?"

"Well, one doesn't exactly enjoy thinking of one's old friends being hotpotted and that sort of thing," she answered, laughing lightly, as she followed the others. Leslie thought she was laughing at the sentimental emphasis he had laid on his question. Gallant fellow as he had shown himself in face of the perils to which she alluded, he found it impossible to summon up any kind of confidence when he was with the woman he loved.

Besides, he soon found out that Miss Fenwick's devotion to her young nephews and nieces, beautiful though it was, had its drawbacks to a lover. Wherever she was, or whatever she was doing, some of them were sure to be haunting her steps. Bobbie especially, who worshipped her pretty aunt, was her inseparable companion. He laughed, too, when he thought of the course of action he had planned for himself in Africa, if on his return he should find May Fenwick free; how no obstacle should deter him from rushing to lay his heart at her feet. It had seemed to him then a simple, matter-of-course proceeding, a thing to be done out of hand. Now day after day passed by and he got no further. He met her constantly, it is true, but hardly ever where there was an opportunity for private talk. Her own manner to him was uncertain; sometimes cold and retiring; sometimes frank and friendly; but now and then with a touch of something about it that was neither camaraderie nor coldness, and more favourable to his hopes than either.

At last he found himself obliged to go up to London for two or three days, to attend meetings of certain scientific societies. On the day of his departure, the Fenwicks and some of their friends had arranged for a picnic, and he had promised to join them for the earlier part of the day, leaving by an afternoon train in time to keep an appointment to dinner in town. He rose that morning with the fixed determination that the day should not pass over without a declaration on his part.

A little way from Donisfield, the high-road is crossed by a tiny brook, which trickles down from the high moorland through a steep and beautifully wooded glen. It is by no means a despicable feat to ascend the brook till one emerges close to the road that runs along the summit of the ridge. This was the plan that the picnic party had decided on. They had driven out from Donisfield, sent on the carriages to await them at an inn on the upper road, and were just entering the glen, when they met Leslie descending to meet them, flicking at the catkins with his riding-whip as he came.

He was hailed with enthusiasm, especially by the juniors. "Have you been here long, Les? Have you been riding? What have you done with the steed of steeds?"

"Put him up at the inn and told them you were coming on."

He found himself at once in request for all sorts of things. To reach down catkins for one girl, get moss for another, and help a third over stepping-stones, to see that the acrobatic feats of the boys did not bring their careers to a premature close, and to make himself generally helpful and pleasant, would have been quite in accordance with his ordinary mood. But on this occasion he could not enjoy it. He was irritated to see how persistently the children clung round May; and began to feel that, after all, he should miss his opportunity.

It came at last, however, when, the other members of the party having fallen behind, they two stopped to rest just where the narrow glen opened out on the moor. Below them was the steep path up which they had climbed, overhung by the budding birch and hazel, and with great boulders, moss-grown and lichen-stained, marking the course of the hidden stream. They were out of sight of the others, whose gay voices, nevertheless, sounded clearly through the bright stillness of the afternoon.

"I hope they are all right," said May, after a moment's rest, preparing to rise and look after the invisibles.

"Oh, don't move. They are all right; you would hear soon enough if they were not. Can't you be an individual for a moment? It is always May and Company!"

"Well, here I am," she said. "What do you want with the individual?"

She glanced up brightly at him, and met a look in his face that made her flush and drop her eyes.

"What do I want?" he said. "Ah! May, need I tell you? I have wanted it for so long!"

Here a sudden scream and clamour of voices from below reached them. May turned pale, sprang to her feet, and rushed down the slope, followed by Leslie. They found an excited group round Bobbie, who was crouched in a heap at the bottom of a great boulder.

"There goes my opportunity!" thought Leslie, ruefully, as the group opened to admit him, that he might use his scraps of surgical knowledge to decide what was amiss.

"It's my ankle, I think," said Bobbie, sitting up, with a very white face, and winking hard to keep away the tears.

And a sprained ankle it proved to be. The rest of the picnic-party crowded round May, explaining how the accident had happened. Instead of crossing the brook on stepping-stones, and taking the easier path on the other side of it, she had ambitiously preferred to scramble over the rocks, with the sad result we have seen.

The only thing to be done was to get her up the hill to the carriage (not a great distance, fortunately), and then home as fast as possible.

"You are going away this afternoon, are you not?" May asked, when Bobbie had been lifted into the carriage.

"I must," he said. "Dinner to-night, and my paper to-morrow, worse luck!"

"I know. What I meant was: if you wouldn't mind calling at the doctor's on your way into the town. You are riding, are you not? You will get to Donisfield before we shall, and if you would leave a message, it would save some time."

She was evidently absorbed in Bobbie for the moment; and if she had not been, he felt that he could hardly finish his interrupted declaration before a carriageful of people.

"Certainly, I'll send him," he answered her; and added, in a low voice, "I'll write you to-night from London."

The look she gave him in return was like a cordial at his heart during his ride to Donisfield, and the three hours' railway journey that followed passed like a happy dream.

CHAPTER II.

THE doctor was at Mr. Fenwick's house almost as soon as they reached it themselves. There was not very much the matter, he said, but condemned the patient to her own room for a day or two. May spent the greater part of the following morning with Bobbie, reading and chatting; but after lunch, as the invalid complained of a headache, she drew down the blinds, and left her in the darkened room to sleep it off—not without a sense of relief. She wanted to be free to think of her own affairs: to remember Leslie's look and tone on the previous afternoon, and to watch for the letter that he had promised. By-and-bye she heard the postman's knock; but nothing came for her. After a few minutes, she rang the bell.

"Was not that the postman?" she asked.

"Yes, miss," was the answer; "a letter for Miss May."

This was Bobbie's title with the servants, while her aunt's was Miss Fenwick. It was not technically correct, of course; but while Bobbie was such a child, anything else would have been absurd.

"Nothing for me—are you sure?" May asked.

"Nothing else, miss; only that."

And with this May had to content herself. She had expected that he would write at once; but it was easy to imagine how he might have been prevented; and, after all, what did formalities matter? She felt sure that they understood each other; only she would have liked to be able to tell him how that first foolish quarrel had distressed her; how hard it had been for her to see him go away for so long, and not to know if he cared for her; how her heart had leapt when she heard of his return; how she had hoped, and feared, and hoped again. Ah! there was a good deal she never could tell him—not for a long while, at any rate. And so she sat musing pleasantly by herself, till it occurred to her to wonder who could have written to Bobbie. It was so unusual for the child to have a letter, except it were a note from some friend in the town. She had been to school in Donisfield, and had no correspondents elsewhere. She decided to go up to her niece. Whatever it was, Bobbie was sure to want to show it her.

She went into the room, and found her patient with feverishly bright eyes, and cheeks that glowed from their nest in the pillows.

"Is that auntie!" cried Bobbie in a strange voice.

"She came in holding her head very high."—p. 871.

"Oh, auntie, come here; I want to tell you something."

But when May approached, instead of revealing anything, she merely caught her round the neck and kissed her several times.

"Well, Bobbie, what's the matter? Whom is your letter from?"

"I don't think I can tell you. And you'll never guess—never. I can't believe it. I think I must be dreaming. Oh, auntie, auntie!"

And here Bobbie burst into tears, but evidently not tears of grief.

May petted and soothed her, and finally restored her to something like calm.

"I am a goose," she admitted. "I don't know what he would think if he knew what a goose I am. Only it was such a surprise, you know."

"I don't know anything yet, dear," May reminded her.

"Well, I'll show you his letter. Oh, no! I can't do that."

"His letter?" repeated May. Something caught at her throat; the room went round her. Bobbie's elated little voice sounded as if it came from an infinite distance.

"Yes, Leslie's. He says he would have spoken yesterday if it had not been for the accident. And—oh, fancy!—he says he has thought of me for so long. I can't take it in."

"You say he has written to you?" said May, and her voice sounded hard and strange.

"Yes, dear, I told you," and here Bobbie enfolded her aunt in another hug. "He wants me to marry him."

May drew back, and sat rigid. "Well?" she said, with dry lips.

Bobbie looked up anxiously at her: but she could see nothing, for the blinds were still down, and May's back was turned to the little light there was. Still, the tone and gesture told her plainly that something was wrong.

"What is the matter?" she said piteously. "Don't you like it? Aren't you glad? Oh, I know I'm not good enough."

The stupor into which May had been plunged by the shock of discovering that Leslie's letter to her had fallen into wrong hands, was penetrated by a sudden pang. Bobbie's tone pierced her: it meant that she was acting unkindly to the child who had been her pet.

"I am glad, dear, if you are glad. I am surprised, that's all. Somehow I never thought of you in this light."

"I never thought of it myself, that's the joke," laughed Bobbie. "Of course, I admired him, and thought him splendid; but as for his caring for me, that never entered my head. When I think," she went on softly, "of his choosing me, I feel as if I wanted to be so charming, and clever, and delightful every way, instead of what I am. You, now, would have been much better. Why didn't he think of you?"

But it was evident from her manner that she did not at all deplore the direction which Mr. Rutherford's thoughts had taken. If May's life had depended upon it, she could not have said anything to damp Bobbie's happiness. Besides, she had no right; she knew nothing. She responded with all the warmth she had at command to her niece's confidences, and got away as soon as she could, to face a situation that only grew more miserably perplexing the longer she considered it.

Two days afterwards, Leslie arrived from London. He was shown by some chance into the breakfast-room, where May was arranging flowers for the table. She had not heard him arrive, and when she looked up and saw him enter, all the trouble of her heart seemed written on her face. She had no time to think of conventional concealments.

"Oh, Les," she cried to him; "what does it mean?"

"That is what I want to know," he answered. "Something has gone frightfully wrong. I wrote you—I said I should."

"It was not Bobbie, then? You meant it for me?"

"How could it be Bobbie?" he broke in, almost savagely. "Why, May, you knew." And then, as if he had just been struck by the traces of pain and trouble in her face, "My darling," he said tenderly, "you look ill. No wonder; what must you have thought of me?"

He came round the table to where she was sitting, and tried to take her hands.

"No, no!" she said, drawing back; "don't talk like that."

"Not if I love you?"

"Bobbie has written you, has she not?"

His face darkened again.

"I don't know what to do," he said; "or how to get out of it. But somehow I must. You love me, May?"

"Leslie, don't you see you are bound?"

"What! by a mistake?—by a thing I couldn't help? I am exceedingly sorry. I'd have given ten years of my life to have it different. I say so deliberately. But it's infamous to marry one girl when you love another. I should be wronging her horribly. Don't you see that I should?"

"She need never know, Leslie," May answered, looking up at him wistfully. "And you know in time you couldn't help caring for her. She is a dear child."

He started up at this, and began to pace the floor distractedly.

"May! is it you who are saying these things? You seem to think it doesn't matter; that a man can put away a feeling like an old coat. I thought you knew what love was, May."

"Don't I?" she said softly.

Something infinitely pathetic in her voice touched him almost with remorse. He flung himself on his knees at the side of her chair, and spoke passionately, without any diffidence now, of the love he had nursed through years of exile, not, surely, to be frustrated by a mere blunder at last.

She listened, but her face was hidden in her hands. He tried again to take one of them in his own.

"Don't, dear," she said, without moving.

"May, won't you speak to me?"

"I am trying to think," she said, looking up. "Oh, it is so difficult!"

"We have one thing to hold by," he answered, "if we love each other."

"I can't see it like that," she replied. "I can't make my happiness out of the child's misery. After all, is it necessary that we should be happy?"

"Oh!" he cried, rising with an impatient gesture, "this is your altruism. This is the stock motive of the third-rate novels. May, do let us look at the thing rationally. They say you women see clearly in these matters. You know the vows I shall take to the girl I marry; have you thought what it would be to take them to her, while all the while I love you—always shall love you?"

They were both so absorbed by the subject that they did not notice certain sounds without, as of someone being assisted along the passage. The words just quoted had hardly left Leslie Rutherford's lips when the door swung open. Bobbie stood there, stick in hand, leaning against the door-post. Having heard from one of the maids that Mr. Rutherford was in the breakfast-room, she had had herself helped along the hall from her sofa in the dining-room; and there she was, blushing, happy, excited, and never doubting but that he would be delighted to see her.

May gave a faint little cry, which Bobbie attributed to horror at seeing her on her feet.

"It's all right, auntie," she made haste to explain; "I haven't stood on the lame foot a bit. They told me Leslie was here," she added, blushing deeper than ever, and looking blissful. Leslie went to her at once, and helped her to the sofa; and May knew better than to suppose that he would be able to undeceive her now. She slipped out of the room, and left them together; there was nothing else to be done.

* * * * * *

It had occurred some time before this to a local magnate, that it might be as well to increase the attractiveness of the town, and his own importance to it, by presenting it with an Art Gallery.

This, of course, had to be formally opened; and "everybody who was anybody" in Donisfield received an invitation to be present. A peer of the realm had been captured for the occasion; and he was to be supported by persons eminent in various walks of life. Among others by Mr. W. Beckford, R.A., the well-known painter of Eastern subjects, who had quite recovered from his recent illness.

Mrs. Beckford, who had accompanied her husband, sat behind him during the speech-making, in a place reserved for the notables; but after it was over, her attention was claimed by one old acquaintance after another. She was talking to some of them in the small room where tea and coffee were being served, when one of the ladies with her called out, "Why, there is Bobbie Fenwick, I declare!"

They were sitting on a sort of divan against the wall, hemmed in by an increasing crowd; and waiting till the efforts of their attendant cavaliers to get some refreshment for them should be crowned with success. Bobbie came up to them looking hot and anxious, and dropped into a seat that had just been left vacant next to Mrs. Beckford.

"We all came together," she explained to the lady who had addressed her; "but there was such a frightful crowd in the Gallery that I got separated from them. I've been trying to find them everywhere."

"It's of no use trying to run after people here," her friend remarked. "You look dreadfully hot, child. Sit still, and have a cup of tea, and they are sure to come for you."

She then introduced her to Mrs. Beckford, who was very gracious indeed.

"You are Mr. Tom Fenwick's daughter, are you not?" said the artist's wife. "I used to know your father as a boy. I'm so pleased to meet you. I heard a great deal about you all from Mr. Rutherford in Switzerland. We became rather confidential, you know. He was so kind all the time my husband was ill! Oh! I can't tell you how good he was!"

"He is always good," said Bobbie, very decidedly.

"So few young men, you know, would have stayed to wait on an invalid as he did, when he was simply dying to get home to his lady-love. I am so glad that it is settled. I just heard that he was engaged—no details, or anything. Of course we only got here in time for the function. I have not seen your aunt yet. I am hoping to. I have seen her photograph, though. Such a sweet face!"

"Isn't it?" Bobbie assented warmly, though wondering a little at the connection of Mrs. Beckford's ideas.

"He used to talk to me about her for hours—he had no one else to talk to, poor fellow! How good she was, and how unselfish, and like a mother to you children. He used to say that he thought he should have some difficulty in persuading her to leave you. But then I said to him, 'Mr. Fenwick has a daughter, hasn't he? old enough to take charge of things——' My dear, are you faint?"

"It is so frightfully close!" Bobbie said faintly.

"You must get into the air. Ah! here he is!—Here is your little stray sheep, Mr. Rutherford!"

Leslie looked rather anxious as he was making his way through the crowd, but his brow cleared when he saw Bobbie.

"Take me outside, Les!" she begged; and he led her away at once, after a brief, pleased recognition of his old acquaintance.

"Call a cab, please," she said, when they were outside. "I want to go home now; my head aches."

She looked so pale and strange, and was so peremptory with him, that he obeyed without demur. The cab was called; he handed her in, and was about to get in beside her.

"No!" she said; "go back to the others. I don't want you. I won't have you come."

"I can't let you go alone," he answered.

"I will go alone!" she cried imperiously, the tears starting to her eyes. "How can you be so disagreeable?"

Leslie bowed without a word, gave the cabman his orders, and walked back to the Gallery, feeling, it must be owned, somewhat savage. He was in a false position, and it made him irritable. He had lacked the cruelty or the courage to explain the real state of things to Bobbie when he met her after her accident, and the consequence was, of course, that he had to accept the situation and make the best of it. He tried loyally and sincerely to do his duty to the child, but her open, innocent fondness afflicted him with a sense of treachery; and May's face, as she went about the house with that look of suppressed sorrow on it that only he understood, shunning his presence, avoiding his gaze, was a continual torment to him. One of the simplest of men, he had constantly to appear with a mask on. His life was a lie; he despised himself; and yet there appeared to him to be no way out of it. If it was impossible to tell the truth to Bobbie at their first meeting, it was tenfold impossible now.

As to Bobbie, she went home, took Leslie's letter out of a certain cedar-wood box where she kept her treasures, and read it over carefully several times. She had a quick little brain, and it was not difficult for her to see that the letter confirmed what Mrs. Beckford had said. As she read it under this new light, expressions that she had hardly noticed before came into sudden prominence. It seemed all at once obvious that it could not have been meant for her. It was not written to a girl, but to a woman; it was the language, not of a sudden fancy or passion, but of a long-cherished love. Then she remembered her aunt's manner when she heard the news, and the change that had come upon her since. She had grown wan and silent; and once, on going into her room, she had found her crying.

Bobbie's pride was deeply hurt. It was perhaps a salutary thing for her that she took it in that way; but she spent some very bitter hours that evening by herself, bolting her door against the outer world and refusing to admit anyone.

Towards twelve o'clock, May, who had retired for the night and was reading in her own room, was surprised by the sudden apparition of Bobbie, still in the white dress she had worn in the afternoon. She came in holding her head very high, and with a letter in her hand.

"That is for you," she said, laying it on the table. "I suppose it is all a mistake, my having had it. And —and will you tell him, please, auntie?"

She was going away, but May stopped her.

"Why, what has happened?" she said. "Don't run away, dear. Tell me."

"There 's nothing to tell," said Bobbie, still holding herself very stiffly; "only I 've made a mistake. What business had he to let me think he liked me?" she cried, breaking down suddenly in a passion of tears. "Did he think I should want a man to marry me who loved someone else? He ought to have told me—he ought—he ought!"

And this was the view Tom Fenwick took, when, as was inevitable, he became acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. Lovers of poetic justice may be assured that Leslie did not go unpunished for the weakness that had closed his lips and made him determined to abide by his mistake.

"It is a comfort that it can't very well come over again," said May.

"Yes, indeed," he assented; "the most awful ordeal I ever went through! Africa was a joke to it. I can't conceive what would have become of us all if Mrs. Beckford hadn't been at that place that afternoon."

"You see, virtue is sometimes rewarded," she said, smiling at him. And then a shadow crossed her face, and she murmured, "Poor Bobbie!"

Bobbie went to Germany after these events, and developed a musical enthusiasm which kept her there two years. When she returned, there was no further danger of confusion between her and her relative, as May Fenwick the elder had for some time been Mrs. Leslie Rutherford. There are rumours that Miss Fenwick is not likely to retain for long her ownership of that euphonious name. Mrs. Beckford, who keeps up her interest in the family, is positive about it. But time will show.

YOUTH AND AGE.

BENEATH a spreading tree, whose shade
A covert from the sun has made,
Lucy, a maiden sweet to see,
The best of all good company,
With gay, bright looks that banish care,
By grandmamma's snug garden chair
Assumes her place, and, closer still,
Fearing, perchance, a sudden chill,
She softly draws the warm shawl round
Her shoulders. Ah, when Youth is found
A graceful minister of Age,
The lesson on the poet's page
May shine in characters of light!
It is indeed a pleasing sight
To see the strong assist the weak;
To see against the faded cheek
The rosy lips of girlhood pressed!
The tender, loving words addressed
To grandmamma, in fancy seem
To bring to her a golden dream,
In which the long years roll away,
And she is once more young and gay,
With all life's storms and griefs untried,
Like that fair vision by her side!

"OUTSIDE OVER THE LEA."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

I DARE say you often picture how the world is looking outside. By reason of weakness, your vision is bounded perhaps by the table and chair, the cupboard and the fireplace and window, all so familiar to you. But when somebody brings you a fragrant, smiling flower, or you catch the notes of the birds that seem so bright and brave even when the weather is grey, your thoughts go out, out to the scenes that once you knew, the bracken stirred by the freshening breeze, the hills where you gathered cowslips in the days of old, the grassy glen, the sweet, shadowy path beneath the woodland trees.

As just now you cannot well see Nature's peace and glory with your own eyes, will you use mine instead to-day, and let me show you my favourite resort, so calm and fair that no hand but that of our Father could have created its beauty? To reach it one must cross a breezy common where there are all sorts of fragile, wonderful grasses; such tiny, feeble things they seem to be as they bend to the breath of the wind, and yield to the little children's tread, yet before God they are not forgotten, and the sunshine and dew come down to them even as to the gayest garden-flowers. The sermon of these little wind-blown lives comes to us full of cheer and comfort as we pass them by; if God so clothe the grass of the field, is He not thinking of you, even though you be poor and lonely?

We now reach a couple of corn-fields, making "waves of shadow" as the sun-kissed gold sways to and fro; and then we enter a copse dear to the spirits of the singing-birds and to our own. It seems the inner temple of peace, the sort of place where infirmities and cares and anxieties can be forgotten, as we look up to Heaven between the branching pines, the cool, whispering leaves that shadow our path like a benediction, and down to the flower-stars of the hedges, the wild strawberry and blackberry blossom. "Ah, yes," perhaps your heart is saying, "one can be at peace in a glade like that; but the cares seem so dark, so very near us, shut up in a room of sickness." There is One who is nearer than the cares in that sick-room, friend; it was He who touched the glade and clothed it with loveliness—it is "this same Jesus" who can be to you a truer, surer peace than Nature's beauty can bestow. Come onward in your fancy a little further still. Yonder is the gleam of water, a tiny streamlet at first, and then a broad, radiant sheet, garlanded with spreading leaves and white and golden water-lilies. These waters, that bedew the grass and lave the feet of marigolds and forget-me-nots, may well remind us of those waters of quietness, beside which the Lord our Shepherd leads us: there is here a great hush and stillness—amid the discords of earth the Master has struck a silence—we have come apart with Him and entered into rest.

What do you know of His peace just now? What you may know of it He only can show you; no language can tell how the Good Shepherd rests and comforts and satisfies His weary ones who have fainted and fretted in loneliness, but steal away from self and over-anxious care into those arms that for them knew the Cross of Calvary. Here, by the water-lily river, your soul could know no real resting apart from the Lord: there, in your quiet room, He is "closer to you than breathing"—His love, His strength, His peace will respond to your feeble cry. Will you make trial of His leading now, and learn how the Lord gives quietness, and prove by what living waters—calm, bright, and eternal—He will lead the soul that trusts Him?

Do not let care and unrest hold your heart as in a prison. I read once of a bird that flew into a church during a service, and tried hard to escape by roof and window, while a sad heart amid the congregation was thinking: "Foolish bird, why strive thus in vain? Is not the door wide open?" At last with weary wings the bird drew near that open door, and soon outside was chanting a song of rest and praise. Its freedom reminded the troubled heart of another Open Door—even the Lord Jesus Christ—and, seeking Him, she escaped from the burden that oppressed.

Seek Him anew to-day; prove anew that with God nothing is impossible. Underneath your every infirmity and worry the everlasting Arms abide: amid your many perplexities let Jesus take you by the hand, and bring you to the waters of quietness. There is a river the streams whereof make glad God's people—a river that flows to you now in blessing and radiance and healing: more glorious than my water-lilies are the fadeless trees of strength it nourishes—"the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine."

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

(A NEW SERIES OF QUESTIONS, BASED UPON THE INTERNATIONAL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.)

QUESTIONS.

121. What marks of sincere repentance are mentioned in connection with Zacchæus the Publican?

122. What event took place at the raising of Lazarus which has been a source of great comfort to many persons?

123. In what way are the words used by the disciples to welcome Christ on His entry to Jerusalem worthy of special attention?

124. In what way is Our Lord's Parable of the Vineyard illustrated in the Old Testament?

125. What was so remarkable in the teaching of Christ, whether by miracle or by words?

126. How often did Christ cleanse the Temple?

127. Why did Our Blessed Lord weep when entering Jerusalem in triumph?

128. Our Lord, in the Parable of the Vineyard, applies to Himself the words of the Psalmist, "The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner." Which of the Apostles speaks of Christ as the "Corner-stone of the Church"?

129. Which of the twelve Apostles were sent by Our Blessed Lord to prepare the Passover for Him?

130. What is the special event associated with the last Passover feast kept by Our Blessed Lord and His disciples?

131. What Psalms were sung at the Feast of the Passover?

132. What similarity is there between the Jewish Passover and the Lord's Supper?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 793.

109. Because by the Law of Moses they were not to come near to any person, the plague of leprosy being infectious. (St. Luke xvii. 12; Lev. xiii. 46.)

110. Because the people of Samaria were the descendants of those heathens whom the King of Assyria placed in Samaria after he had taken away the Israelites as captives. (St. John iv. 9; 2 Kings xvii. 6, 24.)

111. The Prophet Isaiah, where he says, "The whole head is sick and the whole heart faint: from the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it, but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores." (Isaiah i. 5, 6.)

112. The duty of continuing instant in prayer, lest we lose faith in God. (St. Luke xviii. 1, 8; Rom. xii. 12.)

113. In the spirit of humility and faith in God's mercy. (St. Luke xviii. 13, 14; St. James i. 5, 6.)

114. Confession of sin, faith in God, and prayer for pardon. (St. Luke xviii. 13.)

115. The blessing of bringing people to God, and the wrong we do if in any wise we hinder them. (St. Mark x. 16; St. Matt. v. 19; St. James v. 19, 20.)

116. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of God." (St. Luke xviii. 24.)

117. The sin of selfishness; for while the Ruler had outwardly kept all the Commandments, yet in his heart self ruled. (St. Luke xviii. 20—24.)

118. That if we trust in Him, He will give us all things that we need in this life—as is seen in the case of Abraham, Job, and others. (St. Matt. vi. 33; Gen. xii. 1, 2, and xiii. 2; Job xlii. 2, 6, 12.)

119. That God's love is ever seeking the salvation of souls. (St. Luke xix. 5, 10.)

120. That sins of omission will condemn us at the last day as well as sins of commission. (St. Luke xix. 22, 26; see also St. Matt. xxv. 41—43.)

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

PREACHING IN CHAINS.

THE Gospel is still the power of God unto salvation wherever it is faithfully proclaimed, and it can work as mightily, as gloriously, in men's hearts and lives to-day as in bygone ages. There are heroic Christian souls in these later times who follow in the train of the Son of God and of the early martyrs, heeding not the claims of self, but loyal to the heavenly call. A missionary from Madagascar told in our hearing an impressive narrative of a Christian man who unfortunately gave offence in high quarters, and was exiled to the coast, loaded with chains, and watched by guards continually. He had been enjoying the comforts of life and the esteem of those around, but he did not give way to despair or selfish repining; he asked himself if it might not be that the Master had a work for him to fulfil even in that strange, dreary place of exile. How should he, how could he, loaded with weighty irons, become the herald of salvation? He commenced by speaking of Jesus to his guards, who brought their friends to hear his message, till at last he was instructing a little meeting of attentive listeners. The desire took possession of them to build a chapel, and they asked him to become their preacher. He shrank from the notion of a ministry in chains; would not his fetters be revealed while he stood in their chapel preaching the Gospel? But prayerful meditation caused him to ignore the matter of the chains, and he became their preacher. By-and-bye the chapel had to give place to a larger one; and years after, when reinstated in his position and set at liberty, he left behind in his place of exile a congregation that had been brought to God by means of a fettered prisoner. With such an example before us, never let us think despairingly that we are shut out from opportunities of serving the Lord, that we can do nothing in our disadvantageous circumstances to spread His Kingdom!

WHAT PATIENCE WILL DO ("A VETERAN'S COUNSEL").

A VETERAN'S COUNSEL.

An American writer on Sunday-school work, advocating patient perseverance, says: "You sometimes have to drill an entrance for the truth; steady, faithful drilling, with an occasional drop of oil of kindness and love, will surely succeed." These drops of oil work wonders in Sunday-school machinery, both as regards fellow-teachers and the young spirits, mischievous, careless, or defiant, who for a short space weekly are entrusted to Christian guidance. It is true enough that "order must be maintained," but personal goodwill towards the scholar is far more likely to effect such a result than scolding, threatening, or the hasty "box on the ear." "How is it you never report a boy for dismissal?" asked the head of a large firm of a new manager; "we used to hear frequently of rebellion, disobedience, and the like."—"Sir," was the answer, "I am here to manage the lads; if I cannot do so, I (rather than the boy) am the one to go." It is a question whether the Sunday-school teacher who cannot manage the class without the hand of force is the right man in the right place. "I have had many a flippant, troublesome scholar to deal with," said a white-haired Sunday-school veteran, "and I advise, for such, a quiet talk in private. I have found rough, careless natures moved and awakened as I showed them whither they were tending, and pictured to them two opposite lives and characters in the future, and solemnly bade them choose. My endeavour is always to set before such lads a higher ideal than their present selfish, careless existence; let us lovingly show them something better, and, though they may even at the time appear unmoved, the impression of such an appeal remains, and will, with God's blessing, bear fruit to eternity."

STRANGERS IN A GREAT CITY.

Manchester folks are wont to uphold their town as the greatest and best to be met with. "Other places seem to me to look so cheap and second-rate," remarked an appreciative denizen. "When once you have seen Manchester, you will think there is no place like it. Talk of country! I could show you some fine country round Manchester; and have not people got the park as well?" Whatever in the way of smoke this great city could do without, it is blessed with many a kindly Christian mission; and not the least important of these is the scheme to look after young women who travel thither as strangers. The Female Strangers' Lodging House is an outcome of a speech made by the late Dr. Fraser at a meeting of the Young Women's Christian Association. He suggested that rooms should be secured near the London Road station, and a motherly woman engaged on behalf of strangers. Here respectable young women find a refuge when homeless, perplexed, and in trouble through missing trains, running short of money, and the like. A girl of thirteen came to visit a married sister, but arrived at an empty house; the police brought her to the Lodging House, and she was looked after till the right address was found. A respectable workman brought a servant who had run short of money while travelling, and she was safely sent to her employer. Such are illustrative cases of this kindly agency.

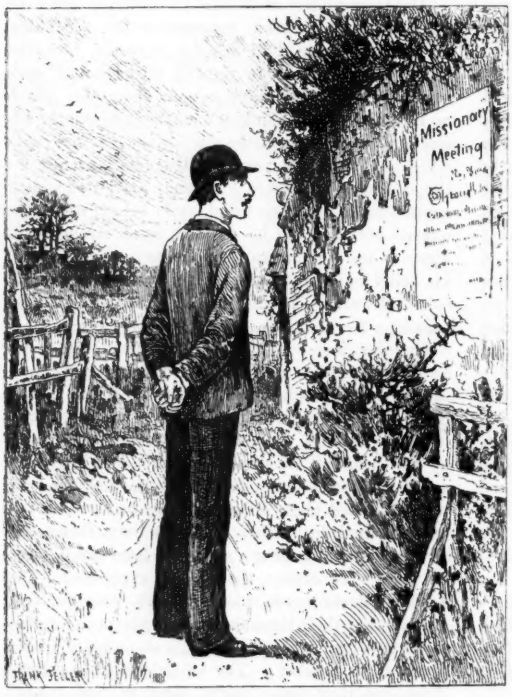
THREE HELPFUL VOLUMES.

We assume that the Expositor's Bible is published for the benefit of a specially intelligent and discriminating class of readers, and that certain expressions which occur in the volume before us will be taken and appraised in the sense intended by the author. With this understanding we may most heartily welcome Dr. Monro Gibson's exposition of the Gospel according to St. Matthew (Hodder and Stoughton). This volume well maintains the high character of the series for freshness of treatment, based upon scholarly research and devout meditation. We hope that pastors and teachers will acquaint themselves with Dr. Gibson's original and thoughtful volume without delay.—The most interesting life-study in the New Testament, after the record of the earthly life of our Lord, must ever be that of the Apostle of the Gentiles. It is only natural, then, that there should be added to Messrs. Nisbet's series on the "Men of the Bible" a volume on "St. Paul: his Life and Times." The Rev. James Iverach, M.A., is the author of this latest accession to the already long list of helpful works, and he has succeeded in the marshalling of his facts in an eminently instructive manner. Of course he has been obliged to base his work upon the scattered hints of autobiographical detail to be gleaned from the apostle's letters. But he has made a scholarly use of them, and the result is a handy work, at once thorough and easily mastered.—A new edition has just been issued, by Mr. Elliot Stock, of Canon Eden's "Churchman's Theological Dictionary," a work which gives in small compass a vast amount of information on ecclesiastical and theological matters, alphabetically arranged for ready reference.

THE WORLD'S SNEER ANSWERED.

In a letter to Sir Horace Mann, Horace Walpole wrote:—"Your friend Doddington is so reduced as to be relapsing into virtue." This was no doubt suggested by the common saying, that the last resource of people who have become disappointed with the world is to turn saint. A great preacher has answered the sneer in these words: "Let the world curl its lip if it will, when it sees through the causes of the prodigal's return. If affections crushed in early life have driven one man to God; if wrecked and ruined hopes have made another man religious; if want of success in a profession has broken the spirit; if the human life lived out too passionately has left a surfeit and a craving behind which end in seriousness; if one is brought by the sadness of a widowed life, and another by the forced desolation of involuntary single life; if, when the mighty famine comes into the heart and not a husk is left, not a pleasure untried, then, and not until then, the remorseful resolve is made—'I will arise, and go to my father:' well, brethren, what then? Why, this: that the history of penitence produced, as it so often is, by mere disappointment, sheds only a brighter lustre round the love of Christ, Who rejoices to receive such wanderers, worthless as they are, back into His bosom."



ASIATIC INDIFFERENCE TO PAIN AND DEATH.

The insensibility of Asiatics to suffering and even death has often been commented on. Medical missionaries have told us, for example, how the Chinese can undergo, in the full possession of such sensibilities as they have, severe operations which no European would think of enduring without the administration of anæsthetics; while the readiness with which an aggrieved person will commit suicide for the sake of being before his enemy at the yamen or courthouse of the Purgatorial world below, where the quarrel will have to be decided, is as strong testimony to the Chinaman's indifference to death as to his belief in the corruption of the mandarins in that spiritual world. Having occasion the other day to consult a file of Indian papers, we were reminded of a singular instance of this promptitude to throw away life, on what seems the most insufficient provocation, that took place some time ago in the native State of Rajputana. The taxes of a certain village being demanded, the religious devotees, instigated by the head of a monastery, refused to pay. A number of brother devotees from the neighbouring villages joined them, till there were in all some one hundred and fifty threatening to bury themselves alive unless they were exempted from paying this tax levied to defray the village expenses! The Thakoor declining to yield to their demand, they showed that their threat was no empty one, for they at once began to carry it out, and actually buried two of their number. The officials tried to prevent them, but they drew knives, daggers, and swords, and defied interference. Ultimately assistance came to the authorities, and a number were arrested and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, the abbot receiving a sentence of three years. Whether this was enough may well be doubted, seeing he had been the cause of considerable trouble before. It appears that some time previously he had been arrested, and nearly a hundred of his followers had rushed into the compound of the British Political Agent threatening to kill themselves unless the abbot were released. They dug four graves, and in each a man sat himself down, ready to be buried alive forthwith if their leader were not set at liberty. On that occasion the Political Agent thought it best in the end to give way, so murder was thus averted for a time. With such facts before us we may almost hope that the barbarous penances and mutilations which Eastern idolaters sometimes inflict upon themselves are not so severe to them as they seem. Nevertheless, the state of things is too horrible as it is, and shows the absolute need of the blessed Gospel of love and good-will as the only true civilising force in the world.

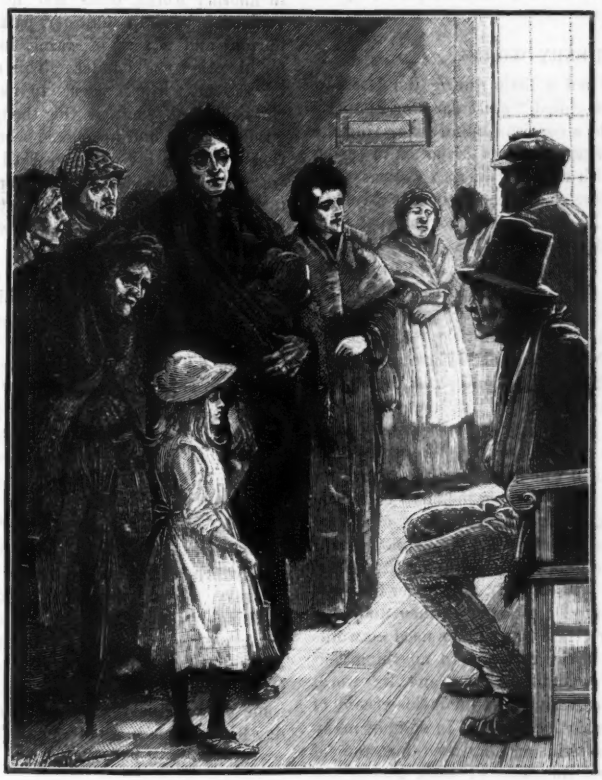
HANDING ON THE TORCH.

Readers of Christian biography often realise that divine leading of the worker to his work is still a fact. The torch is handed down the centuries, often through the ministry of what seems, but is not, adventitious incident. A young gardener, out on a summer evening's walk, stops before a placard announcing a missionary meeting. To him it is a complete novelty. The passion of a lifetime is born, and the band of missionary pioneers has then and there Robert Moffat as a recruit. William Fleming Stevenson told the story of bright Christian faith kindling gladness by its reflection in dark places. His book, "Praying and Working," was a literary success—and more. It handed on the torch. Away in the Australian bush a thoughtless young settler was seized in the grip of fever. He recovered; and during the weary time of convalescence a copy of these tales of true modern marvel—of holy, successful effort made in the Lord's strength and for His sake—came in the young man's way. He read it first as one who seeks any cure for ennui; but soon the beautiful white light of love, trust, and self-abnegation beamed out. He was aroused to deep interest. The question came: Had his life hitherto been a help or a blessing to anyone? From sad communion with the past he turned his glance upwards to the hills. He would turn over a new leaf, and, like these heroes of faith whose records were before him, live for a noble aim. He became a loyal and earnest pleader for his Master. What he had strangely received, that he tried to give to others—handing on the torch.



"To him it is a complete novelty."

MAHOMMEDANS IN CHINA.

A friend lately travelling in Kansuh, Shen-si, and Honan, has met with a considerable body of Mahommedans, "Arab-Chinese," as they are called, concerning whom he writes: Their physical superiority to the Chinese around is marked, while their habits are much more cleanly. They dwell chiefly in cities, nowhere engaged in agriculture; neither do they show any interest in literary pursuits. From their ranks petty military officers are largely drawn, while in many large towns they own the principal shops, distinguished always by the Chinese characters, "Pure, True." It seems, however, that this advertisement is not quite trustworthy, but that if a Mahommedan traveller finds any stopping-place destitute of such an orthodox restaurant, he presents a Chinese landlord with a slip of wood thus inscribed, and when this is suspended he has no scruple in taking food on the premises. But some, to avoid all risk of using utensils which have contained pork, carry their own culinary apparatus, from the stove to the tea-cup. In some of these Mahommedan settlements the women worship once a year, when the mosque is reserved for them. Although, among the earlier colonists, intermarriage with Chinese women was not unknown, the daughters of Islam homes have never been given to Chinese husbands. Strange to say, they are more rigid and inhuman than the natives in the matter of foot-binding. The residence of these foreigners in China dates from the middle of last century, when some natives of Mongolia, in which region the Chinese Emperor, K'ien-lung, had been at war, accompanied him as an escort home to Peking, and at his invitation settled in his Empire.

WAITING TO SEE THE DOCTOR.

"SICK, AND YE VISITED ME."

It is a grand thing when prayer and faith get "down to the finger-tips," and set people doing as well as planning on behalf of the poor. The patients who come up for treatment to the dispensary of St. Luke's Gospel Mission say gratefully that if they were ever so rich they could not have better attention; sympathy and consideration have planned all things for their benefit, the waiting-time being spent in a well-lighted and well-warmed hall. This mission stretches out arms of compassion to the aged, the infirm, young children, the decent struggling poor, and those brought low by drink and shiftlessness. Here has come the poor factory girl, standing long hours at a time, sorely needing the benefit of good food and seaside homes; pale children with "school headache" are brought too often for treatment, and the doctor has had to write many certificates of unfitness for school. It is not easy to study unless good food be building up the growing frame. The trained nurse connected with the dispensary is constantly busy in the district, and that her work calls out a good deal of Christian patience may be judged from the example given of a little boy needing a wash, where the only adjuncts available appeared to be a piedish, a kettle, and a saucepan. The kettle was also the teapot, so the nurse chose the saucepan, and the little fellow received as much of a bath as was possible. She was unaware that one of her patients was a Jew, and to him she said one day, "You are not safe if you rest on any foundation but Jesus Christ." The wife told her they were Jews, and she must not speak to her husband in this way. However, they showed pleasure when she called again, as they had not expected she would continue her care of a Jew, and she went on telling of the Saviour's love, till, while arranging the pillows during her last visit, she heard the dying man whisper, "I believe in your Jesus."

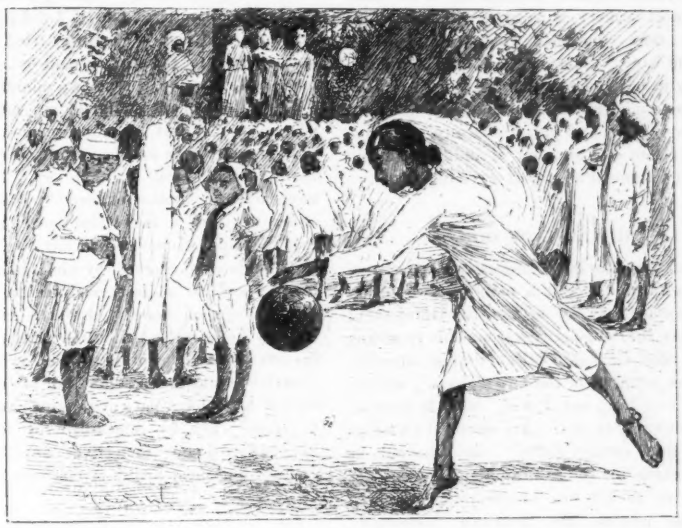
CHEERY WORDS.

We have heard not a little during the last few years about what is called "muscular Christianity," which we take to be a concise form of expressing the work done by earnest Christian labourers in caring for the bodily health of young men as well as their spiritual needs. One of the leaders in this excellent movement is Mr. F. A. Atkins, who has just published, through Messrs. Nisbet, a little work on "Moral Muscle," which, for its straightforward, manly, Christ-like teaching, ought to be in the hands of every young man, and every leader of young men. The work is well called, in its sub-title, "A Brotherly Chat with Young Men." Its tone is brotherly in the best sense, and, while it is evidently and thoroughly earnest, no one could feel that he was being "preached down at" from its pages. It is to misspent evenings in their first years of freedom from "home-lessons" that many young men who have gone astray look for the first false steps. Show young men how to redeem the evenings, then, and not the evenings alone, by forming this "moral muscle" that Mr. Atkins speaks of, and shows so well how to shape.—Another cheery work from Messrs. Nisbet is Mr. Alexander Gordon's story of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen, under the title "What Cheer O!" Our readers need no words of ours to attract their attention to anything connected with this valuable society and its work. Brightly told and cleverly illustrated, this record of faithful service, heroically rendered in spite of many obstacles, ought to win an increased measure of support and interest for those at work among the North Sea fishermen.—Messrs. Morgan and Scott send us another of the Rev. F. B. Meyer's thoughtful and suggestive volumes of expositions. "Tried by Fire" is the title he gives to the present work, which is devoted to the study and explanation of the First Epistle of Peter. The work is one which should be of service to preachers or teachers, and of equal value to those who cannot get out to hear fresh discourses for themselves. With such a work as Mr. Meyer's their thoughts may still be profitably guided and directed. In "The Christian Bible Readings," issued by the same publishers, will be found a series of useful notes to accompany the reading of the Pentateuch. If any of our Bible-class friends should be thinking of studying this part of God's Word, they cannot do better than accept the guidance proffered them in this little volume.



"WHAT PROVISION HAST THOU MADE?"

During a recent voyage between Malta and Tunis, when at the latter place we visited the site of the ancient Carthage. We were shown there a museum in which we saw the skeleton of a man, said to date back three thousand years. In the tomb with him—or coffin, we forget which—were found the bones of a chicken which had been provided by thoughtful friends in case he should wake up hungry in another world, coins lest he should be inconvenienced by impecuniosity, part of a bag, a little mirror, and a sort of razor, intended, no doubt, for his other-world toilet. This sort of preparation for the next world seems to us to be mournfully childish; but what is the thought of those more wisely warned and instructed who make no preparation at all for it? Bishop Hall tells us that there was a certain nobleman who kept a fool, or jester, to whom he one day gave a staff, with a charge to keep it until he should meet with one who was a greater fool than himself. Not many years after, the nobleman was ill, and near death. The jester came to see him, and his lordship said to him, "I must soon leave you."—"And where are you going?" asked the fool.—"Into another world," replied his lordship.—"And when will you come again? within a month?"—"No."—"Within a year?"—"No." "When, then?"—"Never."—"Never!" said the jester; "and what provision hast thou made for thy entertainment there where thou goest?"—"None at all!"—"No!" said the fool, "none at all? Here, then, take my staff; for, with all my folly, I am not guilty of any such folly as this." But what is the provision that should be made for that other land into which, sooner or later, we must all journey? It may be summed up in a single sentence. Nothing but a good life here can fit us for a better one hereafter. The way to prepare for our departure is, long before the time comes, to take Jesus as our individual Saviour, and try to serve Him, not in some extraordinary way, but in our ordinary everyday life. Then, if we die, we shall go to God; and if we live, He will be with us.

SUNSHINE IN THE EAST.

Pleading for cheeriness in dealing with the young, a Sunday-school worker related the anecdote of a child who was visited by a gleam of light during a meal, and placed his spoon within the golden rays, exclaiming, "I've eaten a spoonful of sunshine!" That our little neighbours across the sea may partake of sunshine is the aim of many a mission-worker anxious to bless soul and body, and teach "God's possible by His world's loving." An interesting letter from Bengal tells of a mission-treat to about four hundred children, many of whom arrived at 6 a.m. for festivities timed to commence at 1.30. Greenery and flowers twined the verandah, and flags of red, white, and blue delighted the company; ringing "salaams" greeted the appearance of the missionary and his wife, and then came prayer and singing, followed by gifts of fruit and sweets, and a hearty romp and scrambling for balls. The distribution of the prizes was the great event of the day. The best boys received a flannel jacket, a cap, a comforter, a bag of marbles, a top, a whistle, and a box of pins; the best girls obtained two garments, hairpins, a pincushion, a needle-book, and a doll. All seem to have come in for something; and all see the justice of the awards, for their behaviour is noted each Sunday on their own cards, and the prizes are thus adjudged. Several Brahmin parents looked on at the scene, and must have owned in their hearts that the followers of Christ delight rather in giving than in receiving. Next morning, soon after daylight, most of the guests reappeared to exhibit their presents and renew their thanks. A good deal of loving patience is needed with these little ones, most of whom have had no training of any kind; but that Christian solicitude is fruitful is shown by the instance given of one little maid of ten who clasped the hands of the missionary's wife, saying, "Mem Sahib, Jesus is the Saviour of my soul; I say this from my heart."

SUNSHINE IN THE EAST.

"GOOD WORDS COST LITTLE, AND ARE WORTH MUCH."

It was said of Edward the Confessor that he could deny a request so sweetly that his "No" was pleasanter than the "Yes" of other people. "The love and admiration," says Canon Kingsley, "which that truly brave and loving man, Sir Sidney Smith, won from everyone, rich and poor, with whom he came in contact, seems to have arisen from the fact, that without perhaps having any such conscious intention, he treated rich and poor, his own servants, and the noblemen his guests, alike, and alike courteously, considerately, cheerfully, affectionately—so leaving a blessing wherever he went." "Sir Walter [Scott] speaks to every man as if he were their blood relation," said a Scotch peasant seventy years ago of the great story-teller.

HOW THE FOREST FALLS.

The East has always been the land of metaphor and imagery. Palestine had its parables from sacred lips. Missionaries to-day succeed best as they talk in picture language. And sometimes they listen to wise words that take the figurative form. "India will be won to Christ; our religion is fated to pass away," said an observant Hindoo to an ambassador of the Cross; "and this is how it comes about. A great, dark, terrible forest of heathenism shuts us in. We cannot see our path. And cruelty is in the darkness. But you come to us with the axe of love, and you cut down a few boughs. Only a few boughs. You are not many. You cannot do much. It looks as though the light will never get through the forest. But it is a mistake to despair. The boughs are lopped from the trees here and there, and as they drop they are shaped by the truth, and an axe-head is fitted to each one, and each bough becomes a weapon, and strikes in its turn. You make other workers as you work. The ones are soon the tens, and will be the thousands, and so the forest falls."

It is an inspiring, helpful thought, precious to those who toil for the Master at home or abroad. The dense forest seems to mock the weak efforts of single toilers, or of the Christian Churches. But every lopped bough becomes in its own place an axe, and so the work widens. Every changed heart and new life is a witness to other captive souls. And if by earnest effort we can win one brother, one sister, we do well. For so the axes multiply; for so the forest falls.

"WHERE'S THE BAR?"

Going on a Rhine steamer through one of the most beautiful bits of scenery, a Yankee "globe-trotter" slept all the time, and then woke up and asked, "Where's the bar?" Too many of us act in much the same way in our journey through life. We pass by without noticing, much less using them, opportunities of the highest and purest pleasure, and then we wake up from our slumber of indifference and ask for some excitement as if that were happiness.

"LET HIM ASK OF GOD."

The Biblical Museum has a suggestive narrative of two friends conversing about a man who would not plough and hoe his field, for he said the Omnipotent Lord could give him prosperity without his troubling to bend his head in toil. "But that is tempting God," said the younger of the two; "have you told the man so?"—"Nay, but I will," was the answer, "for my words apply to you. Are spiritual blessings of less worth than earthly fruits? He who bids us stoop to the earth for the sake of the harvest, does He not tell us to lift our heads towards heaven in prayer to receive His heavenly blessing?" Prayer and expectation are channels we neglect at our own peril. Our communion with the Master should be deepened by humble thanksgiving that when we have seemed to forget Him, or give Him but the second place in our lives, He has still been caring for us, and held us in everlasting remembrance.

A CHANCE FOR THE BOYS.

Christian friends in connection with the Dublin Mission are looking after the waifs and strays to some purpose. They have a Home for needy boys, which reports that in its history the promise has been fulfilled—"The Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands." Old boys, we hear, are constantly turning up with good accounts of themselves; as a rule, they are employed as servants, but in cases where a boy shows a special mechanical gift, efforts are made to apprentice him suitably. How many a young life drifts hither and thither uselessly and too often injuriously, which might be won for right and for the Master if sympathy reached as far as his loneliness and need, and gave the boy a chance! Of course, in dealing with young waifs there are many discouragements; still, faith and prayer remove mountains, and no endeavour made for Christ's sake shall be put forth in vain. We are told of one such waif whose mother was an invalid, and his father spent time and money at the tavern, so the boy grew up neglected, wild, and idle, ready for any mischief. In the school he was prevailed upon to attend, his tricks greatly amused his comrades, but his restless and foolish habits prevented his learning much. At last an emphatic remark made by a speaker at one of the meetings seemed to impress the little fellow: "He said I was always making a fool of myself to please the other boys, and if I did not stop I might become a real fool." So Harry tried hard to reform, and entered the Home. By-and-bye he discouraged his friends by departing; two months later, begged for "another chance," stayed six months and went off again. At last he really seemed to understand how ungrateful he had been for the benefits extended to him, and he was heard to say, "I suppose now I never will get another chance!" His regret seemed so sincere that a lady tried hard to get him back into the happy Home he had left, and from that time his friends were cheered by his steadiness, and, best of all, they had at last good reason to believe in a real change of heart. From a situation in the country he sent a contribution to the Home, and in his letter was the sentence, "Please tell Miss S—— I am so thankful to her for that last chance." Shall we not have long patience with those we are trying to train, when we remember the forbearance and long-suffering our own lives experience from the greatest and most loving of teachers?

MODERN DINNER-PARTIES

were disliked by General Gordon because at them "people say what they don't mean, and eat what they don't want." Indeed, our entertainments are in great need of being Christianised. (See St. Luke xiv. 12, 13, 14.)

THE "QUIVER" FUNDS.

List of contributions received from June 18th, 1890, up to and including July 18th, 1890. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs Fund: E. R., London, N., 2s.; Mrs. McIntyre, Duror, 15s.; J. W., Camden Town (10th donation), 10s.; S. A., Duncannon, 6d.; A. M.V., Southsea, 10s.; a Glasgow Mother, 1s.

For The Children's Country Holiday Fund: Belfast, 2s. 6d.; Two Friends, 7s.; M. Moore, Birkdale, 5s.; Reader of THE QUIVER, 2s.; Mrs. McIntyre, Duror, 5s.; Avice, Eastbourne, 5s.: which have been forwarded. Also 5s. from Miss Bodkin, Highgate, to the Coastguards' Mission, and 10s. from G. W., Bishop Auckland, to the holiday fund of Dr. Barnardo's Homes.

Dr. Barnardo asks us to acknowledge the receipt of 10s. from J. G. L. K. towards the funds of his Homes.

THEIR BRIGHT EXAMPLE; OR, HALF-HOURS WITH THE WORTHIES OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC., ETC.

IV.—ELIZABETH PRENTISS, AUTHOR OF "STEPPING HEAVENWARD."

"In Bible-readings she especially excelled."—p. 884.

IT is not easy to write even a brief sketch of Elizabeth Payson, afterwards Mrs. Prentiss, without lingering over her sainted father, Edward Payson, who for a quarter of a century carried on a wonderful ministry in Portland, Maine. Payson was one of the most seraphic saints America has produced. The New World has not been very prolific of such saints; it has not produced many names to rank with St. Bernard of Clairvaux, Madame Guion, Richard Baxter, Samuel Rutherford, or Archbishop Leighton; but Payson deserves a place in the honoured band. The late Professor Calvin Stowe (husband of Mrs. Beecher Stowe) said of his prayers, and the gushings of his heart in familiar discourse, that they were altogether higher and more touching than anything he wrote. "It was my custom to close my eyes when he began to pray, and it was always a letting down, a sort of rude fall, to open them again when he had concluded and find myself still on the earth. His prayers always took my spirit into the presence of Christ, amid the glories of the spiritual world; and to look round again on this familiar and almost misty earth was almost painful."

Among the other remarkable qualities which were exemplified by Edward Payson, and in some degree shared by his daughter, was the combination of humour with devotion, and the power of the spirit to triumph over the body under intense pain. "Without effort, or any appearance of incongruity, he could in turn be grave and gay, playful and serious. . . . Nature and grace had full play in him, and as it were ran into each other. . . . His facetiousness was ever a near neighbour to his piety, if it was not a part of it; and his most cheerful conversations, so far from putting his mind out of tune for acts of religious worship, seemed but a happy preparation for the exercise of devotional feelings." As to his triumph over pain, though his bodily sufferings during his last illness are said to have been indescribable, he seemed, like one of the old martyrs in the midst of the flames, to forget them all in the intensity of his spiritual joy. His farewell letter to his sister might be set down as a great exaggeration if those around him had not amply verified its description of his condition: "Were I to adopt the figurative language of Bunyan, I might date this letter from the land of Beulah, of which I have been for some weeks a happy inhabitant. The celestial city is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its odours are wafted to me, its sounds strike upon my ear, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. The Sun of Righteousness has gradually been drawing nearer and nearer, and now He fills the whole hemisphere, pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun, exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze on this excessive brightness, and wondering with unutterable wonder why God should deign thus to shine upon a sinful worm. A single heart and a single tongue seem altogether inadequate to my wants; I want a whole heart for every separate emotion, and a whole tongue to express that emotion."

Elizabeth Payson was but nine years old when her father died (October 22, 1827). Not only his mental qualities, but some of his very ailments and weaknesses, reappeared in her. The "lost will," which he extolled on his death-bed, when he spoke of the blessedness of having his own will lost in God's, became to his daughter a lofty ideal, representing a style of spiritual life after which she strove most assiduously. With her father's ill-health, she inherited his exuberance of animal spirits, and her love of fun and frolic kept her heart as young and blithe as a girl's, even when the snows of age had fallen on her head and her face was furrowed with marks of suffering. Her nature was nimble and elastic, full of grace and delicate beauty; yet there was in her a natural tendency to sadness, which was not altogether overcome either by the flow of her spirits or the joy derived from fellowship with her Saviour. Her emotions were full and lively, and the warmth of her affections drew to her many a heart.

Her apparent contradictions were really due to her many-sided nature. A martyr to ill-health, yet full of the vivacity which sickness usually kills, and of the cheerfulness that comforts and brightens the sorrowing; dreadfully sleepless, so that often for weeks together she hardly knew a good night's rest, yet fresh as a lark and "happy as a grig;" profoundly earnest in all the aims and exercises of the Christian life, yet translating German tragedies, and reading and enjoying "Adam Bede," and "Les Misérables," and "Adventures of a Phaeton," and the cream of our better light literature; finding much enjoyment in all the lawful avocations and recreations of life, yet so cherishing the thought of the life eternal that at any time she could say it would be a pleasure to her to die; fascinated by the theory of the "higher Christian life," and wistfully eyeing "perfectionism" as a vision of delight, yet compelled to give it up by the hard logic of facts, which showed her that neither in herself nor in any human being had she ever seen it, or anything like it—Mrs. Prentiss was a remarkable character, as she was a lively companion and most useful friend. Natures like hers, of such width and sympathy, are not to be judged by the common standard. Readers of her biography may find some things that do not altogether please them, but in her nature there was room for many things that could not be accommodated in a narrower heart.

The centre of her religious life was the person of Jesus Christ. For dogma she had little appreciation, and of logic she made but little use. Truth was apprehended by her intuitions more than by her logic. Her great criterion was that word of our Lord's: "If any man will do God's will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." Wherever she found a soul thrilled by the glory of Christ, she was attracted and charmed.

To a profound delight in Christ, she added an intense love for the Bible. The longer she lived, the more fresh material she found in it. In Bible-readings she especially excelled; not in any particular attractiveness of manner (for she rarely looked round, or even looked up), "but a sort of magnetic influence attracted every eye to her, and held all hearts in breathless attention." Her style was entirely conversational; the tones of her voice, full of fine, subtle, womanly quality, were touched with much tenderness and depth of feeling; the audience listened as if the voice were the voice of an angel. The last Bible-reading she ever gave was on "Witnesses for Christ." She began, as usual, with reading passages and references; then spoke of the many ways in which we may bear witness for Christ, especially in the family, in the way in which we fulfil everyday home duties. So, also, in services rendered to others. She spoke of the trials of life, and the shortness of them at the longest. "We are all passing away," she said, "one after another. Our intimate friends will mourn for us when we are gone, but the world will move on just the same. And we should not allow ourselves to be troubled lest, when our time comes, we should be afraid to die. Dying grace is not usually given until it is needed. Death to a disciple of Jesus is only like stepping from one room to another, and far better, in our Father's House. And how little all the sorrows of the way will seem to us when we get to our Father's House! I suppose St. Paul, amid the bliss of heaven, fairly laughs at the thought of what he suffered for Christ in this brief moment of time."

XUM

But it is full time for us to give a brief account of the course of her life. At the early age of twelve she joined the Church, and publicly devoted herself to the service of the Saviour. Her friends thought her a girl of decided piety; but to herself it seemed, during a time of religious interest, five or six years afterwards, that she was not then a Christian. At one time she shrank from the Lord's Table as a place of absolute torture, and for a whole fortnight omitted all exercises of private devotion. Then a sense of sin overwhelmed her, and for four months she lay in the depths. Again and again she read the first twelve chapters of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress;" the rest of the book she abhorred. At last she heard a sermon on the ability of Christ to save to the uttermost. The thought of His grace and love, which she had hitherto rejected, now began to be relished, and on going home, she could at first scarcely believe in her own identity: the feeling of peace and love to God and all the world was so unlike the turbulent emotions that had long agitated her soul. This experience took place in her twenty-first year. It is not known what she thought of it in after-life; but her husband, in his biography of her, expresses the belief that she would not have regarded her former condition so unfavourably as she did then. Her friends could not but mark during this time her tender interest in the welfare of her friends and pupils, while the books she delighted in, her filial devotion, and the absolute sincerity of her character, seemed to exclude the idea that she had not been a Christian. The ebbs in the spiritual life, amounting sometimes to apparent lifelessness, are often perplexing; but the recoveries are not less remarkable. There seems to have been no such serious relapse during the remainder of her life.

Her first employment from home was as teacher in a boarding-school in Richmond, where she showed a remarkable power of influencing girls and moulding their character. At the age of twenty-six she married the Rev. G. L. Prentiss, who had just been ordained pastor of the South Trinitarian Church in New Bedford, Massachusetts. The early years of married life were saddened by the loss of children and other trials; but this laid the foundation of that power by which she was able to enter so tenderly in some of her books into the feelings of the afflicted, and minister to their sorrows.

In 1851 Mr. Prentiss became minister of Mercer Street Presbyterian Church in New York, and in this larger sphere his wife had a fine field for her gifts. In 1858, both being worn out, he resigned his charge, and for two years they lived delightfully in Switzerland. In 1861 a new church was built for him, called the Church of the Covenant; and in 1873 he was called to a chair in Union Theological Seminary, New York.

The birth of her children and the publication of her books were the chief external events in her life. In 1853 she wrote "Little Susy's Six Birthdays," "the book," as her husband remarks, "that has given such delight to tens of thousands of children wherever the English language is spoken." Like most of her books, it was an inspiration: the writing of it occupied but ten days. "Stepping Heavenward" was published as a book in 1869. As a well-known clergyman remarked, in a funeral sermon, "The response to it was instant and general. Others of her books were enjoyed, praised, laughed over; but this one was taken by tired hands into secret places, pored over by eyes dim with tears, and its lessons prayed out at many a Jabbok. It was one of those books which sorrowing, Mary-like women read to each other, and which lured many a bustling Martha from the fretting of her care-encumbered life to ponder the new lesson of rest in toil. The circulation of the book was very large." Her husband says: "It was read with equal delight by persons not only of all classes, but of all creeds too—by Calvinists, Arminians, High Churchmen, Evangelicals, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics." The name was got in this wise:—One morning Mrs. Prentiss came to the breakfast-table with her face all lighted up. "I have got a name for my book!" she exclaimed; "it came to me while I was lying awake last night. You know Wordsworth's 'Stepping Westward?' I am going to call it 'Stepping Heavenward.' I think I will put in Wordsworth's poem as a preface."

"Golden Hours: Hymns and Songs of the Christian Life," was her next publication. It was a very real transcript of her own experience. It was sharply criticised by some as conveying too dark a picture of the trials of the Christian life. But Mrs. Prentiss felt that it was through suffering she had acquired her best blessings. "Never could I have known Christ had I not had large experience of Him as a chastiser." It might be very pleasant to picture the world as healthy and happy; "but," said Mrs. Prentiss, "you may depend on it the world is brimful of pain in some shape or other; it is a hurt world. But no Christian should go about groaning and weeping; though sorrowing, he should be always rejoicing."

"Urbane and his Friends" followed next. "Urbane is an aged pastor, and his friends are members of his flock, whom he has invited to meet with him from week to week for Christian counsel and fellowship. Among the topics discussed are the Bible, Temptation, Faith, Prayer, the Mystics, the Higher Christian Life, Service, Pain and Sorrow, Peace and Joy, and the Indwelling Christ." The book contained a memorable allegory of a blind beggar-boy, beautifully fitted to bring out the unreasonableness of man in disbelieving the love of God, even when he has had abundant proofs of it, and the marvellous quality of that love. A blind beggar-boy is rescued and adopted by a kind man; yet the boy cannot believe that he is really loved. By-and-bye he is cured of his blindness. He sees ever so many other boys sharing the father's kindness; but then they are his real sons, and he is not his son, and cannot be loved as they are. To his amazement, he learns that they were just like himself, and that they were loved not because they were affectionate and obedient, but because they were wretched and miserable. "Then you must be made of love!" the boy exclaims; he gets a new view of the whole situation, and a new, and henceforth unwavering, confidence in the father's love.

Her next book was "The Home at Greylock." It was the outcome of her own experience in the management of a home. "She placed religion and love alike at the foundation of a true home: the one to connect it with heaven above, the other to make it a heaven upon earth. She enjoined it upon her young friends, as they desired enduring domestic felicity, to marry first of all for love." To a friend she wrote on this subject: "Oh, if you knew the sacredness, the beauty, the sweetness of married life as I do, you would as soon think of entering heaven without a wedding garment as of venturing on its outskirts, even, save by the force of a passionate, overwhelming power that is stronger than death itself."

Her last book was "Pemaquid; or, a Story of Old Times in New England." Of this a lady friend wrote, that over it she had "laughed and cried, then cried and laughed again;" for Mrs. Prentiss knew how to appeal alike to the tragic and the comic in our nature, and she gave full scope to both in her picture of old New England.

It was but a short period after the publication of "Pemaquid" that her end came. There was but short premonition of the coming change; and when it did heave in sight, she thought of it as too good news to be true. Yet even in her last weeks there was no abatement of her interest in nature, in flowers, in books, in playful jest, and very specially in considerate interest for the comfort of all around her. Suffering from a severe gastric affection, her pain was often fearful. Her habitual sleeplessness, and the dreadful nervous suffering that followed from it, would have been hard to bear without any superadded torture. She died on Tuesday, August 13, 1878.

Her much-honoured friend, Dr. Vincent, in committing her body to the grave, dwelt on the beautiful words, "They shall rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." "Bethink you of the long life marked by the discipline of sorrow and by those unwearied labours for others. Still is the busy hand, at rest the active brain, completed the discipline, the pain ended for ever. Her works do follow her. Think you that because she will no longer meet you at her weekly Bible-readings, because her pen will no longer indite the thoughts that have made many so patient under life's burdens, and helped so many to make of their burdens steps on which to mount heavenward—think you her work is ended? Nay! Go into yonder field, and pluck a single ear of wheat, and plant the grains, and you know that out of each grain which falls into the ground and dies, there will spring up an hundredfold. Shall you recognise so much multiplying power in a grain of wheat and not discern the infinitely greater power of multiplication enfolded in a holy life and in a holy thought? No. Through the long years in which her mortal remains shall be quietly resting beneath this sod, the work of her tongue and pen shall be reproducing itself in new forms of power, of faith, and of patience."

With a Christian lady of such gifts and graces it would be good for us to spend not a few half-hours.

THE OTHER SON.

CHAPTER XII.

REST AFTER WEARINESS.

"What messenger
Ran from the door of heaven to bring her home?"
GEORGE MAC DONALD.

SARSFELD came into the schoolroom, and closed the door noiselessly behind him. He carried in his hand a steaming cup of fragrant coffee. Theodora was just where he had left her an hour or so before, in the corner of the sofa, her cheek resting wearily against the hard horsehair covering.

"Drink this," he said, with tender insistence; and she roused herself and obeyed.

"Where are they all?" she asked, speaking in the hushed tone one uses in the house where Death has come.

"Sleeping, except Polly. She made this coffee and bade me bring it to you."

"Does she know?" asked Theodora.

"Yes, poor child, she knows," was the brief reply.

"How is Beth?" she said.

He made no answer, and she repeated the question.

"Beth is sleeping also," he replied.

"I think I will go to her, if you do not mind," she said, rising to her feet. Sarsfeld put her gently back in the sofa corner.

"I would rather you did not, just yet," he said. "You need to rest a little after the long night's vigil."

"Who will tell mother?" she asked him presently. "I shrink from it. I suppose she loved him. She must, at least, have loved him once."

"Harold will tell her; I have just now been talking to him. All the hard things must not come upon you."

"Do you remember, long ago," she asked him, looking at him with pathetic eyes, "how young and glad we used to be, and how impossible a thing sorrow seemed? It was only something we read of in books, or heard of as touching other people. I often think of those days. Do you remember how full of sunshine the days used to be, and the sky was always blue, and the nights were always lit with stars? And now, wherever we turn, there is sorrow, and sorrow, and yet again sorrow."

Her head drooped forward sadly as she sat with clasped hands, and tears rolling down her white cheeks. Sarsfeld came and sat by her, and took one of her cold hands in his.

"The bright days will come again, dear," he said, with the deep tenderness of perfect sympathy in his voice. She shook her head.

"And there is something else," she said, raising her eyes to his face. "I know by the way you look at me that there is something else you want to break to me."

Sarsfeld's face was almost as white as her own. Her eyes gazed pleadingly into his. "Tell me, whatever it is, tell me; knowledge is less cruel than suspense."

"Can you, then, not guess what I have to say?" he said, in a voice scarce more than a whisper. "When Death came last night, he took two away with him."

"Beth!" she cried, with a wail of such deep heart-anguish that he never forgot it. She sank back half-fainting from the shock and the grief of it. There were tears in Sarsfeld's eyes as he put his arms round her and held her to his breast. He murmured tender caressing words as his lips touched her hair.

"I would have died to save you this, dear heart," he said, as at last she raised her head, and looked at him with haggard eyes, and mute, quivering lips. Under this fresh sorrow and pain, even as his arms held her, so his love and his strength were ready to enfold and protect her; but she put his hands away, and sat up straight facing him.

"And after all these years I was not with her at the last," she said.

"She did not know; she went away in her sleep, quite painlessly, quite peacefully. Your sister watched her all the night, faithfully. She did not cry, or moan, or need you, dear. It is well with her; and can you not be thankful that the long pain of that little life is over at last?"

The door opened softly, and poor Polly, with tear-stained eyes, and haggard, frightened face, came in. Theodora opened her arms to her, and Sarsfeld went out and left the sisters alone in their grief.

None of them ever knew how those dreary, dark, terrible days went over. But what they all knew was that Sarsfeld did all for them that man could do. He made all the needful business arrangements, he settled everything, he went hither and thither in the house to whomsoever wanted him most—comforting Mrs. Ansley, cheering the children; and hundreds of times each day Harold declared that what he would have done without him he did not know. But he hardly ever saw Theodora. On the evening of the second day he asked Harold where she was.

"Up-stairs," said Harold, with a significant up-lifting of both shoulders and eyebrows.

"She must not remain there," said Sarsfeld, masterfully.

"Polly has tried her best, but she will not come away."

"I will go up and talk to her."

"I am sure I wish you would," said Harold, rising and going with him from the room. "It's enough to kill her, or at least cause a serious illness, to have her fretting as she is. I don't want to be a savage, you know, Sarsfeld, but I can't help thinking death has been a merciful release to the child. She must always have been a sufferer. But women don't think this way. I believe they rather like a child they can cry and fret themselves to fiddle-strings over. This is the room; I will wait outside."

Sarsfeld went in. The little attic room was flooded with the light of the setting sun; the rosy light rested upon Theodora's bent golden head, and touched the dead face of the child with a transient glow. Sarsfeld went forward, and put his hand upon her shoulder as she knelt by the bed, her face buried from sight.

"Come with me, Theodora," he said gently.

She made a gesture of dissent, then looked up with her brown eyes glistening with tears. "Let me stay," she murmured brokenly. "They will take her away to-night."

"Come," he repeated, still with his hand on her shoulder. "I wish it."

She rose obediently, and kissing the little face that was so much paler than the snowy flowers about it, turned away.

"I am ready," she said gently.

"Does not the peace of her face comfort you?" he asked, pausing and looking down with folded arms upon the marble, smiling pallor of the child. Theodora walked to the window, and stood there looking at the far golden glory of the sunset sky.

"Yes," she said softly, speaking more to herself than to him. "I am glad that she is at rest; all the little questions she so often mutely asked are answered now; and she has found her home where at last she is welcome and happy. She can run, and leap, and laugh, and sing now as Alice does. She used to smile when I told her that one day she would go there beyond the sunset, and be quite happy, with the pain all gone. People used to think she did not understand anything, but I know she did. And whether she understood or not, the patience and the silence of her life helped me to be patient and silent, and helped me often to look up out of this maze of pain and difficulty, to where there is gladness, and peace, and joy."

CHAPTER XIII.

A PAINFUL TASK.

"Wear thy yoke, endure thy lot, Bear thy burden and do thy best."—ANON.

"YES, my dear Theodora, I'm going back to town in the morning—the very first train that I can get. I am worried beyond endurance. I have put up with her as long as I can, but there's an end to everything; and an end has come to my patience," exclaimed Mrs. D'Albert, speaking with unusual energy. Theodora had met her aunt in the village street, and Mrs. D'Albert instantly plunged into the subject of her woes.

"When that poor man died," went on Mrs. D'Albert, "I thought it only my duty to invite my sister-in-law to my lodgings, being in a measure my own house for the time; but I never meant her to stay all this time. A fortnight to-day since the funeral, and there she is still, and I cannot get my own maid or man to attend to my own wants and requirements, so taken up are they with her whims and oddities. Such a trying woman! And to think she got two men to marry her, and one of them my brother, who ought to have known the difference. Dear, dear! the mischief a pretty face does in this world is incalculable—absolutely incalculable. I cannot stand her another day, that is the truth."

"You've been very good," said Theodora.

"Yes, I have indeed," returned her aunt, with energetic assent. "Quite too good, in fact. She is the most trying person I ever met. You've no idea of it."

"I think I know a little about it," Theodora answered, smiling, "after eight years, aunt!"

"She is so absolutely selfish. She talks as if the poor man went and got himself killed just on purpose to annoy her. She complains that widow's mourning never became her, and she consults with Hales all day long as to how soon she may wear grey, and mitigate her affliction with white ribbons. There, there! don't talk about her; it makes me angry: and at my time of life it does not do to waste one's vital forces getting angry. What I really want to know is, when will you come to me? There is no hindrance in the way now, and I want you so much. I am too old now to be left so much alone. I want someone young and bright constantly with me. We must go abroad for the winter. Travelling will do you good and distract your thoughts, and you used to like it, Theodora."

"And Harold?"

"Oh, Harold! Harold can take care of himself. Harold can fall on his feet better than any young man I ever met, and it is a quality all the young men of the present day possess. Very largely possess, too. A young man of to-day has only one idea, and that is himself and his own comfort. Not that I want to say anything unkind of Harold. Why should he not look after himself? But he is not you, that's all. So it's absurd of you, when I ask you when you'll come back to me, to purse your mouth, and say, 'And Harold?' as if I were neglecting my duty, and as if it were your business to tell me so, even if such were the case. No, Harold is Harold, and he can mind himself; I have taken a lot of trouble to get him this appointment, and he can get on well enough now if he likes. And then there's this Nora of his. I've got to ask her to visit me, and I can't do that unless you will come and help me to entertain her. Besides, she's going to be your sister, and you must meet her. So you must let me know at once when you can come to me, so that I can make my arrangements."

Before Theodora could reply, Dr. Sarsfeld passed them. Mrs. D'Albert knew him by appearance as the Raylington doctor who had been so kind to the Ansleys in their affliction, and as she caught sight of him now she audibly bade Theodora introduce her, and with a smile on his handsome face Sarsfeld stopped and raised his hat courteously.

"Aunt Florence!" cried Theodora, in amazement—for would not she herself have known him after any number of years, and through all and every disguise of change?—"do you not remember Dr. Sarsfeld? We knew him long ago in Germany and Switzerland. Don't you remember how kind he was that winter you were so ill?"

Mrs. D'Albert stared. She had met a vast number of young men "long ago in Germany." There had usually been a phalanx of them wherever the beautiful Miss Holbrook went. And she had been ill so many winters, and so many passing strangers had been kind to her, that it was no wonder if she now felt a little puzzled. But as she looked at the young man closely, remembrance came back. She put out her hand affably.

"So delighted to meet you again! and how really odd when you think what a poky little place this is. I am getting away from it to-morrow. And I want you to use your professional influence with my niece to join me immediately in town. She is looking so very far from well, you know."

Sarsfeld looked at Theodora. She coloured and looked down.

"I am not going to permit my niece to bury herself down here any longer," said Mrs. D'Albert vivaciously, bestowing a very keen glance upon the young doctor's face as she spoke.

"Indeed, I think you are quite right," he said, in his decided way. Theodora went home feeling a little aggrieved.

A few days later he called to see her, and found her in the garden in her favourite seat under the chestnut-tree. She looked up and greeted him with a glad, shy smile, moved her work-basket to make a place for him, then remembered that she was a little offended with him, and consequently became a little stiff. Sarsfeld apparently did not notice these feminine variations of manner. He spoke about the business which had brought him, Theodora listening, and in her secret soul thinking how clever he was, and how capable.

"Everything is turning out so happily for us all," she said, when he had finished. "Mamma has heard from General Ansley, an uncle of my stepfather's. He offers her and the girls a home. He lives near London, and is very wealthy, but he quarrelled some years ago with Mr. Ansley, so has kept up no intercourse with us since then. He will send the boys to school."

"And you?" asked Sarsfeld. "Are you free at last to choose your own life?"

"I begin to hope that I am," she said. "And yet I don't like to hope too much, for when one has often been disappointed one forgets to hope, or one thinks it is too daring."

"Yes;" he quoted softly, "'Hopes apace were changed to long despair.'"

"Oh, not so bad as that," she began, then stopped short, convicted by the remembrance of the "long despair" of the spring day when William had met her on the Hinkley Road, and the many other days, and months, and years in which she had seen no faintest gleam of good.

"What, then, will you do?" he asked.

There was an imperceptible pause, then she said, slowly, without looking at him, "I think I shall go to Aunt Florence."

He said nothing as he leant forward, and seemed absorbed in making patterns upon the gravel at their feet. Theodora stole a glance at his face. It was grave and resolute.

"And so we all go," she said presently, "and leave that little grave behind. . .

"And you? What are you going to do?" she asked, breaking a silence which had fallen on them.

"Oh, my daily work, I suppose. See after my patients, and endeavour to amass a fortune. I think the Raylington practice will turn out well enough."

"But it is such a little, unimportant place for you to stay in," she said.

"It is well enough. I am not ambitious, and I like this neighbourhood."

"'I have my story yet to tell you.'" p. 892.

He seemed to have no interest in the topic of his own prospects, and presently he started another.

Theodora sat and listened, and tried to smile and respond at the right places, while all the time she was wondering was this indeed the same man who had held her in his arms and comforted her in her sorrow? Now he was calmly discussing her life in the future as one to be spent far away from his. Before he went away he asked her when she would leave, and when she said "Soon," he said he was glad to hear it.

The sooner after that she went the better, but she must wait to see the Hardens. In about three weeks she saw Johnson undo the knocker from its wrapping, prune the box borders of the garden walk, and the windows were opened wide, and the steps whitened, so she knew that they were coming home. The next day she sent Vincent over with a note, asking an interview with the doctor.

She looked calm enough, but her face was white, and her limbs were trembling, as she entered the room where the old gentleman sat in state to receive her. She did not know how to frame her lips to the dreadful words of shame which she had come to speak. Something in her white face and pleading eyes, and the sight of her heavy mourning, softened the doctor, and he shook hands more warmly than he had done since she had declined William's attentions.

"Sit down there, my dear," he said kindly. "You do not look as well as I could wish to see you. Mrs. Harden will be down directly."

"I want to see you alone," she said.

"So I gathered from your note. We shall not be disturbed. Sit down."

She unloosed a scarf from about her throat; her lips were dry, and her eyes burning. She stumbled for words to begin. All her natural graceful ease of manner forsook her, and she sat there stiff, and silent, and quivering.

"My stepfather is dead, as you know," she said at last. "He gave me a message for you."

"For me?" said Dr. Harden, with evident surprise.

"There was some money of yours taken," she went on stammeringly, a flood of cruel shame overwhelming her. "It was not your son who took it: it was Mr. Ansley."

Dr. Harden, a hand on each arm of the chair, leaned forward staring at her, with an ashen hue spreading over his ruddy old face. Then a flash of anger such as she had never seen came from his eyes, his nostrils dilated, the veins stood out on his brow like cords. There was a long and terrible silence.

"He took it," he said, in a low tone of the most intense and burning scorn. "For fifty pounds he ruined the boy. He broke my heart. He nearly killed my wife."

"He is dead now," she murmured, shrinking before the old man's wrath. "He is gone beyond the reach of man's forgiveness or blame." He sat transfixed, his eyes staring, his breath coming in hard short gasps.

"And he kept silence," he said presently. "He has looked me in the face day after day, every day for all these years, met me, talked with me, and in his heart the black bitter secret that his was the hand that had ruined my boy." He rose, and paced the floor.

"A word from him would have been enough. Did he think it was the money, the paltry few pounds, that I minded? It was the dishonour and the disgrace. I have never had the shame of it out of my heart since then. He was a good lad until your stepfather came. He took the boy, without my knowledge, to races; he taught him to bet; he taught him to play cards. Both of these things I had strictly forbidden my sons. On the morning of that day Jack came to me and confessed that he had lost fifty pounds—and he not seventeen years of age. I was very angry. What father would not be? I spoke to him very sternly. The next day I went to the drawer of my writing-table to get a roll of notes I had left there. The drawer was unlocked and the money was gone. It was fifty pounds exactly. Jack had spent the evening in that room, a thing he rarely did. He said he had been drawing a map to help William. I accused him of taking the money. He denied fiercely. The thing went on from bad to worse. He had a hot, impetuous temper, and I a hard one. He took me at the word which I never meant, and left the house. I let him go; I let him suffer in silence. I wanted to frighten him and give him a lesson. I thought he would come back. I have waited for him during the long years since. And now to know that he was innocent! Could any man forgive the sin your stepfather has sinned against me?"

"He said," said Theodora gently, "he said that Jack—that your son is living."

"Did he say where he is?" the father asked, a sudden light of hope dawning in his face.

"No," replied the girl. "Those were his last words—'Jack is not dead.'"

"He is dead to us," the old man sighed, and resting his head on his hand he broke down and wept.

Theodora went to him and stood beside his chair, holding his hand and stroking it with her own gloved one.

"I hope I have not been hard to you, my dear," he said presently, looking up into the sweet fair face so full of sympathy and suffering. "He sinned against you, too—forgive me."

"There is nothing to forgive," she said. "With us is the blame and the shame."

"Not with you. Your hand took away the covering from Jack's picture which I had placed there in my anger. And now you have cleared Jack's good name from the cloud which has hung so long about it."

"I think I would almost give my life to bring him back to you," she said passionately.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN A PICTURE GALLERY.

"Oh, let us walk the world, so that our love
Burn like a blessed beacon, beautiful,
Upon the walls of Life's surrounding dark."

G. MASSEY.

"YES, I am tired, and my head aches. You and Harold will forgive me, dear Nora. I am sure, if I stay here and let you go and see this show by yourselves. I will wait for you here," and Theodora sank luxuriously into the corner of one of the velvet-covered lounges in the picture-gallery attached to the exhibition.

"Poor Theo!" said Nora affectionately. "You do look rather pale, and I daresay the noise and the dust, and the Wild-West war-whoops, would be very trying to a head that ached."

"But we shall be quite two hours away," demurred Harold. "You will be wearied at waiting for us, and this is a room full of daubs. There is an Ophelia in the next room which would simply make you shudder. She has green hair and a purple complexion."

"Well, I shall not go near her, so you need not imagine me shuddering. I shall rest here and look at the people passing."

"All right, please yourself, old girl.—Come, Nora: she was always of a rather hermity disposition. We had better go, or we shan't get good places."

And with a good-bye smile from Nora, Harold and his betrothed hastened off and left Theodora alone. She was glad to sit quiet and think, and it was true that her head ached. She was pondering, as she had pondered many an hour since her stepfather died—how Jack Harden could be found. She spoke about it to Harold; but he was not Harold now, he was Nora's shadow. That morning she had told the whole sad story to General Ansley, and the old man, shocked and grieved, had hastened away to consult his lawyer on the subject. Now, as she sat in the almost deserted gallery, she thought, and her thoughts took the one form only—how to find Jack Harden and bring him home. Just in front of her was a very gaudy canvas representing what the catalogue called "A Moorish Interior." Through the deep shadows of an archway struggled in the slanting rays of the sunlight which filled the narrow street just dimly seen beyond. Under a swinging lamp reclined, much at ease, a bey in gorgeous Oriental apparel, with slaves bending before him and rich rugs and skins piled about in luxurious confusion. Years after, Theodora felt she could close her eyes and conjure up every line of that picture.

A few straggling sightseers came and went. Two loudly dressed young women sauntered by with a small boy clinging to the silken skirts of one. Theodora was attracted by his wistful pretty face. The ladies with him paid him no heed; one was volubly telling the other what she had said to someone else, and what that someone else had actually had the audacity to reply. A low-hung painting attracted the little boy: a weird dark picture, with the body of a drowned woman swept in and left by the tide upon a beach of desolate sands. He looked at it with large, frightened eyes. Clutching his mother's dress still tighter, he called to her in his shrill little voice: "What for dey put her in the water, mamma—what for?"

The mother neither heard nor answered, and they swept on to another room, the child's face still turned to the picture, his plaintive voice still calling, "What for, mamma, what for?" Theodora felt sure the ghastliness of that dreary picture would mingle with the child's dreams to-night.

Then a light, firm tread came along the gallery. She looked up, and a bright colour leaped to her face as her eyes met the smiling ones of Sarsfeld.

"You here!" she cried, springing up.

"Yes. Why not? I adore shows."

And he sat down comfortably beside her.

"Will you not tell me you are glad to see me? I do not want you to strain truth for the sake of politeness, of course, but——"

"I am glad," she said, offering him her hand with a frank and pretty welcoming gesture.

"And I am very glad to see you," he said, holding it an instant in a close, friendly clasp. "Are you lost in rapturous admiration of yonder picture? I was almost afraid to interrupt you."

Theodora laughed as her eyes went back to the turbaned head of that gorgeous bey.

"I was thinking of Algiers," she said. "We are going there this winter. Harold will be married in October, and then we start."

"I hope you will like Algiers," he said. "Send me home some flowers of the Star of Bethlehem, won't you? They grow there in profusion, and travel well, they are so wax-like. You can send them to me at Christmas, just to show you have not forgotten me."

"You have been in Algiers?" she asked.

"Yes. I have been pretty well everywhere," he said carelessly. "It is time for me to settle down now quietly. And so Harold is to be married soon?"

"Yes."

"Have you quite decided to live with your aunt?" he asked.

"Yes."

"I am sorry to hear that, for I know, when you do decide upon a certain course of action, how very decided you are."

"What do you mean?" she asked, looking at him with a little surprise.

"Just what I say." And the blue eyes laughed into hers.

"I don't understand you," she said.

"Do you not? I thought I spoke plainly enough. I said I was sorry you had made up your mind so firmly. For you are a very decided young woman, now, aren't you? And I wanted you to do something quite different."

"What?" she said, with a faint pink colour rising to her face.

"I wanted you to come and live with me at Raylington. I am lonely there, rather. And besides, you don't look well: you are thin and pale, and there are hollows in your cheeks that used not to be there, and have no right to be there, and I want to see them vanish. I think plain, simple country life, and rural living and rural fare, would do you far more good than rushing about backwards and forwards from Europe to Africa. I told Mrs. D'Albert just now that I thought so."

"Well, and what did she say?" asked Theodora, trying to look quite at ease and totally disembarrassed, but she did not raise her eyes to Sarsfeld's, and the pink colour in her face grew deeper.

"She said, 'Ask Theodora.' So having found out from her where you were to be found, I started off at once. Well, Theodora, what do you think? Will you go with Aunt Florence, or will you come with me?"

Theodora stared at the Moorish picture. She almost wished she were already in Algiers at this present moment.

"You spoke slightingly of Raylington the other day in the garden. It is a dull little place, but if you were there it would be the nicest place in the world —to me. Seriously, Theodora, you know—you must know—that I love you—that I have loved you for years. And I have sometimes hoped that you cared a little for me. Do you, dear? I am not good at pretty speeches, but I can only say straight out, I love you. There is nothing to come between us now—there need be nothing. I know why you were silent that day in the churchyard at Raylington. I knew you felt your duty lay at home; I understood it all, my darling. True, there is an ill story attaching to my name, but I do not think it need come between us. You will believe my word if you love me. If you do not love and believe in me, I do not want you. Long ago, at Chillon, I was nearly telling you both my story and that I loved you, but the words you spoke, the look of high resolve upon your proud young face when you said that no disgrace should ever come near you, silenced me. I was hardly more than a boy then, and easily silenced; I am a man now, and I want my answer. I love you, Theodora, and I ask for your love; and your love, if given at all, must be accompanied by trust in me and belief in me."

Theodora raised her earnest eyes to his.

"I do trust in you," she said.

He put out his hand, and with a happy smile she laid her own in it. His fingers closed on hers, and held it fast under the friendly folds of her parasol lying across her lap. His eyes were very blue and smiling.

"I have my story yet to tell you," he said, after they had sat thus silently for a time.

"Do not tell it," she said, "now or any other time, if you would rather not. I can believe in you and trust you fully. I know that disgrace in the true meaning of the word has never touched you."

"But its shadow has been over all my life," he said gravely. "I would rather that you knew all. In fact, you must know all."

He folded his hands on the top of his walking-stick, and rested his chin on them. A ray of sunlight came slanting in and fell upon his head. Theodora leant back in her corner and looked at him. By a sudden inspiration, swift and clear and surprising, she at this moment made the discovery that every reader of this little story has made long ago. The colour ebbed from her face, her eyes shone with a very eager light as she sat straight up and put her hand upon her lover's arm. Some of the tremor she felt communicated itself to him, and with a smile he turned towards her.

"What is it now?" he asked. "Have you suddenly thought of some specially splendid reason why you should not marry me?"

"I know you now," she said excitedly. "I know who you are, and everything!"

"What do you know?" he said, still with a smile upon his lips.

"You are Jack Harden!" she said, with triumphant conviction going straight to the heart of the matter, without reasoning, or preamble, or explanation given or asked.

Sarsfeld stared at her.

"How do you know? Who told you?"

"No one. I guessed it just now."

She laughed, and clasped her hands in glee.

"Then you are Jack? You acknowledge it?"

"Certainly; I intended to tell you. But I am puzzled. I did not know you so much as dreamt of the existence of Jack Harden."

"Do you suppose your mother never told me?" She sprang to her feet eagerly. "Your mother—your father—how glad they will be! Come, let me take you to them now at once. Think of the years in which they have waited for you."

"Think of the years in which I have waited for you," he said, in his masterful, smiling way. "Sit down, and let us talk the thing out."

She obeyed meekly. She had got into a habit of obeying him.

"I feel so puzzled," she said, putting up one hand to her brow. "I can't think how it has all happened as it has. I only know that I am very glad. Shall I ever understand, do you think?" she asked, smiling at him.

"Yes, with a little pains I hope to make you do so. But it seems to me you've found out everything there is to find out already."

"You left your home so long ago—and oh," as a sudden recollection struck her, "you know that it has all been cleared up, don't you? Your father is only waiting and longing for your return."

"He was rather hard with me," the young man said, frowning.

"But he has suffered," pleaded Theodora. "Oh, yes, he has suffered. If you had seen him as I did, you would forgive him."

"I do forgive him. But I cannot understand all you say, dearest. That my mother, God bless her! should have spoken to you of me and confided my story to you does not surprise me. But my father, what made him unbend—a man of flint?"

"I do not think your father was nearly so much to blame as you," she said severely. "To go away and nurse your anger and spite all these years! To let their hearts bleed and break for you—why did you not come back? You might have known that they would forgive you."

"I wanted no forgiveness," he said, throwing his head back with a quick, proud gesture. "I wanted justice. I wanted my father to believe my word. He would not. And before you blame me so readily, Theodora, perhaps you do not know that for some years after I left home I made many overtures to my father. He took no notice of my first letters; he then returned them unopened. I did not write to my mother. I knew how her tender soul would be torn in twain between her love for me and her love for my father, so 't was better she should think me dead than know my father was still implacable towards me."

"Forgive me," she said timidly. "I had no right to blame you."

"Yes, you have every right to say exactly what you think of me, dear heart. I like you to do so. You said once you did not like mysteries. Henceforth there shall be no thought of mine you do not know. But you have not told me yet why my father spoke to you."

"When I went to him to tell him that you were innocent—about the money. You know, don't you?" she began.

"I know I never took it. But what you know on the subject is still a mystery."

"You remember that night—that dreadful night that Mr. Ansley died?" A shudder passed over her at the very remembrance, sobering her joy in the present. "He said to me that he took the money."

There was a long silence. Theodora could say no more. Sarsfeld's face flushed scarlet, then slowly paled, his eyes flashed, and his hands were clenched until the veins stood out upon them.

"I always thought so," he said in a low, bitter tone. "I always suspected him. I went to him and begged of him to confess if he had done so, and clear me from the charge. He drove me from his house with evil words."

"But the truth is known," she said slowly, her face turned away. "You can go home now freely. Strange, is it not?" she added with a wistful smile, "strange that the disgrace which has separated us so long—you and me—was on my side after all, not yours."

"No, never on yours," he said quietly, taking her hand. "Never on yours. But I was a fool not to tell you all that time in Switzerland—a young quixotic fool. I might have known that if you loved me you would have believed that I was innocent. I have looked for you since then far and wide, my Theodora, and it was only after I gave up the search and settled at Raylington that I found you. I little thought, when I used to steal over to Drueling to gaze furtively upon my mother's face, that you were so near."

"I do not know why I did not guess the secret long since. Now that I know, it seems very stupid not to have guessed."

"That is always the way with puzzles after you find them out," he said smiling. "But I can't imagine what made you jump at the conclusion now that I and the missing man are one and the same."

"Your mother showed me a lock of your hair once," she said. "I think it was that. Now, when you leaned forward and the light fell on your hair, it seemed to make me recognise you."

He laughed.

"A woman's instinct is a wonderful faculty," he said. "It is better than reason and logic any day. I suppose there are thousands of men in London alone with hair just the same as mine."

"Oh," she cried, a new idea striking her, "how can I ever unlearn that your name is Sarsfeld? How bad of you to take a name not yours!"

"My name is John Morton Sarsfeld Harden, at your service. You can call me Sarsfeld if you like. By what name used you to think of me, if you ever thought of me?"

"I just thought of you," she said, blushing rosily. "There was no need for a name. Oh, will you not allow me to go home with you to Drueling? I must take you there. I am your discoverer. I want to have the joy of saying to your father and mother, 'Here is Jack. After all these years here he is.'"

"You shall do as you like, dearest," he said, smiling at her eagerness, and the soft light glowing in her brown eyes.

"It will be such happiness!" she went on, with a gay little laugh. "And now Dr. Harden will forgive me."

"Forgive you! Why, what have you done? Oh, I know—poor William," said Jack, meaningly. "I am pleased with William. I see he has grown up a man of discrimination and good taste. Yes, father will forgive you fast enough. You will be Mrs. Jack instead of Mrs. William, and that will please them just as well."

"And me a great deal better. But I suppose I don't count, do I, Jack?"

"Not at all. And so I am to be Jack, am I?"

Before she could reply, Harold and Nora reappeared, laughing and chatting gaily, and anxious to know how Theodora had passed the time.

"I met a friend," said Theodora lamely, to Miss Craydon; while Harold sprang forward with hearty eagerness to greet the young doctor. Nora concluded from appearances that Theodora's headache was a great deal better.

"You will come back to dinner with us, Sarsfeld, won't you?" said Harold warmly.

"Yes, thank you. I made a promise to that effect to Mrs. D'Albert before I came here to look for you."

They all voted that it was pleasanter far to walk home than to drive, and they all fell into the strange delusion that across Kensington Gardens was the shortest way. It was quiet and restful there under the shadow of the great old trees, that have seen so many lovers come and go, and heavy hearts, and broken ones, too, and ruined lives pass beneath their shade. The sky beyond the trees was tinged with rose, foretelling a resplendent sunset going to be, and the leaves rustled softly above their heads. And Sarsfeld, looking at Theodora, thought that in all his knowledge of her he had never seen her look so young and radiant and lovely as now.

CHAPTER XV.

THE HOME-COMING.

"Love brings all together at last.
Keep Love safe, it will guide thee well."
W. ALLINGHAM.

AGAIN Theodora stood upon the doorstep of the Clockwork Family's Mansion, and again Peter opened its portals to her. He marvelled at the joyous light in her face, for Peter was a youth of keen observation. He ushered her into the drawing-room, announced her arrival to his mistress, and then slid with an easy grace, born of long practice, down the balustrade of the kitchen stairs to seek Anne, to whom he opined that "somethin' was up with Miss 'Olbrook." Anne curtly sent him to the garden to fetch some parsley, and Peter whistled and went. When he returned, Anne informed him that without doubt there was something up. She had heard the master go into the drawing-room, and then in a few minutes rush wildly out and call the mistress, whom he addressed as "Letty," a thing Anne had not known him to do in these years and years.

Peter received the information in dignified silence. He was offended with Anne. If she would not listen to his news, but snubbed him, and sent him to the garden for parsley, was he now going to demean himself by taking any interest whatever in what she had to say? So with elaborate indifference he went on polishing knives, surveying them every moment with the deepest interest, as if his whole heart and soul and mind were absorbed by his work.

Johnson rushed hastily in. Anne turned upon him with a severe reprimand. Hasty rushes were not tolerated in the Clockwork Family's kitchen any more than up-stairs.

Johnson who had most evidently some important news on the tip of his tongue, sank silenced into a chair, and gaped with masculine helplessness at Anne's grim countenance.

Then they again heard the master's voice, rather tremulous, now calling William. Calling William at this hour of the morning, disturbing his important studies! What would happen next? Were the foundations of the world out of course, and would the stars stray from their orbits?

Then came another ring at the hall-door bell. Peter, with an air of stately indifference, disengaged himself from his occupation, and sauntered up the stairs.

Anne stopped chopping the parsley to listen. A quick and firm step crossed the hall, and went into the drawing-room. The door was shut, but not before a cry—it might be of either joy or pain—came to the listener's ears. And Peter entered the kitchen again, casually whistling a popular air.

"Who 's that, Peter?" Anne asked sharply.

"A gennelman," quoth Peter, gazing tenderly at the point of a knife.

"It's 'im! it's 'im!" said Johnson solemnly, recovering at once his courage and his powers of speech.

"It 's who?" asked Anne, fiercely turning on him.

"It 's 'im—I was agoin' to tell you w'en you took me up so sharp—it 's Master Jack come 'ome!"

"Master Jack!" cried Anne, dropping the parsley and the chopper and her dignity all at the one moment. "Johnson, you've bin drinkin'!"

"I 'aven't," replied Johnson meekly. "I seen 'im, and 'e seen me, and spoke to me. "'Ow are you' Johnson, old man?' ses he—them's 'is very words. 'E's the doctor as 'as bin mindin' of the pore man over the way."

"Master Jack come 'ome!" repeated Anne, as one stunned. "That bein' so, it 's only proper I should go up-stairs and welcome 'im; it 's only what Master Jack would look for on behalf of one as 'as knowed him from a child."

With much dignity she wiped her hands, donned a clean apron, and went. Johnson meanwhile explained to the open-mouthed Peter who Master Jack was, and how he 'd "never have knowed him—never; and he looking at him going in and out of the Ansleys, before his very eyes, and he did not know him, not nohow. And there he was sitting up-stairs again in his own mother's drawin'-room." And he "well he nevered" to such an extent that he annoyed Peter a good deal, who desired the real story, not these rhetorical accessories to it.

When Anne opened the drawing-room door, after knocking twice and getting no answer, there was her mistress, crying and laughing all in a breath, with her cap all gone crooked; and there was a young gentleman kneeling beside her, kissing and caressing her, and speaking lovingly to her; and there was the master on the hearthrug, alternately blowing his nose and setting his hair on end with his fingers; and Miss Holbrook, looking as if she had been crying, though her face was softly bright now, was standing close to him, with her hand on his arm; and there was Master William, looking very beaming and utterly perplexed, his long arms hanging awkwardly by his sides, and his pale eyes very watery and red.

Anne, who was never taken at a disadvantage, pressed forward boldly upon the family group.

"How do you do, Master Jack?" she said calmly, as if he had only been gone since the day before.

Master Jack jumped up and shook her heartily by the hand.

"How do you do, Anne? Why, I declare you are younger than when I left home! I suppose my absence was such a relief to you! I was always the bad boy, Anne, the one that gave you trouble."

"You were always wild enough, sir," said Anne, mollified by the compliment about her youthful appearance, but desirous of inculcating a moral lesson, if possible, as was her worthy wont on all occasions, joyful or otherwise. "But I hope you've tamed down a bit, Master Jack, and that the sorrows of life have taught you resignation."

"I am going to leave off having sorrows now, Anne," he said cheerfully, while Mrs. Harden dried her eyes, and Theodora came across the room and settled the old lady's cap. "I am going to be married, Anne, and we are all going to be as happy as the days are long," went on Master Jack, laughing gleefully.

"Sorrow is the lot of all, sir," sighed Anne. "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward. I hope she 's a good young lady that you've chosen, sir, and will be a comfort to your honoured parents."

"There she is, Anne," said Jack, with mirthful eyes, indicating Theodora, as she stood beside his mother; "there she is. Now, don't you think I shall be happy, and that the sparks won't fly up with me just yet?"

Anne was thoroughly overcome. She stared from one to the other, drawing her apron through her hands.

"Isn't it very sudden-like, sir?" she asked.

"I have known Miss Holbrook for many long years, Anne—long and long before any of you knew her here," the young man said, not sorry of the opportunity to make this explanation in the hearing of his relations, and with a special reference to William in his mind.

"Please, m 'm, lunch is ready," was Anne's characteristic rejoinder, and she bowed herself from the room.

Jack laughed, and offered his mother his arm.

"Anne is unchanged," he said, as they crossed the hall to the dining-room.

"We are all unchanged," replied his mother, looking up into his face with fond pride; "only you—you have changed, my darling: grown so big and strong and manly; and you were always handsome. But your blue eyes are just the same, and your hair has the sunshine in it still."

"It was by my hair that Theodora recognised me," said Jack, laughing across the table at her. "There must be something remarkably beautiful about my hair. I thought heaps of fellows had hair just the same."

"And how did Theodora know?" asked the doctor, his ruddy face all smiles and benignity once more.

"I showed her a curl of Jack's hair," said the mother fondly, "so of course she knew it again. She was always fond of you, Jack, I think. She kissed your picture the day I showed it to her."

"You must not tell him such things as that, dear Mrs. Harden," said Theodora, laughing and blushing. "I find he is quite vain and arrogant enough."

"And to think that she has known you all these years!" said Mrs. Harden, gazing at her son. "I feel thoroughly puzzled. You will all have to be very patient with me, my dears. I am a stupid old woman."

"Don't speak badly of my mother, please; I won't allow it," said Jack. "Theodora will have a few hours' conversation with you on the subject, and she will clear up everything. I believe she knows more than any of us. If you only saw how she jumped to the conclusion that I was I, mother, you'd have been astonished."

"When a woman jumps to a conclusion, she is always right," said the doctor gravely.

"Yes, I thought so; specially when Theodora jumped to the conclusion that she would marry me."

"A saucy fellow, is he not?" said the mother, with fond pride.

And they were all very merry, Anne attending table, for Peter was incapable of aught but a good large, open, candid, and unqualified stare at the returned prodigal. Anne was very gracious, for her, and took especial care of Theodora, and did not scold William once.

William—wise and orderly minded youth—did not seem in the least put out or harassed by the turn affairs had taken. He stowed away as much provisions as if the young woman of his heart were not sitting opposite him, the affianced bride of his brother. The clockwork training had not been lost upon William. The present moment was the time to eat, and he was doing his duty. Besides, if she was not fair for him, need he care how fair she was? And on the whole, perhaps, he felt Jack and she were better suited to each other than she and he would have been.

So there was no awkwardness, and there were no hidden thoughts, no stifled regrets at this banquet; but everyone was as happy as it is possible to be in this sad world. Even Anne, who held gaiety as one of the seven deadly sins, relaxed somewhat the grimness of her face and manner.

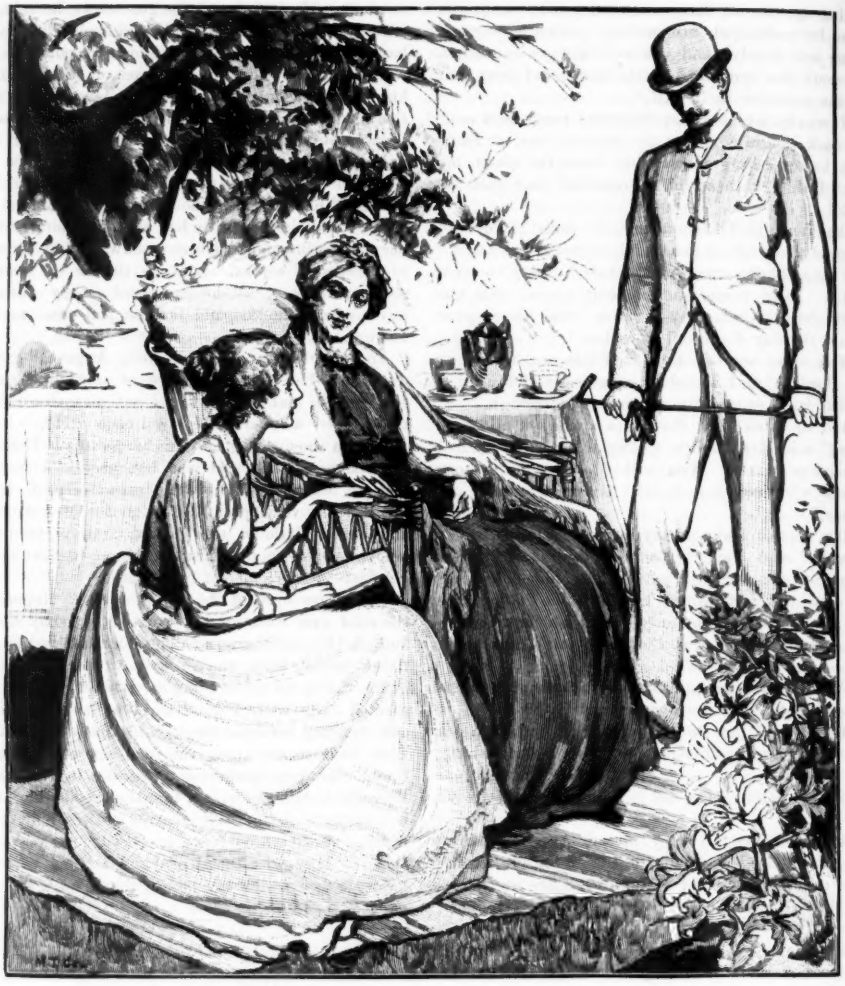
Then, after luncheon, Theodora went home; and presently in came Mr. Dobson, with beaming face, to see Jack. He had heard the good news, he said, and wanted to be the first to call and shake him by the hand. Then came the vicar, slow and pompous and well-meaning; and so, in the eyes of those who had known him as a boy, Jack Harden was cleared from the shadow which had so long clung about his name.

Jack stayed with his mother and father with willing and loving duty all the day. All the past years since he had left them he unfolded before them, telling of his struggles; how he had gone abroad and studied medicine; how he had met Theodora and left her again; how he had been backward and forwards to Australia several times as doctor on board a steamer; how at last he had saved money enough to buy a small practice, and how he had come to Raylington.

And so in happy unity the long August day went over, and there was the peace of mutual unspoken forgiveness, and the past was put away for ever by these three who so truly loved each other.

Late in the evening he went across to see Theodora. She was out, Alice told him, but would he come in and see mamma? The young man declined—he did not feel any very special affection for Mrs. Ansley—and hastened down the village, and he found his beloved where he told himself he might have sought her first—at the grave of little Beth.

The yellow light of the setting sun still lingered on the cold grey walls of the great old gloomy church, and on the quiet graves. Theodora had fashioned a little cross of lilies, and it lay now upon Beth's tiny grave, filling all the evening air with fragrance. She greeted Jack with a quiet smile as he came to her, and, drawing her hand through his arm, led her away. They went slowly along the road where William had found Theodora gathering primroses in the spring. Now the hedgerows were a tangle of reddening blackberry brambles; and tall meadow-grasses, and daisies waving their white faces in the breeze, peeped at them, as they passed hand-in-hand, talking about the happy future which lay before them.



CHAPTER XVI.

THEODORA IS THANKFUL.

"A man's best fortune, or his worst, is his wife."—ANON.

MRS. HARDEN was in a great flutter—so much so as to be perfectly incapable, and Anne let it be plainly understood that for her part she wished her mistress would retire to the drawing-room and let her see to things; or that Mrs. John would come over from Raylington: she was of some use, Mrs. John was. And presently Mrs. John did arrive, perched up beside her husband in his high gig, and with a flutter of white muslin and ribbons she ran up the Clockwork steps, and knocked with both knocker and irreverent knuckles upon the Clockwork door, smiling over her shoulder at Jack as he drove off.

Peter opened the door with an affable smile of welcome, for Peter worshipped the ground covered by Mrs. John's dainty little foot. And Mrs. Harden rushed from the dining-room to embrace her, and Johnson relaxed into smiles as her gay young

"He was amused to find that his wife had carried her point."

laughter rang through the house, and the doctor appeared and kissed her before he went out on what he called his rounds. And, in a word, the coming of Mrs. John completely demoralised the house, as it always had done since the day that she became Mrs. John, and was in the habit of coming over from Raylington, to see them.

"They will be here at five, my dear," said Mrs. Harden. "I am putting out extra forks."

"Let us have tea in the garden," suggested Mrs. John, in the gaiety of her heart.

Anne stared and gasped a little at this revolutionary suggestion.

"It will be so nice and bridal out there, with the flowers all looking so bright, and the place as trim as Johnson always has it. And they will be so glad of the fresh air after their journey in the train, poor things."

"So much trouble," murmured Mrs. Harden, looking timorously at Anne.

"Not a scrap. Johnson can carry out a little table or two, and Peter can run backwards and forwards for anything we may chance to want; can't you, Peter?"

"Yes, miss, ma'am—Mrs. John, I mean," said Peter.

"I suppose if Mrs. John says a thing, it has got to be," said Anne; and that was as much approbation as could be expected of Anne on behalf of any project.

And when Jack arrived in the afternoon he was amused to find that his wife had carried her point, for she had laughingly confided to him her intention of having tea in the garden, and he had backed Anne's influence against hers. His mother was reclining comfortably in an arm-chair near the tea-table, with a pretty new cap Mrs. John had made, and a soft white shawl wrapped about her lest she should catch cold, Anne said severely. Theodora sat on a low seat near her, reading aloud, and all was evidently quite ready for the new-comers.

"Yes, Mr. Jack; tea in the garden," said Anne grimly. "I don't hold with such newfangled ideas."

"If Mrs. John is pleased, that is all that any of us live for," he said, with the utmost gravity.

Anne flounced away, but smiled broadly when out of sight. It amused her to observe Mr. Jack's adoration for Mrs. John.

"I may say adieu to my wife when her Aunt Florence comes to us next week," said Jack, throwing himself in a chair near his mother. "I expect to be cruelly neglected."

"Theodora would not neglect you, dear," said Mrs. Harden, who always took everything in an absolutely literal sense.

Jack shrugged his shoulders.

"I see there is no use in saying anything against Theodora in this house," he said.

"Anything against Theodora!" cried Dr. Harden, coming up at that moment. "I should hope so. Anyone who has anything to say against Theodora had better not come here, that's all!"

Theodora smiled up lovingly into his face.

"I should like my detractors to come to you, father," she said, laughing, "for they would never have the courage to speak against me again! However, it is only Jack who is grumbling at me this time, so it does not matter."

The year that had gone had not changed in one whit these four. But William had changed—William had done marvellously—and, above all, William had got married! And now they all rose in a body to welcome William and his bride, whom Peter was at this moment solemnly conducting forth from the house. William looked longer and more awkward and rawer-boned than ever as he advanced, arrayed in faultless attire, and his large hands pressed into bright yellow wash-leather gloves. It would not be William without a finishing touch of the kind. And poor Julia (for Julia Morley it was) clung to his arm, and blushed, and tried not to look too conscious of either her blushes or her wonderful lilac silk gown.

No one but Julia would don such attire for travelling, thought Theodora, looking at Jack for sympathy, but getting none; for Jack was so dense that he never knew what anyone had on but herself.

"It is a very hot afternoon," said William, with all his usual brilliant conversational powers.

Theodora, to whom he addressed the remark, was pouring out tea, much to Mrs. Harden's distress, who kept whispering, "The servants could do that, my dear."

Having made this effort, William relapsed into silence and sipped his tea.

Mrs. William took up the theme, not of the weather, indeed: she had a more original turn of mind.

"It is nice about Ronald and Polly!" she said, addressing Theodora. "I always knew he admired her, and now the engagement is announced."

"Yes. I am very pleased," said Theodora, with her pretty, gracious smile; "I shall like Major Morley for a brother-in-law."

"Polly is very young. Do you think, at eighteen, she can know her own mind?" inquired Julia, anxiously. "So few girls do."

"Theodora did," laughed Jack under his breath. Theodora flashed a reproving glance upon him, whereon he laughed the more. He sat down beside her, and said, in a low voice, "You had not a notion what you liked when you were eighteen, had you, Theo?"

"It was different," she said. "You are not Ronald Morley."

"Thank you," he said gravely. "I treasure any little word of praise from you; they are so infrequent."

"Do you remember, Mrs. Harden," said the bride, spreading out her silken skirts, "the party you gave last summer? Isn't it strange to think, of all the people who were there, how many are married now, or going to be: Mr. Holbrook—and Belle Casson—though I pity her with that dreadful old man; and they say he's very cross—and Theodora and Jack."

"I wasn't at the party," said Jack.

"No, but Theodora was; so it is all the same."

"Yes," he said humbly; "my identity is quite lost in hers. I acknowledge the fact."

"And me and William," she said, with a blush, but not I think, for her want of grammar.

"Dear me, it's quite interesting!" said Mrs. Harden, firmly convinced that all this marrying and giving in marriage had sprung from the fact of her having given a tea-party. "Theodora, my dear, we must have another tea-party this year."

"But all the parties in the world will not marry Selina Marks," said William, with such earnest conviction that they all laughed.

"She's not fit to look at Mrs. John," said Anne that evening in the kitchen. "And so I've bin telling you all along," she added vindictively, as if Peter and Johnson had been harassing her with contradictions.

"So I thinks likewise," said Johnson.

"You thinks!" said Anne. "You're a pusson to set up for thinking at this time of yer life. And you to have sot and daily looked at Master Jack goin' in and out in yon house, and never knowed 'im. Do you suppose he 'd have escaped me, if I'd bin home?"

"No, Anne, no," said Johnson soothingly.

"Mrs. John 's a bewty," said Peter grandly. "And I always said it."

Theodora and Jack drove home in the dusk. Since her stepfather's death she could not bear the idea of travelling over the line between Raylington and Hinkley, so Jack always drove her over when she wanted to visit his parents. Jack humoured her, Anne said, in all her whims; but indeed, Theodora was not whimsical. But it always seemed to Jack as if the utmost tenderness, the most chivalrous love, the doing of her will in all things great and small, could hardly make up to her for the long desolation and lovelessness in which her youth had passed over.

He thought with ruth of those years of long patience, unlit by hope or pleasure, and he esteemed it the privilege of his life that he had brought back laughter to her lips and happiness to her life.

"I think William and his wife will be very happy," she said, as they went swiftly over the white road in the gathering twilight.

"'Having known you to decline'—with apologies for misquoting," laughed Jack—"how a man who loved you, married Julia, beats me, as Anne elegantly says."

"A man is ever so much happier married to the woman that loves him, rather than to the woman he loves—if she does not love him," said Mrs. John sententiously.

"They are both perfectly satisfied with themselves and each other, and that I declare I believe is the true basis of happiness," her husband replied. "One is never happy if one is perpetually pervaded with a conviction of one's own shortcomings."

"Your father has given them the water-clock," said Theodora irrelevantly.

"Oh," laughed Jack. "William will like that. I was always so terribly afraid that he would offer it to us, and that you would refuse to live in the house with it."

"I shouldn't like it," she said. "But nothing could spoil a house, my Jack, where you are sure to come, and your laugh, and your footstep on the stairs. I often do not know how to be thankful enough, and glad enough, that, after all, I am a member of the Clockwork Family, as those naughty children used to say. You are so good to me, so tender of me. I wish you could look into my heart, and see how much I love you."

It was a lonely stretch of road, and as the horse walked uphill with the reins lying loose, Jack put his arm round his wife, and kissed her.

THE END.

THE HYMNS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

V.—THE HYMN OF THE REIGN OF GOD.

(Rev. xix. 6, 7.)

THIS hymn is sung after the destruction of Babylon. That name stands for the world's power consolidated and upheld in State and Empire; and in the scenes of the Apocalypse it represents the Rome of the first century. It is an awful picture of desolation and anguish. Death and mourning and famine brood over her; silence and darkness mantle her as if she were a stricken field of battle, and nothing is left of conquerors or conquered but masses of the dead. Like a Hinnom of the outcast, her smoke ascends for ever and ever—a spot of ruin, sin, and plague, in a world where hills are still alight with unfading suns, where trees are waving in leafy woods, and flowers are blooming in meadow and in dale.

It is a remarkable contrast; but still more remarkable is the moral contrast that immediately presents itself in the quenchless hope and faith of the Church. There is an aspiration always living towards—always trusting in—better things. It may be found in a few like Simeon and Anna when our Lord was born, or marshalled in battle-force like the army of the Maccabees. It is the remnant that not only shall be saved, but shall bring salvation. It is the eye that penetrates the encompassing cloud of the present, and sees above it eternal brightness and repose. Silence fell upon Babylon: these burst into speech and song.

They sang with no diffident breast. It was a great voice breaking forth into syllables distinct and strong. It is the conquest-hour of faith when it feels itself and knows that it can overcome worlds. It cries no longer for an increase to its volume, but it lifts the arm of its strength. It will pluck up rooted trees of ancient growth; it will bid away mountains that oppose its progress. It is more than enthusiasm; it is stronger than ambition. It has deeds to do, and by the Might that never turned back it will do them.

They sang of the Reign of God. At last the yearned-for result has been attained. The prayer of the centuries has been, "Thy Kingdom come." The task of the good in all of them was to subdue the manifold powers of evil. At times it seemed a hopeless task. At as many times, all good seemed to lie in desperate straits. Was it not so when Israel—tribes of unemancipated slaves—stood between the cliff, the sea, and the host of their pursuers? Or when Gideon with his three hundred rushed down the northern slopes at night against the multitudes of Oreb and Zeeb? Or when the long train of captives turned from the ruin of Jerusalem to that very Babylon that had become the image and picture of death? It was one of the earliest proofs of the divinity of Christ that His first message was of a Kingdom of Heaven at hand. Any coward can cry that a battle is lost; it needs a hero to determine that it shall be won.

And so this Great Voice is prophetic as well as historic. It sees what will be and must be; and it casts itself in front of the generation and proclaims that thus it actually is—"The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

I. It is the true interpretation of worldliness. The name of the world is applied in Scripture to two facts—one is transience, the other is godlessness. Because it is passing away, we are warned against loving the world: but we are told how transience may degenerate, and the feeling of insecurity infect the whole character, because "if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." This is a natural sequence; for the affection towards the trivial and passing destroys affection towards the great and abiding. It is a contradiction of our nature too; and any such contradiction, any continued violation of a natural law in the moral world, means weakness and disease. It seemed fit that Nero should claim the magnificence and splendour of Rome for a triumph; but it was yet more fit that he should die a miserable death. We cannot enjoy the meteor's gleam without expecting the succeeding gloom. The quicker the rush is through the heavens, the fiercer is the disruptive heat that scatters it into lightless dust.

What else could come to that great world-city of Babylon? Her delicious living and extravagance, her selfishness and impurity, could find in all the universe but one goal. Darkness fell upon her. It was no material darkness like that which suddenly wrapped the cities of Campania when life was at its fullest and pleasure laughed its merriest. But it was, and it is in all such existence, the darkness of mind and spirit when there is no light for us—direct or borrowed; when every star is blotted out and we are alone; when we grope the earth and do not find a Father or a God; when we call upon Truth and Good and receive no reply. For silence is the fellow-angel of darkness; angels of the scourge—death-angels both. There issues no sound from the cavernous world. Hushed are the voices of social happiness, of the gatherings of women and men; still as the grave the stroke of the arm of toil, and the burr of the wheels where industry works her wealth. Some of my readers may have stood at the top of one of the lofty passes in the Swiss mountains when the sun had set, and the quick darkness had fallen around; when, far above the flight of birds, and removed from the life of grass or flower or tree, he looks up to giants of rocky desolation above his head—mountains of unclothed, unbefriending stone—and feels about him only unutterable solitude and unutterable silence. They can understand then somewhat of the meaning of that silence of Babylon. Bid every London street be hushed at its noisiest hour, force every hurrying woman, man, and brute to stand like statues, and bate their breath; let the hard pavement echo no more the sound of wheel or foot; blow back to their furnaces the smoke of every chimney; paralyse every living thing and living hope; wipe out the sun and stars, and let each garish lamp be dark, and Babylon shall then be partly—and only partly—reproduced.

Nor can it be otherwise. For nations, for cities and for men, there is the one law unchangeable and irrevocable. The worldly mind, the fleshly, sensuous mind, is decay and death. Selfishness can only destroy self; luxury but ruin comfort, and passion but annihilate pleasure.

II. This hymn teaches us that Faith and Holiness are never alone. It was as the voice of a great multitude—a voice of thunder—a voice of many waters. There is much in this, as in every vision of the whole Book, to comfort and encourage. The young Christian thinks he stands sometimes absolutely by himself. In the counting-house, the school, the shop, he finds none to stand with him. There is not a voice to utter anything in harmony with what his heart most dearly loves. All have gone after their Baal, or made friends of Belial; and the danger is that he rolls himself within his own loneliness, and shrinking back becomes morbid and unhappy. But all the while others, under perhaps the colour of some worldly cant, are longing as he has longed. The same thoughts have filled their minds; the same fears have held their hearts. Had any of them the courage to speak out his own thoughts, had the voice been strong and his heart brave, he would instantly have won companions and friends. This is part of the meaning of Christ when He declares that if any man will confess Him upon earth, that man shall be confessed before the Father in Heaven. It is the holy law of the society of the good. It is the fundamental truth of the Church. It is the necessity in the very nature of things for man to be associated with man. It is the encouragement to all deeds of goodness, to all careers of duty and holiness. No one is alone; but everyone must begin his life as if he were alone. There is a multitude about him though he does not see or hear them: and the voice of all goes up together, "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

III. It shows us the nature of True Progress. The first step therein is the marriage of the Lamb. And that this may be possible, the Bride, which is His Church, makes herself ready. She is arrayed in garments fine and pure and white: and her fair vesture is the robe of righteousness. It is a portion of heaven's hymn that we shall rejoice and be glad because the Church is pure.

And look at the magnitude of the event thus pictured. The world has witnessed many stupendous deeds, big with their own vastness, but bigger with future fates. It was a mighty action of Constantine when he transferred the seat of empire from the ancient banks of the Tiber to the sunnier shores of the Golden Horn. Destiny was big when the light cavalry of the Ottoman swept down upon the plains of Asia Minor, leaving conquest in every charge behind it, and claiming the genius, wealth, and power of the West. But this marriage of the Church with her Lord is the greatest work and event since the Incarnation. It is the fulfilment of God's pledges and the answer of Christ's prayers. It is the final security of the Church. From henceforth she stands, not in the seclusion of an Eastern home, but revealed and evident before the eyes of the world. At present—this long present of many ages—the struggle is unceasing. It is a struggle for unity, for holiness, for celestial beauty. And the aspect of Church and world seems far off yet from even man's ideal. The Omnipotent doth not yet reign in all her thoughts. Men are not yet near to agreeing with one another. Knowledge is scanty, thought is confused, and the logic of action is often the conclusion of policy or of power. Worse still, there is in some quarters no desire for unity and peace. We are satisfied with low ideals however sweetly angels may sing, or however fervently the Master intercedes. Holiness, if assumed, becomes a mockery. A low morality is made to answer all our hopes: and, monstrous though its form may be, we trust it will produce the lovely shape, the bloom and grace of immortality. For beauty is one of Christ's attributes: and beauty must crown His Bride—the Church. The fairness of the lily, and the fragrance of the rose, the inter-blending and mixing of hill and valley in some lovely Midland scene; the uplifting of the slopes into grassy mountains, and crowning them with glistening peaks—all pale before the higher lustre of spiritual beauty, of true manhood and womanhood. It is true that > "There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,

> There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
> There is society where none intrudes—
> By the deep sea, and music in its roar."

But equally true is it that these lead us to the conclusion of a stronger yearning and a deeper love for our fellow-men. The hermit-philosopher of the Austrian mountain, far removed above human voices and the grasp of human hands, alone the whole dark winter amid deep snows—watching Nature in her wildest and grandest play—has told us how the days seem endless; the languor and solitude grow unbearable when November sweeps her mists across the mountain's breast, and December nights lay their long length from peak to peak in maddening silence. The final beauty of earth is the beauty of holy society; the mind and heart and soul of brothers shaped, refined, and strengthened after the pattern—the true hope of beatified humanity—which was "seen in the Mount."

There ensues then an interval, wide in extent and momentous in its events, until the final hymn breaks out which shall tell us its message from our lovelier Home, of a time and a condition when death shall be no more and every tear will be wiped from the eyes of men.

OUR WILFUL BOY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A MOTHER'S CONFIDENCES," ETC., ETC.

NEW-YEAR'S EVE again! How quickly the years fly! Our eldest is fifteen, and Harry, our youngest child, is seven already; surely it cannot be seventeen years since that evening when John brought me home from the Morrises' and on the way asked me to be his wife!

I suppose most mothers have some day in the year when they take stock of their children. This is my day for looking through my old journals; and the record is not altogether disheartening. There is, of course, very much that we might have done and have omitted. Faults have cropped up in later days that we did not suspect while the children were younger. But we have this comfort: the failings we did see, and set ourselves to mend, give us no more trouble. Even Effie has become a steady little soul who finishes. But Harry? It is curious how little record there is of him: just a mention now and then, but no more. Harry's first tooth, Harry's hair cut, Harry's knickerbockers—but Harry's most trying little self? Is it possible that I have not a word down about him? I hope this does not mean that I am getting lax. It is often said that the youngest child is spoilt because he is the youngest, because no baby comes to monopolise for the time the fondness of the parents; but I am not sure that that is the sole reason. The task of training children watchfully and carefully is no doubt an arduous one. Whilst we are in the swing of it we go on from day to day, hardly conscious of the strain; but, comes a time when there is no baby, and we unconsciously relax: the youngest child is not brought under the same steady discipline as his elders, and has every chance to grow up wilful.

"Wilful!" How odd that I should have hit on the very word that describes Harry! The little fellow is full of sweetness and loving ways, and it is only when a fracas arrives we are made aware of the fact that Harry's general good behaviour means no more than that, on the whole, the child is allowed to go his own way and do what is right in his own eyes.

Yesterday we had a terrible scene. Harry has been laid up with a bad cold for the past week, and has amused himself indoors happily enough; but the news that the pond would bear led to furbishing of skates and much excitement in the family. It was only as the rest set off that we found out how much Harry's mind was set upon going too. Poor little lad! no doubt it was a disappointment when a sudden blank denial came down between him and the joy he had been building on; and had I been alive to his small schemes, the child's min' should have been prepared. It is unnecessary to bring a child up suddenly face to face with a blank disappointment. But I thought Harry knew he was on the sick-list, until his busy preparations showed that he meant to be of the skating party.

"You can't go, Harry; why are you lacing your boots?" was followed by a moment of threatening silence, and then a display of passionate wilfulness which I am ashamed to write of. Surely it was a reproach to his parents. His terrific screams; struggles to free himself; lawless outcries—"I will go! You shan't keep me!"—filled me with dismay.

"'Why are you lacing your boots?'"

This was the first time I had been brought face to face with insubordination in any of the children. I quietly turned the key, bade Jane set him free—she was trying to hold him back—and, I think, cowed him a little with a steady gaze. For, truly, the child was like a mad creature—beyond rule and reason. It was more than an hour before the tempest subsided and we were both able to leave the dining-room where this trying scene took place.

I took Harry to my room, and so soon as I saw signs of softening, turned over the "picture Bible" he is so fond of till we came to the "Stilling of the Tempest."

> "But there are storms within > That heave the struggling breast with wilder din:"

Harry listened to the heart-subduing tale till where the maniac sat,

> "Clothed and in calmness at his Saviour's feet;"

The child was moved, melted, ashamed of his ungoverned rage. But, "Mother, I didn't want to be cross; I only want to skate!" made me feel that I was only dealing with effects and not with causes: the rage was bad enough, but the fact that the crossing of his will threw Harry so entirely off his balance, was the real mischief to be dealt with.

It all came upon me like a flash. A delicate infant, Harry had not been allowed to cry. We somehow seem to have forgotten, in Harry's case, the principles we carried out with the first, and with each of our other children. How well I remember that early struggle about putting baby to bed in the dark! But then we went to work rationally. We saw what was to be done, and took our measures accordingly.

Here was bewilderment added to the miserable sense of failure. The source of the mischief was the child's intense determination to have his own way. Of course we might set ourselves to break his will, but would that be altogether a good thing? A strong will is an excellent thing in a man—indeed, I believe it is the one secret of success in life; for is it not the poor souls of feeble will and no fixed purpose who go to the wall? In breaking the child's will for our immediate comfort, should we be ruining his prospects in life?

My head grew dizzy with the attempt to think out all the pros and cons of this question.

The fact is, I had nothing to go upon: I did not know what part the will plays in the child's nature, nor what the will is, nor how it should be trained. It is very odd that the necessity of dealing with the will of a child had not occurred to us before.

"You have opened up a very difficult question," said John, when I told him of my perplexities; "I am by no means sure that the last word has yet been said as to the functions of the will in man. But of this I am quite sure: we make a great mistake in confounding wilfulness, or self-will, with the action of a strong will."

"I don't quite see what you mean. Surely an unconquerable determination to do what he wishes, have what he desires, is what we mean when we say, 'So-and-so has a strong will'? And, if so, I cannot help thinking there is some risk in breaking the will of a child. You know what poor, characterless little souls the Feyntons are; and don't you think it's because their father is a tyrannical sort of man, with whom no one may have will or way but his own? Poor, much-enduring Mrs. Feynton is as spiritless as the children. No; I cannot think it is good for themselves or society that children should be brought up as mere nonentities!"

"Then Feynton is your example of a strong will—a man who does what he likes, and gets what he chooses—that is, his own way? If there is no choice, I'm at a loss to know whether I should prefer the children to grow up big or little Feyntons! But, don't you see, Annie, we have not touched the difficulty yet? Feynton, poor fellow, does not thrive, notwithstanding his strong will; masterful ways and an obstinate temper are not the qualities to win success; and, moreover, they are not to be confounded with strength of will."

"Then what does 'will' do for one? And do try to explain to me what 'will' is."

"I doubt if philosophers are agreed as to what 'will' is; and more, I am not sure that we can be divided into parts—heart and mind and will, and so on. These seem to me different ways in which the man—the thinking, feeling man—acts, or expresses himself. Skating, sewing, playing the piano, are trained and instructed ways of action; and, in like manner, we have need to be trained and instructed in the inward and spiritual exercises of thinking, willing, and loving."

"I'm afraid all this is beyond me; and I get no nearer to the point—what are we to do with Harry?"

"I am going too fast. You say that a strong will is the secret of success in life, and I agree: only I think I should rather say, 'the power of willing.' Now, compare the wilfulness or waywardness of a child like Harry, or a man like Feynton, with the qualities which have made Mr. Winter the successful man he is. Now, Mr. Winter, I believe, owes his success entirely to his strength of will. Notice the self-controlled set of his mouth, the thoughtful attention of his glance, and you will see what I mean. Give such a man a strong purpose, and desire will not draw, emotions stir, appetite drive him out of his course; he goes on steadily, and accomplishes his aim."

"A man without natural feelings! I do believe I should be better pleased that Harry should fail in life than grow up without a heart!"

"There you are wrong, my dear: the man of strong will is usually he of the deepest and tenderest affections. But we won't contend for that; he may be a bad man or he may be a good man—all I maintain is that for some end, good or bad, he has the power of keeping himself in order. Mind, not other people, and not his circumstances; it is over the unruly world within, alone, that will is called to be vicegerent; though, to be sure, in proportion as a man governs himself, he has the world at his feet. We should keep well in view that the functions of will are exercised within the bosom and not without."

"I am still at sea: you are going on a tack that I was not prepared for. Do you mean that 'will is another name for the power of self-control'?"

"Not exactly; you feel the risings of anger, resentment, greed. But you show no sign; you act and speak and look as if you were not boiling over with ugly feelings. That is self-control—good, so far as it goes; but will can do more for you. Will is able to avert the rise of the forbidden feeling or desire; then there is no need for self-control; you do not give way to it because it is not there."

"What a mighty potentate! But, indeed, you are reckoning without your host, as I know full well. I (that is, my will) say to myself, 'You are not to be cross, or worried, or whatever the wrong thing may be.' Myself takes no more notice than a wilful child, and I am just as cross or worried as if will had not put in his oar at all! Your theory will not hold water. My will has no power at all to make me do things."

"That is precisely the power that will should have, and if yours fails, why, it's because you don't set to work in the right way."

"What is the right way? I give my will a fair chance to make me behave myself, and it fails me utterly. 'T is a rotten staff and a broken reed!"

"No wonder, if you will exalt the poor thing to a high estate it was never meant to fill! Will is no mighty lord of the bosom; 't is no more than a wheedling, clever old nurse. You know how a nurse will pick up a screaming child, and carry it to the window to 'see the gee-gees.' There you have exactly the sort of help will can give. You can, by an effort of will, turn your thoughts from the thing you shouldn't think of to some other thing lawful and pleasant to think of: behold, the victory is gained — the forbidden thing no longer solicits, and you are able to go on steadily in the path you had marked out!"

"I am beginning to see! Suppose I am converting my blue cashmere into a new frock for Effie: it is a tiresome task because there are so many faded bits, and I bethink me that it is Mrs. Ellray's afternoon, and of her hot scones and good tea (don't be scandalised—am I very greedy?). Well, I get restless, and am on the point of going up to dress, when will comes to my aid! I turn away from Mrs. Ellray and her tea, and think of our coming holiday in Wales. Effie will want the blue frock (just the colour of her eyes). I see the children scrambling about in flowery nooks, my needle flies quick as the pleasant thoughts come; the frock begins to look pretty, I work away at it for its own sake; and, by-and-bye, I have done a good afternoon's work, the restless, dissatisfied feelings have gone, and I am able to appear with a cheerful countenance when his serene highness, my lawful lord, comes in to his tea. Now, have I got it? Is that the sort of thing you mean?"

"You have hit my meaning to a T! (Not a pun: don't protest!) That is exactly the function of the will. It will be a help to us, both in training the children and in what Sir John Lubbock calls 'taking pains with ourselves,' if we remember that the function of will is probably no more than that of turning our thoughts in the direction we mean them to take. That, and no more, can Will do for us, but that is enough to make us."

"I don't get much help about Harry. Poor little fellow! he does not mean his thoughts to take any direction; and I doubt if he have any power of turning them. And then, you see, you might not even mean good things, and what help would your will be in that case?"

"That 's just what I want to bring you to; we are no doubt born with the power of willing, as we are with that of swimming; but to be able to will, as to be able to swim, you must have training and practice. Away for ever with the notion that our poor little uncurbed Harry has 'a strong will,' forsooth! Don't let the danger of 'breaking his will' keep you awake for an hour, my dear! You can't break what is not there!"

"Don't be hard on the poor child! Well, what is this wilfulness of his if it is not will? 'I mu't hab it!' he would say before he could speak plainly, and to this day he 'mu't hab it!' Happy for us that his desires are not generally very unreasonable."

"Why, don't you see, he has no power of turning away his thoughts from the thing he desires, and the desire becomes uncontrollable, masterful. You don't want me to go over the whole ground again? It is desires, passions, that are strong in him, not will; the strength he shows is the strength of a madman, not of a reasonable, self-possessed soul. Verily, we are guilty concerning our child. But, please God, there is place yet for repentance. We must set ourselves to bring him through this moral disease just as earnestly and promptly as if he were down in a fever. I mean, we must cure him at once and have it over. To send the finest of our children into the world in a state of moral insanity is not to be thought of. I am only sorry, poor wifie, that the strain will fall most heavily on you."

"That is only fair, for the neglect has been mine. But really you must make very plain what is to be done. At present I am in a fog. One thing more: don't think me fanciful, but does it not seem to you that we are taking too much upon ourselves? Do you think anything but God's converting grace can deal with moral disease?"

"Indeed I do not; but I believe converting grace is as open to those who use the means of moral, as is God's life-giving energy to those who use the means of physical, health. We must not forget that asking and seeking are two things, not one. We shall not fail to ask that our little boy may be restored, and because we ask we must be the more diligent in seeking and using the means for his restoration."

"I see. Prescribe, please."

"Well, let us assume that the contrary of wilfulness is the power of willing. We want to give our child the power of willing, and of willing rightly. Men have been able to subdue all other passions and desires to the accomplishment of an object not necessarily good. A man will keep himself in order to make a fortune—even to avenge himself of his enemy. But we need not go back quite to the beginning; you have taken care that the child knows the happiness of duty as his service to God. Give him the power of willing, and he will will what is right. Also, the habit of attention, which we have taken pains to form in all the children, will come to our aid. Harry can keep his wits together and think of the thing in hand as well as most children of his age. What is more, he is of an age to help himself. Show him the way, and he will turn his thoughts from the forbidden thing. The sense of victory will delight him, and he will try again and again. At first we must be on the watch to give him the new thought; but, by-and-bye, as his will gains strength, he will help himself—will be on the watch to divert his thoughts into the appointed channels—will, day by day, be building a manful and Christian character, wise to form the purposes of a godly life, and blessed with strength of will to accomplish them. There, my dear, is the general outlook; but as for all the details of how and when, it is you who must teach me. Think it out; make all this talk practical; and then tell me what to do and what not to do. Only there is no time to be lost. This very day we must begin upon Harry."

"It's very awkward just now: we were going to begin house-cleaning next week: the house is like a pig-sty! But I suppose it must be put off for a month or two. I must have nothing else on my mind if I'm to do any good with Harry."

"Put it off, by all means!"

"No doubt you would like it put off for good! You men never know when a house is fit to be seen!"

I suppose we are growing lazy in our old age. In earlier days we should have thought nothing of putting off dinners for a week, if necessary, while we were bringing either of the children through what John used to call "moral measles!" But I was more put out than I like to own at the thought of having the house in a mess. However, what must be, must be, so I let the house go, and turned all my thoughts upon Harry, endeavouring to reduce my husband's suggestions to some practical outcome.

"Harry, I must speak to you about yesterday, because that sort of thing must never happen again! You understand me? Never again!"

A shamefaced, "I will be good, mother!"

"Of course you will try, and I will help you; so first we must find out what made you so naughty. You told me you did not want to be cross—why not?"

"Because it is naughty!"

"And why is it naughty?"

"Because it vexes mother, and—and—it vexes God." (This last in a whisper.)

"Quite right, dear; it is wicked in a child to displease his parents, and so to displease God. But we must find out how you came to behave so shamefully."

A hot flush warned me that the word cut.

"Poor Harry! 'Shamefully' is an ugly word, and mother wishes she could use another; but it is true. You behaved shamefully; tell me why."

"I wanted to skate, mother"—in a manner shamed, but not quite convinced.

"And you do not think it was wrong to want to skate?"

"Was it, mother?"

"Not until I said, 'You must not go.' To think about skating another minute after that, was wrong."

"But, mother, how could I help? I thought of all the boys and the ice, and the man putting on the skates, and—and—oh——"

Another outburst was imminent. I made hot haste, and broke in with—"How would you like to have a little garden of your very own this year?" An eager talk followed, which lasted fully a quarter of an hour.

"I see the children scrambling about in flowery nooks."—p. 902.

"But the skating?"

"Oh, I forgot all about it! I was thinking of the snowdrops and crocuses I should have; and, mother, don't you think I might have a button-hole of snowdrops ready for father's birthday if we set about it at once?"

"I daresay, dear; but I want to talk about the skating. You told me you couldn't help thinking about it all, and you were just going to begin another terrible hullaballoo. What hindered you?"

"I don't know. Oh, you put it all out of my head, mother, by talking about my garden. Can we go this afternoon for some seeds?"

"All in good time, Harry; but, first, I must have the skating settled. Attend to me, boy. The wrong thing was to go on thinking about it when I said 'No.' You say I put it all out of your head. Now, if you mean to be a man, and to please father and mother and our Father in heaven, you must learn to put things out of your head when you are not to have them or to do them. You must not go on wanting."

"But how can I help wanting things?"

"Think of something else, to be sure! You can't skate? Well, never mind. Out with your paint-box in a minute, before you have time to be naughty!"

"What good fun! I wish that I wanted something now, just to make myself think of something else!"

Thus we have made a beginning.

"Begin it, and the thing will be completed," says somebody; anyhow, we'll go on trying, though it may take weeks of watchful effort on our part; and I have much hope that Harry sees what we are at, and will be our best ally.

CHARLOTTE M. MASON.

THE MERITED PALM.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "ECCE VERITAS," "THE YOUNG MEN OF SCRIPTURE," ETC. ETC.

MORE than eighty years ago, the Nelson family adopted as their motto the words, "Palmam qui meruit ferat"—"Let him who hath earned it bear the palm." Then the illustrious Horatio Nelson, the greatest of British admirals, was at the zenith of earthly fame, and Lord Grenville, quoting from Dr. Jortin's "Ode to the Winds," said of Nelson, "Let him who hath earned it bear the palm." The suitability of the words was at once recognised, and they became henceforth the family motto. The passage by the author of the "Life of Erasmus" from which the words are selected, runs thus:—

> "O winds! breathe calmly o'er us and our foes!
> Let ship with ship alone contending close,
> And while the sea-gods watch above the fray,
> Let him who merits bear the palm away."

Certainly, if ever an admiral merited the palm of honour, Horatio Nelson did. Having been in action about a hundred and thirty times—having lost an eye and an arm in his country's service—having effectually silenced his nation's foes, and procured peace for his cherished friends—he justly earned his title, his pension, and his renown. It is a matter for regret that he was not spared to wear his well-deserved honours and wave his nobly won palm. But Southey's words rise to our minds: "The death of Nelson was felt in England as a public calamity; yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely whose work was done; nor ought he to be lamented who died so full of honours, and at the height of human fame."

It is not always that the bearer of the palm has earned it. There have been scions of noble houses who have stepped up to greatness in their teens because they could not help it. They were born amid splendour, influence, and wealth, and the law of primogeniture has invested them with immense possessions and widespread power. Some such, alas! have proved themselves wholly unworthy to bear the palm. They have dragged their robes of dignity through the mire of the world, and handed down to posterity a tarnished name. Others have carried the palm with so steady a hand and so beautiful a life, that men have grown to admire and esteem them as much as if the palm had been at first acquired by merit.

There have been others who have procured the palm by trickery, deceit, lying, and cruelty. They have risen to fame on the ruins of a brother's reputation, by the confiscation of a neighbour's property, and by the lamentable destruction of human life. "What millions died that Cæsar might be great!"

There have been others, again, who have obtained the palm by favouritism. Being known intimately by or related to some person in a position of authority, influence has been brought to bear on their behalf, and thus honour and wealth have been secured.

On the other hand, there have been scores of instances in which the man who has earned the palm has never obtained it. Ignorance, bigotry, selfishness, and fear have retarded the deserving man's progress, and the palm he should have received has fallen to the lot of another, or he himself has been neglected and ill-used. When Italy was disturbed by political factions, Dante toiled with unwearying zeal to unite the conflicting parties, but was doomed to the sorrows of an exile for many years as his reward. Columbus, the discoverer of America, was sent back to his native land in chains, which he preserved and ordered to be buried with him. He was neglected by the people whom he had so nobly served, died in poverty, and the honour of giving his name to the world he had discovered was denied him. Balboa was one of the first to open up the West Indies. He sent an account of his discovery to Spain. A governor was thereupon appointed, who, being jealous of Balboa, caused him to be beheaded. Bruno advocated the Copernican system, but was burned alive in Rome. Tycho Brahe, becoming the first astronomer of his age, "the first priest of the stars," shed a glory over his country, but men ignorant of all true science opposed him, and he was stripped of his honours and pension. Galileo, notwithstanding his advances in science, was compelled to yield to the all-crushing influence of ecclesiastical despotism. Sir Walter Raleigh, the celebrated English navigator and author, was, without evidence, condemned to thirteen years in the Tower of London, and subsequently beheaded. James Hargreaves discovered a method by which he could spin eight threads whilst one was being spun by the then prevalent system. To the instrument he gave the name "Jenny," and the "Spinning Jenny" is still known. An ignorant mob arose in opposition to him and his invention, broke up his machine, and drove Hargreaves from his native town to die in a workhouse. The man through whom England has amassed immense wealth passed away unrecompensed. Matthew Flinders, the discoverer of Australia, returning to England to make known the results of his investigations, was shipwrecked, taken prisoner by the French for six years, and his plans, charts, and log-books were taken from him. At the end of six years he regained his liberty, only to find that his discoveries had been appropriated by a Frenchman. Another bore the palm. Flinders was unrewarded whilst he lived, and his widow died in abject want. In 1861 Charles Pearson wrote to a friend saying that he had twenty years before introduced the plan to raise the Holborn valley, and centralise the railways by a grand trunk railway running through the valley of the Fleet. To make his scheme known, he plentifully scattered pamphlets, had plans and models constructed, but all in vain. He was opposed and scandalised. Now the plan has been adopted and executed by others, and all London applauds. He who earned the palm never received it.

Thus is it that hundreds of brave spirits have worked and waited, but have been so opposed or neglected, that they have felt a burden on their hearts as "heavy as the mass of Ætna on the breast of Enceladus." Their hopes have been dashed to the ground, their ambition has been disappointed, their hands have been weakened, and their hearts well-nigh broken. We understand how William Caldwell Roscoe could write that the—

> "Low rustling of the loved Apollian leaves
> With which my youthful hair was to be crowned > Grows dimmer in my ears!"

and how Christina Rossetti could sing pathetically of—

> "The dark hair changing to grey
> That had won neither laurel nor bay."

There is, alas! an unhappy tendency in humanity to be lethargic in recognising true worth. Many a real genius, many a true-hearted benefactor of his race, is left to face the difficulties and fight the foes of this cold world, without a smile of approval or a word of encouragement. There is an apparent indisposition to bestow the palm, however justly merited. Not until the man dies is his usefulness acknowledged. It is absolutely astounding to see what a difference death makes in the estimate society forms and expresses of men. There is no limit to the eulogistic language concerning a man of whom men were jealously silent whilst he lived. Why is not the palm accorded whilst he is struggling with care and disappointment? He would thereby be encouraged to further advances; and the Church and the world would be more fully served. Bulwer Lytton truly and beautifully writes: "I know not why we should delay our tokens of respect to those who deserve them until the heart that our sympathy could have gladdened has ceased to beat. As men cannot read the epitaphs inscribed upon the marble that covers them, so the tombs that we erect to virtue often only prove our repentance that we neglected it when with us." It is true there is joy in service, and strength derived from work, to the sincere worker. He finds reward in the task itself. Still, who shall say how much longer he might serve his generation if men ministered a little frank and friendly encouragement? We say—

> "If you have a friend worth loving,
> Love him. Yes; and let him know
> That you love him, ere life's evening
> Tinge his brow with sunset glow;
> Why should good words ne'er be said
> Of a friend till he is dead?

"If you hear a song that thrills you
Sung by any child of song,
Praise it. Do not let the singer
Wait deserved praises long:
Why should one who thrills your heart
Lack the joy you may impart?"

Notwithstanding that many bear a palm who have never earned it, and that many who have deserved the palm have never received it, yet do not forget, reader, that it is our duty to strive to merit a palm. That is the great business and blessedness of life—so to prosecute the duties before us, and so to reach forward toward perfection in all we do, that the cause of failure to win the palm may not be found in us. For this a well-formed resolution is needed. In the year 1814 a little company of German students in the University of Göttingen vowed to each other that they would effect something great in their lives. More or less they all kept their vow. One of the circle was Bunsen, and in his biography the incident is recorded. It is well to set our target in the skies, and with caution, blended with concentration, aim at it. It is well to determine, God helping us, to rise above our own low level into a rarer atmosphere. It is well to brace the loins of our mind for a steady and steadfast step in the great race of life.

But let us guard against the error of supposing that we can ever do anything to merit the palm of glory in the beatific world. When we have done all, we are unprofitable servants in God's sight. The future reward will be a gift. In Cork there is the following epitaph: "Edward Molloy, the friend of humanity, the father of the poor. He employed the wealth of this world only to procure the riches of the next; and leaving a balance of credit on the book of life, he made Heaven debtor to mercy." Nothing can be more unscriptural. There are no works of supererogation. Our good works certainly ought to prove the existence of a Divine life within our hearts, but they will not purchase or procure an eternal recompense. The multitude whom John, in his vision, saw clad in white robes, with palms in their hands, were indebted for both robe and palm to the finished work of Christ. Whilst we do our uttermost faithfully to serve God and man, let us at the same time base our hope of everlasting reward upon the fidelity, affection, and unchangeableness of the Infinite Saviour.

A little before he died, the great Church historian Neander said: "The Christian should ever remember that here all is fragmentary—nothing reaches completion; that even service in the cause of Christ on earth is but the beginning of an activity destined for eternity; that we must not, therefore, be so absorbed even in labours consecrated to God as to be unprepared to obey at any moment the summons to the higher life and service of Heaven." His own life and death are illustrative of his words. He was toiling at his Church History when seized with his fatal illness. Still he kept at his work by the aid of an amanuensis, who took down his words as he dictated them. As though a double meaning were in the query, he would frequently say to the writer—"Are you ready?" Having dictated long, he inquired the time. Being informed that it was "half-past nine," he remarked, "I am weary; I will go to sleep." Having been made comfortable on his bed by kind attendants, he said, "Good night!" and slept the sleep of the just, to awake at the call of the archangel's trump; but his happy spirit went upward to receive the palm. His preparation for "the higher life and service of Heaven" was derived from saving dependence upon the Lord Jesus. So let it be with us. Let us toil honestly and honourably to merit earthly palms, but let us trust implicitly to Christ for eternal glory.

"A MERRY HEART GOES ALL THE DAY."

A STORY IN ONE CHAPTER.

"AND I had pictured life in the country as something quite idyllic, Clare! Away from all the fret and worry of London: sunshine, and flowers, and nightingales, with just enough society to keep off dulness; county families—not very intellectual, of course, but sufficiently so to appreciate your father's undoubted genius, and the people looking up to him with a sort of affectionate idolatry! And the reality: grey skies or incessant rain, a smoky drawing-room chimney, not a single person of any consequence to welcome us; and, from all I can hear of the poor people, they are so frightfully independent that one might just lie down and be trampled on, and pretend to enjoy it! I won't speak of my privations. It has always been my lot to suffer; and when I married your father I renounced then and there all the gaiety and enjoyment that a girl in my position might have expected. But it is such a frightful prospect: all your social and artistic talent, Clare, and his eloquence wasted—thrown away—on a handful of labourers and farmers! And then that Mr. Owen, his successor, whom people make such a fuss about, should come down and see all our miseries! It is too provoking! But you and your father are so sanguine, no doubt you will say you prefer rain, and smoky chimneys, and universal stupidity!" And Mrs. Seymour threw herself back on her cushions with a sigh of utter weariness and impatience.

If that sigh found an echo in her daughter's heart, no trace of it could be discovered on her bright face. "I'm afraid it is dull for you, mother dear," she said; "and Mr. Owen will bring you all the news from town, and cheer you up. Don't worry about entertaining him; we will borrow Henry Bruton's macintosh and gaiters, and send him off with father to poke about the remains of that wonderful old British camp. Besides, it can't rain for ever. We shall have sunshine to-morrow; and I've heard of the most charming old pony, warranted not to go more than three miles an hour, and we'll drive all over the country—you and I—and hunt up those too-retiring nightingales. The pure country air will make you better in no time."

"Really, Clare," said her mother, "you are most terribly unsympathetic! Well in no time! After years of weakness and suffering, that is what one receives for constant patience and stoical endurance! You might have known what mistakes physicians make, even the most eminent; and yet no sooner does that ridiculous Dr. Steel say that I should be stronger and better for a country life than, hardly consulting me, your father throws away all his prospects, resigns his charge, and dooms me to this miserable banishment! Meanwhile he is pottering about 'early British camps,' which, most likely, are nothing more nor less than the remains of some forgotten sheepfold, as he will be obliged to confess before long; and you are more anxious to finish that wrap for a stupid, ungrateful old woman, than to unpick this piece of cross-stitch for your own mother. It has all come wrong!"

"Oh, I am so sorry!" exclaimed Clare penitently, throwing down her wool, and puckering her forehead as she took up that most aggravating form of needlework. "This wrap is for an old woman of exactly my age, with bronchitis and four children."

"Foolish creature to marry so early!" put in Mrs. Seymour. "One can't pity afflictions which people bring on themselves."

"Such a nice young thing!" continued Clare. "I had the greatest trouble to get her to admit she wanted any help, and had to explain what an immense advantage it would be to that overgrown girl of Mrs. Higgins's to learn a little housework; so at last I have arranged that she is to go for a week. Positively, the poor woman was at the wash-tub, coughing frightfully all the time. I should have been tucked up in bed, with jellies and beef-tea, if I had been half as ill. The ex-baby is a picture—I must borrow him next week: such curls and dimpled little arms!"

"I do hope you will keep all those dirty children strictly in your studio, then, Clare. If only you could copy in the National Gallery again!" A pause. "Your father has not the least compunction in leaving me alone the entire afternoon, though he knows I have been shut up in this prison nearly four days!"

"But the poor man was dying, they sent word, mother."

"Well, then, it was natural for his family to wish to have the last few hours with him; at any rate, he needn't have stayed so long," returned Mrs. Seymour peevishly.

"There he is at the garden gate!" cried Clare, running to open the door.

In another minute her father entered—a tall, white-haired man, with clear brown eyes and a smile of wonderful sweetness; the patient lines round the mouth could have told the tale of a life-sorrow.

He went straight to his wife's couch. "How are you now, my love?" he asked, tenderly stroking her thin hand.

"Oh, perfectly numb, after yesterday's neuralgia! Could I be better in such an atmosphere?"

"Is poor Williams still living, father?" said Clare.

"Yes, dear, and wonderfully revived."

"There! of course!" exclaimed Mrs. Seymour, in a tone of annoyance; "and you had your walk for nothing!"

"No, no, my dear," remonstrated her husband mildly. "Mrs. Williams thought it was not necessary for me to see him, though I should have liked to say a few words. I must call again in a day or two. They do not know me yet, and cannot feel quite at ease with a stranger. But I went on to the town, Amabel, and have brought the book you wanted so badly." Mr. Seymour smiled back an answer to the loving thanks in his daughter's eyes as the new volume was eagerly seized.

"Just give me the paper-knife, Clare," said Mrs. Seymour, "and then you can go with your father and meet Mr. Owen, for I believe you do really find some enjoyment in tramping about those miry lanes."

"Isn't the air washed and delicious, father!" said Clare, gaily slipping one hand in his arm as they walked briskly down the hill. "Look, there's blue sky! no waterproof or umbrella for me! Mr. Owen will have fine weather for his visit, after all: and I had been longing to see him in a deer-stalker hat and gaiters! I wonder why he has come down here—to ask your advice about Church matters, I suppose? Will it be painful, dear, to hear about the schools, and the crowded galleries, and flourishing mothers' meetings that he mentioned in his letter?" she asked, with momentary gravity.

"No, no, I think not, Clare," replied Mr. Seymour. "In fact, it will be refreshing to learn how the work is prospering; not," he added hastily, "that I regret for a moment the step I have taken."

"Why, of course you don't, father. When everybody is mourning over the enormously increasing population of London, we are public benefactors to go away and make room for other people."

"And then there seems to be a fascination in city life that one ought to be able to resist," he continued thoughtfully. "I have often wished to enter with fuller sympathy into the trials of my ministerial brethren in the rural districts."

"And I am sure we shall soon understand the people; there is something very taking in their hearty, outspoken ways; I love the north countree," said Clare, with a pretty blush. "Just look at those magnificent masses of cloud rolling away in the west; what a flood of sunshine! It makes me feel amiably disposed even to John Owen!"

"My dear, you hardly do the young man justice—he has talent, is a thoroughly good man,"

"Has an excellent opinion of himself, and thinks he knows more of life and human nature at eight-and-twenty than you do at eight-and-fifty! I have no patience with him!"

"I am sadly behind the times, Clare," said her father, smiling, "and my daughter does not look through impartial spectacles. Why, there is the fly from the station, and Mr. Owen, surely; I did not think we were so late," he said, signing to the driver to stop, and warmly shaking the hand of a sallow, dark young man, whose short-sighted eyes had already complacently taken in the fact of Clare's appearance with her father. "Let your portmanteau be taken on, and walk home with us!"

"With pleasure, my dear sir," said Mr. Owen. "Miss Seymour, I need not ask if you are well."

"Thank you; much as usual," replied Clare. "But I'm shocked that you should find the two and a half miles from the station too long a walk for you—a close carriage in May!"

"You are very kind," replied Mr. Owen. "With this delicacy of throat, I feel obliged to take every precaution. The air is so keen here: very bracing, no doubt, as you say—it certainly agrees with you, Miss Seymour!"

"Almost everything does," she replied, with a slight emphasis.

"This seems to be a charming retreat, Mr. Seymour, far removed from bustle and toil, where one can peacefully dream the days away, perhaps hardly missing, at last, the intellectual friction of town."

"I have to visit a young woman here, so must say good-bye; you have so much to ask my father's advice upon, Mr. Owen. How we have pitied you, coming from your former small charge to such heavy responsibilities."

"You are very good and thoughtful, Miss Seymour," said the infatuated young man, pleasure gleaming through his eyeglasses. Mr. Seymour could not keep back a smile as he met his daughter's alarmed glance.

"Miss Seymour is indefatigable as ever in district work," she heard him remark, as she stood at the cottage door, and would willingly have lingered to discuss Mrs. Jones' "brown kitus" and Martha Higgins' breakages, but for the warning remembrance of the awful consequences that would ensue if Mary Ann were trusted with the sole management of preparations for high tea. So she hurried home, finding time, woman-like, to put on her new spring dress, and to fasten some cowslips carefully in the waistband, while she murmured, "John Owen is more insufferable than ever."

She went down to the pretty drawing-room, where the fire was now behaving admirably. Mrs. Seymour was looking almost animated as she listened to talk of people and things which two months ago she would have branded as gossip; Mr. Owen's softly modulated tones were really soothing and pleasant.

"My love," said Mr. Seymour, "I met Henry Bruton this afternoon, and asked him to join us; Mr. Owen must not suppose we have no society."

"How very tiresome!" interrupted his wife. "He is the personification of rude health and animal spirits, Mr. Owen, with a loud voice and north-country accent that jar one's nerves frightfully. So unsympathetic, too! You would hardly believe that he actually recommended me to walk a mile or two before breakfast! He tramps about with Mr. Seymour, hunting for British camps——"

"My dear," said her husband, slightly nettled for once, "you did not let me finish my sentence. Henry is not able to come this evening. You must admit that he has been most kind and attentive, and I could not bear that we should seem to slight the son of the dearest friend of my college days."

"Tea is ready now, father darling," said Clare, giving his arm an affectionate hug as they passed through the little hall.

"I must have seen Mr. Bruton at the station, I think," remarked Mr. Owen, as he placed a footstool for Mrs. Seymour and arranged the fire-screen at its proper angle—"a florid north-country giant, with a fist like a sledge-hammer—good-natured enough, I daresay; he offered me a drive in his dog-cart when he heard me inquiring the way to your house."

"You may be thankful you did not accept his offer, then," said Mrs. Seymour. "He is breaking in a young horse, and it is positively dangerous: I have forbidden Clare to drive with him."

"You are quite right," said Mr. Owen, with such an air of sincere conviction that Clare broke into a merry laugh.

Next morning, the weather being delightfully fine, Mr. Seymour proposed showing his guest the beauties of the neighbourhood, but Mr. Owen declined, on the plea that he had several letters to write for the morning post. Clare was in and out of the house, bringing a breath of the spring with her as she arranged velvet auriculas, great bunches of polyanthus blossoms, and wild hyacinths, humming snatches of "Barbara Allen."

The young minister evidently found such interruptions very distracting, and it was wonderful that those important letters were ever finished, but I suppose they must have been, for when all the china pots and jars were filled, Clare placed some lovely cowslips by his elbow, saying, "Here is a subject for next Sunday's sermon, Mr. Owen;" adding, "I am off to the farm for new-laid eggs, so good-morning." John Owen, starting up, said he would walk with her, and post them in the village.

Mrs. Seymour seconded the suggestion so cordially that there was no escape, and naughty Clare inwardly determined to make their route lead them over some specially slippery stepping-stones and up a very breathless hillside.

So Mr. Owen had to carry on his share of the conversation in a very panting and staccato style. "Isn't the country glorious!" exclaimed Clare, as they at last found themselves on the crest of the hill, looking down on the wooded slope, with its delicate tints of brown and faintest green, the silver river shining beyond, and a thrush in the copse filling the air with a perfect ecstasy of song.

"Most charming indeed," was the reply, with just that touch of conventionality in the tone which brought Clare back to commonplace life in a moment.

"Shall we sit down on this timber—I don't think it is damp—and enjoy it thoroughly? You must be aware, Miss Seymour," he went on, with the slightest air of embarrassment, "why I have undertaken this journey to the north at a time when it is really seriously inconvenient to me to be absent from town,

"But, indeed, you must not exaggerate the cares of a minister's life; on the contrary, I have found my career thus far singularly free from perplexity——"

"Did you ever hear of my father's magnificent sermon on spiritual lethargy?" asked Clare, with "'No waterproof or umbrella for me!'"—p. 907.

with pressing engagements, meetings to arrange—but I need not tell you what a London minister's life in May is!"

"No, indeed," said Clare demurely; "and I am sure we thoroughly understand and appreciate your motive, and if it had not been for those tiresome letters, you could at this identical moment have been talking over all your worries and anxieties with my dear father, who always sees a clear way out of difficulties when no one else can find even a knot-hole."

heightened colour. But Mr. Owen apparently did not notice this remark.

"The difficulties I experience, Miss Seymour, rise out of the fact that without the help of a cultivated and really intellectual woman a minister's work must be terribly maimed and one-sided. I am, perhaps constitutionally, too much given to analysis and introspection, and constant intercourse with a cheerful, sympathising spirit like yours would be life and energy to me, whilst my work would be infinitely benefited, I know. It has pained me inexpressibly to think how starved and arid your intellectual life must be here, and the constant fret and worry of your home must, in time, deaden all your natural brightness. Clare, will you be my wife and share my joys and sorrows—my triumphs too? for, without vulgar boasting, I feel that I have some talent, and a latent power which only your influence could fully develop."

Clare had taken off her hat, and the west wind was blowing the soft curls from her forehead. She turned to him now, a fine scorn looking out from her clear brown eyes.

"I suppose I should feel greatly honoured by your proposal," she said quietly. "But surely, with all your abstruse studies and knowledge of the world, you must occasionally have come across the fact that when a woman is asked to entrust her heart and life to his keeping, she expects—very absurdly, of course—to hear something, from the man who asks that very small sacrifice, of what is, after all, the great motive power of life. You have left love entirely out of the question, Mr. Owen; and already having that, I find, instead of being starved and arid, as you fancy, my life is brimming over with happiness and hope! I must decline, with thanks, your very kind offer;" and she was rising, with a haughty bow.

But Mr. Owen caught her hand with a sudden earnestness which almost frightened her.

"And why did I not speak of love, Clare?" he whispered, with suppressed passion. "Because I dared not! You think I do not love you, when I hunger to touch your hand, to breathe the very air that has kissed your cheeks!—when you have filled my heart and life until I can think and dream of nothing else, and the work to which I have vowed that life and energy seems futile without you! I have fought and struggled—how fiercely no earthly being will ever know!—and now, Clare, you tell me that I have left love out of the question! It is cruel—unutterably cruel!" and he put his face in his hands and groaned aloud.

There was a long silence. At last Clare said quietly, "Forgive me—I did not know."

"And you will give me some hope?" he exclaimed, looking up at her with a desperate eagerness.

"I promised, two months ago, to be Henry Bruton's wife," she answered simply. "But if it had not been so, I could never have made you happy—could never have shared your social ambitions. I hope, dear Mr. Owen," she faltered, using the cruel form of parting words which a kind-hearted woman so often makes use of, "I hope you may soon meet one who is worthy of you, and can return your affection."

He laughed bitterly.

"Don't—please don't! what have I said? Oh, how could I tell you ever cared for me?" she cried piteously, the hot tears on her cheek. "I cannot bear to think I have made anyone so unhappy."

But Mr. Owen had regained his self-control.

"Forgive me, dear, and forget it all! I see it is impossible; it would have been too great a happiness for me; and my love might easily have become idolatry. You have nothing to blame yourself for—but your name," with a sad smile. "'Is not Clare for love excuse enough'?"

* * * * * *

Three years have passed away; Clare is a happy wife and mother, sunshine in her heart and home. John Owen still has the charge of a large and increasing church, and has thrown himself with such energy into the work that many a fair member of his congregation has feared that dear Mr. Owen was wearing himself out, and would gladly have cheered his solitary hearth. But, with a little secret pride in his own constancy, he had set Cupid's best-aimed shafts at defiance, his heart being securely guarded, as he thought, by certain faded cowslip blossoms.

But who can withstand his destiny? and John Owen's has come to him in the form of a sweet, attractive girl, who believes him to be perfect—I mean, has that full appreciation of his talent and power in which Clare Seymour had been so sadly wanting. She is not intellectual, does "not understand, but loves," and will make him a most tender and devoted wife.

The "decayed vegetables," in fact, with other rubbish, were emptied from his desk by Isabel Owen the other evening, she having a sudden attack of tidiness, not curiosity. "Botanical specimens, I suppose, John dear?" was her remark, as the withered things fluttered down into the grate. "You don't want to save them, do you?"

Mr. Seymour, like the rest of us, has had his trials. His wife's malign prophecy has been fulfilled, and the beloved early British camp has been proved to be a delusion and a mockery. But kind nature's compensation is curly-haired little Seymour Bruton, in whose extraordinary intellectual promise his grandfather finds an ever-increasing source of interest and astonishment. Mrs. Seymour has developed an entirely new malady, which has received an unpronounceable name of several syllables from a celebrated leading physician, and in discussing and noting down its varying and minute symptoms her time is fully and most pleasantly occupied.

"TAKE HOLD OF MY STRENGTH."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

HICH of you, clasping the hand of the child that you love, leading it home in the eventide darkness, or across some stony way, would let go that feeble hand, so that the little thing came to harm in unaided loneliness? Not one of us would forsake the little life that trusted to our guidance; our utmost power would be at the child's disposal, to bear it safely home.

It may be that to you life's path is rough and hard just now; the skies may be darkened, the track perplexing. Yet never dream the hand of your God and Father has ceased to guide you. He holds you all the more closely because the road is dark. There is no shadow, no stone of difficulty in the way, that is not known and understood by your Lord, and His gentle bidding comes to you in your helplessness and bewilderment: "Take hold of My strength."

"I felt a different creature when I had talked it over with my friend," said one whose circumstances seemed all in a tangle, but who suddenly remembered one living near her who was willing and able to unravel the tangle. Lying awake in the silence of the night, she made the decision, "I will go to that friend," and she came away cheered and hopeful. But what is the cheer that earthly sympathy can give compared to the sense of support and aid and comfort imparted by Him Who bids us take hold of His strength by prayer? Lying before His mercy-seat in humble faith, spread the tangle out before the Strong One, the Counsellor, to Whom belong the cattle upon a thousand hills, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom. You know not how to act, how to decide, amid your perplexity. Lay hold of His strength as you pour out your heart before Him; He will give you the power you need for the wise and right decision.

Do you need strength for endurance, for patience, to repress the sense of murmuring, and keep the light of trust in triumphant glow? Lay hold of His strength Who, in supreme love, wore the thorn-regalia, Who was led as a lamb to the slaughter, yet He opened not His mouth; Who knelt in Gethsemane's olive-shade and prayed, "Thy will be done." Whether you need power to do or to bear, take hold of the strength of Christ, the Rock of His people's hearts, the Strong Tower whereto we may continually resort, the Deliverer, the Captain of salvation, the Friend that loveth at all times.

The strength available for you this day, and in every moment of your need, is changeless, eternal, gentle, inexhaustible. Your life has been a record of change, and the strength of past days has waned to infirmity; but the Master is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever—just as strong as when He stilled the tempest, just as mighty as when He overcame the darkness of death and led captivity captive. Many an Ebenezer of help arises in your life-history; think not you have reached a crisis too hard, too crooked, for Divine strength to avail. Is anything too hard for the Lord?

"He lives! He lives!" were the words Luther's fingers traced on the table at a time of perplexity and fear. He lives! and to Him even now you may commit your cause, and, in your weakness, take hold of His unchanging strength.

Power without tenderness is the power of a tyrant; the strength you may clasp, however ignorant, poor, friendless, or infirm, is the strength of the Father—yea, of the mother—for in the Lord your God meet mercies and compassions beyond those of earth's gentlest parent. The arms that pillow your weakness are the arms that rule the earthquake, the ocean, and the storm; yet they are the arms that blessed little children, and were stretched out in blessing to His flock as He passed to His sovereign throne. Even should your infirmity prove a weariness to your nearest and dearest (though, could you read their hearts, you would understand it is far otherwise), the strength of the Master's loving-kindness remaineth, and His ear is never deaf, His power is never limited, like the power of human pity. The strength of God flows out towards you through the channels of His love. Nothing can separate you from this love, stronger than death, triumphant, unspeakable, invincible. Remember this day "the great love wherewith He hath loved us," and thus take hold of strength sufficient for your need, strength whereby you can do all things, bear all things, endure to the end, through Christ which strengtheneth you.

All earthly supplies fail sooner or later; the strength you have in the Lord is inexhaustible, and you will prove more of its fulness, even as you learn more and more your own frailty and helplessness.

"God is an unchanging Rock," said John Brown of Haddington when laid low upon a bed of weakness. Suffering and exhausted, he could yet say, with a smile, "The Lord is my strength and my song, He also is become my salvation." May we take hold likewise of that strength which is changeless, faithful, divine, eternal; then our last thought, like John Brown's, will be one of tender and availing comfort even through the valley of the shadow—"My Christ!"

"THE LUXURY OF WOE" IN CHINA.

A CHINESE BUDDHIST PRIEST.

THE deceased lady was the wife of an official, and in her lifetime had often visited a Christian lady residing near her, but while admiring the pretty European house and furniture, the lady's conversation about her God and Saviour seemed to have no influence on the T'ai-t'ai. Early one cold morning her foreign friend heard the sad wailing and sobbing which always accompanies Chinese mourning. On calling, she found the two young daughters and a daughter-in-law of the family sitting on the ground and wailing most piteously. Their embroidered silk robes were replaced by the coarsest white cotton garments, the borders of which were not even hemmed, and the usually elaborately dressed black hair was streaming in wild confusion over their shoulders. The wailing was continued early in the morning for some forty days, with an occasional few days' intermission. During this time the coffin, which in China is of very heavy wood and hermetically sealed, was kept in the house, and at vast expense constant relays of Buddhist and Taoist priests held various services for the dead. A few of these services Mrs. Grey was invited to see; and hoping to drop some words of truth and comfort, she accepted the invitations. On the first occasion she found a life-size sketch of the dead lady in coloured chalks on the floor. Round this a priest was pouring a little stream of rice, which a second priest following him deftly worked out with his fingers into a framework of vine-leaves and grapes. This completed, the priests formed in procession, and with monotonous chants and sounding of cymbals and gongs, moved in a kind of slow dance round and round the figure, crossing and re-crossing the rice pattern with their long flowing robes, and yet in some mysterious fashion never disarranging it. Between the times of wailing and the priests' services, the three young girls were busy embroidering silk and satin shoes in their mother's favourite patterns, and having them made up according to the size she used to wear. The second time Mrs. Grey was summoned this was explained to her. She was conducted to a large, handsome-looking house, made of bamboo and paper, but painted and coloured to look exactly like a real dwelling, standing in an open space some distance from the home of the family. The coffin, after a long processional journey, was also there. The sedan-chairs of the lady mourners halted as Mrs. Grey arrived, and on being opened discovered the three girls, pale and worn with long wailing, clad in coarse white cotton garments and shoes, and with sackcloth veils covering their heads. According to Chinese custom, they did not move themselves, but were roughly dragged by servants from their chairs and along the stony ground to the coffin, before which they prostrated themselves. Mrs. Grey was now invited to enter the house, as the relatives would be the last to inspect it, and no one else would then be allowed to enter. To her surprise, she found the structure consisted of nine rooms, each large enough to contain six persons comfortably. Loving thought had evidently been bestowed upon it, for in the guest-hall was a capital imitation of Mrs. Grey's own drawing-room grate, which had been a special object of admiration to the T'ai-t'ai. Chinese chairs and tables and excellent effigies of men and women servants were also there; then came the bedroom, with wardrobe and appropriate furnishings, the former containing numbers of costly silk and satin dresses and the embroidered shoes. In ordinary cases the clothes and shoes are also made of paper, but it is understood that the better the materials used on earth in these ceremonies the better will be the spiritual counterparts in the other world. Next came the box-room, containing piles of imitation Chinese trunks full of paper money, clothes, pu-kais (a kind of wadded quilt, often covered with silk), and many other necessary articles; outside this was the kitchen, with a Chinese cooking range and all its accompanying pots and pans, among which was a foreign lamp and bottle of kerosene, all most ingenious imitations of the real things. After all the invited guests had left the house, the mourners entered, carefully inspected and rearranged everything in the different rooms, and then closed the doors and withdrew to a short distance. The priests now formed in procession, and having, amid the firing of crackers, set fire to the house, marched round and round it as the flames burnt it up, chanting and beating their gongs. One of them sprinkled something on the fire from a bowl held in his hand, and Mrs. Grey asked one of the gentlemen of the family to tell her what it was and explain the meaning. He replied briefly, "Fairy water," and turned away. Not satisfied, she appealed to a younger member of the family who had already manifested interest in the foreigner's religion; he explained at once, as fully as he knew himself, that it was the blood of a cock, and that its being sprinkled on the burning house in some way helped to transform it into a spirit-land habitation for the departed one! So fully is it believed that the wants of the dead are thus supplied, that relatives will take advantage of an occasion such as the one just described to send boxes to their own friends. The one for whose special benefit the burning is taking place is supposed to pass on these boxes to their owners. In the sprinkling of the blood, can there be some vague notion of the need of a sacrifice? After the house and its contents had been consumed, the coffin was deposited in a temple near by. Not yet would the rapacious priests allow "the hope of their gains" to go, and so the coffin must remain unburied for another year, or even years, with periodical expensive ceremonies performed, before a lucky site could be fixed upon for burial.

Truly in this present life "Godliness would be profitable" to these poor people, to say nothing of the comfort and joy of a "sure and certain hope" for the future. Let us think for a moment of our own "walking in the light" compared with their stumbling in darkness, and surely the contrast will lead us to pray earnestly that on them, too, the Sun of Righteousness may rise with healing in His wings.

THE ANGEL IN MID-HEAVEN.

(PREACHED IN BEHALF OF A UNIVERSITY MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.)

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."—Rev. xiv. 6.

NO one will question the assertion that of all books of Sacred Scripture, on that of the Revelation of St. John, the book of sealed but magnificent mysteries, it is the height of presumption to dogmatise. Yet we only follow the footsteps of many cautious and reliable expositors when we identify the beautiful description and vision we have now read with the era of the Reformation and its momentous results. Even if we were less satisfied with the grounds of such a reference than we are, the suggestive passage might readily be accommodated to the theme and the object of our present meeting.

In a previous chapter we have a vivid picture of a mighty angel, typifying the Lord Jesus Christ, the great Angel of the Covenant, coming down from heaven clothed with a cloud and a rainbow. He has in his hand an open book. It is an unclosed Bible, Heaven's best boon to apostate Christendom. In the verses immediately preceding our text there is a striking delineation of a different kind. A lamb is seen on Mount Sion, surrounded with 144,000 with harps in their hands and a new song on their lips. It is the Church of the living God, with their living Head in the midst of them—no longer witnessing in darkness and sackcloth, but openly, in the face of the world, exulting in the glorious liberty wherewith Christ makes His people free. But what then? Are these handful of representatives, these 144,000—a number we may take to be indicative of the smallness of the true Church at that particular age—to appropriate to themselves all the sweets of that freedom and the preciousness of that new anthem? No. Other harps are to be awoke; other voices in far-distant climes are invited to swell the chorus. That "new song," the first note of which, if our suggested interpretation be allowed, was chanted by a poor monk, is to awake the echoes of the world. For John's attention is immediately arrested by a new and more startling figuration. Another divine messenger is seen, with the same opened book in his hand, high in mid-heaven (as if he had been delegated by the Covenant Angel), speeding onwards with this charter of freedom to distant nations. Brethren, let us seek, in preaching for a Missionary Association and a missionary object, to track his stupendous flight, viewed in connection with the great ecclesiastical movements and impulses of this busy century, now fast waning.

I would desire, then, with the blessing of God, to direct your attention to these three particulars brought before us in this verse:—

I. The revival of a missionary spirit in the Church of Christ.—"I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven."

II. The instrumentality employed.—"Having the everlasting Gospel."

III. The object and extent of His commission.—"To preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."

I. We have described the revival of a missionary spirit in the Church of Christ. We say a revival, for that spirit not only formed a necessary element all throughout the New Dispensation, but it had its recognised place and potency in the Old. How many of the prophets of Judah and Israel, in varied words and imagery, exulted in the prospect of times when the exclusive privileges of the covenant-land would cease; when nations sitting in darkness would see the great Light! How often in the Psalms do we find the same aspirations! The sweetest strains of the minstrel monarch of Israel are missionary odes. What was his very last, when his head was whitened with years, and the corruptible crown was fading from his brow? What the last cadence, ere the golden harp often attuned on earth is to be exchanged for the nobler harp of the skies? It was a missionary note. The farewell vision which awoke that melody was the very vision of the text. The undimmed eye of faith saw far down the vista of ages the Angel flying through the midst of heaven with the tidings of salvation to perishing nations. "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before Him, and His enemies shall lick the dust." It is enough; His task is done! "Blessed be His glorious Name for ever and ever, and let the whole earth be filled with His glory." And then, and not till then, he adds, "Amen and Amen; the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended."

It was the apostolic age, however, which was the era for the grand development of missionary zeal. Scarce had the gates of glory closed on their ascended Lord when the disciples set out on the task which had been confided to them, and manfully did they fulfil their great commission: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

But was missionary ardour to expire with the primitive era in the Church of Christ? a solitary and transient outburst of enthusiasm, when Peter and John crossed the borders of Palestine for the regions of Asia Minor and the distant lands of the dispersion; or when Paul braved the surges of the Adriatic and confronted the merchant princes of Corinth, the philosophers of Athens, and the captains of Imperial Rome? True, for the space of 1,400 years, with some memorable exceptions, specially in the sixth and again in the eleventh and twelfth centuries,* the missionary harp was muffled; while, in other cases, efforts made by the purer representatives of Gospel times and Gospel truth, Bigotry frowned on and Tyranny suppressed. The Reformation dawned, but did there come along with it, as we might have expected, all at once the resuscitation of this missionary spirit? No, alas! Even then, in that first hour of her emancipation, the Church seems to have been forgetful of her responsibilities. Supine after the first flush of victory, she laid aside her weapons for fresh conquests, and rather sought to repose on the laurels she had won.

The set time, however, duly came for God fulfilling His own irrevocable decree—"Ask of Me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The occasion had arrived, as marked in the roll of prophecy, when Zion was to awake, like a giant refreshed, to a sense of obligation to those beyond her pale. And what is the time her great Head selects for the fresh outburst of this expansive force? The Church's walls have always been built, and now her outposts are again to be reared, in portentous and troublous times. Europe was heaving to its core. The shock of the first French Revolution had just been felt; thrones were tottering; empires were dismembered; old dynasties crumbled; and withal, in that tremendous crash, there was the threatened disownment and dethronement of the God of nations. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" He did now as oftentimes before; He made the season of darkness and peril the season of awakening. The enemy was coming in like a flood, but the Spirit of Grace put it into the hearts of not a few to lift up a standard to resist him. Christians in our own favoured land were the first to unfurl the banner, naturally beginning with the outcast and benighted—"the heathen at home"—but ready, too, to carry that standard far and wide, and to inscribe on it, "The field is the world." While Europe, like a midnight ocean, was rocking itself asleep in the gloom of spiritual death, all at once this rising sun of missionary enterprise shoots above the murky horizon, bursting on the crests of a thousand waves and illuminating them with living gold! Beautiful figure surely to depict all this, is that employed in the words of the text.

In the following chapter we have what we may assume to be a contemporary vision. A number of harpers (symbolic of the true Church of Christ in these lands) are represented as standing by a sea of glass mingled with fire, making the shores re-echo their pæans of victory. And what is it that forms the new note in their exultation as they sing in sweet symphony, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ"? Lo! above their heads, as described in the text, there is seen, speeding through the vault of heaven, the great Mission Angel, an ambassador charged with treaties of peace to every nation under heaven.

Shall we attempt to track him in his majestic flight?

Far away in the distant East there lay a mighty empire. Poetry had sung of it as "The climes of the sun," and British arms and enterprise had claimed it as their proudest trophy. But the darkness of spiritual death is brooding over it, and polluted fires are rising from unnumbered altars. Thither the Angel of the vision wings his way. Altar-fire after altar-fire is quenched. The chime of the Sabbath bell and the hum of the Christian school break the stillness of moral solitude, and he comes back to tell, "In the region and shadow of death light has sprung forth."

He only pauses there to renew his errand. Again, in the expanse of a wide wilderness of waters on the bosom of the Pacific, there slept in quiet loveliness what seemed as if the fabled islets of the blest. Sad contrast, however, between the azure canopy above, or the fragrant beauty around, and those who proclaimed amid the paradise they tenanted that it was too sadly, too truly, "Paradise lost." Thither the Mission Angel speeds. Nothing meets his eye but licentiousness, cruelty, revenge—the blood of brothers, parents, children, crimsoning the guilty soil. He drops his mighty antidote. Lo! in a few brief years the vulture is changed into the dove, the lion into the lamb, and the cannibal is seen at the feet of Jesus sitting clothed and in his right mind.

Yet again, there is a far-off land in the same teeming East. It has for ages, with vain conceit, mimicked in name the glories of the true Celestial—China, in extent and numbers itself a world. Thither, too, the delegated messenger directs his way. For long he hovers, like the dove of old, over the proscribed and forbidden territory, and can find no resting-place! Babel walls and portals of adamant seem to debar all access. But, lo! the ponderous gates seem at last to move. The ambassador of the Cross, slowly, but surely, has achieved an entrance among these 300 millions. The expiring shout of one devoted missionary, who died nobly at his post, seemed prophetic—"China for Christ!" And ever and anon there are voices heard in trembling accents to exclaim, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

Yet again, the earth is one mighty valley, like that of Ezekiel, strewn with the skeletons of once breathing men and animated frames. "Son of man, can these bones live?" It is the scattered Jewish race, for ages under the curse of abandonment, a

* One of these centuries must be remembered with thankfulness for the ecclesiastical revival in England, especially under Lanfranc and Anselm. Also, that through missionaries sent from Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark were brought to embrace Christianity.

hissing and a byword and a proverb among the nations. Thither, on an errand of mercy to fallen Israel, the Mission Angel is sent. Who can follow him in his devious flight? for there is not a spot, from the chill regions of Siberia to the burning sands of Libya, where the outcast children of Abraham are not found. The Gospel messenger begins, like their own prophet, to prophesy to these bones. But what has he to tell, save the same mournful tidings, "Behold, they are very many and very dry"? And yet as he passes by, the mouldering wrecks in that Valley of Vision seem to move—the skeletons are clothed; the dead live! The summons is heard, "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." "Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed to the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh. Thou shalt no longer be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land be any more termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah, and thy land Beulah; for the Lord delighteth in thee!" The response comes, it may yet be only in trembling whispers, but soon will it proceed from ten thousand voices, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth glad tidings of good; that publisheth salvation. . . . Break forth into joy; sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem, for the Lord hath comforted His people, He hath redeemed Jerusalem."

We need not dwell on the picture. The Evangelist beheld the Angel of the vision "flying." It denoted at once suddenness and rapidity. And in this respect the emblem beautifully accorded with the reality. The outburst of missionary zeal at the period we have alluded to was as instantaneous as it was comprehensive and remarkable. All at once, without any note of preparation, the Churches awoke from their slumber, and, with a lofty moral chivalry, united in a missionary crusade against the world. Denominational differences were forgotten; the electric spark of Christian zeal ran along the varied links of the chain which begirt the globe. Bible Societies, and Tract Societies, and Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, followed in rapid succession. It seemed as if the earth were on the eve of the time in which "nations were to be born in a day." Oh! when Christians, with astonished transport, beheld this unprecedented rise of a dormant missionary spirit, proselytism in its noblest form, that glorious flight to earth's kindreds, commenced, which is only to terminate with the hour of Advent: what could an exulting Church testify but this?—giving glory to Whom glory alone was due—"This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes!"

II. We have the instrumentality employed: "The Everlasting Gospel." This was the book the Mission Angel held in his hand. In the former chapter, to which we have already referred, where is described the descent of the Covenant Angel, and, if we are correct in our interpretation, the dawn of the Reformation, it was this same volume, called there "the little book," no longer sealed, but open, and made patent to the gaze of all, which formed not the least prominent part of the vision. Nay, more; you will observe, by referring to the close of the same chapter, that the Angel of the Reformation, if we may so designate him, in delivering it over to the Apostle, accompanied the act with a special charge. John, as personating the Church of Christ, is told that that precious boon is not for behoof of it alone (to be muffled and secreted like the law in the ark of old)—"Thou must prophesy," was the solemn commission (or preach) "before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."

Thus was a grand missionary design unfolded in connection with that Resurrection-era in the Church's spiritual liberties. Her living Head enacted it as a special article in her reformed creed, and by this preliminary vision prepared His servant for the scene depicted in the text, when that "little book" was to reach kindreds and tongues; or, changing the figure, to be the winged messenger of mercy carrying the olive-branch of peace around the globe.

"The little Book."

It may seem to proud reason a poor weapon with which to effect the moral conquest of the world. And more especially when that Gospel is proclaimed, not by angels, but by feeble men. "But the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men."

It seems to be a law or distinguishing feature in His government of the world, that the mightiest ends are effected by the simplest and often unlikeliest means; that results are brought about by agencies and instrumentalities in themselves apparently inadequate to produce them. Look at His providential dealings as these are recorded in the page of Scripture. It was the sling of a shepherd-boy and a few pebbles from the brook which brought to the dust the giant of Philistia. It was a simple rod in the hand of the meekest of men which made a passage through the waves of the Red Sea or summoned water from the flinty rock. It was the blowing of trumpets of rams horns which levelled the proud bulwarks of Jericho, and effected an entrance for the hosts of Israel. And all these are only types of the like feeble instrumentality God uses in the achievements of grace. The sterner walls of the world's unbelief are to be razed to the ground; He employs the blast of this Gospel trumpet in the hands of human agents. Twelve humble fishermen from Tiberias' shores, with no weapon but the sling of faith and the Gospel stone, showed, ere half a century was past, how He could choose "The foolish things of this world to confound the wise, and weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things of the world and things which are despised, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are; that no flesh should glory in His presence" (1 Cor. i. 27, 28, 29). And, powerful in the past, the same moral and spiritual forces are still to be mighty for the pulling down of heathen strongholds. It is with this "little book" the Mission Angel is still to fly through mid-heaven. Countless Dagons are to fall before this Ark of God.

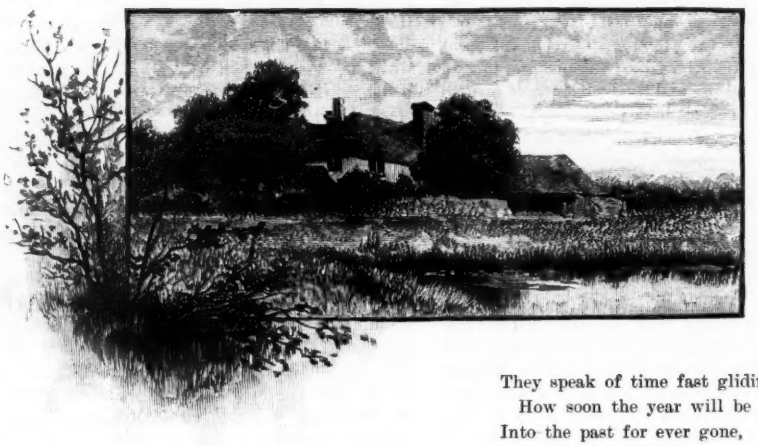
And who can fail to admire the wondrous adaptation of that everlasting Gospel to all characters, and ages, and times! The same truths which gave light to the mind of the child Timothy, and peace to the Ethiopian in the desert, and wisdom to the sages of Athens, and an ideal of true imperial life to Nero's household which rank and splendour never could have unfolded, that same Word of God, sharper than any two-edged sword, still effects its conquests alike over barbarous races and polished Europeans. The vision of the text, moreover, tells us it is destined, yet on a vaster scale, to vindicate its title to be "The power of God unto salvation" unto the very ends of the earth—the grand fulcrum and lever in one which is to elevate degraded humanity. Governments and rulers may seek still, as in ages past, to invent other panaceas for national wrongs. The wisdom of statesmanship, and the refinements of philosophy, and the theories of economists, may affect to discover other means for the amelioration of man; but too many of these are like the flaming meteor, bred from its own atmospheric corruptions, which illumines for a moment with its glare, and then leaves behind it a darkness more felt. The other is like the sun, its eternal type, in the firmament. It shines with increasing brightness as it climbs the meridian in its onward path to perfect day.

And then, and more than all, it is God's own appointed means. That Angel sets forth on his flight at the bidding of the Almighty Himself; and though the weapon were feebler and the foolishness of preaching greater than it is, "it hath pleased God," it is His own devising, and that is enough. What an encouragement is here to the humble, devoted missionary who, looking to his own unworthiness on the one hand, and the magnitude of his work on the other, is tempted at times to exclaim, "Who shall believe my report?" to know that he goes not a warfare on his own charges; that He who took Peter from his nets and Matthew from his toll-bar, and, in later times, Carey from his cobbler's stall, and Livingstone from his factory, and made them the triumphant messengers of mercy to thousands, can bless the weakest instrumentality in the execution of His own great purposes. He committeth the treasure to earthen vessels, that the excellency and the power may be altogether of Him. He would demonstrate this to be the secret and history of the efficacy of all means, and ordinances, and ministrations: "Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

III. Let us now turn to the extent of the commission: "To preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." We believe, as already stated, that this vision has been fulfilling for the last eighty years. Alas! however, before the glowing picture we have given, are we not compelled to shade our eyes and to ask, "What is it, after all?" The mind sinks at the thought of the little done, the much undone. What way have we got among these perishing millions? How few olive-branches, in comparison, has that winged messenger brought back to the Ark of God! If we can sketch a bright foreground, what of the looming distance? What a petty instalment of the world's great debt! What a few paltry sheaves of the world's great harvest! Christianity can only number her units, Paganism her thousands. There seems but like a single sheaf gathered from each land, while the reaping-time still remains. And what? Does this reverse side of the picture indicate the failure of the Mission Angel? and are we left to mourn how far off still is creation's jubilee-day, when it shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, and be translated into the liberty of the glory of the Sons of God? Not so. That day approaches. Its approach is certified, even though the Angel of our text is touching only the borders of these lands, and gathering little more than a handful from each. That everlasting Gospel is not to be preached to "convert all nations;" but we are expressly told it is to be preached for a "witness to all," and "then" (after that witness is accomplished)—"THEN shall the end be."



May we not farther venture, without presumption, to say that that witnessing is rapidly completing?—as if the great voice in the contemporary seventh vial were about to emanate from the Temple of Heaven—from the Throne—saying, "It is done." Blessed be God, those nations are now the exceptions where this symbolic messenger has not given forth his witness. Traverse what climes we may, to earth's remotest shores, "there is no speech nor language where His voice is not heard. His line is gone to all the earth, and His words unto the end of the world." We behold the Esquimaux and the Laplander, in their frigid zone, gazing on the better Sun of Righteousness; we behold the Gospel beacon-light studding Greenland's inhospitable shores, and shining amid the fogs of her dreary winter. We behold the degraded African, the type of mental imbecility, exulting in the wisdom that cometh from above; mission stations studding the banks of the Niger and Zambesi, and the shores of the Lakes Nyassa and Nyanza. We behold British evangelists making a peaceful conquest of the Island of Madagascar in one hemisphere, and the Moravians planting their settlements amid the rushing streams of Alaska in the other. We behold the cannibal shedding tears over the victims of former cruelty and lust, and triumphing only in the blood which cleanseth from all sin. We behold the pagodas of India tottering to their base, and the subtleties of the Hindoo merging in the sublime simplicities of the faith of Jesus. We behold the Chinese—tardily, it may be—renouncing hereditary superstitions, and glorying in those walls which are salvation, and those gates which are praise. We behold the Jew traversing as a Christian the slopes and rocky pathways of his own Jehoshaphat; Christian churches crowning the steeps of the holy mountain; and that Mission Angel standing amid the wreck of Jerusalem's former magnificence, exclaiming, "Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King!"

But we shall not enlarge. With the prospect of that end (come when it may, sooner or later), let us all be up and doing God's work while it is yet day—while the dimming shadows still fall on time's dial. There are voices from all sides exclaiming, "He cometh, He cometh to judge the earth!" Blessed, thrice blessed, are those servants who, when their Lord cometh, shall be found watching.

God's work must be accomplished, and will be accomplished, independent of us. And the question is, not who will make the sacrifice, but who will feel honoured in sharing the instrumentality? Nor let us excuse ourselves, or venture to plead that our missionary objects are unnecessarily multiplied and extended. Shall we plead exemption from fresh claims by pointing to what we have already done? Done! What have we done? Nothing; absolutely nothing in comparison with what we have still to do. One is almost ashamed to think of the petty mite thrown into the Church's missionary treasury, compared with the squanderings of lavish profusion, the waste of guilty extravagance. And if from all we have now said, the Lord has done so much and we have done so little; and if there be a fresh opportunity now afforded us of aiding the Mission Angel in his flight, of helping to add a fresh stone to the fast-completing Temple, let us hail the opportunity rather than grudge the claim. It may not be our privilege long. The coping-stone of that Temple may soon be brought forth, and the angelic choir sound the prophetic note over the consummated structure. Let us turn the simple but beautiful Hebrew chant with reference to that Temple into a prayer:—"The mighty God shall build His Temple speedily; in haste, in haste, in our days, speedily. Lord, build! Lord, build! build Thy Temple speedily! The blessed Lord, the glorious God, the holy God, the gracious God shall build His Temple speedily. In haste, in haste! in our days, speedily, speedily. Lord, build! Lord, build! build Thy Temple speedily!"

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

WHERE golden sunshine lights the air
In pleasant woodland ways,
How bright, how peaceful, and how fair
Are these sweet autumn days!

They speak of time fast gliding on!
How soon the year will be
Into the past for ever gone,
Lost in eternity!

Lord, in our youth may we obey
The voice of Love Divine,
And seek Thy guidance day by day,
And in Thy likeness shine!

Keep us, dear Saviour, by Thy grace,
Who art the children's Friend,
Until in heaven we see Thy Face
Through years that have no end!

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

OCTOBER 19TH. THE SPIRIT OF TRUE SERVICE.

To read—St. Luke xxii. 24—38. Golden Text—Phil. ii. 5.

I. HUMILITY (24—38). Notice the occasion.

The time. The night before our Lord's Crucifixion.

The place. The upper room at Jerusalem.

The occasion. Taking seats at the Last Passover. Teacher must draw or describe a plan of the three tables with couches behind, forming three sides, thus:

The centre table the post of honour. A strife as to who should have the place nearest the Master, not from feelings of love, but ambition—who should have the seat of honour. What does Christ say?

In the world greatness constitutes honour, e.g.—

Greatness of birth and position—as kings.

Greatness of influence—as wealthy men.

But in Christ's Kingdom it is the reverse.

They are great, not who demand, but who give most service.

He Himself is the best example of all, for He came not to be ministered unto but to minister.

His disciples shall have the same reward as Himself, viz., present service—future kingdom.

How is this humility to be shown?

1. Each esteem other better than himself (Phil. ii. 5).

2. Minister to others—as Dorcas (Acts ix. 39).

II. TRIALS (31—34). The disciples had been with Christ in some of His earthly trials. Had seen Him—

Weep at the grave of Lazarus (St. John xi. 35).

Grieved at the hard hearts of the Pharisees (St. Mark iii. 5).

Displeased at disciples rebuking the mothers (St. Mark x. 14).

Now their time of trial is coming. What was St. Peter's to be?

Trial of faith—would he confess or deny Christ?

Trial of courage—would he stand by his Master?

Christ foresaw his fall and recovery—bids him afterwards, from his experience, strengthen his brethren.

Notice how St. Peter answers.

With proud confidence in himself—"I am ready!"

With foolish boasting—"even to prison and death."

Not yet had he learned the folly of trusting to his own heart (Prov. xxviii. 26).

Forewarned with him was not to be forearmed.

LESSONS. Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe.

III. DANGERS (35—37). Christ's cause before had been popular.

Disciples been gladly welcomed, treated with hospitality, received as messengers of peace.

Now all is changed. Must provide for their own wants—may even have to use sword in defence (not for attack), for Christ is now rejected of men—treated as a malefactor. Disciples must expect the same.

LESSON—

> "Christ leads us through no darker rooms
> Than He went through before;
> He that into God's Kingdom comes > Must enter by the Door."

OCTOBER 26TH. JESUS IN GETHSEMANE.

To read—St. Luke xxii. 39—53. Golden Text—Is. liii. 3.

I. THE AGONY (39—46). Must picture Christ and disciples leaving the "upper room" at Jerusalem and going to the Mount of Olives.

The walk—down the valley, over the brook Kedron, up the green slope to the Garden of Gethsemane—a retired but familiar spot (St. John xviii. 2).

The talk. Passed vineyards on the way. Christ spoke the parable of the Vine (see St. John xiv. 31; xv. 1). Probably paused in the full Paschal moonlight with the disciples grouped around Him.

The garden. A last charge to disciples to pray.

Christ leaves eight disciples under the trees—withdraws with three best loved, Peter, James, and John, deeper into the shade (St. Matt. xxvi. 37).

He kneels down to pray. What is His prayer?

Removal, if possible, of the cup of agony.

Yet in this, as in all, God's will to be done.

An angel, as after the temptation, sent to strengthen.

Christ undergoes great mental agony. Why?

Because of man's great sin—the pain and punishment of which He is enduring.

Also great bodily exhaustion—His sweat like drops of blood.

Three times makes the same prayer—three times finds disciples asleep, worn out with sorrow and excitement (St. Matt. xxvi. 44).

They did not watch with Him. Soon all forsook Him, and one denied Him.

LESSONS. 1. The awfulness of sin—causing such agony to the holy Jesus.

2. The need for watching and prayer.

3. Prayer always to be according to God's will.

II. THE BETRAYAL (47—53). The multitude. Officers from the chief priests, and a mixed rabble.

Judas had left the supper-table some hours before, and been getting together his party.

The kiss. Pre-arranged signal to point out Christ.

The sword. Disciples could not understand that Christ's weapons were not carnal. So Christ with a touch of pity and love healed His captor's ear.

The address. He rebukes the leaders. Why take Him as a dangerous malefactor? They had many opportunities of taking Him. He will make no defence.

LESSONS. What does the betrayal of Christ teach?

1. Beware of covetousness. Judas did it simply to get money.

2. Beware of hypocrisy. The seeming kiss of friendship covered deadly enmity.

3. Beware of violence. Christ's followers may defend themselves, but not attack enemies.

4. Beware of cowardice. Have we never deserted Christ's cause when His enemies attacked Him?

NOVEMBER 2ND. JESUS ACCUSED.

To read—St. Luke xxii. 54—71. Golden Text—Is. liii. 5.

I. THE DENIAL (54—62). Christ led away as prisoner to palace of High Priest—first to Annas (St. John xviii. 12), then to his son-in-law Caiaphas the actual high priest—for preliminary inquiry.

Where were the disciples? Nine had fled right away when Christ was taken prisoner. St. Peter and St. John followed afar off—covered by the darkness.

St. John knew the portress and got admission (St. John xviii. 16). Through his influence St. Peter was let in. Was he not exposing himself to temptation?

Now his trial comes. Picture the group—

The servants crowding together round the fire—the very men who made Christ prisoner.

The busy talk about the events of the night.

Suddenly the portress recognises St. Peter and challenges him. Taken off his guard—he denies.

Presently another says the same—he denies again.

An hour passes—what a terrible hour for him!

His love to Christ makes him stay—he fondly hopes the danger is over. But he is again recognised—this time by his speech. Why could not he keep silent? And now with oaths he denies again.

The cock crows, as Christ had foretold.

Christ hears it—turns His head—looks through the open door at Peter outside. Peter sees, recognises, remembers the warning—rushes out and weeps bitterly. What sort of a look was Christ's?

Of remembrance—recalling St. Peter's boast.

Of sadness for His disciple's fall.

Of yearning that he should repent.

What sort of tears were those of St. Peter?

Of sorrow for his grievous sin.

Of repentance—turning to Christ for forgiveness.

Such tears never in vain.

II. THE ACCUSATION (63—71). Christ's sufferings from men had begun.

He is mocked—as appearing under false pretences.

He is struck—after being blindfolded, and challenged to name the striker.

He is reviled and insulted, but answers not.

Truly He was a Man of Sorrows (Golden Text).

Now at break of day the Sanhedrin—the great Council of seventy Jewish elders—is assembled. What do they ask?

Does He claim to be the Christ—the expected Messiah? Does He claim to be the Son of God?

Christ after silence answers at last.

He is the Son of God. They see Him now a prisoner—they shall see Him hereafter in glory.

So they condemn Him out of His own mouth.

LESSONS. 1. Christ's dignity. He suffered manfully.

2. Christ's patience. He suffered uncomplainingly.

3. Christ's sympathy. He can feel for us.

NOVEMBER 9TH. JESUS BEFORE PILATE AND HEROD.

To read—St. Luke xxiii. 1—12. Golden Text—verse 4.

I. BEFORE PILATE (1—4). So far Christ had been tried by His countrymen.

Been arraigned before Sanhedrin on charge of blasphemy. But that was not an offence for which Romans could put to death. So they needed a charge of treason. Sanhedrin take Him to Pilate.

They begin at once to accuse Him of three things.

(a) Perverting the nation—vague and indefinite.

(b) Forbidding to pay tribute—perfectly false.

(c) Making Himself King—false in spirit.

See how Christ's life was answer to these charges.

(a) He blessed the people by word and deed.

(b) He told them distinctly to pay tribute.

(c) He always refused to be made King (St. John vi. 15).

Pilate only listens to the third charge. He questions Christ—is satisfied with His explanation that His Kingdom is not of this world (St. John xviii. 33—38)—and pronounces sentence: "Not guilty."

So far Pilate acted fairly and rightly.

He heard the charge at once—as a judge should.

He tried the case on its merits—according to law.

He listened patiently to the prisoner's defence.

He judged according to righteous judgment.

II. BEFORE HEROD (5—12). The Jews angry with the verdict—heap fresh charges against Christ. "He stirreth up the people." Was this true?

Yes. Christ did stir up the people. For example—

At Nazareth—preached deliverance to the captives.

In Levi's house told of His mission to sinners.

On the mountain proclaimed the law of love.

Warned the multitude against hypocrisy, covetousness, etc. (iv. 18; v. 31; xii. 1, 15).

And the common people heard Him gladly.

Now Pilate sends Him to Herod. Why? Perhaps to get rid of Christ without offending the Jews.

Who was Herod Antipas?

The murderer of John the Baptist, who reproved him of his sin. Was still living in open sin.

This man expected Jesus to show off a miracle!

No wonder Christ kept dignified silence.

Herod in anger mocked Him with His soldiers—insulted Him, and sent Him back to Pilate.

Thus a second time Christ was acquitted.

Herod the Jew and Pilate the heathen became friends over the trial of Christ.

LESSONS. 1. Keep innocency, for that brings peace.

2. A time to speak and a time to be silent.

3. To do well and suffer patiently is acceptable with God.

XUM

(Drawn by MARY L. GOW, R.I.)

"Art one with all her darlings dead,
Refusing to be comforted?"

(See p. 022.)

SORROW.

WHAT is thy pain?
Art one with all her darlings dead,
Refusing to be comforted?
Or Jephthah's daughter for one rash word slain?

Or Magdalene,
Hurt with the fiery sword which drinks
The spirit, till it fainting shrinks,
And whispers, "O that I had never been"?

O mourning one!
Whate'er thy root of bitterness,
Wait, and thou yet mayst surely bless
The cloudy day, when glory was begun!

He chooseth thee,
Not where thou wouldst, had choice been given;
Earth may not dictate so to Heaven;
In the deeps only must thy calling be!

When all is bare
Of mirth and pleasure—when the tomb
Has swallowed love, and life is gloom,
'T is then He seals thee His, and makes thee fair.

Behold the Man
In His abysm; His pale face wet
With agony and bloody sweat,
The sorest heart on earth since time began:—

The cup He drains,
Then, lifting up His glorious head,
His manhood wholly perfected,
On high ascends, and there triumphant reigns.

And His great Name,
The angels and archangels vie
With ransomed saints to magnify,
For which He bore the cross, despised the shame.

Oh, if, as He,
Thou bearest what thy God ordains,
Thou too, from thine allotted pains,
Shalt rise, the pure in heart, His face to see.

CHAPTER XXI.

HE was not gone three minutes; in less than that time he and Markham returned together. Hope saw at a glance that the latter had never been in bed. He, too, looked dishevelled; his face was pale, and its expression considerably disturbed. His eyes rather avoided Hope's; she came up at once and took his hand.

"I'll leave you," said Grey; "only I told you, Hope—I told you that it was wrong to disturb a man who is ill. If Markham gets worse, the sin will be on your head."

"Don't be bitter," said Hope. Her voice was almost bright. She herself opened the door for Cecil, and saw him out. Then she again returned to Markham, took one of his big hands in both her own, and looked full up into his face. She was a tall girl, but he towered above her. His face, massive and rather heavy in outline, made no response to the quick, sweet glance, and the hand she clasped lay passive between hers.

"Dick, are you really ill?" she said tenderly, but with some of the alarm, which his presence had for a moment dispersed, coming back into her voice.

"In mind, Hope; I have had a blow, and am ill in mind."

"But Cecil said you sent for the doctor."

"He did—he is a good fellow, and he and the doctor between them made up a sort of story about me."

"Then it wasn't true?"

"No, it wasn't true. Physically, I am in health—that is, I move, I breathe, I see and hear without pain."

"Yes—come and sit on the sofa, Dick. Here, close to me. Dick, you have had a blow?"

"God knows, child—yes."

Hope felt the cold round her heart getting greater. All the momentary reaction of pleasure had left her. Even her hands felt chilly; she would have trembled but for the violent restraint she put upon herself. Markham sat by her side as she bade him, and when she nestled close, his big frame bent forward a little; still he avoided her eyes.

"Look at me," said Hope suddenly. "Dick, look at me - you must, you shall! I know what has happened. You have seen the other girl; the shadow has come to life."

"Yes, it has come to life with a vengeance."

"You saw the other girl to-day, Dick?"

"I saw her to-day."

"You will marry her, I suppose?"

"Marry her! No, that I shall never do. She is not for me."

Hope sat absolutely silent. She did not move even an inch away from Markham's side; the only difference in her attitude was that now her cold hands lay perfectly still on her dress.

Markham still kept his face averted. His expression was dogged, changed, almost cowed. There was no tenderness in his manner, no compunction. His mouth was set hard, and its expression was cruel. The fact is he was absolutely taken up with himself. He was an unselfish man, as a rule. Now all his thoughts were self-centred; at this moment the slim girl by his side was absolutely nothing to him. It seemed as if hours had passed away, although in reality not many minutes had gone by, before Hope raised her voice and spoke quietly.

"You were quite honest with me, Dick; you told me about the other girl before we were engaged. You did not think you would meet her again, but you admitted the possibility. You never for a moment gave me to understand that you loved me, or could love me, better than her."

"It would have been a lie if I had said it," answered Markham, suddenly rising, and beginning to pace the floor. "I am not myself when I think of her. That I should have seen her to-day, of all days! —I am not myself; I have had an awful blow. You had better leave me, Hope. I cannot talk to you now."

"You were quite fair about it," continued Hope; "you told me at the time. It is an awful thing for me all the same. You gave me so little, and I gave you so much—all. I have nothing left, Dick; I am going away empty. Good-bye, Dick! You are not sorry for me now, but you will be presently. Good-bye, Dick!"

She went up to him, took his hand, raised it to her lips, and kissed it, then went out of the room. He scarcely saw her go, and scarcely felt her kiss; but when she was gone, really gone away; when he heard the house door being shut quietly, he staggered up and leant against the mantel-piece, and, burying his head in his hands, gave one or two great tearless sobs.

"Does she know?" said Cecil, who came into the room. "Did you tell her? Did you really break her heart?"

"Yes, old man," replied Markham, "she knows. She spoke of it herself—she guessed. Yes, she knows.,'

"Then you have broken her heart. Hope's heart broken!—think of it—the brightest, the bravest heart any girl ever possessed! But, Dick, one question more. Does she know who has robbed her?"

"I did not tell her," replied Markham, rubbing his hand wearily across his forehead. "She may guess, of course, but I don't see why she should; I did not tell her. I am going up-stairs, Grey. I feel dazed and queer; I ought to be in an awful state, but I 'm not. Don't worry me any more to-night, like a good fellow. The best news I can now hear is that you are engaged and married. Do it quickly, and tell me nothing until you send me a paper announcing the fact."

"About Hope—what about Hope, Dick?"

"I don't know. I can't think of her, somehow."

CHAPTER XXII.

A FORTNIGHT after the events mentioned in the last chapter, a girl might have been seen standing in an expectant attitude on the steps of Mrs. Douglas's small but daintily kept house. It was a very bright day, and the girl, who was exquisitely dressed, had a face so radiant that in itself it seemed part of the May sunshine. She stood on the steps, drawing on her gloves, and looking half-expectantly, half-absently, up and down the street.

At that moment a hansom cab was seen to dash round the corner, a rather restive horse was pulled up short, and Cecil Grey, springing out, ran up the steps.

"Have I kept you, Jocelyn? I didn't mean to. What a day it is! Will you come now? My mother came to town last night. We shall meet them in the Park; I told them you would be there."

"You were imprudent, Cecil, and I never gave you leave to be that. If your mother sees us together, she will think—oh, you know naturally what she will think."

"But it is true, dearest. We are engaged."

"Yes, yes. Did I deny it? I will drive with you, Cecil, not to the Park, but to Regent Street. I want to make a change in a rather important order. Now let us be off; all the housemaids in the street will soon have their heads out of the windows, wondering what we are talking about. Yes," continued Jocelyn, as the hansom whirled the pair away, "I admit that I am engaged to you, but I also admit, and you must admit, that all this is under the seal of secrecy—secrecy inviolate."

"You said so, Jocelyn; not that I could see the smallest necessity for it. My mother is most anxious that we should both be happy: my father has withdrawn any opposition he ever felt, and—and—but don't let us talk of it. Your wishes are mine, darling. I am the happiest fellow in the world—too happy, under the circumstances."

"Yes, the circumstances are grave," responded Jocelyn. "What an eccentric person—to use the mildest term—your friend Dick must be! I should like to see him, really, out of curiosity."

"The powers forbid!" ejaculated Grey.

Then he forced a laugh, looked into the radiant face of his betrothed, and said again, almost apologetically—

"I 'm the happiest fellow, and I 'm ashamed of myself when Hope is so ill."

"I cannot understand Hope," answered Jocelyn. "She certainly is very ill; the doctors say it is a sort of low fever. Oh, I don't think they are really alarmed, Cecil. They say she has had a shock of some sort, and will come round if she gets time and isn't worried. What puzzles me about her is her fretting at all for a man who would behave so abominably. Fancy his breaking off the engagement at the eleventh hour! Hope will never give any reason for it, and she won't blame the wretched fellow. Shouldn't I blame him, though, if it were I!"

"No, you wouldn't, Jocelyn—you least of all."

"Why should I blame him least of all? Oh, how mysterious you all are! and I hate mysteries!"

"Forget what I said, Jocelyn. Don't think of it again. Dick has gone out of our lives. Poor Dick! Hope is right not to blame him. Hope was always right, and some day he'll remember it to her. Some day her face will come back to him as the sweetest memory."

"It 's all most melancholy," said Jocelyn—"melancholy and mysterious; I came back, as I thought, to a wedding, but it 's much more like a funeral."

"You came back to me, darling," said Cecil. His face glowed, and he tried to take her hand.

"Don't, Cecil. I hate demonstrations, particularly in hansom cabs. Here we are. Will you come in? You 'll find it awfully slow."

"Yes, I will. No, I won't, if you 'd rather not. I'll walk up and down outside until you come out."

"Much the best plan," laughed Jocelyn.

She went into the shop; it was nearly an hour before she reappeared. When she did, she was accompanied by a slight, plain, eager-looking girl.

"I must have an answer for him, Jocelyn," the girl was saying. "Are you coming back to-night, or are you not? I can't have him coming to the house as if he wanted to see me. Mother would be so wild."

"Hush! I 'll come if I can; how can I make promises when Hope is so ill? You are unreasonable, Lottie."

"Well, shall I give him Mrs. Douglas's address? It really is hard on me. He is certain to come again to-night."

"I 'll come over. I 'll promise. If you give my address, I 'll never speak to you again. Now, no more, I entreat. This is Mr. Grey coming up the street; you have heard me speak of him—Cecil Grey, an old Downton friend.—Cecil, let me introduce my cousin, Miss Seaton."

"I have often heard of you," said Lottie.

The three walked away together. Presently Jocelyn made an excuse.

"I must go into this shop with Lottie," she said. "Yes, I am going to sleep at the Douglases' to-night, but I shall go home to lunch with Aunt Margaret and Lottie, and it is very probable I shall spend the evening with them. I can see you to-morrow with the Douglases, Cecil; you might come about eleven if you liked."

Cecil's face fell.

"And my mother!" he began. "You know she expected to meet you in the Park."

"Please give her the prettiest message you can invent, from me. Tell her I was unexpectedly detained. I trust you will say something nice, dear old man."

The last words were almost whispered; the lovely eyes grew soft and tender. Cecil felt a glow round his heart.

"I 'll manage it, my dear," he said, in a voice tremulous with emotion.

Jocelyn nodded again lightly to him, and went into the shop with Lottie.

"No wonder poor Dick is as bad as he is," thought the young fellow, as he walked down Regent Street. "I loved her before—I loved her always, since the first day I saw her, when she was a little imperious child, and made me do what she wanted; but oh, how deeply I care for her now! She bewilders me, she teases me, she 'll always do just whatever she fancies with me—she knows that; but how lucky I am! I can't believe in my own good fortune. Well, poor Dick! Yes, of course I 'm sorry for Dick; he must go to Australia, or Ceylon, or somewhere; he 'll have to give up Oxford. Oh, of course, that goes without saying. I don't suppose he 'll be selfish about it, for I couldn't take Jocelyn into exile; she wouldn't go. I shouldn't like to test her love too much. Oh, of course it 's there, but she mustn't be ruffled. The first thing I ask her shall not be a sacrifice. No, Dick must go away. Poor Hope! I hate to think about Hope. Well, it is all really settled. I am absolutely engaged to Jocelyn Karron. Now I shall write to Dick and tell him."

Grey turned into his club, and soon dashed off a hasty line. He was happy, but he felt very restless and disturbed. Jocelyn was his, but he certainly could not mention any possible wedding-day.

"Dick said, not to let him know until we were absolutely married," he murmured to himself. "I may have to wait awhile for that, but this will put him out of his pain. Poor Dick! poor old fellow!"

Then Grey wrote his letter, glanced over its contents, put it into its envelope, and with his own hands dropped it into the nearest pillar-box.

The next morning Markham, who had returned to Oxford, received it. He had taken a house there—a house where he and Hope were to have lived happily together. He had not gone near the house, but had returned to his old lodgings. There he silenced his astonished landlady by telling her that he had no news whatever to give her—that he was not married nor likely to be—and by a request, made with most unusual sternness, that she would cease to question him on the subject.

Then he took up his usual avocations, lecturing better than ever, but shunning his fellow-men. It was quite true that he was not the least ill in body; he ate, and when he went to bed he slept. His brain felt more acute than ever; his reasoning powers were excellent; but the kindly light had quite gone out of his face—the light which used to make Dick Markham's plain, rough, rugged features almost beautiful when he looked at suffering, or spoke to a child, was gone. He often said to himself, "I don't suffer at all, but really I have not a scrap of heart. It is as if it had been killed with a blow. If this state of things goes on, I may turn into a very cruel man. I am a hard man now—hard as iron. I must be on my guard against myself."

On the morning Markham received Grey's letter, he ascertained with almost a sense of satisfaction that the heart he thought dead was only frozen or stunned. It awoke with a great throb to fresh life. A wretched sense of bitterness came over him.

"'My unknown friend!'"—p. 926.

"The worst of it is, I know I am an utter fool," he said to himself. "What man who was not an idiot would throw away all that makes life worth living for the sake of a face and a voice that can never be his? Never, now, absolutely, for at this very moment she belongs to another."

For the first time that day Markham's thoughts turned to Hope. Not that he was even yet sorry for her. It seemed impossible to him at that moment that any girl was to be pitied who was well rid of a fellow like himself. For perhaps the most acute part of the suffering which fell to his share during the few weeks that followed was his sense of self-abasement. He hated himself even more thoroughly than he still loved and clung to the voice and the shadow which darkened his life.

His heart was no longer paralysed, however; which, although he could scarcely be got to consider it a special blessing, was at least a move in the right direction.

CHAPTER XXIII.

It was rather a merciful thing for Hope that the dreadful and mysterious calamity which fell upon her was immediately followed by illness of an acute form. She was not absolutely in danger, but she suffered from a recurrent sort of low fever, which, when at last it left her, took away a good deal with it.

For instance, the great charm which there had always been about Hope had been the singular likeness which her face bore to her name. It was an expectant face, with a glad outlook about it, an anticipation of something brighter and better than the present could give, always filling the eyes and sparkling on the lips.

Now this look had gone. The face which rose from that sick-bed was sweet, but the thing that had given it its beauty had left it. It was a still face, rather wanting in animation, quite unexpectant, with no forward inquiring glance. No one could now speak of Hope Karron as beautiful, although the trouble that had come to her had in no sense embittered her.

There are girls and girls. There are many who under a blow like this would become shattered, poor, and useless; not a great many really die of broken hearts, but most would be embittered.

Hope was not embittered. A great deal had been taken away, but she was not going to lead a useless life.

After three weeks of illness, she went one day to Mrs. Douglas, and had a long talk with her.

"I am not cured," she said. "Something has been taken away from me which can never be replaced. Dick was not to blame; he told me that a possible contingency might occur when first he asked me to be his wife. I became engaged to him, knowing all about this. Dick was not to blame, although it is very sad for me. Yes, it is very sad and hard, but I am not going to be crushed. To-morrow, Mrs. Douglas, I want to go away. I have fixed on the place I am going to, but I don't want anyone to know my secret but you. Neither Katie nor Jocelyn is to know. I will give you the address. See, it is here, in this closed envelope. Open it if you really want me, and in any case open it at the end of six months, if you don't hear from me before. I am going away to get cured, or at any rate so far cured that I can be a useful sort of girl again."

"But what about money, dear?" said Mrs. Douglas, who was a soft-hearted woman, and could not help crying while the young girl sat by her side so quiet and still and patient. "You can't go on with your profession while you are away, Hope. You must have money to carry out your scheme."

"So I have," answered Hope. "I have a little money saved, and Mr. Frost has just sent me my half-yearly income. Now, you will keep my secret, won't you? I am not going to tell anyone I am going. I am not going to say good-bye to anyone."

"Not even to Jocelyn?"

"No, not even to Jocelyn. Jocelyn seems very far from me now. Oh, yes, I am glad she is engaged to Cecil; but she is changed. I think she is more Aunt Margaret's child now, than my sister."

The next morning, early, Hope carried out her plan. She vanished from the Douglases' quiet little dwelling leaving no apparent trace behind her, for Mrs. Douglas faithfully kept her secret. There was a small excitement at her departure. The little circle of her acquaintance were interested for a day or two; but time goes fast in the busy London season, and in a day or two Hope Karron and her sad little story were forgotten.

It was the end of June, and a very sultry evening, when Markham once again, owing to some circumstances connected with his profession, found himself travelling to London. Once again he was in the bustle of arrival at Paddington. After his late experience, he cordially hated railway stations, and now pushed his way rapidly through the crowd. All his necessary luggage had been shoved into one small handbag. This he carried himself, and was about to hail a hansom to convey him to his destination when once again he was pulled up short, and once again his heart beat heavily and strangely.

As he stood on the pavement waiting to summon his hansom, a neat brougham drawn by a pair of bays came rapidly up, occupied the space just before which he was standing, interrupted his view of the line of hansoms, and forced him for the moment, chafing with impatience as he was, to turn his attention to the occupants of the brougham.

They got out—a girl and a man. The girl looked full into Markham's face; he staggered back and turned white. His change of colour and evident confusion perhaps helped her to recognise him. She stepped forward with a radiant smile.

"My unknown friend of other years at Rome—is it not so?" she said. And she held out her little hand.

Markham did not take it. He stammered something unintelligible; a crimson wave of deep colour had rushed all over his face.

"I think myself lucky to have met you," continued the girl. "I don't know your name, but I have always somehow associated you with luck. I will tell you my name now—that is, my new name—the Contessa di Longobardi. Yes, I am a bride—this is my wedding-day."

"Let me congratulate you," began Markham. "My name is—is—" But before he could utter a word the Count, a fussy little dark-eyed Italian, hurried up.

"Not a moment to lose—we shall miss our train, carissima," he said, and he darted a fiery glance at Markham. Some people rushed up in a hurry, the bustle increased, and in a moment Markham found himself whirling away in a hansom through the sultry evening air. There was a cold dew on his forehead; he had a queer sensation as if he had suddenly passed through death. "Anywhere—drive anywhere," he said to the cabman.

The evening was very still; not a breath of air seemed to move. Markham took his hat off and began mechanically to wipe the drops of dew from his cold forehead. The driver of the hansom, not knowing where else to go, took him into Hyde Park. He drove through from one gate to another, not too fast, for surely there was no use in wearing his horse out over a person who did not know his own mind. Markham, with his hat still off, leant forward in his seat. The balmy warm air was reviving to him, and something in his present situation recalled dimly at first, then vividly, an old memory. About two months ago he had left Paddington and driven, a gay and light-hearted man, to Victoria. He was going to meet a girl who on the next day was to take his hand in hers and promise to be his true, loving, and faithful wife. All through the years that followed this girl and he were to walk in loving fellowship—they were to be so united that no man could sever them. The picture of the home which he and Hope were to have together once more rose up before his mental vision. He saw Hope's face, tender, strong, very faithful, very bright and steadfast. The whole picture came vividly before him, and he there and then discovered that for the last two months his whole moral nature, all that made him manly, worthy, honourable, had been under an eclipse. Something had come between him and the sun. A dark cloud, from which he never thought to escape, had enveloped him. But this evening at Paddington he had looked once into a beautiful but shallow face, the voice that had haunted him sounded once more in his ears—it was insincere, it was untrue.

"Thank God, I'm cured!" suddenly shouted Markham. He said it aloud, and the cabman, who heard him, thought his eccentric fare had gone quite off his head.

"Look here," said Markham, putting on his hat, springing to his feet, and addressing the cabby, "drive to —— in Pall Mall." He gave the address of Cecil's club. In ten minutes he found himself there. He inquired of the hall-porter if Grey were in.

"No," said the man; "Mr. Grey has been in the country for the last day or two."

"I will write to him," said Markham; and he was about to proceed to the reading-room when a hand was laid on his shoulder, and the very man he sought stood by his side.

"Good gracious, Markham! what has brought you to town? And you look—you look quite well!"

"So I am," said Markham, "quite—that is, I am well," he continued, with a sudden pause of shocked recollection. Until this moment he had absolutely forgotten that what had worked his own recovery might wreck the life of the bright young fellow who stood by his side.

"Come into the coffee-room," said Grey, his face glowing. "Your presence puzzles, astonishes, but it also delights me. You here, the old Dick—I know by your face that you are the old Dick."

"A sadder and a wiser man," said Markham, with a grim smile. "Still, absolutely cured—yes, absolutely; but at a cost, Grey. Grey, old fellow, must each man have his turn? I am cured, at a cost."

"Come into the coffee-room," said Cecil. "Let us have some dinner together. Afterwards I am going to the Seatons. They are having their last reception for the season. You—you couldn't come? I don't suppose you are cured enough for that?"

"I am absolutely cured, Cecil. No, I won't go into the coffee-room. If you are hungry, go and eat. Afterwards, shall we take a stroll together? The evening is lovely."

"As you please. I don't believe you are cured, Markham; you look queer. I'll just go and have something, for I'm starving. Then I'll join you."

Markham went into the reading-room. He took up an evening paper, held it so that no one should see his face, and fell instantly into a dream. Once again he saw the home and the girl who presided there. He was cured; he had been delivered from a delusion; but perhaps even yet his mind had not recovered its normal balance. He was a just man, unselfish, a man with generous instincts—such was the normal Markham. He was about to inflict a terrible blow on his best friend, and yet the moment that friend left him he forgot him.

He sat on in a snug chair, enjoying his dream. The room was full of men when he entered. After a time he noticed that he was almost alone. Then it occurred to him to speculate on the length of time Cecil took to dine. Then he looked at his watch and started—he had been in the reading-room for over an hour; it was now nine o'clock.

He rose with an effort; his pain had been so acute, and his absolute deliverance so sudden, that he felt a certain sense of pleasant inertia. All was right where all had been wrong—the love, the home, were before him. He was not troubled as yet with even the faintest shadow of a doubt with regard to the reception Hope would give him.

Still, Cecil was a long time away. He went out of the reading-room, and found himself again in the entrance-hall. Seeing that he was looking about in an inquiring manner, a page came up to him.

"Are you Mr. Markham, sir? Are you looking for Mr. Grey?"

"Yes. Mr. Grey was dining here. Will you ascertain if he has finished?"

"He went out a long time ago, sir. He said when you asked for him I was to give you this."

A rather bulky envelope was put into Markham's hand. He thrust it into his pocket, put on his hat, and went out. He felt no curiosity to read what Grey had said.

"He knows, poor fellow!" he murmured. "Probably she wrote to him at his club. She was all froth and vapour. He will be as glad as I am to have been saved from her, one day."

Then Markham turned his attention once again with a certain selfish recklessness to his own affairs.

There was a quiet little hotel in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly where he was in the habit of going when he spent a few days in town. Should he drive there now, order some dinner, read poor Cecil's letter, and ponder over what he could do for him? No, he could do nothing for Cecil; he could not even comfort him. His own affairs were paramount. Something was drawing him, a longing which was almost pain was impelling him in a certain direction. He yielded to the impulse, jumped into the cab, gave Mrs. Douglas's address, and soon reached the house. It was now half-past nine—rather a late hour for an ordinary caller; but he could not possibly class himself under such a head. A neatly dressed servant—not Jane—answered his ring.

"Is Miss Karron at home?"

"Miss Karron? No, sir. Miss Karron doesn't live here, sir."

This answer made Markham stagger back a trifle. He gazed at the servant with a perturbed expression coming over his face.

"Can I see Mrs. Douglas?" he asked, then.

"Mrs. Douglas is away until to-morrow, sir."

"Oh, is anyone at home?"

"There 's Miss Katie, but——"

"That 'll do," said Markham, in a tone of relief. "I 'll see Miss Katie Douglas. Take her this; ask her if I can see her on important business at once."

He gave his card to the maid, who presently returned with a grave face, and conducted him to the drawing-room. The gas was lit; the little room which Markham had always associated with Hope, for they had often spent hours alone there, looked dreary, and not too tidy. The windows were open, and Katie, as usual surrounded by trophies of needlework, rose with a startled, nervous glance from the recesses of one, and came to meet him. Her manner was as cold and stiff as such a very empressée, undignified person could make it. She did not offer her hand, but looked at Markham in no friendly spirit. He afterwards said that the look on Katie's face showed him more of what he himself had done than any reproach he had ever received. The words he had meant to utter so easily were arrested half-way. When he did speak, it was with an effort.

"I am told by the servant that Hope is not with you; can you give me her address?"

"No, I cannot. I don't know it."

Katie stood about six feet away from Markham. He did not advance any nearer. Again his words came with an effort.

"You must be able to tell me something about Hope," he said presently. "When last I saw her, she lived with you. It is most important I should find her at once."

"It is not at all important to us that you should find her; I don't know where she is—I cannot help you in the matter."

Katie sat down once more in her window. She was altering an elegant dress, and she took the flimsy material now between little fingers that trembled.

"You are rather cruel to me, Miss Douglas," said Markham. "You can at least tell me something—something about Miss Karron."

"Yes, it is much more suitable for you to call her Miss Karron. She is nothing whatever to you."

"That 's as she and I will, in future. Miss Douglas, I know my conduct must appear black to you. I begin to see something of its true colours myself, now. My excuse is that I was insane. Now I am sane—my right mind has returned to me."

"What a blessing that you didn't make Hope your wife—how awful if she had married a lunatic! No, I don't know anything about her, and if I did I shouldn't tell you."

"But I wasn't insane in that sense! Good gracious, I can't explain it to you. Miss Douglas, you don't know what awful mischief you may be doing by keeping back what little information you can give me. Now, look here, I desire you to tell me what you know about Hope."

"'You desire,' said Katie, flinging down her work, and confronting him with flashing eyes. "Do you know that you nearly killed Hope? Do you know that she went away because you broke her heart? You! I love Hope, and I hate you. Do you think I would do anything to help you?"

"I bitterly repent," began Markham, whose face had grown white.

"Yes, and what good does your repentance do anyone? You did not take Hope's life, but you took away that which made her a delight to all who knew her. You took the sun from her, and the joy from her; you made her name, her dear name, a lie every time she is called it. Oh, how miserable the world is when men like you can be so cruel!"

Here Katie's fortitude forsook her. She laid her head on her hands and sobbed bitterly.

It is impossible for a girl to keep up her anger long when she gives way to violent weeping. Presently her voice became softer and more heartbroken.

"This has been such an awful, wretched day," she began. "You must forgive me if I say bitter things. You know—or do you not know?—that Jocelyn was privately married this afternoon to Count di Longobardi; that wretched, mean-spirited little Lottie Seaton helped her, and poor Cecil knew nothing about it till an hour ago. Cecil came here for a minute this evening. He was almost wild. Jocelyn wrote him a letter which he got at his club. I could tell him nothing, and he went straight away to the Seatons. Oh, no wonder I am miserable and perturbed. Fond as I am of Hope, I almost wish I had never known the Karrons. Now what is the matter, Mr. Markham?"

"Nothing. I am going to the Seatons to try and find Grey—good-night. I may call to-morrow."

CHAPTER XXIV.

UNTIL Markham got to the Seatons' house he quite forgot what Cecil had told him; they were having a reception, a gay reception, the farewell to their many friends of the season. In his present attire Markham could scarcely enter. Besides, he did not know the Seatons. He inquired of more than one liveried footman standing about if he could tell him anything of Grey. Was Grey up-stairs? Had he left? No one seemed able to give accurate information. One said one thing, one another. Markham resolved to see the reception out on the steps. He was slightly in the shadow himself, but he could see the face of each man and woman as they came out to go away. An attendant looked askance at him. He slipped a sovereign into the man's hand and held on to his position. By-and-bye the very last guest departed. No, Grey was not present. Markham hailed a hansom and drove back to Grey's club. The hall-porter assured him that Mr. Grey had never come in. Then he drove to the young man's private address in Curzon Street; the house was shut up—no light anywhere; finally, Markham went to his own hotel. He was spent, weary, almost faint now; it was hours since he had eaten. He ordered some supper, quickly despatched it, and going up to his room at last took out Cecil's letter. All this time remorse like a vulture was tearing him. How could he in the moment of his own deliverance have so forgotten his friend as to let him receive this blow unsupported? The sense of Jocelyn's unworthiness had been a relief to him. Why did he forget that what was his release might be another man's death?

He opened Cecil's letter. Some straggly lines were written across a thick page of the club note-paper.

"Each man must have his turn; enclosed will explain."

There was no signature. Markham saw then that Grey had absolutely sent him Jocelyn's own letter. He took it in his hand for a moment, tried to open it carelessly, then flung it from him on the floor as if it were a living thing and could sting him. Presently he buried his head in his hands, and strong man, in many respects iron man, that he was, he began to weep. A man's tears are terrible things. Markham was weeping for the sorry part he had played, for the desolation which he had caused, and also because a new dull fear had taken possession of him. Was it at all likely that Hope would look at him or think of him again? Between fear about Hope, and remorse at having let Cecil meet his trouble unaided, Markham had a bad night of it. It was not until morning had long broken that he took courage to read Jocelyn's letter. This was what she said—

"Dear Cecil,—When you hold this in your hands I shall be another man's wife. I know how angry you will be. I know that I shall have hurt you awfully. I am very sorry. I would not, if I could help it, Cecil, give you a moment's pain. I'll tell you how it is, and how I can't help myself. I am marrying the Count di Longobardi because I am a coward. I am afraid of him—you don't know how fierce he can look. He is an Italian, and has an awful, passionate nature. He does not know anything about my ever being engaged to you. He must never know—it would be too dreadful. I'll tell you the story about him, Cecil.

"Last winter, at Algiers, Aunt Margaret used to have receptions, and he always came to them. He is enormously rich, and Aunt Margaret thought for a time he was coming after Lottie. She did not want Lottie to marry a foreigner, and she often said she would only give her to an Englishman. But the Count did not want Lottie—it was me. He said that he worshipped me, and I think he did and does. He asked me to marry him, and I was frightened, and I said I would. I was sorry the moment I said it. I didn't a bit want to marry him. I begged of him to keep our engagement secret, and I always hoped and hoped that I might get out of it. Then you wrote, asking me to marry you, again, and I thought how much nicer you were than the Count, and I felt more sorry than ever that I had promised to be his. He was very fierce just then, and he was always threatening to tell Aunt Margaret, but I used all my powers to get him to keep it a secret. I tried to make him think that Aunt Margaret wouldn't let me have him, that she meant me for some grand titled man in England. That frightened him, and he gave in. I told him I would marry him privately whenever he wished, but that we must not tell Aunt Margaret until after we were man and wife. Just then he had to go to Italy; I think his father died or something—anyhow, he had to go away in a hurry. It was then I was coming to England for Hope's wedding, and I managed to get away without his knowing, and I hoped, oh, so earnestly, that I had escaped the Count. Then you proposed to me, Cecil, once again—the third time, dear Cecil. I thought perhaps that the Count could never find me in England. No such luck. He discovered me all too soon. I have gone through six weeks of misery, trying to keep you two apart. I don't think he knows of your existence—he must never know. Lottie helped me, and I married him this morning. I am writing this now while he thinks I am changing my dress. Oh, how my hands shake! Good-bye, Cecil. I don't suppose I'd have been a good wife for you. What a pity it wasn't Hope you fell in love with! Forget the worthless, the unhappy

"His voice was gruff, and not very steady."—p. 931.

"JOCELYN DI LONGOBARDI."

Markham read every word of this letter.

"Poor girl!" he said softly. "Yes, it was somebody quite different who filled my heart. I am bitterly sorry for her and for Cecil."

Then he saw some pencilled lines faintly scratched at the end of the letter. They were in Cecil's handwriting.

"Burn this, Markham, when you have read it."

So Markham tore up the letter, and committed it to the flames. The Contessa's miserable story was safe as far as he and Grey were concerned.

CHAPTER XXV.

HOPE settled herself comfortably in a tiny village on the Devonshire coast. She had gone there once many years ago with her mother. She sought out the same landlady, who kept just the same neat little whitewashed, spotlessly clean dwelling. She took in Hope with acclamations of delight; told her she had grown into a most beautiful young lady, fed her up and petted her.

Hope now set herself seriously to the task of getting well; quite well, not only in body, but in mind, she intended to become; but even Hope did not realise how sore and deep her pain was. She determined to lead a busy life in the little village. She made friends with the fisher people, and often went out in their boats. She hired a rough pony, and took long rides by herself. She studied French and German diligently, made a collection of sea-anemones and seaweeds. She even sketched a little; and during every moment of spare time, she read.

No one could have led a busier or more healthful life. The colour bloomed once more in her cheeks, and the light of health came back to her eyes. Still, the dull ache in her heart did not go away. It lay down with her at night, and pursued her through the long and busy day. She knew its name—it was a starved pain—starved because Dick had turned away from her, and she might never see his face again.

She had been about a month at Highbeach, and all that time had congratulated herself at not having met a single human being of her own world, when one day, returning from a longer ride than usual, she was startled by hearing a clear voice call out her name.

She turned round, and saw, rather to her dismay, Roley Douglas, accompanied by two other boys, coming tumbling and leaping over the short rough grass to meet her.

"Hullo! I knew it was you, Hope—Miss Karron, I suppose I ought to say—I always do call you Hope behind your back. We have come down to lodge next door to you—Jones and Spicer and I."

Here he waved his hand in a patronising style to the other boys, who were nearly double his size, and looked red and awkward.

Hope nodded to them, took Roley's hand in hers, but could not help a shade of disappointment coming into her voice.

"How did you find me out, Roley? I did not think anyone—anyone knew where I was."

"I like that! What a muff you must take me for! Wasn't your easel outside the door, and a bit of blotting-paper of yours floating out of the open window with great D's scribbled all over it? D stands for—D stands for—— I say, Hope, you need not go off in a rage like that. I'm not going to split. The fact is, we all had whooping-cough at school, and Jones and Spicer and I were the worst. And my mother wrote to our master, and told him what a nice place Highbeach was. She didn't say anything about your being here. We found that out for ourselves; didn't we, Spicer?"

"I say, you might let Miss Karron go on—go on with her ride," drawled Spicer.

"Oh, I 'm very glad to see you, boys," said Hope, after a moment. "I 've had my ride, and am coming home now. And will you—will you all," she added, "come and have tea with me to-night? If you say Yes, we may as well go round by the shrimp-man's—I know Roley of old was devoted to shrimps."

Roley uttered a loud hurrah of joy; Spicer might have been observed to pronounce distinctly the one word "Galopshious!" while Jones, who had not hitherto articulated, said solemnly, "It 's scrumptious!"

During the days that followed, the boys and Hope spent most of their time together. After the first little pang of dismay, she had to own that she was glad of their society. She was just the sort of girl herself to delight boys, and they took long expeditions together, had a few almost perilous adventures, not a few long, delightful days, and were in every respect the best of friends.

"I think you might," said Roley one day to her.

"Might what, Roley?"

"Might let me call you Hope now, to your face, as well as behind your back."

"Well," said Hope, after a pause, "it doesn't sound very respectful, does it? I used to be your teacher, you know."

"Yes, the only jolly one I ever had."

"But I'm not your teacher now. Yes, I think, on the whole, you may call me Hope."

"Thanks, very much. And I suppose Spicer and Jones may too? They don't like Miss Karron; they think it so stiff."

"No, Roley; I really must draw the line there."

"Must you? I think it's rather hard of you. Spicer and Jones like you tremendously. Spicer said the other night that he'd almost as soon have a walk with you as eat shrimps. He did, really; and Jones nodded. Jones always nods to everything Spicer says."

"I'm greatly obliged," said Hope, "and—flattered. Are they coming now? It's time we were off."

It was on the evening of that same day that Roley edged up close to Hope, looked into her face, and said—

"I've a bit of news for you. You won't guess what my eyes rested on to-day."

"No; what is it? I wish you wouldn't be mysterious, Roley."

"I mysterious? That's not my way. Why, you have all coloured up! Well, I'll tell you—I expect you'll be surprised. Rossiter's here."

"Nonsense, Roley! I don't believe it."

"It isn't nonsense. I saw him—a groom had him—he's in the stable at the White Hart—I saw him going in. He looked very wicked, and the groom seemed afraid of him. As if I wouldn't know Rossiter! He is here—he's in the stable of the White Hart this minute. I'll go and ask, if you won't believe me."

"No, Roley, you'll do nothing of the kind. You have mistaken the horse, that's all. Little boys are always making mistakes of the kind."

"Thank you—'little boys,' indeed! 'Little boys' are sometimes right. How obstinate you are, Hope; and your face is as white as it was rosy a minute ago. Are you tired, Hope?"

"I believe I am; I'll go indoors," said Hope.

All the freshness had left her voice. She went in, feeling flat and quiet. After all, life with the flavour out of it must at the best be a tasteless thing.

Presently she went to bed, but a headache kept her awake. Roley was probably quite wrong; but if Rossiter were there, it was only because he was sold to a new master.

Towards morning she fell into a troubled sleep. She had a dream in her sleep; she was still Dick Markham's betrothed wife. She was standing close to him, and he was singing to her—

> "Sae fair art thou, my bonny lass,
> Sae deep in love am I;
> And I will love thee still, my dear,
> Till all the streams run dry."

"But he was never deep in love with me," said poor Hope to herself, as she dressed languidly, pressing her hand now and then to her hot forehead. "I gave him all—he knew that. Yes, it has been hard on me."

She went down-stairs; the words of the old song kept ringing in her ears:—

> "Sae fair art thou, my bonny lass,
> Sae deep in love am I."

She hated herself for humming them—she almost hated the words. In the middle of breakfast Roley rushed in.

"It's a lovely morning, Hope," he said. "Are you going for a ride?"

"I think I will," said Hope. "I have a headache, and the exercise will drive it away. You might ask them to bring Robin round in half an hour, like a dear boy, Roley."

Roley nodded and vanished, and Hope, having finished her breakfast, went leisurely up-stairs to put on her rough grey habit.

The half-hour passed; no Roley appeared, but she heard horses' footsteps, and running down opened the cottage door.

"I'm ready, Jim," she said, addressing the man who generally helped her to mount. "I hope Robin is nice and fresh this morning. I mean to take it well out of him, I can tell you."

Nobody answered; she had been drawing on her gloves, and had not for the moment raised her head. The colour was fresh in her cheeks; she never looked more animated nor sweeter. Now, startled at the silence, she raised her eyes fully.

"Jim——" she began. Then she turned very white, stepped back a pace or two, and leant against the cottage porch.

Neither Jim nor the rough pony was waiting for her, but Rossiter, pawing the ground and arching his neck, stood close to the cottage step; he had on a lady's saddle. By his side was a powerful black horse, and holding the bridles of both stood Dick Markham.

"Will you come for a ride?" he said.

His voice was gruff, and not very steady.

"You need not be afraid of Rossiter. He conquered you once. Having done that, he'll forgive you all the rest of his days. You need not fear Rossiter, nor—nor me—Hope."

"I never feared either man or horse," said Hope, when she could find her voice. "But—I don't understand."

"No, you don't. Something marvellous has happened—marvellous, miraculous! Take one ride on Rossiter by my side, and let me tell you. Hope, let me tell you; I shall be a broken-hearted man all my days if you say No."

Perhaps Hope Karron had no spirit, after all. No one can quite count beforehand on how a girl will act under given circumstances. This girl stood quite still for another full minute, then she held out her hand to Markham, and lightly sprang on Rossiter's back.

They took a long ride away, away through the lovely country. For hours they were absent, and when at last they returned, no one who had known Hope of old could now miss anything out of her face.

"There is one thing," said Markham, as they rode quietly up to the cottage door: "that I never even knew the meaning of being properly in love before."

"And you are certain, Dick—certain," said Hope, in a shy, tremulous voice, "that the shadow won't come back again?"

"It cannot, Hope; it has melted into air. You fill my heart. When all is said and done, I cannot give you more than all."

But Hope never knew—never during the whole of her happy married life—whose face and voice Markham had once passionately worshipped. She never knew this, for neither Markham nor Grey would tell her. Jocelyn did not return to England, and from one cause or another the sisters are scarcely likely to meet.

By-and-bye Grey recovered from the blow which had nearly shattered him. He married Bee Chaverton, and makes her an excellent husband.

Markham says no man is as happy as he is, and he also adds, what perhaps in some ways is true, that he doesn't deserve it.

"But then there was never anyone quite like Hope," he adds; "which just accounts for my being absolutely forgiven and loved beyond my deserts."

THE END

A TALE OF A DUTCH HERO.

BY PEVERIL, AUTHOR OF "IN THE GOOD OLD DAYS," ETC.

IN the days when Charles IX. was King of France, when Philip II. reigned over Spain, and our own land was governed by Good Queen Bess, the people of Holland and the Netherlands were called upon to endure the most fiery persecution the world ever witnessed.

For many generations the Dutch had enjoyed more liberty than was usual at that stage of the world's history. Their cities possessed charters and privileges of which they were justly proud, and to which they owed their prosperity. As a natural consequence, education advanced, and the people were accustomed to freedom of thought and argument.

In this good soil the seed of the Reformation took deep root. Nowhere did the doctrines of Luther spread so rapidly, nor bring forth so rich a harvest.

Then came persecution.

The cruel and bigoted King of Spain, believing himself ordained of God to sweep heresy from the face of the earth, let loose upon these smiling provinces all the terrors of the Spanish Inquisition.

Already they had suffered much for the cause of religion. During the reign of Charles V., many thousands laid down their lives for the truth; but Philip II. exceeded his father both in cruelty and tenacity of purpose. Henceforth no man's life was safe. Liberty was crushed, and a dark cloud of oppression settled over the land. Men and women were tortured, drowned, strangled, burnt alive or buried alive, for no other crime than reading the Bible, praying with their children, and teaching them to look to Jesus as their only Saviour.

It would shock you too much were I to tell you a tithe of what these poor Christians endured at the hands of their fellow-Christians. Saddest of all human delusions, when religion is used as a mask for tyranny! Happy are we who have the privilege of serving God according to the dictates of reason and conscience!

In Holland, cruelty and injustice produced their natural result; the people rose up against their oppressors, and an army was sent by Philip to reduce them to obedience. Thus the misery of war was added to the terrors of the Inquisition.

The Dutch were a commercial rather than a warlike people. Stern necessity obliged them to fight for their homes, and for their wives and little ones; but at first the well-disciplined Spanish troops had them at a terrible disadvantage.

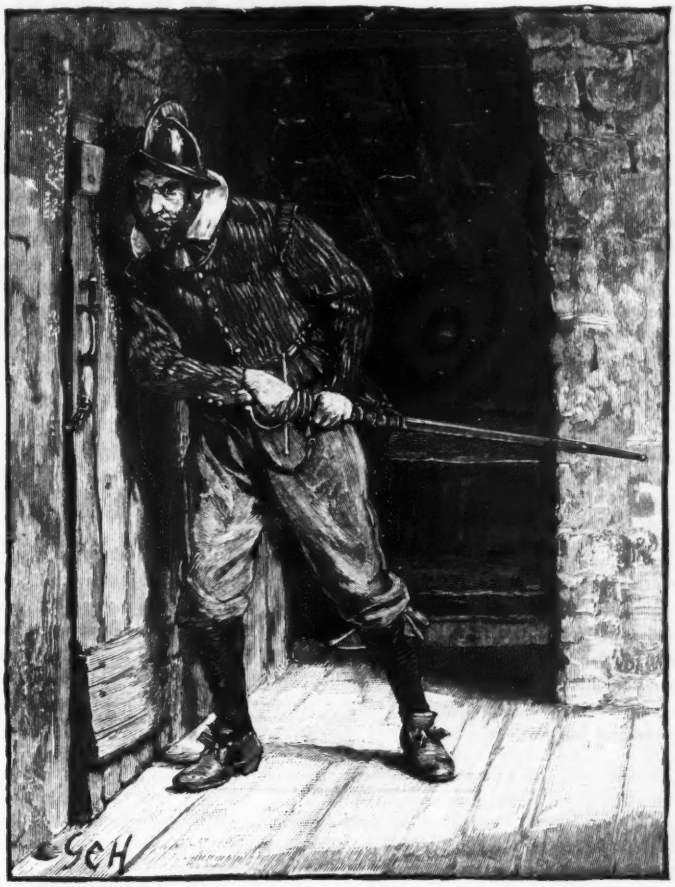
In one way, however, they were superior to their foes. They were as much at home on water as on land; and in winter they could skim about upon the frozen seas and lakes, to the great confusion of their enemies. When the battle was fought upon water or upon ice, it was the Dutchman's turn to win.

But the Spaniards were persevering as well as brave. They soon bought skates and learnt to use them, though not so skilfully as those who had been accustomed to them from childhood.

Dirk Willemzoon was one of those who suffered for conscience' sake. Although he was innocent of any offence beyond the reading of his Bible and attending religious meetings, he was taken prisoner, tried, and condemned to death.

Dirk felt it hard to submit to this cruel injustice. He was young, and life was sweet—even life such as it then was in Holland. He set his wits to work out a plan of escape.

His plan succeeded. Once more he was free. Free, but not safe. He must still hide from his enemies. In this, alas! he was not so fortunate; his retreat was discovered by a Spanish soldier, and he was pursued across the open country. At no great distance was a lake, now a broad sheet of frozen water.



Here was a chance for Dirk. He knew that upon ice he could soon outstrip his pursuer.

He was right. The Spaniard was a bold runner, but upon that slippery surface he was no match for the young Dutchman. Moreover, at this season, the lake was not to be traversed without danger. Winter was nearly over; already there had been mild spring days, and the ice was unsafe. It trembled and shook beneath the flying footsteps of the hunter and his prey.

Dirk was no stranger to the lake. He knew well what parts to avoid. The soldier lacked this useful bit of knowledge. Suddenly there was a loud crack—a cry—a splash! The fugitive turned to look, and behold! his enemy was gone. A large hole in the ice, surrounded by many a deep crack—that was all now visible.

But as he looked, the head of the drowning man reappeared above the water. He stretched out his hands and grasped the edge of the ice, which bent beneath his weight. Dirk saw that he could not get out unaided. He was caught as securely as any rat in a trap. In a few minutes he must sink.

Dirk was safe now. Intense gratitude for his escape filled his heart to overflowing. "The Lord hath delivered me!" he cried. "It is not my work. Truly God hath fought for me; He hath overthrown my enemy like the Egyptians in the Red Sea."

"His retreat was discovered by a Spanish soldier."—p. 932.

But this thought was rapidly succeeded by another. "I say unto you, love your enemies; do good to them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

Would he not be disobeying his Saviour's command if he left this man to perish? It was a terrible moment for poor Dirk. He covered his face, and fell upon his knees. A fierce battle raged within his soul, the powers of good and evil striving for mastery.

God give us all grace to fight such battles on our knees!

It was soon over.

The Spaniard was presently amazed to see the young Dutchman returning across the ice; but the sight brought him no comfort.

"He comes to slay me with his dagger," thought he. "Well, 't is more a soldier's death than drowning like a kitten in a tub."

So he resigned himself to his fate, with the stoicism of one who has faced death too often to fear it.

To his astonishment, however, the young man showed no desire to kill, but seemed, on the contrary, anxious to save him. He advanced cautiously along the quivering ice, then lay down, and creeping towards the hole, stretched forth his hands and drew the soldier out of the water.

There is but one way in which such a story should end. If the Spaniard had no reward to offer, he must at least grant freedom to the man who had risked his life to save him. But, alas! the tale has a far darker sequel.

Whatever his feelings may have been while in the ice-hole, the soldier was no sooner safe on dry land than the instinct of the bird of prey revived. The man was in his power yet—the man he had followed through so many dangers; should he let him go, and so lose the reward of his valour? No! The young Dutchman was his lawful captive, and back to prison he must go.

Motley, from whose pages we have drawn this sketch, tells us that the Spaniard was subsequently stricken by remorse, and would have released his prisoner, but was prevented by the burgomaster of Aspern, who bade him remember first his duty to his king.

We are not disposed to give the soldier much credit for this tardy repentance. It was never strong enough to induce him to open the door to his captive.

Dirk's noble action met with no reward in this world. After languishing in prison for some weeks, he was led out into the market-place, tied to a stake, and burnt to death.

Even then we may be sure that brave Dirk Willemzoon never for a moment regretted his generous self-sacrifice.

He had followed his Master; for, like Him, he had laid down his life for his enemy; and perchance to him also was granted grace to say with that dying Master, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

EARLY LESSONS.

'T WILL not be always May, dear,
Nor always mirth and song;
For cares will cross your way, dear,
And dangers round you throng.
Yet there's a land of perfect spring
Beyond the shining river,
Where happy little children sing
For ever and for ever.

'T will not be always day, dear,
Nor always bright and clear;
For even while you play, dear,
The night is drawing near.
Yet there's a land of endless light
Beyond the shining river,
Where children walk in robes of white
For ever and for ever.

MANY MEMBERS, ONE BODY.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," ETC.

SAINT PAUL was a great logician. He did not confine himself to statements of Christian truth; where need was, he argued about it too. And this he does here. He had to combat human pride, selfishness, discontent, misconception; he had to deal with all these even in the matter of spiritual gifts, where one might have supposed that there would have been no room for them at all; and he deals with the matter by an analogical, and then by a logical process—he shows that the Church is a whole made up of many members, just as the human body is, and then he makes use of the analogy in what is called an argumentum ad absurdum; that is, an argument which says "because such a thing is absurd, it cannot be."

And a very good kind of argument this is too, in its place; for, when men have a thing put before them in a ridiculous light, they will often see its folly, when otherwise nothing could have persuaded them of it.

There is a great deal of useful, practical information and instruction in this chapter,* some of which I would briefly gather up here; for I am persuaded that it can teach us now, just as it did the Corinthians long ago.

* 1 Corinthians xii.

One lesson that we are taught here is, that there is actual even though it be unconscious connection. What we are not thinking of yet is, and not only is, but cannot be otherwise. Our not knowing this, or not thinking about it, does not alter the matter in the least. The eye, if it had powers of independent thought, might be absorbed with itself, and the ear, and the hand, and the foot, with themselves; but they are all indissolubly bound together, for all that.

This, good reader, may awaken a new thought in you. You have perhaps looked upon yourself as a unit—as alone—as self-contained; and all the while you were in a position of which you had no conception—but you were in it, for all that. You have been, you are, in intimate relationship with others; and out of that relationship your responsibilities none the less flow because you have never thought about them, and so do not know them.

Another lesson is that solidarity is the true law of God. "Solidarity" is a new word in our language—it means a great whole, a whole with many parts, and these parts mutually related. This word has come into being even as other new words have, in order to express new ideas, new discoveries, new revelations of truth. It does not express the creation of anything new, only the existence of what always has been, but with an existence unrecognised—at any rate, in its power.

God never planned a series of isolations either in nature or in grace—I doubt if He ever planned even one single isolation. Christ Himself was not an isolation. "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part in the same" (Heb. ii. 14). By Mary His mother, He became one of the human race; and He fulfilled the law of solidarity—for, being made in all things like unto His brethren, He suffered in all points as they suffered, and "in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted." When we feel that we are weak and miserable, it is because we are realising isolation, and not solidarity—realising ourselves, and not ourselves in Christ.

Another thing that we learn is that God's ordering cannot be interfered with, without confusion and absurdity. The merging of the eye in the ear, or the ear in the eye, involving the loss of one organ: or the abnormal and exaggerated swelling of arm or leg, drawing off to itself more than its share of the vital juices of the body, would end in confusion—perhaps in destruction.

Imagine the eye gone, and according to its wish become an ear—thinking that to listen to soft Æolian tones is better than to look at softly harmonising shades—and see the body which it ought to direct, no longer bounding forward with a fearless step, but slowly and painfully creeping by the wall. And imagine the ear, according to its wish, become an eye, so that the man sees now twice as far and twice as much; but ah! where now is the thrill of the organ's swell, where now the spirit's hush of the summer's breeze? where now the rustle of the leaf and the song of the bird, and the murmur of the stream, and the chime of the distant bells, and the soft whisperings of human love, and the soothing plash of the falling tide, and the ripple of the rising wave, waking wondering thought as to whither we are going, and whence, indeed, we came.

Now that the hand has become a foot, where is the delicate tracery of the cathedral window, where the fluted column and its sculptured boss? what is there to raise the stalwart tower and tapering spire? where now is the soft ministry of touch with which to bind the wound, and where, it may be, the softer pressure, which, with an eloquence its own, tells without words its unspoken tale of love? The order of God has been violated, to the loss, as it ever must be, of him by whom it has been broken; and the body which He made perfect is distorted, crippled, and incomplete. The violation of the ordered harmony of God can issue in nothing but loss and misery for man.

Here, too, we are taught that reciprocity is the law of the natural body, and of spiritual life. "If one member suffer, all the members suffer with it;" if one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. Each of them lives for itself, but each of them lives for others too—each, not for one other alone, but for the others, each and all. Our common saying, "Give and take," is the very law and life of the perfection of the world, of the Church, of the man.

Here in this chapter we see also the danger and the loss of isolation. Isolation is a breach of law, and in common with all breaches of law brings trouble in its train. No man liveth to himself, and no man dieth unto himself. The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you. The eye is a perceptive power, the hand is its executive; it is little use to be able to know, without being able to reduce that knowledge to practice, and to do. And the matter is put more strongly when the case comes to be as between the head and the foot; the head contains the eye and the ear, the mouth and brain. But with all its great supremacy, it is not independent of the humble foot. Let the feet refuse it their help, and the eye cannot go where it will see, nor the ear where it will hear; and for want of exercise, the brain, ever thinking, will leave the nervous system unbalanced by the muscular, when it will become unnaturally excited, and induce all manner of disease. The idea of eye and ear, of hand and foot, of eye and hand, and then even of head and foot, all being dependent the one upon the other, is as much as to say, "No persons similarly circumstanced are independent of each other, nor are people dissimilarly circumstanced, nor is the very highest independent even of the very lowest. The outward connection may not be seen; who sees the muscles and nerves between the head and the foot? but there they are; and so the body, with its many parts, is one.

Ignorance of this truth touches deleteriously the opposite poles of society; it lies at the root of the communism of the lowest classes, and the selfishness of the higher. The hands and feet seem to think that they have nothing to do with the head except to be used, and they are indignant that they have to work while, as they think, the ear and the eye are taking it easily; and the whole head has a fine time of it, while they have to work for it and carry it about. They forget that it is the brain that gives them the means of living, and they often little know the anxieties of that brain which they envy so much. The great houses which are built, and which they would pull down and wreck if they could, could never have given bread to those who built them unless there were people to live in them; and there could be no people to live in them unless they had incomes to support them, and the spending of those very incomes is the bread of thousands of artisans and servants who would have no employment if those incomes were not there.

The rich, whether they like it or not, are compelled to live for the poor; there is scarce a single way in which they can spend their money but that it comes down to them at last—but often there is no thanks to them for this. God, indeed, overrules their selfishness; they are unconsciously what they ought to be consciously; and theirs, if only they knew it, is the bitter loss.

And now let us turn for a moment to the instruction to be derived from this. We may learn much, and that practically, in the way of feeling and action.

In the matter of feeling, there is great encouragement to those who occupy low positions, whatever they may be. We are apt to be depressed when we think how lowly our place is; but we are necessary. We have an importance; we may be only what the foot is to the brain, but we have our place, and an importance in it. The earth-worm is a very humble creature. What relation has it to the blushing rose, or the spreading palm, or the fruitful vine, to the great fields white with harvest, to the sustenance of the race of man? and yet I have read that unless the functions of the earth-worm were fulfilled the world would be uninhabitable for man. The housefly is one of the humblest creatures about our homes. What has it to do with the bounding steps and the rosy cheeks of those within its walls; and yet if there were no housefly to consume the deadly particles which are often floating in the dust we breathe, our lives would be in much greater danger than they are.

Don't envy other people's positions and gifts. You may be sure they have their troubles as well as you have yours—they have their own peculiar responsibilities too. You might be as happy in your sphere without having what others have, as they are in theirs with all they possess. A certain sultan, who found all the remedies of his physicians fail, was at last recommended to wear the shirt of the merriest man in his dominions—that would cure his melancholy. Well, at last the merriest man who could be found was caught and stripped, and lo! he had not a shirt at all—he was too poor to afford one.

Be content. Remember that your part, whatever it may be, is an assigned and ordered one—you have not been thought of no consequence, and not worth anything, because you are a foot and not a head. You have the qualifications necessary for a foot, you have not those necessary for a brain. There's many a one now an admirable foot, who if he were turned into a head would soon get giddy, and end by going out of his mind. Depression—the depression of isolation—is met, by remembering that in God's eye you are part of a great whole—and the fittest part for you.

And, if you want a consciousness of full dignity, look for it not in yourself alone, but in yourself as in connection with a great body—serving others, and served by others too. The clothes you wear involve the service of others to you, and the food you eat, and everything in life. God has ordained that you shall not only serve, but be served.

Your sphere may be very limited, but let there be contentment and conscious dignity in it. Remember you are part of a great body.

And as to action—don't allow yourself to be extinguished by extinguishing yourself. While wishing to be another, you may cease to be yourself.

Assert your place in the body by action. The foot! let itself be known as valuable by walking; the hand! by working. Show, by doing something, that you are worth something. And do it, if need be, in a limited sphere. The range of the hand's action is small compared with the range of the eye's vision, and the range of the foot's motion compared with the ear's ingathering of far distant sound; but the hand can polish a diamond and set it in a crown, and the foot can bear the eye to the vantage ground whence it can map out the stars which are in the sky.

You are best serving the whole—you are most carrying out the full and harmonious mind of God, you are most honouring yourselves, when you are fulfilling your own part, and doing what you were taught as a child to do—"your duty in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call you."

Be content in your own particular sphere—believe that you have a sphere—and that what is God-appointed is always best.

Awake, thou that Sleepest.*

"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."—EPHESIANS v. 4.

Words by JOHN FRANCIS WALLER, LL.D. Music by the REV. H. G. BONAVIA HUNT, MUS.D.

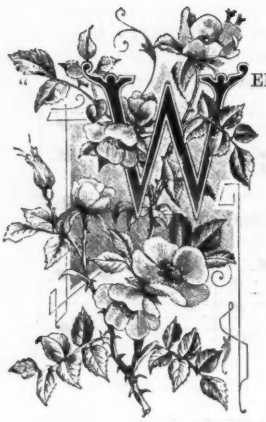
2. From Death's dark slumber wake thee;
Behold, the "Day-star" bright
Shines on thy heart to make thee
Alive in Christ, thy Light.
O Light, Thy light that givest
To all that look to Thee,
Thou art the Life that livest
Through all eternity.



3. Oh! let Thy light enlighten
Our darkness, Christ, we pray;
Wake us from sleep, and brighten
Our night, and make it day.
Thou Life, in Thee still living
O Christ, in mercy save
All those, in Thee believing,
From death beyond the grave.

* The Greek from which the words of this hymn are a translation, seems to be rhythmical, and was probably taken from some Christian hymn well known at the time.

'TWIXT LOVE AND HONOUR.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.—HONOUR.

"WELL, I 've succeeded in getting a nomination for you at last, Nellie; so now you 'll have an opportunity of distinguishing yourself," exclaimed Mr. Grantham, with very evident satisfaction.

"When is the examination, father?" asked pretty Nellie, in dismay.

"On the fifteenth of next month, lassie; so you 've no time to lose."

"I don't believe I shall ever know enough to pass."

"What! not after I have been down on my knees to all the big-wigs who sit at the board to get you a nomination?"

Nellie shook her head dolefully. "I shall never be able to do twenty-four 'tots' in half an hour."

"Oh, you must get Hester to coach you up a bit. She knows all about it; don't you, Hester?"

"Well, I suppose I ought to know something about it, uncle, at any rate," I replied, when thus appealed to.

It was in the old days, when one had to obtain a nomination in order to enter the lists of competitors for clerkships in the offices of the United Operatives' Life Insurance Company, the competition being then limited to three candidates for every vacancy.

Six years before, Mr. Grantham had obtained a nomination for me, and I had become a lady clerk.

I still held my appointment when the foregoing conversation took place, and valued it highly, for clerical duties were very congenial to me.

Mr. Grantham was not my uncle, although I addressed him as such; in fact, he was not related to me in any way. He had, however, taken me in when I was homeless and penniless, and he and his wife had been parents to me in all but name ever since. Need I say I loved them as a daughter, and that their joys were my joys, and their sorrows mine?

Nellie worked hard as soon as she got her nomination; and although, as she had said, she was not particularly quick at casting up columns of figures—or very brilliant at any branch of arithmetic, for that matter—still, she had sufficient knowledge of the other subjects in which she was to be examined for me to feel that she did at least stand a fair chance of acquitting herself creditably.

Of course I did the very best I could to prepare her for the coming ordeal, getting up early in the morning to set her tasks, and hurrying home of an evening to examine her day's work. What would I not have done to show my gratitude to the Granthams for their loving-kindness to me?

There were at that time three branch offices, situated in different manufacturing centres, where the business of the United Operatives' Life Insurance Company was carried on, all of which had opened their doors to women, the vacancies in the three offices being filled by the successful candidates at the one competitive examination. Those whose marks entitled them to a place high up on the list were allowed to select the office they would prefer to enter, while the others had to fill the vacancies that remained after the more successful ones had made their choice.

"Will you advise Nellie to go into your office if the option rests with her?" asked George Grantham of me the night before Nellie's examination.

"No, George; I think not."

"I fancy the pater will expect you to do so."

"I am afraid he will."

"He will think that you could give her a helping hand."

"And that is just what I could not do, George. It would not be fair to treat her differently from the other clerks because she happens to be as dear as a sister to me."

I could speak out plainly to George, for we were very dear friends, and thoroughly understood each other. He was a young doctor, and was then acting as assistant to his father's brother, Dr. Grantham, a successful medical practitioner. After a time he hoped to be allowed a share in the profits sufficiently large to enable him to marry, and when that happy day should arrive, he was to claim me as his future wife. Not much had been said about this conditional engagement in the family circle, as both George and I were rather shy of talking about it; still, I think the others knew of our attachment. At all events, there was no intentional deception on George's part, or on mine.

"Poor little soul! I do hope she will get on all right," murmured George, more to himself than to me.

Then, as I looked anxiously into his face, I could see that he shared my dread lest Nellie should not be able to adapt herself to official routine.

"Oh, George! what if she came into my office and didn't get on?"

"It 's no use meeting troubles half-way, dear," replied George, putting his hand kindly on my shoulder. "We can but do what we think right, and then leave the rest."

I felt that George's advice was sound. I would wait until the result of the examination was known, and then, if the option rested with Nellie, I would advise her to elect to go into one of the other two offices, and say out boldly my reason for doing so.

But when the list came out, Nellie's name was too near the bottom for there to be any choice in the matter.

However, there were great rejoicings at home when it was known she had been so far successful as to obtain an appointment at all.

"I told you little Nellie would do us all credit," exclaimed Mr. Grantham, with paternal pride. "It doesn't follow that a girl lacks brains because she isn't a dowdy;" and the proud father's eyes rested lovingly on his youngest daughter's winsome face.

"Do be quiet, John! you 'll make the child as vain as a peacock," said aunt. But she, too, gave a swift, admiring glance at dear Nellie, who was blushing very prettily.

It was such an indescribable relief to me not to have to damp their joy by the offer of unpalatable advice.

Very impatiently we all waited until Nellie was informed as to which office she was appointed.

"Oh, father, I shall be with Hester after all!" and tears of happiness shone in Nellie's eyes as she handed the paper containing this joyful intelligence to her father.

"Well, now, I do call that a stroke of luck. Here 's Nellie just as well off as if she hadn't had to put up with Hobson's choice. What do you think of that, George?—Hester will be able to give you a helping hand now, lassie, and no mistake!" exclaimed Mr. Grantham delightedly.

George gave one glance at me, a glance of sympathy and encouragement, and then evaded making a direct reply to his father's remark by asking Nellie when she was to attend for the first time.

"This day week," replied Nellie, again referring to her paper. "Oh, father, I do hope I shall be able to do the work! See—it says I am to be put on probation for three months," she added, calming down a little.

"Not much fear of that, lassie, with Hester at hand to put you in the right way."

Dear uncle! he was himself so ready to extend a helping hand to a friend in need, I felt at once how almost impossible it would be for him to realise that there may be occasions when, in fairness to others who are not friends, the helping hand should be withheld.

In those days, when the offices of the United Operatives' Life Insurance Company had not long thrown open their doors to women, promotion amongst the lady clerks was rapid; so that, although I had commenced my official career only six years before, I was already the head of a large section. It is different now, so I am told; and a girl may be a good worker, and yet not get even her first step up for several years. On the whole, I think it is better that it should be so. Looking back on my past experience, I cannot but feel that too much responsibility is not good for very young women.

Now, it was in the section of which I had charge that the probationers were tried. It would, therefore, be my duty, at the expiration of Nellie's three months' trial, to report on her work; and whether she were called upon to resign or offered a permanent appointment in the company's employ would, in a great measure, depend on the character of this report. Of course the report would be handed to the head of the branch, who would represent the case to the Board; but as I enjoyed the confidence of my chief, and the Board was guided entirely by her opinion, the decision practically rested with me. This was why I would so much rather Nellie had entered one of the other two offices.

We had several vacancies when Nellie got her appointment, so that five other probationers entered with her. Unfortunately for Nellie, these five showed great aptitude for the work.

I think it was rather a disappointment to Nellie when she discovered how very little I, as head of the section, came into touch with her. A duly qualified clerk was told off to teach her her new duties, and I had only the uncongenial task of cautioning her when she made errors. During the first day or two she called me Hester, as she had been accustomed to do nearly all her life; but as I always made a point of addressing her as Miss Grantham, she soon discontinued the use of my Christian name during office hours. It was the practice to observe the punctiliousness of official etiquette strictly. This was all very well as long as those in authority were not personally acquainted with the clerks under them; but I certainly felt it to be a little awkward to be obliged to treat Nellie, who was so very dear to me, just like any other junior clerk. And yet I knew that I ought to do so.

"You should rise, Miss Grantham, when Miss Langley addresses you," I overheard Nellie's instructress whisper to her after I had paused, when passing Nellie's desk, to speak to her about some official matter.

Poor Nellie got furiously red. But the next time I spoke to her she rose before replying, and, in her confusion, nearly upset her chair. I wonder which of us felt the more uncomfortable at that moment!

As I had feared before she entered, Nellie had but little natural aptitude for clerical work. She was painstaking and conscientious to a degree, but she appeared to experience great difficulty in mastering the details of her official duties, and was distressingly slow over all she did. It was no good for me to shut my eyes to facts: Nellie's work compared very unfavourably with the other five probationers'.

"Dear me! how dull Miss Grantham is!" I overheard my assistant, Miss Moore (who had a table next to mine), murmur to herself as she was ticking off some returns. This occurred when Nellie had been in the office about two months.

Then Miss Moore called Nellie up, and explained to her at great length how the return ought to have been made out. Miss Moore was very patient, and her explanation seemed to me to be particularly lucid; but I could see, by the one glance I ventured to cast at poor Nellie, how hopelessly puzzled she was.

Nellie returned to her seat, and at the expiration of a quarter of an hour brought the return up again.

Still the numbers were wrong. This time Miss Moore called up Miss Burton, Nellie's instructress.

"I wish you would get this return right for me, Miss Burton, and try to make Miss Grantham understand how it ought to be made out. I have already seen her about it."

"I did the very best I could."—p. 938.

"How do you think, Miss Grantham is getting on?" I asked Miss Moore, as soon as Miss Burton had retired.

Miss Moore looked grave. "Not very well, I am afraid, Miss Langley."

Now, Miss Moore was a very experienced clerk, and I had great confidence in her judgment. She was, moreover, thoroughly kind-hearted, and always said the best she could for a struggling junior.

"Is there anything we could do to help her, do you think? I should be grieved to be obliged to report unfavourably of her work."

"Yes; I should be very sorry for you to have to do that, Miss Langley: she is such a nice girl," murmured Miss Moore compassionately. "But it seems to me she has had many advantages already. She was taught by Miss Burton, if you remember, whose pupils have hitherto always turned out well; and the duty she is now on is a very light one."

I felt the force of all this. I had done the best I could for Nellie. I had given her an experienced instructress, and as soon as she was ready to go alone, I had put her on a light duty. Greater indulgence than this I could not have shown her without being unfair to those who, although they were not personally dear to me, had an equal claim on my consideration.

"There are not many errors recorded against her, Miss Moore," I observed, as I referred to the list.

"No, she is careful, but she is very slow. In times of pressure she gets so flustered that I always have to arrange for someone to help her, and the helper invariably does nearly all the work."

"Don't you think she may improve?"

"I hope so, I am sure, Miss Langley; but I am very much afraid it isn't in her."

Miss Moore's remarks merely confirmed the unfavourable opinion I had already formed of poor Nellie's official character. Had she been quick and careless, I should have been more hopeful of her; but painstaking, slow, nervous, and dull: these I knew were not the attributes that go to make a valuable clerk, however much time may be allowed for the process. And yet she tried so hard!

Of course, Nellie talked a good deal about matters official at home, and the Granthams soon learned to how great an extent her future career depended on the report I might give of her. But what they did not fully understand was that the character of this report must, in justice to others, be governed entirely by the quality and quantity of Nellie's work, and that I should be merely an instrument used in its preparation.

So when Nellie bewailed her manifold shortcomings, the slips she made, and her inability to get her work done to time, Mrs. Grantham would say—

"You must ask Hester to help you, dear. I am sure she would show you how to do it all properly if you went to her."

While Mr. Grantham would put it even more plainly—

"Don't you worry yourself, little lassie. Hester 'll pull you through right enough, never fear."

Mr. Grantham had done so much for me that, now I had an opportunity of making some little return, it was not in the nature of things that I should be so ungrateful as not to embrace it. Thus he reasoned, although he was almost unconscious of doing so. Had it been put plainly to him, would he wish me to deceive one who trusted me? He would have repudiated such a suggestion, while he would probably have been equally indignant had anyone explained to him that to advise the appointment of an inefficient clerk at a salary which would command the services of an efficient one would be tantamount to being generous with the shareholders' money. Nevertheless, I felt that nothing I could say would ever make this plain to Mr. Grantham. He had but a poor opinion of women's business capabilities. When the supply exceeded the demand, it was of course necessary to institute some such method of selection as a competitive examination; but when a clerk was once admitted into one of the three offices, the work required from her must be so simple that to fail in performing it would be an impossibility. Those in authority over her might raise an objection or two; but all such objections would arise from a desire to magnify the imaginary difficulties of that which they did well themselves, rather than from any inherent defects in the work submitted.

What, therefore, would he think if honour compelled me to report unfavourably of Nellie's work, and she were, in consequence, called upon to resign her appointment?

I asked myself this question repeatedly, and I could find but one answer. George would understand me, and Nellie would know I had only performed a most painful duty; but Mr. Grantham and the other members of the family would always believe I had refused to make the only return in my power for all their goodness to me.

But there was another month yet, and Nellie's work might improve. As George said before she passed the examination, it was no good meeting troubles half-way.

And it did improve, but the improvement was so slight that I would almost rather it had retrograded. Poor Nellie was still so careful, slow, nervous, and dull, that I could not fail to see the makings of a really good clerk were not in her.

Then came the agony of trying to decide what I ought to do. Hour after hour I would lie awake at night, endeavouring to make up my mind one way or the other.

I think Nellie must have known how sorely distressed I was. We used to have long talks together about the work, and I would make any suggestions I could think of likely to help her. But when she bewailed her own inability to carry out these suggestions, I did not dare to say a word of encouragement to her, lest I should be buoying her up with false hope.

"I shall be glad when it is all settled, both for your sake and Nellie's. I shall have to prescribe for the pair of you soon, if you worry yourselves much more," George remarked to me, a few days before Nellie's probation report was due.

"Oh, George, George! what shall I do? I was never so perplexed and unhappy before."

"Do what you feel to be right, dearest."

I never knew anyone so brave as George. One look into his steadfast eyes always gave me courage. And then I had such perfect confidence in his judgment: he seemed so to have accustomed himself to look all difficulties straight in the face and go boldly forward.

"But, George, I cannot make up my mind what I ought to do. It would have been so much easier if she had failed utterly. Of course, I should have been bitterly grieved to have been obliged to report against her; still I should have had no choice in the matter. As it is, however, she is not a downright bad worker; she is only an indifferent one."

"What would you do if you were not personally interested in her, dear?"

"George, I don't know—I really don't know. I have thought and worried over it so much until my head seems in a whirl."

"I tried to write out the rough draft."—p. 942

"It seems to me that what you have to try to do is to put all personal feeling aside, and treat Nellie exactly as you would were she one of the others now on probation."

"If she is called upon to resign, it will be a dreadful blow to uncle."

George could only look grave. "I know it is difficult for you, Hester, my darling," he said, very tenderly.

"He will think me so terribly ungrateful."

"Better that than that you should know yourself to have acted dishonourably."

"Oh, George, if I could only wake up and find it all a bad dream!"

But no such escape as that was possible. As George said, what I had to do was to put all personal feeling aside. I ought not to lean towards Nellie because I was so interested in her welfare; while, on the other hand, I ought not to decide against her from sheer dread of being unduly influenced by my love for her. If only the quality of her work had been a few degrees either better or worse!

And if I could pass her without being disloyal to my employers, surely it was my duty to do so?

Then, in the sanctity of my own room, I took up pen and paper, and tried to write out the rough draft of a favourable report.

But as I wrote on I seemed to see the reproachful eyes of my chief fixed on me; she had always treated me with such implicit confidence. Throughout my official career, I had never intentionally deceived her by word or look. I respected her so thoroughly, I loved her so loyally, I——

Thinking thus, I tore up the report I was writing into fragments, and burned them one by one in the candle, while the tears rolled down my cheeks.

The next day I wrote another report, in which appeared the fatal words: "I should not wish to have Miss Grantham working permanently in my section."

Poor Nellie! If that report went forward, her doom was sealed. Nevertheless, I felt that as the words were true, they ought to stand. If all the clerks under me had been no better able to perform their duties than was Nellie Grantham, I could not possibly have got the work of the section done to the satisfaction of my chief.

Then I locked up the report in my desk. It wanted two days to the date on which it should be handed to the head of the branch.

Twenty times I was tempted to tone it down, as I looked at Nellie's pale, anxious face, and thought of all that would be said when she should carry home the sad news of her failure. But loyalty to my chief triumphed, and early on the morning of the appointed day I sent the report to her just as it stood. Since attempting to write that other favourable report I had never doubted in which direction duty pointed.

I thought that perhaps my chief would send for me as soon as she read the report, but the day wore on, and she did not do so.

That evening, while Nellie and I were sitting together at work, she began talking about the office.

"I seem to have got on a little better to-day, Hester. I really begin to think that if I keep on trying very hard, I shall get on right in course of time."

I murmured some inarticulate reply, and made an excuse to hurry out of the room. Official etiquette would not permit me to prepare Nellie for the bitter disappointment in store for her, and I could not bear to hear her talking in so hopeful a tone.

In the hall I met George, who had just let himself in with a latch-key.

"Oh Hester! Hester, my darling! it has come at last!" he exclaimed, when he caught sight of me; and in another moment he had folded me in his arms.

"What is it, George?" I asked in much astonishment; for George was not generally a demonstrative lover.

"Uncle Benjamin has taken me into partnership, and we can be married just as soon as ever we like."

"Taken you into partnership, George! Why, you didn't even hope for that, did you?"

"Well, dear, between you and me, I have thought just lately that that might be what he meant to do; but I didn't like to say anything about it, even to you, in case I was mistaken."

Then George carried his good news to the other members of the family, and we all talked, laughed, and asked questions at the same time without waiting for the answers.

And in the midst of the excitement George led me forward, and formally introduced me as his future wife.

No one was in the least surprised; but they all clustered round me and kissed me, as they offered their congratulations.

"'Whoso findeth a wife findeth a good thing,'" quoted uncle; "and I am well pleased you did not go far afield to seek one, George, for Hester has been as a dear daughter to me these many years."

But when we had all calmed down a little, and were arranging to have a family dinner the following evening in honour of George's partnership with his uncle and his engagement to me, my thoughts wandered back to poor Nellie, and my face grew grave.

"Why, Hester, you are saying hardly a word," observed George, when I had sat by his side in silence for some time.

"Marriage is a solemn business," remarked uncle. "And Hester won't make a worse wife because she looks a bit grave over it. Take my word for that, George."

But George was not altogether satisfied.

"What is troubling you, dear?" he asked, as I was wishing him good night. "I don't want to hurry you if it really is inconvenient; but considering we have already waited——"

"George, it isn't that at all. I will come to you gladly directly you really need me, dear," I replied eagerly. I was far too upset to consider whether I ought to make quite so free a gift of myself.

Of course George expressed his gratitude for this noble offer in becoming terms.

"But what is it, then, dearest?" he asked, a few minutes later on.

"Oh, George, it's poor dear Nellie!" Then I laid my head on George's shoulder, and a big sob escaped me.

"Hester, Hester, don't, my own darling!" exclaimed George, with all a man's natural aversion to tears.

George said all he could to comfort me, commending me for what he termed my courage in doing that which I felt to be right. But I could see that he, too, was bitterly grieved on poor Nellie's account, and I was very, very miserable.

The next morning I had occasion to see my chief about some work that had to be done in my section.

Just as I was about to retire, she called me back.

"The probationers in your section seem to have got on very well, with the exception of Miss Grantham." And as she spoke, Miss Semple unfolded Nellie's report.

"Yes, Miss Semple," I answered.

"And you say you would rather not keep Miss Grantham."

"I am afraid she would never make an efficient clerk."

"What would you say to extending her probation for another six weeks, Miss Langley?"

I was prepared for this question, and yet I hardly knew how to reply to it.

"Perhaps you think it would be of no use," said Miss Semple, seeing that I hesitated.

"I should not be very hopeful about the result, Miss Semple," I replied at length.

"Let me see, Miss Langley: you say she is careful, but very slow and rather dull. Can she do a full day's work?"

"No, Miss Semple."

"On no occasion has she done so?"

"I think not; in fact, I am sure she has not."

"And she does stupid things, I suppose?"

I admitted that she did.

"Oh, well, Miss Langley, I will represent the case to the Board, and let you know its decision later on."

In the afternoon Miss Semple sent for me.

"You will be interested to hear, Miss Langley, that the Board has instructed me to offer permanent appointments to five of the probationers and to call upon Miss Grantham to resign."

It was just what I had expected. Yet, now that it had come, I felt it to be a shock.

"Will you see them all this afternoon, Miss Semple?" and as I put the question I felt that my voice quavered.

"I am going to send for them at once."

The five successful probationers went into the chief's room first, one by one, and each came out with a smiling face to announce her success to her fellow-clerks.

Then came poor Nellie's turn. I turned quite faint as I watched her walk across the office. Even her lips were colourless, I observed.

She returned at the expiration of ten minutes, and came straight up to my table.

"Will you give me some foolscap, please, Miss Langley? I am to write my resignation at once."

It didn't sound like Nellie's voice at all. I handed her the paper, without daring to look at her. I was afraid that she would break down every moment, and had she done so, I felt that I must have thrown my arms round her, and wept too.

"I am not to go to the office any more," announced Nellie, in a choking voice, when she got home that evening.

"Not going to the office any more! How's that?" asked her father sharply.

"I can't do the work;" and poor Nellie's long pent-up tears began to flow.

"Who says you can't do the work?"

There was no answer for a few seconds, and then the word "Hester" was heard between her sobs.

"Speak up, lass; I doubt if I understand you."

But Nellie sobbed on.

"And how about the other five you've talked so much about?"

"They've—all passed—their—probation."

"And who said they could do the work?"

"H-H-Hester."

"Do you mean to tell me that Hester had the face to say all those five could do the work, and you were the only one who couldn't?"

"But, father, it wasn't Hester's fault—it wasn't, indeed," explained Nellie, getting more coherent as she began to realise that her father was about to put the blame on me.

"I wouldn't have believed it of her. No, I wouldn't have believed she'd have done such a thing if my own brother had told me so. And I thought she was so fond of us all."

"Father, father, you mustn't say that; you mustn't, indeed. I couldn't do the work. It wasn't Hester's fault."

And then she broke down again, and sobbed more bitterly than ever.

"Nellie dear, you know how grieved I am about it, don't you?" And as I spoke I put my arms about her and drew her to me.

"Stand aside, Hester," said Mr. Grantham sternly. "A little doing is worth a great deal of talking."

Then Mrs. Grantham came into the room, followed by some other members of the family, and there was more weeping and wailing.

Preparations had been made for a family dinner that evening, at which Dr. and Mrs. Grantham, and a few other relatives and intimate friends, were to be present to congratulate George and me.

With a heavy heart I dressed for the occasion.

As for Nellie, her eyes were so red that she went straight up to bed.

"Where is Nellie?" whispered George to me, as we took our seats at the table.

"She has a headache and has gone to bed. She was called upon to resign to-day. Uncle is so angry and aunt so grieved about it," I whispered back.

"Poor Nellie! To-night of all nights, too! It was the greatest mistake in the world for her ever to have gone up for the examination. Poor little soul!" and George looked about as miserable as I felt.

It was a wretched affair, that dinner. And it might have been so different! There were no end of speeches, in which my name was coupled with George's, and people said kind things about me, thinking that by so doing they were pleasing their host and hostess. But

Mr. Grantham did not glance at me once during those two long weary hours; while Mrs. Grantham's manner, whenever she addressed me, was painfully constrained.

CHAPTER II.—LOVE.

My life at home after Nellie's failure became known was very depressing. Mr. Grantham seldom spoke to me; and although I was convinced Mrs. Grantham endeavoured not to be unduly influenced by what had occurred, I missed that touch of motherly sympathy in her manner to which she had so long accustomed me. It was the same with the others, always excepting George and Nellie. No word of reproach was addressed to me; nevertheless, I was made to feel how grievously I had offended.

Every morning I left Nellie studying the advertisements in the daily papers, and every evening I returned to find her worn out after a fruitless search for employment; for the Granthams were not sufficiently well off to keep her at home.

In private, Nellie would tell me of her many disappointments, and we would grieve over them together; but in the family circle my advent was always a signal for the subject to be dropped. Mr. Grantham evidently felt that had I been only commonly grateful for all his goodness to me, this trouble would not have come to poor Nellie; therefore he would not allow it to be discussed in my presence.

No active opposition was offered to my marriage; and as George was anxious that it should not be unnecessarily delayed, I began to prepare for it. Still, I was made to feel that Mr. Grantham no longer cared to welcome me as a daughter-in-law, and I was, in consequence, very, very unhappy.

What with the worry of getting my new home together, the sorrow of feeling myself so grievously misunderstood, and the misery of seeing poor Nellie grow thinner and paler as she met with fresh disappointments day after day, I at length began to feel quite ill. So I resigned my clerkship in the employ of the United Operatives' Insurance Company a month before the date fixed for my wedding, with the intention of going into the country for change of air. To leave all those with whom I had worked happily for so long was in itself a wrench, and that I was debarred from speaking of it at home did not make it easier.

Of course I did not care to go away alone; so I asked Marian, Mr. Grantham's eldest daughter, if she would accompany me. Marian was a widow, with one little girl. She seemed pleased at the suggestion; and so it was arranged that she, little Elsie, and I should go for a fortnight to Pindale, a small, prettily situated village about twenty miles out of Birmingham.

Elsie was a sweet little maiden of four, the pet of the whole household, and the very apple of her grandfather's eye.

"So mother and Aunt Hester are going to take you into the country, are they?" said Mr. Grantham, as Elsie climbed up on his knees and imparted the joyful intelligence

It was the first time uncle had spoken kindly of me since Nellie's failure.

It was, therefore, with a lighter heart than I had had for many a day that I started one Monday morning, with Marian and Elsie, for Pindale. George was to come down the following Saturday, and stay over Sunday.

Pindale was a charming spot. The freedom of country life had the effect of making Elsie rapturously happy; while in watching her delight, all misunderstanding between Marian and myself soon ceased to exist; so that I was well pleased we had come away together.

However, when George came down on the Saturday, he thought we were not looking much better for the change.

"I hope the drains are all right," he observed. "You are all rather pale, especially Elsie."

And again on the Monday morning, as we three were standing on the platform, seeing him off, George remarked—

"If I were you, Marian, I wouldn't give Elsie milk without boiling it first."

"You don't think there is anything really the matter with her, do you, George?" Marian asked, in some anxiety.

"No; I suspect she has been running about rather too much. Still, it's just as well to be careful."

Marian boiled Elsie's milk, and we both did all we could to keep her from over-tiring herself.

"Poor little mite! she does look pale!" exclaimed Marian to me that evening.

She was peevish, too, and kept putting her hand up to her throat. "It hurts," she complained more than once. We noticed that her throat was a little swollen, and that the glands behind the ears were slightly enlarged; but we were too inexperienced to attach much importance to these symptoms.

"I am afraid she has a bad cold coming," said Marian.

We put her to bed, and gave her some hot arrowroot. She refused to take more than a few spoonfuls, and was very cross and fretful. She was naturally such a bright, sweet-tempered child, that I almost wonder her peevishness did not alarm us more.

She was very restless all night, but in the morning she seemed better. As the day wore on, however, she got worse again, and in the evening she was in a high state of fever. She kept constantly complaining of her throat hurting her, and she appeared to experience some difficulty in breathing.

"I shall send for a doctor," announced Marian; "I have never seen her like this before when she has had a cold."

The doctor lived a couple of miles off. However, our landlady kindly offered to go for him. Marian was much relieved, as she did not like the prospect of being left alone with Elsie.

A horrible dread had assailed me, so that I was not altogether taken by surprise when the doctor, after a few minutes' examination, declared Elsie to be suffering from diphtheria. But poor Marian was in a terrible state.

"Will she die?" she asked, with volumes of pent-up agony in her voice.

XUM

"'You must have been mad to let her do it.'"—p. 946.

"There is no immediate danger; but she will require very careful watching."

In the morning she again seemed a little better. But the doctor did not appear reassured; so that later in the day we telegraphed for George. We knew, however, that he could not possibly arrive before the next morning.

Towards sunset Elsie got rapidly worse. We again sent for the doctor. When he arrived he looked very grave. However, he declared that even then there was no immediate danger. But he would, he said, call in last thing that night, and bring his assistant with him.

Elsie grew worse and worse, until we could hardly control our impatience for the doctor's return.

"Oh, Hester, is she dying?"

"No; not yet." The words were wrung out of me.

It was awful to watch the child struggling for breath, and to be so powerless to help her.

"Can't we do anything for her, Hester?"

"I think the doctor will be able to relieve her when he comes, Marian."

"If he would only come!"

A few minutes after that he did arrive.

"There is no time to be lost," he said to his assistant. "We must do it at once: it 's the only chance."

"Do what?" asked Marian.

"Operate on her."

"Operate on her! How?" And Marian looked the alarm she felt.

"The usual operation of tracheotomy is necessary." Then the doctor turned to speak to his assistant.

It was what I had dreaded. Tracheotomy was, I knew, performed only in the most desperate cases, the percentage of recoveries after it being very small.

Elsie lay in Marian's lap, and I held the light while the doctor and his assistant divided the rings of the trachea and inserted a tube.

The operation relieved the child greatly. The doctor stayed till about twelve o'clock, and then left, saying he would call first thing in the morning.

During the next hour Elsie was comparatively quiet. Then the distressing symptoms returned, and their severity gradually increased. She threw her head back; now her arms were thrown up, then they were seizing hold of her throat violently, as if to remove the painful respiration; her nostrils were in perpetual motion, and her face became puffed and distorted.

And there were we—two lonely, helpless women—in a strange, silent house during the still hours of the night, watching the agonies of a dying child whom we dearly loved.

"Oh, Hester! couldn't you fetch him again?"

I shook my head. "She would be dead before I could bring him back; besides, he couldn't do anything. Tracheotomy is the last resource. When that fails, there is nothing more to be done."

"Nothing? Oh, my poor, poor darling!"

Elsie's agony was frightful to witness.

Suddenly I sprang to my feet. Yes, I remembered about it now; and I would try it. I don't think I could have helped making the attempt even if my reason had bidden me desist, my heart was so lacerated by the sight of poor little Elsie's dreadful sufferings.

I paused a moment to consider. Had I any anywhere? Then I snatched up a pair of scissors, and the hat I had trimmed for myself for country wear with artificial poppies and India muslin.

"Whatever are you going to do, Hester?"

But I was too excited to explain.

In another moment I had cut away from the trimming of my hat a piece of muslin about three or four inches square, and had steeped it in disinfecting fluid. I also rinsed my mouth out with the fluid.

Placing the muslin on Elsie's windpipe, and so arranging it that it formed a small sac over the orifice, I knelt down, and bent over the little sufferer.

"What are you going to do, Hester?" again inquired Marian.

"Suck the tube and clear it of the obstructing membrane, if I can."

"But, Hester, isn't it dreadfully dangerous? Oh, do you think you dare do it?" Anxiety for her child kept Marian from making more than a faint protest.

"George said that if that poor young doctor at the hospital had used a piece of muslin, there would have been little or no risk. But, Marian, if I—die, give my dearest love to uncle, and tell him——"

Here Elsie had another terrible paroxysm, which threatened to cause immediate suffocation. There was not a moment to be lost; so I received the sac into my mouth, and commenced drawing up the diphtheritic films.

The operation was successful even beyond my wildest hopes. Elsie's struggles ceased almost immediately; and in the morning, when the doctor came, he pronounced his little patient out of danger. He, however, expressed great surprise at the wonderful improvement in her condition, admitting that on the previous evening he had entertained but little hope of her recovery. So Marian told him what I had done, and he listened with grave attention.

Then he turned to me, and said such kind things that I should blush to repeat them. But when he had finished complimenting me, he felt my pulse, looked very grave, and said he would call again in the evening.

George arrived by the first train from Birmingham, and Marian went through the whole story again for his benefit.

"You must have been mad to let her do it!" exclaimed George, as soon as Marian had finished speaking.

"But Elsie was dying, George; and Hester said you declared no risk was incurred if a piece of muslin were used."

"That is only a theory," exclaimed George, impatiently; "I have never tested it. You ought to have known better than to have let her do it."

Here Marian began to cry. It was so natural that she should think no sacrifice too great to save her child's life: natural, too, I suppose, that George should regret I had incurred any risk. Yet I felt sure he would have done the same himself had he been in my place.

"Anyhow, all's well that ends well, George," I put in.

"But you are not out of the wood yet, Hester; in fact, it is at present impossible to tell what effect it may have on you."

I was not to escape. I had a sharp attack of diphtheria, and suffered terribly, but I had more strength to battle against it than poor little Elsie. However, it left me very weak, and the date originally fixed for my wedding was long past before I was strong enough to return to Birmingham.

But when I did return, I was made very happy by uncle's reception of me.

"Hester, my own brave girl!" he said, as he put his hands on my shoulders and kissed my forehead.

And then I heard what was to me the best of news: Nellie had gone as nursery governess to the children of a young married lady with whom we were slightly acquainted.

She came in to see me on the night of my return, and spoke very hopefully of her new position.

"It is work I like, and that I feel I can do well," she said. "I don't mean to be conceited, but I do think Mrs. Wood is satisfied with me."

"Hester was about right, after all: it 's no use trying to fit a round peg into a square hole," uncle observed, rather gruffly.

We all felt this to be a great concession on Mr. Grantham's part, because he was not given to admitting himself to have been in the wrong.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

LIFE'S SUNSET-TIME.

"I AM a good many years older than you are, sir!"—"Perhaps you are none the better for that!" Such was the style of conversation we heard of late between two travellers, who had entered into hot debate, apparently political. It suggests to us, among other things, the question: Are we better for growing old, for nearing life's sunset-time? The hearts that have weathered life's storms ought to be considerably better in many ways than those whose barques are but lately launched. Not only should we be richer in judgment, in experience, in knowledge than those treading behind us, but infinitely richer in tenderness, sympathy, and patience. Severe were our verdicts and sweeping our condemnations in the years gone by. Our heroes were on the topmost pinnacle; those with whom we did not agree were completely and utterly wrong, and nothing remained to be said in their favour. Now, though we love our brethren better, we are not so exacting in our expectations from them; and having fallen so far short ourselves of what we would fain have been, and knowing that the hearts around us have cares and difficulties known only to God, we judge not our neighbours, for the time that is left is too short for aught save love and help. Our age should be like the flower of evening, which puts forth its blossom of sweetness when day is ending. Emerson reminds us that of a certain Spanish prince it was said, "The more you took from him, the greater he looked." Let not our hearts fail us if the relentless scythe of Time has swept life's roses from us, and much that we possessed of energy, intellectual force, ability for work, faculty for organisation. Much has been taken from us, but we who are kings and priests unto God are the greater for Time's work. The years have brought us a harvest beyond what we have lost, and, lending a helping hand and drawing for others from the stores of dearly-bought experience, we pass onward gently in the sunset-glow, content to linger here or to answer the home-call, as God shall please. By His great might, it is ours, infirm as we are, to "live like light, or die in light like dew."

ENCOURAGEMENT WON FROM OPPONENTS.

One of the most encouraging signs of the success of Christian mission work in India is that unintentionally given by those who least desire to encourage it. Recently a spirit of antagonism to Christianity has been aroused both among the Mohammedans and the Hindus. The most learned moulvies of the former have been called upon seriously to examine the question as to whether permission should be granted to Christian ladies to enter the Zenanas and teach the inmates, and have decided that such permission ought not to be granted, since it was imperilling the Mohammedan faith. The establishment of a Tract Society among the Hindus, avowedly to counteract the work of the Christian missionaries, shows that the adherents of Hinduism share the alarm of the Mohammedans. The wife of a missionary at Bellary tells of a book shown her by a native woman describing the punishments in store for those who listen to the Christian teachers. This book is liberally enriched with illustrations depicting men being pounded in mortars, or being hacked to pieces with knives, or being thrown upon trees (apparently of a species cultivated for the purpose, as each several leaf is a razor), or being subjected to various other tortures. Such attempts at intimidation are likely to overreach themselves, and to lead to a comparison between Brahmanical and Christian teaching which will be in favour of the latter. At any rate it is evidence that the leaders of the faiths which Christians are seeking to supersede in India are not congratulating themselves on the "great missionary failure," and this ought to be an encouragement alike to the missionaries and to those who sympathise with them.

THE DYING KING AND THE HUGUENOT NURSE.

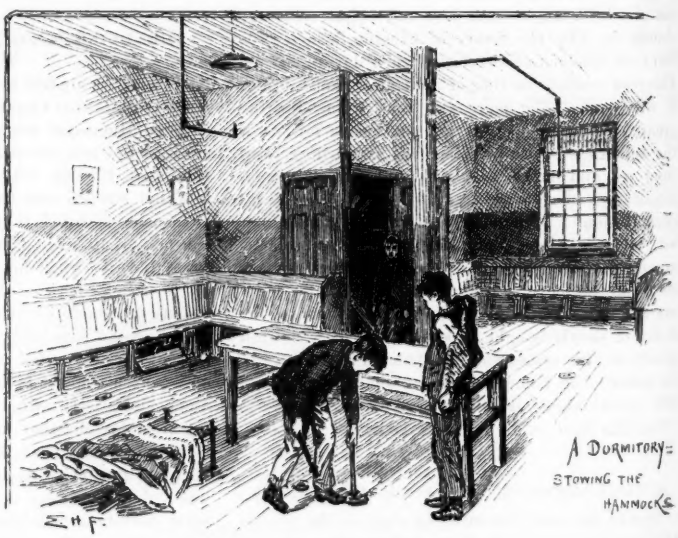
It seems, we are told in one of the Protestant Papers for the People, that Charles had bargained for the lives of some Huguenot domestics in his household, and amongst the rest, for that of his faithful old nurse, Philippine Flipote. And now, when the king fell into that strange and mortal malady—of which his physicians declared they had never seen the like (the only man, since Christ, who is known to have sweat blood)—when his complexion became flushed, his eyes glaring, and his slumbers disturbed by visions of murdered men, then this pious woman would soothe him and speak gentle and hopeful words to her distracted master. She was, indeed, the only person who could comfort him, and when cardinals and priests retired horror-struck and despairing from his chamber, it was whispered in Court, "If he opens his heart to take in true hope, it will be from the voice of old Philippine." And so it was: the king kept crying, "My God! my God! what horrors—what blood!" She took from him his tear-drenched and blood-drenched handkerchief, and spoke to him of "the blood that cleanseth from all sin, and speaketh better things than that of Abel." And it was she who heard and treasured up his last words: "If the Lord Jesus will indeed receive me into the company of the blessed——" How remarkable that sort of double retribution of justice and mercy—this monarch made a spectacle of pity to men and angels for his representative part in this bloodshed, and yet saved and taught by a poor Huguenot, for whose life he had interceded.



MR. WHEATLEY.

LENDING A HELPING HAND.

At St. Giles's Christian Mission, Brooke Street, Holborn, may be seen two Homes: one for discharged adult male prisoners, the other for boys. The latter is one of three Homes started of late for receiving juvenile criminals direct from prison, and rescuing them from a life of crime. Mr. Wheatley, the indefatigable secretary of the mission, whose portrait accompanies this note, visits the different prisons and lays claim to the young misdemeanants; in other words, they are given into his charge, instead of remaining for a time in gaol and being afterwards cast back upon the streets to resume their career of theft. There are now between fifty and sixty in the Homes, most of whom are employed by various firms during the day, and return to the Homes at night, bringing their receipts with them. They are under constant supervision, and are generally found to prefer a course of virtuous labour to the evil one to which they have too often been driven either by starvation or wicked associations. Many have remained two years in the Home, and have subsequently kept their situations for indefinite periods of one or two years, and are at the present moment respectably placed. Others have gone to sea or emigrated to the colonies, and satisfactory letters and reports are constantly received from or of them. The inmates of the Homes are expected to go twice every Sunday to Wilde Street Mission Chapel, and to subscribe their names on a register kept there in token of their presence. It was at this chapel, in the year 1877, that Mr. George Hatton began his work among prisoners anxious to reform; and it would be impossible to calculate the numbers snatched from a life of crime during these thirteen years. The Homes for boys are an offshoot of this, and a more hopeful sight could scarcely be seen than these lads when gathered together for any particular occasion, respectably dressed, and with no "outward or visible sign" of the juvenile criminal in their appearance or look. Indeed, the Homes in Brooke Street, and the mission generally, deserve every possible support; for the most sceptical people must confess that it is cheaper, better, and certainly more Christian, to help both men and boys to maintain themselves, than to pay heavy rates for their maintenance in prison.

WASTE NOT, WANT NOT.

Nowhere is the prodigality of youth more conspicuous than in the waste of affection and happiness. When young and surrounded by friends, we treat affection in a scornful way as if it could never cease to flow to us. When it does cease, we look back with sorrowful wonder at our folly. The old home is broken up which we did not care to visit until too late. Now the warmest welcome we get anywhere is at an inn. The caress which we took as a matter of course, if we did not reject it, is no longer proffered. We wasted affection, and now we want it. We cared for no one, and now no one cares for us. "Blind and deaf that we are: oh, think, if thou yet love anybody living, wait not till death sweep down the paltry little dust-clouds and idle dissonances of the moment, and all be at last so mournfully clear and beautiful, when it is too late." In the same way pure and peaceful happiness is too often despised, while we rush after unsatisfying excitement.

"NOT ABSENT ONCE."

Some months ago (April, 1890, page 478) we drew attention, under this title, to the report of a Transatlantic superintendent, who had in his Sunday-school a teacher who had not been absent once in twelve years, and a scholar who had made the full number of attendances for fourteen consecutive years. This record seemed to us, as we confessed at the time, unique. But we are glad to learn from correspondents all over the kingdom that it is not quite so. From the south-west of Scotland we hear of a teacher whose home is nearly three miles from his school and the church at which he worships, but who has, nevertheless, only been absent three times from either in forty-six years. Liverpool boasts a Bible-class in which a stonemason, who is one of its members, has made, at the rate of two each Sunday, 1,227 consecutive attendances, and who also devotes part of the time between the meetings of the class to tract distribution and other good works. A Birmingham teacher is able to report nearly a quarter of a century's regular attendance, during the whole of which long time he has not been fifteen minutes late. From far Kirkwall we hear of a teacher whose record is just that of our American friend—twelve years' unbroken service. A school at Dresden, near Longton, reports that of 350 scholars, seven have not been late or absent once for ten years, five for eleven years, two for twelve years, five for thirteen years, and one for fourteen years. And one ceases to wonder at this splendid record when he reads that of the teachers there are about a dozen who had previously made fourteen years' regular attendance as scholars.

HOW WE KILL OURSELVES AND OTHERS.

Though suicide is acknowledged a great sin in Christian England, and though hardly any crime carries with it so much horror as that of murder, how many there are who, by their culpable carelessness, if not deliberately and with malice aforethought, kill themselves and others! We are entrusted with our own welfare and with that of others, yet even serious people seldom reflect how the care of their health is a religious duty; and as for our thoughtlessness concerning the health of others, many of us seem to consider murder a fine art. Although the guilt is not so great, the effect of careless homicide is the same as wilful murder. And yet the speculative builder who professes to be a Christian, and who feels unfeigned horror at Burmese or Bulgarian atrocities, is not at all disturbed in his sleep or peace of mind by the fact that his badly-built, badly-drained houses are slaying their victims by slow torture. Murder most foul is committed by those who sell adulterated food; by employers who take no care to counteract the unhealthy influences which necessarily belong to several trades; by parents who will not isolate their children when they have infectious disease; and by every careless, thoughtless person.

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

A TEACHER'S PREPARATION.

We once heard the wish expressed by a wise and excellent pastor that the many aids provided by the printer for our spiritual progress were cremated or otherwise destroyed. He was of the opinion that in the case of Sunday-school teachers, for instance, it would be better for them to prepare, individually instructed by the Spirit, than for them to lean on the help of the thoughts of others. Now, if all Christian teachers and workers had plenty of leisure, there might have been more room for so sweeping a condemnation; but we have a noble army of self-sacrificing helpers who are earning their living all the week, and have neither time nor opportunity for research, yet long to bring to their classes the best and highest that is possible. Some may say, "Then let them bring what the Holy Spirit teaches as they study the Book of books; they want no book but that." Yet let us remember that the Master speaks to others besides ourselves; and when He has given a message to those who have the opportunity of printing it, He surely means them to pass it on, and thus to make that message an inspiration to hundreds. It seems to us that it is right and reasonable gratefully to use all such aids as are within our reach; though the teacher's personal contact with the Master must render his instruction alive, and his own individuality ought to permeate all that he has brought to his scholars. There is doubtless a danger in leaning entirely upon what others have provided. God's Word has a special message for us too, and no other study will avail if we neglect what Scott, in his last illness, described as "the only complete, perfect Book." Better hear no more sermons, read no more spiritual instructions, rather than accept these in the place of personal study of the Scriptures. One of the martyrs was informed once by an ecclesiastic that the Bible holds enough for our salvation, but not for our instruction. The sensible answer was, "Well, then, sir, God send me salvation, and take you the instruction!"

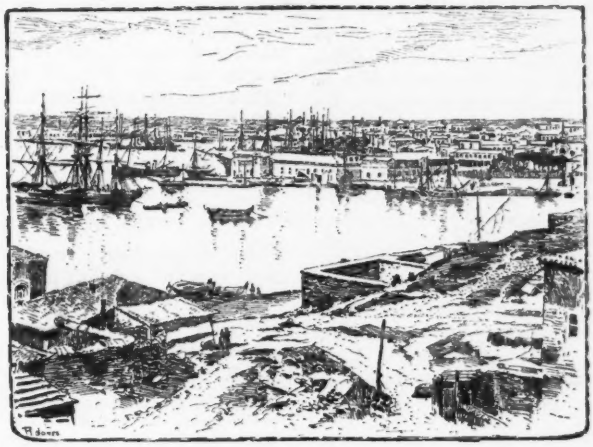
PIETY AT HOME.



When Jesus had cast the unclean spirit out of the Gadarene, he said to him: "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." Every Christian should so live as to be able to say with the good Methodist preacher, "If you don't believe I am a Christian, ask my wife." "I would not give much for that man's religion," said Rowland Hill, "whose very cat and dog are not better for it."

SOMETHING FOR EVERYBODY.

Under the authority of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, a committee was appointed not long ago to draw up a scheme for four years' series of lessons to be used in Sabbath schools. The scheme was drawn up, and includes 40 lessons on the Old Testament; two series of 40 lessons each on the Life, Teaching, and Works of our Lord; and a fourth series of 40 lessons on the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles. The committee was further authorised to prepare a series of lesson-helps for the use of teachers in schools where these courses were adopted; and the result of their labours is seen in three handsome volumes that have just been issued by Messrs. R. and R. Clark, of Edinburgh, under the title of "The Scottish Sabbath School Teachers' Book." Each volume covers the whole four series, but with special view to the differing needs of teachers of three grades of scholars—first, those from seven to ten years of age; second, those from ten to fourteen; and third, those above fourteen years of age. In each grade the various courses of lessons have been allotted to different writers, sometimes two or more writers dividing the work of a single course. This secures great thoroughness of treatment throughout; and in the important matter of suitability to scholars of the age aimed at in each grade, the editors have had the advantage of the advice of qualified educational experts. Primarily, no doubt, these three volumes will be of use to those of our Scotch friends who adopt these courses of lessons, but many a worker who speaks to children south of the Tweed will be glad of their assistance in the preparation of lessons or addresses for young people. We are glad to see that the editors throughout emphasise the fact that these volumes are for the help of teachers in the preparation of their lessons, and must not be regarded as substitutes for preparation. A work intended rather for the use of preachers and students than for teachers is Dr. Bullinger's reprint of Thomas Boys's "Key to the Psalms" (published by the editor at 7, St. Paul's Churchyard, E.C.)—an extension of a work first issued some five-and-sixty years ago. It is a most valuable index, analytical and synthetical, of the Psalms, showing the parallelisms in each, and the plan upon which, humanly speaking, it is built up. A work more suggestive of thought it would be difficult to take up. Our young readers will find in "Nigel Browning" (Longmans) a capital story by that good friend of all girl readers, Miss Agnes Giberne. Now that we are once more at the season of lengthening evenings, this story ought to find many a reader, as should another single-volume story from the same publishers, under the title of "Hurstleigh Dene," by Mrs. O'Reilly, whose work is illustrated by our old friend Mr. E. Edwards. As gift-books or prizes these two volumes would be most acceptable. A pleasantly told and most instructive work for children is "The Story of Denmark," by Charlotte S. Sidgwick, also published by Messrs. Longmans. If children are in after years rightly to understand the relations of our own land to other countries, they cannot too soon learn something of their history; and from such a work as this they may do it under most favourable conditions.

AN OLD MAN'S DEMAND.

An amusing instance of the way in which the European missionary is sometimes regarded as a kind of universal provider comes to us from South India. A poor widow who procured a precarious living by keeping a small shop, was regularly visited by a missionary lady. One day, while the missionary was giving her lesson, the widow's father—an old man of over eighty years of age and a cripple—hobbled in. At the close of the lesson he said: "There are two things I wish you to do for me. Will you promise to do them?" The natural reply was given that the two things must be known before the promise could be made. So the old cripple said: "You see I have lost the use of my legs and cannot walk easily; I want you to give me a small cart to go about in. The second thing I want you to do is to advise my daughter here to have me married again." The missionary lady thought that, considering his years and infirmities, it would seem more suitable for him to be preparing for death rather than for marriage, and told him so. But that suggestion troubled him. He had no inclination to think of death. He did not want to die but to marry. His widowed daughter tried to change the subject, but in vain. At last the missionary jokingly promised to make inquiries for some aged and discreet woman suited for partnership with such a venerable man as he. The old man was disgusted. He wanted no aged woman but a young bride! This is certainly an amusing incident, but it has its serious value in showing that our missionaries have inspired a feeling of confidence in those amongst whom they lovingly and self-denyingly labour.

"LOOK ON THE FIELDS."

The Evangelical Church in the kingdom of Greece is faithfully putting forth efforts to extend the knowledge of the simple Gospel. "At Volo," we read, "one old couple, having come to the table of the Lord, could hardly eat the rest of the day, and talked of nothing but the great things God had done for them in bringing them out of the darkness of superstition." Piræus is mentioned as an encouraging field, a place of worship being required to take the place of the overcrowded room where meetings have been held. Christian workers visit the ships and hospitals, distribute tracts, sell Bibles, and read the Scriptures from house to house. The outlook in the Syrian mission-field is bright and hopeful; the Sabbath-school children form quite a multitude. And in Beyrout, in the Tripoli field, towards Sidon, and along the slopes of Lebanon, there are to be found the fruits of devoted labours, the stars in the crowns of heroic missionaries. Our brethren report "missions at Latakia, Schweir, and Damascus, in Palestine and Egypt, are in most happy and hearty sympathy, co-operating in the service of one Lord and Master." A worker in Albania speaks of the sympathy of a Mohammedan who frequently attends the Christian worship. He would take no money for repairing a book-satchel used in the Mission, his testimony being, "The object of the Society is a good and holy one, and I am happy to contribute the work of my hands." Well may the workers in the Turkish Missions' Aid Society, witnessing what God has inspired His people to attempt, and what He has wrought already, exclaim, "Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

ANCIENT GRECIAN AND MODERN ENGLISH GRIEF.

What struck me most when on a recent occasion I visited Athens, writes a friend, and walked through the ancient Greek cemetery, was the calm, dignified grief which was expressed by the reliefs upon the tombs. There is no violence, no despair, no exaggeration. The survivors are represented as shaking hands with him who is going away, and a faithful dog is generally to be seen bidding farewell in his way. And yet we know that though the ancient Greeks were unable to shake off a belief in life after death, they could not conceive that state as anything but a shadowy and wretched echo of the real life upon earth. It was a gloomy and dark existence, burdened with the memory of lost happiness, and the longing for lost enjoyment. Yet, with less hope about death than we Christians profess to have, the ancient Greeks never imagined anything so suggestive of despair as are many of our modern funerals.

"WELL, THAT'S PAST."

This is what a man with a healthy mind says to himself when any circumstance causes him to look back upon opportunities lost or mistakes done in the past. One day Sir Henry Lawrence and his sister were reading together the "Life of Washington." Looking up between the chapters, Letitia soliloquised "that it was a pity they had not been better taught." Henry mildly replied, "Well, that's past. We can now teach ourselves."

THE USES OF FLOWERS.

Even when summer days end, the Bible Flower Mission is disinclined to give up its cheering work.

THE FLOWERS OF THE SEA.

The text-messages to hospital patients and others of our brethren in need have power to bring comfort though the flowers are falling asleep, and any one who has "everlastings," ornamental grasses, ivy, mosses, seaweed, small cones, dried leaves, bramble-foliage, and the like to spare should bear in mind this Mission that spreads the good seed of the Kingdom, linked with the beauteous works of our Father's hand. A worker writes concerning a gift of lavender-bags to those journeying abroad in the troopships:—"They have been warmly, almost excitedly, welcomed, and formed such a happy introduction." Not only soldiers and their families, but those in lodging-houses, railway and gas-works, have come in for a share of welcome offerings winged with heavenly messages. A lady held out to a patient afflicted with asthma a bunch of flowers with the text, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He replied, sullenly, "There is no rest for me either in this world or the next." He was an out-patient of the hospital, and, though sought for, he appeared among them no more. One day, however, she was called to an in-patient, passing away. She did not recognise him; but he fumbled under his pillow, and the nurse produced a handkerchief, in which the flower and the text were wrapped up. The lady asked, "Have you taken that rest?" And pointing up, with the whisper, "Thank God!" the freed soul passed "to where beyond these voices there is peace."

THE SAVIOUR'S KINGDOM.

REJOICE, rejoice, O Zion!
Behold, thy King doth come,
To heal thee of thy sickness,
And make thy mourning dumb.
Wouldst share, O thou, His glory?
Then pure must be thy heart;
Within the Saviour's Kingdom
Only the pure have part.

Rejoice, rejoice, O Zion!
Behold, thy King is nigh;
Thy King is meek and lowly—
He doth not strive nor cry.
Wouldst share, O thou, His glory?
Then humble be thy heart:
Within the Saviour's Kingdom
Only the meek have part

Rejoice, rejoice, O Zion!
Thy King rides on apace;
Thy King is very tender,
And full of love and grace.
Wouldst share, O thou, His glory?
Then love must rule thy heart;
Within the Saviour's Kingdom
None without love hath part.

Rejoice, rejoice, O Zion!
Thy King the gate doth win;
Thy King is very holy—
He cannot look on sin.
Wouldst share, O thou, His glory?
Then let Him wash thy heart;
Within the Saviour's Kingdom
Only the cleansed hath part.

F. LANGBRIDGE.

FRANCES KANE'S FORTUNE.

BY L. T. MEADE, AUTHOR OF "THE BEAUFORTS OF BEATRICE GARDENS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

IT was a very sunny June day, and a girl was pacing up and down a sheltered path in an old-fashioned garden. She walked slowly along the narrow gravelled walk, now and then glancing at the carefully trimmed flowers of an elaborate ribbon border at her right, and stopping for an instant to note the promise of fruit on some well-laden peach and pear trees. The hot sun was pouring down almost vertical rays on her uncovered head, but she was either impervious to its power or, like a salamander, she rejoiced in its fierce noonday heat.

"We have a good promise of peaches and pears," she said to herself; "I will see that they are sold this year. We will just keep a few for my father to eat, but the rest shall go. It is a pity Watkins spends so much time over the ribbon border: it does not pay, and it uses up so many of our bedding plants."

She frowned slightly as she said these last words, and put up her hand to shade her face from the sun, as though for the first time she noticed its dazzling light and heat.

"Now I will go and look to the cabbages," she said, continuing her meditations aloud. "And those early peas ought to be fit for pulling now.—Oh, is that you, Watkins? Were you calling me? I wanted to speak to you about this border. You must not use up so many geraniums and calceolarias here. I don't mind the foliage plants, but the others cost too much, and cannot be made use of to any profit in a border of this kind."

"You can't make a ribbon, what 's worthy to be called a ribbon, with foliage plants," gruffly retorted the old gardener. "Master would be glad to see you in the house, Miss Frances, and yer 's a letter what carrier has just brought."

"Post at this hour?" responded Frances, a little eagerness and interest lighting up her face; "that is unusual, and a letter in the middle of the day is quite a treat. Well, Watkins, I will go to my father now, and see you at six o'clock in the kitchen garden about the cabbages and peas."

"As you please, Miss Frances; the wegitables won't be much growed since you looked at them yester-night, but I 'm your sarvint, miss. Carrier called at the post-office and brought two letters: one for you and t'other for master. I 'm glad you 're pleased to get 'em, Miss Frances."

Watkins' back was a good deal bent: he certainly felt the heat of the sun, and was glad to hobble off into the shade.

"Fuss is no word for her," he said; "though she 's a good gel and means well, werry well."

After the old gardener had left her, Frances stood quite still: the sun beat upon her slight figure, upon her rippling, abundant dark-brown hair, and lit up a face which was a little hard, a tiny bit soured, and scarcely young enough to belong to so slender and lithe a figure. The eyes, however, now were full of interest, and the lips melted into very soft curves as Frances turned her letter round, examined the postmarks, looked with interest at the seal, and studied the handwriting. Her careful perusal of the outside of the letter revealed at a glance how few she got, and how such a comparatively uninteresting event in most lives was regarded by her.

"This letter will keep," she said to herself, slipping it into her pocket. "I will hear what father has to tell me first. It is a great treat to have an unopened letter to look forward to. I wonder where this is from. Who can want to write to me from Australia? If Philip were alive——" Here she paused and sighed. "In the first place, I heard of his death three years ago; in the second, being alive, why should he write? It is ten years since we met."

Her face, which was a very bright and practical one, notwithstanding those few hard lines, looked pensive for a moment. Then its habitual expression of cheerfulness returned to it, and when she entered the house Frances Kane looked as practical and business-like a woman as could be found anywhere in the whole of the large parish in the north of England where she and her father lived.

Squire Kane, as he was called, came of an old family; and in the days before Frances was born he was supposed to be rich. Now, however, nearly all his lands were mortgaged, and it was with difficulty that the long, low, old-fashioned house, and lovely garden which surrounded it, could be kept together. No chance at all would the squire have had of spending his last days in the house where he was born, and where many generations of ancestors had lived and died, but for Frances; she managed the house and the gardens, and the few fields which were not let to surrounding farmers. She managed Watkins, too, and the under-gardener, and the two house-servants; and most of all, she managed Squire Kane.

He had been a hale and hearty man in his day, with a vigorous will of his own, and a marvellous and fatal facility for getting through money; but now he leant on Frances, was guided by her in all things, never took an opinion or spent a shilling without her advice; and yet all the time he thought himself to be the ruler, and she the ruled. For Frances was very tactful, and if she governed with a rod of iron she was clever enough to encase it well in silk.

"I want you, Frances," called a rather querulous old voice. The squire was ensconced in the sunniest corner of the sunny old parlour; his feet were stretched out on a hassock, he wore a short circular cape over his shoulders, and a black velvet skull-cap was pushed a little crooked over his high bald forehead. He had aquiline features, an aristocratic mouth, and sunken but somewhat piercing eyes. As a rule his expression was sleepy, his whole attitude indolent; but now he was alert, his deep-set eyes were wide open and very bright, and when his daughter came in, he held out a somewhat trembling hand, and drew her to his side.

"Sit down, Frances—there, in the sun, it 's so chilly in the shade—don't get into that corner behind me, my dear; I want to look at you. What do you think? I have got a letter, and news, great news! It is not often that news comes to the Firs in these days. What do you think, Frances? But you will never guess. Ellen's child is coming to live with us!"

"What?" said Frances. "What! Little Fluff we used to call her? I don't understand you, father; surely Ellen would never part with her child."

"No, my dear, that is true. Ellen and her child were bound up in each other, but she is dead—died three months ago in India. I have just received a letter from that good-for-nothing husband of hers, and the child is to leave school and come here. Major Danvers can't have her in India, he says, and her mother's wish was—her mother's last wish—that she should make her home with us. She will be here within a week after the receipt of this letter, Frances. I call it great news: fancy a young thing about the house again!"

Frances Kane had dark straight brows; they were drawn together now with a slight expression of surprise and pain.

"I am not so old, father," she said: "compared to you I am quite young. I am only eight-and-twenty."

"My dear," said the squire, "you were never young. You are a good woman, Frances, an excellent, well-meaning woman, but you were never either child or girl. Now this little thing—how long is it since she and her mother were here, my love?"

"It was just before cousin Ellen went to India," responded Frances, again knitting her brows and casting back her memory. "Yes, it was six years ago; I remember it, because we planted the new asparagus bed that year."

"Ay, ay; and a very productive bed it turned out," responded the squire. "Fluff was like a ball then, wasn't she?—all curly locks, and dimples, and round cheeks, and big blue eyes like saucers! The merriest little kitten—she plagued me, but I confess I liked her. How old would she be now, Frances?"

"About seventeen," replied Frances. "Almost a grown-up girl; dear, dear, how time does fly! Well, father, I am glad you are pleased. I will read the letter, if you will let me, by-and-bye, and we must consult as to what room to give the child. I hope she won't find it very dull."

"Not she, my dear, not she. She was the giddiest mortal—always laughing, and singing, and skipping about in the sunshine. Dear heart! it will do me good to see anything so lively again."

"I am glad she is coming," repeated Frances, rising to her feet. "Although you must remember, father, that six years make a change. Ellen may not be quite so kittenish and frolicsome now."

"Ellen!" repeated the squire; "I'm not going to call the child anything so formal. Fluff she always was and will be with me—a kittenish creature with a kittenish name; I used to tell her so, and I expect I shall again."

"Once again she played with the envelope, and examined the writing."—p. 6.

"You forget that she has just lost her mother," said Frances. "They loved each other dearly and you cannot expect her not to be changed. There is also another thing, father! I am sorry to have to mention it, but it is necessary. Does Major Danvers propose to give us an allowance for keeping his daughter here? Otherwise, it will be impossible for us to have her except on a brief visit."

The squire pulled himself with an effort out of his deep arm-chair. His face flushed, and his eyes looked angry.

"You are a good woman, Frances, but a bit hard," he said. "You don't suppose that a question of mere money would keep Ellen's child away from the Firs? While I am here she is sure of a welcome. No, there was nothing said about money in this letter, but I have no doubt the money part is right enough. Now I think I'll go out for a stroll. The sun is going off the south parlour, and whenever I get into the shade I feel chilly. If you'll give me your arm, my dear, I'll take a stroll before dinner. Dear, dear! it seems to me there isn't half the heat in the sun there used to be. Let's get up to the South Walk, Frances, and pace up and down by the ribbon border—it's fine and hot there—what I like. You don't wear a hat, my dear; quite right—let the sun warm you all it can."

CHAPTER II.

IT was quite late on that same afternoon before Frances found a leisure moment to read her own letter. It was not forgotten as it lay in her pocket, but she was in no hurry to ascertain its contents.

"Until it is read, it is something to look forward to," she said to herself; "afterwards — oh! of course there can be nothing of special interest in it."

She sighed; strong and special interests had never come in her way.

The afternoon which followed the receipt of the two letters was a specially busy one. The squire never grew tired of discussing the news which his own letter had brought him. He had a thousand conjectures which must be dwelt upon and entered into; how and when had Ellen Danvers died, what would the child Ellen be like, which bedroom would suit her best, would she like the South Walk as much as the old squire did himself, would she admire the ribbon border, would she appreciate the asparagus which she herself had seen planted?

The old man was quite garrulous and excited, and Frances was pleased to see him so interested in anything. When she had walked with him for nearly an hour she was obliged to devote some time to Watkins in the vegetable garden; then came dinner; but after that meal there always was a lull in the day's occupation for Frances, for the squire went to sleep over his pipe, and never cared to be aroused or spoken to until his strong coffee was brought to him at nine o'clock.

On this particular evening, Frances felt her heart beat with a pleased and quickened movement. She had her unopened letter to read. She would go to the rose arbour, and have a quiet time there while her father slept. She was very fond of Keats, and she took a volume of his poems under her arm, for of course the letter would not occupy her many moments. The rose arbour commanded a full view of the whole garden, and Frances made a graceful picture in her soft light grey dress, as she stepped into it. She sat down in one of the wicker chairs, laid her copy of Keats on the rustic table, spread the bright shawl on her lap, and took the foreign letter out of her pocket.

"It is sure to be nothing in the least interesting," she said to herself. "Still there is some excitement about it till it is opened." And as she spoke she moved to the door of the arbour.

Once again she played with the envelope, and examined the writing. Then she drew a closely written sheet out of its enclosure, spread it open on her lap, and began to read.

As she did so, swiftly and silently there rose into her cheeks a beautiful bloom. Her eyelids quivered, her hand shook; the bloom was succeeded by a pallor. With feverish haste her quick eyes flew over the paper. She turned the page and gasped slightly for breath. She raised her head, and her big, dark eyes were full of tears, and a radiant, tender smile parted her lips.

"Thank God!" she said; "oh, this is wonderful! Oh, thank God!"

Once again she read the letter, twice, three times, four times. Then she folded it up, raised it to her lips, and kissed it. This time she did not return it to her pocket, but opening her dress, slipped it inside, so that it lay against her heart.

"Miss Frances;" old Watkins was seen hobbling down the path. "You hasn't said what's to be done with the bees. They are sure to swarm to-morrow, and—and—why, miss, I seem to have startled you like——"

"Oh, not at all, Watkins; I will come with you now, and we will make some arrangement about the bees."

Frances came out of the arbour. The radiant light was still in her eyes, a soft colour mantled her cheeks, and she smiled like summer itself on the old man.

He looked at her with puzzled, dull wonder and admiration.

"What's come to Miss Frances?" he said to himself. "She looks rare and handsome, and she's none so old."

The question of the bees was attended to, and then Frances paced about in the mellow June twilight until it was time for her father to have his coffee. She came in then, sat down rather in the shadow, and spoke abruptly. Her heart was beating with great bounds, and her voice sounded almost cold in her effort to steady it.

"Father! I, too, have had a letter to-day."

"Ay, ay, my love. I saw that the carrier brought two. Was it of any importance? If not, we might go on with our 'History of Greece.' I was interested in where we left off, last night. You might read to me for an hour before I go to bed, Frances; unless, indeed, you have anything more to say about Fluff, dear little soul! Do you know it occurred to me that we ought to get fresh curtains and knick-knacks for her room? It ought to look nice for her, dear, bright little thing!"

"So it shall, father." There was no shade of impatience in Frances's tone. "We will talk of Fluff presently. But it so happens that my letter was of importance. Father, you remember Philip Arnold?"

"Arnold—Arnold? Dimly, my dear, dimly. He was here once, wasn't he? I rather fancy that I heard of his death. What about him, Frances!"

Frances placed her hand to her fast-beating heart. Strange—her father remembered dimly the man whom she had thought of, and dreamt of, and secretly mourned for for ten long years.

"Philip Arnold is not dead," she said, still trying to steady her voice. "It was a mistake, a false rumour. He has explained it—my letter was from him."

"Really, my love? Don't you think there is a slight draught coming from behind that curtain? I am so sensitive to draughts, particularly after hot days. Oblige me, Frances my dear, by drawing that curtain a little more to the right. Ah, that is better. So Arnold is alive. To tell the truth, I don't remember him very vividly, but of course I 'm pleased to hear that he is not cut off in his youth. A tall, good-looking fellow, wasn't he? Well, well, this matter scarcely concerns us. How about the dimity in the room which will be Fluff's? My dear Frances, what is the matter? I must ask you not to fidget so."

Frances sprang suddenly to her feet.

"Father, you must listen to me. I am going to say something which will startle you. All these quiet years, all the time which has gone by and left only a dim memory of a certain man, to you, have been spent by me smothering down regrets, stifling my youth, crushing what would have made me joyous and womanly—for Philip Arnold has not been remembered at all dimly by me, father, and when I heard of his death I lived through something which seemed to break the spring of energy and hope in me. I did not show it, and you never guessed, only you told me to-day that I had never been young, that I had never been either child or girl. Well, all that is over now, thank God! hope has come back to me, and I have got my lost youth again. You will have two young creatures about the house, father, and won't you like it?"

"I don't know," said the squire. He looked up at his daughter in some alarm; her words puzzled him; he was suddenly impressed too by the brightness in her eyes, and the lovely colouring on her cheeks.

"What is all this excitement, Frances?" he said. "Speak out; I never understand riddles."

Frances sat down as abruptly as she had risen.

"The little excitement was a prelude to my letter, dear father," she said. "Philip is alive, and is coming to England immediately. Ten years ago he saw something in me—I was only eighteen then—he saw something which gave him pleasure, and—and—more. He says he gave me his heart ten years ago, and now he is coming to England to know if I will accept him as my husband. That is the news which my letter contains, father. You see, after all, my letter is important—as important as yours."

"Bless me!" said the squire. The expression of his face was not particularly gratified; his voice was not too cordial. "A proposal of marriage to you, Frances? Bless me!—why, I can scarcely remember the fellow. He was here for a month, wasn't he? It was the summer before your mother died. I think it is rather inconsiderate of you to tell me news of this sort just before I go to bed, my dear. I don't sleep over-well, and it is bad to lie down with a worry on your pillow. I suppose you want me to answer the letter for you, Frances, but I 'll do nothing of the kind, I can tell you. If you encouraged the young man long ago, you must get out of it as best you can, now."

"Out of it, father? Oh, don't you understand?"

"Then you mean to tell me you care for him? You want to marry a fellow you haven't seen for ten years! And pray what am I to do if you go away and leave me?"

"Something must be managed," said Frances.

She rose again. Her eyes no longer glowed happily; her lips so sweet five minutes ago had taken an almost bitter curve.

"We will talk this over quietly in the morning, dear father," she said. "I will never neglect you, never cast you aside; but a joy like this cannot be put out of a life. That is, it cannot be lightly put away. I have always endeavoured to do my duty—God will help me to do it still. Now, shall I ring for prayers?"

CHAPTER III.

WHEN Frances got to her room she took out pen and ink, and without a moment's hesitation wrote an answer to her letter.

"My Dear Philip,—I have not forgotten you—I remember the old times, and all the things to which you alluded in your letter. I thought you were dead, and for the last three or four years always remembered you as one who had quite done with this world. Your letter startled me to-day, but your hope about me has been abundantly fulfilled, for I have never for a moment forgotten you. Philip, you have said very good words to me in your letter, and whatever happens, and however matters may be arranged between us in the future, I shall always treasure the words, and bless you for comforting my heart with them. But, Philip, ten years is a long time—in ten years we none of us stay still, and in ten years some of us grow older than others. I think I am one of those who grow old fast, and nothing would induce me to engage myself to you, or even to tell you that I care for you, until after we have met again. When you reach England—I will send this letter to the address you give me in London—come down here. My dear and sweet mother is dead, but I daresay my father will find you a room at the Firs, and if not, there are good lodgings to be had at the White Hart in the village. If you are of the same mind when you reach England as you were when you wrote this letter, come down to the old place, and let us renew our acquaintance. If, after seeing me, you find I am not the Frances you had in your heart all these years, you have only to go away without speaking, and I shall understand. In any case, thank you for the letter, and believe me, yours faithfully,

"FRANCES KANE."

This letter was quickly written, as speedily directed and stamped, and, wrapping her red shawl over her head, Frances herself went out in the silent night, walked half a mile to the nearest pillar-box, kissed the letter passionately before she dropped it through the slit, and then returned home, with the stars shining over her and a wonderful new peace in her heart. Her father's unsympathetic words were forgotten, and she lived over and over again on what her hungry heart had craved for all these years.

The next morning she was up early; for the post of housekeeper, head-gardener, general accountant, factotum, amanuensis, reader, etc., etc., to John Kane, Esq., of the Firs, was not a particularly light post, and required undivided attention, strong brains, and willing feet, from early morning to late night every day of the week. Frances was by no means a grumbling woman, and if she did not go through her allotted tasks with the greatest possible cheerfulness and spirit, she performed them ungrudgingly, and in a sensible matter-of-fact style.

On this particular morning, however, the joy of last night was still in her face; as she followed Watkins about, her merry laugh rang in the air; work was done in half the usual time, and never done better, and after breakfast she was at leisure to sit with her father and read to him as long as he desired it.

"Well, Frances," he said, in conclusion, after the reader's quiet voice had gone on for over an hour and a half, "you have settled that little affair of last night, I presume, satisfactorily. I have thought the whole matter over carefully, my love, and I have really come to the conclusion that I cannot spare you. You see you are, so to speak, necessary to me, dear. I thought I would mention this to you now, because in case you have not yet written to that young Arnold it will simplify matters for you. I should recommend you not to enter on the question of your own feelings at all, but state the fact simply —'My father cannot spare me.'"

"I wrote to Philip last night," said Frances. "I have neither refused him nor accepted him. I have asked him on a visit here; can we put him up at the Firs?"

"Certainly, my love: that is a good plan. It will amuse me to have a man about the house again, and travellers are generally entertaining. I can also intimate to him, perhaps with more propriety than you can, how impossible it would be for me to spare you. On the whole, my dear, I think you have acted with discernment. You don't age well, Frances, and doubtless Arnold will placidly acquiesce in my decision. By all means have him here."

"Only I think it right to mention to you, father;" here Frances stood up and laid her long, slender white hand with a certain nervous yet imperative gesture on the table. "I think it right to mention that if after seeing me Philip still wishes to make me his wife, I shall accept him."

"My dear!" Squire Kane started. Then a satisfied smile played over his face. "You say this as a sort of bravado, my dear. But we really need not discuss this theme; it positively wearies me. Have you yet made up your mind, Frances, what room Ellen's dear child is to occupy?"

CHAPTER IV.

THE day on which Ellen Danvers arrived at the Firs was long remembered, all over the place, as the hottest which had been known in that part of the country for many a long year. It was the first week of July, and the sun blazed fiercely and relentlessly—not the faintest little zephyr of a breeze stirred the air—in the middle of the day, the birds altogether ceased singing, and the Firs, lying in its sheltered valley, was hushed into a hot, slumberous quiet, during which not a sound of any sort was audible.

Even the squire preferred a chair in the south parlour, which was never a cool room, and into which the sun poured, to venturing abroad; even he shuddered at the thought of the south walk to-day. He was not particularly hot—he was too old for that—but the great heat made him feel languid, and presently he closed his eyes and fell into a doze.

Frances, who in the whole course of her busy life never found a moment for occasional dozes, peeped into the room, smiled with satisfaction when she saw him, tripped lightly across the floor to steal a pillow comfortably under his white head, arranged the window curtains so as to shade his eyes, and then ran up-stairs with that swift and wonderfully light movement which was habitual to her. She had a great deal to do, and she was not a person who was ever much affected by the rise or fall of the temperature. First of all, she paid a visit to a charming little room over the porch. It had lattice windows, which opened like doors, and all round the sill, and up the sides, and over the top of the window, monthly roses and jasmine, wisteria and magnolia, climbed. A thrush had built its nest in the honeysuckle over the porch window, and there was a faint sweet twittering sound heard there now, mingled with the perfume of the roses and jasmine. The room inside was all white, but daintily relieved here and there with touches of pale blue, in the shape of bows and drapery. The room was small, but the whole effect was light, cool, pure. The pretty bed looked like a nest, and the room, with its quaint and lovely window, somewhat resembled a bower.

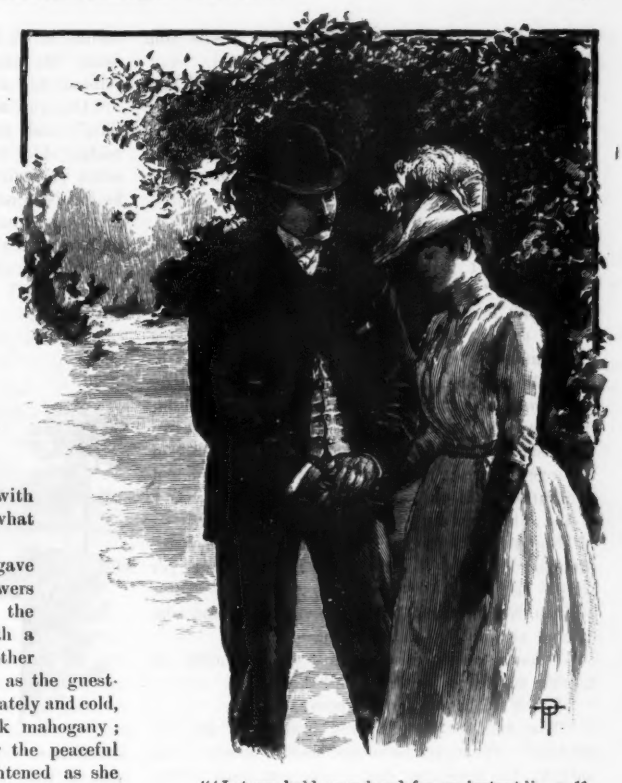
Frances looked round it with pride, gave one or two finishing touches to the flowers which stood in pale-blue vases on the dressing-table, then turned away with a smile on her lips. There was another room just beyond, known in the house as the guest-chamber proper. It was much more stately and cold, and was furnished with very old dark mahogany; but it, too, had a lovely view over the peaceful homestead, and Frances's eyes brightened as she reflected how she and Ellen would transform the room with heaps of flowers, and make it gay and lovely for a much-honoured guest.



She looked at her watch, uttered a hurried exclamation, fled to her own rather insignificant little apartment, and five minutes later ran down-stairs, looking very fresh, and girlish, and pretty, in a white summer dress. She took an umbrella from the stand in the hall, opened it to protect her head, and walked fast up the winding avenue towards the Lodge gates.

"I hear some wheels, Miss Frances," said Watkins' old wife, hobbling out of the house. "Eh, but it is a hot day; we'll have thunder afore night, I guess. Eh, Miss Frances, but you do look well, surely."

"I feel it," said Frances, with a very bright smile. "Ah, there's my little cousin—poor child! how hot she must be.—Well, Fluff, so here you are, back with your old Fanny again!"

There was a cry—half of rapture, half of pain—from a very small person in the lumbering old trap. The horse was drawn up with a jerk, and a girl, with very little of the woman about her, for she was still all curls, and curves, and childlike roundness, sprang lightly out of the trap, and put her arms round Frances's neck.

"Oh, Fan, I am glad to see you again! Here I am back just the same as ever; I haven't grown a bit, and I'm as much a child as ever. How is your father? I was always so fond of him. Is he as faddy as of old?—That's right; my mission in life is to knock fads out of people. Frances, dear, why do you look at me in that perplexed way? Oh, I suppose because I'm in white. But I couldn't wear black on a day like this, as it wouldn't make mother any happier to know that every breath I drew was a torture. There, we won't talk of it. I have a black sash in my pocket; it's all crumpled, but I'll tie it on, if you'll help me. Frances dear, you never did think, did you, that trouble would come to me? but it did. Fancy Fluff and trouble spoken of in the same breath; it's like putting a weight of care on a butterfly; it isn't fair—you don't think it fair, do you, Fan?"

"'Let me hold your hand for an instant.'"—p. 11.

The blue eyes were full of tears, the rosy baby lips pouted sorrowfully.

"We won't talk of it now, at any rate, darling," said Frances, stooping and kissing the little creature with much affection.

Ellen brightened instantly.

"Of course we won't. It's delicious coming here; how wise it was of mother to send me! I shall love being with you more than anything. Why, Frances, you don't look a day older than when I saw you last."

"My father says," returned Frances, "that I age very quickly."

"But you don't, and I'll tell him so. Oh, no, he's not going to say those rude, unpleasant things when I'm by. How old are you, Fan, really? I forget."

"I am twenty-eight, dear."

"Are you?"

Fluff's blue eyes opened very wide.

"You don't look old, at any rate," she said presently. "And I should judge from your face you didn't feel it."

The ancient cab, which contained Ellen's boxes and numerous small possessions, trundled slowly down the avenue; the girls followed it arm-in-arm. They made a pretty picture—both faces were bright, both pairs of eyes sparkled, their white dresses touched, and the dark, earnest, and sweet eyes of the one were many times turned with unfeigned admiration to the bewitchingly round and baby face of the other.

"She has the innocent eyes of a child of two," thought Frances. "Poor little Fluff! And yet sorrow has touched even her."

Then her pleasant thoughts vanished, and she uttered an annoyed exclamation.

"What does Mr. Spens want? Why should he trouble my father to-day of all days?"

"What is the matter, Frances?"

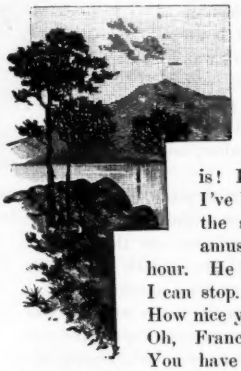
"That man in the gig," said Frances. "Do you see him? Whenever he comes, there is worry; it is unlucky his appearing just when you come to us, Fluff. But never mind; why should I worry you? Let us come into the house."

At dinner that day Frances incidentally asked her father what Mr. Spens wanted.

"All the accounts are perfectly straight," she said. "What did he come about? and he stayed for some time."

The slow blood rose into the old squire's face.

"Business," he said; "a little private matter for my own ear. I like Spens; he is a capital fellow, a thorough man of business, with no humbug about him. By the way, Frances, he does not approve of our selling the fruit, and he thinks we ought to make more of the ribbon border. He says we have only got the common yellow calceolarias—he does not see a single one of the choicer kinds."



"Indeed!" said Frances. She could not help a little icy tone coming into her voice.—"Fluff, won't you have some cream with your strawberries?—I did not know, father, that Mr. Spens had anything to say of our garden."

"Only an opinion, my dear, and kindly meant.—Now, Fluff" (the squire turned indulgently to his little favourite), "do you think Frances ought to take unjust prejudices?"

"But she doesn't," said Fluff. "She judges by instinct, and so do I. Instinct told her to dislike Mr. Spens's back as he sat in his gig, and so do I dislike it. I hate those round fat backs and short necks like his, and I hate of all things that little self-satisfied air."

"Oh, you may hate in that kind of way if you like," said the squire. "Hatred from a little midget like you is very different from Frances's sober prejudice. Besides, she knows Mr. Spens; he has been our excellent man of business for years. But come, Fluff, I am not going to talk over weighty matters with you. Have you brought your guitar? If so, we'll go into the south parlour and have some music."

CHAPTER V.

"ONE, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight—good!—nine, ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen—excellent! Oh, how out of breath I am, and how hot it is! Is that you, Frances? See, I've been skipping just before the south parlour window to amuse the squire for the last hour. He has gone to sleep now, so I can stop. Where are you going? How nice you look! Grey suits you. Oh, Frances, what extravagance! You have retrimmed that pretty shady hat! But it does look well. Now where are you off to?"

"I thought I would walk up the road a little way," said Frances. Her manner was not quite so calm and assured as usual. "Our old friend Philip Arnold is coming to-night, you know, and I thought I would like to meet him."

"May I come with you? I know I'm in a mess, but what matter? He's the man about whom all the fuss is made, isn't he?"

Frances blushed.

"What do you mean, dear?" she asked.

"Oh, don't I know? I heard you giving directions about his room, and didn't I see you walking round and round the garden for nearly two hours to-day choosing all the sweetest things—moss-roses, and sweetbriar, and sprays of clematis? Of course there's a fuss made about him, though nothing is said. I know what I shall find him—— There, I'm not going to say it—I would not vex you for worlds, Fan dear."

Frances smiled.

"I must start now, dear," she said, "or he will have reached the house before I leave it. Do you want to come with me, Fluff? You may if you like."

"No, I won't. I'm ever so tired, and people who are fussed about are dreadfully uninteresting. Do start for your walk, Frances, or you won't be in time to welcome your hero."

Frances started off at once. She was amused at Fluff's words. "It is impossible for the little creature to guess anything," she said to herself; "that would never do. Philip should be quite unbiassed. It would be most unfair for him to come here as anything but a perfectly free man. Ten years ago he said he loved me, but am I the same Frances? I am older; father says I am old for twenty-eight—then I was eighteen. Eighteen is a beautiful age—a careless and yet a grave age. Girls are so full of desires then, life stretches before them like a brilliant line of light. Everything is possible; they are not really at the top of the hill, and they feel so fresh and buoyant that it is a pleasure to climb. There is a feeling of morning in the air. At eighteen it is a good thing to be alive. Now, at eight-and-twenty, one has learned to take life hard; a girl is old then, and yet not old enough. She is apt to be over-worried; I used to be, but not since his letter came, and to-night I think I am back at eighteen. I hope he wont find me much altered. I hope this dress suits me. It would be awful now, when the cup is almost at my lips, if anything dashed it away; but, no! God has been very good to me, and I will have faith in Him."

All this time Frances was walking uphill. She had now reached the summit of a long incline, and, looking ahead of her, saw a dusty traveller walking quickly with the free-and-easy stride of a man who is accustomed to all kinds of athletic exercises.

"That is Philip," said Frances. Her heart beat almost to suffocation; she stood still for a moment, then walked on again more slowly, for her joy made her timid.

The stranger came on. As he approached he took off his hat, revealing a very tanned face and light short hair; his well-opened eyes were blue; he had a rather drooping moustache, otherwise his face was clean shaven. If ten years make a difference in a woman, they often effect a greater change in a man. When Arnold last saw Frances he was twenty-two; he was very slight then, his moustache was little more than visible, and his complexion was too fair. Now he was bronzed and broadened. When he came up to Frances and took her hand, she knew that not only she herself, but all her little world, would acknowledge her lover to be a very handsome man.

"Is that really you, Frances?" he began.

His voice was thoroughly manly, and gave the girl who had longed for him for ten years an additional thrill of satisfaction.

"Is that really you? Let me hold your hand for an instant; Frances, you are changed."

"Older, you mean, Philip."

She was blushing and trembling—she could not hide this first emotion.

He looked very steadily into her face, then gently withdrew his hand.

"Age has nothing to do with it," he said. "You are changed, and yet there is some of the old Frances left. In the old days you had a petulant tone when people said things which did not quite suit you; I hope—I trust—it has not gone. I am not perfect, and I don't like perfection. Yes, I see it is still there. Frances, it is good to come back to the old country, and to you."

"You got my letter, Philip?"

"Of course; I answered it. Were you not expecting me this evening?"

"Yes; I came out here on purpose to meet you. What I should have said, Philip, was to ask you if you agreed to my proposal."

"And what was that?"

"That we should renew our acquaintance, but, for the present, both be free."

Arnold stopped in his walk, and again looked earnestly at the slight girl by his side. Her whole face was eloquent—her eyes were bright with suppressed feeling, but her words were measured and cold. Arnold was not a bad reader of character. Inwardly, he smiled. "Frances was a pretty girl," he said to himself; "but I never imagined she would grow into such a beautiful woman."

Aloud, he made a quiet reply—

"We will discuss this matter to-morrow, Frances. Now tell me about your father. I was greatly distressed to see by your letter that your mother is dead."

"She died eight years ago, Philip. I am accustomed to the world without her now; at first it was a terrible place to me. Here we are, in the old avenue again. Do you remember it? Let us get under the shade of the elms.—Oh, Fluff, you quite startled me!"

Fluff, all in white—she was never seen in any other dress, unless an occasional black ribbon was introduced for the sake of propriety—came panting up the avenue. Her face was flushed, her lips parted, her words came out fast and eagerly—

"Quick, Frances! quick! The squire is ill! I tried to awake him, and I couldn't. Oh, he looks so dreadful!"

"Take care of Philip, and I will go to him," said Frances. "Don't be frightened, Fluff; my father often sleeps heavily.—Philip, let me introduce my little cousin, Ellen Danvers.—Now, Nelly, be on your best behaviour, for Philip is an old friend, and a person of importance."

"But we had better come back to the house with you, Frances," said Arnold. "Your father may be really ill. Miss—Miss Danvers seems alarmed."

"But I am not," said Frances, smiling first at Philip and then at her little cousin. "Fluff—we call this child Fluff as a pet name—does not know my father as I do. He often sleeps heavily, and when he does his face gets red, and he looks strange. I know what to do with him. Please don't come in, either of you, for half an hour. Supper will be ready then."

She turned away, walking rapidly, and a bend in the avenue soon hid her from view.

Little Ellen had not yet quite recovered her breath. She stood holding her hand to her side, and slightly panting.

"You seem frightened," said Arnold kindly.

"It is not that," she replied. Her breath came quicker, almost in gasps. Suddenly she burst into tears.

"It's all so dreadful," she said.

"What do you mean?" said Arnold.

To his knowledge he had never seen a girl cry in his life. He had come across very few girls while in Australia. One or two women he had met, but they were not particularly worthy specimens of their sex; he had not admired them, and had long ago come to the conclusion that the only perfect, sweet, and fair girl in existence was Frances Kane. When he saw Fluff's tears he discovered that he was mistaken—other women were sweet and gracious, other girls were lovable.

"Do tell me what is the matter," he said, in a tone of deep sympathy; for these fast-flowing tears alarmed him.

"I'm not fit for trouble," said Fluff. "I'm afraid of trouble, that's it. I'm really like the butterflies—I die if there's a cloud. It is not long since I lost my mother, and—now, now—— I know the squire is much more ill than Frances thinks. Oh, I know it. What shall I do if the squire really gets very ill—if he—he dies? Oh, I'm so awfully afraid of death."

Her cheeks paled visibly, her large, wide-open blue eyes dilated; she was acting no part—her terror and distress were real. A kind of instinct told Arnold what to say to her.

"You are standing under these great shady trees," he said. "Come out into the sunshine. You are young and apprehensive. Frances is much more likely to know the truth about Squire Kane than you are. She is not alarmed; you must not be, unless there is really cause. Now is not this better? What a lovely rose! Do you know, I have not seen this old-fashioned kind of cabbage-rose for over ten years!"

"Then I will pick one for you," said Fluff. She took out a scrap of cambric, dried her eyes like magic, and began to flit about the garden, humming a light air under her breath. Her dress was of an old-fashioned sort of book-muslin—it was made full and billowy; her figure was round and yet lithe, her hair was a mass of frizzy soft rings, and when the dimples played in her cheeks, and the laughter came back to her intensely blue eyes, Arnold could not help saying—and there was admiration in his voice and gaze—

"What fairy godmother named you so appropriately?"

"What do you mean? My name is Ellen."

"Frances called you Fluff; Thistledown would be as admirably appropriate."

While he spoke Fluff was handing him a rose. He took it and placed it in his button-hole. He was not very skilful in arranging it, and she stood on tiptoe to help him. Just then Frances came out of the house; the sun was shining full on the pair; Fluff was laughing, Arnold was making a complimentary speech. Frances did not know why a shadow seemed to fall between her and the sunshine which surrounded them. She walked slowly across the grass to meet them. Her light dress was a little long, and it trailed after her. She had put a bunch of Scotch roses into her belt. Her step grew slower and heavier as she walked across the smoothly kept lawn, but her voice was just as calm and clear as usual as she said gently—

"Supper is quite ready. You must be so tired and hungry, Philip."

"Not at all," he said, leaving Fluff and coming up to her side. "This garden rests me. To be back here again is perfectly delightful. To appreciate an English garden and English life, and—and English ladies;" here his eyes fell for a brief moment on Fluff, "one must have lived for ten years in the backwoods of Australia. How is your father, Frances? I trust Miss Danvers had no real cause for alarm?"

"Oh, no; Ellen is a fanciful little creature. He did sleep rather heavily. I think it was the heat; but he is all right now, and waiting to welcome you in the supper-room. Won't you let me show you the way to your room? You would like to wash your hands before eating."

Frances and Arnold walked slowly in the direction of the house. Fluff had left them; she was engaged in an eager game of play with an overgrown and unwieldy pup, and a Persian kitten. Arnold had observed with some surprise that she had forgotten even to inquire for Mr. Kane.

CHAPTER VI.

ON the morning after Arnold's arrival the squire called his daughter into the south parlour.

"My love," he said, "I want a word with you."

As a rule Frances was very willing to have words with her father: she was always patient and gentle and sweet with him, but she would have been more than human if she had not cast some wistful glances into the garden where Philip was waiting for her. He and she also had something to talk about that morning, and why did Fluff go out, and play those bewitching airs softly to herself on the guitar? And why did she sing in that wild-bird voice of hers? and why did Philip pause now and then in his walk, as though he was listening?—which indeed he was, for it would be difficult for anyone to shut their ears to such light and harmonious sounds. Frances hated herself for feeling jealous: no, of course she was not jealous; she could not stoop to anything so mean. Poor darling little Fluff! and Philip her true lover, who had remained constant to her for ten long years.

With a smile on her lips, and the old look of patience in her steady eyes, she turned her back to the window and prepared to listen to what the squire had to say.

"The fact is, Frances——" he began. "Sit down, my dear, sit down ; I hate to have people standing, it fidgets me so. Oh ! you want to be out with that young man ; well, Fluff will amuse him—dear little thing, Fluff—most entertaining. Has a way of soothing a man's nerves, which few women possess. You my dear, have often a most irritating way with you : not that I complain—we all have our faults. You inherit this intense over-wrought sort of manner from your mother, Frances."

Frances, who was standing absolutely quiet and still again, smiled slightly.

"You had something to talk to me about," she said, in her gentlest of voice.

"To be sure I had. I can tell you I have my worries—wonder I'm alive, and since your mother died never a bit of sympathy do I get from mortal. There, read that letter from Spens, and see what you make of it. Impudent, uncalled-for ? I should think so, but I really do wonder what these lawyers are coming to. Soon there'll be no distinctions between man and man anywhere, when a beggarly country lawyer dares to write to a gentleman like myself in that strain. But read the letter, Frances ; you'll have to see Spens this afternoon. I'm not equal to it."

"Let me see what Mr. Spens says," answered Frances.

She took the lawyer's letter from the squire's shaking old fingers, and opened it. Then her face became very pale, and as her eyes glanced rapidly over the contents, she could not help uttering a stifled exclamation.

"Fluff fingered her guitar lovingly."—p. 15.

"Yes, no wonder you're in a rage," said the squire. "The impudence of that letter beats everything."

"But what does Mr. Spens mean ?" said Frances. "He says here—unless you can pay the £6,000 owing within three months, his client has given him instructions to sell the Firs. What does he mean, father ? I never knew that we owed a penny. Oh, this is awful !"

"And how do you suppose we have lived ?" said the squire, who was feeling all that undue sense of irritation which guilty people know so well. "How have we had our bread and butter? How has the house been kept up? How have the wages been met? I suppose you thought that that garden of yours—those vegetables and the fruit—have kept everything going? That's all a woman knows. Besides, I've been unlucky—two speculations have failed—every penny I put in lost in them. Now what's the matter, Frances? You have a very unpleasant manner of staring."

"There was my mother's money," said Frances, who was struggling hard to keep herself calm. "That was always supposed to bring in something over £200 a year. I thought—I imagined—that with the help I was able to give from the garden and the poultry yard that we—we lived within our means."

Her lips trembled slightly as she spoke. Fluff was playing "Sweethearts" on her guitar, and Arnold was leaning with his arms folded against the trunk of a wide-spreading oak tree. Was he listening to Fluff, or waiting for Frances? She felt like a person struggling through a horrible nightmare.

"I thought we lived within our means," she said faintly.

"Just like you—women are always imagining things. We have no means to live on; your mother's money has long vanished—it was lost in that silver mine in Peru. And the greater part of the £6,000 lent by Spens has one way or another pretty nearly shared the same fate. I've been a very unlucky man, Frances, and if your mother were here, she'd pity me. I've had no one to sympathise with me since her death."

"I do, father," said his daughter.

She went up and put her arms round his old neck.

"It was a shock, and I felt half stunned. But I fully sympathise."

"Not that I'm going to sell the Firs," said the squire, not returning Frances's embrace, but allowing her to take his limp hand within her own. "No, no; I've no idea of that. Spens and his clients, whoever they are, must wait for the money, and that's what you've got to see him about, Frances. Come now, you must make the best terms you can with Spens—a woman can do what she likes with a man when she knows how to manage."

"But what am I to say, father?"

"Say? Why, that's your look-out. Never heard of a woman yet who couldn't find words. Say? Anything in the world you please, provided you give him clearly to understand that come what may I will not sell the Firs."

Frances stood still for two whole minutes. During this time she was thinking deeply—so deeply that she forgot the man who was waiting outside—she forgot everything but the great and terrible fact that, notwithstanding all her care and all her toil, beggary was staring them in the face.

"I will see Mr. Spens," she said at last, slowly; "it is not likely that I shall be able to do much. If you have mortgaged the Firs to these clients of Mr. Spens, they will most probably require to sell, in order to realise their money; but I will see him, and let you know the result."

"You had better order the gig, then, and go now; he is sure to be in at this hour. Oh, you want to talk to the man that you fancy is in love with you; but lovers can wait, and business can't. Understand, clearly once for all, Frances, that if the Firs is sold, I die."

"Dear father," said Frances—again she took his unwilling hand in hers—"do you suppose I want the Firs to be sold? Don't I love every stone of the old place, and every flower that grows here? If words can save it, they won't be wanting on my part. But you know better than I do that I am absolutely powerless in the matter."

She went out of the room, and the squire sat with the sun shining full on him, and grumbled. What was a blow to Frances, a blow which half stunned her in its suddenness and unexpectedness, had come gradually to the squire. For years past he knew that while his daughter was doing her utmost to make two ends meet—was toiling early and late to bring in a little money to help the slender household purse—she was only postponing an evil day which could never be averted. From the first, Squire Kane in his own small way had been a speculator—never at any time had he been a lucky one, and now he reaped the results.

After a time he pottered to his feet, and strolled out into the garden. Frances was nowhere visible, but Arnold and Ellen were standing under a shady tree, holding an animated conversation together.

"Here comes the squire," said Fluff, in a tone of delight. She flew to his side, put her hand through his arm, and looked coaxingly and lovingly into his face.

"I'm so glad you are not asleep," she said. "I don't like you when you fall asleep and get so red in the face; you frightened me last night—I was terrified—I cried. Didn't I, Mr. Arnold?"

"Yes," replied Arnold, "you seemed a good deal alarmed. Do you happen to know where your daughter is, Mr. Kane?"

"Yes; she is going into Martinstown on business for me.—Ah, yes, Fluff, you always were a sympathising little woman." Here the squire patted the dimpled hand; he was not interested in Philip Arnold's inquiries.

"If Frances is going to Martinstown, perhaps she will let me accompany her," said Arnold. "I will go and look for her."

He did not wait for the squire's mumbling reply, but started off quickly on his quest.

"Frances does want the gift of sympathy," said the squire, once more addressing himself with affection to Ellen. "Do you know, Fluff, that I am in considerable difficulty; in short, that I am going through just now a terrible trouble—oh, nothing that you can assist me in, dear. Still, one does want a little sympathy, and poor dear Frances, in that particular, is sadly, painfully deficient."

"Are you really in great trouble?" said Fluff. She raised her eyes with a look of alarm.

"Oh, I am dreadfully sorry! Shall I play for you, shall I sing something? Let me bring this arm-chair out here by this pear-tree; I 'll get my guitar; I 'll sing you anything you like—'Robin Adair,' or 'Auld Robin Gray,' or 'A Man's a Man;' you know how very fond you are of Burns."

"You are a good little girl," said the squire. "Place the arm-chair just at that angle, my love. Ah, that's good! I get the full power of the sun here. Somehow it seems to me, Fluff, that the summers are not half as warm as they used to be. Now play 'Bonnie Dundee'—it will be a treat to hear you."

Fluff fingered her guitar lovingly. Then she looked up into the wizened discontented face of the old man opposite to her.

"Play," said the squire. "Why don't you begin?"

"Only that I'm thinking," said the spoilt child, tapping her foot, petulantly. "Squire, I can't help saying it—I don't think you are quite fair to Frances."

"Eh, what?" said Squire Kane, in a voice of astonishment. "Highty-tighty, what next! Go on with your playing, miss."

"No, I won't! It isn't right of you to say she's not sympathetic."

"Not right of me! What next, I wonder! Let me tell you, Fluff, that although you're a charming little chit, you are a very saucy one."

"I don't care whether I'm saucy or not. You ought not to be unfair to Frances."

These rebellious speeches absolutely made the squire sit upright in his chair.

"What do you know about it?" he queried.

"Because she is sympathetic; she has the dearest, tenderest, most unselfish heart in the world. Oh, she's a darling! I love her."

"Go on with your playing, Fluff," said the squire.

Two bright spots of surprise and anger burnt on his cheeks, but there was also a reflective look on his face.

Fluff's eyes blazed. Her fair cheeks crimsoned, and she tried to thunder out a spirited battle march on her poor little guitar.

CHAPTER VII.

ARNOLD went quickly round to the back of the house. Although he had been absent for ten years, he still remembered the ways of the old place, and knew where to find the almost empty stables, and the coach-houses which no longer held conveyances.

"This place requires about £4,000 a year to keep it up properly," murmured Arnold to himself, "and from the look of things I should say these dear good folks had not as many hundreds. I wonder if Frances will have me—I wonder if——" here he paused.

His heart was full of Frances this morning, but it was also full of a strange kind of peace and thanksgiving. He was not greatly anxious: he had a curious sensation of being rested all over. The fact was, he had gone through the most hairbreadth escapes, the most thrilling adventures, during the last ten years. He had escaped alive, at the most fearful odds. He had known hunger and thirst; he had been many, many times face to face with death. For more than half the time of his exile things had gone against him, and hard indeed had been his lot; then the tide had slowly turned, and after five more years Philip Arnold had been able to return to his native land, and had felt that it was allowed to him to think with hope of the girl he had always loved.

He was in the same house with Frances now. She had not yet promised to be his, but he did not feel anxious. The quiet of the English home, the sweet, old-fashioned peace of the garden, the shade under the trees, the songs of the old-fashioned home birds the scent of the old-fashioned home flowers, and the bright eyes and gentle voice of the prettiest little English girl he had ever seen, had a mesmerising effect upon him. He wanted Frances; Frances was his one and only love; but he felt no particular desire to hurry on matters, or to force an answer from her until she was ready to give it.

He strolled into the stable yard, where Pete, the under-gardener, message-boy, and general factotum, a person whom Watkins, the chief manager, much bullied, was harnessing a shaggy little pony to a very shaky-looking market cart. The cart wanted painting, the pony grooming, and the harness undoubtedly much mending.

"What are you doing, Pete?" said Arnold.

"This yer is for Miss Frances," drawled the lad. "She's going into Martinstown, and I 'm gwine with her to hold the pony."

"No, you're not," said Arnold. "I can perform that office. Go and tell her that I 'm ready when she is."

Pete sauntered away, but before he reached the back entrance to the house Frances came out. She walked slowly, and when she saw Philip her face did not light up. He was startled, not at an obvious, but an indefinable change in her. He could not quite tell where it lay, only he suddenly knew that she was quite eight-and-twenty, that there were hard lines round the mouth which at eighteen had been very curved and beautiful. He wished she would wear the pretty hat she had on last night; he did not think that the one she had on was particularly becoming. Still, she was his Frances, the girl whose face had always risen before him during the five years of horror through which he had lived, and during the five years of hope which had succeeded them.

"'I wish this tea might last for ever.'"—p. 21.

He came forward and helped her to get into the little old-fashioned market cart. Then, as she gathered up the reins, and the pony was moving off, he prepared to vault into the vacant seat by her side. She laid her hand on it, however, and turned to him a very sad and entreating face.

"I think you had better not, Philip," she said. "It will be very hot in Martinstown to-day. I am obliged to go on a piece of business for my father. I am going to see Mr. Spens, our lawyer, and I may be with him for some time. It would be stupid for you to wait outside with the pony. Pete had better come with me. Go back to the shade of the garden, Philip. I hear Fluff now playing her guitar."

"I am going with you," said Arnold. "Forgive me, Frances, but you are talking nonsense. I came here to be with you, and do you suppose I mind a little extra sunshine?"

"But I am a rather dull companion to-day," she said, still objecting. "I am very much obliged to you—you are very kind, but I really have nothing to talk about. I am worried about a bit of business of father's. It is very good of you, Philip, but I would really rather you did not come in to Martinstown."

"If that is so, of course it makes a difference," said Arnold. He looked hurt. "I won't bother you," he said. "Come back quickly. I suppose we can have a talk after dinner?"

"Perhaps so; I can't say. I am very much worried about a piece of business of my father's."

"Pete, take your place behind your mistress," said Arnold.

He raised his hat, and there was a flush on his face as Frances drove down the shady lane.

"I have offended him," she said to herself; "I suppose I meant to. I don't see how I can have anything to say to him now, he can't marry a beggar; and besides, I must somehow or other support my father. Yes, it's at an end—the brightest of dreams. The cup was almost at my lips, and I did not think God would allow it to be dashed away so quickly. I must manage somehow to make Philip cease to care for me, but I think I am the most miserable woman in the world."

Frances never forgot that long, hot drive into Martinstown. She reached the lawyer's house a little before noon, and the heat was then so great that when she found herself in his office she nearly fainted.

"You look really ill, Miss Kane," said the man of business, inwardly commenting under his breath on how very rapidly Frances was aging. "Oh, you have come from your father; yes, I was afraid that letter would be a blow to him; still, I see no way out of it—I really don't!"

"I have never liked you much, Mr. Spens," said Frances Kane. "I have mistrusted you, and been afraid of you; but I will reverse all my former opinions—all—now, if you will only tell me the exact truth with regard to my father's affairs."

The lawyer smiled and bowed.

"Thank you for your candour," he remarked. "In such a case as yours the plain truth is best, although it is hardly palatable. Your father is an absolutely ruined man. He cannot possibly repay the six thousand pounds which he has borrowed. He obtained the money from my client by mortgaging the Firs to him. Now my client's distinct instructions are to sell, and realise what we can. The property has gone much to seed. I doubt if we shall get back what was borrowed; at any rate, land, house, and furniture, all must go."

"Thank you—you have indeed spoken plainly," said Frances. "One question more: when must you sell?"

"In three months from now. Let me see: this is July. The sale will take place early in October."

Frances had been sitting. She now rose to her feet.

"And there is really no way out of it?" she said, lingering for a moment.

"None; unless your father can refund the six thousand pounds."

"He told me, Mr. Spens, that if the Firs is sold he will certainly die. He is an old man, and feeble now. I am almost sure that he speaks the truth when he says such a blow will kill him."

"Ah! painful, very," said the lawyer. "These untoward misfortunes generally accompany rash speculation. Still, I fear—I greatly fear—that this apprehension, if likely to be realised, will not affect my client's resolution."

"Would it," said Frances, "would it be possible to induce your client to defer the sale until after my father's death? Indeed—indeed—indeed, I speak the truth when I say I do not think he will have long to wait for his money. Could he be induced to wait, Mr. Spens, if the matter were put to him very forcibly?"

"I am sure he could not be induced, Miss Kane; unless, indeed, you could manage to pay him the interest at five per cent. on his six thousand pounds. That is, three hundred a year."

"And then?" Frances's dark eyes brightened.

"I would ask him the question, but such a thing is surely impossible."

"May I have a week to think it over? I will come to you with my decision this day week."

"Well, well, I say nothing one way or another. You can't do impossibilities, Miss Kane. But a week's delay affects no one, and I need not go on drawing up the particulars of sale until I hear from you again."

Frances bowed, and left the office without even shaking hands with Mr. Spens.

"She's a proud woman," said the lawyer to himself, as he watched her driving away. "She looks well, too, when her eyes flash, and she puts on that haughty air. Odd that she should be so fond of that cantankerous old father. I wonder if the report is true which I heard of an Australian lover turning up for her. Well, there are worse-looking women than Frances Kane. I thought her very much aged when she first came into the office, but when she told me that she didn't much like me, she looked handsome and young enough."

Instead of driving home, Frances turned the pony's head in the direction of a long shady road which led in a westerly direction away from Martinstown. She drove rapidly for about half an hour under the trees. Then she turned to the silent Pete.

"Pete, you can go back now to the Firs, and please tell your master and Miss Danvers that I shall not be home until late this evening. See, I will send this note to the squire."

She tore a piece of paper out of her pocket-book, and scribbled a few lines hastily.

"Dear Father,—I have seen Mr. Spens. Don't despair. I am doing my best for you.

"Frances."

"I shall be back before nightfall," said Frances, giving the note to the lad. "Drive home quickly, Pete. See that Bob has a feed of oats, and a groom-down after his journey. I shall be home at latest by nightfall."

CHAPTER VIII.

FOR nearly another quarter of a mile Frances walked quickly under the friendly elm-trees. Then she came to some massive and beautifully wrought iron gates, and paused for an instant, pressing her hand to her brow.

"Shall I go on?" she said to herself. "It means giving up Philip—it means deliberately crushing a very bright hope."

She remained quite still for several seconds longer. Her lips, which were white and tired-looking, moved silently. She raised her eyes, and looked full into the blue deep of the sky; then she turned in at one of the gates, and walked up an exquisitely kept carriage-drive.

Some ladies in a carriage bowled past her; the ladies bent forward, bowed, and smiled.

"Why, that is Frances Kane," they said one to another. "How good of her to call—and this is one of Aunt Lucilla's bad days. If she will consent to see Frances it will do her good."

Frances walked on. The avenue was considerably over a mile in length. Presently she came to smaller gates, which were flung open. She now found herself walking between velvety greenswards interspersed with beds filled with all the bright flowers of the season. Not a leaf was out of place—not an untidy spray was to be seen anywhere; the garden was the perfection of what money and an able gardener could achieve.

The avenue was a winding one, and a sudden bend brought Frances in full view of a large, square, massive-looking house—a house which contained many rooms, and was evidently of modern date. Frances mounted the steps which led to the wide front entrance, touched an electric bell, and waited until a footman in livery answered her summons.

"Is Mrs. Passmore at home?"

"I will inquire, madam. Will you step this way?"

Frances was shown into a cool, beautifully furnished morning-room.

"What name, madam?"

"Miss Kane, from the Firs. Please tell Mrs. Passmore that I will not detain her long."

The man bowed, and closing the door softly after him, withdrew.

Her long walk, and all the excitement she had gone through, made Frances feel faint. It was past the hour for lunch at the Firs, and she had not eaten much at the early breakfast. She was not conscious, however, of hunger, but the delicious coolness of the room caused her to close her eyes gratefully—gave her a queer sensation of sinking away into nothing, and an odd desire, hardly felt before it had vanished, that this might really be the case, and so that she might escape the hard rôle of duty.

The rustling of a silk dress was heard in the passage—a quick light step approached, and a little lady most daintily attired, with a charming frank face, stepped briskly into the room.

"My dear Frances, this is delightful—how well—no, though, you are not looking exactly the thing, poor dear. So you have come to have lunch with me; how very, very nice of you! The others are all out, and I am quite alone."

"But I have come to see you on business, Carrie."

"After luncheon, then, dear. My head is swimming now, for I have been worrying over Aunt Lucilla's accounts. Ah, no, alas! this is not one of her good days. Come into the next room, Frances—if you have so little time to spare, you busy, busy creature, you can at least talk while we eat."

Mrs. Passmore slipped her hand affectionately through Frances's arm, and led her across the wide hall to another cool and small apartment where covers were already placed for two.

"I am very glad of some lunch, Carrie," said Frances. "I left home early this morning. I am not ashamed to say that I am both tired and hungry."

"Eat then, my love, eat—these are lamb cutlets; these peas are not to be compared with what you can produce at the Firs, but still they are eatable. Have a glass of this cool lemonade.—Oh, yes, we will help ourselves. You need not wait, Smithson."

The footman withdrew. Mrs. Passmore flitted about the table, waiting on her guest with a sort of loving tenderness. Then she seated herself close to Frances, pretended to eat a mouthful or two, and said suddenly—

"I know you are in trouble. And yet I thought—I hoped—that you would be bringing me good news before long. Is it true, Frances, that Philip Arnold is really alive after all, and has returned to England?"

"It is perfectly true, Carrie. At this moment Philip is at the Firs."

Mrs. Passmore opened her lips—her bright eyes travelled all over Frances' face.

"You don't look well," she said, after a long pause. "I am puzzled to account for your not looking well now."

"What you think is not going to happen, Carrie. Philip is not likely to make a long visit. He came yesterday; he may go again to-morrow or next day. We won't talk of it. Oh, yes, of course it is nice to think he is alive and well. Carrie, does your Aunt Lucilla still want a companion?"

Mrs. Passmore jumped from her seat—her eyes lit up; she laid her two dimpled, heavily ringed hands on Frances's shoulders.

"My dear, you can't mean it! You can't surely mean that you would come? You know what you are to auntie: you can do anything with her. Why, you would save her, Frances; you would save us all."

"I do think of accepting the post, if you will give it to me," said Frances.

"Give it to you? you darling! As if we have not been praying and longing for this for the last two years!"

"But, Carrie, I warn you that I only come because necessity presses me—and—and—I must make conditions—I must make extravagant demands."

"Anything, dearest. Is it a salary? Name anything you fancy. You know Aunt Lucilla is rolling in money. Indeed, we all have more than we know what to do with. Money can't buy everything, Frances. Ah, yes, I have proved that over and over again; but if it can buy you, it will for once have done us a good turn. What do you want, dear? Don't be afraid to name your price—a hundred a year? You shall have it with pleasure."

"Carrie, I know what you will think of me, but if I am never frank again I must be now. I don't come here to oblige you, or because I have a real, deep, anxious desire to help your aunt. I come—I come alone because of a pressing necessity; there is no other way out of it that I can see, therefore my demand must be extravagant. If I take the post of companion to your Aunt Lucilla, I shall want £300 a year."

Mrs. Passmore slightly started, and for the briefest instant a frown of disappointment and annoyance knit her pretty brows. Then she glanced again at the worn face of the girl who sat opposite to her; the steadfast eyes looked down, the long, thin, beautifully-cut fingers trembled as Frances played idly with her fork and spoon.

"No one could call Frances Kane mercenary," she said to herself. "Poor dear, she has some trouble upon her. Certainly her demand is exorbitant; never before since the world was known did a companion receive such a salary. Still, where would one find a second Frances?"

"So be it, dear," she said aloud. "I admit that your terms are high, but in some ways your services are beyond purchase. No one ever did or ever will suit Aunt Lucilla as you do. Now, when will you come?"

"I am not quite sure yet, Carrie, that I can come at all. If I do it will probably be in a week from now. Yes, to-morrow week; if I come at all I will come then; and I will let you know certainly on this day week."

"My dear, you are a great puzzle to me; why can't you make up your mind now?"

"My own mind is made up, Carrie, absolutely and fully, but others have really to decide for me. I think the chances are that I shall have my way. Carrie dear, you are very good; I wish I could thank you more."

"No, don't thank me. When you come you will give as much as you get. Your post won't be a sinecure."

"Sinecures never fell in my way," said Frances. "May I see your aunt for a few minutes to-day?"

"Certainly, love—you know her room. You will find her very poorly and fractious this afternoon. Will you tell her that you are coming to live with her, Frances?"

"No; that would be cruel, for I may not be able to come after all. Still, I think I shall spend some time in doing my utmost to help you and yours, Carrie."

"God bless you, dear! Now run up to auntie. You will find me in the summer-house whenever you like to come down. I hope you will spend the afternoon with me, Frances, and have tea; I can send you home in the evening."

"You are very kind, Carrie, but I must not stay. I will say good-bye to you now, for I must go back to Martinstown for a few minutes early this afternoon. Good-bye, thank you. You are evidently a very real friend in need."

Frances kissed Mrs. Passmore, and then ran lightly up the broad and richly carpeted stairs. Her footsteps made no sound on the thick Axminster. She flitted past down a long gallery hung with portraits, presently stopped before a baize door, paused for a second, then opened it swiftly and went in.

She found herself in an ante-room, darkened and rendered cool with soft green silk drapery. The ante-room led to a large room beyond. She tapped at the door of the inside room, and an austere-looking woman dressed as a nurse opened it immediately. Her face lighted up when she saw Frances.

"Miss Kane, you're just the person of all others my mistress would like to see. Walk in, miss, please. Can you stay for half an hour? If so, I'll leave you."

"Yes, Jennings. I am sorry Mrs. Carnegie is so ill to-day."

Then she stepped across the carpeted floor, the door was closed behind her, and she found herself in the presence of a tall thin woman, who was lying full length on a sofa by the open window. Never was there a more peevish face than the invalid wore. Her brows were slightly drawn together, her lips had fretful curves; the pallor of great pain, of intense nervous suffering, dwelt on her brow. Frances went softly up to her.

"How do you do, Mrs. Carnegie?" she said, in her gentle voice.

The sound was so low and sweet that the invalid did not even start. A smile like magic chased the furrows from her face.

"Sit down, Frances, there's a dear child," she said. "Now, I have been wishing for you more than for anyone. I'm at my very worst to-day, dear. My poor back is so bad—oh, the nerves, dear child, the nerves! I really feel that I cannot speak a civil word to anyone, and Jennings is so awkward, painfully awkward—her very step jars me; and why will she wear those stiff-starched caps and aprons? But there, few understand those unfortunates who are martyrs to nerves."

"You have too much light on your eyes," said Frances.

She lowered the blind about an inch or two.

"Now tell me, have you been down-stairs to-day?"

"How can you ask me, my love. when I can't even crawl? Besides, I assure you, dear, dearest one"—here Mrs. Carnegie took Frances's hand and kissed it—"that they dislike having me. Freda and Alicia quite show their dislike in their manner. Carrie tries to smile and look friendly, but she is nothing better than a hypocrite. I can read through them all. They are only civil to me; they only put up with their poor old aunt because I am rich, and they enjoy my comfortable house. Ah! they none of them know what nerves are—the rack, the tear, to the poor system, that over-strained nerves can give. My darling, you understand, you pity me."

"I am always very sorry for you, Mrs. Carnegie, but I think when you are better you ought to exert yourself a little more, and you must not encourage morbid thoughts. Now shall I tell you what I did with that last five-pound note you gave me?"

"Ah, yes, love, that will be interesting. It is nice to feel that even such a useless thing as money can make some people happy. Is it really, seriously the case, Frances, that there are any creatures so destitute in the world as not to know where to find a five-pound note?"

"There are thousands and thousands who don't even know where to find a shilling," replied Frances.

Mrs. Carnegie's faded blue eyes lighted up.

"How interesting," she said. "Why, it must make existence quite keen. Fancy being anxious about a shilling! I wish something would make life keen for me; but my nerves are in such a state that really everything that does not thrill me with torture, palls."

"I will tell you about the people who have to find their shillings," responded Frances.

She talked with animation for about a quarter of an hour, then kissed the nervous sufferer, and went away.

Half an hour's brisk walking brought her back to Martinstown. She reached the lawyer's house, and was fortunate in finding him within.

"Will you tell your client, Mr. Spens, that if he will hold over the sale of the Firs until after my father's death, I will engage to let him have five per cent. on his money? I have to-day accepted the post of companion to Mrs. Carnegie, of Arden. For this I am to have a salary of £300 a year."

"Bless me!" said the lawyer. "Such a sacrifice! Why! that woman can't keep even a servant about her. A heartless, selfish hypochondriac! even her nieces will scarcely stay in the house with her. I think she would get you cheap at a thousand a year, Miss Kane; but you must be joking."

"I am in earnest," responded Frances. "Please don't make it harder for me, Mr. Spens. I know what I am undertaking. Will you please tell your client that I can pay him his interest? If he refuses to accept it, I am as I was before; if he consents, I go to Arden. You will do me a great favour by letting me know his decision as soon as possible."

The lawyer bowed.

"I will do so," he said. Then he added, "I hope you will forgive me, Miss Kane, for saying that I think you are a very brave and unselfish woman, but I don't believe even you will stand Mrs. Carnegie for long."

"I think you are mistaken," responded Frances, gently. "I do it for the sake of £300 a year, to save the Firs for my father during his lifetime."

The lawyer thought he had seldom seen anything sadder than Frances's smile. It quite haunted him as he wrote to his client, urging him to accept her terms.

CHAPTER IX.

SQUIRE KANE had spent by no means an unhappy day. The misfortune, which came like a sudden crash upon Frances, he had been long prepared for. Only last week Mr. Spens had told him that he might expect some such letter as had been put into his hands that morning. He had been a little nervous while breaking his news to Frances: a little nervous and a little cross. But when once she was told, he was conscious of a feeling of relief; for all his hard words to her, he had unbounded faith in this clever managing daughter of his; she had got him out of other scrapes, and somehow, by hook or by crook, she would get him out of this.

Except for Fluff's rather hard words to him when he spoke to her about Frances, he had rather an agreeable day. He was obliged to exert himself a little, and the exertion did him good and made him less sleepy than usual. Both Fluff and Philip did their best to make matters pass agreeably for him, and when Frances at last reached home, in the cool of the evening, she found herself in the midst of a very cheerful domestic scene.

At this hour the squire was usually asleep in the south parlour; on this night he was out of doors. His circular cape, it is true, was over his shoulders, and Fluff had tucked a white shawl round his knees, but still he was sitting out of doors, cheering, laughing, and applauding while Arnold and Miss Danvers sang to him. Fluff had never looked more lovely. Her light gossamery white dress was even more cloudy than usual; a softer, richer pink mantled her rounded cheeks; her big blue eyes were lustrous, and out of her parted lips poured a melody as sweet as a nightingale's. Arnold was standing near her—he also was singing—and as Frances approached he did not see her, for his glance, full of admiration, was fixed upon Miss Danvers.

"Hullo! here we are, Frances!" called out the squire; "and a right jolly time we've all had. I'm out of doors, as you see; broken away from my leading-strings when you're absent; ah, ah! How late you are, child: but we didn't wait dinner. It doesn't agree with me, as you know, to be kept waiting for dinner."

"You look dreadfully tired, Frances," said Philip.

He dropped the sheet of music he was holding and ran to fetch a chair for her. He no longer looked at Ellen, for Frances's pallor and the strained look in her eyes filled him with apprehension.

"You don't look at all well," he repeated.

And he stood in front of her, shading her from the gaze of the others.

Frances closed her eyes for a second.

"It was a hot, long walk," she said then, somewhat faintly. And she looked up and smiled at him. It was the sweetest of smiles, but Arnold, too, felt, as well as the lawyer, that there was something unnatural and sad in it.

"I don't understand it," he said to himself. "There's some trouble on her; what can it be? I'm afraid it's a private matter, for the squire's right enough. Never saw the old boy looking jollier." Aloud he said, turning to Fluff, "Would it not be a good thing to get a cup of tea for Frances? —No?—now I insist. I mean you must let us wait on you, Frances: Miss Danvers and I will bring the tea out here. We absolutely forbid you to stir a step until you have taken it."

His "we" meant "I."

Frances was only too glad to lie back in the comfortable chair, and feel, if only for a few minutes, she might acknowledge him her master.

The squire, finding all this fuss about Frances wonderfully uncongenial, had retired into the house, and Arnold and Fluff served her daintily—Arnold very solicitous for her comfort, and Fluff very merry, and much enjoying her present office of waiting-maid.

"I wish this tea might last for ever," suddenly exclaimed Frances.

Her words were spoken with energy, and her dark eyes, as they glanced at Arnold, were full of fire.

It was not her way to speak in this fierce and spasmodic style, and the moment the little sentence dropped from her lips, she blushed.

Arnold looked at her inquiringly.

"Are you too tired to have a walk with me?" he said. "Not far: down there under the shade of the elm-trees. You need not be cruel, Frances. You can come with me as far as that."

Frances blushed still more vividly.

"I am really very tired," she answered. There was unwillingness in her tone.

Arnold gazed at her in surprise and perplexity.

"Perhaps," he said, suddenly, looking at Fluff, "perhaps, if you are quite too tired even to stir a few steps, Frances, Miss Danvers would not greatly mind leaving us alone here for a little."

Before she could reply, he went up to the young girl's side, and took her hand apologetically.

"You don't mind," he said. "I mean, you won't think me rude when I tell you that I have come all the way from Australia to see Frances."

"Rude? I am filled with delight," said Fluff.

Her eyes danced—she hummed the air of "Sweethearts" quite in an obtrusive manner as she ran into the house.

"Oh, squire," she said, running up to the old man, who had seated himself in his favourite chair in the parlour, "I have discovered such a lovely secret."

"Ah, what may that be, missy? By the way, Fluff, you will oblige me very much if you will call Frances here. This paraffin lamp has never been trimmed—if I light it, it will smell abominably; it is really careless of Frances to neglect my comforts in this way. Oblige me by calling her, Fluff; she must have finished her tea by this time."

"I'm not going to oblige you in that way," said Fluff. "Frances is particularly engaged—she can't come. Do you know he came all the way from Australia on purpose? What can a lamp matter?"

"What a lot of rubbish you're talking, child! Who came from Australia? Oh, that tiresome Arnold. A lamp does matter, for I want to read."

"Well, then, I'll attend to it," said Fluff. "What is the matter with it?"

"The wick isn't straight—the thing will smell, I tell you."

"I suppose I can put it right. I never touched a lamp before in my life. Where does the wick come?"

"'I should not mind at all,' said Fluff."—p. 26.

"Do be careful, Ellen, you will smash that lamp—it cost three-and-sixpence. There, I knew you would; you've done it now."

The glass globe lay in fragments on the floor. Fluff gazed at the broken pieces comically.

"Frances would have managed it all right," she said. "What a useless little thing I am—I can do nothing but dance, and sing, and talk. Shall I talk to you, squire? We don't want light to talk, and I'm dying to tell you what I've discovered."

"Well, child, well—I hate a mess on the floor like that. Well, what is it you've got to say to me, Fluff? It's really unreasonable of Frances not to come. She must have finished her tea long ago."

"Of course, she has finished her tea; she is talking to Mr. Arnold. He came all the way from Australia to have this talk with her. I'm so glad. You'll find out what a useful, dear girl Frances is, by-and-bye, when you never have her to trim your lamps."

"What do you mean, you saucy little thing? When I don't have Frances; what do you mean?"

"Why, you can't have her when she's—she's married. It must be wonderfully interesting to be married; I suppose I shall be some day. Weren't you greatly excited long, long, long ago, when you married?"

"One would think I lived in the last century, miss. As to Frances, well—well, she knows my wishes. Where did you say she was? Really, I'm very much disturbed to-day; I had a shock, too, this morning—oh! nothing that you need know about; only Frances might be reasonable. Listen to me, Fluff; your father is in India, and, it so happens, cannot have you with him at present, and your mother, poor soul, poor dear soul, she's dead; it was the will of Heaven to remove her, but if there is a solemn duty devolving upon a girl, it is to see to her parents, provided they are with her. Frances has her faults, but I will say, as a rule, she knows her duty in this particular."

The squire got up restlessly as he spoke, and try as she would Fluff found she could no longer keep him quiet in the dark south parlour. He went to the open window, and called his daughter in a high and peevish voice. Frances, however, was nowhere within hearing.

The fact was, when they were quite alone Philip took her hand, and said, almost peremptorily—

"There is a seat under the elm-trees; we can talk there without being disturbed."

"It has come," thought Frances. "I thought I might have been spared to-night. I have no answer ready—I don't know what is before me. The chances are that I must have nothing to say to Philip; every chance is against our marrying, and yet I cannot—I know I cannot refuse him to-night."

They walked slowly together through the gathering dusk. When they reached the seat under the elm-tree Arnold turned swiftly, took Frances's hand in his, and spoke.

"Now, Frances, now; and at last!" he said, "I have waited ten years for this moment. I have loved you with all my heart and strength for ten years."

"It was very—very good of you, Philip."

"Good of me! Why do you speak in that cold, guarded voice? Goodness had nothing to say to the matter. I could not help myself. What's the matter, Frances? A great change has come over you since the morning. Are you in trouble? Tell me what is troubling you, my darling."

Frances began to cry, silently.

"You must not use loving words to me," she said, "they—they wring my heart. I cannot tell you what is the matter, Philip—at least, for a week. And—oh! if you would let me answer you in a week—and oh! poor Philip, I am afraid there is very little hope."

"Why so, Frances; don't you love me?"

"I—I—ought not to say it. Let me go back to the house now."

"I shall do nothing of the kind. Do you love me?"

"Philip, I said I would give you an answer in a week."

"This has nothing to say to your answer. You surely know now whether you love me or not."

"I—Philip, can't you see? Need I speak?"

"I see that you have kept me at a distance, Frances; that you have left me alone all day; that you seem very tired and unhappy. What I see—yes, what I see—does not, I confess, strike me in a favourable light."

Frances, who had been standing all this time, now laid her hand on Arnold's shoulder. Her voice had grown quiet, and her agitation had disappeared.

"A week will not be long in passing," she said. "A heavy burden has been laid upon me, and the worst part is the suspense. If you have waited ten years, you can wait another week, Philip. I can give you no other answer to-night."

The hand which unconsciously had been almost caressing in its light touch was removed, and Frances returned quickly to the house. She came in by a back entrance, and going straight to her own room locked the door. Thus she could not hear her father when he called her.

But Philip remained for a long time in the elm walk, hurt, angry, and puzzled.

CHAPTER X.

FRANCES spent a very unhappy night. She could not doubt Philip's affection for her, but she knew very little about men, and was just then incapable of grasping its depth. Like many another woman, she overlooked the fact that in absolutely sacrificing herself she also sacrificed the faithful heart of the man who had clung to her memory for ten long years.

Frances was too humble to suppose it possible that any man could be in serious trouble because he could not win her.

"I know what will happen," she said to herself, as she turned from side to side of her hot, unrestful pillow. "I know exactly how things will be. The man to whom my father owes the money will accept the interest from me. Yes, of course, that is as it should be. That is what I ought to wish for and pray for. In about a week from now I shall go to live at Arden, and the next few years of my life will be taken up soothing Mrs. Carnegie's nerves. It is not a brilliant prospect, but I ought to be thankful if in that way I can add to my poor father's life. Of course, as soon as I hear from Mr. Spens, I must tell Philip I can have nothing to say to him. I must give Philip up. I must pretend that I don't love him. Perhaps he will be disappointed for a while; but, of course, he will get over it. He'll get another wife by-and-bye; perhaps he'll choose Fluff. Fluff is just the girl to soothe a man and make him happy. She is so bright and round and sweet, she has no hard angles anywhere, and she is so very pretty. I saw Philip looking at her with great admiration to-night. Then she is young, too. In every way she is more suited to him than I am. Oh, it won't be at all difficult for Philip to transfer his affections to Fluff! Dear little girl, she will make him happy. They will both be happy, and I must hide the pain in my heart somehow. I do believe, I do honestly believe, that Fluff is more suited to Philip than I am; for now and then, even if I had the happiest lot, I must have my sad days. I am naturally grave, and sometimes I have a sense of oppression. Philip would not have liked me when I was not gay. Some days I must feel grave and old, and no man would like that. No doubt everything would be for the best; at least, for Philip, and yet how much—how much I love him!"

Frances buried her head in the bedclothes, and sobbed, long and sadly. After this fit of crying she fell asleep.

It was early morning, and the summer light was filling the room when she woke. She felt calmer now, and she resolutely determined to turn her thoughts in practical directions. There was every probability that the proposal she had made to Mr. Spens would be accepted, and if that were so she had much to do during the coming week.

She rose at her usual early hour, and going downstairs occupied herself first in the house, and then with Watkins in the garden. She rather dreaded Philip's appearance, but if he were up early he did not come out, and when Frances met him at breakfast his face wore a tired, rather bored expression. He took little or no notice of her, but he devoted himself to Fluff, laughing at her gay witty sallies, and trying to draw her out.

After breakfast Frances had a long conversation with her father. She then told him what she meant to do in order that he might continue to live at the Firs. She told her story in a very simple, ungarnished manner, but she said a few words in a tone which rather puzzled the squire at the end.

"I will now tell you," she said, "that when Philip wrote to me asking me to be his wife I was very, very glad. For all the long years of his absence I had loved him, and when I thought he was dead I was heart-broken. I meant to marry him after he wrote me that letter, but I would not say so at once, for I knew that I had grown much older, and I thought it quite possible that when he saw me he might cease to love me. That is not the case; last night he let me see into his heart, and he loves me very, very deeply. Still, if your creditor consents to the arrangement I have proposed, I cannot marry Philip—I shall then absolutely and for ever refuse him. But I do this for you, father, for my heart is Philip's. I wish you to understand, therefore, that I could not give up more for you than I am doing. It would be a comfort for me if, in return, you would give me a little affection."

Frances stood tall and straight and pale by her father's side. She now looked full into his face. There were no tears in her eyes, but there was the passion of a great cry in the voice which she tried to render calm.

The squire was agitated in spite of himself; he was glad Fluff was not present. He had an uneasy consciousness of certain words Fluff had said to him yesterday.

"You are a good girl, Frances," he said, rising to his feet and laying his trembling old hand on her arm. "I love you after my fashion, child—I am not a man of many words. By-and-bye, when you are old yourself, Frances, you won't regret having done something to keep your old father for a short time longer out of his grave. After all, even with your utmost endeavour, I am not likely to trouble anyone long. When I am dead and gone, you can marry Philip Arnold, Frances."

"No, father."

Frances's tone was quiet and commonplace now.

"Sit down, please; don't excite yourself. I am not a woman to keep any man waiting for me. I trust, long before you are dead, father, Philip will be happy with another wife."

"What! Fluff, eh?" said the old man. "What a capital idea! You will forgive my saying that she will suit him really much better than you, Frances. Ah, there they go down the elm-walk together. She certainly is a fascinating little thing. It will comfort you, Frances, to know that you do Philip no injury by rejecting him; for he really gets a much more suitable wife in that pretty young girl—you are decidedly passée, my love."

Frances bit her lips hard.

"On the whole, then, you are pleased with what I have done," she said, in a constrained voice.

"Very much pleased, my dear. You have acted well, and really with uncommon sense for a woman. There is only one drawback that I can see to your scheme. While you are enjoying the luxuries and comforts of Arden, who is to take care of me at the Firs?"

"I have thought of that," said Frances. "I acknowledge there is a slight difficulty; but I think matters can be arranged. First of all, father, please disabuse yourself of the idea that I shall be in a state of comfort and luxury. I shall be more or less a close prisoner; I shall be in servitude. Make of that what you please."

"Yes, yes, my love—a luxurious house, carriages, and horses—an affectionate and most devoted friend in Lucilla Carnegie—the daintiest living, the most exquisitely furnished rooms. Yes, yes, I'm not complaining. I'm only glad your lot has fallen in such pleasant places, Frances. Still, I repeat, what is to become of me?"

"I thought Mrs. Cooper, our old housekeeper, would come back and manage matters for you, father. She is very skilful and nice, and she knows your ways. Watkins quite understands the garden, and I myself, I am sure, will be allowed to come over once a fortnight or so. There is one thing—you must be very, very careful of your money, and Watkins must try to sell all the fruit and vegetables he can. Fluff, of course, cannot stay here. My next thought is to arrange a home for her, but even if I have to leave next week, she need not hurry away at once. Now, father, if you will excuse me, I will go out to Watkins, for I have a great deal to say to him."

CHAPTER XI.

"I HAVE something to say to you, Fluff," said Frances. The young girl was standing in her white dress, with her guitar hung in its usual attitude by her side. She scarcely ever went anywhere without this instrument, and she was fond of striking up the sweetest, wildest songs to its accompaniment at any moment.

Fluff, for all her extreme fairness and babyishness, had not a doll's face. The charming eyes could show many emotions, and the curved lips reveal many shades either of love or dislike. She had not a passionate face: there were neither heights nor depths about little Fluff, but she had a very warm heart, and was both truthful and fearless.

She had been waiting in a sheltered part of the garden for over an hour for Arnold. He had promised to go down with her to the river—he was to sketch, and she was to play. It was intensely hot, even in the shadiest part of the squire's garden, but by the river there would be coolness and a breeze. Fluff was sweet-tempered, but she did not like to wait an hour for any man, and she could not help thinking it aggravating of Arnold to go on pacing up and down in the hot sun by the squire's side. What could the squire and Arnold have to say to one another? And why did the taller and younger man rather stoop as he walked? And why was his step so depressed, so lacking in energy that even Fluff, under her shady tree in the distance, noticed it?

She was standing so when Frances came up to her; now and then her fingers idly touched her guitar, her rosy lips pouted, and her glowing dark blue eyes were fixed reproachfully on Arnold's distant figure.

Frances looked pale and fagged: she was not in the becoming white dress which she had worn during the first few days of Arnold's visit; she was in grey, and the grey was not particularly fresh nor cool in texture.

"Fluff, I want to speak to you," she said. And she laid her hand on the girl's shoulder—then her eyes followed Fluff's; she saw Arnold, and her cheeks grew a little whiter than before.

"Fluff misses him already," she whispered to her heart. "And he likes her. They are always together. Yes, I see plainly that I shan't do Philip any serious injury when I refuse him."

"What is it, Frances?" said Fluff, turning her rather aggrieved little face full on the new-comer. "Do you want to say anything to me very badly? I do call it a shame of Mr. Arnold: he and the squire have chatted together in the south walk for over an hour. It's just too bad. I might have been cooling myself by the river now; I'm frightfully hot."

"No, you're not really very hot," said Frances, in the peculiarly caressing tone she always employed when speaking to her little cousin. "But I own it is very annoying to have to wait for anyone—more particularly when you are doing nothing. Just lay your guitar on the grass, Fluff, and let us walk up and down under the shade here. I have something to say to you, and it will help to pass the time."

Fluff obeyed at once.

"You don't look well, Frances," she said, in her affectionate way, linking her hand through her cousin's arm. I have noticed that you haven't looked yourself ever since the day you went to Martinstown: nearly a week ago now. Now I wonder at that, for the weather has been so perfect, and everything so sweet and nice; and I must say it is a comfort to have a pleasant man like Mr. Arnold in the house. I have enjoyed myself during the past week, and I greatly wonder you haven't, Frances."

"I am glad you have been happy, dear," said Frances, ignoring the parts of Fluff's speech which related to herself. "But it is on that very subject I want now to speak to you. You like living at the Firs, don't you, Fluff?"

"Why, of course, Frances. It was poor mamma's"—here the blue eyes brimmed with tears—"it was darling mother's wish that I should come here to live with you and the squire. I never could be so happy anywhere as at the Firs; I never, never want to leave it."

"But of course you will leave it some day, little Fluff, for in the ordinary course of things you will fall in love and you will marry, and when this happens you will love your new home even better than this. However, Fluff, we need not discuss the future now, for the present is enough for us. I wanted to tell you, dear, that it is very probable, almost certain, that I shall have to go away from home. What is the matter, Fluff?"

"You go away? Then I suppose that is why you look ill. Oh, how you have startled me!"

"I am sorry to have to go, Fluff, and I cannot tell you the reason. You must not ask me, for it is a secret. But the part that concerns you, dear, is that if I go I do not see how you can stay on very well at the Firs."

"Of course I should not dream of staying, Francie. With you away and Mr. Arnold gone," here she looked hard into Frances's face, "it would be dull. Of course, I am fond of the squire, but I could not do without another companion. Where are you going, Frances? Could not I go with you?"

"I wish you could, darling. I will tell you where I am going to-morrow or next day: it is possible that I may not go, but it is almost certain that I shall."

"Oh, I trust, I hope, I pray that you will not go."

"Don't do that, Fluff, for that too means a great trouble. Oh, yes, a great trouble and desolation. Now, dear, I really must talk to you about your own affairs. Leave me out of the question for a few moments, pet. I must find out what you would like to do, and where you would like to go. If I go away I shall have little or no time to make arrangements for you, so I must speak to you now. Have you any friends who would take you in until you would hear from your father, Fluff?"

"I have no special friends. There are the Harewoods, but they are silly and flirty, and I don't care for them. They talk about dress—you should hear how they go on—and they always repeat the silly things the men they meet say to them. No, I won't go to the Harewoods. I think if I must leave you, Frances, I had better go to my old schoolmistress, Mrs. Hopkins. She would be always glad to have me."

"That is a good thought, dear. I will write to her to-day just as a precautionary measure. Ah, and here comes Philip.—Philip, you have tried the patience of this little girl very sadly."

In reply to Frances's speech Arnold slightly raised his hat; his face looked drawn and worried; his eyes avoided Frances, but turned with a sense of refreshment to where Fluff stood looking cool and sweet and with a world of tender emotion on her sensitive little face.

"A thousand apologies," he said. "The squire kept me. Shall I carry your guitar? No, I won't sketch, thanks, but if you will let me lie on my back in the long grass by the river, and if you will sing me a song or two, I shall be grateful ever after."

"Then I will write to Mrs. Hopkins, Fluff," said Frances. And as the two got over a stile which led down a sloping meadow to the river she turned away. Arnold had neither looked at her nor addressed her again.

"My father has been saying something to him," thought Frances. And she was right.

The squire was not a man to take up an idea lightly and then drop it. He distinctly desired come what might that his daughter should not marry Arnold; he came to the sage conclusion that the best way to prevent such a catastrophe was to see Arnold safely married to someone else. The squire had no particular delicacy of feeling to prevent his alluding to topics which might be avoided by more sensitive men. He contrived to see Arnold alone, and then rudely, for he did not care to mince his words, used expressions the reverse of truthful, which led Arnold, whose faith was already wavering in the balance, to feel almost certain that Frances never had cared for him and never would do so. He then spoke of Fluff, praising her enthusiastically, and without stint, saying how lucky he considered the man who won not only a beautiful but a wealthy bride, and directly suggested to Arnold that he should go in for her.

"She likes you now," said the squire; "bless her little heart, she'd like anyone who was kind to her. She's just the pleasantest companion any man could have—a perfect dear all round. To tell the truth, Arnold, even though she is my daughter, I think you are well rid of Frances."

"I'm ashamed to hear you say so, sir. If what you tell me is true, your daughter has scarcely behaved kindly to me, but, notwithstanding that, I consider Frances quite the noblest woman I know."

"Pshaw!" said the squire. "You agree with Fluff—she's always praising her too. Of course, I have nothing to say against my daughter—she's my own uprearing, so it would ill beseem me to run her down. But for a wife, give me a fresh little soft roundabout, like Fluff yonder."

Arnold bit his lip.

"You have spoken frankly to me, and I thank you," he said. "If I am so unfortunate as not to win Miss Kane's regard, there is little use in my prolonging my visit here, but I have yet to hear her decision from her own lips. If you will allow me, I will leave you now, squire, for I promised Miss Danvers to spend some of this afternoon with her by the river."

"With Fluff? Little puss—very good—very good—Ah!

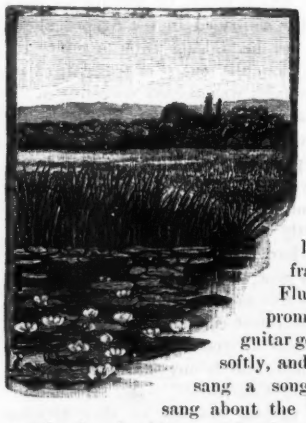
"'The time I've spent in wooing,' never wasted, my boy, never wasted. I wish you all success from the bottom of my heart."



"Insufferable old idiot!" growled Arnold under his breath.

But he was thoroughly hurt and annoyed, and when he saw Frances, could not bring himself even to say a word to her.

The squire went back to the house to enjoy his afternoon nap, and to reflect comfortably on the delicious fact that he had done himself a good turn.

"There is no use playing with edge tools," he murmured. "Frances means well, but she confessed to me she loved him. What more likely, then, that she would accept him, and, notwithstanding her good resolutions, leave her poor old father in the lurch? If Frances accepts Arnold, it will be ruin to me, and it simply must be prevented at all hazards."

CHAPTER XII.

FLUFF found her companion strangely dull. They reached the river, where Arnold, true to his promise, did stretch himself at full length in the long fragrant grass; and Fluff, true to her promise, touched her guitar gently, and gently, softly, and sympathetically sang a song or two. She sang about the "Auld acquaintance" who should never be forgot; she sung of "Robin Adair;" and, lastly, her clear little notes warbled out the exquisite Irish melody, "She is far from the land." Never had Fluff sung better. She threw feeling and sympathy into her notes—in short, she excelled herself in her desire to please. But when at the end of the third song Arnold still made no response, when not the flicker of an eyelid or the faintest dawn of a smile showed either approbation or pleasure, the spoilt child threw her guitar aside, and spoke pettishly—

"I won't amuse you any more," she said. "I don't like sulky people; I am going home to my darling Frances. She is often troubled—oh, yes, she knows what trouble is—but she never sulks, never!"

"Look here, Fluff," said Arnold. "I may call you Fluff, may I not?"

"I don't mind."

Fluff's big eyes began to dilate. She stretched out her hand to draw her guitar once more to her side. She was evidently willing to be reasonable.

"Look here," repeated Arnold.

He rose hastily, and leaning on a low wall which stood near, looked down at the bright little girl at his feet.

"Fluff," he said, "should you greatly mind if I threw conventionality to the winds, and spoke frankly to you?"

"I should not mind at all," said Fluff. "I don't know what you have got to say, but I hate conventionalities."

"The fact is, I am very much bothered."

"Oh."

"And I haven't a soul to consult."

Another "Oh!" and an upward glance of two lovely long-fringed eyes.

"And I think you have a kind, affectionate heart, Fluff."

"I have."

"And you won't misunderstand a man who is half distracted?"

"I am sorry you are half distracted. No, I won't misunderstand you."

"That is right, and what I expected. I was thinking of all this, and wondering if I might speak frankly to you when you were singing those songs. That is the reason I did not applaud you, or say thank you, or anything else commonplace."

"I understand now," said Fluff. "I'm very glad. I was puzzled at first, and I thought you rude. Now I quite understand."

"Thank you, Fluff; if I may sit by your side I will tell you the whole story. The fact is I want you to help me, but you can only do so by knowing everything. Why, what is the matter? Are you suddenly offended?"

"No," answered little Ellen, "but I'm surprised. I'm so astonished that I'm almost troubled, and yet I never was so glad in my life. You are the very first person who has ever asked me to help them. I have amused people—oh yes, often; but helped—you are the very first who has asked me that."

"I believe you are a dear little girl," said Arnold, looking at her affectionately, "and if anyone can set things right now, you are the person. Will you listen to my story? May I begin?"

"Certainly."

"Remember, I am not going to be conventional."

"You said that before."

"I want to impress it upon you. I am going to say the sort of things that girls seldom listen to."

"You make me feel dreadfully curious," said Fluff. "Please begin."

"The beginning is this. Ten years ago I came here. I stayed here for a month. I fell in love with Frances."

"Oh—oh! darling Frances; and you fell in love with her ten years ago?"

"I did. I went to Australia. For five years I had an awful time there; my friends at home supposed me to be dead. The fact is, I was taken captive by some of the bushmen. That has nothing to say to my story, only all the time I thought of Frances. I remained in Australia five more years. During that five years I was making my fortune. As I added pound to pound, I thought still of Frances. I am rich now, and I have come home to marry her."

"Oh," said little Fluff, with a deep-drawn sigh. "What a lovely story. But why, then, is not Frances happy?"

"Ah, that is where the mystery comes in; that is what I want you to find out. I see plainly that Frances is very unhappy. She won't say either yes or no to my suit. Her father gives me to understand that she does not love me; that she never loved me. He proposes that instead of marrying Frances I should try to make you my wife. He was urging me to do so just now when I kept you waiting. All the time he was telling me that Frances never could or would love me, and that you were the wife of all others for me."

"Why do you tell me all this?" said Fluff. Her cheeks had crimsoned, and tears trembled on her eyelashes. "Why do you spoil a beautiful story by telling me this at the end?"

"Because the squire will hint it to you, Fluff; because even Frances herself will begin to think that I am turning my affections in your direction; because if you help me as I want you to help me, we must be much together; because I must talk very freely to you; in short, because it is absolutely necessary that we should quite understand each other."

"Yes," said Fluff. "I see now what you mean; it is all right; thank you very much." She rose to her feet. "I will be a sort of sister to you," she said, laying her little hand in his; "for I love Frances better than any sister, and when you are her husband you will be my brother."

"No brother will ever be truer to you, Fluff; but alas, and alas! is it ever likely that Frances can be my wife?"

"Of course she will," said Fluff. "Frances is so unhappy because she loves you."

"Nonsense."

"Well, I think so, but I'll soon find out."

"You will? If you were my real sister I would call you a darling."

"You may call me anything you please. I am your sister, to all intents and purposes, until you are married to my darling, darling Frances. Oh, won't I give it to the squire! I think he's a perfectly horrid old man, and I used to be fond of him."

"But you will be careful, Fluff—a rash word might do lots of mischief."

"Of course I'll be careful. I have lots of tact."

"You are the dearest girl in the world, except Frances."

"Of course I am. That was a very pretty speech, and I am going to reward you. I am going to tell you something."

"What is that?"

"Frances is going away."

Arnold gave a slight start.

"I did not know that," he said. "When?"

"She told me when you were talking to the squire. She is going away very soon, and she wants me to go too. I am to go back to my old schoolmistress, Mrs. Hopkins. Frances is very sorry to go, and yet when I told her that I hoped she would not have to, she said I must not wish that, for that would mean a great calamity. I don't understand Frances at present, but I shall soon get to the bottom of everything."

"I fear it is all too plain," said Arnold, lugubriously. "Frances goes away because she does not love me, and she is unhappy because she does not wish to give me pain."

"You are quite wrong, sir. Frances is unhappy on her own account, not on yours. Well, I'll find out lots of things to-night, and let you know. I'm going to be the cunningest little mouse in the world; but oh, won't the squire have a bad time of it!"

CHAPTER XIII.

THE morning's post brought one letter. It was addressed to Miss Kane, and was written in a business hand. The squire looked anxiously at his daughter as she laid it unopened by her plate. Fluff, who was dressed more becomingly than usual, whose eyes were bright, and who altogether seemed in excellent spirits, could not help telegraphing a quick glance at Arnold; the little party were seated round the breakfast-table, and the squire, who intercepted Fluff's glance, chuckled inwardly. He was very anxious with regard to the letter which Frances so provokingly left unopened, but he also felt a pleasing thrill of satisfaction.

"Ha! ha!" he said to himself, "my good young man, you are following my advice, for all you looked so sulky yesterday. Fluff, little dear, I do you a good turn when I provide you with an excellent husband, and I declare, poor as I am, I won't see you married without giving you a wedding present."

After breakfast the squire rose, pushed aside his chair, and was about to summon his daughter to accompany him to the south parlour when Fluff ran up to his side.

"I want to speak to you most particularly," she said. "I have a secret to tell you," and she raised her charming, rounded, fresh face to his. He patted her on the cheek.

"Is it very important?" he said, a little uneasily, for he noticed that Philip and Frances were standing silently side by side in the bay window; and that Frances had removed her letter from its envelope, and was beginning to read it.

The squire found himself wheedled and dragged into the south parlour. There he was seated in his most comfortable chair, just as much sunlight as he liked best was allowed to warm him, a footstool was placed under his feet, and Fluff drawing a second forward seated herself on it, laid her hand on his knee, and looked at him with an expression of pleased affection.

"'You have got to prevent it, you know.'"—p. 32

"She 'll absolutely tell that fellow the contents of the most important letter she ever received," inwardly grumbled the squire. "He'll know before her father knows." Aloud he said, "I have a little business to talk over with Frances just now, Ellen. I am afraid your secret must wait, little puss."

"But that 's what it can't do," answered Fluff. "Don't call Frances: she 's reading a letter. What a rude old man you are, to think of disturbing her! I 'm quite ashamed of you. Now come with me, for I must tell you my important secret."

"Aren't you dreadfully curious?" she said.

"Oh, yes, Fluff—quite devoured with curiosity. I wonder now what Frances is doing; the fact is, she has received an important letter. It 's about my affairs. I am naturally anxious to know its contents. Tell your secret as quickly as possible, little woman, and let me get to more important matters."

"More important matters! I 'm ashamed of you," said Fluff, shaking her finger at him. "The fact is, squire, you mustn't be in a hurry about seeing Frances—you must curb your impatience; it's very good for you to curb it—it's a little discipline, and discipline properly administered always turns people out delightful. You'll be a very noble old man when you have had a little of the proper sort of training. Now, now: why, you look quite cross; I declare you're not a bit handsome when you're cross. Frances can't come to you at present—she's engaged about her own affairs."

"And what may they be, pray, miss?"

"Ah, that's my secret."

Fluff looked down; a becoming blush deepened the colour in her cheeks; she toyed idly with a rosebud which she held in her hand. Something in her attitude, and the significant smile on her face, made the squire both angry and uneasy.

"Speak out, child," he said. "You know I hate mysteries."

"But I can't speak out," said Fluff. "The time to speak out hasn't come—I can only guess. Squire, I'm so glad—I really do think that Frances is in love with Philip."

"You really do?" said the squire. He mimicked her tone sarcastically, red, angry spots grew on his old cheeks. "Frances in love with Philip, indeed! You have got pretty intimate with that young Australian, Fluff, when you call him by his Christian name."

"Oh yes, we arranged that yesterday. He's like a brother to me. I told you some time ago that he was in love with Frances. Now, I'm so delighted to be able to say that I think Frances is in love with him."

"Tut—tut!" said the squire. "Little girls imagine things. Little girls are very fanciful."

"Tut—tut!" responded Fluff, taking off his voice to the life. "Little girls see far below the surface; old men are very obtuse."

"Fluff, if that's your secret, I don't think much of it. Run away now, and send my daughter to me."

"I'll do nothing of the kind, for if she's not reading her letter she's talking to her true love. Oh, you must have a heart of stone to wish to disturb them!"

The squire, with some difficulty, pushed aside his footstool, hobbled to his feet, and walked to the window where the southern sun was pouring in. In the distance he saw the grey of Frances' dress through the trees, and Philip's square, manly, upright figure walking slowly by her side. He pushed open the window, and hoarsely and angrily called his daughter's name.

"She doesn't hear you," said Fluff. "I expect he's proposing for her now; isn't it lovely? Aren't you delighted? Oh, where's my guitar? I'm going to play 'Sweethearts.' I do hope, squire, you'll give Frances a very jolly wedding."

But the squire had hobbled out of the room.

He was really very lame with rheumatic gout; but the sight of that grey slender figure pacing slowly under the friendly sheltering trees, was too much for him; he was overcome with passion, anxiety, rage.

"She's giving herself away," he murmured. That little vixen Fluff is right—she's in love with the fellow, and she's throwing herself at his head; it's perfectly awful to think of it. She has forgotten all about her old father. I'll be a beggar in my old age; the Firs will have to go: I'll be ruined, undone. Oh, was there ever such an undutiful daughter? I must go to her. I must hobble up to that distant spot as quickly as possible; perhaps when she sees me she may pause before she irrevocably commits so wicked an act. Oh, how lame I am—what agonies I'm enduring; shall I ever be in time? He's close to her—he's almost touching her—good gracious, he'll kiss her if I'm not quick. That little wretch Fluff could have reached them in a twinkling, but she won't do anything to oblige this morning. Hear her now, twanging away at that abominable air, 'Sweethearts'—oh—oh—puff—puff—I'm quite blown. This walk will kill me. Frances—I say, Frances, Fran*ces!*"

The feeble cracked old voice was borne on the breeze, and the last high agonised note reached it's goal.

"I am coming, father," responded his daughter. She turned to Arnold, and held out her hand.

"God bless you!" she said.

"Is your answer final, Frances?"

"Yes—yes. I wish I had not kept you a week in suspense; it was cruel to you, but I thought—oh—I must not keep my father."

"Your father has you always, and this is my last moment. Then you'll never, never love me?"

"I cannot marry you, Philip."

"That is no answer. You never loved me."

"I cannot marry you."

"I won't take 'no,' unless you say with it: 'I never loved you, I never can love you.'"

"Look at my father, Philip; he is almost falling. His face is crimson. I must go to him. God bless you!"

She took his hand, and absolutely, before the squire's horrified eyes, raised it to her lips, then flew lightly down the path, and joined the old man.

"Is anything wrong, father? How dreadful you look."

"You—you have accepted the fellow! You have deserted me; I saw you kiss his hand. Fah! it makes me sick. You've accepted him, and I am ruined."

"On the contrary, I have refused Philip. That kiss was like one we give to the dead. Don't excite yourself; come into the house. I am yours absolutely from this time out."

"Hum—haw—you gave me an awful fright, I can tell you." The squire breathed more freely. "You set that little Fluff on to begin it, and you ended it. I won't be the better of this for some time. Yes, let me lean on you, Frances; it's a comfort to feel I'm not without a daughter. Oh, it would have been a monstrous thing had you deserted me! Did I not rear you, and bring you up? But in cases of the affections—I mean in cases of those paltry passions, women are so weak."

"But not your daughter, Frances Kane. I, for your sake, have been strong. Now, if you please, we will drop the subject; I will not discuss it further. You had better come into the house, father, until you get cool."

"You had a letter this morning, Frances—from Spens, was it not?"

"Oh yes; I had forgotten; your creditors will accept my terms, for the present. I must drive over to Arden this afternoon, and arrange what day I go there."

"I shall miss you considerably, Frances. It's a great pity you couldn't arrange to come home to sleep; you might see to my comforts then, by rising a little earlier in the morning. I wish, my dear, you would propose it to Mrs. Carnegie; if she is a woman of any consideration she will see how impossible it is that I should be left altogether."

"I cannot do that, father. Even you must pay a certain price for a certain good thing. You do not wish to leave the Firs, but you cannot keep both the Firs and me. I will come and see you constantly, but my time from this out belongs absolutely to Mrs. Carnegie. She gives me an unusually large salary, and, being her servant, I must endeavour in all particulars to please her, and must devote my time to her to a certain extent day and night."

"Good gracious, Frances, I do hope that though adversity has come to the house of Kane, you are not going so far to forget yourself as to stoop to menial work at Arden. Why, rather than that—rather than that, it would be better for us to give up the home of our fathers."

"No work need be menial, done in the right spirit," responded Frances.

Her eyes wandered away, far up among the trees, where Arnold still slowly paced up and down. In the cause of pride her father might even be induced to give up the Firs. Was love, then, to weigh nothing in the scale?

She turned suddenly to her father.

"You must rest now," she said. "You need not be the least anxious on your own account any more. You must rest and take things quietly, and do your best not to get ill. It would be very bad for you to be ill now, for there would be no one to nurse you. Remember that, and be careful. Now go and sit in the parlour, and keep out of draughts. I cannot read to you this morning, for I shall be very busy, and you must not call me nor send for me unless it is absolutely necessary. Now, good-bye for the present."

Frances did not, as her usual custom was, establish her father in his easy-chair; she did not cut his morning paper for him, nor attend to the one or two little comforts which he considered essential; she left him without kissing him, only her full, grave, sorrowful eyes rested for one moment with a look of great pathos on his wrinkled, discontented old face, then she went away.

The squire was alone; even the irritating strain of "Sweethearts" no longer annoyed him. Fluff had ceased to play—Fluff's gay little figure was no longer visible; the man who had paced up and down under the distant trees had disappeared; Frances' grey dress was nowhere to be seen.

The whole place was still, oppressively still—not a bee hummed, not a bird sang. The atmosphere was hot and dry, but there was no sunshine; the trees were motionless, there was a feel of coming thunder in the air.

The squire felt calmed and triumphant, at the same time he felt irritated and depressed. His anxiety was over, his daughter had done what he wished her to do—the Firs was saved, at least for his lifetime—the marriage he so dreaded was never to be. At the same time, he felt dull and deserted; he knew what it was to have his desire, and leanness in his soul. It would be very dull at the Firs without Frances, he should miss her much when she went away. He was a feeble old man, and he was rapidly growing blind. Who would read for him, and chat with him, and help to wile away the long and tedious hours? He could not spend all his time eating and sleeping. What should he do now with all the other hours of the long day and night? He felt pleased with Frances—he owned she was a good girl, but at the same time he was cross with her, she ought to have thought of some other way of delivering him. She was a clever woman—he owned she was a clever woman, but she ought not to have effected his salvation by deserting him.

The squire mumbled and muttered to himself. He rose from his arm-chair and walked to the window; he went out and paced up and down the terrace; he came in again. Was there ever such a long and tiresome morning? He yawned, he did not know what to do with himself.

A little after noon the door of the south parlour was quickly opened and Arnold came in.

"I have just come to say good-bye, sir."

The squire started in genuine amazement. He did not love Arnold, but after two hours of solitude he was glad to hear any human voice. It never occurred to him, too, that anyone should feel Frances such a necessity as to alter plans on her account.

"You are going away?" he repeated. You told me yesterday you would stay here for at least another week or ten days."

"Exactly, but I have changed my mind," said Arnold. "I came here for an object—my object has failed. Good-bye."

"But now, really——" the squire strove to retain the young man's hand in his clasp. "You don't seriously mean to tell me that you are leaving a nice place like the Firs in this fine summer weather, because Frances has refused you."

"I am going away on that account," replied Arnold stiffly. "Good-bye."

"You astonish me—you quite take my breath away. Frances couldn't accept you, you know. She had me to see after. I spoke to you yesterday about her, and I suggested that you should take Fluff instead. A dear little thing, Fluff. Young, and with money; who would compare the two?"

"Who would compare the two?" echoed Arnold. "I repeat, squire, that I must now wish you good-bye, and I distinctly refuse to discuss the subject of my marriage any further."

Arnold's hand scarcely touched Squire Kane's. He left the south parlour, and his footsteps died away in the distance.

Once more there was silence and solitude. The sky grew darker, the atmosphere hotter and denser—a growl of thunder was heard in the distance—a flash of lightning lit up the squire's room. Squire Kane was very nervous in a storm—at all times he hated to be long alone—now he felt terrified, nervous, aggrieved. He rang his bell pretty sharply.

"Jane," he said to the servant who answered his summons. "Send Miss Kane to me at once."

"Miss Kane has gone to Martinstown, sir. She drove in in the pony-cart an hour ago."

"Oh—h'm—I suppose Mr. Arnold went with her?"

"No, sir. Mr. Arnold took a short cut across the fields; he says the carrier is to call for his portmanteau, and he's not a-coming back."

"H'm—most inconsiderate—I hate parties broken up in a hurry like this. What a vivid flash that was! Jane, I'm afraid we are going to have an awful storm."

"It looks like it, sir, and the clouds is coming direct this way. Watkins says as the strength of the storm will break right over the Firs, sir."

"My good Jane, I'll thank you to shut the windows, and ask Miss Danvers to have the goodness to step this way."

"Miss Danvers have a headache, sir, and is lying down. She said as no one is to disturb her."

The squire murmured something inarticulate. Jane lingered for a moment at the door, but finding nothing more was required of her, softly withdrew.

Then in the solitude of his south parlour the squire saw the storm come up—the black clouds gathered silently from east and west, a slight shiver shook the trees, a sudden wind agitated the slowly moving clouds—it came between the two banks of dark vapour, and then the thunder rolled and the lightning played. It was an awful storm, and the squire, who was timid at such times, covered his face with his trembling hands, and even feebly tried to pray. It is possible that if Frances had come to him then he would, in the terror fit which had seized him, have given her her heart's desire. Even the Firs became of small account to Squire Kane while the lightning flashed in his eyes and the thunder rattled over his head. He was afraid—he would have done anything to propitiate the Maker of the storm—he would have even sacrificed himself if necessary.

But the clouds rolled away, the sunshine came out. Fear vanished from the squire's breast, and when dinner was announced he went to partake of it with an excellent appetite. Fluff and he alone had seats at the board; Arnold and Frances were both away.

Fluff's eyes were very red. She was untidy, too, and her whole appearance might best be described by the word dishevelled. She scarcely touched her dinner, and her chattering merry tongue was silent.

The squire was a man who never could abide melancholy in others. He had had a fright, his fright was over. He was therefore exactly in the mood to be petted and humoured, to have his little jokes listened to and applauded, to have his thrice-told tales appreciated. He was just in the mood, also, to listen to pretty nothings from a pretty girl's lips, to hear her sing, perhaps to walk slowly with her by-and-bye in the sunshine.

Fluff's red eyes, however, Fluff's disordered, untidy appearance, her downcast looks, her want of appetite, presented to him, just then, a most unpleasing picture. As his way was he resented it, and began to grumble.

"I have had a very dull morning," he began.

"Indeed, sir?—I won't take any peas, thank you, Jane; I'm not hungry."

"I hate little girls to come to table who are not hungry," growled the squire. "Bring the peas here, Jane."

"Shall I go up to my room again?" asked Fluff, laying down her knife and fork.

"Oh no, my love; no, not by any means."

The squire was dreadfully afraid of having to spend as solitary an afternoon as morning.

"I am sorry you are not quite well, Fluff," he said, hoping to pacify the angry little maid; "but I suppose it was the storm. Most girls are very much afraid of lightning. It is silly of them; for really in a room with the windows shut—glass, you know, my dear, is a non-conductor—there is not much danger. But there is no combating the terrors of the weaker sex. I can fancy you, Fluff, burying that pretty little head of yours under the bedclothes. That doubtless accounts for its present rough condition. You should have come to me, my love; I'd have done my best to soothe your nervous fears."

Fluff's blue eyes were opened wide.

"I don't know what you are talking about," she said. "I afraid of the storm, and burying my head under the bedclothes, as if I were a baby or a silly old man! Yes, of course I knew there was a storm, but I didn't notice it much, I was too busy packing."

This last remark effectually distracted the squire's attention.

"Packing! good gracious, child, you are not going away too?"

"Of course I am; you don't suppose I am going to stay here without my darling Francie?"

"But what am I to do, Fluff?"

"I don't know, Squire. I suppose you'll stay on at the Firs."

"Alone! Do you mean I'm to stay here alone?"

"I suppose so, now that you have sent Frances away."

"I have not sent her away. What do you mean, miss?"

"I'm not going to say what I mean," said Fluff. "Dear Frances is very unhappy, and I'm very unhappy too, and Philip, I think, is the most miserable of all. As far as I can tell, all this unhappiness has been caused by you, Squire, so I suppose you are happy, but if you think I am going to stay at the Firs without Frances you are very much mistaken. I would not stay with you now on any account, for you are a selfish old man, and I don't love you any longer."

This angry little speech was uttered after Jane had withdrawn, and even while Fluff spoke she pushed some fruit towards the squire.

"You are a selfish old man," she continued, her cheeks burning and her eyes flashing—"you want your comforts—you want to be amused, and to get the best of everything, and if that is so you don't care for others. Well, here is the nicest fruit in the garden—eat it. And by-and-bye I'll sing for you, if my singing gives you pleasure. I'll do all this while I stay, but I'm going away the day after to-morrow. But I don't love you any more, for you are unkind to Frances."

The squire was really too much astonished to reply. Nobody in all his life had ever spoken to him in this way before; he felt like one who was assaulted, and beaten all over. He was stunned, and yet he still clung in a sort of mechanical way to the comforts which were dearer to him than life. He picked out the finest strawberries which Fluff had piled on his plate, and conveyed them to his lips. Fluff flew out of the room for her guitar, and when she returned she began to sing a gay Italian air in a very sprightly and effective manner. In the midst of her song the squire broke in with a sudden question.

"What do you mean by saying I am unkind to Frances?"

Fluff's guitar dropped with a sudden clatter to the floor.

"You won't let her marry Philip—she loves him with all her heart, and he loves her. They have cared for one another for ten long years, and now you are parting them. You are a dreadfully, dreadfully, selfish old man, and I hate you."

Here the impulsive little girl burst into tears, and ran out of the room. The squire sat long over his strawberries.

CHAPTER XIV.

IT was arranged that Frances should take up her abode at Arden on the following Friday, and on Thursday Fluff was to go to London to stay—for a time, at least—under the sheltering wings of her late schoolmistress, Mrs. Hopkins. With regard to her departure, Fluff made an extraordinary request—she earnestly begged that Frances should not accompany her to Martinstown. She gave no reason for this desire; but she enforced it by sundry pettings, by numerous embraces, by both tears and smiles—in short, by the thousand and one fascinations which the little creature possessed. A certain Mrs. Mansfield was to escort Fluff to London; and Frances arranged that the two should meet at the railway station, and catch the twelve o'clock train for town.

"I don't want you to introduce her to me, darling," said Fluff. "I can't possibly mistake her; for she is tall, and has a hooked nose, and always wears black, you say. And you know what I am, just exactly like my name; so it will be impossible for us not to recognise each other."

Thus Fluff got her way, and Frances saw her off, not from the railway platform, but standing under the elm-trees where Fluff had first seen her and Arnold together.

When a turn in the road quite hid Frances Kane from the little girl's view she clasped her hands with a mixture of ecstasy and alarm.

"Now, I can have my way," she said to herself, "and dear Frances will never, never suspect."

A cab had been sent for to Martinstown to fetch away Fluff and her belongings. The driver was a stranger, and Fluff thought it extremely unlikely that, even if he wished to do so, he would be able to tell tales. She arrived in good time at the railway station, instantly assumed a business-like air, looked out for no tall lady with a hooked nose in black, but calmly booked her luggage for a later train, and calling the same cabman, asked him to drive her to the house of the lawyer, Mr. Spens.

The lawyer was at home, and the pretty, excitable little girl was quickly admitted into his presence. Mr. Spens thought he had seldom seen a more radiant little vision than this white-robed, eager, childish creature. Childish, and yet womanly just then, with both purpose and desire in her face.

"You had my letter, hadn't you?" said Fluff. "I am Ellen Danvers; Miss Kane is my cousin, and my dearest, my most dear friend."

"I have had your letter, Miss Danvers, and I remained at home in consequence. Won't you sit down? What a beautiful day this is!"

"Oh, please, don't waste time over the weather. I am come to talk to you about Frances. You have got to prevent it, you know."

"My dear young lady, to prevent what?"

"Well, she's not to go to Arden. She's not to spend the rest of her days with a dreadful, fanciful old woman! She 's to do something else quite different. You 've got to prevent Frances making herself and—and—others miserable all her life. Do you hear, Mr. Spens?"

"Yes, I certainly hear, Miss Danvers. But how I am to alter or affect Miss Kane's destiny is more than I can at present say. You must explain yourself. I have a very great regard for Miss Kane; I like her extremely. I will do anything in my power to benefit her; but as she chose entirely of her own free will — without anyone, as far as I am aware, suggesting it to her—to become companion to Mrs. Carnegie, I do not really see how I am to interfere."

"Yes, you are," said Fluff, whose eyes were now full of tears. "You are to interfere because you are at the bottom of the mystery. You know why Frances is going to Mrs. Carnegie, and why she is refusing to marry Philip Arnold, who has loved her for ten years, and whom she loves with all her heart. Oh, I can't help telling you this! It is a secret, a kind of secret, but you have got to give me another confidence in return."

"I did not know about Arnold, certainly," responded Spens. "That alters things. I am truly sorry; I am really extremely sorry. Still, I don't see how Miss Kane can act differently. She has promised her father now: it is the only way to save him. Poor girl! I am sorry for her, but it is the only way to save the squire."

"Oh, the squire!" exclaimed Fluff, jumping up in her seat, and clasping her hands with vexation. "Who cares for the squire? Is he to have everything? Is nobody to be thought of but him? Why should Frances make all her days wretched on his account? Why should Frances give up the man she is so fond of, just to give him a little more comfort and luxuries that he doesn't want? Look here, Mr. Spens, it is wrong—it must not be! I won't have it!"

Mr. Spens could not help smiling.

"You are very eager and emphatic," he said. "I should like to know how you are going to prevent Miss Kane taking her own way."

"It is not her own way, it is the squire's way."

"Well, it comes to the same thing. How are you to prevent her taking the squire's way?"

"'Won't you go down and have a chat with him?'"—p. 37.

"Oh, you leave that to me! I have an idea. I think I can work it through. Only I want you, Mr. Spens, to tell me the real reason why Frances is going away from the Firs, and why she has to live at Arden. She will explain nothing; she only says it is necessary. She won't give any reason either to Philip or me."

"Don't you think, Miss Danvers, I ought to respect her confidence? If she wished you to know, she would tell you herself."

"Oh, please — please tell me! Do tell me! I won't do any mischief, I promise you. Oh, if only you knew how important it is that I should find out!"

The lawyer considered for a moment. Fluff's pretty words and beseeching gestures were having an effect upon him. After all, if there was any chance of benefiting Miss Kane, why should the squire's miserable secret be concealed? After a time he said—

"You look like a child, but I believe you have sense. I suppose whatever I tell you, you intend to repeat straightway to Mr. Arnold?"

"Well, yes; I certainly mean to tell him."

"Will you promise to tell no one but Arnold?"

"Yes, I can promise that."

"Then the facts are simple enough. The squire owes six thousand pounds to a client of mine in London. My client wants to sell the Firs in order to recover his money. The squire says if he leaves the Firs he must die. Miss Kane comes forward and offers to go as companion to Mrs. Carnegie, Mrs. Carnegie paying her £300 a year, which sum she hands over to my client as interest at 5 per cent. on the six thousand pounds. These are the facts of the case in a nutshell, Miss Danvers. Do you understand them?"

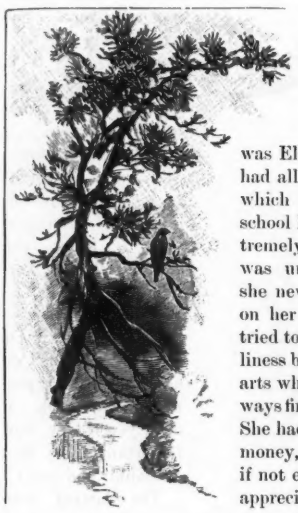
"I think I do. I am very much obliged to you. What is the name of your client?"



"You must excuse me, young lady—I cannot divulge my client's name."

"But if Philip wanted to know very badly, you would tell him?"

"That depends on the reason he gave for requiring the information."

"I think it is all right, then," said Fluff, rising to her feet. "Good-bye, I am greatly obliged to you. Oh, that dear Frances! Mr. Spens, I think I hate the squire."

CHAPTER XV.

IF there was a girl who was a prime favourite with her schoolfellows that girl was Ellen Danvers. She had all the qualifications which insure success in school life. She was extremely pretty, but she was unconscious of it; she never prided herself on her looks, she never tried to heighten her loveliness by a thousand little arts which schoolgirls always find out and despise. She had always plenty of money, which at school, if not elsewhere, is much appreciated. She was generous, she was bright, she was loving; she was not sufficiently clever to make anyone envious of her, but at the same time she was so very smart and quick that not the cleverest girl in the school could despise her.

When Fluff went away from Merton House the tribulation experienced on all sides was really severe. The girls put their heads together, and clubbed to present her with a gold bangle, and she in return left them her blessing, a kiss all round, and a pound's-worth of chocolate creams.

The school was dull when Fluff went away; she took a place which no one else quite held. She was not at all weak or namby-pamby, but she was a universal peace-maker. Fluff made peace simply by throwing oil on troubled waters, for she certainly was not one to preach; and as to pointing a moral, she did not know the meaning of the word.

It was with great rejoicing, therefore, that the young ladies of Mrs. Hopkins' select seminary were informed on a certain Thursday morning that their idol was about to return to them. She was no longer to take her place in any of the classes; she was to be a parlour boarder, and go in and out pretty much as she pleased, but she was to be in the house again, and they were to see her bright face, and hear her gay laugh, and doubtless she would once more be everyone's confidante and friend.

In due course Fluff arrived. It was late when she made her appearance, for she had missed the train by which Frances had intended her to travel. But late as the hour was—past nine o'clock—Fluff found time to pay a visit to the school-room, where the elder girls were finishing preparations for to-morrow, to rush through the dormitories, and kiss each expectant little one.

"It's just delicious!" whispered Sybil Lake, the youngest scholar in the school. "We have you for the last fortnight before we break up. Just fancy, you will be there to see me if I get a prize!"

"Yes, Sibyl, and if you do I'll give you sixpennyworth of chocolate creams."

Sibyl shouted with joy.

The other children echoed her glee. One of the teachers was obliged to interfere. Fluff vanished to the very select bedroom that she was now to occupy, and order was once more restored.

Fluff's name was now in everyone's mouth. Didn't she look prettier than ever? Wasn't she nicer than ever? Hadn't she a wonderfully grown-up air?

One day it was whispered through the school that Fluff had got a lover. This news ran like wildfire from the highest class to the lowest. Little Sybil asked what a lover meant, and Marion Jones, a lanky girl of twelve, blushed while she answered her.

"It isn't proper to speak about lovers," said Katie Phillips. "Mother said we weren't to know anything about them. I asked her once, and that was what she said. She said it wasn't proper for little girls to know about lovers."

"But grown girls have them," responded Marion. "I think it must be captivating. I wish I was grown up."

"You're much too ugly, Marion, to have a lover," responded Mary Mills. "Oh, for goodness' sake, don't get so red and angry! She's going to strike me! Save me, girls!"

"Hush!" exclaimed Katie, "hush! come this way. Look through the lattice. Look through the wire fence just here. Can you see? There's Fluff, and there's her lover. He's rather old, isn't he? But hasn't he l'air distingué? Isn't Fluff pretty when she blushes? The lover is rather tall. Oh, do look, Mary, can you see—can you see?"

"Yes, he has fair hair," responded Mary. "It curls. I'm sorry it is fair and curly, for Fluff's is the same. He should be dark, like a Spaniard. Oh, girls, girls, he has got such lovely blue eyes, and such white teeth! He smiled just now, and I saw them."

"Let me peep," said Marion. "I haven't got one peep yet."

But here the voices became a little loud, and the lovers, if they were lovers, passed out of sight behind the yew hedge.

"That's it," said Fluff, when she had finished her story, "it's all explained now. I hope you're obliged to me."

"No brother could love you better, nor appreciate you more than I do, Fluff."

"Thank you; I'll tell you how much I care for those words when you let me know what you are going to do."

Arnold put his hand to his forehead; his face grew grave, he looked with an earnest half-puzzled glance at the childish creature by his side.

"I really think you are the best girl in the world, and one of the cleverest," he said. "I have a feeling that you have an idea in your head, but I am sorry to say nothing very hopeful up to the present time has occurred to me. It does seem possible, after your explanation, that Frances may love me, and yet refuse me; yes, certainly, that does now seem possible."

"How foolish you are to speak in that doubting tone," half snapped Fluff (certainly, if the girls had seen her now they would have thought she was quarrelling with her lover). "How can you say 'perhaps Frances loves you'? Loves you! She is breaking her heart for you. Oh! I could cry when I think of Frances's pain!"

"Dear little friend!" said Arnold. "Then if that is so—God grant it, oh, God grant it!—Frances and I must turn to you to help us."

Fluff's face brightened.

"I will tell you my plan," she said. "But first of all you must answer me a question."

"What is it? I will answer anything."

"Mr. Arnold——"

"You said you would call me Philip."

"Oh, well, Philip—I rather like the name of Philip—Philip, are you a rich man?"

"That depends on what you call riches, Fluff. I have brought £15,000 with me from the other side of the world. I took five years earning it, for all those five years I lived as a very poor man, for I was adding penny to penny, and pound to pound, to Frances's fortune."

"That is right," exclaimed Fluff, clapping her hands. "Frances's fortune—then of course you will spend it in saving her."

"I would spend every penny to save her, if I only knew how."

"How stupid you are!" said Fluff. "Oh, if only I were a man!"

"What would you do, if you were?"

"What would I not do? You have £15,000, and Frances is in all this trouble because of £6,000. Shall I tell you, must I tell you what you ought to do?"

"Please—pray tell me."

"Oh, it is so easy. You must get the name of the old horror in London to whom the squire owes £6,000, and you must give him six out of your fifteen, and so pay off the squire's debt. You must do this and—and——"

"Yes, Fluff; I really do think you are the cleverest little girl I ever came across."

"The best part is to come now," said Fluff. "Then you are to go to the squire; tell him that you will sell the Firs over his head, unless he allows you to marry Frances. Oh, it is so easy, so, so delightful!"

"Give me your hand, Fluff. Yes, I see light, yes. God bless you, Fluff."

"There is no doubt she has accepted him," reported Mary Mills to her fellows. "They have both appeared again round the yew-hedge, and he has taken her hand, and he is smiling. Oh! he is lovely when he smiles."

"I wish I was grown up," sighed Marion, from behind. "I 'd give anything in all the world to have a lover."

"It will be interesting to watch Fluff at supper to-night," exclaimed Katie Phillips. "Of course she'll look intensely happy. I wonder if she'll wear an engagement-ring."

The supper-hour came. Fluff took her seat among the smaller girls; her face was radiant enough to satisfy the most exacting, but her small dimpled fingers were bare.

"Why do you all stare at my hands so?" she exclaimed, once.

"It's on account of the ring," whispered little Sybil. "Hasn't he given you the ring yet?"

"Who is 'he,' dear?"

"Oh, I wasn't to say. His name is Mr. Lover."

CHAPTER XVI.

MRS. CARNEGIE could scarcely be considered the most cheerful companion in the world. There was a general sense of rejoicing when Frances took up her abode at Arden, but the victim who was to spend the greater part of her life in Mrs. Carnegie's heated chambers, could scarcely be expected to participate in it. This good lady, having turned her thoughts inwards for so long, could only see the world from this extremely narrow standpoint. She was hypochondriacal, she was fretful, and although Frances managed her, and, in consequence, the rest of the household experienced a good deal of ease, Frances herself, whose heart just now was not of the lightest, could not help suffering. Her cheeks grew paler, her figure slighter and thinner. She could only cry at night, but then she certainly cried a good deal.

On a certain sunny afternoon, Mrs. Carnegie, who thought it her bounden duty on all occasions to look out for grievances, suddenly took it upon herself to complain of Frances's looks.

"It is not that you are dull, my dear," she remarked. "You are fairly cheerful, and your laugh is absolutely soothing; but you are pale, dreadfully pale, and pallor jars on my nerves, dear. Yes, I assure you, in the sensitive state of my poor nerves a pale face like yours is absolutely excruciating to them, darling."

"I am very sorry," replied Frances. She had been a month with Mrs. Carnegie now, and the changed life had certainly not improved her. "I am very sorry." Then she thought a moment. "Would you like to know why I am pale?"

"How interesting you are, my love!—so different from every other individual that comes to see me. It is good for my poor nerves to have my attention distracted to any other trivial matter. Tell me, dearest, why you are so pallid. I do trust the story is exciting—I need excitement, my darling. Is it an affair of the heart, precious?"

Frances's face grew very red. Even Mrs. Carnegie ought to have been satisfied for one brief moment with her bloom.

"I fear I can only give you a very prosaic reason," she said, in her gentle, sad voice. "I have little or no colour because I am always shut up in hot rooms, and because I miss the open-air life to which I was accustomed."

Mrs. Carnegie tried to smile, but a frown came between her brows.

"That means," she said, "that you would like to go out. You would leave your poor friend in solitude."

"I would take my friend with me," responded Frances. "And she should have the pleasure of seeing the colour coming back into my cheeks."

"And a most interesting sight it would be, darling. But oh, my poor, poor nerves! The neuralgia in my back is positively excruciating at this moment, dearest; I am positively on the rack; even a zephyr would slay me."

"On the contrary," replied Frances in a firm voice, "you would be strengthened and refreshed by the soft sweet air outside. Come, Mrs. Carnegie, I am your doctor and nurse, as well as your friend, and I prescribe a drive in the open air for you this morning. After dinner, too, your sofa shall be placed in the arbour; in short, I intend you to live out of doors while this fine weather lasts."

"Ah, dear imperious one! And yet you will kill me with this so-called kindness."

"On the contrary, I will make you a strong woman if I can. Now I am going to ring to order the carriage."

She bustled about, had her way, and to the amazement of everyone Mrs. Carnegie submitted to a drive for an hour in an open carriage.

All the time they were out Frances regaled her with stories of poor and suffering people. She told her stories with great skill, knowing just where to leave off, and just the points that would be most likely to interest her companion. So interesting did she make herself that never once during the drive was Mrs. Carnegie heard to mention the word nerves, and so practical and to the point were her words that the rich woman's purse was opened, and two five-pound notes were given to Frances to relieve those who stood most in need of them.

"Positively I am better," explained Mrs. Carnegie, as she ate her dainty dinner with appetite.

An hour later she was seated cosily in the arbour which faced down the celebrated Rose-walk, a place well known to all the visitors at Arden.

"You are a witch," she said to Frances, "for positively I do declare, the racking, torturing pain in my back is easier. The jolting of the carriage ought to have made it ten times worse, but it didn't. I positively can't understand it, my love."

"You forget," said Frances, "that although the jolting of the carriage might have tried your nerves a very little, the soft sweet air and change of scene did them good."

"And your conversation, dearest—the limpid notes of that sweetest voice. Ah, Frances, your tales were harrowing!"

"Yes, but they were more harrowing to be lived through. You, dear Mrs. Carnegie, to-day have relieved a certain amount of this misery."

"Ah, my sweet, how good your words sound! They are like balm to this tempest-tossed heart and nerve-racked form. Frances dear, we have an affinity one for the other. I trust it may be our fate to live and die together."

Frances could scarcely suppress a slight shudder. Mrs. Carnegie suddenly caught her arm.

"Who is that radiant-looking young creature coming down the Rose-walk?" she exclaimed—"See, ah, my dear Frances, what a little beauty! What style, what exquisite bloom!"

"Why, it is Fluff!" exclaimed Frances. She rushed from Mrs. Carnegie's side, and the next moment Miss Danvers' arms were round her neck.

"Yes, I've come, Frances," she exclaimed. "I have really come back. And who do you think I am staying with?"

"Oh, Fluff—at the Firs! It would be kind of you to cheer my poor old father up with a visit."

"But I'm not cheering him up with any visit—I'm not particularly fond of him. I'm staying with Mr. and Mrs. Spens."

Frances opened her eyes very wide; she felt a kind of shock, and a feeling of almost distrust crept over her.

"Mr. Spens? Surely you don't mean my father's lawyer, Mr. Spens, who lives in Martinstown, Fluff?"

"Yes, I don't mean anybody else."

"But I did not think you knew him."

"I did not when I last saw you, but I do now—very well, oh, very well indeed. He's a darling."

"Fluff! How can you speak of dull old Mr. Spens in that way? Well, you puzzle me. I don't know why you are staying with him."

"You are not going to know just at present, dearest Francie. There's a little bit of a secret afloat. Quite a harmless, innocent secret, which I promise you will break nobody's heart. I like so much being with Mr. Spens, and so does Philip—Philip is there too."

"Philip? Then they are engaged," thought Frances. "It was very soon. It is all right, of course, but it is rather a shock. Poor little Fluff—dear Philip—may they be happy!"

She turned her head away for a moment, then with a white face, but steady, quiet eyes, said in her gentlest tones—

"Am I to congratulate you, then, Fluff?"

"Yes, you are—yes, you are. Oh, I am so happy, and everything is delicious! It's going on beautifully. I mean the—the affair—the secret. Frances, I left Philip at the gate. He would like to see you so much. Won't you go down and have a chat with him?"

"I cannot; you forget that I am Mrs. Carnegie's companion. I am not my own mistress."

"That thin, cross-looking woman staring at us out of the bower, yonder? Oh, I'll take care of her. I promise you I'll make myself just as agreeable as you can. There, run down, run down—I see Philip coming to meet you. Oh, what a cold wretch you are, Frances! You don't deserve a lover like Philip Arnold—no, you don't."

"He is not my lover, he is yours."

"Mine? No, thank you—there, he is walking down the Rose-path. He is sick of waiting, poor fellow. I am off to Mrs. Carnegie. Oh, for goodness' sake, Francie, don't look so foolish!"

Fluff turned on her heel, put wings to her feet, and in a moment, panting and laughing, stood by Mrs. Carnegie's side.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," she exclaimed when she could speak. "I know who you are, and I am dear Frances's cousin, Fluff. I knew you would not mind giving the poor things a chance, and allowing me to stay and try to entertain you for a little."

"Sit down, my dear, sit down. You really are a radiant little vision. It is really most entertaining to me to see anything so fresh and pretty. I must congratulate you on the damask roses you wear in your cheeks, my pretty one."

"Thank you very much; I know I have plenty of colour. Do you mind sitting a little bit, just so—ah, that is right. Now we'll have our backs to the poor things, and they'll feel more comfortable."

"My dear, extraordinary, entertaining little friend, what poor things do you mean?"

"Why, Frances and——"

"Frances, my companion—Frances Kane?"

"Yes, your companion. Only she oughtn't to be your companion, and she won't be long. Your companion, and my darling cousin, Frances Kane, and her lover."

"Her lover! I knew there was a love affair. That accounts for the pallor! Oh, naughty Frances; oh, cruel maiden, to deceive your Lucilla! I felt it, I guessed it, it throbbed in the air. Frances and her lover! My child, I adore lovers—let me get a peep at him. Dear Frances, dear girl. And is the course of true love going smoothly, miss—miss—I really don't know your name, my little charmer."

"My name is Fluff—please don't look round. It's a very melancholy love affair just at present, but I'm making it right."

"My little bewitching one, I would embrace you, but my poor miserable nerves won't permit of the least exertion. And so Frances, my Frances, has a lover! It was wrong of her, darling, not to tell of this."

"She gave him up to come to you."

"Oh, the noble girl! But do you think, my child, I would permit such a sacrifice? No, no; far rather would Lucilla Carnegie bury her sorrows in the lonely tomb. Lend me your handkerchief, sweet one—I can't find my own, and my tears overflow, Ah, my Frances, my Frances—I always knew you loved me, but to this extent—oh, it is too much!"

"But she didn't do it for you," said Fluff. "She wanted the money to help her father—he's such a cross, selfish old man. He wouldn't let her marry Philip, although Philip loved her for ten years, and saved all his pence in Australia to try and get enough money to marry her, and was nearly eaten himself by the blacks, but never forgot her day or night—and she loved him beyond anything. Don't you think, Mrs. Carnegie, that they ought to be married? Don't you think so?"

"My child, my little fair one, you excite me much. Oh, I shall suffer presently! But now your enthusiasm carries that of Lucilla Carnegie along with you. Yes, they ought to be married."

"Mrs. Carnegie, they must be married. I'm determined, and so is Philip, and so is Mr. Spens. Won't you be determined, too?"

"Yes, my child. But, oh, what shall I not lose in my Frances? Forgive one tear for myself—my little rose in June."

"You needn't fret for yourself at all. You'll be ever so happy when you've done a noble thing. Now listen. This is our little plot—only first of all promise, promise most faithfully, that you won't say a word to Frances."

"I promise, my child. How intensely you arouse my curiosity! Really I begin to live."

"You won't give Frances a hint?"

"No, no, you may trust me, little bright one."

"Well, I do trust you. I know you won't spoil all our plans. You'll share them and help us. Oh, what a happy woman you'll be by-and-bye! Now listen."

Then Fluff seated herself close to Mrs. Carnegie, and began to whisper an elaborately got-up scheme into that lady's ears, to all of which she listened with glowing eyes, her hands clasping Fluff's, her attention riveted on the sweet and eager face.

"It's my plot," concluded the little narrator. "Philip doesn't much like it—not some of it—but I say that I will only help him in my own way."

"My dear love, I don't think I ever heard anything more clever and original and absolutely to the point."

"Now did you? I can't sleep at night, thinking of it—you'll. be sure to help me?"

"Help you? With my heart, my life, my purse!"

"Oh, we don't want your purse. You see there's plenty of money—there's the fortune Philip made for Frances. It would be a great pity anything else should rescue her from this dilemma."

"Oh, it is so sweetly romantic!" said Mrs. Carnegie, clasping her hands.

"Yes, that's what I think. You'll be quite ready when the time comes?"

"Oh, quite! More than ready, my brightest fairy!"

"Well, here comes Frances—remember, you're not to let out a word, a hint.—I think I've amused Mrs. Carnegie quite nicely, Francie."

Frances's cheeks had that delicate bloom on them which comes now and then as a special and finishing touch, as the last crown of beauty to very pale faces. Her eyes were soft, and her dark eyelashes were still a little wet with some tears which were not unhappy ones.

"Philip wrung a confession out of me," she whispered to her little cousin. "No, Fluff—no, dear Fluff, it does no good—no good whatever. Still I am almost glad I told him."

"You told him what?"

"I won't say. It can never come to anything."

"I know what you said—you have made Philip very happy, Frances. Now I must run away."

CHAPTER XVII.

IT is necessary for some people to go away to be missed. There are certain very quiet people in the world, who make no fuss, who think humbly of themselves, who never on any occasion blow their own trumpets, who under all possible circumstances keep in the background, but who yet have a knack of filling odd corners, of smoothing down sharp angles, of shedding the sunshine of kindness and unselfishness over things generally. There are such people, and they are seldom very much missed until they go away.

Then there is a hue and cry. Who did this? Whose duty was the other? Where is such a thing to be found? Will nobody attend to this small but necessary want? The person who never made any talk, but did all the small things and made all the other people comfortable, is suddenly missed, and in an instant his or her virtues are discovered.

This was the case at the Firs when Frances on a certain morning drove away.

Watkins missed her—the stable-boy, the house-servants—the cat, the dog—many other domestic pets—and most of all, Squire Kane.

He was not neglected, but he had a sense of loneliness which began the moment he awoke, and never left him till he went to sleep again.

He had his meals regularly; he was called in good time in the morning; the new housekeeper lit his candle and brought it to him at night; his favourite fruit and his favourite flowers were still set before him, and the newspaper he liked best always lay by his plate at breakfast-time. Watkins was really an excellent gardener, and the ribbon border still bloomed and flourished, the birds sang in the trees as of yore, the lawn was smoothly kept. It was early September now, but the old place never looked gayer, sweeter, brighter. Still, somehow or other the squire was dull. His newspaper was there, but there was no one to cut it, no one to read it aloud to him. The flowers were making a wonderful bloom, but there was no special person to talk them over with. He had no one to tell his thoughts to, no one to criticise, no one to praise, and—saddest want of all to a nature like his—not a soul in the world to blame.

Really, Frances was very much missed—he could not have believed it before she went, for she was such a quiet grave woman, but there wasn't the least doubt on the subject. She had a way of making a place pleasant and home-like. Although she was so quiet herself, wherever she went the sun shone. It was quite remarkable how she was missed—even the Firs, even the home of his ancestors was quite dull without her.

Frances had been away for five weeks, and the squire was beginning to wonder if he could endure much more of his present monotonous life, when one day as he was passing up and down in the sunny south walk, he was startled, and his attention pleasingly diverted, by the jangling sweet sound of silver bells. A smart little carriage drawn by a pair of Arab ponies, and driven by a lady, drew up somewhere in the elm avenue, a girl in white jumped lightly out, and ran towards him.

"Good gracious!" he said to himself, "why, it's that dear little Fluff. Well, I am glad to see her."

He hobbled down the path as fast as he could, and as Fluff drew near, sang out cheerily—

"Now this is a pleasing surprise! But welcome to the Firs, my love, welcome most heartily to the Firs."

"Thank you, squire," replied Fluff. "I've come to see you on a most important matter. Shall we go into the house, or may I talk to you here?"

"I hope, my dear, that you have come to say that you are going to pay me another visit—I do hope that is your important business. Your little room can be got ready in no time, and your guitar—I hope you've brought your guitar, my dear. It really is a fact, but I haven't had one scrap of entertainment since Frances went away—preposterous, is it not?"

"Well, of course I knew you'd miss her," said Fluff in a tranquil voice. "I always told you there was no one in the world like Frances."

"Yes, my dear, yes—I will own, yes, undoubtedly, Frances, for all she is so quiet, and not what you would call a young person, is a good deal missed in the place. But you have not answered my query yet, Fluff. Have you come to stay?"

"No, I've not come to stay: at least, I think not. Squire, I am glad you appreciate dear Frances at last."

"Of course, my love, of course. A good creature—not young, but a good worthy creature. It is a great affliction to me, being obliged, owing to sad circumstances, to live apart from my daughter. I am vexed that you cannot pay me a little visit, Fluff. Whose carriage was that you came in? and what part of the world are you staying in at present?"

"That dear little pony-trap belongs to Mrs. Carnegie, of Arden; and her niece, Mrs. Passmore, drove me over. I am staying with Mr. and Mrs. Spens, at Martinstown."

"Spens the lawyer?"

"Yes, Spens the lawyer. I may stay with him if I like, may I not? I am a great friend of his. He sent me over here to-day to see you on most important business."

"My dear Fluff! Really, if Spens has business with me, he might have the goodness to come here himself."

"He couldn't: he has a very bad influenza cold; he's in bed with it. That was why I offered to come. Because the business is so very important."

"How came he to talk over my affairs with a child like you?"

"Well, as you'll learn presently, they happen to be my affairs too. He thought, as he couldn't stir out of his bed, and I knew all the particulars, that I had better come over and explain everything to you, as the matter is of such great importance and as a decision must be arrived at to-day."

Fluff spoke with great eagerness. Her eyes were glowing, her cheeks burning, and there wasn't a scrap of her usual fun about her.

In spite of himself the squire was impressed.

"I cannot imagine what you have to say to me," he said; "but perhaps we had better go into the house."

"I think we had," said Fluff; "for as what I have got to say will startle you a good deal, you had better sit in your favourite arm-chair, and have some water near you in case you feel faint."

As she spoke she took his hand, led him through the French windows into his little parlour, and seated him comfortably in his favourite chair.

"Now I'll begin," said Fluff. "You must not interrupt me, although I'm afraid you will be a little startled. You have mortgaged the Firs for six thousand pounds."

"My dear Ellen!"—an angry flush rose in the squire's cheeks.—"Who has informed you with regard to my private affairs? Frances has done very——"

"Frances has had nothing to say to it; I won't go on if you interrupt me. You have mortgaged the Firs for six thousand pounds, to some people of the name of Dawson and Blake, in London. Frances lives at Arden, in order to pay them £300 a year interest on the mortgage."

"Yes, yes; really Frances—really Spens——"

"Now do stop talking; how can I tell my story if you interrupt every minute? Messrs. Dawson and Blake were very anxious to get back their money, and they wanted to sell the Firs in order to realise it. Mr. Spens had the greatest work in the world to get them to accept Frances's noble offer. He put tremendous pressure to bear, and at last, very unwillingly, they yielded."

"Well, well, my dear"—the squire wiped the moisture from his brow—"they have yielded, that is the great thing—that is the end of the story, at least for the present."

"No, it is not the end of the story," said Fluff, looking up angrily into the old man's face. "You thought to make it the end. You were quite satisfied, for it seemed all right to you; you were to stay on quietly here, and have your comforts, and the life you thought so pleasant; and Frances was to give up Philip Arnold, whom she loves, and go away to toil and slave and be miserable. Oh, it was all right for you, but it was bitterly all wrong for Frances!"

"My dear little Fluff, my dear Ellen, pray try and compose yourself; I assure you my side of the bargain is dull, very dull. I am alone: I have no companionship. Not a living soul who cares for me is now to be found at the Firs. My side is not all sunshine, Fluff; and I own it—yes, I will own it, Fluff, I miss Frances very much."

"I am glad of that, I am very glad. Now I am coming to the second part of my story. A week ago Mr. Spens had a letter from Messrs. Dawson and Blake to say that they had sold their mortgage on the Firs to a stranger; a man who had plenty of money, but who had taken a fancy to the Firs, and who wished to get it cheap."

The squire sat upright on his chair.

"Mr. Spens wrote at once to the new owner of the mortgage, and asked him if he would take five per cent. interest on his money, and not disturb you while you lived. Mr. Spens received a reply yesterday, and it is because of that I am here now."

The squire's face had grown very white; his lips trembled a little.

"What was the reply?" he asked. "Really—really, a most extraordinary statement; most queer of Spens not to come to me himself about it. What was the reply, Fluff?"

"I told you Mr. Spens was ill and in bed. The stranger's reply was not favourable to your wishes. He wishes for the Firs; he has seen the place, and would like to live there. He says you must sell; or, there is another condition."

"What is that? This news is most alarming and disquieting. What is the other condition—the alternative?"

Fluff rose, yawned slightly, and half turned her back to the squire.

"It is scarcely worth naming," she said, in a light and indifferent voice; "for as Frances loves Philip, of course she would not think of marrying anyone else. But it seems that this stranger, when he was poking about the place, had caught sight of Frances, and he thought her very beautiful and very charming. In short, he fell in love with her, and he says if you will let him marry her, that he and she can live here, and you need never stir from the Firs. I mention this," said Fluff, "but of course there's no use in thinking of it, as Frances loves Philip."

"But there is a great deal of use in thinking of it, my dear; I don't know what you mean by talking in that silly fashion. A rich man falls in love with my daughter. Really, Frances must be much better-looking than I gave her credit for. This man, who practically now owns the Firs, wishes to release me from all difficulties if I give him Frances. Of course I shall give him Frances. It is an admirable arrangement. Frances would be most handsomely provided for, and I shall no longer be lonely with my daughter and son-in-law residing at the Firs."

"But Frances loves Philip!"

"Pooh! a boy-and-girl affair. My dear, I never did, and never will, believe in anything between Frances and Arnold. I always said Arnold should be your husband."

"I don't want him, thank you."

"Frances was always a good girl," continued the squire; "an excellent, good, obedient girl. She refused Philip because I told her to, and now she'll marry this stranger because I wish her to. Really, my dear, on the whole your news is pleasant; only, by the way, you have not told me the name of the man who now holds my mortgage."

"He particularly wishes his name to be kept a secret for the present, but he is a nice fellow; I have seen him. I think, if Frances could be got to consent to marry him, he would make her an excellent husband."

"My dear, she must consent. Leave my daughter to me; I'll manage her."

"Well, the stranger wants an answer to-day."

"How am I to manage that? I must write to Frances, or see her. Here she is at this moment, driving down the avenue with Mrs. Carnegie. Well, that is fortunate. Now, Fluff, you will take my part; but, of course, Frances will do what I wish."

"You can ask her, squire. I'm going to walk about outside with Mrs. Carnegie."

"And you won't take my part?"

"I won't take anybody's part. I suppose Frances can make up her own mind."

When Miss Kane came into her father's presence her eyes were brighter, and her lips wore a happier expression than the squire had seen on them for many a long day. She stepped lightly, and looked young and fresh.

Fluff and Mrs. Carnegie paced up and down in the south walk. Mrs. Carnegie could walk now, and she was certainly wonderfully improved in appearance.

"Beloved little fairy," she whispered to her companion, "this excitement almost overpowers me. It was with the utmost difficulty I could control myself as we drove over. Our sweet Frances looks happy, but I do not think she suspects anything. Dear little one, are you certain, quite certain, that the hero of the hour has really arrived?"

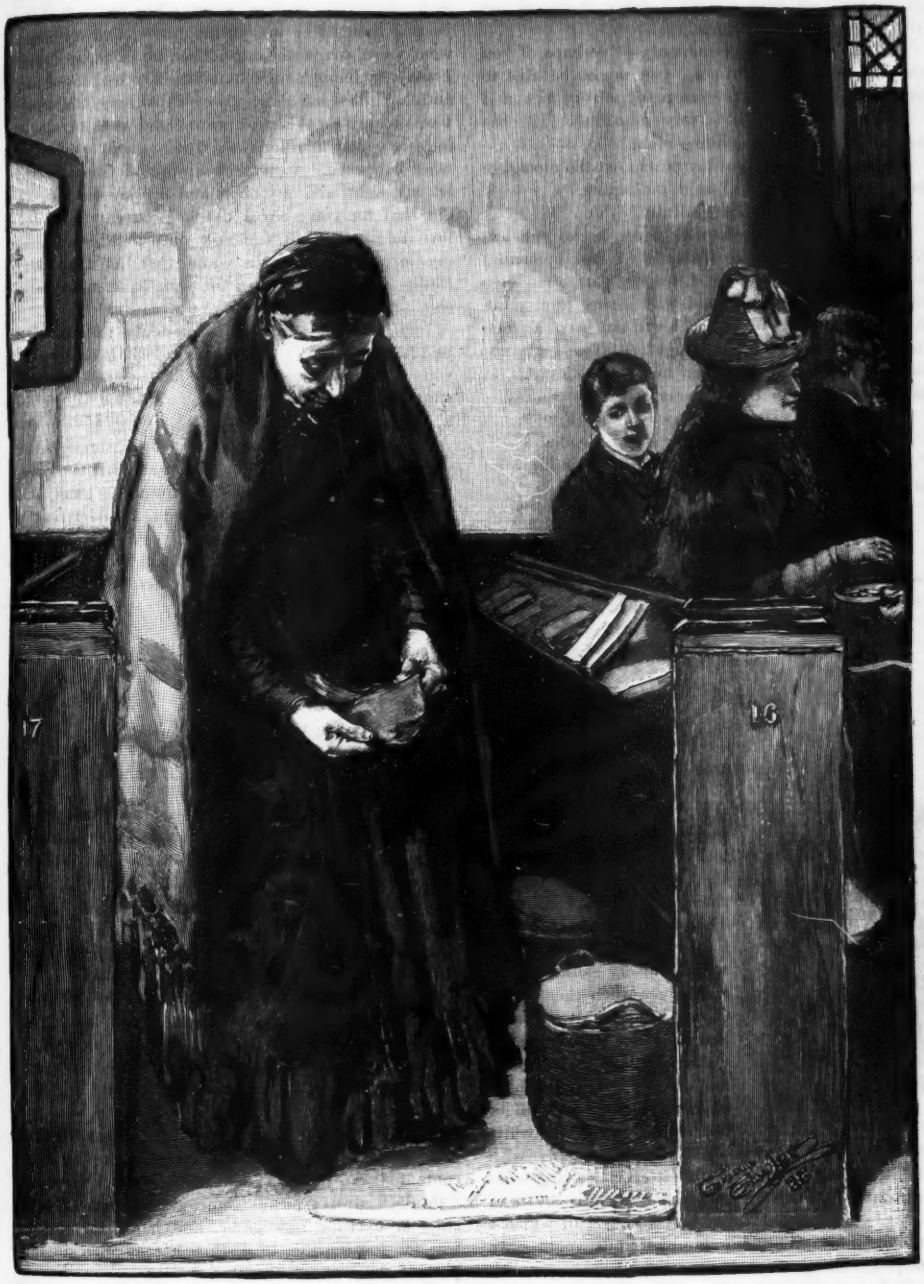
"Philip? I have locked him up in the dining-room," said Fluff, "and he is pacing up and down there now like a caged lion. I do hope the squire will be quick, or he'll certainly burst the lock of the door."

The two ladies paced the south walk side by side.

"We'll give them half an hour," said Fluff.

When this time had expired, she took Mrs. Carnegie's hand, and they both approached the open windows of the squire's parlour. When the squire saw them, he rose and confronted them. Angry red spots were on his cheeks; his hands trembled. Frances was seated at the table; she looked very pale, and as the two ladies approached she was wiping some tears silently from her eyes.

"Yes, look at her," said the squire, who was almost choking with anger. "She refuses him—she absolutely refuses him! She is satisfied that her poor old father shall end his days in the workhouse, rather than unite herself to an amiable and worthy man, who can amply provide for her. Oh, it is preposterous! I have no patience with her; she won't even listen to me. Not a word I say has the smallest effect."



"Because, father——"

"No, Frances, I won't listen to any of your 'becauses.' But never, never again even profess to care for your father. Don't waste words, my child; for words are empty when they are not followed by deeds."

"I must take an answer to Mr. Spens to-day," said Fluff. "Perhaps, if Frances thought a little, she would change her mind."

These words seemed to sting Frances, who rose quickly to her feet.

"You know why I cannot help my father in this particular," she said. "Oh! I think, between you all, you will drive me mad."

"Perhaps," said Fluff suddenly—"perhaps, if you saw the gentleman, Frances, you might be able to give a different answer. He really is very nice, and —and—the fact is, he's very impatient. He has arrived—he is in the dining-room."

"The gentleman who has purchased the mortgage is in the dining-room!" said the squire.

He rubbed his hands gleefully.

"Excellent! Frances will never be so rude as to refuse a rich man to his face. I look upon him already as our deliverer. I, for my part, shall give him a hearty welcome, and will assure him, if he will only give me time, that I will not leave a stone unturned to overcome my daughter's absurd infatuation. Frances, do you hear me? I desire you to behave politely to the stranger when he comes."

"Perhaps I had better go away," said Frances.

"No, no, dear Francie; do stay," pleaded Fluff. "I'll go and fetch the gentleman; I know him; he is really very nice."

She darted away.

Frances turned her back to the window.

"You know, father, all I have done for you," she said, her beautiful eyes shining and her slim figure very erect. "I have loved Philip—oh! so deeply, so faithfully!—for ten years. For five of these years I thought he was in his grave; and my heart went there, too, with him. Then he came back, and I was very happy; for I found that he had loved me, and thought of me alone, also, all that long, long time. I was happy then, beyond words, and no woman ever more fervently thanked God. Then—then—you know what happened. I gave Philip up. I consented to let my light, and my hope, and my joy die out. I did that for you; but I did not consent to let my love die; and I tell you now, once and for all, that my love will never die; and that, as I so love Philip, I can never, even for your sake, marry any one but Philip!"

"Oh! Francie, Francie!" suddenly exclaimed a joyful little voice. "No one in all the world wants you to marry anyone else! The stranger isn't a stranger. Say 'Yes' to your father and to Philip at the same time."

Frances turned; Arnold stepped in through the open window and put his arm round her.

"Now, sir," he said, holding Frances's hand, and turning to the squire, "which am I to have—the Firs or Frances?"

Of course, everybody present knew the answer, so there is no need to record it here.

THE END.

THE CHRIST-CHILD'S GIFT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BEAUTY AND THE BEAST," "A CHRISTMAS DREAM," ETC. ETC.

THEY were a desolate little couple, this small boy and girl, who were curled up upon the broad window-seat of their dull London nursery. Their very clothes bore that untidy, don't-care sort of look which nursery clothes are so apt to get when there is no chance of their little owners being suddenly sent for by visitors to the drawing-room, and the big bow of Hermie's sash was slipping round under one elbow, while the white socks on Whiffles' feet had parted company with his little strap shoes, and the latter were lying comfortably neglected on the floor beneath. A wax doll in a bright pink dress, and a huge ball which I do not think Whiffles' chubby hands could have clasped, were on a chair near them; but even they looked uninviting, for the children were suffering from that unpleasant feeling which occasionally seizes the wisest of us: they were tired of nothing to do.

At last the boy broke the silence.

"That nasty old doll is makin' faces at me, Hermie," he began, cautiously, pointing to Miss Pink Dress upon the chair near them. "Do you know, Hermie, I was finking," at five years old master Whiffles spoke nearly as clearly as his sister, who was three years his senior, with the exception of his "th's," which were still a stumbling-block to him: "I was finking we might chop off her head an' bury her, an' then she would never make faces any more."

It was a bold thing to suggest, for the doll was new, and Hermie tender-hearted; but instead of jumping up to protect her property, she only shook her head, and looked very solemn indeed.

"Mustn't talk. I am having a think," she said mysteriously.

Whiffles nodded, gave a delighted little chuckle, and sliding down from his high seat, he went off contentedly to the other end of the room. Hermie's "thinks" always meant some grand piece of mischief or exciting new game, and her little brother was far too sensible to disturb her at such an important moment.

"Is you ready now?" he asked, a minute later, under the belief that he had been quiet for at least half an hour; and, climbing back into his place, he put both arms round his sister's neck, and gave her an affectionate hug.

"You have such *boo*tiful finks, dear," he said earnestly, for Hermie made his little world, and he thought her the cleverest and in every way the most wonderful person there could possibly be. "Is there 'ventures in it?"

"*Ad*ventures," corrected the elder child. "Yes, that is it. We are going to have them d'rectly minute, and it will be more fun than we ever had before. You see this little balcony kind of place?"

Twisting herself round, she knelt up upon the cushions, and Whiffles followed her example.

The other side of the window was a broad stone ledge, which was protected by a tolerably high balustrade, and which ran the whole length of that particular row of houses. It had been built there as a protection from fire, for if it broke out in any house, the people who lived in it could quietly step out upon "this balcony kind of place," as Hermie called it, and walk along the backs of the other houses until they were in safety. But the children did not know the real reason it had been built. They thought it had been put there to accommodate the cats, and Whiffles said so, as they stood surveying it now together.

"This is the pussies' walk. Is that where the 'venture is?"

"We'll climb out and go straight on, and see who the other people are; and when we see someone nice, we'll tap at the glass and go in."

Hermie threw back her head to toss away the long fair hair which was always falling forward into her eyes, and caught her little brother by both his hands.

"Oh! won't it be lovely!" she cried, with a number of little dimples chasing each other round her rosy lips, and with her eyes sparkling. "Make haste, Whiffles. Jane won't be up here again till tea-time, and no one will miss us."

"Must we take something to eat?" Whiffles asked gravely. He was not a greedy boy, but he remembered that Robinson Crusoe, of whom Hermie had read from the fat green book upon the shelf yonder, had made various preparations before setting out upon any journey, and he wanted to do the same.

Hermie considered. "Nothing to eat," she said at last; "'cause we haven't anything. But we might take our sea-side pails; and I think Clara Louise would like to come too. I am sure she is pale enough."

Now, Clara Louise was only a rag doll, who had lost her hair, and who had never had any legs, and, before deciding upon taking her, Hermie had looked wistfully at the bright frock of her latest treasure. But she felt afraid of hurting Clara Louise's feelings if she were left at home while the fresher doll was taken out, so Miss Pink Dress was left alone in her glory. And I think Hermie's choice was quite the prettiest part of the expedition.

"'I am having a think.'"—p. 42.

That same October afternoon, while the children were making plans, a girl whose face was bright, although it looked a little tired just then, was walking slowly up the stairs of the next house. Now, this house, although it stood next door, was by no means as grand as its neighbour. Instead of being beautifully furnished, and being ruled by a frowning old lady in a black silk dress, whom the children called "grandmamma," and her friends "Lady Rayton," there were at least half a dozen different sets of people living in this curtainless ugly house, and the poorest of them was this girl, who lived at the very top, and whose face, even when it was tired, looked kind and kissable.

She was an artist, and was generally very busy; but this afternoon, when she reached her own room, she lay back in her chair instead of standing at her easel, for she had just finished one picture, and was trying to think what the next should be about.

"If I were as lucky as some folk, I should just see the very scene that is worth painting," she was saying to herself rather enviously, and then—she raised her eyes and saw the very thing she wanted!

Two little children, a girl and a boy, were peeping at her through the window, with their pretty faces flushed with excitement, and with bubbling laughter breaking from their parted lips. The younger was a tiny lad, with short golden curls clustering round the shining tin pot which he wore helmet-wise upon his head, and with eyes as blue as hyacinth-bells which have grown in a shady nook; and, in a sudden dread that he might come to harm, the girl-artist rushed to the window, and throwing it up, she took the little fellow in her arms.

"Why, you darling!" she cried, as she lifted him in, half delighted, half scared. "Have you dropped from the skies, you elves, or are you fairy burglars? I have had visitors before, but they never came to me from cloudland!"

"How do you do?" asked Hermie politely. She had clambered in unaided, and now stood surveying the young lady, who was cuddling Whiffles as if she loved him, and who yet was asking such strange questions. "We haven't come from cloudland; we have come from next door. He is Reginald, and I am Hermione."

"What grand names!" exclaimed the young lady, and then she kissed Whiffles again, and began to laugh. It was a soft laugh, and somebody who used to listen to it (and who afterwards became a great friend of the children's too) used to say that it reminded him of the hushed song of a bird mingling with sunny water as it danced caressingly over shining stones; and of a woman whose arms folded lovingly round the clinging weight of a little child; and of all that was beautiful and good. But Hermie and Whiffles did not think of any of these things; they only knew that her laugh made them want to laugh too, and so they did, and by the time their laughter ceased, the three were very good friends indeed.

"And now tell me all about yourselves," she said, at last. "What made you want to come to me?"

So they told her, and then Mary—she said that was her name, and that they might call her by it—wanted to know if they would not be missed, and someone be frightened about them.

"There is not a someone," said Hermie cheerfully. "Miss Piper—she is my governess—only comes in the morning, and we don't often see gran'ma, except on Sundays, and Jane is always going away to be with the other servants down-stairs. No one will miss us till five o'clock."

It was on the tip of Mary's tongue to say what of their mother, but she never asked children a lot of questions she would have thought rude to ask grown-up people, and perhaps that was one of the reasons all children liked her.

This particular question, however, soon settled itself, for the little ones began wandering round the room to look at the pictures, and came to a standstill before an engraving of Rivière's "Sympathy."

"I fink she is sorry 'cause her mother's dead," said Whiffles, looking up at the sad-eyed child in the picture with his own eyes very widely opened; but Hermie disagreed.

"I don't think she looks sorry enough for that," she said dreamily. "You are so very veriest sorry for your mother, you know; perhaps it is her father."

Mary stooped to kiss the wistful upturned face; she did not know which part of the little speech sounded the more pathetic.

Then they had tea, and some slices of dry bread with it. "I can't afford butter for a long time, because I bought the engraving," Mary explained merrily, and as if it were quite a natural thing that she could not have both; and while they had it the children talked to her.

They told her about their uncle Victor, and about how Jane had said Whiffles was his heir, and would be a very grand gentleman one of these days.

"I thought she meant all his hair had gone to Whiffles, and that is why he is so bald," remarked Hermie, "but when I told gran'ma, it made her so cross that I mightn't go down-stairs for a month."

Then her brother had his little say, and then, tea being over, Mary began talking to them. I do not know what started it, but the talk turned upon the coming Christmastide, which was still two months away.

"I went to school in Germany," Mary said, "and that is a country the other side of the seas, where they think a great deal about this beautiful season, and all that it means."

"Germany! I know it," called out Hermie, proud to show that Miss Piper's teaching had not been wasted. "It is a pink place on the map."

Mary laughed: "That is it, dear; but somehow it does not look so pink when you get there. Well, in this school of mine, we used to ha e a big Christmas-tree covered with lighted candles, and with little presents hanging from the branches, one for each girl."

Hermie drew a long breath. "That must have been lovely," she said. "Gran'mamma does not let us go to parties, so I never saw a pretty tree like that. I don't like Christmas."

"Oh, yes, you do, my darling." Mary slid one hand round the little girl's neck as she knelt beside her, and with the other she drew Whiffles' curly head down upon her shoulder. "I am quite sure you care very much. Why, it is a birthday, Hermie. All little children care for birthdays, don't they?"

"A birthday?" repeated the child doubtfully: this was a new way of looking at it. "It comes in the hymn—Christmas does, I mean—and the words are long; I don't understand it."

She caught up her silk sash and began industriously plaiting the knotted fringes, feeling suddenly shy; but Whiffles raised his head, and kissed Mary full upon the lips.

"Make a story of it. Tell us about Kissmas," he said, coaxingly, and Mary obediently began at once.

"Our Father Who art in heaven," she said: wondering how much or how little these motherless children had been taught. "You know Who that is, don't you, my sweet? That is God, Who made this beautiful world, and you, and me, and Hermie, and Who loved us so much He sent us His only Son."

"I know," Whiffles cried excitedly, and rumpling up his yellow curls with both his chubby hands. "He was a baby boy. We've got a picture in the nursery, at home, and He is lying in a stable."

"That was because His mother was so poor, and she had nowhere better to cradle this little holy, helpless, beautiful Child."

"And it was His birthday," said Hermie softly. She had left off plaiting her sash, and leaned forward, with both elbows planted upon this new friend's knees. "What presents did He have, Mary?"

"Gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. That means the very best and most precious things which could be brought Him. For the men who carried them knew that this pretty Baby, who lay cooing and babbling upon the golden straw, was the Christ-child, and the great Prince of Peace Who owned the whole world. And what else do you think they brought Him, Hermie?"

The child looked up and seemed to read her answer in the kind eyes. "Loves," she said.

"Right, dear, they brought Him love too, or else none of their gifts would have been worth His having. Oh, my darlings"—she waited a moment before saying these last words, and drew the children closer with those strong young arms, which felt so empty sometimes, and so satisfied to-day—"the Christ-Child is coming to us again very soon. Won't you try and prepare for Him, and give Him presents, and give Him love? People are so busy, and we are all so full of our own pleasures, that we are apt to forget all about Him, and it is so sad when the children do."

"I won't! Really, I won't!" Hermie answered her; and Whiffles said the same.

"And now, my chicks, you must be going back, for it is a quarter to five," Mary said briskly, after she had walked to the window and satisfied herself that there could be no harm in her visitors going back the way they came. "What is it, Hermie? Oh, yes, you may come again another day if you tell Jane about it first, and she does not think grandmamma will mind. Good-bye, dear little lad. Let me lift you up; here's the pail. Now for the sister. Good-bye, and God bless you!"

"Good-bye, good-bye," returned the children, kissing their hands to her; and as she stood watching them clamber in at their nursery window, the sound of Whiffles' baby-voice was borne back to her by the wind.

"God bless you!" he echoed.

CHAPTER II.

THE children talked it all over with Jane that same night, while sitting in front of the night-nursery fire, warming their bare toes and eating their supper of sponge-cakes preparatory to be tucked up in bed. She was a good-natured woman, and was glad when any fresh pleasures entered their dull lives, though she was not quite good-natured enough to care to stay much with them in the nursery instead of going to her fellow-servants down-stairs. So, when Hermie very carefully explained that "Mary" had said that they were not to come again unless Jane were quite sure that grandmamma would not mind, Jane was quite as decided on that point as they wished her to be.

"You go just as often as the lady will have you, missy dear," she advised Hermie. "Only mind and wrap up Master Whiffles, and mind you are back again before five."

So it was arranged, and so it came to pass that during the next few weeks the new friends saw a great deal of each other. The morning, of course, was given up to Miss Piper and lesson-hours, and after their early dinner came the hour which they spent like little prisoners tramping round and round the dull square; but after that the children's time was their own until five o'clock, and it was very seldom that they did not scramble out of the one window and in at the other to spend it with Mary. At first it weighed rather heavily upon Hermie's mind that they were wasting the artist's time, for these fears and anxieties are apt to trouble the little ones much more than we bigger folk are usually willing to believe; but after turning it over and worrying about it for some days, the little girl hit upon an idea which proved to be a happy one.

"Don't you think if you painted Whiffles we should be helping you do another picture, and then we shan't feel so much in your way?" she suggested to Mary. "He is rather a pretty boy, isn't he? and I promise you he will keep very still."

It had been an effort to screw up her courage to say this, so it was really quite delightful to see how pleased Mary was. She said it was a beautiful thought—which it was, of course, because it was a kind one—and that, if Hermie did not mind, she would like to make a picture of them both together, just as she had first seen them getting in at the window.

While Mary painted she told the children tales, and so far from not moving one finger, they might laugh right out loud if they liked. And then, when the painting was over for the afternoon, there came long, delicious talks in the firelight, when Mary would lie back in her big lounging-chair with Whiffles resting in her arms, and Hermie stretched on the rug at her feet. Sometimes she told them about her own childhood, and of a little brother who had died, and of how she had longed for him to come back to her.

"I was only a tiny child when Frank died," said Mary in such a sweet, hushed voice that Hermie crept closer to her, and laid her head caressingly against the other's knee; "and I thought the sky was the floor of Paradise, where my little brother had gone. I remember being sent into the garden that first sad day, because all the house was so quiet and so gloomy inside the closed blinds; and standing to watch a tiny white cloud which was sailing through the blue of the skies. I thought it was the white wings of God's angel who was carrying Frank to Him. And then, at night, I knelt up in the bed, which seemed so wide and cold without Frank's curly head upon the empty pillow, and I peeped through the window-blinds. There was a great thunder-storm that night, and I could not see the white cloud I had watched in the morning, and so I began to cry. But when there came a flash of gold-sparkling lightning, I thought it was heaven's floor opening, and I stopped crying because I thought I saw my little brother, and his face was so happy."

"He was happy without you?" Whiffles asked wonderingly.

But Hermie said, "He was happy because he was with 'Our Father Who art in Heaven.'" And then there came one of those pauses when nobody spoke, and when the firelight glowed very brightly indeed.

"Kissmas will be here soon," Whiffles announced presently, jerking himself into a sitting position, and giving his yellow mop a refreshing shake. "I've begun my paper chain."

"Oh, have you?" asked Mary, with much interest, though she knew all about the paper chain quite as well as Whiffles himself. "How do you make it?"

"It is pink and white cake-paper," both children answered in a rush, and then Hermie went on: "You know it is all soft and fluffy when it is tied round a plum cake, don't you? But it is not fluffy to begin with, that is because it has been snipped up with scissors. It is quite smooth, and we cut it into strips, and then pin the strips into rings, and then catch them one into the other, first pink and then white, so as to make a long chain. It is so pretty. We are going to frame the pictures and windows with it to make them look all bright and Christmasy like they dic . . dac. . . ."

"Decorate, dear?"

"Yes; decorate the churches."

"I see," said Mary, as the excited child paused for breath; "and didn't I hear something too about a holly wreath?"

"That is to hang under the picture," returned Hermie: the one with the Christ-Child in the stable that Whiffles told about the first time we came. Only that costs two shillings, and I know we have not enough pennies in our money-box for that."

"Not enough for that," echoed Whiffles, sorrowfully, while the tears gathered slowly in Hermie's grey eyes.

It was such a great matter to them, these poor little people—even Mary could not understand quite how much, this getting of the holly wreath, on which they had set their hearts. It was to be their gift—their present, as Whiffles called it—to the dear Lord upon His birthday. They were both very fond of holly—as what child is not?—with its dark shining leaves and glistening berries; and when in the twilight of their own nursery they had first thought of getting the wreath, they had clung very close together while Hermie had spoken of it. Somewhere—everywhere—she said, the Christ-Child was. He knew what they were thinking of now, and He would take their offering at Christmastide, because it meant loving Him very much not to spend their weekly pennies for such a long time, but to save them up to buy the holly. She almost thought—the soft voice faltering for a moment in the darkness—that He would accept it as if it were "gold, and frankincense, and myrrh"

It was the night before this talk with Mary that they had had this other talk by themselves, and had gone over the contents of their money box, so when she asked them now how much there was in it, they were able to answer her very exactly.

"A sixpence, an' two pennies, an' three pennies together in silver, an' one halfpenny, an' two farthings."

"That means—let me see—oh! a shilling," Mary told them; "and there are three more pennies coming to you each in these three weeks before Christmas, so that will bring it up to eighteenpence; that means you will still be sixpence short."

Both boy and girl looked very grave indeed.

"You see, dears," Mary went on, "I could give it you if I liked, but then the wreath would be hardly your gift, would it?"

"No, it wouldn't," said both the children at once; and Hermie added, "I couldn't ask anybody to take a present from me that was not all my own."

"So the only other way that I can see is that you must earn it."

Mary smiled into the serious upturned faces, and then the little ones smiled back at her. They were waiting to hear how it was to be done.

"If every day until Christmas Eve you both work very hard at your lessons; if Whiffles does not sit dreaming about 'ventures' instead of listening to what Miss Piper is saying, and Hermie does her copy steadily instead of drawing holly-wreaths upon the blotting-paper, then you will both get the full number of marks, and if you do, I will give you a new threepenny bit each, and that will just make up the two shillings you want. Do you quite understand?"

Did they understand? I only wonder they did not strangle her in their delight, for brother and sister flung themselves upon her with cries of rapture, which sounded a good deal more like an Indian war-whoop than two little children pledging themselves to conquer their laziness, and "work very hard," at the lessons of which neither of them was particularly fond.

Cold weather and Miss Piper did not agree with each other, and so it was hard upon her, poor thing! to have a long walk through the slippery streets before reaching her pupils, who, meanwhile, had been toasting before the cosy fire. But, also, it was unfortunate that the form this disagreement with the weather took was in being doubly stern about all sorts of little things which, to the children, really did not seem to matter one way or the other. So what with these difficulties, and what with a new trouble on Whiffles' part, which was neither more nor less than wanting to cry whenever he was spoken to sharply, it required a good deal of remembrance and love to avoid losing their full marks.

"Molly cried so much that at first the children could not understand what she said."—p. 48.

And then, just a week before Christmas, something happened which was very perplexing—that means very muddling—indeed. The two were sent for to the drawing-room to see some visitors, and one of them was an old gentleman who thought he was making himself "a great favourite with the young people" by playfully prodding at them with a heavy gold-knobbed walking-stick, and asking them questions about the price of certain herrings, which, to Hermie's amazement, he divided into halves. She had not much time, however, to look at him, for Whiffles' chin was beginning to quiver, and his anxious little sister knew that that meant a coming flood of tears.

"It does not hurt to be poked, and it amuses him, I think. Don't cry, Whiffles dear," she pleaded; and, taking courage from her whisper, the little lad's face was clearing, when the visitor, with an alarming "Hey, my boy!" proceeded to ask him in his turn the price of a couple of herrings, if a herring and a half cost three halfpence?

Whiffles' curiosity overcame his fear.

"You is very fond of fiss," he observed gravely. "Is you a fissmonger?"

To do the old gentleman justice, he laughed very much, and was not a bit angry; but Lady Rayton was, and she spoke to them all three in such an awful voice, that the one stopped laughing, and the other burst into tears; while as for Hermie, she shook in her shoes.

"My dear duke," she said, "I pray you to forgive my grandchildren.—Reginald, leave the room instantly. Hermione, take him away."

Hermie hustled him out of the room as fast as she could, and they were halfway up the back stairs before she ventured to stop and comfort him.

"Don't cry any more, Whiffles," she begged, dabbing at his wet eyes with her ever-useful sash. "It wasn't your fault you thought he was a fishmonger, though perhaps it is not as nice as being a duke. But you shouldn't ask questions; it is rude."

"He asked me questions," said Whiffles, resentfully, and Hermie gave a patient sigh.

"Lots of things are rude when you are little, and not when you aren't," she explained.

"Then I'll ask questions when I'm big, and I'll say 'Children must eat bread-y butter,' and I'll eat free biscuits, like gran'ma, so now!" Whiffles answered determinedly.

Hermie kissed him. As long as he would be comforted, she did not mind very much what it was made his tears cease, and they went climbing up the stairs together, hand in hand, and as merry as a couple of kittens.

Suddenly they met Molly, the kitchen-maid: her eyes were red, and she held a broken cup in her hand. She stared at the unusual sight of the children upon the back staircase, until Hermie explained that they were afraid of meeting more visitors if they went the ordinary way.

"What is the matter with your eyes? Have you hurt yourself?" she ended abruptly.

Molly cried so much that at first the children could not understand what she said. By slow degrees, however, they found out that Mrs. Pratt, the stately housekeeper, was very angry with her, because she had broken another cup.

"She sez I may buy one like it, or I may pack," sobbed Molly. "I've broke such a many, and she sez she'll 'have no more of my flightiness.'"

"Why don't you, then?" inquired Hermie.

"It's a shillin', miss; I haven't got one, and I daren't sell anything to raise the money, for fear Mrs. Pratt should hear of it. Oh dear! oh dear! and me so proud and all at getting such a nice place." She threw her apron over her head, and sat down upon the landing while the children stood sorrowfully looking at her.

"Hermie!" Whiffles was twitching at her sleeve. "Stoop down, I want to whisper to you. Do you fink——"

"Yes. Shall we do it?" Hermie knew what he meant. "We have it, you know."

They waited a moment in silence, and then looked at each other and nodded.

"Molly," Hermie asked with a second heavy sigh—for the troubles of this world seemed pressing very weightily upon her just then—"if we lend you a shilling, could you give it us back again soon?"

Whiffles' eyes flashed. How clever Hermie was. But Molly's answer disappointed them both.

"Oh yes certain, sure, as soon as ever the new year is turned, miss. Will you lend it me? Bless your kind little hearts."

"Oh, it doesn't matter," said Hermie sadly. "If you can't give it back by Christmas Day, we shan't want it at all, thank you. Come up to the nursery straight away, and I will give it you now."

So they went up-stairs, and the cherished little hoard was broken into, and Molly made happy, but when she had gone away again she left the children very quiet indeed.

"We must get a teeny weeny wreath now, for one shilling and not two," said Hermie mournfully, and she tossed back her long hair, and blinked both her eyes very hard to prevent the tears coming.

"This is the love part too," she said presently, and in the same dreamy voice in which she had spoken of the child in the picture wanting her mother. "This is the love part, too, and I think—it will—count for part of the wreath."

CHAPTER III.

MOLLY'S troubles came upon a Thursday, and two days later two wonderful things happened. First of all, a letter came from Miss Piper saying that she would not be able to come to them again until after the Christmas holidays. The letter was written to Lady Rayton, and the governess no doubt gave a number of excellent reasons and excuses why this should be, but all that the children understood was, that she was not coming, and very glad of it they were. Whiffles had gone into the night nursery, and had climbed back again into his cot, when Hermie ran in to him with the news.

"I'se glad," he said languidly. "Oh, Hermie, this one is the hottest winter-time that ever I knew; I feel like that glass box where they put the ferns." He propped his hot little face on to the brass rim of the cot, and peeped at his sister, who was disappointed he did not seem more pleased. "'Know I couldn't have got the marks to-day, an' now the pennies are all safe," he added contentedly; and then dropped back upon the pillow, and went off into a heavy sleep.

He was waked from it ten minutes later by his sister appearing again, and this time with a face from which all the pleasure had vanished.

"Whiffles dear," she began, "something else has happened. Guess what it is."

"Can't," said Whiffles sleepily, and he rolled over on to the other side.

"Oh, you are going to sleep again!" cried Hermie, in dismay. "You are a lazy little boy, Whiffles, and this is so particular. Jane is going away."

"For long?"

"No, for short. She will be back again to-night; but oh! Whiffles, her brother Jim is ill. She says there is 'a good deal of illness about,' though I don't know about what. She made me go to Pratt's room, and ask her for some oranges for Jim, and Pratt is grumpy, and says there are not any left. Jane is like Molly, and wont have any money till after Christmas, so she can't buy any. Shall we send Jim some oranges, Whiffles?"

"Hermie was strong enough to scramble in by herself."—p. 50.

Whiffles didn't understand. "We haven't any," he said; and then, more eagerly, "Oh, Hermie! I fink I would like oranges, too."

"There is the wreath money," said Hermie, and stopped short.

"He shan't have it, then," said Whiffles, and it almost sounded as if he were a wee bit cross. "We shall have nofing to give the Christ-Child."

"Yes, we shall," returned Hermie. She had thought it out before waking her brother, and though she was dreadfully disappointed about it, she was sure she was doing right. What remained now was to persuade Whiffles. "Listen, dear," she said, standing on tip-toe to lean over the cot, and look down at him. "If we get the wreath, Jane's boy has nothing, and that would make the dear Christ sad. But if we give Jim the oranges, he has them, and the Christ-Child has the love. Do you understand?"

Whiffles shook his head. "I fink I don't," he said slowly. "But you know. Do it."

Hermie gave an affectionate pat to the yellow head, which she could not reach to kiss, and went off to get the money-box. In it was a packet which held the two promised threepenny bits, for Mary had given them some time before, saying that they were to take them when they had earned them. Hermie took them now, for she knew that every day the marks had been faithfully gained, and adding to the bright silver pieces the remaining coppers which were in the box itself, she carried them off to Jane, who, by this time, had put on her hat and jacket.

"Please buy the oranges you want; Pratt had not any. And please tell your Jim they come from Whiffles and me."

"Why, missy dear!" began Jane, and stopped, and almost looked as if she were going to cry. That was not the end of her sentence, but she could not say any more because she was so pleased at the children caring about her trouble. But I think Hermie understood, and though it made her feel very unhappy to look at the empty money-box, and her throat felt as if there were quite a lump of tears in it, she never liked Jane quite so much as at that moment when she took her money from her.

The rest of the morning was the longest the children had ever spent. Whiffles began shivering soon after Jane had started, and crept out of bed and lay down in front of the fire. His head ached, he said, and his legs felt as if they belonged to somebody else. Hermie grew frightened, and when Whiffles—sweet-tempered, happy little Whiffles—pushed her away when she came near him and then burst out crying about nothing at all, she remembered what Jane had said about there "being a good deal of illness about," and wondered vaguely if it had come anywhere "about" Whiffles.

She sat down on the rug and looked at him, with her chin resting upon her knees.

"Would you like Mary?" she asked at last. "She'd be so snugly."

Whiffles did not answer her at once, and when he did, it sounded as if he had not heard what she said.

"The little white clouds in the blue sky," he said drowsily, "and the pretty sparkles where she saw Frank."

"Whiffles!" Hermie knelt down beside him, and laid her cool cheek against his burning one. "Wake up, dear; talk to me. You frighten Hermie."

But Whiffles would not look at her. He only murmured something more about the white clouds, and drew himself closer to the fireguard.

Hermie never waited very long to make up her mind, and now it was only a minute more before she was climbing out of the back window on to the snowy parapet.

Whiffles was ill and wanted someone; Jane was away, and she was afraid of disturbing Pratt or grandmamma, so she must fetch Mary.

It was desperately cold, and though it only took a few moments to reach Mary's window, she was sprinkled by the snowflakes. Luckily the latch of the window was not fastened, and Hermie was strong enough to push it up and scramble in by herself, but when she gained the room it was a sore disappointment to find that Mary was not there. There was a pencil and paper lying upon the table, and that gave Hermie the idea of leaving a letter behind her, but it is difficult to write when one's fingers are almost blue from the cold, and when one is only used to big-letter copies. But when it was finished this is what she had said:—

DEAR MARY,—Whiffles is dieing will you plese come cose we love you and we cannot get our holy wreath Your loveing— HERMIE.

She was just finishing her name, when she heard a voice saying: "Why, little woman, who are you?" and looking up with startled eyes she saw a big man with a kind face and a long brown beard.

"Do you know Mary?" asked Hermie at once, for he had leaned over her shoulder and read the letter which was lying upon the table, and she thought he would not do that unless he were very much at home.

"Yes," said the big man, "I do," and he smiled as if he liked saying it. "Are you little Miss Rayton?"

"You know me?" cried Hermie joyously; and so he did, for he was a doctor who lived down-stairs in that same house, and, moreover, he was the same one who said that Mary's voice reminded him of so many pretty things.

"If you know me, won't you come and see my little brother? He is ill, and talks funny things, and we are all alone without anyone to make him better."

The big man looked grave, and then he said suddenly, "I'll come, little one," for he was used to deciding things almost as quickly as Hermie herself.

Then he added a few words to the letter which was waiting for Mary.

"You go back by the same way, and I'll come in by the front door. I'll be after you in no time."

"Thank you so much," said Hermie gratefully, as he lifted her out; and back she went to tell the good news to Whiffles. "A doctor is coming, and he 'll make you not hot," she explained, for the little lad was awake now, and looking rather brighter, and presently, though I do not know what he said to the servant who opened the door, nor how he explained about Hermie's message, sure enough the doctor himself walked into the nursery.

What a commotion there was the next half-hour! Not that Hermie saw much of it, for everyone seemed to forget that she had been left in charge the whole of the morning, and that it was thanks to her wisdom in seeking for her friend, as Dr. Lintot warmly put it, that anyone had troubled about the little invalid at all. For he really was ill; it was inflammation of the lungs, the doctor said, and poor Hermie was ordered to stay in the housekeeper's room, so that the nurseries might be kept quite quiet.

XUM

But by waiting on the stairs she saw the maids hurrying in what seemed all directions at once, one going for more doctors, and another for a nurse from the Children's Hospital, and a third with sal-volatile and smelling-salts for poor old Lady Rayton, who promptly went into hysterics when she heard what was the matter.

As the day wore on it was just the same. Hermie saw Uncle Victor arrive and come out of the sick-room shaking his head, and even the grand Mrs. Pratt, whom Molly had declared would not even look at a saucepan, insisted on making some poultices herself rather than trust them to the cook. Everybody seemed suddenly to remember that poor little neglected Whiffles, shut away with Hermie in the gloomy London nursery, would be Reginald, Lord Rayton, one day, if he lived, and his life, they said, was very valuable. If he lived? Yes, they began to say that at last, as the days went on, and Hermie, who caught the whisper, was nearly frantic because they would not let her see him. She tried to get to him several times, but was always caught and taken back, until the horror of her little brother dying, as Mary's brother had done, and going away without her seeing him again, began to haunt the child even in her dreams. For she had made up her mind that he was going to die, and she thought it would be upon Christmas Day. The Christ-Child wanted Whiffles to be the offering—not just a holly wreath. Yes, that was it, He wanted the little lad, with his gay laugh and yellow hair, to be one of those white-robed angels round His throne, of whom Mary had told them.

Christmas Eve she had gone to bed full of these thoughts, and very early on Christmas morning she woke up with a start, full of an unreasoning dread. The angel with the grave tender face, God's angel whom men call Death, was coming for Whiffles, and she must go to him.

Slipping out of bed, she went swiftly out of the room and up the staircase until she came to the nursery part of the house. How still everything was! A cuckoo clock in the hall below struck some muffled notes, but the little girl never paused to count the hour. She did not even wait for breath until she had crept into the bedroom, and then she stopped and glanced round her. Everything was much the same, and yet the room looked strangely unfamiliar to her after not seeing it for so long. Some shaded candles were burning on a little table, and the first grey streaks of the dawn were struggling through the closed blinds. Whiffles was lying in a bed instead of his usual cot, and talking to himself incessantly. The nurse had gone away for a couple of hours' rest, and it was Mary who was in charge. She was at the farther end of the room, half hidden by a curtain, and seeing that the child did not notice her, she decided to leave Hermie to herself. After all, it could do no harm, she thought, and it might make the poor little thing happier to look back on afterwards. So she watched her as she crept on tiptoe to the bed, and climbing on to it, first kissed her brother, and then knelt up with clasped hands.

"Gentle Jesus," she began, the soft reverent tones rising clearly above the confused murmur of sounds which came from the boy's lips, "Whiffles is a little tiny boy, and I am big. He would be lonely without me. If the great angel takes him, make him to take me too. We give ourselves to Thee, dear Christ-Child, because we cannot give the holly wreath. I am so sorry. We did try."

Then she crouched down by Whiffles' pillow, and putting her mouth to his ear, she whispered: "Don't be frightened, dear. I am so close to you, Whiffles, that the angel must see us both, and he wouldn't take you without me. We'll go to mother. We did not understand it properly, Whiffles, about the wreath, I think. Mary said He wanted us ourselves, so of course He will take us."

A silence followed, during which the candles burnt more feebly, and the conquering dawn stretched farther and farther into the room. It had reached the bed by now, and was lighting the two fair little heads upon the pillow.

Suddenly Mary started forward. She knew very little of sick-nursing, but Dr. Lintot had told her that if the patient could regain consciousness—which means if he could cease talking of all manner of strange things, and remember where he was—then the fever would be leaving him, and he would fall into a natural and restful sleep, which would probably be the means of saving his life. So now Mary left her seat behind the curtain and came hurriedly forward, because she heard Whiffles speaking, not in the muttering uneven fashion of the last few days, but in his own pretty voice, although it sounded pitiably weak.

"Hermie," he said, "you'll—stay close?"

"Yes, Whiffles, very, very close."

Hermie moved her head quietly until her lips touched his, and a Christmas peal of bells in a neighbouring church tower rang out merrily as the children kissed each other.

"I'se glad you're—come," said the weak voice presently. "I'll go—to s'eep now," and he closed his eyes with a sigh of contentment.

Hermie propped herself up on one elbow, and then lifted a warning finger, as she raised her eyes and saw Mary standing at the other side of the bed. "Hush! you mustn't talk," she whispered. "It is the Christ-Child's gift. You remember what you told us? I am giving Him Whiffles, and the angel will take me too."

But Mary looked from the gently sleeping child to the little watcher by his side, and her eyes filled with sudden tears.

"Oh, my darling, my little girl, thank God for this Christmas morning!" she said, brokenly, and then she held out her arms. "Come away, Hermie, come away. We mustn't waken him. It is the gift of the Christ-Child as you say, but He has given Whiffles back to you." MABEL E. WOTTON.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A FATHER CHRISTMAS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC. ETC.

"'You know my wishes with regard to my daughter.'"—p. 56.

I.

OF THE FAMILY OF FATHER CHRISTMASES IN GENERAL, AND OF MYSELF IN PARTICULAR.

YOU will observe, good reader—or good readers, for I am sure there will, according to the unalterable law of the CHRISTMAS QUIVER, be many of you—at the very outset, that these pages are called the "Autobiography of a Father Christmas," that I have used an indefinite article "a," that I have not taken to myself the honour, and, I may add, the responsibility of being the only Father Christmas in the world—a piece of vanity which the very geniality of my constitution and nature would make abhorrent to me.

In one sense we are all one, in another we are many; and I profess to be only one of the many; and the experiences of all the Father Christmases put together are in reality only the experience of Father Christmas himself.

But to pursue this subject would be to run into metaphysics, and metaphysics are not in my line at all. If I had ever been at college, I should have been plucked, for I am sure not a feather, or, to speak more correctly, not a snowflake, would have been left on me. Instead of waiting to be plucked by my examiner, I might as well have plucked myself, and made the pluckings into a snowball on my own account, and pitched it at his head; the only change in the affair being a slight one, and to my advantage on the whole: viz., that I pitched into him, instead of his pitching into me. Though used to severe weather—and, indeed, considering it seasonable—I do not like to be what is commonly called "left out in the cold"; and there it is that the metaphysical gentleman would have left me, without doubt.

Many great folk have written their own lives (and, in some cases, they had much better have let it alone); and as they have written theirs, I don't see why I shouldn't write mine; for at a certain season of the year, at any rate, I am a great person; which fact, I am glad to tell you, does not prevent me from enjoying myself immensely in a general way.

These autobiographies generally begin at a man's beginning; though for myself I don't see how he can know much on that subject. No doubt, there are some family traditions about him—and the Family Bible on the first page gives him a help; and perhaps his nurse may be still alive, and she can tell him some things—some, but not all, of which, he considers suitable for transmission to posterity.

But I labour under tremendous disadvantages in this way. My beginning seems—I don't know where; so let us put it down as it is in one or two cases in the Peerage—"the origin of this title is lost in antiquity." I don't know, I'm sure, whom I should have chosen for my father, supposing someone said I might have whom I liked—the late Duke of Wellington or the Czar of all the Russias (as coming from a cold clime); but for a mother, give me the poor, poor woman who, with two shillings a week to live on, fished out of her halfpence a new shilling for the collection because it was blessed Christmas Day.

Well, now I am here, I am going to tell you the good I have done in my short life—a short life I say, for no individual Father Christmas ever lives long. When we have plaster-of-Paris in our constitution we invariably die of a disease called "Smash"; but when we are made of papier-maché we survive indeed a little longer, but it is almost always to endure more or less suffering, and I grieve to say sometimes indignity, in what for a Father Christmas may be called our "old age." We are liable to affections of the nose—it gets, in fact, I might almost say, broken—sometimes a half goes, sometimes the whole. In this department of its art surgery is behind-hand; our nasal troubles it can do almost nothing for.

Our eyes suffer too. They have been known to disappear altogether—for all the world as if they had been gouged out by some mischievous boy's fingers; and as to our ribs, they become staved in; and I have seen a Father Christmas of this kind who had such a tremendous orifice in that portion of his person connected with Christmas pudding that it seemed as if he had had a kind of earthquake there; and now was the time for any prying doctor, without resorting to vivisection, to observe how the various organs of digestion work—a study particularly interesting to medical men at Christmas-time.

You would hardly think that the great law of Compensation, which is to be found all through Nature, extends to us, but it does; and speaking in the capacity of Father Christmas generally, if I am nowhere during the rest of the year, I am everywhere, almost, at Christmas-time; and there are so many good things going at Christmas that, I don't mind being put by in a cupboard for the rest of the year—that is, of course, assuming that I survive Christmas at all.

It is with us as it is with mankind—there are all sorts and conditions amongst us. There are Father Christmases which at first sight appear to belong to the upper ten; they might be considered dukes, marquises, or earls, or at any rate landed gentry of large means amongst the Christmas family: but that is all only to the outward eye. We know no such distinctions amongst ourselves. We look upon these external things as of little moment; it matters not amongst us whether one Father Christmas's beard is a bit longer, or thicker, or whiter than another's; or whether he have on him a few snowflakes more or less. What we go in for is "Heart"—that is the very essence of the family likeness—that is what makes us all akin. If you were to vivisect us, you'd find us all to be, I might almost say, nothing but heart within; the wonder is that, seeing we are so hot within, we don't melt all the snow that is about us outside.

I never heard of but one of our family who was deficient in the matter of heart. I have heard of there being shortcomings in one way and another in different directions, but never but once in the matter of heart. And in this case I comfort myself with the thought that the creature of whom I am going to tell you was not a real Father Christmas at all—he was a bogus, an impostor—for aught that I know one of the disreputable family of Guys, who have been going down much in the world of late; and I scarcely like to use the revered name of "Father Christmas" in connection with him at all.

This wretch (excuse the strong language—but when the feelings are strong you cannot wonder if the words are to match) came into the world in a way that he should not. He was bad from beginning to end. His beginning was bad, and his doings (which I might call the middle) were bad, and the end was bad—so I have the satisfaction of knowing that he was bad altogether. I am thus saved the task of trying to excuse him; my duty is to condemn.

This spurious Father Christmas owed his parentage to a wretched boy nine and a half years old. This dreadful youth was already the parent of many domestic miseries—the fact was, he was bringing them into the world all the year round, but one would have thought that at Christmas-time at least he might have ceased from his evil deeds, and helped on in the general happiness around.

Not a bit of it. His idea of seasonableness was to invent some mischief, which would work in with the season in the most appropriate way possible—at least, appropriately in his mind; for as to appropriateness in reality, there could be no such thing.

This creature's baleful eye fell upon a lovely Father Christmas in a shop window as he was coming home from school, smarting, I am happy to say, under some external applications, which had been administered to him (not by any medical man) for his good.

It might be that he was then in a particularly savage condition—but so it was, that, at the sight of this beautiful Father Christmas, he determined that he would have a Father Christmas of his own; and, moreover, that that Father Christmas should keep Christmas-time in a way altogether out of the ordinary beat, but also in one altogether in harmony with itself. The wretched youth had a baby sister, and going home, he promised her, with words as sweet as if his mouth had been filled with lollipops or butterscotch, that she should have a Father Christmas all to herself, and that she needn't go to sleep all night, and have to wait ever so long before he brought her something. She need only shut her eyes just for five short minutes, and then open them when he told her, and she should find a stocking full of all sorts of beautiful things—notably, what she had been longing for for a long time—a wax doll with real hair, and with eyes that opened and shut; and that said "Ma-ma" when you gave her a pinch in the proper place. Individually I should have felt more inclined to have cried out "Oh! oh!" at this interference with my diaphragm, but "Ma-ma" seemed a great point with the little child, and so she agreed with all that he proposed.

I shudder to think how this pretended Father Christmas was made; he was as big as a boy of four or five. The wretch to whom he owed his being first bought a black mask, and then dressed up a body for it with some black calico, and here and there dabbed on pieces of cotton-wool; out of this bogus Father Christmas's mouth he put a great carrot for a tongue, and he tied two balls of touch-paper in its hollow eyes. Then inside the hollow body he fixed what boys call a double cracker, which bangs off five or six times like a pistol shot.

"Now, Sissy, you lie down there on the ground; brother has made you a pretty bed—four cushions to lie on, and one for your head. Hang up the stocking—that 's right—leave the top wide open, for the dolly 's very big——"

"Will it say 'Ma' very well, Jack?"

"Oh yes, much more than that; 't is a new kind that says 'Mammy dear.' There now, mind you don't open your eyes;" and the faithful little thing squeezed her eyelids tight together, and put her hands over them, to make sure that nothing on her part should hinder Father Christmas in the outcome of his good-will.

This fearful creature the odious boy put at the bottom of the bed, and at a given signal the poor child looked up, only to see this dreadful figure, with its great red tongue and its eyes of fire, and to hear the cracker go off; at which, without more ado, she went into a fit.

You can imagine what a Christmas that was for that family; the only wonder was that the child did not die of the fright.

I must say that, though I am fond of all sorts of innocent fun, and, I might almost say, preside over such every year, I detest all practical jokes. They are often very witless, and they cause a deal of bad feeling; and anything that causes annoyance we are bound in charity to abstain from—I mean unnecessary annoyance, which generally accompanies practical jokes.

This wretched Father Christmas—who would have been quite in his proper place earlier in the year as a Guy—came to a worthy end. He was partly blown up by the double cracker, and what was left of him was pulled to pieces by the poor child's father, in his just wrath. As to Jacky himself, though no Christmas was kept in that home that year, he never remembered, during his after life, having been so warm as he had been that Christmas. What he got then did him a world of good; and for many a year, seldom did a Christmas come round without its bringing with it retrospects of a torrid and tingling character, the equivalents of which, whatever they might be, he did not wish to repeat in after life.

As I have spoken of this horrid figure—a make-believe, in word at least, of one of us—I am anxious, before I give some of my actual life-experiences, to say a word on the subject of another figure, in no way connected with us, except that it sometimes makes its way into our company, and is particularly active indoors at the same time that we are, and that is, "Punch."

I have observed his doings at Christmas parties where I (still using the term "Father Christmas" in my general sense of the term) have been. There is much, no doubt, that is comical about him, but that wife-beating, which does not meet with its merited reward, is, I believe, a thing not to be laughed at; and is productive of a great deal of mischief. Street urchins here get their first lessons in ill-treating women, and that with impunity—not but that they very often get the same sad lesson at home—but anyhow, though there is one to cry, and cry sorely at it, there is, at any rate, seldom anyone to laugh at it. "Punch," it might be said, is essentially English; so is wife-beating too, varied now and again with something worse, which at Christmas time, at any rate, I don't care to bring to the fore. I say that bringing bad things before people's eyes in such a way as to make them laugh at them, and not show that they bring their deserved punishment, tends to make men inclined to do them; and I take serious objection to Punch on this account. It is not that I am what anyone might call strait-laced, or sour, or incapable of being amused by a trifle—not a bit of it; I am rather given to Fantoccini than otherwise. Good marionettes are often as amusing as an amusing picture or book; but ever since my eyes have been opened to this view of Punch I don't care to have anything to do with him; and I wish he 'd stay at home at Christmas-time altogether.

Children must no doubt have something to amuse them. I once heard an old minister at a Christmas party saying that the children in old Egypt—long before I was thought of—had their Fantoccini, for the very figures with their movable limbs have been found in their tombs, and in a place called Etruria, wherever that is. He said they were all over India, China, and the East; but I am no antiquarian—indeed, I might almost say no scholar. I do know a thing or two; but then what I have learned is from men and not from books; any outside knowledge I may have is just from hearing what people say.

II.

HOW FATHER CHRISTMAS EXPERIENCES THE VANITY OF GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

 OU will understand, good reader, that I am now an old Father Christmas. I am in the fourth year of my age; and that, for a Father Christmas, is almost the same as being a Methuselah amongst men. Very few indeed of us attain to that age; and if one and another does, here and there, it is so decrepit that it cannot gather its wits together; and if it has any memory, it cannot commit to paper, at least with any propriety of style, such experiences as it may have had. Editors now-a-days are no joke; they sniff all shortcomings afar off; and it is a serious strain upon the nervous system to come into their presence at all.

I am at present residing in what is to me an almshouse—a place of honoured retirement in old age. Things in this world, and places too, are to a great extent what people make them; and if people look on me as being simply in a cupboard, or say I am "on the shelf," I don't mind that in the least. I am here in a state of honoured leisure, and I prefer occupying it with literature to being idle.

Three years have I been out in the world—for our family have no childhood: we come into the world and have to play our part in it as full-grown Father Christmases at once. All we have to do with childhood is to sympathise with it, and make it happy, and show it kindness all we can—but that "all" is our "all"—and a big "all" it is.

I am, on the whole, in good health, and, as it is said of many elderly people, in "good preservation," or "well preserved." All preserves, you will observe, are not jam. Some preserved old men and women, however, are very like jam in one respect—they are so sweet, they are preserved in sugar; others—well! they are preserved too, but it is in vinegar—they are pickles. I propose telling you a little of my three years' experience in the world. I can't tell you about the fourth, for it hasn't come yet, and it isn't safe to prophesy; for it has been well said, you should "never prophesy unless you know."

My first experience in actual life was not a happy one—but let anyone who reads these lines and who is downcast at the thoughts of a bad beginning which is not their fault, take courage. Many an unpropitious beginning has had a good ending. It doesn't do to be downhearted: it takes all the life and pluck out of one's body or one's mind, wherever one's pluck is kept. I am sure when I began to write this, my Autobiography, I didn't know how I should get on at all—in fact, I couldn't get on. I was distrustful of myself, and afraid of the editor, and the pen was bad and spluttered, and there were people playing what they call 'scales' dingling in my very ears; but I stuck to it, and up to the present have got on very comfortably—in fact, "Here I am." Things sometimes turn out better in the end than one expects. Anyhow, until the worst comes, don't be moaning and groaning as if it had come, hugging it up in your bosom as if it were all you had in the world, and for all the world couldn't let it go.

I began, as I have said, very badly; and this was all the more distressing because I never dreamed for a moment that a Father Christmas could by any possibility ever do badly at all. I had expected nothing but wholesome mirth, and pleasure-giving, and general hilarity. I knew that my mission in the world was to give happiness, and the thought of failure never entered into my head. From the moment that I had the finishing touch put to me, in the form of a large spot of vermilion on the top of my nose (that being considered to add to my general effect), up to the time I left the shop-window where I was placed to give me a chance of being put out in life, I had never dreamed of anything but healthy merriment and joy.

I did not consider it in the least beneath my dignity that my life and energies belonged to little folks—to children. I enjoyed the thought of contributing to their happiness in the happiest time of their lives—and I anticipated with great pleasure seeing some who had once been children becoming such for even an hour or two again. If I had my way, I would cut up all grown people once a week at least into little pieces and make children of them, say for a Saturday half-holiday. I would make the Archbishop read a fairy tale, and believe every word of it; and I would make the Lord Chancellor play football or bo-peep with his wig, and all the masters of public schools I would make whip-tops instead of boys. If I approved of chuck-farthing, I'd make the Governor of the Bank of England play at it for a spell, but as I don't, I'd make him what boys call "shell out," and treat everyone all round to a new sixpence and a bottle of ginger-pop. Oh! wouldn't I make everyone young again, even for an hour, and wake up the echoes of olden days in the empty chambers and corridors of their hearts! No grand pictures of fictitious value would I hang there—thousands upon thousands for what has in it no freshness and no life—no classic music would I play there; but I would make peals of laughter, an' screams, and whistles, and shouts, and jumble them a.l together, so that Echo would give up the attempt to copy them in despair. I would tap all Old Humanity upon the shoulder, and say, "Wake up, old chap; and for an hour be young again." But I feel getting too sentimental, and the public don't like sentiment—at least, not too much—a little cream it may be on the top, but milk in a general way for puddings and to drink. Besides, there is the editor!

Well, from my very constitution, and the remarks made on me by the various folk who looked in at me in the shop window, I was expecting all happiness, when my first experience came in quite a different way. Only one individual had said anything uncomplimentary against me, and he called me "an old humbug," but I didn't mind that, for he was a sinister-looking individual—an old lawyer who hadn't as much vermilion in the whole of his veins as I had on the tip of my nose—and he had scarcely made this unwarrantable assertion (for which, indeed, he might have been had up for libel), when a portly gentleman, with rather a skinny-looking lady and a very beautiful child, came into the shop.

"Miss Slitherwick," said the portly gentleman, jingling I suppose what were sovereigns in his pocket—though, if only you have impudence enough to do the make-believe, as some do it, your keys will do as well—"Miss Slitherwick, you know my wishes generally with regard to my daughter, and I desire them to be carried out on the present occasion, and in this place. You are, I hope, thoroughly 'posted up' on the subject?"

Miss Slitherwick, who kept her situation only on the condition of being always posted up in this direction—never in arrears; always, in fact, striking a balance, and always bringing out the same result: viz., everything for Miss Chutney, and nothing for anyone else—responded suitably; and Mr. Chutney, after waving his hand in a significant manner (thereby as in a figure intimating that the whole shop was at Miss Slitherwick's disposal for Miss Chutney, though he never told her to choose some little thing for herself), took his departure to take the chair at a meeting, which people who don't know the world might suppose had a touch of Christmas expansion of heart about it, inasmuch as it was about to offer for the trifling consideration of £1 in the form of a share in the Judicious Rain Distributing Company, a bonus annually of ten shillings and a dividend of seventy per cent. to the public generally; the allotment of the shares to be guaranteed to be made pro rata on the applications, and not even one share to be reserved for the directors or their friends. There were to be no founders' shares, for founders' shares are rather a big mouthful for the public to swallow, and for reasons best known to the directors, they would in this Company at least not be required.

The present meeting was rather an anxious one, for the solicitor to the intended company has started some awkward questions with reference to the clouds as a consenting party—and there were vested interests and, indeed, he might say, common law rights in that direction which could not be ignored.

So off went Mr. Chutney, and very addled, I can tell you, he looked when he came home that night. I was in his house to see, having been purchased, as you shall presently hear, by his little daughter Kate—Miss Slitherwick fully approving, consenting—"aiding and abetting," as the law says—as, indeed, she daren't do anything else.

Mr. Chutney, despite all his wealth, was not in what is called "high society;" consequently, the juvenile party which his little daughter was about to give to her young friends was composed of middling people; in fact, it was made up, for the most part, of the children of the people whom he knew in the City—not the aristocracy of the City, for Mr. Chutney was insufferable to them—but various small people, highly respectable in their way, who were under obligations to him in one way or another, and who were only too pleased to have their children rubbing skirts with Miss Chutney. For as to that rubbing of skirts, it was a thing concerning which no one could tell "what would come of it"—anyhow, what might come; it was something with an infinite perspective, something without an horizon; it had in it the sprightliness of a will-o'-the-wisp, if it had nothing else, and that sprightliness has a certain effervescence in it—until—you are bogged.

There was to be a Christmas-tree at Mr. Chutney's, and I was to preside over it. I was supposed to be the beneficent being who, though my snowflakes would not melt in a temperature of 70°, still was so full of warmth internally, that I had to vent my feelings in that Christmas-tree.

I took, accordingly, great interest in the purchases which were made.

First of all, I must tell you I was bought myself. And at this I was delighted. I was not content with being kept merely in the window, as a decoy to the people passing by; indeed, it vexed me to hear so many saying, "What a lovely Father Christmas! don't you wish we could have him?" and so forth; that sort of thing went quite against the grain with me. I wanted to be at business; I wanted to make happiness, and not misery; I wanted to give pleasure to people in what they had, and not misery for what they had not. So I said to myself, "Now we'll have a grand time of it; there's lots of money here, and so there'll be lots of happiness," for at that time I was fool enough to believe that these two always went together; and I thought that I, being a costly Father Christmas, must, from my very money's worth, confer no end of joy.

As soon as I was bought, I had an opportunity of seeing and hearing all that went on, for it was not worth while putting me back in the window again. I heard, therefore, Miss Chutney's shopping, her questions, and Miss Slitherwick's answers thereto.

Miss Slitherwick had the inestimable merit in Mr. Chutney's eyes of knowing her place, and she rounded off that merit, and made it complete, by keeping in it—not only as regards herself, but also as regards her charge, which she was to consider as in fact Mr. Chutney himself, only of a different sex, and not quite so much grown.

All this came out in the purchases which were made. I was the first purchase that Kate Chutney made, and this was something pretty stiff to begin with; but I was very quickly followed by others.

These, for the sake of order, and that the whole might be the more easily remembered by those to whom the remembrance may do good, may be divided into two classes, such as Miss Chutney, or, if you can take in the idea, 'Mr. Chutney's daughter' made for herself, and for others; to which may be added a little supplement, not worthy of being made into a third class by itself: viz., a little Christmas present for Miss Slitherwick.

For herself, Miss Chutney bought a lovely doll; two guineas went there. It walked, and so far as "Ma, ma" went, it talked, it opened its eyes and shut them; and but for the impropriety of the thing, it might have winked for aught I know; but it was a wonderful doll, and that was enough. And what was a doll without its clothes? The young lady provided for it in a truly motherly way. She outfitted it with garments for day and night, with a horse and a carriage, with doll jewellery, and doll pots and pans

Miss Slitherwick fulfilling her proper functions by continually saying, "Yes, dear, of course," when her charge proposed having this and that; then she proceeded to a work-box—not that she meant to work, there were some children coming on Christmas night, and that there was to be a tree for them. "They aren't anything very particular, my dear," he said: "they are just the children of some of the people I

"'You are not to be blamed for what happened last Christmas Day.'"—p. 60.

for she hated work in any form—but a new-fashioned one caught her fancy; and a writing-desk—not that that was much good either, for the poor ignorant child could hardly write half a dozen words plainly—and so, on she went merrily, Miss Slitherwick being, as in duty bound, a consenting party to all the extravagance that was going on.

Being thus amply provided for herself, Miss Chutney proceeded to think of others. And this she did, not of her own mental or heart outcoming, but by reason of a commission from her father, who told her that know in the city, and you can buy just what you like for them."

Now to some children the "just what you like" would have been a carte blanche to do wonderful things. Their little hearts would have swelled with the conscious power of making others happy, and with the desire to do it; they would have been delighted at the thought of being able to be the "Lady Bountiful;" and to share their own happiness with others; but poor little Kate had never been taught such things; she had never seen any examples of them before her eyes; they naa no part in the surroundings of her daily life; and so there was what I must call a very niggardly provision indeed made for the Christmas-tree. As I was to preside over that Christmas-tree, and was theoretically, at any rate, supposed to have been the provider of it, I was indignant, and longed to say to the shopkeeper: "Here, put in this, and that;" but what can a Father Christmas do when his own big heart is not met with bigness of heart in others? It would be a relief to him if in some way or other he could blow up—or blow out, if you like; but he can't explode any way; he must, just like many a human being, keep his feelings to himself; and very uncomfortable, I can tell you, they sometimes make him.

Miss Slitherwick was not forgotten. Her young charge presented her with a scent-bottle with a German silver head, the net cost of which was 2s. 3¾d. Of course, it wasn't silver as regards its head, nor cut-glass as regards its body, but it was a smelling-bottle and a present, and a Christmas present; and that was enough for the one by whom it was given.

Poor Miss Slitherwick! She already had a smelling-bottle at home; but it was her place to take what she was given, and to make no remarks. That smelling-bottle of Miss Slitherwick's! It had not even a German silver top; it was quite plain, and made no pretensions to be cut-glass; it had only cost eightpence the first day, but to her it was worth its weight in gold; for it had come from a little creature now lying under the sod, who had a little heart inside his little body when it was here—it had come from a little Slitherwick, who somehow or other had got something of heaven inside him, and who, because of that something, had gone without lollipops for a whole year to buy his sister that smelling-bottle as a Christmas-box. Miss Slitherwick, you should not have remembered this when you received another smelling-bottle, under somewhat different circumstances indeed, but with a real German silver head. You should have compared the two bottles, and not the two people by whom they were given; the two bottles, I say, and their prices (only think of the difference between 2s. 3¾d. and 8d.!), and not the heart-feelings from which they came.

Miss Slitherwick, though I don't entertain the opinion myself, nevertheless it is entertained, and acted upon too, that there are some people so situated in the world that they have no business with hearts—hearts are an encumbrance to them. They might go even still farther: they might become a nuisance. Hearts have been known to keep people from getting on in the world; when too heavy a strain has been put on them—the worthless brittle things have been known to break—hearts when they get into mathematics, and metaphysics, and machinery are like chips in porridge: they make everything go wrong. Some people hold that the world would get on much better without hearts at all. Aren't even the doctors continually plagued with them? They wouldn't mind if people had two or three livers, and half a dozen pairs of lungs, if only they'd dispense with hearts, and the incurable and obscure diseases incidental thereto.

Well, let us be getting on. Dear good Miss Slitherwick was utterly ashamed of the provision made for the Christmas-tree over which I was to preside, and out of her own slender pocket did her very best to put the best face on matters that she could. She bought walnuts and gilt them over, so that the tree looked laden with untold wealth—if Miss S. had robbed the Bank of England, or had shares in the Twenty-two Carat Solid Gold Rock Company, Limited, that tree would not have been unworthy of her. Moreover, she, so to speak, plated some other nuts with silver leaf, on the score of which the above remarks might be repeated, only substituting silver for gold. Moreover, she did wonderful things with twiddlings up of ribbon and coloured paper, and some cheap coloured lamps; and if only that tree were looked at from a little distance it would have passed muster well enough.

But the mischief was that, whereas "distance lends enchantment to the view," in daily life things will keep coming up close to us, and if they do, we have continually to come up close to things, and then the enchantment goes—I'm sure I can't tell you where.

So it was when Mr. Chutney's Christmas party came. All the little people had come duly impressed with the importance of the occasion, and the responsibility and privilege of being sharers in Miss Chutney's Christmas-tree; and that, if ever they had been on their good behaviour, their very best had been miserable shortcoming compared with what was expected of them now. And all might have gone well—at least, what the Chutney family would have called "well," but not what the Father Christmas, with a large heart, and Felicia Slitherwick, with a large heart, would have called "well," had it not been that amongst the party was a boy of the name of Stumps—a boy whom Nature had forgotten to round off in any way when she sent him into the world—trusting, it may be, to the experiences of life to chip off his rough edges, or to its bitter waters to rub him down smooth, as the waters wear the stones.

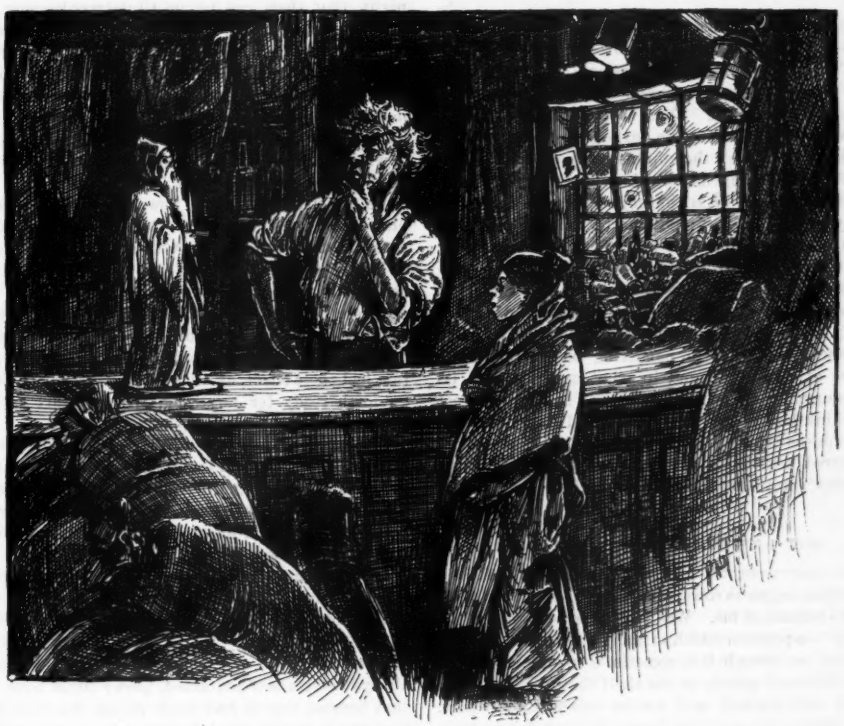
Stumps and his sister were of the party, and Stumps and she had both come in anything but a chastened and respectful frame of mind, for their old uncle had "fixed up," as the Americans say, a grand tree for them at home, with no end of real good things upon it, which they had got a look at on the sly, though the good uncle knew nothing about that. Stumps was a kind of boy that would have called the Lord Mayor even in his robes, "Old chap," or "Old cock," and would have squared out even at the mace itself. When I tell you this, I have exhausted my descriptive powers; what kind of a boy he was, and what he could do, you must judge for yourself.

A part of the evening's entertainment consisted in Miss Chutney's showing her young guests her Christmas presents: being those of which the reader has already heard, and some others in addition, which her father had given her as a surprise.

All wondered, all admired, all speculated as to how, if they were Miss Chutney, they should feel that night.

All but the unreverential Stumps—he was unsophisticated enough to think that he'd rather be "Stumps" than anyone else—and he'd back his sister Chatty against a dozen pale-faced Chutneys any day—

"Chatty against Chutney any day, and ten to 'one on the favourite: the other nowhere"—that was the form the matter took in Master Stumps' mind. Now this boy "Stumps," who had always an eye to the main chance, had absented himself from the little side room where Miss Chutney's Christmas presents were being displayed, and taken the opportunity of everyone's absence to make a minute inspection of the Christmas-tree. The motive was interested, for he wanted to see what there was there that would suit himself, and for what he should swop what he got if it did not suit him; and the result of this investigation was very unsatisfactory. He mentally compared Mr. Chutney's tree with the one fixed up by his American uncle at home; and then sauntered in to look at Miss Chutney's spread.



Stumps was a boy of quick apprehension, and quick feelings—he was quick every way except in going to school; but he made up with the cause of education generally, by thus supplying the exception that proved the rule, and being quick all over—he was quick in action too.

"I say, Chat," said this boy Stumps, pinching his sister's arm, "here's an awful shame! all the good things are on this table, and none on the tree. I'm blessed if I don't blow up the whole affair—we don't want their rubbishing things; there are ever so much better on our own tree for to-morrow night; and we're kept out of them a whole day by having to come here. I saw a rubbishing shilling knife, that I suppose is for me, and I know it wouldn't cut butter; but there's a regular seven-and-sixpenny one on the tree at home that would shave a mouse asleep or cut off your nose without your even knowing 'twas gone. You wouldn't know your nose was gone, Chat, until you looked in the glass, which of course you, being a girl, would never do; and even if you did, you'd have to have someone to tell you about it then—you'll see!"

When Kate Chutney had exhibited herself and her presents to her heart's content, the proceedings of the Christmas-tree began. As for me, I ought at that moment to have been full of delight—quite in my element over the fun; but, on the contrary, I was full of forebodings. It required a great effort of self-recollection to make me feel that I was a Father Christmas at all; I felt sure that there was trouble ahead, and within measurable distance too.

All went tolerably well, although I could see that the young people were not particularly enchanted with their gifts. Miss Slitherwick managed to pass that off pretty well, until we came to that fatal knife, which, sure enough, fell to that dreadful Stumps.

Oh, Stumps, that you had been a girl—or anything else but what you were!—Oh that you had only put that knife in your pocket and said nothing about it

"I fetched three-halfpence sterling."—p. 62.

"She begged to have me put up opposite her bed."—p. 63.

there, but anything you liked about it when you got home! But no! You cried out, "Look here, Chat, here's an old saw that cost sixpence. Let it go back to where it came from;" and you flung it into the Christmas-tree again. Then followed a fearful catastrophe: a Chinese lantern, struck by the knife, was upset and took fire; then up blazed poor Miss Slitherwick's paper arrangements—the whole thing was upset and came to grief. Miss Chutney's hands and face were, to say the least of it, pretty smartly singed; the party had to be broken up, and I was left to my meditations, to spend the rest of the evening as best I might.

My meditations were, as you may well imagine, not of an hilarious character; indeed, I felt myself almost like a naughty boy in disgrace, and I spent much of the succeeding year in pondering on the miserable effects of selfishness, and in what curious ways its punishment is worked out at times; and I could not but think how entirely my owner had been mistaken in her ideas of what Christmas-time should be; and I wondered whether there were many like her, and whether many Christmases are spoiled.

HOW I SPENT MY SECOND CHRISTMAS.

The year wore on, and as it neared its end, and Christmas began to draw nigh again, I wondered what was to become of me. Was I going to remain "on the shelf?"—a position which so many dread when hilarity is going on, though it is sometimes much better to be peacefully and quietly on the shelf than to be knocked about, and cracked, and maybe smashed, elsewhere. No; there was something better in store for me than that. Who should let daylight in on me one day but good Miss Slitherwick. "Father Christmas," said she, "you are not to be blamed for what happened last Christmas Day. Still, you'll have to go, for Miss Chutney has been so nervous ever since that fatal night, that there can be no Christmas-keeping here this year, at any rate; and Mr. Chutney says you had better clear out. I asked him what I was to do with you, and he said, 'Anything I liked.' I am anxious that you should have a good home, and some amends made to you for having your Christmas spoiled; so I have given you to a friend of mine who has come down in the world—as, indeed, for the matter of that, so have I done myself. But I have learned this: that there are many beautiful flowers growing in lowly places, and many sparkling streams running through them; so don't be down-hearted; and you would not be a Father Christmas unless you were ready to condescend to men of low estate."

Where do you think, good reader, I found myself, four-and-twenty hours after this kind little speech? (And these few kindly words, let me tell you in passing, had their effect, as all such have; they made me go forth ready for anything, with a heart for any fate, so as only I could make people happy.)

Where? why at Miss Slitherwick's own uncle's. Now I could understand why there were some tears in her eyes last Christmas Day; now, why she was so earnest in her wish that I should make the people happy with whom I was to spend the coming Christmas Day. She would have wished me to make anybody and everybody happy, but, as was most natural, especially her own flesh and blood.

The house to which I was conveyed was a humble one in the outskirts. It had never been a mansion—reduced in its old age to letting apartments; it had always been a self-contained, perky little house, one that boasted that it had never passed the three years by a single day in which it should be painted outside, nor by one day the seventh year in which it must be thoroughly done up within.

Here lived Mr. James Upton, the only brother of Miss Slitherwick's mother, hereafter to be known under the name, style, and title of "Uncle." Here lived Mr. Upton and his only daughter Bessy, and so frequently did he call to tea, and make himself generally at home, that here I might also say lived Mr. Geoffrey Pigment—a young and very rising artist in the portrait line, who had painted Bessy in six different attitudes, and was now engaged on the seventh which promised to be a great success. Painted Bessys were very nice, but a substantial Bessy is nicer; and when the question came to be between what is nice and what is nicer, common sense really left no choice in Mr. Geoffrey Pigment's mind, but settled the matter at once.

"Well, Bessy, what kind of a Christmas are we going to have?" asked Geoffrey Pigment.

"Why did you say 'we,' Geoff? You know how father is; he'll never be able to get beyond the arm-chair, and perhaps I shall not be able to get him even into that, and that would be but a dull Christmas for you. You had better far go to the Pentwhistles—there will be a merry party there. I know your heart will be with me, all the same."

"And you're not afraid of Mary Pentwhistle, Bessy, though that scamp Crimple, who is after her, says that she has driven two men to commit suicide, and sent three into asylums, and a callow youth into a duck-pond, who was pulled out very wet indeed. I hear he says he never knew what ducks lived on before, nor what duckweed tasted like, but that there is an awful lot in that pond, and that duckweed anyhow, unless 'tis cooked, has a very nasty taste."

"Pish!" said Bessy; "he wants to make himself out a fine fellow himself when Mary takes him, as I know she intends to do. You may dance with Mary all the evening if you like, and I know what will happen. She'll come here next day, and say, 'Bessy, that's a nice young man of yours; do you mind changing him for Bob Crimple?' Perhaps she'll offer me that pearl brooch of her grandmother's to boot. You go to the Pentwhistles; only do not spoil poor Crimple's Christmas, for he's true to Mary; and remember there are more duck-ponds in the world than one."

"Many ponds," said Geoffrey sentimentally, "but only one duck."

"Now be off," said Bessy Upton, "and tell the Pentwhistles you'll be with them."

"Now, Bessy, look here," said the young man, "you say my heart will be here. Well, in a general way, I like to be where my heart is: 'tis more convenient, to say the least of it: so here I Christmas with you, my dear, and we'll get up a Christmas for the governor up-stairs—or down-stairs, if we can get him down—and when he's settled for the night we'll settle when 'tis to be. The last two pictures will pay for the furniture for a bigger house; and I think my foot's well on the ladder now."

"Well, if you will come," said Bessy, "I might as well tell you—you'll have company."

"No," said the young man, vehemently, "that's the very thing I don't want; you know the old saying, 'Two is company, but three is none'—at least, none to some people—not to me, anyhow, Bessy, when I'm with you—man or woman, Bessy; which is it? though neither's welcome."

"Man—and I want you to fetch him too. Now, there's a goody—just wait—don't go off in a tantrum, Geoff; he's a very old man."

"He's none the better for that," said Geoffrey Pigment.

"Well, you men are dreadfully impatient. I don't know how the world would get on if women were like you—'tis only a 'Father Christmas.' Aunt Slitherwick wants someone to fetch him, and I want you to go and get him, there's a dear."

If women have to say "love, honour, and obey" when they're married, men have to do the last, at any rate, whether they say it or not, before they're married, and Mr. Geoffrey Pigment was no exception to the rule. Bessy Upton had no servants to send about on such errands, but Geoffrey was her humble servant for everything, and he actually came himself and fetched me. He waited until 'twas dark, and then arrived at Mr. Chutney's with his coat collar turned up, and his hat slouched down over his eyes. I was waiting for him, ready done up in the hall; and off we went to the fair Bessy's little home.

I had a grand Christmas of it there—it was all very quiet, compared to the previous Christmas; but I had then the pleasure of performing my life-mission for the first time, though I felt I was equal, if opportunity offered, to doing much more.

But you must know, good reader, that it is a cardinal point with the Father Christmas family to do what they can, and not to lose all their opportunities in wishing that they could do more.

Old Mr. Upton was now a child; trouble had put him back, I am afraid to say how many years, but trouble had not restored him the mother on whose heart he might have laid his whitened head—the golden glint of youth changed into the hoar frost and the snows of age. The world would be only half as full of sorrows if it were twice as full of mothers. Old John Upton had lost all his money, and with it most of his hair, and Bessy was a good daughter and a good nurse to him—but a mother—no; how could she be? Wives are grand, but there is a touch ineffable about the mother, which my pen shall most honour by not making any attempt to give.

Back in old childhood, Christmas was well within the old man's thoughts, and present in gone-by manhood was his great money loss. The A1 ship Eldorado had gone down, and with it the venture of all he had. Those two ideas were distinct enough, and out of them was the old man's Christmas made. For, you see, Love was at work, and Love is quick at finding out many inventions.

"I have it," burst out Geoffrey Pigment; "he shall have a jolly Christmas this year—that he shall; he is but a child, Bessy," said the young man in a low and tender voice: "a child with a big sorrow; that's an out-of-the-way thing, and there will be no harm in dealing with it in an out-of-the-way manner. Let us make a Christmas for him—you and I can make Christmas for each other. See here, Bessy; I've been telling him that Christmas-time is coming quite close, and he 's been saying, 'Ah, yes; Christmas—that 's the time when the people sing "Peace, good will," and there are lots of presents going, and a stocking, and a Father Christmas—he brings little people what they want, doesn't he? I wonder now, if I put out a stocking for him, if he 'd give me what I want? I like sponge-cakes, and almond comfits, and squibs. Once Father Christmas brought me a peg-top, but he forgot the string.' "

"Hang out the stocking to-morrow night, sir," said the young man. "I shouldn't be a bit surprised if Father Christmas came this way; indeed, I know he was seen in the street to-day."

"Yes, we 'll put it up," said the old man, "and I 'll sleep like a top, for he may not come if he knows that I 'm awake."

"Now we 'll fill the stocking for him, dear old fellow, and we 'll do something more. He said to me, 'But what about the money—will Father Christmas bring back all the money? I wonder if he knows where the Eldorado is? ' and I 've told him, 'Who knows? Father Christmas sometimes does very wonderful things.'

"Can you get him down, Bessy, into his chair to eat his Christmas dinner with us? and then we 'll have in Father Christmas. I know where I can get a lot of new farthings, as bright as sovereigns; you wouldn't know them from sovereigns by lamplight; you make a bag, and we 'll fill it with them, and sling it over Father Christmas's shoulder, and I 'd bet ten to one—if ever I bet at all—that he 'll think he has got back all his money from the Eldorado—and he will have a jolly Christmas of it."

That Christmas Eve the stocking was hung out; that Christmas morning all the delight of a child abounded in that old man's room and heart. There is happiness in being thrown forward in time, and there is happiness in being thrown back—provided only you go far enough, far enough either way—back to the time ere sorrow came, on to the time when sorrow will be no more.

I came out grandly after dinner. As the young man thought it would be, so it was; the old man gave a scream of delight when he emptied out the bag which I had upon my back, but in a moment he became quite composed. "Susan," said he, addressing his dead wife, "the Eldorado has come in, and here, my dear is all the money for you. I only wanted it for you; let 's count how much it is." And that Christmas night was spent by the old man in counting out the money, putting it in little heaps, and sending it to the bank, and various performances of the same kind.

And he was so well employed, there was no need of Bessy's and Geoffrey's taking special care of him; they gave an eye to him generally, and entertained each other as best they could. I was glad to see they got through the evening very well: indeed, Mr. Pigment wanted to make out that the clock was an hour fast when it struck ten, and it was time for him to go home. He looked at his watch, but that was ten, too, but he felt sure that that also must be fast, and he could only account for it by supposing that watches and clocks were subject to epidemics, and that just then there was one abroad of going fast.

It was a quiet Christmas evening—that I grant; but I felt that my life had not thus far been mis-spent; to minister even to one afflicted one was a mission. I had fulfilled the mission which that Christmas-time had been entrusted to me, and I was happy—and all will be happy who does the like.

SHOWS HOW FATHER CHRISTMAS DESCENDED IN THE SOCIAL SCALE, YET CONTINUED HIMSELF, FOR ALL THAT.

AS the publisher has made me promise to condense myself—an operation as necessary in ink as in steam—I must content myself with telling you that I came into my present home through an accident. I am not writing of a home for incurables, or a hospital—convalescent or otherwise. I am the honoured inmate of a poor man's house, and I don't mind in the least if I continue here until I go off the scene altogether, for a jollier time I can't conceive anyone's having than I had when Christmas came round.

A careless little child at Mr. Upton's let me fall—or rather, knocked me down, and to put it as shortly as possible, almost knocked me into what an Irishman would call "smithereens." Shock to the spinal cord, fracture of the skull (requiring trepanning), compound ditto of the thigh, dislocation of the shoulder, fearful abrasions of the facial skin, broken nose, and general shock to the system. These will give some idea of what I suffered; of course, my mission at poor Mr. Upton's was ended, and I had to go—but whither? I must tell everything—to the rag-and-bone shop. I fetched three-halfpence sterling; and to all human appearance my mission in life was ended. But with me before him for an example, let no one despair; like the Phœnix, I rose from the ashes with fresh vigour; and what became of me and what I did in the last year of my existence I shall now proceed to tell.

What the rag-and-bone man meant to do with me eventually I do not know; I shudder to think I might have been bought to be made a scarecrow of; and anything in the scaring way would have been, as you may well imagine, quite out of my line; but whatever I may come to hereafter, I was not destined as yet to come quite so low as this. On the contrary, I was to take quite a new start in life, on a lower plane, indeed, as regards worldly position and grandeur, but on one in which I really lived more than I had ever lived before, and enjoyed myself to my heart's content.

Hard by the rag-and-bone shop there lived a poor working glazier and painter, by name Jonathan Nopps. He was a man with a big heart like myself, and though his means were small, his aims were large; they embraced no less than the happiness of the whole human race, if only by any means he could bring it about. Finding it impossible with his limited means to secure the felicity of the whole of mankind—partly because he couldn't get at them, and partly because they would not have minded him if he could—he took up the idea that the best thing he could do would be to try and make as many as were within his reach as happy as he could. He took in one respect a trade view of humanity—not the common one, as to how much could be got out of mankind, but of how much could be done for them. He believed that they had infinite capacities for being painted and varnished and puttied, that they had innumerable cracks which could be filled up, and that they need by no means present at all times such a dilapidated appearance as they often did.

The moment he saw me at his friend the rag-and-bone man's, he pounced upon me. An inspiration shot through his brain that he would give a Christmas party, and that I should be the chief feature of it. He bought me accordingly for sixpence—that itself was a rise of 400 per cent. upon my recent value, and was therefore to be taken as an omen of good things to come.

I am afraid to say what I went through in the way of operations. My new owner might have walked all the London hospitals, and carried off all the prizes, so skilfully did he put my poor mangled form together again. Glue was liberally administered as a general strengthener of the constitution, as well as a powerful local application: "Pig. Ver.," "Pig. Alb.," "Pig. Chrom.," and Pigs. of various tints, were judiciously applied here and there, as the case required. There were also partial snow-like applications of cotton-wool. Special attention was given to the nose, as the most prominent feature of the face—in fact, between ourselves, a new one of putty was stuck on. Pig. Verm. was liberally applied to the top of it; then came some varnish, to make me beam as if I were in the most exuberant health. Being well stuffed inside—which I could not but think was eminently suitable for Christmas time—I was ready by the all-important evening when Mr. Jonathan Nopps's party came off.

It was a kind of New Testament party—at least, so far as the spirit of it went—for there was one halt, and one maimed, and one blind child there; besides several who were all the same, only morally, and not one of them could have recompensed Mr. Nopps to the value, I might almost say, of the putty on my nose.

These were all entertained by the good man in question, having had not only the pleasure of the Christmas night, but also the delight of looking forward to the treat for a whole week beforehand, and the pleasure of looking back upon it for a whole week afterwards.

On that occasion I distributed in I might almost call reckless fashion, considering the circumstances, buns, oranges, apples, and tea, and ginger-pop. Shall I say squandered? no, I will not say I squandered the savings of Mr. Jonathan Nopps for quite three months beforehand, but I laid them out, and the company certainly took them in. That Christmas night was an enormous festivity. Under the genial influence of two highly odoriferous paraffin lamps, I shone like a star of the first magnitude. Not a drop of my varnish failed to do its duty; I far outdid even my own most sanguine expectations.

I was privileged also to be not only a means of enjoyment, but therein to be a very engine of power. I actually humanised, or helped to humanise, some of those young Arabs, who felt softened in heart at the kindness shown to them through me.

One little instance I may give you of my power—I may say my victorious power—that night. And talking of victory, it may not be out of place to turn my attention to St. Paul's, after all. I don't see why Mr. Nopps and I, having fought all the powers of evil in those troops of Satan, and gained a victory, should not go down into the crypt with Wellington, and Nelson especially. He said, "England expects that every man will do his duty," and we did ours. However, let that be for the present.

The instance to which I refer is this. At Mr. Nopps' party was a little girl who was quite lame. She was a pretty little girl, but very helpless. Her name was Susan—Susan Pike. Poor little Susie! she could not get near me, like the rest of the children, and when they crowded round me she got pushed about, and had to retire to the outmost edge of the ring. But the humanities, which seldom had much place in Jack Boulder's heart, took possession of it now, and putting his big strong arms under Susan's little spare body, he lifted her up and held her in them, so that she got the best view of everyone there. My word, how she did admire me! I never knew how handsome I was until then, nor did I ever know the great advantage and privilege of having a vermilion spot upon one's nose. I am convinced that one should be of a humble mind to enjoy with any degree of safety such a privilege as that.

The humanities stuck to Jack Boulder ever since that night. He then got the first idea of the blessedness of being tender, and from that Christmas night Jack adopted certain Christian ways.

But he had only some months under poor little Susie's influence. Poor child! her disease was not only in her leg, but in her body; it was in her leg because it was in her body.

She was to spend no more Christmases on earth—during the autumn she got worse and worse. You never heard, I dare say, of a Father Christmas ministering at a sick-bed—and I pride myself upon being unique in this way—but I did.

Poor little Susie's chief happiness was associated with me, and she begged to have me put up opposite her bed, to keep her company. I was willingly lent for this purpose by Mr. Nopps, and many a time I lay by her side all night, with her thin little arm round my flowing white beard.

Poor little Susie had little in this world to love, and even around me—papier-maché though I was—her little heart began to cling. To her, however, I was a person. She thought I must be very kind to be associated always with so many good things. Some wiser folk, as the world would call them, might have criticised the vermilion of my nose, or perhaps taken exception to its material—being putty; but, happier far than they, this poor child took me in my symbolic aspect, and I was an embodiment to her of kindness and love.

Well, thought I, there must be a deal of yearning for love in the human heart when this poor child fixes itself on something the moment it has a chance. Isn't it a pity that more chances aren't given by some who have something really to give to their poor fellow-creatures! There are long straggling creepers trailing in the gutter all the world over, waiting for something to cling to and rise up upon, and—and what?—blossom, and gladden with colour and with scent. Perhaps, good reader, someone would cling to you. Forbid it not—you would not, if you could experience what I, only a papier-maché Father Christmas, feel to-day from having allowed that poor child to cling to me.

She wanted to be buried with me, but the minister's wife, who often visited her, though she considered this complimentary so far as I was concerned, did not consider it suitable, and she gave her a beautiful wax doll all dressed in white—which the poor child said must be an angel, and it would be very nice to have an angel with her in her grave.

But even for the beautiful doll the child did not entirely give me up. She thought that all that was the matter with me was my dress, and she used to talk to me and say, "Father Christmas—you dear old Father Christmas! I'll make you some beautiful white clothes some day, and then you'll be fit to go to heaven: I'm sure you will, for you're very kind and good; and I'll go to school and learn to sew, and I'll earn money enough to buy some white silk, and you'll look beautiful—that you will. If anybody wants to know who you are, I'll tell them you're somebody that liked to make poor children happy; and then they'll be all glad to see you, and they'll hug you and kiss you, and love you for ever and ever."

I don't suppose that a happier head was laid upon the pillow that Christmas night than Mr. Jonathan Nopps's. It was not a very learned head: a very simple problem in mathematics would have puzzled it; Greek and Latin it had none—in history and art it was nowhere. It knew a few plain things out of an old-fashioned book called the Bible, and like many a wiser head than his own, many a thing in that did Jonathan Nopps not understand. Nor was there any need that he should. Just as Jonathan did not understand all the mysteries of the very bread he ate, but he did eat it, and it did him good—so he understood not all either of doctrine or precept, but he practised what he knew, and verily it did him good.

Jonathan had lived this Christmas Day not for himself alone, and the day followed him into the night. It came again to him on his pillow—it seemed loth to depart; happiness-giving is happiness-getting; and I, Father Christmas, now that all the bustle was over, enjoyed a quiet time with—my owner, I suppose I must call him, but only owner so as also to be fellow-worker and friend.

As Mr. Nopps owned only a single room, I had, of course, now that the festivities were over, to abide there with him, and so it came to pass that I heard him talking to himself as he lay awake awhile.

He lay awake from very happiness. "Who am I," said Mr. Nopps, "that I should be privileged to scatter so much happiness around?—who am I that I should be able to do so much with so little? but it is the increase of good seed sown. The good Lord gives big harvests to little grains. What is man that he should be like God—that he should be allowed to be like God in doing good? I'm all aglow," said Jonathan, "as if I had fifty Christmas fires burning inside. I am satisfied as if I had had the richest dainties at fifty rich men's Christmas tables. I am rich as if I had stripped their Christmas-trees of all their gifts—who am I that all this should be given to me, and withal a blessing in the Promised Land to come?" And it was with much ado that, from sheer overmuch of happiness, the good man could get to sleep.

I only know of things at this side of the grave, but sometimes I wonder what kind is the Christmas-keeping at the other. I'm told 't is all happiness there, and that all tears are wiped away from the eyes. Here I see that there are but snatches of joy, but they say that there there will be fulness of joy. Here there are pleasures, but they are only for awhile; but I am told that there they will be "for evermore."

The great Father's children will be grown up then, and they will not want many a thing they need now, but He is the great Father here as well as there, now as well as then, and He allows His children ere they hunger and thirst no more to pluck the little ears of corn, and to drink of the little brooks by the way.

Many books are written about these things. I hope they will admit into their company, as one earnestly desiring to teach as well as to amuse, the pages which, kind reader, you have just read—

"THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A FATHER CHRISTMAS."

THE CALL OF THE BELLS.

LOW in the valley the little church stands,
High on the hill-top the farm glisteas white,
Deep drifts the snow on the low-lying lands,
Hiding the pathway and hedges from sight.
Naught cares the farmer's fair daughter for snow,
Tempest or hailstorm she dreads not at all;
Church-bells are ringing, and down she must go,
Heeding but one thing—the sweet Christmas call.

Bright-hearted lass, may it ever be so—
Duty your pleasure, your first and last thought;
Be the way toilsome and painful or no,
Seeking at all times to walk as you ought!
Then through the years will you ever be fair,
Fair with the beauty of life-work fulfilled,
Fair when Life's winter has whitened your hair,
Fair when God calls and the true heart is stilled!

G. W.

THE SAVIOUR'S ADVENT.

BY THE REV. W. LANDELS, D.D.

"But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."—GAL. iv. 4, 5.

THE fact of Christianity as it now exists is one of the best evidences of its Divine origin. That it should exist where and as it does is very wonderful from a human point of view — most wonderful when the supernatural is ignored — altogether inexplicable then. It is a wonder for which its Divine origin alone will account.

Taking the facts in the first instance as they appear to any observer, the mere outward facts of the past history and present position of Christianity—looking at them as we do at any other phenomena—fixing our eye on what cannot be disputed, before we enter on the question of how it came to be, we are compelled to arrive at the acknowledgment that it is Divine, the account which it gives of itself being the only one that commends itself to our judgment, every other leaving it in the position of an utterly inexplicable enigma.

One cannot but be struck at this Christmas-time with the rejoicings which are taking place in so many different parts of the world, and these, in so far as enlightenment and power are concerned, by far the most important parts. There is no country in Europe or America where men do not with rejoicings observe this festival. Nor is it confined to these. Amid the sands of Africa it is not forgotten, nor on the ice-bound coast of Labrador. Traces of it are found in India and China, and in many Burmese homes. At the Antipodes—in Australia and New Zealand, and in many of the islands of the Pacific, it is as much a national custom as it is among ourselves. It is a time, moreover, not only of rejoicing, but of kind and generous acts. More than at any other season of the year men are disposed to show consideration for their neighbours. The purse-strings which are tightly held all the year are loosened at this season. Many of those who steel their hearts against all appeals presented by the sufferings of the poor cannot let Christmas pass without giving something out of their abundance. not simply to supply their neighbours' wants, but to minister to their neighbours' pleasure. Friendly feeling which circumstances may have restrained all the year round now finds opportunity of expressing itself by the bestowal of substantial tokens of love and respect. Family feuds are buried at this season, as the different members gather under the old roof-tree, or round the fireside associated with the prattle of their infancy, and the merry days of their youth; and the interrupted friendships are resumed, and the ties of amity strengthened, during this season of peace and good-will.

Now this is a very significant fact, look at it how we may. The fact itself is indisputable; and the only explanation of it which is possible involves the conclusion that Christianity is Divine.

For if we begin to ask, How is it so? Whence all this rejoicing and all this good-will at this particular time? the only answer which can be given to the question from a human point of view is not at all satisfactory. We are told that all this is on account of, or is meant to celebrate, the birth of a child which took place eighteen hundred years ago. But why such rejoicing and such expressions of good-will on account of that? The rejoicings are not accounted for by His nationality, nor by His personal surroundings. For the nation to which He belonged has as a nation ceased to exist, and 1800 years after His birth that tribute is paid to Him by men of every other nation, which was withheld during His life by the men of his own. So that it is by the simple story of His life circulating among the nations so long afterwards that the extraordinary result is produced. How well God must have adapted that story to the wants and desires of mankind its effect sufficiently shows, and it cannot be—it would be a mockery of our hopes, a shock to our sense of right—sufficient to reduce us to absolute despair—we should never be able to believe or confide in anything any more after being so cruelly trifled with—were that story to be found false. What, then, is the story? What are its external features? What was there in this child more than in other children of men, that His birth should be so widely celebrated, and in such manner? Was He socially considered the foremost of His species? Was He a prince born to an earthly throne loftier than any prince had ever filled? Was He destined to sway a mightier human sceptre over greater numbers of the human race? Was He by right of birth the temporal ruler of hundreds and millions, and did He as a mighty warrior so lead His armies forth to victory that myriads more would be constrained to yield to His conquering sway? Did the inhabitants of many lands pay their tribute to Him, filling His royal exchequer, and making His state splendid beyond those of any other Sovereign? Or is it that He was born to ordinary royal state, and that the present rejoicing is occasioned by the beneficent manner in which He exercised His temporal rule, like a second and greater Solomon, making Himself a model for all other kings?

Not by any of these suggestions are you able to explain the rejoicings of the Nativity. For if we look only at the outward circumstances of His life, and keep ourselves out of the region of the supernatural, He was really one of the meanest of men—"a root out of a dry ground"—"a worm and no man, a reproach of men, and despised of the people." He was a peasant's child, and never rose above a peasant's estate. His mother, when travelling, being poor, was crowded out of the inn into the stable, and in one of its stalls He was born, and had a manger for His cradle. Humbler circumstances scarcely ever attended the birth of any human child. His unknown boyhood was passed among children and youth of His own class in one of the most obscure and disreputable villages, in a country little known and less esteemed. Even when He came forth from His obscurity, His companions were peasants, His few friends mainly drawn from among the toiling and suffering and outcast poor. And after being known for only three brief years, He was put to death as a malefactor by the vilest mode of execution then known, and buried in a borrowed grave. Such are the facts of His life in its human side. What is there in these to account for the hold it has taken of the world? Surely the present rejoicing in view of these alone is altogether inexplicable. It is a wonder for which no one can account.

And if we go beyond these, we come at once into the region of the supernatural and Divine. There all becomes plain enough. Let it be known that this low-born child was the Son of God—that His birth had been the subject of a long line of prophetic utterance—that it was announced by angels amidst the songs of a celestial choir—that in Him the Most High God sojourned among men—that during His brief ministry he proclaimed the Divine love, and employed His Divine power to heal all manner of sickness and disease and infirmities—that He died praying for His murderers, and that His death procured forgiveness for them and the race—that having died He conquered death, rising from the dead on the third day, and finally ascended through the open heavens to the right hand of the Majesty on high; let all this be known, and the present rejoicing becomes intelligible enough. For then the meaner the circumstances of His outer life, the more is it fitted to excite the adoring gratitude of mankind. And this is substantially the story of His life in its Divine side. Is that story false? Has the world through all these years, and throughout so many lands, been rejoicing in a delusion? Does God thus mock its yearnings and its hopes? Does he make sport of its most sacred feelings? No! profane be the tongue that would thus dare to falsify the hopes of humanity. Be whose it may, whether that of professing Christian or avowed infidel, accursed be the hand which would madly dash from the world's lips its cup of joy, and sink it into the depths of despair, by driving it to the conclusion that this belief which has so answered to its longings is no better than the belief of a lie. We should deem him the worst enemy of the race who dared to affirm or to insinuate that God has led the world to rejoice in a story so marvellously fitted to awaken joyous echoes in its breast, while it has no foundation in fact. The injury such a man does to our dearest interests is only equalled by the insult which he offers to our common sense. We may safely affirm that considering the human circumstances of our Lord the story could never have obtained credence if it had not been incontestably true. Jesus of Nazareth, as a mere man, must have passed away out of the world's memory covered with the world's contempt. Jesus of Nazareth, as the incarnate God, meets the world's cravings and fills the world with joy. And by the very extent to which it is received, and the effects it has produced, are we shut up to the conclusion that the Divine as well the human side of the story is true, that Jesus Christ is the manifested God, that "In the fulness of time, God sent forth his Son." Fixing your attention now on the words of the text, I ask you to consider first the meaning of—

I. That phrase "fulness of time." This points to the preparation which had been made for this marvellous event, which has had such a mighty influence on the history of the world. As was becoming to an event of such importance, it was not isolated but preceded by a long series of prophecies which heralded and prepared the way for its coming. These prophecies had marked its place in history as well as foretold the fact. He came not only in the manner, but at the time foretold. He came, too, when His coming was earnestly expected, while Mosaic ceremony as well as prophetic utterances pointed to His approach. The disorganised and deteriorated state into which the ceremonial had fallen, its inability to secure the regeneration or even to prevent the deterioration of the people to whom it was given, made many feel the need of that to which it pointed. The choicest and best spirits of the nation looked for the advent of the promised Deliverer. The sad condition of the nation as subjugated to the Roman yoke, the contending sects into which it was divided, the manner in which the moral was subordinated to the ceremonial, by some of its accredited and most approved religious teachers;—all these made many sigh for the speedy fulfilment of those promises which were the hope of their nation. And though many mistook the nature of His work, and made their own carnal longings the medium through which they looked at the prophetic predictions, there were others who, with a spiritual perception of its meaning, looked for salvation in Israel, and were ready even in His lowly form to receive the Lord's Christ.

Outside the Jewish nation a kindred course of preparation had been going on.

Surprise has been expressed that so many ages of the world should have been allowed to pass before the Saviour came, and that the revelation which heralded His coming should have been so much confined to one small country; and explanations have sometimes been tendered which are very much beside the mark. The true explanation is found in the phrase—"The fulness of time." "In the fulness of time God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law." These words point to a preparatory process as having been necessary to, and as having preceded, the Saviour's coming. The world needed such a process in order that it might be mentally and morally prepared for receiving Him. It needed, too, the development of the ages, in order that the means of diffusing the revelation might be supplied. It had to be convinced of its need before it would welcome the Deliverer. It had to reach a stage of mental development before it could apprehend the truths of the Gospel. Politically, it had to be prepared for the free and comparatively safe transit of the heralds of the cross. And when the preparatory process was completed—"in the fulness of time"—Christ came. Humanity for four thousand years had been trying to work out the problem of its own regeneration. Under every form of government, in all conceivable circumstances, it had made its experiments, and had confessedly and signally failed. The expectation of the thoughtful turned to look, and the woes of the multitude cried aloud, for the appearance of a superhuman helper. Deteriorating morally, however, it had advanced intellectually, and in the Greek language possessed for the first time an admirable vehicle for the communication of religious truth. The conquests of Alexander brought that language into use throughout the known world. The rise of the Roman Empire did but consolidate and extend its dominion, while its roads furnished the means of travel, and its far-reaching arm afforded protection, to the messengers who bore into the distant parts of the earth the glad tidings of salvation.

Thus, both as regards the world's demonstrated need of a Saviour and its preparedness for receiving and transmitting the revelation which He gave, He may be said to have come "in the fulness of time."

II. The two following phrases describe the form and condition in which He appeared:—The first relating to His human nature; the second to His legal position.

1. When we read of His being "made of a woman" we are taught how truly human He was—how completely He took upon Himself our nature in all its parts, with all its natural conditions, and thus became in all respects one of ourselves. As born of woman He could lay claim to the most complete humanity. No one of woman born was more human than He. He had all the natural qualities which pertain to all the race. His incarnation was no making to appear, no assumption of an unreal or shadowy form, but an actual putting on of our humanity, a clothing of His Divinity in human flesh, a taking to Himself of a true body and a reasonable soul, a coming down of the Divine to the level of His creatures, bearing their nature, and standing in their place.

2. His being "made under the law" describes the legal position which He assumed on our account, and is fitted to enhance our estimate of His condescension in taking upon Himself our nature. As we are said to have been under the law before He came to redeem us from the thraldom, the position which He took was that which we occupied, so that an understanding of what it meant in our case will show what it meant in His. Let it be observed, then, that we were under the law in the sense of our eternal life being made contingent on our obedience to its requirements. By obedience, perfect and unfailing, life was secured to us. By one act of disobedience, or by one failure to meet its requirements, life was for ever forfeited. It could never be procured again on law terms. Unless we were redeemed from the law, placed on a new and different footing, as sinners we must die.

When the Saviour was made under the law He voluntarily placed Himself in our position. As Creator and Lawgiver, the law could not require of Him an obedience like ours. But He took upon Him our nature in order that for our sakes He might come under the law as we were, and that His life and ours might become contingent on His perfect obedience to its requirements.

If we are not impressed with the position which our Saviour thus occupied, it is only because we fail to realise its solemnity and its awfulness. Let us, if we would realise it aright, keep in mind his true and essential humanity; for it was a condition of his incarnation that His Divine nature left him still free to feel and think and act as a man. Consider, then, how a sense of responsibility must have pressed on Him, when the destiny of the whole human race was made dependent on His obedience. We know by experience in some measure with what awfulness our acts are invested when we feel that the welfare of many is made dependent thereon, and what an additional strain is thereby made upon us. And how must the human mind of our Saviour have been affected by the thought that the myriads of the human race, born and unborn, were to have their eternal condition affected by His obedience, or disobedience—that one act of deviation from the requirements of the law during any part of His earthly life would seal both His doom and theirs, cutting them off for ever from all hope of a glorious immortality and consigning them to endless misery and despair; how this must have made His whole life a course of prolonged and awful sacrifice and suffering which none could understand or appreciate but Himself! And how this suffering must have been intensified by the temptations to which He was exposed—from the assaults made upon Him by the powers of darkness, when all hell was animated by the consciousness that His obedience was its defeat, and His disobedience its victory, and thus grew more fierce and desperate in its assaults as He neared the close of His course, until He Himself bore testimony to the power with which it assailed Him, when He spoke of the final struggle as "the hour and power of darkness"! How must it have been intensified also by the ingratitude and cruelty of those for whom He was enduring so much, when they made His course so difficult and painful, blaspheming and reviling Him, attributing His miracles to Satanic agency, and at last crucifying Him and deriding Him in His last agony, thus giving Him the strongest conceivable provocation, to resent with impatience their evil treatment, and thereby to fail in the obedience which He was rendering on their account! And above all, how must He have suffered from the hidings of His Father's countenance, the withdrawal of Divine consolation and support, when, as the opposition of devils was most fiercely raging, and the cruelty of men had reached its climax, He had to exclaim, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" Of the suffering of His life, the endurance which was required of Him up to that hour—who can conceive? None but the Divine Sufferer Himself. Human or angelic mind is all inadequate to its realisation. Human or angelic mind cannot comprehend all that was meant by His being thus made under the law. And yet He bore the strain up to the very last. There was no failure of His obedience. No murmur of resentment or impatience escaped His lips. No distrust of God. Nothing which the law could disapprove.

III. The final purpose of His coming described in the words, "to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."

Our redemption consists in our release from the thraldom in which we were held by the law as doomed by it to death, because of our failure to comply with, or, in other words, our violation of, its requirements. Not that we have altogether done with the law. As a rule of life it is as valuable as it ever was, except as it is surpassed and superseded by the example which our Saviour hath set us, and the Spirit which He gives us to breathe. Whatsoever it enjoins upon us is still right and incumbent, as well as becoming. It is our duty still to practise every virtue which it inculcates, to avoid every practice or feeling which it condemns. In this respect we are not freed from it. Our redemption does not consist in this, for this good reason: that to souls that love righteousness there is in such requirements no bondage. But while we are not freed from the law's moral dominion, we are redeemed from its curse, inasmuch it hath not, because of our failure to meet its requirements, any power to consign us to death. In this respect it no longer holds us in its grasp, like victims awaiting their doom. Its power to do this is gone since our representative voluntarily came under it and fulfilled it in our stead, honouring it more by so doing than it would have been honoured, either by the perfect obedience or the eternal perdition of the whole human race.

Then this slavery, being abolished, is meant to be followed by sonship. Freed from the condemnation of the law, we have access to the privileges of those who are sons of God. We have the freedom of our Father's house and our Father's possessions. It is our privilege to call God Father, and to enjoy all the dignity and all the blessings which belong to His children. God deals with us as His sons—prodigal sons, indeed, until by penitence and faith we return to Him, but still sons. He invites our filial confidence and our filial intercourse. He bids us call Him Father: "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto Me, 'My Father, Thou art the Guide of my youth?'" Legally, we are in the position of unfallen sons of God—not slaves, but sons and heirs. And it only remains for us by faith to claim our privileges, to recognise our relation, and to act accordingly, in order to our receiving the adoption of sons.

We say, by faith. For while the work of Christ opens to us all the privileges of sonship, it is only by faith that we enter on their actual possession or enjoyment. In this sense "we are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." And hence it is written, "To as many as received Him to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." Faith sees what Christ has done for us, how He hath freed us from the law's condemnation, from exposure to death by the law, how He hath placed us legally in the position of those who have fulfilled the law, so that we may approach God and hold intercourse with God as confidently as His unfallen children, and look with them for a share in the paternal inheritance. And seeing this, it engenders in us filial feelings. We call God our Father. We think of Him as our Father, and feel towards Him as our Father, and love and trust Him as our Father, and expect from Him all that we have a right to expect from our Father. And God responds to our confidence. He respects the feelings Himself has evoked. He holds paternal converse with us; owns us as His children by His paternal dealings with us; and ultimately, having by all the discipline of our earthly life strengthened the ties which unite us to Himself, He by recognising us as His children before an assembled universe, bestows upon us, in the highest sense of the words, "the adoption of sons."

Such is the glorious purpose the Saviour came to accomplish; and be it understood by you all that this work has been done for you. The Saviour who was born on that far-off Christmas morning was to be a Saviour unto all people. He assumed your nature and mine. The obedience He rendered, the suffering He endured, was for you as well as for me. He lived and died for your redemption as well as for mine. For you as for me He has prepared the way for our receiving the adoption of sons. O let not unbelief deprive you of the blessings He has procured for you. Credit the testimony borne by Scripture to the work He has wrought for you as much as for any creature of the race. Enter by faith on your privilege of freedom from the curse of the law. Venture to call God, Father. In view of all that Christ has done on your behalf, He now appeals to you, saying, "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father?"

OUT OF THE SHADOWS.

CHAPTER I.

AND that poor little baby was God!"

"Was He poor—poor like us, mammy?" asked little Nellie plaintively, her wan baby face lighting up with interest and pity.

"No; nothin' near so bad off as us!" struck in her brother gloomily, "'cos it wasn't so cold there, was it mother?"

"I don't think so, dear," answered "mother," as her needle flew in and out of the warm bright cloth she was embroidering; "but afterwards, when He grew up, He knew what it was to go hungry, and often He hadn't got 'where to lay His head.' Thread me another needle, Paul."

"And why did He be poor?" queried Nellie's weak little voice.

"Just so that He might be able to feel sorry for us."

"If He is sorry, how can He let us go on like this?" asked Paul gloomily. "We haven't done anything wrong, and you——"

"Oh, Paul, that's wicked," interrupted his mother; "He knows what's best for us, though it's hard to think so at the time."

"Well, I wish He didn't be poor, 'cos Nellie's so hungry and cold; but can't He give us a fire, and nice warm tea, now He's growed up?"

"Yes, dear, I s'pose so," returned her mother, sighing wearily.

"Do ask Him then, mammy, please. Can He hear up there?"

"Yes, Nellie, though He does seem far off sometimes," sighed the poor mother, as the tears began to roll over her thin cheeks; "but never mind, darling," she continued, struggling bravely with her depression, "p'raps He'll send us pennies enough to buy some tea, and a fire, when I've taken this work to the warehouse. We must have a fire," she said, half to herself; "my fingers are so numbed with cold I can't work without."

"'Don't be long, Paul.'"—p. 70.

A shuffling footstep, which had been audible ascending the stairs as she spoke, had stopped outside the door, which was pushed open with scant ceremony, to admit a slatternly, ill-tempered-looking woman.

"Must have a fire, must yer?" she asked indignantly, setting her arms akimbo. "Well, I'll tell yer what it is, Mrs. Whatsername, there's a 'must' as comes first, an' that's my rent. 'Ere, it's a fortnet come Saturday since I've seen the colour o' yer money, and the week afore not all paid up, neither."

"If you'll only wait a week or two longer I'll get it all paid up," pleaded the lodger. "They're sure to have plenty of work to give out so near Christmas, but I shan't be able to work half so quick without a bit o' fire this bitter weather, and that I can't have, if I give you all I take."

"It's all very fine," was the reply. "Why don't yer go out a-charin', 'stead a-sittin' there sewin' like a lady? That 'ud warm yer, and pay yer better too, I guess."

"I wish I could, but I'd got this work, you see, when my husband and—the little one I lost—an' then I couldn't spare the time to look after what I mightn't get; an' who do you think would employ me without anyone to speak for me?"

"That's none o' my business. You could a' got a job if you'd 'ad a mind to, I dessay. All I've got to say is, if you can't pay to-night for last week an' what's left on the week afore, you must go elsewhere, an' that's more'n many' ud say, for then yer'll be a week behind; an' remember, you must pay up altogether afore Christmas, or out you go, an' think yerself lucky not to 'ave yer bed taken!"

"You shall have the money, Mrs. Smith;" and as the poor woman spoke, she knew that when she had paid her bill at the chandler's shop at the corner of the road, and supplied herself with light to work by, either the fire, or the meal she had promised herself and her hungry children must be given up for that day at least. She rose wearily, folded up her parcel of completed work, and put on her battered black bonnet and thin old jacket.

"That's all right, then," said Mrs. Smith, following her, as she went sadly and silently out of the room. "I don't want to be hard on yer, yer know, but only this very mornin', I turned away a lady wot's got regler work. An' if lodgers don't pay—which they don't 'arf on 'em—'ow'm I to pay my rent, I arsk yer?"

True enough, Mrs. Cichowski thought as she passed down the bare dirty stairs, but surely all the lodgers could not be as hardly situated as herself. God did indeed seem to be far off, and utterly forgetful of her and her troubles. And can we who are fed and clothed, and have loving friends near to share and soothe the trials which life brings to most of us, wonder at her want of faith? Would it have been so easy for us to realise the fact, that God was hiding His face for His own wise and loving purposes?

"Naughty woman, to be so cross to poor mammy, isn't she, Paul?" asked Nellie, the moment they were alone.

"She's no worse than others what thinks a sight more o' themselves," replied Paul bitterly. "Look at the clergyman that was goin' to do such a lot for us, and ain't been nigh us ever since! He's got a good warm coat on his back, an' as much as he wants to eat—what's he care for the like of us? He had a face that was good enough to look at, too," muttered the boy regretfully. "He don't know what bein' hungry an' cold is like! Why, I dessay he's sittin' before a bright fire now, with a carpet all over the room, an' the kettle singin' away on the 'ob ready for tea, an' muffins toastin' in the fender, How should he know?"

Little Nellie opened her eyes wide, and glanced wistfully round the miserable place they called home, as Paul's words conjured up before her childish mind a picture of almost impossible brightness and comfort. What she saw was so different. A small bare room, containing a rickety little chair bedstead, covered by a thin patchwork quilt, and the remains of some worn-out clothing; a tin bowl and broken plate on the floor; the little brown jug in which her mother made tea—when she had it; and the tin lamp she worked by on the chimney-piece; no table or chair; no fire in the grate; no blind or curtain at the window, only a piece of rag which had been pinned across the lower half of it to keep the draught out; and Paul crouching opposite her, beside the empty grate, leaning his head dejectedly against the wall. She came close to him, slid her little hand into his, and began to cry.

"Don't, Nellie, don't!" he said, jumping up suddenly. "Look here," he continued, as she rubbed her dirty knuckles into her wet eyes until her white cheeks were covered with grey streaks, "you be a good girl an' get on the bed. I'll cover you up nice and warm, then I'll go out an' try to pick up a penny or two, so we'll have our tea an' our fire too, in spite of Mrs. Smith, if I have any luck! Won't mother be pleased? I'd have gone before, only she was afraid I should get lost in the fog; but if she can go, why can't I?"

"Don't be long, Paul," replied Nellie, brightening a little; "an' I'll ask the dear little baby God to send you pennies."

"All right," he returned indulgently, as he lifted her on to the bed, and tucked her up. He then dragged from underneath it a case, which he opened, and from which he took a violin. With loving, reverent touch, which was almost a caress, he took it into his hands. Next to his mother and Nellie he loved the instrument, both with the love of a born musician, and also because it had been his father's last gift to him. As he passed into the foggy street, he was thinking of that dearly loved father, who had been taken from them only half a year ago. How, the first time he had taken the violin into the streets to play the tunes his father had taught him, he had said, "Courage, my Paul; wait a little till I am well and strong again. We will both play before great ladies and gentlemen some day!" Would this ambition ever be realised? Paul wondered drearily; or would he die as his father had done, before he could gain a hearing from those lucky people who could afford to pay for beautiful music, as they did for the other beautiful things of which their lives were full? The only son of a man whose musical genius had met with sufficient appreciation in his native land to enable him to live by it and bring up his family, Henri Cichowski had been left by his father in his twentieth year with a small sum of money, and the violin, which had been purchased, as he knew, at the cost of daily self-denial on the part of the whole family. Though his father had contented himself with a success which left him comparatively unknown to fame, he had cherished wider ambitions for his son. Had he lived longer they might possibly have been realised, for he was a prudent man. His death occurred, however, just after he had incurred the expense of marrying a second daughter. Had Henri been contented to remain where he was, amongst friends, he would probably have made his way by degrees; but what his father had dreamed of as the crowning point of his ambition, to be attained only by long devotion to his art, the foolish lad thought himself capable of achieving at the outset of his career. The splendid recognition awarded to genius in London, of which he had heard, determined him to go there. Against all persuasion, he had persisted in this step. The first person in England to show him any kindness had been a poor hard-working widow, in whose house he had lodged. When she died, leaving her only child Mary unprovided for, the young musician had married her. The hardships they had encountered had resulted in the death of three children, and eventually of the father himself. Like many consumptive people, the poor man had, till within a day or two of his death, believed in his ultimate recovery, and in his direst distress had always refused to part with his beloved instrument. "I will never use another," he would say; "it is my father's legacy to me, and when I die it will be for my son." What prospect had Paul of making this legacy a means of living even? Less than his father had started with, even supposing he possessed greater talent. How would the question he had asked himself be answered?

XUM

CHAPTER II.

"Three—five—sevenpence ha'penny. Bravo! What luck! An' me not out more'n three hours or so. Poor little Nell! I wonder if she's been askin', an' that's why I've got on so well?" And the sting which rose to Paul's eyes, followed by a moisture that obliged him to resort to a vigorous application of his shabby coat-sleeve to them, was not owing entirely to the fog. "Let's see; that'll buy—tea, three-'apence; bread, a penny; firin', thrippence 'apenny—that is, if Mrs. Smith'll let us 'ave it of her—three pen'orth o' coal an' a haporth o' wood; then we can 'ave a bit o' fried fish for a treat, an' some milk—we must 'ave some milk for Nellie." And Paul, thinking that he would get the fire lighted first of all, set off at a run, coming into collision with the wayfarers in the foggy streets, until he was obliged to slacken his pace.

"What! mother 's not back yet?" he asked, on reaching their room and finding only Nellie there.

"Want mother!" whimpered the child.

"Look, Nellie! look!" he said, displaying the tea and bread, which he had bought on his way home, as it led him past the shop. "An' that isn't all; I got some more pennies."

"I did tell Him," replied Nellie, languidly eyeing the bread without appetite. "Did He send the pennies?"

"Well, I s'pose so," returned Paul. "Ain't you hungry? 'Ave a bit now, while I make a nice bright fire against mother comes 'ome." Nellie shook her head.

"Ah, you 've gone past your food, that's what it is," said the boy, with a wisdom born of experience. "Never mind, I'll get some milk in a minute or two, an' you shall 'ave some nice 'ot bread an' milk. You'll eat that up fast enough!"

Nellie made no reply, and he ran off to coax Mrs. Smith to let him have the materials for a fire from her. Very soon one was burning cheerfully in the little grate, and having borrowed a saucepan to boil the water in, Paul left Nellie to go and fetch her some milk. He was not uneasy at his mother's absence; she had been kept waiting for her work before, and he knew it would take her longer to find her way home to-day, on account of the fog, but he wished that he had found her there, for he was ravenously hungry, and did not feel as if he should be able to stop eating, when once he began, till all before him was finished. He had hardly been able to keep his fingers off the bread while carrying it home, "an' when it comes to anything like fried fish—all 'ot an' smellin' so good—why, I could eat the whole lot, bread an' fish an' all! But that won't do, for mother's as 'ungry as I am," he said to himself; "an' p'raps Nellie 'll fancy a bit too, when she's 'ad some warm milk. I know—I 'll get that ready first, an' get her to take a little, for she does look queer, poor little thing! an' p'raps by then mother 'll be 'ome."

But though the boy waited what seemed to him, in his hungry condition, a long time after he had returned with the milk, she did not come. His hunger became unbearable, and he could not withstand the temptation to finish the sop he had prepared for his sister, who had only been able to swallow a little of the milk. Suddenly it struck him that if he took his violin out with him again, he might earn some more money, which would enable him to buy bread and fish enough for the three of them.

"Tell mother I shan't be long," he said hopefully, as he ran off again.

This time, however, he played away without receiving anything for his trouble. Everybody in the streets seemed to be in a hurry to get home out of the fog, and to have neither time nor inclination to listen to or reward him for his music. Presently he stopped before an "eating-house," attracted by the savoury odours, wafted from the inside of the shop, as a customer came out looking warm and satisfied. Paul stood for a minute or two, with his face pressed against the window, looking longingly through the blurred glass at "hot sausages," "pease pudding," "boiled plum," etc., all enveloped in clouds of steam, rising from some contrivance for keeping the eatables hot.

"I wonder if they'd let me play inside?" he thought; "may be, as they're jolly an' comfortable in there out o' the cold, some o' the customers wouldn't mind sparin' a penny or two for a tune!"

Pushing aside the swing door, he entered boldly.

"Now, then, what's for you, sir?" asked one of the young men behind the counter.

"Nothin', thank you," said Paul reluctantly; "but would you mind me playin' in here a bit?"

"Get out, you young rascal! I know what you're after," said the man angrily, following the boy's ravenous glance along the counter. "We don't want none o' your sort 'ere!"

"He stopped before an eating-house."

"I wasn't goin' to touch nothin'," Paul retorted indignantly.

"Now, then, what's the matter?" asked the master, coming from the other end of the shop, where he had been serving a customer. There was a kind of bluff good-nature about the man's broad red face, which emboldened Paul to repeat his request.

"No! no!" he replied; "it's too late! There won't be nobody much in now, till nine or ten o'clock! Besides, how do I know if that 's all you're up to, eh?"

"Won't you let me give you a tune, then?" asked Paul, his great blue eyes eagerly scanning the man's face.

"No thanks, I ain't musical myself; an' if I was I could make as good a noise as them fiddles do, drawin' a knife across a plate," the man replied, with a laugh at his own humour.

Paul was in despair. It was evidently no use trying to earn anything more to-night. Yet he was nearly wild with the gnawings of hunger; not with that kind of hunger which only gives a strong desire for food, and makes one eat with appetite, but with that fierce craving which is absolute pain, and which, in his case, was rendered more acute by the appetising odours around him. With a faint blush on his thin cheeks, the words fell from his lips, in spite of himself—

"I'm so 'ungry!"

"Well, you can 'ave as good a feed 'ere as anywheres in London for a penny!" replied the man, looking at him with attention.

Paul shook his head and turned hopelessly away, while a great lump that seemed as if it would choke him, rose in his throat.

"Ah! I thought beggin' was your game!" commented the man, regarding him irresolutely; "but if I was to give a meal to every young rascal as come askin' for it, I might as well 'ave the shutters up at once! Besides, if I was to give one to you, you'd send twenty more o' your own sort to-morrer. I know the ways of yer!"

"I'm not a beggar," retorted Paul indignantly; "an' I don't want you to give me nothin'; but I'm awful 'ungry, an' if you'd only trust me till to-morrer——"

A burst of laughter from two or three of the assistants greeted this request.

"Well, if that ain't good!" said the man he had first addressed. "He don't take us for simpletons! Oh, no! not at all!"

"'Old your noise, Jones!" said his employer, for something in the boy's manner and expression made him doubt whether he had been right in believing him to be an habitual beggar. "You'd call out loud enough if you was 'ungry, I'll be bound! I'll tell you what I'll do, my lad, I will trust you for a penn'orth of pease-puddin'; but don't you come sneakin' in 'ere every now and then; nor don't you send nobody else o' the same sort, because——"

"I don't want you to trust me," replied Paul proudly, "if you're afraid to. I'll pay you to-morrow, fair enough; but I'll leave the violin behind till I bring the money; it's worth more'n I shall eat, anyhow!"

"Serve 'im with three penn'orth of anything he likes," said the man shortly, holding out his hand for the instrument.

"Thank you, sir!" said Paul gratefully; "I'll be sure an' come for it to-morrer."

"Mind you do!" replied the man gruffly; "for it won't pay me to be runnin' about to find someone to buy an old fiddle—it ain't in my line; so if you don't turn up in a day or two, I shall pawn it for what I can get."

"I shall be here to-morrer, about this time," said Paul, after he had finished such a meal as he had not eaten for many a day; "an' you'll take care of it, please?" he added, wistfully, for now that the pangs of hunger were appeased, he did not at all like leaving his father's legacy in strange hands.

"Her thin little arms clasped his neck even more tightly than usual."—p. 74.

"Just step outside, one of you, an' see where that youngster goes," commanded the good man, who had been half inclined to trust the boy in spite of his suspicions. The man he had addressed before as Jones, immediately left the shop. Paul was so much absorbed in his own thoughts, and eager anticipations of the pleasure his mother would feel, on finding a warm fire and comfortable meal awaiting her, that he never noticed that he was being followed, although the fog had lightened considerably during the last half hour. Just as he was coming out of the fried-fish shop with his purchase in his hand, he ran up against Jones. Suddenly there flashed into his mind the construction that might be placed on his conduct, and with a guilty look he took to his heels. True, he had not said he had not the money to pay for his meal, but his conduct had certainly implied as much, and in spite of his efforts to argue the matter out in his own favour, Paul felt that he had acted a lie, and determined that he would explain how it was that he had allowed himself to do so to-morrow. Now, he must hasten home to his mother, and tell her the afternoon's adventure. But to his surprise he found that she had not yet returned. He began to feel anxious, but it would be no use going to the warehouse after her now; she certainly must have left it a good hour ago. Perhaps she had lost her way in the fog; if so, it was still no use seeking her, for he did not know where to look, and as it had lifted she would be able to find her way. Finding that she did not come, he made the tea, and put it on the hob to keep warm. He drank a little himself, and toasted a little bread for Nellie to dip in his cup; for, to his great disappointment, she could not touch the fish. Then she wanted to be nursed, and cried herself to sleep in his arms. He sat beside the waning fire with her, till he was quite cold and very sleepy. Still, no one came near, and putting Nellie into bed, he curled himself up at her feet, and fell into a troubled slumber.

It was still dark when he awoke next morning, and with a feeling of self-reproach, and wonder that he could have slept so soundly during his mother's unaccountable absence, sprang off the bed, and began to light the fire. He was going to look for his mother, but he meant to make Nellie as comfortable as possible first. His movements soon awoke her, and though he could not persuade her to eat much, she drank a little of the tea left from the night before, which he had re-warmed. The meal he made from the remainder of yesterday's feast, was scarcely better than hers, for he felt anxious and worried.

Something dreadful must have happened to have kept his mother away all night. As cheerfully as he could, he told Nellie he was "going to fetch mother," which seemed to satisfy her; and though her thin little arms clasped his neck even more tightly than usual when she gave him her good-bye kiss, she let him leave her without a murmur. His errand proved fruitless; his mother had left the warehouse about five o'clock in the afternoon with the money that had been paid her, but without any fresh work. This was all he could ascertain. All sorts of fearful fancies crowded into his mind, as he dejectedly retraced his steps. Perhaps she had been murdered for the sake of the money—he had heard of such things; perhaps she had gone to seek work elsewhere, and, losing her way in the fog, had been overtaken by the night, and was wearily finding her way home even now. But the whole day and another night, passed with no news of her, and he began to feel sure that something dreadful had happened to prevent her from coming home to them. What was he to do? He knew of no one to whom he could turn for help. Thick and fast the shadows had been falling lately round the desolate family, and now, indeed, it seemed as if every glimmering of hope was quenched in thickest darkness. With this trouble came a new sense of responsibility. Paul felt that he must be doing something, for Nellie seemed worse, and now she had only him to take care of her. The landlady had been up-stairs asking for her rent again, and had told him, that it was good broth she wanted, but that as she couldn't afford to give it her, and as their mother seemed to have taken herself off and left them for somebody else to take care of, they'd better go into the "house." Paul begged her to give them one more week's shelter; his mother would never leave them, "he was sure."

"It's my belief she's either run away or made away with 'erself," the woman replied.

Paul smothered his anger at this suggestion, and, having gained an unwilling consent to his request, went out to try and earn the money to redeem his violin, for if after all he had to sell it, he felt sure it ought to bring them several shillings, as he had often heard his father say that it had cost a great deal of money. "And, Nellie dear," he whispered, before he left her, "you 'd better ask for pennies again to-day, for we want 'em bad enough. And mother, ask——" he could say no more, but Nellie understood him, and giving her a reassuring pat, he went away, feeling as if he had the world upon his shoulders.

After three hours waiting about, he earned fourpence by carrying a portmanteau home for its owner. He immediately hurried off to the eating-house.

"If you please, sir, I've come for my violin," he said breathlessly, tendering the money to the master of the shop.

"Oh, you 'ave, 'ave you? What's your little game now, I should like to know? I s'pose that's every penny you've got, or you'd like me to think so. I'm not goin' to give you anything more on trust, you young rascal! An' you with money in your pocket all the time to go and buy fried fish!"

Paul attempted to explain.

"A likely story that!" replied the man incredulously. "I kept your fiddle for you yesterday, accord'n' to promise; but you can keep your thrippence, for it's gone now!"

"Gone!" echoed Paul faintly, and with a glance of reproachful misery he turned to leave the shop, but the floor seemed to rise before his uncertain footsteps, there was a rushing in his ears, a dark mist swam before his eyes, and he felt himself falling.

"What's the good o' crowdin'? Here, carry him into the parlour." The same voice was speaking that had a moment ago carried such despair to the boy's heart, but he heard it as if it had nothing to do with him and with a faint sensation of surprise, such as we sometimes experience in dreams, felt himself raised and carried somewhere. When he next opened his eyes, their languid glance encountered the puzzled gaze of the master of the shop. In a moment everything came rushing back to him, and he made an attempt to struggle into a sitting posture, with a vague intention of getting away.

"Come, come; easy now! There wasn't no call for all this fuss!" said the man. "Your fiddle's safe enough, d'ye hear?"

Paul covered his face with his hands and burst into tears, but he was too much a boy to let such weakness overpower him long, and was soon able to hear how it happened that his violin could not be restored to him at a moment's notice.

"You see," began the man, "Mr. Chester—that's our parson—comes in yesterday quite friendly—as he often does, for he's a pleasant sort o' man, an' a real gentleman—an' ses he, 'Davis, where did you get that instrument?' for I'd 'ung it up in the shop. So I told him the whole business, an', what's more, I ses, 'I believe it's stole, an' the boy didn't know where to get rid of it, an' has got frightened an' palmed it off on me for what he could get."

Paul opened his mouth indignantly. "'Old your tongue, my boy," continued Davis. "Nothin's proved either for or against you yet. 'Owever, stole or not stole, Mr. Chester's got it; for, ses he, 'The lad's not cheated you, Davis, if he never comes again, for I shouldn't be surprised if that violin was worth a good sum.'—'All the worse, sir,' ses I. 'How's a poor boy like that got anything o' that kind honestly?'—'Well,' ses he, 'I believe from what you tell me that this is the boy I've been looking for this long time. I was goin' to see 'im an' 'is mother just before I was ill, an' then I lost sight of 'em. So,' ses he, 'if you'll let me pay the boy's dinner, an' have the instrument, I'll take the risk.' So ses I, 'Take it, an' welcome, sir!' An' he ses, 'When he comes, which I think he will, send 'im round to me, for if it's the same boy, the violin's his father's, Davis.'"

"Where is he?" asked Paul, his face glowing with hope and excitement, for he felt that this must be the clergyman who had seemed so kind, and of whose broken promise he had spoken so bitterly to Nellie. "I must go to 'im—now, directly!"

"Well, I'll go round with you; it ain't so very far," said Davis, with suspicion still in his glance.

Paul thanked him eagerly, and waited with impatience while he added a coat and hat to his costume. After a short tram ride they alighted at Mr. Chester's house, were admitted, and ushered into what seemed, to the boy's unaccustomed eyes, a luxuriously furnished room. But before many moments all his attention was absorbed by a familiar object, for there upon the table lay his violin. With a glad cry he sprang forward, and took it into his trembling hands. Then the door opened, and Paul, turning eagerly with the exclamation, "Oh, sir, I've got the money, an' I want my violin!" found himself gazing into the kind face he had described as being "good to look at."

"All in good time, my boy," replied Mr. Chester; "but I want a little talk with you first."

Very soon his sympathetic questions had drawn from the boy the whole story of the troubles of the last few weeks, ending with the disappearance of his mother. He shook his head gravely over that.

"Well, my boy," he said kindly, "we will do our best to find her; but first of all we must try and arrange something for Nellie. Come, we will go to her at once. Stay, have you had anything to eat?" Paul replied that he did not want anything; but Mr. Chester sent for some broth, which he made him drink; some more was put into a bottle, and, taking a thick travelling-rug over his arm, he and Paul set out.

CHAPTER III.

When they arrived, Mr. Chester found Nellie looking so weak and ill that he changed his first purpose, which had been to make her as comfortable as possible till he could get her admitted into a hospital. So, sending the boy for a cab, he went down-stairs to pay the landlady the rent owing to her, and a week over. He then told her to keep the room vacant for that time, in case of her lodger's reappearance, leaving his address, so that he might be communicated with at once if any news of her was received. By the time Paul returned, these arrangements were completed, and wrapping the little invalid first in the miserable bedclothes, and then in the rug, he carried her tenderly down to the cab, and placing her in her brother's arms, told the man to drive to his house. Paul's joy may be imagined when he was informed of Mr. Chester's purpose. There had been a prospect of separation from Nellie, for, during their walk from his house, he had made a proposal which Paul had thought it his duty to gratefully accept, even though it involved leaving her in the care of strangers. She was to have been taken to a hospital, or left in Mrs. Smith's care, while he was to enter Mr. Chester's service. In any case he was to earn the help and care his benefactor intended bestowing upon him, by cleaning knives, boots, windows, running errands, etc., out of school-time. For that he should go regularly to school Mr. Chester insisted.

"Of course when your mother comes back we shall have to make different arrangements for Nellie, but I am sure she will be glad to let you come to me," said Mr. Chester; "you will be fed and clothed and taught, and we will see what else we can do to help her; the next thing will be to do our best to find her."

"But I'm 'fraid all I can do won't be worth what all that'll cost, sir," said Paul gratefully; "I'd like to work all day, an' then it wouldn't pay you, I know."

"I think it will, my boy," replied Mr. Chester kindly; "for, remember, I shall expect you to work hard; there will be no more playing in the streets, you know; and in return for what I am doing for you, I shall ask you to leave your violin in my care for the present. I shall let you have it at certain stated times, when your work is done. Then you will be able to feel that you are really helping to earn your own and Nellie's living—and that is what you want, is it not?"

"That it is," said Paul; "but there'll be lots left to thank you for, only some'ow I don't mind bein' grateful to you for it."

A few days' experience of his new life strengthened this feeling, and he determined that he would show his gratitude, by taking pains to do everything he was told, as well as it could be done. There was no lack of employment for him, for there were three boys in the house besides himself—"his family," Mr. Chester called them, though they did not bear his name, and but for his paternal care would have been destitute. Paul was to be added to their number.

Seven years before, when the young wife died whom Mr. Chester had loved with a depth of affection their year of companionship had only increased, he had determined, as he had no idea of marrying again, to spend such a proportion of his income as would have been required to bring up a family, upon the maintenance of six orphan and destitute boys, to be chosen by him from time to time, as circumstances brought them under his notice. Three had already been inmates of his home for some time, and, having finished their compulsory course at the board school, were helping to earn their own living in various capacities.

The uncertainty concerning his mother made it very hard for the boy to fix his attention upon the tasks set him in anticipation of his beginning again at the board school, which he had already attended in a desultory fashion up till now. But his suspense did not last long. About a week after his arrival he was sent for to go to Mr. Chester's room. The moment the boy saw his face he knew that something had been heard about his mother, and that it was something sad.

"My boy," he said tenderly, "at last we have heard."

"What?" asked Paul.

"That your mother has been taken away from her troubles," he replied.

"How? Have you seen her? Are you sure?" asked the boy, wondering dimly that he could not cry.

"You were quite right, Paul; she did not leave you willingly, nor did she take her own life, as Mrs. Smith believed," said Mr. Chester, encircling the boy with his arm. "There were two or three accidents that day; but she just fainted from exhaustion, was taken into a police-station, and never recovered."

"I can't—I ain't goin' to believe it!" Paul burst out. "What, while I was stuffin' away like a animal! It's too bad to be true! Why, often she's give me the last bit o' bread, an' gone without 'erself! 'I ain't a 'ungry growing boy,' she'd say, jest to pretend!"

"My dear boy," said Mr. Chester, drawing the boy closer to him, "I know how you feel; you didn't know, or you'd have gone to her help; but what could you have done? And that meal helped you to look after Nellie. Don't you think she would have been glad of that?"

Paul burst into tears. "But she didn't know," he sobbed.

"There is one thing you may feel sure of—she knows now all that is needed to make her happy," replied Mr. Chester, "for, from all you tell me, your dear mother trusted in God through all her troubles. I am sure she was a good woman, Paul; but it is a sad Christmas for you. God bless and comfort you, my boy. Shall we tell Him all about it before you go to Nellie?"

Paul nodded, and, kneeling side by side, the loving sympathetic man spoke for the grief-stricken boy in simple words to the great "Father of the fatherless," commending him and his sister so earnestly to His care and keeping, that the young mourner rose from his knees feeling comforted and strengthened to bear the grief which only time could cure.

"And now, Paul," he said, "will you undertake to tell Nellie, or shall Miss Chester do so?—for I must leave you, as I have a great deal of business to arrange."

"I will, please; she's more used to me," said Paul, and pressing the kind hand that grasped his own gratefully to his lips, he went immediately to perform his sad task. Nellie took the news more quietly than he had expected. She seemed consoled when she heard that some day she would go to her mother if she were a good little girl, although it might be a long time first, and that Paul would stay with her.

As soon as he left her, Paul went to his usual tasks, although his heart ached sadly over them; for he felt that he must do all in his power to show his gratitude to his benefactors. There was plenty for him to do, for the next day would be Christmas Eve, and the usual bustle of preparation for the festival was increased, by the distribution of gifts to the poor of the parish.

"Well, boys," said Mr. Chester, when at the end of the day they were all assembled for prayers, "I think you heard the news of our rector's death last week?"

"Yes, sir," said the eldest of the three; "it won't be a very merry Christmas for Mrs. Beauchamp and the young ladies."

Paul listened with interest; he had heard a great deal of conversation going on between the boys on the subject during the last week.

"No, indeed," replied Mr. Chester; "and it will make a great deal of difference to us; to you boys it will bring, or be the means of bringing, a longer holiday from evening work, I expect."

"We shan't mind that, sir; though of course we're sorry for the reason," answered one of the lads.

"I daresay I shall find you something else to do," said Mr. Chester.

"Bravo! All right, sir. We're ready!" came in an eager chorus from all.

"You saw the gentleman who read the lessons this morning?" asked Mr. Chester, smiling indulgently upon this natural outburst. "Well, that is our new rector."

This statement was received in silence.

"And," he continued, "he will not require my help."

There was a chorus of indignant protest.

"I hoped, as you all know," continued Mr. Chester, "to spend the rest of my life among the people here, but it was not to be. Two months ago a small living was offered me, which I declined. Last week, knowing that it was still vacant, I wrote to recall my refusal; yesterday I heard that I was appointed."

"Then you'll be vicar, sir; isn't that better?" asked one of the boys.

"For some things, perhaps, yes," replied Mr. Chester gravely; "only I would rather have remained here as curate. But the new rector is young and strong, and intends to do without a curate, so next week we must begin to move."

A fortnight later saw them installed in their new home, in a poor and populous district, situated in a north-western suburb of London. Then came school and the many occupations of his new life to weaken the impression, which had at first been so strong in the boy's mind, that his mother could not be dead. Paul's happiness and gratitude increased with every day. It was so delightful to see Nellie looking so neat and pretty in the nice warm clothes that he was assured his labour helped to provide for her. She was looking so well too, and Miss Chester was beginning to teach her her letters. Even had his service been worth all that was spent on them, which the boy knew well enough it was not, he felt that nothing could repay the love and care they received. Only one attainable desire was left ungratified, and that was the possession of his violin. It was not long before this joy was added to his daily life. About six weeks after they had settled at the vicarage, Mr. Chester called Paul to him one evening, and, telling him that he felt sure he could trust him not to use the instrument "while any duty was left undone," restored it to him. A few days later Paul was delighting himself and the boys, just before prayer-time, by his performance of "Hark! the herald angels sing," when Mr. Chester entered unperceived by him, and, holding up a warning finger to those who were aware of his presence, took up his station behind the young musician.

"Well done, Paul!" he said, laying his hand kindly on the boy's shoulder as the last jubilant note died away; "I had no idea you could play as well as that."

Nothing more was said on the subject then, but the following Saturday, Paul was told to put on his best clothes and prepare to accompany Mr. Chester in his afternoon walk. Hitherto his duties had deprived him of this pleasure, which was generally conferred on the boy who had worked hardest at lessons during the week.

"I wonder what's up now?" cried one of the boys bursting into the room where Paul awaited the summons to join Mr. Chester. "You're to take your violin, youngster! I was told to say so!"

What could be the meaning of this command, Paul was almost afraid to guess; something pleasant, he felt sure. He was not kept long in suspense. Mr. Chester told him that he was taking him to see a very clever violinist; "so play your best, Paul," he said, "for if he thinks you have talent enough to make it worth while, I will try and arrange to get some lessons for you—not from Herr Schroeder himself—that would be too expensive; but from someone who can teach you all you will want to know for the present."

Paul began to stammer out his eager thanks.

"Stop—don't be too excited," said Mr. Chester with his kind smile; "there is nothing settled yet, you know."

"Suppose the gentleman's out, sir?" suggested Paul.

"I made an appointment with him," answered Mr. Chester. "Don't be frightened!"

"I'll try not to," Paul replied. But, in spite of his efforts to control his excitement, when half an hour later he stood in the maestro's presence, it was with an unsteady hand that he drew the bow across the strings, although the gentleman was apparently paying no attention to him.

"Stop!" cried Herr Schroeder in an excited tone after Paul's first two or three notes; "give me your violin!"

"'Carry him into the parlour.'"—p. 74.

Paul obeyed; and the musician, taking it into his hand, examined it closely, then began to play—first little snatches, interspersed with exclamations of delight; then when he had, as it were, tried the temper of the instrument, he burst into a brilliant "Rapsodie," while the boy listened, his face glowing with appreciation.

"Beautiful!" exclaimed the player enthusiastically as he lowered his bow; "it is worth much—ach! very much—money. Will you sell it? I will give fifty pounds now, and after—say, three months—fifty more, to have that violin"

"It is a Cremona, then?" asked Mr. Chester with interest.

"A genuine Stradivarius!" replied Herr Schroeder; and he began to point out to his eager listeners the proofs of his statement.

"Well, Paul, what do you say? Will you sell it? It is yours," said Mr. Chester, watching the boy's changing countenance.

"It isn't mine—not yet," cried Paul. "But, oh, sir, please don't sell it—my father's violin; it is yours, of course; but some day I will pay you. I can't let it go; you are rich—you don't want for nothing—an' he wouldn't when he was often hungry an' ill."

"I will not sell it, Paul; don't be afraid," said Mr. Chester, exchanging glances with the maestro. "But remember, my boy, what the money would mean to you. No more work to do, before and after lessons; we could pay another boy to do that."

"That is scarcely fair—to tempt the boy with such motives," began Herr Schroeder.

Paul laughed with the tears in his eyes.

"I can work!" he said. "I will try to do more; but if we ain't costin' too much, sir, I'd rather keep father's violin!"

The musician nodded approvingly, and, handing the instrument back to him, told him to play something.

"Good," he said, when Paul had finished playing; "you will keep it, my young friend, and I shall teach you to play; only you shall lend me your violin when I will play at some grand concerts, and, with permission, you shall be there to hear. How will that do?"

Paul turned red and white with excitement, and, stepping eagerly forward, placed the instrument in the maestro's hand; then, with sudden dutiful remembrance, turned with an appealing glance to Mr. Chester, as if asking approval of his action.

"You are most kind, Schroeder," said Mr. Chester, with as much gratitude as if the benefit had been conferred on himself.—"Ah! my boy, I never dreamed of this for you," he continued, turning to Paul; "why, this gentleman will not teach some people who can pay him well."

"Ah! no, where is the good if they do not love music? There are many who think they do; but they will not work, and they cannot lend me a Stradivarius," said Herr Schroeder. "And now," he continued, "you shall come every Saturday afternoon at this time, for a half-hour at first; you will be punctual; and we shall see if the enthusiasm lasts. Never mind to thank me; your thanks shall be to work hard. Next Saturday, then, I shall see you again."

With reiterated thanks to the benevolent musician, they prepared to return.

"Can you spare me a few minutes more?" asked Mr. Chester.

"I have an appointment at four," replied Herr Schroeder; "but I shall be pleased to walk a little way with you."

"Thanks; then, Paul, you walk on, and if I do not overtake you before, wait for me by the station."

"Well, what do you think of him?" he asked enthusiastically, as soon as the boy was out of hearing.

"He has been taught, I perceive," replied Herr Schroeder; "but how much, I cannot tell; if not much, he is clever. He will be clever, I think."

"But do you think him clever enough to look forward to a successful musical career?" asked Mr. Chester earnestly.

"Ach! I cannot say; in his position I would not trust to it. It is hard work at first; it takes time, and money to live while studying, and friends—unless he is something marvellous. Give him a trade, my friend; and after, if he can be great—good—he will be; and the greater that it was not too easy."

"I suppose you are right," was the disappointed reply; "and it would not be fair to the other boys, to spend an undue portion of time and money on an uncertainty. But you are giving your time—you must think he shows promise."

"I like the boy; and—you forget the violin. We shall see."

But we must hasten over the next four years, which passed rapidly away, bringing the brother and sister to a fresh epoch of their existence. Nellie, now in her tenth year, began to attend a middle-class school, where she was to be trained for the position of mistress; and Paul was placed with a firm of music-publishers. This new order of things brought the lessons, which had been mutually delightful to master and pupil, to an end. Paul, however, resolved that Herr Schroeder's kindness should not be thrown away, and continued to give every spare moment to the study and practice of music with unabated enthusiasm.

CHAPTER IV.

"YOU are quite right, Nellie; I ought to have noticed it before."

It was Paul who spoke. Brother and sister were walking home from church together, and his words were in answer to what she had been saying to him a day or two before.

"He works too hard, that's what it is; he ought to have gone for his holiday in the autumn. I wonder why he would not."

"Oh, Paul, don't you know?" answered Nellie. "I heard him tell Miss Chester he could not afford it, he said there were so many in the parish wanting help; he is so good! I wish I could earn money to help, like you, Paul."

"Ah, and that was just before Parker and Beale came to the house; he could afford that, you see," remarked her brother.

"Yes; and Miss Chester told me there were others he would like to have, but he cannot, and that is what is worrying him so. Oh, Paul, don't you want to help him?"

"Of course; but what can I do yet?" he asked.

Nellie could not answer him. She knew that her brother was always at work of one kind or another.

But suddenly into Paul's mind flashed the answer to his own question. His violin! But no, he could not part with it. He said nothing to Nellie, but for the next week or two the idea haunted him, and took half the pleasure out of his practice. There was a sharp struggle between gratitude and his own inclinations, but the better feeling conquered at last. If Herr Schroeder would promise not to part with the violin, he should have it until Paul could save money enough to buy it back. It would take years to do this, he knew; and it was with a very sad heart that he presented himself to his late master a week or two later, and offered him his instrument.

"What does it mean? 'You want money?' Ach! you are in debt?" asked Herr Schroeder in surprise.

"No, no," cried Paul; "at least, yes—to Mr. Chester and to you—but——"

"You are not in debt? Then you are discouraged? You find difficulties?"

"It is not that," began Paul; and then, encouraged by his friend's kind interest, he told him the whole story.

"My boy, I will buy it," said Herr Schroeder. "I know what it costs you, but I will not seek to turn you from your generous purpose."

Paul blushed. "I don't deserve any praise, sir," he said; "it was a long time before I could make up my mind. After all, I owe everything to him; and, you know, I am hoping that some day I shall be able to buy it back again."

"Well, we will see," replied the musician. "We will speak of that afterwards; now let me hear how you have studied. Play me something."

Silently Paul took his instrument into his hands—as he thought, for the last time probably—and played as the maestro had never heard him play before.

"Who has taught you?" he cried, when the sweet sounds had ceased.

"Only yourself, sir," replied Paul modestly; "but I have had two years' practice since my last lesson."

"Then I am proud of my pupil," said Herr Schroeder enthusiastically. "God has given you a great talent, but you have done wonders with it; pity that you and your instrument must part—yet I am selfish. I have, however, an idea. I will write you now a cheque for fifty pounds, and lend you a good violin—not like your own, but good enough till you can buy it back again. This you shall do by playing for me at the recitals I am about to give, in the New Year. Each evening you play for me, you shall say, 'There is paid three, or perhaps five, guineas of the money to buy back my dear father's violin.' Ach! what do you say?"

"I play in public? Oh, my master, and as your pupil?" Paul stammered with a radiant face.

"We must, of course, first consult your more than father," continued Herr Schroeder; "and if he will, for the present you shall be my guest; yes indeed, for there is still something to be learnt; and it will be more convenient so. No thanks. You shall bring me a great success this winter."

Paul felt as if treading upon air as he hurried home with his cheque in his pocket, and it is difficult to say whether the giver or the receiver of it felt most pleasure in devoting it to its charitable purpose. Mr. Chester, always convinced of his protégé's gratitude, was profoundly touched by this fresh proof of it.

"My dear Paul," he said, when he heard of Herr Schroeder's kind proposal, "we shall miss you sadly, but I must not allow a selfish affection to stand in the way of your advancement. There is no saying to what great things this may lead for you. There is only one stipulation I wish to make; do not give up your present employment till success is assured in the career you hope to adopt."

Paul readily promised to do as Mr. Chester wished. The following week saw him and his belongings transferred to Herr Schroeder's house.

At last the eventful evening has arrived. Mr. and Miss Chester, Nellie and the boys, are at the hall. The first part of the programme is over, and there is a stir, a murmur of expectation and comment, as the youthful débutant steps upon the platform and makes his bow to the audience. Some of his new musical friends greet his appearance with applause; but it is not only their generous encouragement which brings such a happy look of modest confidence to his face. A moment before Herr Schroeder had handed him his father's violin, and he feels that if anything could help him to do credit to his kind patron, it is the sensation of perfect comprehension of its capabilities, and of loving familiarity with which he grasps it. Raising it to his shoulder, he listens to the first few bars of introduction, and then, as if he "had caught confessions of its secret thought," he and his violin soon hold the audience spellbound. During the excitement produced by his performance, a lady is removed from the hall in a fainting condition. At last his ordeal is over, and he is receiving the delighted congratulations of his friends, when he is informed that a lady is waiting to see him in an ante-room.

"Come, my friend," says Herr Schroeder, "perhaps it is some great person who wishes to engage your services for her next 'At Home.'"

As they entered the room together, a tall, middle-aged lady started forward.

"Paul!" she exclaimed, "don't you know me—my son! my dear boy!"

"Mother!" he cried. For it was indeed his mother restored to him at this moment of triumph, to make his happiness complete. Then Nellie was sent for, and Mr. and Miss Chester. After some conversation the little family, reunited after their long separation, went together to the hotel where Mrs. Cichowski was staying, for there was much to hear and to relate on both sides. Before they parted she told them how she had been knocked down by a cab while crossing the street, and having sustained such severe injuries as to become unconscious, had been taken to a hospital. There were no means of finding out anything about her, and it was three weeks before she was able to give an account of herself, or send to inquire after her children. When her messenger returned she learnt, not only that the children had disappeared, but that the house was occupied by other tenants, who knew nothing of them. After being discharged from the hospital she spent the first money she earned in advertising their disappearance; but as it was in a paper that Mr. Chester never saw, and there was no one else who took any interest in them, the advertisement of course produced no result. Then she lost heart and courage, and after a hard struggle was obliged to go into the workhouse for a time. "God's goodness sent me friends there, who helped me to procure work," she said; "but it was a hard life, and disappointing, for all my spare time and money were spent in looking for my children, without any sign of success. At last a lady who was interested in my sad story, got me the post of attendant to the patients in a hydropathic establishment. There, a year ago, I met my kind friend and employer Miss Proctor. As soon as she was well enough, she promised me she would take me with her to London, and we would begin a fresh search for my children. We only arrived last night, and the first thing I saw on leaving the hotel this morning, was my son's name. I was sure it was you, my boy; the name is uncommon. And so Miss Proctor brought me to hear you p'ay to-night."

There is little more to tell. For a time Miss Proctor retained Mrs. Cichowski's services as companion, remaining in London that she might be near her children; but before another New Year had dawned Paul was able to provide a home for her and Nellie, near their good kind friends at the vicarage. For his first success had been followed by others; engagements poured in, and he was able to enter, with every prospect of earning fame and success, upon the career of which his father had dreamed for him, and in the hope of which he had worked so perseveringly. Nor did he forget the lessons of love to God and man learnt under Mr. Chester's care; for with the cordial approval of his mother, he devoted a tenth of all he earned to the maintenance of "the Home," in the hope that his thank-offering might be the means of helping to bring others "Out of the Shadows" of poverty, ignorance, and misery, which once lowered so darkly on his own path.
